The general went to the king and said: “The citizens are angry with you, Great King.” When asked by the king about the reason, he said: “Because you alone are attending to the Buddha and they do not have such a chance, so they say. Great King, it is not too late yet. If they were given permission to serve the Buddha, they would no longer be angry. If not, they say they will give battle against you.” Then the king replied: “General, I shall wage war but by no means shall I give up right to serve the Saṅgha.” – “Great King,” said the general, putting the king in a difficult position, “your servicemen are threatening that they will take up arms against you. Whom would you call up to encounter the looming war?” – “Are not you my general?” asked the king persuasively. “I cannot fight after being separated from the citizens, Great King,” said the general.

The king then realized: “The force of the citizens is great. The general too is one of them.” He therefore made a request, saying: “In that case, friends, let me feed the Saṅgha for another period of seven years and seven months only.” But the citizens did not agree and rejected the request. The king reduced the duration of his proposed gift step by step to six years, five years, and so on and finally to seven days. Then the people came to a unanimous decision, saying among themselves: “Now that the king has asked for only seven days to perform the act of food offering, it is not good for us to be so stubborn in [1179] rivalry with him.”

King Bandhuma gave away, in seven days, all his offerings, which were meant for seven years and seven months. For the first six days, he did so without letting the people see. On the seventh day, however, he invited the citizens and showed them his grand gift offering, saying this to sound them out: “Friends, will you be capable of giving such a grand alms giving (dāna)?” – “Great King,” retorted the citizens, “your gift took place only with our help, isn’t it?” And he asserted it was true. “Yes, we are capable,” they said. Wiping the tears with the back of his palm, the king paid respects to the Buddha and said: “My dear son, exalted Buddha, I have decided to support you together with 168,000 monks for life with the four requisites, giving no assignments to others. But now I am compelled to allow the people to attend to you. In fact, they were angry with me and complaining about the deprivation of their right of giving alms. My son, exalted Buddha, from tomorrow onwards, please do allow them to serve you!” Thus did he pathetically utter words of compliance in his despair. The next day, the general gave a grand gift to the Saṅgha with the Buddha at its head, according to the agreement he had with the people.

Faithful Sumanā

On the day allotted to him the general, while supervising his grand gift (mahā-āna), issued the order saying: “Care must be taken so that no other person should get a chance to offer even a spoonful or ladleful of rice,” and he placed sentries to keep watch around the area. That very day, a widow of a wealthy merchant of Bandhumatī was crying in great distress because she did not get a chance to offer her share of gifts on the first day. She complained pitifully, saying to her daughter who had just come back from the games she had been playing with her 500 female playmates: “My darling daughter, if your father were alive, today I could have been the first to feed the Buddha.” The daughter responded with words of comfort: “Mother, please do not worry! I will do something so that the Saṅgha, headed by the Buddha, will accept and partake of our meal first.”

After that, the daughter filled the gold bowl which was worth 100,000 coins with milk rice unmixed with water. She added butter, honey, molasses, etc. to enrich the food. She covered it with another gold bowl turned upside down and tied both the gold bowls with garlands of jasmine so that it might look like a garland of flowers. When the Buddha entered the city, she carried it herself on her head and left the house in a company of her many attendants. On the way a dialogue took place between the wealthy lady and the watchmen:

Watchmen: Do not come here, daughter!

Lady: Dear uncles! Why don't you allow me to go?<sup>266</sup>

Watchmen: We are to keep watch by the general's order, that nobody else must be allowed to offer alms food, daughter.

Lady: But, uncles, do you see any food in our hands that warrants you to bar me like this?

Watchmen: We see only the garland of flowers.

<sup>266</sup> People of past good deeds speak endearing words, and others are not able to reject their repeated request.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1759

Lady: Well, did your general say even an offering of flowers was not allowable?

Watchmen: As for an offering of flowers, it is allowable, daughter.

The lady then said to the watchmen: “In that case please go away. Do not prevent us, uncles,” and she went to the Buddha and offered her gift with a request: “Please, exalted Buddha, accept my offering of a garland of flowers.”

The Buddha glanced at a watchman, signalling him to bring the floral garland. The lady made obeisance and said: “Exalted Buddha, may my life throughout Samsāra be free from want and worry. May I be lovable to many, like this garland of jasmine (sumanā) flowers, and may I be named Sumanā in all my coming existences.” [1180] The Buddha answered: “May you be well and happy,” and the lady then paid respects to him joyfully and departed.

The Buddha went to the general’s house and took the seat prepared for him. The general brought rice gruel and offered it him. The Buddha covered the bowl with his hand. The general thought that the Buddha did not accept the gruel because the monks had not all come yet. When all had come, the general reported to the Buddha saying that all were present and seated. The Buddha said: “We have already had a bowl of food which we received on the way. When the covering jasmines were removed from the bowls the milk rice with puffs of steam was found. Then the general’s young serviceman who had brought the floral garland said: “General, I have been cheated by a lady who told me that it was just a garland of flowers.” The milk rice was sufficient for all the monks beginning with the Buddha. Only after giving the milk rice to the Buddha did the general hand over the offerings that were made by himself. When the partaking of food was over, the Buddha delivered a discourse on auspiciousness and left.

When the Buddha had left, the general asked his men about the lady’s name and they told her that she was the daughter of a wealthy merchant. “What a wise woman she is! If such a wise woman administers a household, it may not be difficult for the householder to attain divine pleasures.” Speaking in praise of the lady, the general managed to take her in marriage and placed her as the mistress of the house.

While taking charge of the wealth of both houses, her father’s as well as the general’s, she gave gifts to the Buddha till the end of her life. She was reborn in the celestial abode, the world of sense pleasures. At that very moment, a rain of jasmines fell heavily, filling the whole divine city to about knee deep. “This divine damsel has brought her own name, even by herself,” so saying all the Devas named her Sumanā Devī.

Sumanā Devī had no suffering states for 91 aeons, taking rebirth in divine and human abodes. Wherever she was reborn, there rained jasmines continuously and she continued to be known only as Sumanā Devī or Sumanā Kumārī. In the Dispensation of the present Buddha, she was born of King Kosala’s Chief Queen. Simultaneously, in the households of the king’s various ministers, all her maids were born on the same day as Sumanā. At that very moment jasmine flowers rained very heavily to about knee deep.

Seeing that phenomenon, the king thought: “My daughter must have done a unique act of merit in the past,” and became overjoyed. “My daughter has brought her name by herself,” and he let her bear the very name Sumanā. Pondering: “My daughter must not have been born alone,” the King had her birth-mates searched for all over the city and hearing that 500 girls were born, the king took the responsibility for feeding, nursing and bringing up all the 500 birth-mates. He also ordered that each month the 500 girls must be brought and presented to his daughter.

When Princess Sumanā was seven, the Buddha, in the company of monks, visited Sāvattthī as he had been invited by the wealthy Anāthapiṇḍika through a messenger, for he had completed the construction of the Jetavana monastery. Anāthapiṇḍika went to King Kosala and said: “Great King, the Fortunate One’s visit to our city of Sāvattthī means auspiciousness for you and us. Therefore, please send Princess Sumanā and her 500 maids with water-filled pots, perfumes, flowers, etc. to welcome the Fortunate One and receive him. The king replied, saying: “Very well,” and did as told by the merchant. Under the orders of the king, Sumanā approached the Buddha and paid him homage with perfumes, flowers, etc. and stood at a suitable distance. When the Buddha taught Sumanā, even on his way, she and all her companions were established together in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). So were the 500 girls, 500 women and 500 male lay devotees established in the same fruition at the Buddha’s assembly. In this way, on the day the Buddha visited the monastery, before he reached it but while on the way, 2,000 people became Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna).

When the princess came of age, King Kosala gave her 500 chariots and emblems of royalty so that she might use them on her travel with her 500 [1181] companions. In those days, there were three women who received 500 chariots and royal emblems from their parents. They were:

1. Cundī, daughter of King Bimbisāra.
2. Visākhā, daughter of the wealthy merchant Dhanañjaya.
3. Sumanā, daughter of King Kosala.

As had been said, the day after the general had the permission from the king and performed his great gift (mahā-dāna) to the Buddha on a grand scale. The citizens organized an offering that was greater than the king's and gave great gifts to the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha. When the meal-offering by the whole city was accomplished, the villagers near the city-gate arranged to pay homage, as it was their turn to do so.

Then the householder Mahākāla discussed with his younger brother Cūlakāla: “Our turn to pay homage to the Fortunate One is tomorrow. What kind of homage shall we offer?” – “Brother,” replied Cūlakāla, “please think by yourself of what is proper.” Then Mahākāla said: “Dear brother, if you follow my plan, from our land of 28 acres,<sup>267</sup> full of ripening fine rice paddy, we shall take out the newly ripened paddy from the ears and cook milk rice, which is befitting to the Fortunate One.” Cūlakāla presented his view: “Brother, if we do so, nobody will be benefited. Therefore I do not agree to that.”

Then Mahākāla said: “If you do not agree to it, I wish to have my share of property.” So the 28 acres of land was divided into two halves, each measuring 14 acres and a fence was erected in the middle of the two portions. Then Mahākāla took out the tender grain from the ears, to which he added milk unmixed with water. He had it cooked and the four sweet things (catu-madhu) put to it, and offered:

1. The first food to the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha.

The strange thing was that the ears from which the grain had been taken out became full again with grain as before. It was a gift of the first grain formed in their earliest stage of development. Mahākāla similarly gave the following in generosity:

2. The first portion of the paddy that had partially developed to yield newly appeared grain, yet to be pounded.
3. The first portion of the paddy that had fully developed or ripened.
4. The first portion of the paddy that had been reaped.
5. The first portion of the paddy that had been made into sheaves.
6. The first portion of the paddy that had been piled up in sheaves.
7. The first portion of the paddy that had been threshed.
8. The first portion of the paddy that had been winnowed.
9. The first portion of the paddy that had been stored up in the granary.

In this way, each time he grew paddy, he accomplished gifts of the first portion (agga-dāna) nine times. And never did the harvest of his paddy become low despite his gifts. In fact, the amount of paddy even increased and became bigger than before. This indeed was his wholesome deed in connection with his expressed aspiration made in the past.

The virtuous Mahākāla, the future Koṇḍañña, performed deeds of merit in this way throughout the Buddha's life as well as throughout his own, and he wandered from the human abode to the divine abode and back and enjoyed divine and human luxuries.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

When our Buddha was about to arise he was reborn in a wealthy Brahmin family in the village of Doṇavatthu, near the city of Kapilavatthu. On his naming day, the young Brahmin was given the name of Koṇḍañña. While being brought up, he was educated in the three Vedas and was accomplished in the physiognomy of a great man.

At that time, our Buddha had passed away from the Tusita Realm and was conceived in the womb of Mahā Māyā, Chief Queen of King Suddhodana of Kapilavatthu, and was later duly born. On the naming day, the king presented 108 Brahmins with absolutely new garments and fed them with sweet pure milk rice. He selected from among them eight highly intelligent Brahmin wise men and let them be seated in serial order in the courtyard. He then had the little prince, the Bodhisatta, put down on white linen and brought to the Brahmins who were to examine the baby's body-marks.

The Brahmin, who occupied the first seat among the eight, raised his two fingers and [1182] predicted: "If this boy remains a layman, he will become a Universal Monarch. If he lives an ascetic life, he will definitely become a Buddha in the three worlds!" In the same way six more Brahmins declared the same by putting up two fingers. Of those eight Brahmins, Koṇḍañña was the youngest. When his turn to predict came, he studied very carefully the marks on the body, and noticed that the one who would become a Universal Monarch should not have the mark of a Universal Monarch on his soles, but the boy had that mark on his soles, so he put up only one finger, boldly predicting: "There is absolutely no reason for the prince to stay in a household. The prince will indeed become a Buddha!"

After the predictions, the wise Brahmins went back to their respective homes and summoned their sons and gave instructions saying: "Dear sons, we have become old. We may or may not be living by the time Prince Siddhattha, son of King Suddhodana, attains omniscient Buddhahood. When the prince does, you, dear sons, should become monks in his Dispensation."

King Suddhodana brought up his son in comfort by providing him with protection, facilities and resources beginning with his appointment of attendants. When he became sixteen years of age, the prince enjoyed Deva-like royal luxuries and at the age of 29, when he became intellectually more mature, he saw the disadvantages of sense-pleasures and the advantages of renunciation. So, on the day his own son Rāhula was born, he performed a great act of renunciation by riding the royal steed, Kanthaka, in the company of his coeval and personal officer, Channa, going through the city-gate that was opened by the Devas.

On that single night, he passed through the three cities of Kapilavatthu, Koliya and Devadaha, and proceeded to the bank of river Anomā where he put on the robe and other paraphernalia which were brought and offered by Brahma Ghaṭikāra.

Soon, he arrived at the city of Rājagaha in a very pleasing manner, like a great elder of 60 years' standing and 80 years of age. After going on alms round, he partook of his meal in the shadow of the Paṇḍava Hill. Though King Bimbisāra invited him to stay on and promised to give his kingdom, he turned down the offer, and proceeding in due course he reached the grove of Uruvelā.

“Oh!” he exclaimed, “this flat ground is very pleasant! For clansmen who wish to devote themselves to meditation, it is an ideal place.” With this reflection, he sojourned in that grove and commenced his meditation and ascetic practice.

By the time of the Bodhisatta’s renunciation, all the wise Brahmins, except Koṇḍañña, had deceased. The youngest, Koṇḍañña, alone remained in good health. On hearing the news that the Bodhisatta had gone forth, he visited the sons of these deceased Brahmins and said: “It is said Prince Siddhattha had become an ascetic. No doubt the prince will really become a Buddha. If your fathers were alive, they would go forth even today. Come, if you wish to do so. Let us become monks in the wake of that great man.” But the seven sons were not unanimous in their aspirations, and three did not like the idea. Only the remaining four donned robes under Koṇḍañña’s leadership.

After becoming ascetics, the Group-of-Five (Pañca-vaggiya) went round for food in villages, towns and royal cities and reached the Bodhisatta’s dwelling eventually. While the Bodhisatta was practising his austere meditation for six long years, they entertained great hope, thinking: “He will soon become a Buddha! He will soon become a Buddha!” So thinking, they attended to the Bodhisatta, staying and moving about him.

In the sixth year, the Bodhisatta came to realize that the ascetic practice (dukkara-cariyā) would absolutely not earn him the noble paths and fruitions, though he had spent time eating just a rice-grain, just a sesame seed, etc., and had become emaciated and weary. He collected food in the village of Senānigama and ate whatever was available, such as rice and hard cakes. Then the Group-of-Five, as compelled by the law that dictates the lives of all Bodhisattas, were fed up with the Bodhisatta and left him, and went to Isipatana and the Deer Park.

After the Group-of-Five had thus left him, by eating whatever was available, such as rice and hard cakes, the Bodhisatta’s skin, flesh and blood became normal in two or three days. On the full moon day, the day he was to become enlightened, he took the excellent milk rice [1183] food offered by Sujātā, wife of a wealthy merchant. He then placed his bowl in the river Nerañjarā and came to decide that he would definitely become a Buddha on that very day.

In the evening, after the Nāga King Kāḷa have spoken in praise of him, he went to the site where the Mahā Bodhi tree was and sat crossed-legged on the undefeated throne, the unshakable seat, facing the east. Having developed his fourfold exertion, he drove away the deity Māra just before sunset, acquired the knowledge of previous lives (pubbe-nivāsa-ñāṇa) in the first watch of the night, the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu-ñāṇa) in the middle watch and in the last watch he was absorbed in the wisdom of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda). He reflected, with his diamond-like great insight knowledge (mahā-vajira-vipassanā-ñāṇa), on its twelve factors forward and backward, up and down, and finally become a Buddha, having gained unique omniscience (asādhāraṇa-sabbāññuta-ñāṇa), which belongs to all Buddhas as has been told in the section of the Buddha's Awakening. On that very throne under the Mahā Bodhi tree, the Buddha passed seven days, being absorbed in the Arahat fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti).

In this way, the Buddha stayed in the seven places, and later on being requested by Brahma Sahampati, he considered, asking himself: “To whom should I preach first?” Then he came to know that the religious teachers, Āḷāra and Udaka, had deceased and when he continued to think, he reflected thus: “To the Group-of-Five I am very thankful. They served me while I was engaged in the austere practices. What if I should preach to them first?” Such an idea is conceived by all Buddhas as a rule. With the exception of Koṇḍañña, there was none who could first grasp the four truths in the Dispensation of the Buddha. As for Koṇḍañña, his capability to grasp the four truths, first and foremost was because he had performed significant deeds of merit for 100,000 aeons and had given the unique gifts of the first crop, nine times to the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha, as has been told above.

Taking his bowl and robe, the Buddha set out for the Isipatana Deer Park and duly reached the dwelling of the Group-of-Five monastics. The five monastics saw the Buddha coming and they made an agreement among themselves not to fulfil their obligatory duties, but, as the Buddha was approaching nearer they could not keep their original agreement, and one took the bowl and robe from the Buddha, another prepared the seat for him, still another brought water for washing his feet, the fourth washed the Buddha's feet, and the fifth brought a round fan made of palm-leaf to fan him, thus they rendered their respective services.

When the five monastics had taken their seats near the Buddha after doing their duties, the Buddha delivered the Discourse setting the Dhamma Wheel Turning (Dhamma-cakkappavattana-sutta, SN 56.11) with three functions to the five monastics, with Ven. Koṇḍañña as the principal listener in his presence.

At that time the Buddha thought: "As the ascetic Koṇḍañña was first to penetrate the four truths which I have understood with thousands of difficulties, he deserves the name Aññāsi Koṇḍañña," and so he uttered a solemn utterance: Aññāsi vata bho Koṇḍañño; aññāsi vata bho Koṇḍañño! "Koṇḍañña has penetrated the four truths! Koṇḍañña has penetrated the four truths!" Because of this solemn utterance, Ven. Koṇḍañña came to be known as Aññāsi Koṇḍañña, Koṇḍañña the One-who-Knows, from that time onwards.

Foremost Title Achieved

In this way, Ven. Koṇḍañña became a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) on the full moon day of July (Āsāḷha) in the year 528 BCE, the same year the Buddha became a Buddha. Likewise, the day after the full moon, Ven. Bhaddiya also became a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna); two days after the full moon, Ven. Vappa, three days after the full moon, Ven. Mahānāma, and four days after the full moon, Ven. Assaji. Five days after the full moon, at the end of the delivery of the Discourse about the Characteristics of Non-Self (Anatta-lakkhaṇa-sutta), all five members of the Group-of-Five were established in the Arahāt fruition (Arahatta-phala). At that time, the number of Arahats amongst human beings were therefore six, the [1184] Buddha himself and the Group-of-Five.

From that time onwards the Buddha led 55 friends headed by Yasa, the son of a wealthy merchant to the noble paths and fruitions; he also led the 33 Bhadda princes, in the Kappāsika grove; 1,000 former matted-hair ascetics, on the stone plateau of Gayāsīsa and others. After leading a large multitude of people to the noble paths and fruitions, on the full moon day of January (Phussa), in the same year, the Buddha arrived in Rājagaha and established Brahmin householders, numbering 110,000 headed by King Bimbisāra in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) and 10,000 such householders in the three refuges.

Having caused the abundant blossoming and fruition of his teaching, with the eight wonders and three trainings, throughout Jambudīpa, the entire land of which he caused to be illuminated bright with the colour of the robes and caused the environs to be blown by the rushing wind from the moving monks and other noble ones. Later on, once he had arrived at the Jetavana monastery of Sāvathī and while remaining there at the monastery and sitting on the Dhamma throne, the seat for a Buddha, he delivered a discourse and in the course of his delivery, he became desirous of declaring that his eldest son, Koṇḍañña, was the best of all who were first to realize the four truths; and he uttered:

Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakanam bhikkhūnam rattaññūnam yad-idam Aññāsi Koṇḍañño.

O monks, of my monastic disciples who are of long standing (rattaññū), Aññāsi Koṇḍañña is the foremost (etad-aggā).

Thus speaking in praise of Ven. Koṇḍañño, the Buddha declared him the foremost of those of long standing (rattaññū-etad-aggā).

Herein long standing (rattaññū) literally means one who knows the nights, that is to say: “One who has passed through a long duration of many nights since one’s renunciation.” In the Buddha’s Dispensation there was none who realised the four truths earlier than Koṇḍañña. Hence Koṇḍañña was the one who knew many nights, and lived over the greatest number of years, since he became a monk. According to this explanation, a long standing (rattaññū) individual means the senior-most in monkhood.

Or, as Ven. Koṇḍañña realized the four truths before all others, since his realization, he had passed through many a night. According to this, the word in question means the earliest knower of the four truths.

Or, as every Arahāt is conscious of daytime and night-time, he earns the epithet of knower of nights (rattaññū), one who is aware of the divisions of day and nighttime. Because Ven. Koṇḍañña was the earliest of all Arahats, he stood out from other long standing Arahats knowing the divisions of time.

After His Attainment

Ven. Aññāsi Koṇḍañña became an Arahāt on the fifth day after the full moon of July (Āsāḷha). On the full moon day of January (Phussa) that year, the Buddha arrived in Rājagaha and on the first waxing day of February (Māgha) the future chief disciples, Sāriputta and Moggallāna, donned the robes. On the seventh day, Ven. Moggallāna became an Arahat and Ven. Sāriputta did so on the full moon day. In this way, there arose complete categories of Arahats, such as chief disciples, great disciples and ordinary disciples, in the Buddha's Dispensation, all going for alms round in a single line, with the most senior in front and the most junior last in the line. When the Buddha gave a discourse, he sat on the Dhamma throne, the Buddha-seat decorated in the middle of the assembly. The captain of the Dhamma, Ven. Sāriputta, sat on the right side of the Buddha and Ven. Moggallāna sat on the left side.

At the back of the two chief disciples, a seat was prepared for Ven. Koṇḍañña. The remaining monks took their seats surrounding him. Because Koṇḍañña was the first to understand the four truths in the Buddha's Dispensation and because he was senior also by age, the two chief disciples were respectful to him, they regarded him as Mahā Brahma, as [1185] a huge mass of fire, or as a highly poisonous serpent. They felt somewhat scared, though they occupied the front seats. They were also shy and embarrassed. Ven. Koṇḍañña then reflected: "For the front seats, these two chief disciples had fulfilled the perfections (pāramī) for one immeasurable period and 100,000 aeons. Though they are taking those seats they are less confident, shy and embarrassed. I shall do whatever is necessary to make them live at ease." This was a reason for his vacant seat.

Besides, Ven. Koṇḍañña was a highly powerful great elder. Like the attributes of the Buddha, his attributes spread among the people in this universe as well as among the Devas and Brahmas of the 10,000 world-element. Therefore, whenever divine and human beings visited and honoured the Buddha with perfumes, flowers, etc. They immediately after that approached Ven. Koṇḍañña and honoured him, remembering: "This venerable was the first to comprehend the unique doctrine of the four truths." There is also a religious custom, according to which the visited monk is to give a Dhamma talk or to exchange greetings with them. As for venerable Koṇḍañña he was inclined only to remain blissfully in the attainment of fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti). Therefore, to him, Dhamma talks given to, and greetings exchanged with, the visitors appeared superfluous. This was another reason.

For these two reasons, venerable Koṇḍañña desired to stay away from the master. As he foresaw that his nephew, the young Puṇṇa, son of the Brahmin lady Mantānī, would become a famous Dhamma-preacher (Dhamma-kathika), he went to the Brahmin village of Doṇavatthu and made his nephew a monk and helped him become a resident pupil (antevāsika) with the thought that he would stay behind near the Fortunate One. Then he approached the Buddha and made a request: “Exalted Buddha, to me a rural residence is not suitable. I am not capable of staying with the laity. Therefore, kindly permit me to live in the Chaddanta forest.” And the permission was granted by the Buddha.

Having obtained permission from the Buddha, Ven. Koṇḍañña packed up his bedding, and taking his bowl and robe, he went to Lake Mandākinī in the Chaddanta forest. In the region around Chaddanta, 8,000 elephants, who were experienced in serving Paccekabuddhas and who were long-lived, like spirits, became happy as they thought: “A large expanse of a fertile field has come to us so that we might sow the seeds of meritorious deeds.” So they shovelled a path with their feet and got rid of grass to make a meditation path for the venerable.

They also cleared the meditation path of twigs and branches that might be in his way and after making his residence clean, the 80,000 elephants held a discussion among themselves thus: “Friends, if we expect ‘this elephant will do what is necessary for the venerable,’ or, ‘that elephant will do it for him,’ the venerable will then have to return to his dwelling from alms round with his bowl washed as before, as if he had been to a village of his relatives. Therefore, let us serve him by taking turns so that there might be no negligence. We must be careful especially when it is an assignment of a particular sort and do it without thinking selfishly.”

And so they took turns in serving the venerable. The elephant on duty would arrange water for washing the face, and twigs for brushing the teeth, and so on, and the arrangement went on like this. The elephant, whose assignment was to serve, made fire by rubbing dry firewood that could easily burn, such as pine. With this fire he baked stones and rolled them down by means of sticks into the water in the stone basins. After ascertaining if the water was hot enough, he would place a tooth brush made of firewood sticks. Then the same elephant assigned would sweep the meditation hut that was Koṇḍañña’s dwelling, both inside and outside with a broom made of branches. He would also perform other duties including his feeding of Koṇḍañña in the way that will soon be described.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1770

Lake Mandākinī, where Koṇḍañña resided, was 50 leagues wide. The middle area of the lake, measuring 25 leagues, was entirely free from algae and other aquatic plants. The water was crystal clear. In its outer circle, where the water was waist deep, there flourished white-lotus thickets of half a league's width, surrounding the lake of 50 leagues, beyond the white lotus thickets existed red lotus thickets also of half a [1186] league's width, beyond them white lotus-thickets, beyond them blue-lotus thickets, beyond them red lotus thickets, beyond them fragrant red paddy fields, beyond them creeper thickets full of such tasty vegetables as cucumber, gourd, pumpkin, etc. and measuring half a league in width; beyond them existed sugar-cane thickets also of half a league width, encircling the lake. The sugar-cane stalks growing there were as thick as the trunk of an areca palm.

Beyond the sugar-cane thickets lay banana tree thickets, also of half a league's width encircling the lake. Those who happened to have eaten two bananas or so would suffer, feeling stiff and uneasy; beyond the banana trees lay jack-fruit groves bearing fruit, each being the size of a large jar; beyond that lay cherry groves; beyond that lay mango groves; in this way there lay more groves of fruit trees. In short, it could not be said there were no edible fruit around Lake Mandākinī, there were fruits of all kinds.

During the flowering period, the wind blew, carrying the pollen from the blossoms and placed them on the lotus leaves. Drops of water fell on these leaves. By the heat of the sun, the pollen was cooked and became solidified milk. It was called lotus-honey comb. It was brought to Ven. Koṇḍañña by the elephants in turns.

The lotus stems were as thick as a tilling log. These stems too the elephant took and gave to Ven. Koṇḍañña. The lotus stems were as large as a drum head. Each joint of the stems contained about one measure of lotus milk. That lotus milk too the elephants brought and offered to Ven. Koṇḍañña.

The elephants mixed the lotus stems with honey and offered it to Ven. Koṇḍañña. They placed the sugar-cane plants, which were as thick as areca palm, on a stone slab and crushed them with their feet. The juice then flowed into stone cups and holes and was cooked by the heat of the sun and it became solidified sugar-cane cakes that were like solidified milk. They then brought these sugar-cane cakes and offered them to Ven. Koṇḍañña.

On the Kelāsa hill, in the Himavanta, lived a god named Nāgadatta. Ven. Koṇḍañña sometimes went to the doorway of his mansion. The god filled Ven. Koṇḍañña's bowl with pure milk food made of newly produced butter and powder of lotus-honey. The god gave an alms giving (dāna) of sweet smelling butter and milk by the lot for 20,000 years during the life time of the Buddha Kassapa. Hence, such pure milk food containing butter and powder of lotus-honey appeared to him as nourishment. In this way Ven. Koṇḍañña dwelt near Lake Mandākinī in the Chaddanta forest.

Ven. Koṇḍañña's Passing

Later, when he reflected on his life process (āyu-saṅkhāra), he found that it was coming to an end. When he further reflected as to where he should de cease, it occurred to him thus: "These 8,000 elephants who have served me for twelve years have done what is difficult to do. I am very grateful to them. I shall first go to the exalted Buddha and seek his permission to pass into Parinibbāna and then I will return and do so in the meditation hut near these elephants."

Having decided thus, he immediately appeared at Veḷuvana monastery in Rājagaha and visited the Buddha. He bowed his head touching the feet of the Buddha and kissed them with his mouth; he also pressed them with his hand forcefully. He then mentioned his name in his supplication to the Buddha: "Exalted Buddha! I am Koṇḍañña; Gracious One! I am Koṇḍañña."

Herein, the reason for Ven. Koṇḍañña's mention of his own name was this: at that time among the monks around the Buddha some elderly monks knew him but the younger ones did not. Therefore, it occurred to him: "The young monks who do not know me might offend me with the thought who is this white-haired, bent, toothless and failing old monk? Who is he that is talking with the exalted Buddha?" Those young monks who wronged me might land in a suffering state. If I mention my name, those who previously did not know me will now realize who I am. Thus the two groups of monks, the one older and aware of my name and the other younger and coming to know me now, will be pleased and faithful at the thought: "Ah, here is a Great Disciple (Mahā-sāvaka) who has renounced like the exalted Buddha throughout the 10,000 worlds system, and this would lead them to the realm of Devas." In order to close the road to the suffering states, and open that to [1187] the Deva Realms, the venerable disclosed his name in his announcement to the Buddha.

At that time, a thought arose in the mind of Ven. Vaṅgīsa thus: “This Ven. Aññāsi Koṇḍañña visited the Fortunate One after twelve long years; he touched the feet of the Fortunate One with his head and kissed his feet with his mouth. And, he also pressed them with his hand. Mentioning his name, he also said: “Exalted Buddha! I am Koṇḍañña; Gracious One! I am Koṇḍañña.” What if I should sing appropriate verses in praise of this Ven. Koṇḍañña in the presence of the Buddha.” So he rose from his seat, adjusted his robe so that it covered his left shoulder, raised his joined hands towards the Buddha and addressed him thus: “Exalted Buddha, these improvised verses (paṭibhāna-gāthā) occurred to me! Gracious One, these improvised verses occurred to me!”

Thereupon, the Buddha granted permission, saying: “Dear son Vaṅgīsa, you may recite some improvised verses.” Accordingly, Ven. Vaṅgīsa sang the verses in praise of Ven. Koṇḍañña in the presence of the Buddha as follows (SN 8.9):

Buddhānubuddho so thero Koṇḍañño tibba-nikkamo, lābhī sukha-vihārānaṃ vivekānaṃ abhiṅhaso.

That venerable who is known by his clan name Koṇḍañña and who has visited the supremely exalted Buddha, is distinguished as Awakened through following the Buddha (Buddhānubuddha), for he is the first who understood the four profound truths, having contemplated the Buddha’s teachings intelligently. He is endowed with the unique, forceful energy of the right exertions. He achieves without interruption the three forms of seclusion, the means of blissful living.

Sabbassa tam-anuppattaṃ, appa-mattassa sikkhato.*

The Saṅgha of noble disciples, who follow the Buddha’s exhortation, should attain the four paths, the four fruitions, and the analytical knowledges, etc., through their wisdom. That supreme person of glory, Ven. Koṇḍañña, attained them all, ahead of other disciples, smoothly supported by the necessary facilities, for he possessed mindfulness and practised assiduously in the threefold training.

Mahānubhāvo tevijjo, ceto-pariyāya-kovido, Koṇḍañño Buddha-dāyādo pāde vandati Satthuno.

The venerable, who is known by his clan name Koṇḍañña, who is highly powerful, who clearly possesses the threefold knowledge of the remembrance of former rebirths, the divine eye and the extinction of all pollutants, who can read others' minds, as he knows all the mental activities, who has inherited first and foremost the supermundane legacy of the Buddha, has indeed respectfully paid homage at the Buddha's lotus feet by touching them with his head, kissing them with his mouth, and gripping them with his hands.

By the time these verses had been sung, silence reigned in the assembly. Knowing of the silence, Ven. Koṇḍañña exchanged a few words with the Buddha and asked for permission: “Exalted Buddha, my life process has come to an end. I am going to pass into [1188] Parinibbāna.” – “Where will you pass into Parinibbāna, my dear son Koṇḍañña?” asked the Buddha. Ven. Koṇḍañña replied: “Exalted Buddha, the elephants who served me for twelve years have done something that is difficult to do. Therefore, I shall pass into Parinibbāna somewhere around the elephants, by the lake in the Chaddanta forest.” The Buddha granted his permission by keeping silent.

When Ven. Koṇḍañña requested permission to attain Parinibbāna, if the Buddha had not granted permission, it might be thought that Ven. Koṇḍañña took delight in the round of suffering in the three worlds, which he himself had taught to be something sickening. On the other hand, if the Buddha were to grant permission, it might mean that he encouraged him to die. In order to avoid these two ends, therefore, the Buddha asked a neutral question: “Where will you pass into Parinibbāna?”

Thereupon Ven. Koṇḍañña made obeisance to the Buddha and spoke: “Exalted Buddha, formerly when you were practising the ascetic practice (dukkara-cariyā), we visited you for the first time to attend to you. In other words, my first obeisance took place in the Deer Park. Now this is my last obeisance!” While many people were lamenting, Ven. Koṇḍañña paid homage to the Buddha, came out from his presence and, standing at the doorway, admonished the people: “Do not be sad! Do not lament! There is none among those conditioned, be they Buddhas or disciples, who will not come to destruction.” While the people were looking on him, Ven. Koṇḍañña disappeared from there and reappeared near the lake, in the Chaddanta forest, where he bathed. Thereafter, he put on the robe properly, put away his bedding and spent the three watches of the night engaged in the meditation of fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti).

Just before morning came with its very brilliant light, Ven. Koṇḍañña entered the Parinibbāna with no grasping at existence remaining.

No sooner had Ven. Koṇḍañña entered Parinibbāna than all the trees in the Himavanta burst open with flowers and fruit both at the top and bottom and they bent down as well. The elephant, whose turn it was to serve Ven. Koṇḍañña, performed his usual duties early by placing water for washing the face and a tooth-brush made of twigs, stood at the end of the wall without knowing about Ven. Koṇḍañña's Parinibbāna. Not seeing Ven. Koṇḍañña coming, though he had waited till sunrise, the elephant began to wonder: "The noble Ven. Koṇḍañña used to take an early walk and used to wash his face. But now he has not come out from his dwelling even at sunrise. What could be the reason for this?"

So he opened the door of the dwelling wide enough to see into it, and saw Ven. Koṇḍañña sitting. He stretched out his trunk to investigate whether there was in-breath or out-breath and it came to know there was neither. Then, coming to know that Ven. Koṇḍañña had entered Parinibbāna, he put his trunk in his mouth and trumpeted aloud. The sound of its trumpet echoed all over the Himavanta.

The elephants discussed the situation in unity. Ven. Koṇḍañña's body was put on the largest elephant. The others surrounded him, each carrying branches that had fully blossomed. After repeatedly going around the Himavanta and paying homage, they conveyed the remains to the lake in the Chaddanta forest.

Then Sakka summoned Deva Vissakamma and gave him an order: "Dear Vissakamma! Our elder brother, Ven. Koṇḍañña, has passed into Parinibbāna. Let us do homage to him. Create a coffin measuring nine leagues and adorn it with a pinnacle!" Vissakamma created what he was asked for. The remains of Ven. Koṇḍañña were put in the coffin and returned to the elephants.

Carrying the coffin together and repeatedly moving around the whole Himavanta, measuring 3,000 leagues, the elephants paid homage. From the elephants, the coffin was taken by the Devas of the sky who performed the funeral rites. Thereafter, the coffin was taken by the Devas of the rain-clouds, the Devas of the cold-clouds, and the Devas of the hot-clouds, the Catumahārājika Devas, the Tāvatiṃsa Devas and so on. In this way, the pinnacled coffin containing Ven. Koṇḍañña's body reached up to the realm of the Brahmas. Again the Brahmas returned it to the Devas and in this way the coffin went back to the elephants.

Each Deva or Brahma brought two sandalwood pieces, each being about the breath of [1189] four fingers. The pile of such sandalwood pieces was nine leagues high. Upon the pile of sandalwood the coffin carrying Ven. Koṇḍañña's body was put. Five hundred monks appeared simultaneously and recited the Dhamma throughout the night. Ven. Anuruddha gave a discourse in the assembly, and, as a result, many Devas realized the four truths and were released from Saṃsāra thereby.

The night saw the burning of the remains. On the following morning, at dawn, the pile of burning fragrant wood was extinguished and the monks filled the water-filter with the relics, which were as white as jasmine buds and brought them to the Buddha, who was readily waiting and welcoming at the doorway of the Veḷuvana monastery.

Holding the filter containing the relics, the Buddha delivered a discourse befitting that occasion and causing spiritual urgency (saṃvega) in the minds of those present, after which he stretched out his hand towards the earth. Instantly, a colossal shrine (cetiya) emerged, resembling a huge silver bubble, penetrating the great earth. The Buddha enshrined the relics of Ven. Koṇḍañña with his hands in that shrine. It is said that the shrine exists even today.

2-3. Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Moggallāna

In this Dispensation, Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Moggallāna are known as the two chief disciples of the Buddha. These two venerables had mostly worked together to fulfil the Perfections during the period of their performance of meritorious deeds for that goal. In their last existence too, they renounced the world together and became monks together. Hence their accounts are given together in the commentaries and sub-commentaries. Following these treatises, in this book too, their accounts will be given together.

Aspiration in the Past

From this present aeon (kappa), one immeasurable period (asaṅkhyeyya) and 100,000 aeons ago, the future Sāriputta, a virtuous person, was born in a wealthy Brahmin family and was named Sarada the youth. The future Moggallāna, another virtuous man, was also born in another family and was named Sirivaḍḍhana the householder. They became intimate friends, having played together in their childhood.

One day, while Sarada the youth was examining and managing the wealth of his household, which was inherited from his forebears, as his father had died, a thought arose in him thus: “I know only about this existence. I do not know about the hereafter. It is absolutely certain that beings born are subject to death. It would be proper, therefore, if I become a recluse and seek the doctrine for liberation from Saṃsāra.”

Sarada went to his friend Sirivaḍḍhana and said: “Friend Sirivaḍḍhana, I shall become a recluse and seek the doctrine for liberation from Saṃsāra. Will you be able to come together with me?” – “No, friend, I am not,” answered Sirivaḍḍhana, “you, friend, go ahead.” Then it occurred to Sarada: “Among those who pass into the hereafter, there is none who is able to take his friends and relatives with him. It is indeed true that only his good or bad deeds are his own property as they do actually follow him.”

Thereupon, he opened his treasure houses and performed a great alms giving (dāna) to the destitutes, poor people, travellers and beggars. Thereafter, he made his way to the foot of a mountain and became an ascetic. Those who became matted-hair ascetics in the wake of Sarada numbered 74,000. The ascetic Sarada himself acquired the fivefold mundane psychic power and the eightfold absorption (jhāna) attainments. He also taught his followers how to make preparations for meditation on a device (kaṣiṇa), how to practise that meditation and they too gained the same power and attainments.

At that time, Buddha Anomadassī appeared in the world.<sup>268</sup> One day, when Buddha Anomadassī surveyed the world [1190] of sentient beings after emerging from his attainment of the absorption of compassion (karuṇā-samāpatti) at daybreak, he saw the ascetic Sarada and decided, thinking: “When I visit Sarada, a grand Dhamma talk will take place. The ascetic will express his aspiration to become a chief disciple, flanking on the right-hand side some other Buddha in the future. His friend, Sirivaḍḍhana, will do similarly for the other chief disciple, flanking on the left. By the end of the talk, Sarada's 74,000 followers, those ascetics who accompanied Sarada, will become Arahats. I should, therefore, pay a visit to Sarada's dwelling at the foot of the mountain." Taking his bowl and robe he set forth alone, without informing anybody else, like a lion-king. While Sarada's pupils were away gathering fruit, Buddha Anomadassī made a resolution that Sarada should come to know him as an omniscient Buddha, and while Sarada was looking at him, the Buddha descended from the sky and stood on the ground.

As he had seen the magnificence and the physical splendour of Buddha Anomadassī, Sarada studied them in accordance with the physiognomical treatises and unwaveringly came to the conclusion: "One who is possessed of these marks, will become a Universal Monarch if he were to live a household life, but, if he were to put on the robe, he would become an omniscient Buddha." He, therefore, welcomed the Buddha, paid homage by touching the floor in five ways and offered the prepared seat to him. The Buddha sat down in that seat and the recluse also took an appropriate seat for himself.

At that time, the 74,000 pupils returned, carrying with them fruits of various sizes with immensely rich flavour and nutrition. Seeing the seating arrangement of the Buddha and that of their teacher, they remarked to him: "Master, we thought that there was no person higher than you in the world. But now it seems that this noble man is far superior to you." The master reprovingly replied: "How dare you say so, pupils! You wish to compare a mustard seed with the great Mount Meru which is 168,000 leagues high. Do not weigh me against the Buddha." Then the pupils said among themselves: "If this were an unworthy one, our master would not have given such a simile. Indeed he must be supreme!" So saying, they all prostrated at the feet of the Buddha and venerated him with their heads.

Thereafter, the recluse told his pupils: "Dear sons, we have no gift that is proper for the Buddha. It was during his hour for collecting alms food that he came to our residence at the foot of the mountain. Let us give alms to the best of our ability. Pupils, bring big and small fruits that appear nice and wholesome." Thus, he had the fruit brought and having washed his hands he himself offered the fruit after putting them in the bowl. No sooner had the Buddha accepted the fruit than Devas put ambrosia in the bowl. Sarada offered water that he had duly filtered. Having eaten the fruit, the Buddha washed his hand and sat calm and quiet. While the Buddha was sitting thus, Sarada summoned all his pupils and spoke to the Buddha words that ought to be remembered for long. Then the Buddha resolved that his two chief disciples should visit him in the company of the monks at this mountain foot. The two chief disciples, Ven. Nisabha and Ven. Anoma, knowing the Buddha's desire, immediately appeared, accompanied by 100,000 Arahats and, after paying homage to the Buddha, stood at suitable places.

Thereupon, the recluse Sarada called his pupils and ordered: "Dear sons, the seat made for the Buddha is still low. The 100,000 monks are also without seats. You, dear sons, should today do high honour to the Buddha. Bring beautiful and fragrant flowers from the foot of the mountain." The time spent on giving the order seemed even longer. The power of the mighty ones is wonderful beyond imagination. Instantly, therefore, the pupils miraculously brought flowers of beauty and fragrance and made them into the Buddha seat, measuring a league. The floral seat made for the two chief disciples measured three miles each and the seat for the rest of monks measured half a league or two miles. Even for the youngest monk, the seat was one half a mile (usabha) in height.

After making the seats in this manner, Sarada stood before the Buddha and addressed him with his joined hands raised: "Exalted Buddha, please take this seat of flowers for my long welfare and happiness." Buddha Anomadassī mounted the seat and sat down and remained there, engaging in the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti) for seven days. Knowing what the [1191] Buddha was doing, the two chief disciples and the rest of the monks, while remaining in their respective seats, in the wake of the master, engaged themselves in the absorptions (jhāna).

Sarada the recluse stood holding a floral umbrella over the Buddha. While the Buddha was absorbed in the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti), the pupils sought various roots and fruits during the food gathering hour and ate them. For the rest of the time, they stood, raising their joined hands in the direction of the Buddha. Sarada, however, did not move even for searching for fruit but held the umbrella over the Buddha and spent the time living on the food of rapture (pīti).

Emerging from the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti), the Buddha asked the chief disciple, Ven. Nisabha, who was sitting near him on his right side: “Teach, dear son, a discourse in appreciation of the flowers, to the honourable recluses.” With his mind immensely gladdened, as a heroic warrior who had received a great reward from the Universal Monarch, Ven. Nisabha taught them by virtue of his perfect intelligence as a disciple. At the end of Ven. Nisabha’s teaching, the Buddha asked the other chief disciple, Ven. Anoma, who was on the left side: “You too teach a discourse, dear son.” Reflecting on the Buddha’s words contained in the Three Baskets, Ven. Anoma gave a discourse.

The realization of the truths and the attainment of release did not affect yet a single recluse despite the teaching of the two chief disciples. Thereafter, Buddha Anomadassī, in his incomparable state as a Buddha, taught the Dhamma. By the end of his teaching all 74,000 matted-hair recluses attained Arahāt fruition (Arahatta-phala). Sarada alone remained unaffected. Then the Buddha stretching his right arm and pronounced: “Come, monks.” At that very moment the hair and beard of all these ascetics disappeared and they became monks already equipped with the eight items of requisites.

Sarada’s Aspiration for Chief Discipleship

It may be asked: Why did he fail to become an Arahāt though he was a great teacher? The answer is because he was distracted. Since the time when Ven. Nisabha the chief disciple, one who sits on the right, started teaching, Sarada had been repeatedly distracted by the thought: “It would be well if I should gain the same position as this chief disciple’s in the Dispensation of a Buddha to come.” Because of this distraction, Sarada failed to penetrate and gain the knowledge of the paths and fruitions. He was left behind with no acquisition of the paths and fruitions (magga-phala).

After his pupils had become monastics, Sarada the recluse paid homage to the Buddha and while standing before him asked: “What is the name of the monk who is sitting just next to you?” When the Buddha replied: “His name is Nisabha, my right-hand side chief disciple, who, in my Dispensation, can turn the wheel-treasure of the Dhamma after me, who had reached the apex of the perfect wisdom of a disciple and who had penetrated the fifteen forms of wisdom (paññā).” Sarada the recluse said: “As a result of my act of merit by honouring you with a floral umbrella held over you for seven days, I do not long for the state of a Sakka nor that of a Brahma but I wish to become a chief disciple, one who sits on the right, like this noble Ven. Nisabha, but during the Dispensation of a Buddha in the future.”

When Buddha Anomadassī enquired with his knowledge of the future (anāgataṃsa-ñāṇa) into whether Sarada’s wish would be fulfilled, he foresaw that it would be fulfilled after one immeasurable period (asaṅkhyeyya) and 100,000 aeons (kappa). So he said to the recluse: “Your wish will not go unfulfilled, when an immeasurable period and 100,000 aeons have elapsed, the Buddha Gotama will appear in the three worlds. His mother will be Queen Mahā Māyā; his father, King Suddhodana; his son, Rāhula and the chief disciple on the left hand side, Moggallāna. But you will become Buddha Gotama’s chief disciple on the right hand side, by the name of Sāriputta.” Having predicted this, he gave a Dhamma talk and afterwards he rose into the air in the company of the monks.

Sarada the recluse then approached the venerables who had been his old pupils and said: “Venerable sirs, please tell my friend Sirivaḍḍhana the householder thus: ‘Your friend [1192] Sarada the recluse has aspired, at the foot of the Buddha Anomadassī, for the rank of chief disciple on the right hand side. For that of the chief disciple on the left hand side of Gotama, a coming Buddha, you, householder, may decide.’” After giving the message thus, Sarada went hurriedly ahead of them by another road and stood at the door of the house of Sirivaḍḍhana.

Thinking: “My master has come after a long time after being absent,” Sirivaḍḍhana gave a seat to Sarada and he himself sat down in a lower seat and asked: “Venerable sir, your retinue of residential pupils is not seen.” – “They are not, friend. Buddha Anomadassī visited our recluses; we honoured the Saṅgha headed by him to the best of our ability. The Buddha taught us, and by the end of the teaching, all 74,000 recluses became Arahats and monks, except for myself.” – “Why you did not become a monk?” asked Sirivaḍḍhana. “Having seen Ven. Nisabha, the Buddha’s chief disciple on the right hand side,” replied Sarada, “I wished for a similar position during the Dispensation of the coming Buddha Gotama. You too can wish for the second chief discipleship on the Buddha’s left hand side.” When the recluse urged him thus, his friend replied: “I have no experience of talking with a Buddha.” Then Sarada said, encouraging him: “Let the talking with the Buddha be my responsibility. On your part, make an arrangement for your great aspiration (adhikāra).”

Having listened to Sarada’s advice, Sirivaḍḍhana levelled the ground measuring 14 acres in front of the doorway of his house and covered it with white sand, scattered over it confetti of flowers of the five kinds with parched rice as the fifth. He also built a shed roofed with blue lotus flowers, prepared the seat for the Buddha and arranged things that were dedicated in honour of the Buddha. Then only did he give a signal to Sarada to bring the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha. Taking his cue from Sirivaḍḍhana, Sarada brought the Saṅgha, with the Buddha at its head, to Sirivaḍḍhana’s house.

Sirivaḍḍhana welcomed the Buddha and took his bowl and robe and respectfully brought him into the shed and offered water together with excellent food to him and his Saṅgha. When the meal was over, he gave highly valuable robes to the Buddha and his Saṅgha. Thereafter, he said: “Exalted Buddha, this act of merit performed by me is not intended for a small reward. Therefore, kindly do me a favour in this way for seven days.” The Buddha kept silent in agreement.

Sirivaḍḍhana then performed a great alms giving (mahā-dāna) in the same manner for a week. On the last day of the alms giving, while standing with his joined hands raised respectfully in the direction of the Buddha, he said thus: “Exalted Buddha, my friend Sarada has aspired for the position of a chief disciple on the right hand side of the Buddha Gotama. I too aspire for the position of the chief disciple on the left hand side of that very Buddha Gotama.”

When the Buddha surveyed the future, he saw that the aspiration of Sirivaḍḍhana would be fulfilled. So he predicted: “An immeasurable period (asaṅkhyeyya) and 100,000 aeons from now, you will become a second chief disciple on the left hand side.” Hearing the Buddha’s prophecy, Sirivaḍḍhana was overjoyed. After giving a talk in appreciation of the alms giving, the Buddha returned to the monastery in the company of the monks. From then onwards, till his death, Sirivaḍḍhana made efforts to perform deeds of merit. On his passing away from that existence, he was reborn in the Heavenly Sense Realms (Kāmāvacara-deva-loka). Sarada the recluse developed the four sublime practices (Brahma-vihāra) and was reborn in the Brahma realm.

Ascetic Life in Their Final Existence

The commentary says nothing much about their good works done during the existences after their lives as the recluse Sarada and the householder Sirivaḍḍhana, but it gives an account of their lives in the last existence.

Just before the appearance of our Buddha Gotama, a virtuous man, the future Ven. Sāriputta, who had formerly been recluse Sarada, was conceived in the womb of a Brahmin woman, a merchant's wife, Rūpasārī by name, in the village of Upatissa, near the city of Rājagaha. On that very day, another virtuous man, formerly Sarada's friend, Sirivaḍḍhana, the future Moggallāna, took conception in the womb of Moggalī, wife of another merchant, in the village of Kolita, also near Rājagaha. These two great families had been [1193] very friendly households for seven generations.

When they were born, after ten months had elapsed, each boy was looked after by 66 nurses. On the naming day, the son born of Rūpasārī was named Upatissa because he was the scion of the head of Upatissa village. The son born of Moggalī was named Kolita as his family was chief in Kolita village. When the two boys grew up, they became accomplished in all kinds of crafts.

The ceremonial paraphernalia of the youth Upatissa included 500 golden palanquins to accompany him constantly whenever he paid a visit to the river, to the garden or to the hill for sport and pleasure. As for the youth Kolita, it was 500 chariots drawn by the best breed of horses that usually went along with him. In Rājagaha, there was an annual festival held on the hilltop. For the two friends the couches were fixed and prepared at the same place. Both took their seats together, and while watching the show, they laughed when there was humour and they were shocked when there was horror; they also gave awards when they were supposed to do.

After enjoying the show in this manner many times, one day they became more sober at the show and were no longer amused by the funny scenes, nor frightened by the horrible ones. Also, there were absolutely no more awards given where they were expected. Both of them thought thus: "Where are those things attractive to the eyes on this festive occasion? Those who participate in the show and those who come to see it will all disappear before the end of 100 years. We should therefore search for some form of spirituality for our escape from Saṃsāra." They reflected on the miseries of life.

Thereafter, Kolita said to his friend Upatissa: “Friend Upatissa, you show no satisfaction as on the other days. What are you thinking about, friend?” Upatissa replied: “Friend Kolita, I found nothing worthy in watching the show.

Enjoyment of the festivity is useless; it is empty. I was, therefore, sitting with the thought that I ought to seek something for myself that would lead to liberation from Saṃsāra.” Having said this, he asked: “Friend Kolita, why are you also wearing a long face and looking displeased?” Kolita’s answer was the same as Upatissa’s. Knowing that his friend was contemplating the same thing, Upatissa consulted, saying: “Our common idea, dear Kolita, is something well conceived. Those who seek release from Saṃsāra should adopt an ascetic life. Under whom shall we become ascetics?”

At that time, the great wandering ascetic, Sañjaya, the leader of a religious sect, was staying in Rājagaha with a large gathering of pupils. The two friends agreed to become ascetics in the presence of Sañjaya, each with his 500 attendants. Since the time of the two friends’ association with him, Sañjaya attained the height of his possession of retinue and fame.

Within two or three days, the two wanderers, Upatissa and Kolita, became well-educated in all the doctrines of the teacher Sañjaya and they asked: “Teacher, is that all that you have mastered? Or, is there still some more that we have to learn?” – “That is all I have mastered,” replied Sañjaya, “you have learned all of my doctrines.”

The two friends then discussed between them: “In that case, it is useless to remain observing celibacy (brahma-cariyā) under this teacher, Sañjaya. We have come from the life of householders in quest of release from Saṃsāra. Never shall we be able to achieve that release in his presence. Jambudīpa is vast, if we wander about villages, towns and royal cities and search, certainly we shall find some teacher who will give us the means leading to liberation.”

From that time onwards, they visited various places, which they learned were the resort of learned monks and Brahmins and had doctrinal dialogues and discussions. There were, however, no monks and Brahmins who were really learned and able to answer the questions raised by the two wandering friends. In fact, it was the two friends who had to solve the problems put forth by the so-called learned sages. Having failed to find someone whom they should regard as their teacher, though they had roamed about all over Jambudīpa [1194] and made inquiries, they returned to their ascetic dwellings and made an agreement between themselves that whosoever received the doctrine concerning the deathless earlier, should inform the other.

The time was the first waxing moon of February (Māgha), about half a month after the arrival of the Buddha in the city of Rājagaha.

Readers are now referred to chapter 16. That chapter contains such episodes as the conversion of the two friends and their pupils from the state of wandering ascetics to that of monastics called forth in the presence of the Buddha and their attainment of the height of wisdom as disciples. These episodes are only summarized here.

Foremost Title Achieved

In the year he became enlightened, the Buddha passed his Rains Retreat (Vassa) in the Deer Park; thence he went to the Uruvelā forest and converted 1,000 recluses headed by the three Kassapa brothers and established them in Awakening by means of the Instruction about Burning (Āditta-pariyāya-sutta, SN 35.235). On the full moon day of January (Phussa), he arrived at Rājagaha in the company of 1,000 monks. After a fortnight, on the first waxing moon of February (Māgha), Upatissa met the Arahāt, Assaji, a member of the Group-of-Five, in Rājagaha. Having listened to the verse beginning with Ye Dhamma hetuppabhavā, “whatever things have a cause and source,” from Ven. Assaji, Upatissa became a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna). So did Kolita, after having heard the verse through Upatissa. Thereafter, both noble Stream-enterer friends and their followers became monastics summoned by the Buddha. Before they became monks, their followers became Arahats the moment they heard a discourse from the Buddha. As the wisdom of discipleship was much greater to achieve, the future chief disciples had still not attained that state, and it was on the seventh day of his monastic life that Ven. Mahā Moggallāna became an Arahāt and it was on the fifteenth day, that is, on the full moon day of February (Māgha) that Ven. Sāriputta did.

In this manner, the two venerables reached the apex of their Perfections and wisdom in chief discipleship while the Buddha was staying in Rājagaha. But, at a later time, while he was at the Jetavana monastery, Sāvattihī, he uttered this in praise of them (AN 1.14):

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ
Mahā-pañṇānaṃ yad-idaṃ Sāriputto.*

Monks, among my disciples who are of great wisdom, Sāriputta is the foremost.

iddhimantānaṃ yad-idaṃ Mahā Moggallāno.*

Monks, among my disciples who are of great supernormal powers, Mahā Moggallāna is the foremost.

With these words, the Buddha placed Ven. Sāriputta the foremost in great wisdom and Ven. Moggallāna as foremost in supernormal powers.

These two venerables had practised for the welfare of sentient beings for 44 years since they became monastics. The discourses given by them are quite numerous in the Five Collections and the Three Baskets. They are so numerous that it is almost impossible to reproduce them here, especially, the Path of the Analytic Knowledges (Paṭisambhidā-magga), the Long Exposition (Mahā-niddesa) and the Short Exposition (Cūḷa-niddesa) which embody the words of Ven. Sāriputta. His verses in the Verses of the Elder Monks (Thera-gāthā) contain many of his doctrines. So do Moggallāna's verses, his doctrinal miscellany. Those who desire to, may read the translations of the texts concerned. Here in this work, however, only the account of their attainments, after making efforts for the welfare of sentient beings for 44 years will be given.

Ven. Sāriputta's Attainment of Parinibbāna

Having observed his last and 45 Rains Retreat (Vassa) at the small village of Veḷuva, near the city of Vesālī, the Buddha emerged from that Rains Retreat and, as has been stated above, left the village by the same road which he had taken in reaching there. After setting forth for the [1195] last time, the Buddha arrived in Sāvattihī and entered the Jetavana monastery. The Captain of the Dhamma, Ven. Sāriputta, served the Buddha and went to his dwelling. When his pupils had fulfilled their duties to him at his dwelling and left, he would sweep the place and spread the leather mat; then he washed his feet, sat down crossed-legged and engaged in the Arahat fruition state (Arahatta-phala).

When the prescribed time for meditation was over, Ven. Sāriputta rose from it and wondered whether the Buddha would attain Parinibbāna first or his chief disciples. He came to know that the disciples usually did earlier. And when he examined his life process, he found that it would go on only for seven more days. He further considered where his attainment of Parinibbāna should take place. “Ven. Rāhula attained Parinibbāna in Tāvatiṃsa and Ven. Koṇḍañña at the lake in Chaddanta. Where should I do so?” he pondered repeatedly and remembered his mother, the Brahmin lady Rūpasārī as follows: “My mother has no faith in the Three Treasures: the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha, despite her being the mother of seven Arahats. Does that mother of mine possess the spiritual potential for any of the paths and fruitions?”

When he reflected thus, he came to know that she had, from her past deeds of merit, the potential that would lead to Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga). He continued to reflect as by which approach she would realize the four truths, and it became manifest to him thus: “My mother’s realization of the four truths and conversion will happen by my teaching to her and not by any other way. If I were to be indifferent without caring to convert her, people may speak words of reproach, saying: “Ven. Sāriputta is a dependable person to others. This is true. The day the Ven. Sāriputta taught the Discourse on the Even-Minded (Sama-citta-sutta, AN 2.37). 1,000 billion Devas and Brahmas became Arahats. Those who attained lower fruitions are countless. Those who gained liberation by realizing the four truths elsewhere have also been witnessed. Besides the celestial families, those who have faith in Ven. Sāriputta are 80,000 in number. Ven. Sāriputta is now helpless even to remove the wrong views of his own mother.” Therefore, after eradicating my mother’s false notions, I shall attain Parinibbāna in the very chamber in which I was born.”

Having decided thus, an idea to inform the Buddha, seek his permission and set out even on that day, appeared in him. So he ordered his young brother Ven. Cunda: “Dear Cunda, inform my 500 monastic pupils to make themselves ready with their bowls and robes. The Captain of Dhamma, Ven. Sāriputta, is desirous of going to Nālaka, his native village.” Ven. Cunda did as he was told by his older brother.

The 500 monks packed their beddings, took their bowls and robes and gathered round their master in unison. The great elder himself packed his own bedding, swept his dwelling, stood at its doorway and viewed the place, thinking: “This is the last time I will see this place. I will not come here again.” Together with the company of his 500 pupils, he went to the Buddha, paid homage to him and said in supplication: “Exalted Buddha! May the Fortunate One give me permission to leave. May the Gracious One grant me permission to leave. The time has come for me to attain Parinibbāna. My life-process has been given up.”

Herein, the word anujānātu of the sentence: anujānātu me bhante Bhagavā, of the text is translated “give me permission” and such is the required meaning. Its literal meaning, however, is: “May you know of my proposed entry into Parinibbāna,” that is to say, “I am aware of my coming attainment of Parinibbāna. May you also be aware of it.”

When other disciples, who were also Arahats, came and sought permission for their demise, if the Buddha had said: “Do so!” those with wrong views would blame him: “The Buddha speaks in praise of death!” If, on the other hand, he said: “No, dear son, do not do that yet!” they would blame him all the same, saying: “He speaks in praise of suffering!” [1196]

The Buddha asked Ven. Sāriputta: “Dear Sāriputta, where will you attain Parinibbāna?” Ven. Sāriputta answered: “There is, exalted Buddha, my birthplace, Nalaka village, in the country of Magadha. There I will do so.” – “Now you are aware, dear son, of the time of your Parinibbāna. It may be very difficult for your brethren, particularly, to no longer see a man of your stature any longer. You had better give them a discourse.”

Understanding that the Buddha wanted him to engage in teaching preceded by a performance of miracles, the noble Ven. Sāriputta paid homage to the Buddha, rose up into the air to the height of a toddy palm tree, came down and paid homage at the Buddha’s feet. Again he rose into the air to the height of two toddy palm trees, came down and paid homage at the feet of the Buddha once more. In this way he rose up to the height of three, four, five, six and seven toddy palm trees and displayed hundreds of miraculous feats.

While so doing, he taught. How did he preach? He taught while showing himself; he taught while hiding himself; he taught while showing and hiding the upper part of his person; he taught while showing and hiding the lower part of his person; sometimes he created and showed the shape of the moon; sometimes he created and showed that of the sun; sometimes he made the shape of a great mountain; sometimes he made the shape of a great ocean; sometimes he became a Universal Monarch: sometimes he became the Deva King Vessavaṇa; sometimes he became Sakka, the Lord of the Devas; sometimes he became Mahā Brahma. In this way the great elder taught while performing hundreds of miracles. The entire city of Sāvattthī assembled. Having taught in this way to his heart's content, he came down and paid homage at the Buddha's feet and stood firmly like a golden gatepost.

Then the Buddha asked: "Dear son Sāriputta, what is this kind of teaching called?" Ven. Sāriputta replied: "Exalted Buddha, it is called the sport of a lion (sītha-vikīḷita)." The Buddha delightedly approved of Ven. Sāriputta's reply by saying: "Dear son Sāriputta, yours is indeed the sport of a lion! Yours is indeed the sport of a lion."

Ven. Sāriputta's Last Homage to the Buddha

Firmly holding the feet of the Buddha by the ankles with his hands dark red like the colour of liquefied lac, the noble Ven. Sāriputta said in supplication: "Exalted Buddha, I have fulfilled the perfections (pāramī) for an immeasurable period (asaṅkhyeyya) and 100,000 aeons just to pay homage at these two feet of yours. The result of the fulfilment of my heart's desire has now successfully reached its apex. There is no prospect of reunion with you elsewhere in some existence through rebirth from now on. Familiarity or friendliness connected with this life has been totally cut off. Now will I enter the city of Nibbāna, which is free from old age, death and danger, which is blissful, calm, secure, which hundreds of thousands of Buddhas have entered. Should there be any wrong doings, physical and verbal, done by me to your displeasure, kindly forgive me. The final moment for me has now come, exalted Buddha."

"My son Sāriputta, I forgive you. There is nothing whatsoever wrong physically or verbally on your part. You may now go, my dear son, wherever you wish." Thus, the Buddha gave his permission.

Immediately after the Buddha had given permission, Ven. Sāriputta pressed and gripped the Buddha's feet most vigorously. When he stood up, the great earth quaked instantly down to the water below, very strongly as though it were saying: "Though I am able to shoulder Mount Meru, the universe, the Himavanta and the seven surrounding mountains, I cannot today bear this aggregate of virtues." A loud crash of thunder occurred, roaring tumultuously across the entire sky. Huge clouds arose in a second and let a lotus rain (vassa) fall heavily.

The Buddha thought: “Sāriputta has paid homage to me as I am sitting. Now I shall let him do so as I am standing.” So he rose from the Dhamma throne, the Buddha-seat, from which he usually gave sermons, and walked towards the fragrant chamber and stood on the wooden board studded with gems. Ven. Sāriputta circumambulated the Buddha, who was thus standing, [1197] keeping him on his right and made obeisance from the front, from the back, from the left and from the right of Buddha.

Then he made his last supplication: “Exalted Buddha, I expressed my wish, prostrating at the feet of the Buddha Anomadassī an immeasurable period and 100,000 aeons ago, just for seeing you. My wish has now been fulfilled, I have had a chance to see you. When I expressed my wish, I listened continuously to the prophetic word of Buddha Anomadassī, and I visualized you through my knowledge and that was my first sight of you. My seeing you now is my last. There is no more chance for me to see you again.”

Thereafter he raised his joined hands, which were graceful and bright with the ten nails, towards the Buddha and walked backward till the visibility of the Buddha ended. Having paid respect thus, he departed together with his 500 pupils. Then again the earth failed to bear Ven Sāriputta’s excellence and quaked down to the water below.

The Buddha asked the monks surrounding him: “Dear sons, go and see your elder brother off!” All four classes of the assembly then left the Buddha alone at the Jetavana monastery and went out without anyone remaining there, to give Ven. Sāriputta a send-off. The citizens of Sāvathī too learnt that Ven. Sāriputta was leaving Jetavana to attain Parinibbāna after seeking permission from the Buddha. Wanting to get a glimpse of the noble Ven. Sāriputta, they came out from the city gate that was wholly crowded, with no room for exit or entry. Carrying perfumes and flowers and with their hair dishevelled, they wailed: “Venerable sir, to which venerable should we go now, enquiring: ‘Where is Ven. Sāriputta of great wisdom? Where is Ven. Sāriputta, the Captain of the Dhamma?’ Into whose hands do you entrust the exalted Buddha and leave, noble venerable?” Wailing in this way, they followed Ven. Sāriputta step by step.

As Ven. Sāriputta was of great wisdom, he exhorted the crowd briefly: “This path leading to the death of every arising being is something which no one can avoid.” He also asked the monks: “You too stay behind, monks, and do not neglect the Fortunate One.” Thus he sent them back and headed for Nālaka village together with his own followers. To those people who went along with him lamenting: “Formerly the noble one used to travel only to come back. But his journey now is of no return?” Ven. Sāriputta gave an exhortative discourse, saying: “Dear supporters, virtuous ones! Be mindful. Conditioned things, whether physical or mental, happen like this: after arising, they end by passing away!” By this advice concerning mindfulness, Ven. Sāriputta persuaded them to go home.

Ven. Sāriputta Goes Home

After uplifting the people on the way for seven days, spending just one night at each place, but without prolonging his stay, he travelled on and on till he reached Nālaka one evening. He stopped and rested at the foot of a banyan tree near the village gate.

Then the nephew of Ven. Sāriputta, a boy by the name of Uparevata, came out of the village. Seeing the noble Ven. Sāriputta, he went up to him and stood, paying respects. Ven. Sāriputta asked his nephew: “Uparevata, is your grandmother at home?” When the boy answered that she was, Ven. Sāriputta said: “Go and tell her of our arrival in the village. If she asks the reason for our coming here, say that we shall stay here the whole day and ask her in my name to clean the chamber where I was born and also to arrange lodgings for 500 monks.”

Uparevata, went to his grandmother Rūpasārī and told her: “Grandmother, my uncle Upatissa has come.” – “Where is he now?” asked the grandmother. The boy answered: “At the city gate.” – “Is he alone or is there somebody else too?” – “Yes, there are 500 monks who have come along.” – “Why did he come?” the grandmother asked him again, and the boy related all as instructed by Ven. Sāriputta. “Oh, why does he want me to clean and arrange lodgings for such a great number of monks?” wondered the lady. “After becoming a monk in his youth, perhaps he desires to return to lay life now that he has grown old.” With this thought, she cleaned the chamber which was the birthplace of Ven. Sāriputta and prepared the accommodation for the 500 monks. She also lighted the [1198] standing lamps and sent for Ven. Sāriputta.

The noble Ven. Sāriputta, having ascended to the upper terrace together with the 500 monks and having entered the chamber and sat down there, dismissed them saying: “Go to your respective places.” As soon as the monks were out, a severe ailment occurred to Ven. Sāriputta’s body. Deadly pains, with discharge of blood, developed incessantly. The care given to him involved an exchange of a vessel in for a vessel out. Thinking: “I do not like the way my son is suffering,” the Brahmin lady Rūpasārī stood, leaning against the doorway of her chamber.

Then the Four Great Kings surveyed the present whereabouts of the noble Ven. Sāriputta, the Captain of the Dhamma and they saw him lying on his deathbed in his chamber, his birthplace, in the village of Nālaka, and they decided to go there to pay their last respects and to give their last treatment. On arrival, they stood near him while paying respects. When Ven. Sāriputta asked who they were, they answered that they were the Four Great Kings. “Why did you come?” enquired Ven. Sāriputta and they answered: “We come to look after you, sir.” He sent them back, saying: “Enough! I have a monk as my nurse. You may return!” When they went back, Sakka came and spoke in exactly the same way. When Sakka departed, Mahā Brahma came and spoke in exactly the same way. Both Sakka and Mahā Brahma were sent back by Ven. Sāriputta with the same words.

Having seen the coming and going of Devas and Brahmas, the Brahmin lady Rūpasārī became desirous of knowing who those beings were that came and paid homage to her son. She went to the doorway of the chamber and asked her younger son Ven. Cunda who was already there: “Dear son Cunda, what is the matter?” Ven. Cunda explained to his mother that Ven. Sāriputta was sick, and he told Ven. Sāriputta of their mother’s presence. When Ven. Sāriputta asked why she came untimely, the mother replied that she did so to see her ailing son, and asked: “Who are those persons, dear son, that visited you earlier?” – “Those who came to me, madam, are the Four Great Kings.” – “Are you superior to those Four Great Kings, son?” Ven. Sāriputta answered: “Madam, those Four Great Kings are like the guardsmen of our residence. Armed with their swords they have protected our master, the exalted Buddha, since his conception.” The mother continued to ask: “Who came immediately after the Four Great Kings?” – “He was Sakka.” – “Are you superior to Sakka too?” Ven. Sāriputta answered: “That Sakka, madam, is like a young novice who carries my bowl and other articles. When our master, the exalted Buddha, descended from the Tāvātimsa abode to the human world after his teaching of the Abhidhamma there, Sakka came along carrying the master’s bowl and robe.” The mother asked again:

“Who is he that came shinning, immediately after Sakka’s visit?” – “Madam,” answered Ven. Sāriputta, “the one who came last was Mahā Brahma, your god and master.” – “Dear son, are you also superior to Mahā Brahma, our god?” Then Ven. Sāriputta said: “Oh, yes, madam! On the day our teacher, the exalted Buddha, was born, four Mahā Brahmas, not just one, came and received the Bodhisatta, the Supreme One, with a gold net.”

Rūpasārī Attains Stream-Entry

Then his mother reflected: “What I have seen now is my son’s magnificence. I wonder what the magnificence of my son’s master, the exalted Buddha, would be like? It must indeed be inestimable!” While she was thus wondering, the five kinds of joy (pīti) occurred to her and pervaded her whole body. Ven. Sāriputta perceived: “Now joy and happiness (pīti-somanassa) has occurred to my mother. This is a very suitable occasion for me to give a Dhamma talk to her.” So he asked: “Madam, what are you thinking about?” – “I am wondering, son, I have seen my son’s magnificence, but what is your master’s magnificence like, for it must be inestimable.” Then Ven. Sāriputta explained: “Madam, when our master, the Fortunate One, was born, when he gave up the world, when he gained Awakening and when he delivered the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, the system of the 10,000 world-element trembled roaringly. There is none in the world who equals our master in such virtues as morality, mental concentration, wisdom, emancipation and [1199] insight through emancipation. For these reasons, he is the possessor of such attributes as Arahant, and Sammā-sambuddha.” With this introductory speech, Ven. Sāriputta gave a Dhamma talk expounding elaborately on the attributes of the Buddha.

At the end of the discourse by her beloved eldest son, the mother was established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) and said reprovingly: “My dear son Sāriputta, why did you fail to give me such wonderfully substantial happiness? Why did you have the heart to do like this?” Thinking: “I have paid my debt of gratitude to my mother for my birth. Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) is good enough for her.” Ven. Sāriputta sent her away, saying: “Go, madam!” Then he asked his brother Ven. Cunda about the time. When the reply was: “Almost daybreak,” Ven. Sāriputta called a meeting of the monks and when Cunda informed him that the monks had assembled, he asked Ven. Cunda to help him sit up.

Ven. Sāriputta, asking for forgiveness, addressed the assembly: “Friends, if there is any unpleasant deed or word on my part while you were wandering along with me for 44 years, kindly forgive me.” The assembly of monks replied: “Venerable sir, during our wandering with you, without deserting you for 44 years, we saw no unpleasant deed or word of yours. In fact, it is you, venerable sir, who must forgive us.” When they had asked for forgiveness, he gathered his robe and covered his face and lay on his right side. Like the Buddha, he entered upon the nine absorptions (jhāna) that were to be taken up in order; he was absorbed in them progressively and then regressively; again he proceeded in his absorption from the first absorption up to the fourth absorption. Immediately after his emergence from the fourth absorption, Ven. Sāriputta attained Parinibbāna, complete extinction of the physical and mental aggregates, the element of Nibbāna without any remnants of the aggregates remaining, causing immediately the great earth to roar and echo.

Being aware that her son did not say a word and wondering what had happened to her son, the mother Rūpasārī enquired by running her hands on the back of his sole and she came to know that her son had attained Parinibbāna. So making a loud noise, she touched Ven. Sāriputta’s feet with her head and cried, uttering: “Dear son, we did not know of your virtues previously. Now we have no opportunity to invite hundreds of thousands of monks, with you at their head, to my house for feeding! There is no chance to offer you robes! No occasion to have hundreds of dwellings built!” Thus, she wailed till dawn. As soon as dawn came, his mother summoned goldsmiths, had the treasuries opened and gold bars weighed with a huge pair of scales and handed them over to the goldsmiths, ordering: “Brothers, make with this gold bullion 500 spired halls and 500 pavilions.”

Sakka too called Vissakamma and commanded him: “Friend Vissakamma, the Captain of the Dhamma, Ven. Sāriputta, has attained Parinibbāna. Create 500 spired halls and 500 pavilions of gold.” Vissakamma created them all under Sakka’s command. In this way, there were 500 spired structures and 500 pavilions built by his mother, and another 500 spired halls and 500 pavilions created by Vissakamma, totalling 2,000 golden structures.

Thereafter, a large hall was built with a big golden pinnacle in the middle, at the centre of the Nālaka village and other pinnacles were made for lesser halls.

Then the ceremony for funeral rites took place. In this ceremony, Devas mingled with humans and humans with Devas and thus they all paid homage to the remains of Ven. Sāriputta, making the ceremony more crowded.

The Story of Revatī the Female Devotee

Ven. Sāriputta's female devotee, Revatī by name, came to the funeral with three golden vases made to honour her master. At that moment, Sakka too came to the human world with the intention to do honour to Ven. Sāriputta and with him were divine dancing girls as his companions, numbering twenty-five million (25,000,000). Learning of Sakka's visit, people turned back and moved away. In the crowd was Revatī, who also tried to move back like [1200] the others, but as she was heavy with child, she could not get to a safe place and fell down in the midst of the people. Not seeing her, the people trod on her and went away. Revatī died on the spot and was reborn in a golden mansion in Tāvatiṃsa. Instantly she had a body about three miles long, resembling a huge gem stone. Her ornaments were about a load of 60 boxes and her retinue of divine maids were 1,000 in number.

Then the maids placed a big mirror in front of her. When she saw her luxuries, she pondered: "This wealth is great indeed! What kind of good works have I done?" And this led her to know: "I paid homage to Ven. Sāriputta with three golden vases. The people stomped on me and went away. I died on the spot and instantly took rebirth in this Tāvatiṃsa heaven. I shall tell the people clearly of the result of my wholesome deeds done to Ven. Sāriputta. So she went down in her own flying mansion to the realm of human beings.

Seeing the golden mansion from a distance, the people were amazed wondering: "What is happening? Are there two suns rising brightly?" While they were thus talking, the big mansion descended near them, and showed its shape. Then they said: "This is not a sun. It is a gigantic gold mansion!" While the people were talking among themselves, the golden mansion descended in a moment and halted in the sky just above the funeral pyre of fragrant wood piled up to burn the remains of Ven. Sāriputta. The goddess Revatī left the mansion in the sky and went down to earth. "Who are you?" asked the people and Revatī replied: "Do you not know me? I am Revatī by name. After honouring Ven. Sāriputta with three golden vases, I was trodden to death by the people and was reborn in Tāvatiṃsa heaven. Behold my fortune and splendour. You too now give alms.

Do other deeds of merit as well.” Thus she spoke in praise of the beneficial results of good works. She paid homage and circumambulated the funeral pyre by keeping it on her right, then she went back to her divine abode in Tāvātimsa heaven.

Ven. Cunda Conveys the Relics to Sāvathī

Having performed the funeral rites for seven days, the people made a heap of fragrant wood, its height measuring 99 cubits. They put Ven. Sāriputta’s remains on top of the fragrant wooden heap and lighted it with fragrant grass. On the site where the cremation took place, a Dhamma talk was given throughout the night. At daybreak, Ven. Anuruddha extinguished the fire of the funeral pyre with scented water. Then Ven. Sāriputta’s younger brother, Ven. Cunda put the relics in the water filter, and thinking: “I must not stay here now in this Nālaka village. I shall report the attainment of Parinibbāna by my older brother, Ven. Sāriputta, the Captain of the Dhamma, to the Fortunate One.” So he took the water-filter containing the relics and collected Ven. Sāriputta’s requisites, such as bowl, robes, etc., and went to Sāvathī. He spent only one night, not two nights, at each stage of his journey and eventually arrived at Sāvathī.

Then Ven. Cunda bathed in the lake near the Jetavana monastery, returned to the shore and put on his robes properly. He reflected: “Buddhas are great personalities, to be respected, like a stone umbrella. They are difficult to approach like a snake with its hood erect or like a lion, tiger or an elephant in heat. I dare not go straight to the Fortunate One to inform him. Whom should I approach first?” Reflecting thus, he remembered his preceptor: “My preceptor, the custodian of the Dhamma, Ven. Ānanda, is a very close, good friend of my brother. I shall go to him and relate the matter and then I shall take him with me and speak to the Fortunate One.” So he went to Ven. Ānanda, paid respects to him and sat down at a proper place. And he said to Ven. Ānanda: “Venerable sir, Ven. Sāriputta has attained Parinibbāna. This is his bowl and this is his robe, and this is the water-filter containing his relics.” Thus he presented one article after another while speaking to Ven. Ānanda.

Then Ven. Ānanda said: “My friend Cunda, we have a reason to see the Fortunate One. Come, friend Cunda, let us go. Let us approach the Fortunate One and tell him of the matter.” So saying Ven. Ānanda took Ven. Cunda to the Buddha, paid respects [1201] to him, and they took their proper seats.

Thereafter Ven. Ānanda said to the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, this Ven. Cunda who is a novice (samañuddesa) has informed me that Ven. Sāriputta has attained Parinibbāna. This is Ven. Sāriputta’s bowl, this is his robe and this is his water-filter with his relics.” So saying, Ven. Ānanda handed over the water-filter to the Buddha.

The Buddha stretched out his hand to receive the water-filter and placed it on his palm and addressed the monks: “Monks, my dear sons, fifteen days ago Sāriputta performed a number of miracles and sought my permission to enter Parinibbāna. Now only his bodily relics remain which are as white as a newly polished conch shell.

Monks, that monk Sāriputta was one who had fulfilled the perfections (pāramī) for an immeasurable period (asañkhyeyya) and 100,000 aeons. He was the individual who turned the Dhamma Wheel that had been turned by me previously or one who had taught the Dhamma Wheel that had been taught by me. Marvellously did he occupy the place that was next to me.

That monk Sāriputta light up the assembly of disciples (sāvaka-sannipāta), with his presence extremely well, the assembly of disciples which emerged on the day he became an Arahat. Besides me, he was peerless in possessing wisdom throughout the field of births (jātikhetta), the system of the 10,000 worlds.

That monk Sāriputta was of great wisdom, of vast wisdom, of active wisdom, of quick wisdom, of sharp wisdom, and of wisdom destructive to the defilements (kilesa), of few wants, easily contented, free from the hindrances (nīvaraṇa), who didn’t mix with people and was highly energetic. He admonished others by pointing out their faults, and he condemned evil deeds and evil doers regardless of their social positions.

Dear monks, that monk Sāriputta embraced asceticism after renouncing great wealth in 500 existences; that monk Sāriputta had forbearance that was as mighty as the great earth; that monk Sāriputta was least conceited like a horn-broken bull; that monk Sāriputta was as humble-minded as a beggar’s son.

Dear monks, behold the relics of Sāriputta who was of great wisdom! Behold the relics of Sāriputta who was of vast wisdom, of active wisdom, of quick wisdom, of sharp wisdom, of wisdom penetrative of the defilements, of few wants, easily contented, free from the hindrances, who did not mix with people and was highly energetic. He admonished others by pointing out their faults, condemned evil deeds and evil doers regardless of their social positions!”

After uttering this in prose, the Buddha went on to speak the following verses. These verses are from the commentary to the Discourse to Cunda (Cunda-sutta, SN 47.13):

*Yo pabbajī jāti-satāni pañca,
pahāya kāmāni mano-ramāni.
Taṃ vīta-rāgaṃ susamāhitindriyaṃ,
Parinibbutaṃ vandatha Sāriputtaṃ.*

O my dear sons, monks! That noble monk, named Sāriputta, unflinchingly and completely discarded sense pleasures that would delight the foolish mind. He adopted an ascetic life with great faith for 500 existences. To that noble monk, named Sāriputta, who now has totally cut off craving and passion, whose sense-faculties were well restrained, who has attained Parinibbāna and ceased suffering, bow your heads in homage with respectful faith and conceit destroyed.

*Khanti-balo paṭhavi-samo na kuppati, na cāpi cittassa vasena vattati. [1202]
Anukampako kāruṇiko ca nibbuto,
Parinibbutaṃ vandatha Sāriputtaṃ.*

O my dear sons, monks! That noble monk, named Sāriputta, had great forbearance as his strength; resembling the great earth he showed no anger to others; he never yielded to the whims of the unstable mind; he looked after many beings with loving-kindness; he was immensely compassionate; he quenched the heat of the defilements. To him, who has attained Parinibbāna and ceased suffering, bow your heads in homage with respectful faith and conceit destroyed.

*Caṇḍāla-putto yathā nagaraṃ pavīṭṭho,
nīca-māno carati kaḷopi-hattho.
Tathā ayaṃ vicarati Sāriputto,
Parinibbutaṃ vandatha Sāriputtaṃ.*

O my dear sons, monks! Just as the son of a poor beggar who enters towns and villages looking for food with a worn out cup made of bamboo strips in his hand, wanders without conceit but humble-minded, even so this noble monk, named Sāriputta, wandered knowing no pride but in all humility. To him, who has attained Parinibbāna and ceased suffering, bow your heads in homage with respectful faith and conceit destroyed.

*Usabho yathā chinna-visāṇako, aheṭṭhayanto carati purantare vane.
Tathā ayam vicarati Sāriputto, Parinibbutam vandatha Sāriputtam.*

O my dear sons, monks! Just as the horn-broken bull wanders in towns, villages and forests, absolutely harmless to other beings, even so the noble monk, named Sāriputta, wandered doing no harm to others and lived in harmony in the four postures of lying, sitting, standing and walking. To him, who has attained Parinibbāna and ceased suffering, bow your heads in homage with respectful faith and conceit destroyed.

Beginning thus the Buddha praised the virtues of Ven. Sāriputta in 500 verses. The more the Buddha praised in every way Ven. Sāriputta's virtues the greater was Ven. Ānanda's helplessness. As a chicken near a cat's mouth trembles, so did Ven. Ānanda helplessly tremble. Accordingly, he asked the Buddha: "Exalted Buddha, having heard of Ven. Sāriputta's Parinibbāna, I feel as though my body is stiff, the directions are blurred to my eyes, the Dhamma does not manifest itself to me. I am not inclined to learn any unlearnt Dhamma texts nor am I interested to recite what I have learnt."

Then in order to cheer him up the Buddha said as follows: "My dear Ānanda, did Sāriputta attain Parinibbāna taking with him the aggregate of your virtues (sīla) or taking with him the aggregate of your concentration (samādhi), your wisdom (paññā), your freedom (vimutti), your knowledge and seeing of freedom (vimutti-ñāṇa-dassana)?"

Thereupon Ven. Ānanda replied: "Exalted Buddha, Ven. Sāriputta when attaining Parinibbāna, does not take the aggregate of my virtues (sīla) or take with him the aggregate of my concentration (samādhi), my wisdom (paññā), my freedom (vimutti), my knowledge and seeing of freedom (vimutti-ñāṇa-dassana).

In fact, exalted Buddha, Ven. Sāriputta, the great elder exhorted me, made me plunge into the Dhamma, made me understand the Dhamma, and made me set up the Dhamma. He made me become ardent and happy to practise the Dhamma. He was anxious to preach to me. He respected his co-residents. I always remember his [1203] Dhamma influence, his Dhamma instruments and his righteous support.”

The Buddha knowing that Ven. Ānanda was really in great distress, said to him as follows, for he desired to abate his sorrowful feelings: “My dear Ānanda, have I not spoken to you long before about separation from one’s beloved while alive (nānā-bhāva), separation by death (vinā-bhāva) and separation in different existences (aññathā-bhāva)? Dear Ānanda, herein how could it be possible to wish that something, having the nature of coming to life, coming into existence and being subject to conditioning and destruction, should not pass away? Indeed there is no such possibility!

My dear Ānanda, while a big substantial tree is standing, its largest branch might come to destruction; similarly, while the community of worthy monks is existing, Sāriputta ceases to live. Herein how would it be possible to wish that something, having the nature of coming to life, coming into existence and being subject to conditioning and destruction, should not pass away? Indeed there is no such possibility.

My dear Ānanda, do not live depending on others but live depending on yourself. Live not by relying on other doctrines but by relying on the supermundane ones! My dear Ānanda, how should a monk not live depending on others but live depending on himself? How should one live not relying on other doctrines but by relying on supermundane ones?

My dear Ānanda, in this Dispensation, a monk lives, eradicating craving and grief that tend to appear in the world, by putting forth strong effort, by reflecting, by being mindful, by repeatedly seeing the body as the body. By putting strong effort, by reflecting, by being mindful, one lives, eradicating craving and grief that tends to appear in the world, by repeatedly seeing feelings as feelings, by repeatedly seeing the mind as mind, by repeatedly seeing phenomena as phenomena. My dear Ānanda, in this way a monk lives not by depending on others but by depending upon himself. He lives not by relying on other doctrines but by relying on supermundane ones.

My dear Ānanda, if monks, at present or after my demise, live by not depending on others but by depending on themselves, by not relying on other doctrines but by relying on supermundane ones, all of them will become noble Arahats, indeed among those, who take up the three trainings.”

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1800

Speaking to him in this way, the Buddha gave some relief to Ven. Ānanda. Thereafter, he had the bone relics of Ven. Sāriputta placed in a shrine (cetiya) in the city of Sāvattthī.

Herein, the Buddha attained Awakening on the full moon day of May (Vesākha). On the first waxing day of February (Māgha) Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Moggallāna joined the Saṅgha, and on the seventh day Ven. Moggallāna became an Arahat. On the fifteenth day, the full moon of February, Sāriputta became an Arahat.

On the full moon day of November (Kattikā) of the year 483 BCE, the day the Buddha completed 45 Rains Retreat (Vassa) and the two chief disciples, 44 Rains Retreat, Ven. Sāriputta attained Parinibbāna in his native village Nālaka. It should [1204] be noted briefly in advance that Ven. Moggallāna did the same at the Kālasilā stone slab on Mount Isigili, Rājagaha, on the new-moon day of that same month of November (Kattikā) in the same year.

Ven. Moggallāna's Attainment of Parinibbāna

After having the relics of Ven. Sāriputta placed in a shrine in Sāvattthī, as has been said, the Buddha gave a hint to Ven. Ānanda that he would travel to Rājagaha. Ven. Ānanda then informed the monks of the Buddha's proposed journey to that city. In the company of a large number of monks, the Buddha set out from Sāvattthī to Rājagaha and took residence in the Veḷuvana monastery.

While the Buddha was staying at the Veḷuvana monastery of Rājagaha, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna was sojourning to the stone slab, named Kālasilā, on Mount Isigili. As Ven. Mahā Moggallāna was at the height of his supernormal powers, he used to visit the realm of Devas as well as to that of Ussada hell. After seeing for himself the great enjoyment of divine luxuries by the Buddha's followers in the realm and the great suffering of the heretical disciples in Ussada, he returned to the human world and told the people that such and such a male or female supporter was reborn in a certain realm, enjoying great luxuries but among the followers of heretics such and such a man or a woman was reborn in a certain hell. People therefore showed their faith in the Buddha's teaching and avoided heretics. For the Buddha and his disciples, the people's honour and hospitality increased whereas those for the heretics decreased day by day.

So the latter conceived a grudge against Ven. Mahā Moggallāna. They discussed it and decided, saying: “If this monk Moggallāna lives longer our attendants and supporters might disappear and our gains might diminish gradually. Let us have him killed.” Accordingly they paid 1,000 pieces of money to a chief robber, named Samaṇaguttaka, to put the noble Ven. Mahā Moggallāna to death.

With the intention to kill Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, the chief robber Samaṇaguttaka, accompanied by a large number of robbers, went to Kālasilā. When Ven. Mahā Moggallāna saw him, he disappeared into the air by means of his supernormal powers. Not finding Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, the chief robber went back that day and returned again the next day. Ven. Mahā Moggallāna evaded him in the same way. Thus six days elapsed.

On the seventh day, however, due to a misdeed done in the past, the unwholesome deed that comes to fruition in a future life (aparāpariya-akusala-kamma) took effect.

The unwholesome deed of Ven. Mahā Moggallāna was as follows: In one of his former existences, when he was inexperienced, wrongly following the slanderous words of his wife, he wished to kill his blind parents. So he took them in a small vehicle to the forest and pretending to be plundered by robbers, he attacked his parents. Being unable to see who attacked them because of their blindness and believing that the attackers were real robbers, they cried for the sake of their son, saying: “Dear son, these robbers are striking us. Run away, dear son, to safety!”

With remorse, he said to himself: “Though I myself beat them, my parents cried, worrying about me,” and he realised: “I have done a wrong thing!” So he stopped attacking them and making them believe that the robbers were gone, he stroked his parents’ arms and legs and said: “Mother and father fear not. The robbers have fled,” and he took them home.

Having no chance to show its effect for a long time, his evil deed remained like a live charcoal covered by ash and now, in his last existence, it came time to seize upon and hurt him. A worldly simile may be given as follows: When a hunter sees a deer, he sends his dog for the deer, and the dog, following the deer, catches up at the right place and bites his prey. In the same way, the evil deed done by Ven. Mahā Moggallāna now had its chance to show its result in this final existence of Ven. Mahā Moggallāna. Never has there been any person who escapes the result of his evil deed when it finds the opportunity to show up at an opportune moment.

Knowing full well his being caught and bitten by his own evil deed, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna was unable to get away by his supernormal power at the seventh attempt. This was the power that had been strong enough to make even the Nāga King Nandopananda tame and to make the Vejayanta palace tremble, but as a result of his past wickedness, he could not disappear into the air. The power that had enabled him to defeat the Nāga King and to make the Vejayanta tremble had now become weak because of his former unwholesome deed.

The chief robber, Samaṇaguttaka, arrested Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, and together with his men he hit him and pounded him so that the bones broke to pieces like broken rice. After doing this [1205] deed known as pounding the bones to dust so they become something like straw used as a cushion to put something on (palālapīṭhika), and thinking that Ven. Mahā Moggallāna was dead, the chief robber threw the body into a bush and left together with his men.

Becoming conscious, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna thought of seeing the Buddha before his demise, and having fastened his pounded body with the bandage of his psychic powers, he rose into the sky and appeared before the Buddha and paid homage to the master. Thereafter, the following conversation took place between Ven. Mahā Moggallāna and the Buddha:

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna: Exalted Buddha, I have given up the control of my life process (āyu-saṅkhāra), I am going to attain Parinibbāna.

Buddha: Are you going to do so, my dear son Moggallāna?

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna: Yes, I am, venerable sir.

Buddha: Where will you go and do that?

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna: At the place where the Kālasilā stone slab is, exalted Buddha.

Buddha: In that case, dear son Moggallāna, give a Dhamma talk to me before you go. I will not have another opportunity to see a disciple like you.

When the Buddha said thus, the noble Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, replying: “Yes, exalted Buddha, I shall do as you say,” and he paid homage to the Buddha and flew up into the air up to the height of a toddy palm tree, then that of two palm trees and in this way he rose up to the height of seven trees, and as Ven. Sāriputta had done before on the day of his Parinibbāna, he displayed various miracles and spoke of the Dhamma to the Buddha. After paying homage respectfully, he went to the forest where Kālasilā was and attained Parinibbāna.

At that very moment, a tumult arose in all six planes of the Deva realms, and they spoke among themselves, saying: “Our master, Ven. Moggallāna, is said to have attained Parinibbāna.” Devas and Brahmas brought divine unguents, flowers, fragrance, smoke and sandalwood power as well as various divine firewood. The height of the funeral pyre made of sandalwood was 99 cubits. The Buddha himself came together with his monks and standing near the remains, supervised the funeral arrangements and had the cremation conducted.

On a vast funeral site a rain of flowers fell. At the funeral ceremony, there were human beings moving about among Devas and Devas moving about among human beings. In due course, among Devas stood demons; among demons, Gandhabbas; among Gandhabbas, Nāgas; among Nāgas, Garuḷas; among Garuḷas, Kinnarās; among Kinnarās, umbrellas; among umbrellas, fans made of golden yak (camara) tail; among these fans, round banners, and among round banners were flat ones. Devas and humans held the funeral ceremony for seven days.

The Buddha had the relics of Ven. Mahā Moggallāna brought to him and a shrine (cetiya) was built. In it the relics were enshrined near the gateway of the Veḷuvana monastery.

The Murderers Are Punished

The news of the murder of Ven. Mahā Moggallāna spread throughout the whole of Jambudīpa. King Ajātasattu sent detectives to all places to investigate and arrest the murderous robbers. While the murderers were drinking at a liquor shop, one of them provokingly slapped down the liquor cup of another fellow. Then to pick a quarrel the provoked man said: “Hey, you wretched one, you stubborn fellow! Why did you do that and make my cup fall to the ground?” Then the first man asked annoyingly: “Hey, you scoundrel! How was it? Did you dare to hurt Ven. Mahā Moggallāna first?” – “Hey, you evil one! Did you not know that I was the first and foremost to harm that monk?” the other man defiantly retorted.

Hearing the men discussing among themselves: “It was I who did the killing. It was I who murdered him!” the king’s officers and detectives seized all the murderers and reported to King Ajātasattu on the matter. The king summoned them and asked: “Did you kill the [1206] Ven. Mahā Moggallāna?” – “Yes, we did, Great King,” the men replied admitting it. “Who asked you to do so?” – “Great King, those naked heretics did, and they gave us money,” the men confessed.

The king had all the 500 naked heretics caught and buried together with the murderers in the pit, navel-deep in the courtyard. They were covered with straw and burnt to death. When it was certain that they all had been burnt, they were cut to pieces by ploughing over them with an iron plough.

Herein, the account of Ven. Mahā Moggallāna’s attainment is taken from the exposition of the Birth Story about the Teacher Sarabhaṅga (Sarabhaṅga-jātaka, Ja 522); that of the punishment of the murderers from the exposition of the Story about Mahā Moggallāna (Mahā Moggallāna-vatthu) of the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, 123) commentary.

Regarding the fact that the Buddha himself supervised the funeral of Ven. Moggallāna, the monks in the Dhamma Hall remarked: “Friends, since Ven. Sāriputta’s Parinibbāna did not take place near the Buddha, he did not receive the Buddha’s honour. On the other hand, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna received it because he attained Parinibbāna in the neighbourhood of the Buddha.” When the Buddha came and asked the monks what they were talking about, they told him. The Buddha then said: “Monks, Moggallāna was honoured by me not only in this life but also in the past.” The Buddha told them the Birth Story about the Teacher Sarabhaṅga (Sarabhaṅga-jātaka, Ja 522).

Soon after the Parinibbāna of the two chief disciples, the Buddha went on a great circular (mahā-maṇḍala) tour in the company of monks and reached the town of Ukkacelā where he made his alms round, and delivered the Discourse at Ukkacelā (Ukkacela-sutta, SN 47.14) on the sand banks of the Ganges.

4. Ven. Mahā Kassapa

Aspiration in the Past

100,000 aeons ago, Buddha Padumuttara appeared and, with the city of Hāmsavatī as his alms resort, he resided in the Khemā Deer Park. While he was so residing, a wealthy person owning 800 million, named Vedeha, who was the future elder Mahā Kassapa, had his delicious early meal and kept the Observance Day (Uposatha). With unguents, flowers, etc. in his hand, he went to the monastery where he made obeisance and sat down at a proper place.

At that time, the Buddha spoke about his third disciple, Mahā Nisabha by name, saying: “Monks, among my disciples who themselves practise the austerities (dhutaṅga) and advise fellow monks to practise the same, Nisabha is foremost (etad-agga).”

Hearing the Buddha’s words, Vedeha was very pleased and his faith increased and when the audience had left as the occasion came to an end, he respectfully paid homage to the Buddha and said: “Exalted Buddha, please accept my alms food tomorrow.” – “Supporter,” replied the Buddha, “the monks are too many!” – “How many are they, exalted Buddha?” When the Buddha said they were 6,800,000, he said boldly: “Exalted Buddha, without leaving even a single novice at the monastery, kindly have my meal offering together with all of your monks.” The Buddha accepted the invitation of the devotee Vedeha by keeping silent.

Knowing that the Buddha had accepted his invitation, Vedeha returned home and prepared a great offering and on the next morning sent a message to the Buddha announcing the time for having the meal. Taking his bowl and robe, the Buddha went to Vedeha’s house in the company of monks and sat on the prepared seat. When the pouring of the waters of dedication was over, the Buddha accepted the rice gruel, and other food, and the distribution and partaking of food was made. Sitting near the Buddha, Vedeha was pleased.

At that time, while on alms round, Ven. Mahā Nisabha came to that road. Seeing Ven. Mahā Nisabha, Vedeha got up from his seat and drew near to him, showing his respect, he asked: “Venerable sir, please hand your bowl to me.” The noble Ven. Mahā Nisabha handed his [1207] bowl to Vedeha. “Please come into my house,” said Vedeha, “the Fortunate One is still seated there.” – “It is unbecoming to come into the house,” Ven. Mahā Nisabha replied. So the devotee filled the bowl with food and offered it to him.

After sending off the noble Ven. Mahā Nisabha and returning home, Vedeha took his seat near the Buddha and said: “Exalted Buddha, although I told him that the exalted Buddha was still in my house, he did not want to come in. Does he possess virtues that are greater than yours?”

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1806

Never has a Buddha any reluctance to speak in praise of others (vaṇṇa-macchariya), accordingly the Buddha gave his reply as follows, immediately after the lay devotee had asked: “Supporter, expecting food, we are seated in your house, but Nisabha never sits, waiting for food. We occupy a dwelling near a village, but Nisabha stays in a forest dwelling. We stay under a roof, but Nisabha dwells only in open air. These are Nisabha’s unusual attributes.”

The Buddha elaborated on Ven. Mahā Nisabha’s virtues as though he filled the ocean with more water. As for Vedeha, he developed greater faith with greater satisfaction as though more oil was poured into the lamp that is burning with its own oil. So he came to a conclusion: “What use is there for me with human and divine luxuries? I shall resolve to become foremost among those who speak about austerity (dhuta-vāda), monks who themselves practise austerities (dhutaṅga) and advise their co-residents to do so.”

Again, the lay devotee Vedeha invited the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha to his food for the next day. In this way, he offered a great alms giving (mahā-dāna) and on the seventh day, he distributed, in generosity, three robes to each of the monks. Then he fell at the feet of the Buddha and told his wish as follows: “Exalted Buddha, with the development of deeds accompanied by loving-kindness (mettā-kāya-kamma), words accompanied by loving-kindness (mettā-vacī-kamma), and thoughts accompanied by loving-kindness (mettā-mano-kamma), I have performed deeds of merit for seven days such as this great alms giving (mahā-dāna). I do not long for the bliss of Devas, the bliss of Sakka nor the bliss of Brahma as a result of my good works, but may it be the wholesomeness will enable me to strive for becoming foremost among those who practise the thirteen ascetic (dhutaṅga) practices in the lifetime of a coming Buddha, similar to the position that has been achieved now by Ven. Mahā Nisabha.”

Buddha Padumuttara surveyed Vedeha’s future with his psychic power, wondering whether he will achieve it or not for it is so great an aspiration, and he saw the man’s wish would definitely be fulfilled. So the Buddha said prophetically as follows: “Supporter, you have expressed your wish for the position you love. In future, at the end of 100,000 aeons, a Buddha by the name of Gotama shall arise. You shall then become the third disciple, named Mahā Kassapa, of the Buddha Gotama!”

Having heard the prophecy, lay devotee Vedeha was happy as though he was going to attain that position even the following day, for he knew that a Buddha speaks only the truth. For as long as he lived, Vedeha performed various sorts of generosity, kept the precepts and did other wholesome deeds and on his death, was reborn in a divine abode.

Life as Ekasāṭaka Brahmin

From that time onwards, the devotee enjoyed luxury in the divine and human worlds. Ninety-one aeons ago, Buddha Vipassī appeared and was staying in the Deer Park called Khemā, with the city of Bandhumatī as his alms resort. The lay devotee, former Vedeha, then passed from the divine world and took rebirth in an unknown and poor Brahmin family.

Buddha Vipassī used to hold a special convocation, once in every seven years and gave discourses. In so doing, he held day and night sessions so that every being might be able to attend. For the day session, he taught in the evening and for the night-session, he spent [1208] the whole night. When the convocation was drawing near, there arose a great noise and Devas, roaming about the whole Jambudīpa, announced that the Buddha would deliver a discourse.

The Brahmin, the future Mahā Kassapa, heard the news. But he had only one garment. So did his housewife, the Brahmin woman. As for the upper garment, the couple had but one. That was why he was known all over the town as “Ekasāṭaka Brahmin, the Brahmin with only one garment.” When a meeting of Brahmins took place to discuss some business, the Brahmin himself went to the meeting leaving behind his wife at home; when an assembly of Brahmin women occurred, the Brahmin stayed at home and his wife went there, putting on the same piece of upper garment.

On the day the Buddha was to speak, Ekasāṭaka asked his wife: “Dear wife, how is it? Will you go to hear the discourse at night or will you go for the day session?” – “We women are unable to listen to sermons at night, I shall attend the day session.” So saying she left her husband at home and went along with other female lay devotees and supporters to the day session wearing the upper garment. There, she paid respect to the Buddha, sat at a proper place and listened to the sermons and went home together with the female companions. Then, leaving his wife, the Brahmin, in his turn, put on the same piece of upper garment and went to the monastery at night.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1808

At that time Buddha Vipassī was gracefully seated on the Dhamma throne and, holding a round fan, spoke the Dhamma-words like a man swimming in the celestial river, or like a man stirring up the ocean forcefully with Mount Meru as a churning stick. The whole body of Ekasāṭaka, who was sitting at the end of the assembly and listening, was filled with the five kinds of joy (pīti) profusely, even in the first watch of the night. Hence he folded the upper garment and was about to give it to the Buddha. Then he became reluctant to do so as stinginess (macchariya) occurred in him, manifesting 1,000 disadvantages of giving it away. When stinginess thus occurred in him, he utterly lost his willingness to offer it because worry overwhelmed him as follows: “We have only one upper garment between my wife and myself. We have nothing else for a substitute. And we cannot go out without it.”

When the second watch of the night came, the five kinds of joy reappeared in his mind, and he lost his enthusiasm once more as before. During the last watch too he felt the same joyful emotion. But this time the Brahmin did not allow stinginess to appear again and was determined, saying to himself: “Whether it is a matter of life or death, I will think about the clothing at a later time.” With this determination, he folded the garment, placed it at the feet of the Buddha and whole-heartedly offered it to the Buddha. Then he slapped his bent left arm with his right three times and uttered aloud three times: “Victory is mine! Victory is mine!”

At that time, King Bandhuma, seated behind the curtain, at the back of the throne, was listening to the Dhamma. As a king, it was he who should declare victory; so the shout: “Victory is mine!” did not please him. He, therefore, sent one of his men to enquire what the shout meant.

When the man went to Ekasāṭaka and asked about it, the Brahmin answered: “Man, all princes and others, riding elephants, horses, etc and carrying swords, spears, shields and cover, defeat their enemy troops. The victory achieved by them is no wonder. As for me, like a man who with a club strikes the head of a bull and made the beast run away, so I have defeated my stingy heart and successfully given in generosity the upper garment of mine to the Buddha. I have overcome miserliness and I am invincible.”

The man came back and reported the matter to the king. The king said: “Friend, we do not know what should be given to the Buddha. But the Brahmin does.” So saying, he sent a set of garments to the Brahmin. The Brahmin thought to himself: “The King gave me nothing as I kept silent at first. Only when I talked about the Buddha’s attributes did he give this to me. What use is there for me with this set of garments that occurred to me in association with the Buddha’s attributes?” So thinking he also [1209] offered that set of garments to the Buddha.

The king asked his men as to what the Brahmin did with the garments given by him and came to know that the poor man had given it away to the Buddha. So he had two sets of garments sent to the Brahmin. Again the Brahmin gave them away to the Buddha. The King then had four sets sent to the Brahmin, who again gave them away to the Buddha. In this way the king doubled his gift each time and had 32 sets sent to the Brahmin. This time the Brahmin thought: “Giving away all to the Buddha without leaving some for us seems to mean that we are increasingly receiving the garments.” Accordingly, out of the 32 sets, he took one set for himself and another set for his wife and gave the rest to the Buddha. After that the Brahmin became friendly with the master.

Then one day, in the extremely cold evening, the king saw the Brahmin listening to the Dhamma in the presence of the Buddha. He gave the Brahmin his red mantle which he had on and which was worth 100,000 coins, asking him to cover himself while listening to the Dhamma. But the Brahmin reflected: “What is the use of covering this putrid body of mine with this mantle?” he therefore made it into a canopy and offered it to the Buddha, fixing it above the Buddha’s couch in the fragrant chamber. Touched by the Buddha’s six-coloured radiance, the mantle became all the more beautiful. Seeing the mantle, the King remembered what it was and said to the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, that mantle once belonged to me. I gave it to Ekasāṭaka Brahmin to put on while attending your Dhamma assembly.” The Buddha replied: “Great King, you honoured the Brahmin, and the Brahmin honoured me.” The king thought to himself: “The Brahmin knows what should be given to the exalted Buddha, but we do not.” So thinking, the king gave all kinds of useful articles to the Brahmin, each kind numbering 64. Thus, he performed the act of generosity called the eight by eight (aṭṭhaṭṭhaka) to the Brahmin and appointed him as his Brahmin chaplain.

Understanding that eight by eight equals 64 the chaplain sent 64 vessels daily of food for distribution among the monks by lot. Thus, he established his alms giving (dāna) for as long as he lived, and on his death, he was reborn again in the realm of Devas.

Life as a Householder

Passing away from the Deva realm, the future Mahā Kassapa was reborn in the house of a layman, in the city of Bārāṇasī, during the period between the two Buddhas (Buddhantara), Koṇāgamana and Kassapa, who appeared in this Fortunate Aeon (Bhadda-kappa). When he grew old, he married and while living a householder's life, he one day took a stroll towards the forest. At that time, a certain Paccekabuddha was stitching a robe near a river-bank, and as he did not have enough cloth to make a hem he folded up the unfinished robe.

When the householder saw the Paccekabuddha, he asked the latter why he had folded the robe. When the Paccekabuddha answered that he had done so because he did not have enough cloth for the hem. Hearing this, he gave his own clothes, saying: "Please make the hem with this, venerable sir." Then he expressed his wish, praying: "In my coming existences in Saṃsāra, may I know no lack of such things."

Later on, at the householder's residence, there was a quarrel between the householder's sister and his wife. While they were quarrelling, a certain Paccekabuddha appeared, to receive alms food. Then the householder's sister offered the food to the Paccekabuddha and said: "May I be able to avoid the householder's wife even from a distance of hundred leagues." While standing at the doorway, the wife heard the wish, and thinking: "May the Paccekabuddha not partake of the other woman's food," she took the alms bowl and threw away the food and filled the bowl with mud before she gave it back to the Paccekabuddha. Seeing what the wife was doing, the sister scolded her, saying: "Hey, you stupid woman, you may abuse me, or even beat me if you wish, but it is not proper to throw away the food and fill the bowl with mud and give it to the Paccekabuddha, who has fulfilled the perfections (pāramī) for so long a period of innumerable years."

Then only did the householder's wife regain her moral sense and said: "Wait, please, venerable sir." Then she begged his pardon and threw away the mud from the bowl and washed it thoroughly and rubbed it with fragrant powder. She then filled the bowl with [1210] the four sweet things (catu-madhu), and poured butter which was white like the colour of a thickly grown lotus, and added brilliance thereby. Handing the bowl back to the Paccekabuddha, the wife said: “Just as this food shines, even so may my body emanate a brilliant radiance.” The Paccekabuddha spoke words of appreciation, gave his blessing and flew up into the sky. The husband and wife performed meritorious deeds throughout their lives and upon their death they were reborn in the divine world.

Life as a Bārāṇasī Merchant

Again, when they passed away from the divine world, the householder was reborn during the lifetime of the Buddha Kassapa, in the city of Bārāṇasī, as the son of a wealthy merchant who owned 800 million. Similarly, his wife became the daughter of another wealthy merchant.

When the son came of age, that very daughter was brought to his home as his wife. Because of her past misdeed, the result of which until then had been latent, as soon as she passed the threshold while entering the house, a putrid smell issued forth from her body, as though the toilet was opened. When the merchant son asked whose smell it was and came to know that it was the odour of the bride who had just come, he ordered that the bride be expelled and sent back to her parents’ house in the same pomp and grandeur that had attended her when she came. In this way, she had to return to her parents’ home from seven different places because of the foul smell that appeared as soon as she entered the threshold of her husband-to-be’s house. Terrible indeed is an evil deed!

At that time, as Buddha Kassapa had attained Parinibbāna, people began to erect a relic shrine (dhātu-cetiya), a league high with bricks of gold worth 100,000 made from pure gold bullion. While the shrine was under construction, it occurred to the lady thus: “I am the one who had to return from seven places. What is the use of my living long?” So she sold her jewellery and with the money thus obtained she had a gold brick made, one cubit long, half a cubit wide and four fingers thick, and then took the gold brick together with orpiment and eight lotus stalks and went where the shrine was situated.

At that moment, a brick was wanted to fill the gap that appeared when an encircling layer of bricks was laid as part of the shrine. So she said to the master mason: “Please, sir, fill the gap with my brick.” – “Lady,” replied the master mason, “you have come at an opportune moment. Do it by yourself.”

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1812

When permitted wholeheartedly thus, the wealthy daughter climbed up to that spot and, having mixed the orpiment with the liquid, she filled the gap with her brick by means of that cohesive mixture. Then she paid homage by placing the lotus stalks at the brick and expressed her wish: “In whatever existence in Saṃsāra, may sandalwood fragrance emanate from my body and lotus fragrance from my mouth!” After worshipping the shrine respectfully she went home.

At that moment, the wealthy merchant’s son, to whom the lady was to be married first, remembered her. A festival was held in full swing then. The son asked his men: “Once there was a girl brought to my house; in whose house is she now?” When the men answered that the young lady was still at her father’s house, the man said: “Friends, go and fetch her. Let us enjoy the festival together with her.” So saying he sent his men for her.

When they got to the young lady’s residence, they paid respect to her and stood there. When the lady asked about their visit, they spoke of their purpose. “Brothers,” said the lady, “I have offered all my ornaments in honour of the shrine. I have no more to put on.” The men reported the matter to their master who replied: “You just bring the girl, she will get some jewellery.” So the lady was brought to him by his men. As soon as the merchant’s daughter entered the house, the whole house was filled with sandalwood fragrance as well as that of lotus.

The wealthy son asked: “The first time you came here your body issued forth a foul smell. But now it is sandalwood fragrance from your body and lotus fragrance from your mouth. What is the reason for that?” When the whole story of her meritorious act was told, the man’s faith developed as he thought: “Ah, the Buddha’s teaching is indeed able to free one from the [1211] cycle of suffering!” Accordingly, he wrapped the golden shrine, measuring a league, with velvet blankets. At certain places, he made decorations in the form of golden lotus flowers so as to add exquisite beauty to the shrine, the flowers being the size of a chariot’s wheel. The hanging stems and stalks of the golden lotus were twelve cubits in length.

Life as King Nanda

Having done meritorious deeds in that existence, the wealthy husband and wife lived the full span of life and were reborn in a divine realm on their death. Again, when they passed away from that realm, the husband was reborn at a place a league away from the city of Bārāṇasī, in the family of a noble man, while the wife became the eldest princess in the palace in that city.

When both came of age, an announcement was made to hold a festival in the village where the noble man's son Nanda lived. Then Nanda asked his mother for clothes to put on while enjoying the festive amusements and got a washed, second hand cloth. The son asked for another cloth on the ground that the one given to him was coarse. The mother gave another cloth as a substitute. But it was also rejected because of its roughness. When the rejection was repeated several times in this way, the mother said: "We are of such a noble man's household, dear son. We are not fortunate enough to have clothes better than this." – "In that case, mother, I shall go where finer clothing is available." – "I wish you kingship of Bārāṇasī, dear son," replied the mother, "even today." Thus the mother gave her consent with such auspicious words.

Having done obeisance to his mother, the young Nanda asked her permission to go. And the mother willingly gave her permission. But she did so because of her conviction, thinking: "Where is my son going? He has nowhere else to go. He will be staying here and there in my home." But Nanda left his village for Bārāṇasī and took a nap with his head covered on the stately stone-couch in the royal garden. That was the seventh day after the king's demise.

The ministers performed the funeral rites and held a meeting in the courtyard, discussing among themselves: "Only a daughter was born to the king. He had no son. A kingdom without a king is unseemly. Who should become the monarch?" They proposed one another for kingship saying: "Be our king!" – "No, you should become the ruler." Then the Brahmin chaplain said: "We should not see many persons to choose from. Let us send the state chariot to search for the deserving one!" When the chaplain's decision was agreed by all, they let the state chariot loose and it was followed by the four army divisions with the five kinds of musical instruments playing.

The chariot departed through the eastern gate of the city and ran towards the royal garden. Some people suggested that the chariot should be turned back because it was running towards the garden as a result of its force of habit. The suggestion, however, was rejected by the chaplain. The chariot entered the garden, circumambulated Nanda three times and stopped and set itself ready for Nanda to get on. After removing the edge of the covering cloth from Nanda, the chaplain studied his soles and declared: “Let alone Jambudīpa, this man is worthy to rule over the four continents with their 2,000 surrounding smaller islands.” He also ordered the musicians to play three times.

Then Nanda removed the cloth that covered his face and saw the ministers, with whom he entered into a conversation:

Nanda: For what purpose did you come here?

Ministers: Great King, the kingship of Bārāṇasī has come for you.

Nanda: Where is the king?

Ministers: He has passed away, sir.

Nanda: How many days have elapsed since his passing away?

Ministers: Today is the seventh day.

Nanda: Did not the late king have a son or a daughter? [1212]

Ministers: He had only one daughter, but no son, great king.

When the ministers said thus, he accepted the kingship, saying: “In that case, I shall act as king.” Then the ministers constructed a pavilion for consecration and brought the princess who was fully bedecked and made him king of Bārāṇasī after duly holding a royal consecration ceremony.

Thereafter, the ministers offered a dress costing 1,000 to the consecrated Nanda. “Friends, what sort of clothing is it?” asked King Nanda. “Great King, it is for you to put on.” – “Friends,” enquired the king, “this is but coarse clothing. Have you not got a finer one?” – “Great King, there is no finer one among the clothes to be used by men,” replied the ministers. “Did your late king put on such a dress?” asked Nanda. When the ministers answered in the positive, King Nanda remarked: “Your late king did not seem to be one of great fortune. Bring a golden jar full of water. We shall get very fine clothing.” The ministers brought it and handed it to the king.

Rising from his seat, the king washed his hand and mouth, and carrying the water with his cupped hand, he tossed it in the direction of the east. Then eight wish-fulfilling trees emerged, breaking up the great massive earth. When he did the same in the southern, the western and northern directions, eight trees in each direction emerged. In this way there were 32 wish-fulfilling trees in the four directions. King Nanda wrapped the lower part of his body in a divine robe and put on another one for the upper part. Then he had an announcement made by the beat of drum. The announcement being: “In this state of King Nanda let no women spin yarn!” He also raised the royal white umbrella, bedecked himself with adornments, entered the city on the back of an elephant, ascended the upper terrace of the palace and enjoyed a great kingly life.

After some years of Nanda’s enjoyment of kingly life, the queen, watching his life, showed her manner, expressing pity as she thought: “Rare indeed is a new act of merit!” When the king asked why her manner expressed pity, she reminded him: “Your luxurious life is really great. That is because you have truly performed good deeds with faith in the past. But now you do nothing for future happiness.” – “To whom should we give alms?” asked the king, “there are no virtuous recipients!” – “Great King, Jambudīpa is not void of Arahats. You had better arrange things to be given. I shall bring worthy individuals to receive,” said the queen boldly.

The next day the king had the offerings arranged at the eastern gate of the city. The queen performed a vow early to observe the precepts and facing to the east and prostrating, invited by word of mouth: “If there be Arahats in the eastern direction, may they come and accept our alms food!” Since there were no Arahats in that direction, nobody came to do so. The offerings had to be made to destitutes and beggars. On the next day, similar arrangements took place at the southern gate. The third day saw them too at the western gate. But no Arahats came from those directions either as there were none.

On the fourth day, the offerings were arranged at the northern gate, and when the queen extended her invitation as before, the Paccekabuddha, Mahā Paduma, the oldest of 500 Paccekabuddhas, who were all sons of Queen Padumāvātī, addressed his younger brothers: “Brother Paccekabuddhas, King Nanda has invited you. Accept his invitation!” The noble ones accepted the invitation with pleasure. They washed their faces at Lake Anotatta and then disappeared from there and reappeared at the city’s northern gate.

The citizens went to the king and informed him: “Great King, 500 Paccekabuddhas have come.” With the queen, the king went to the Paccekabuddhas and welcomed them with folded hands. Holding the alms bowl, he brought the 500 Paccekabuddhas to the upper terrace of the palace after performing a great alms giving. When the performance was over, the king, sitting at the feet of the eldest member of the assembly; and the queen, at the feet of the youngest member, made a request, saying: “Venerable sirs, if you stay in our garden, you all will be happy with our supply of requisites. There will also be a growth of merit on our part. Therefore, please give us your promise to stay in the garden of Bārāṇasī city.” The promise was given to the king, who made full accommodations, such as 500 lodgings, 500 meditation paths, etc., in the [1213] royal garden. The four requisites were also provided to them so that they might find no trouble.

When such provision had lasted for some time, a state of unrest and disturbance took place in the border areas. The king asked his queen to look after the Paccekabuddhas during his absence to quell the border rebellion.

As the king had instructed, the queen supported the Paccekabuddhas with the four requisites carefully. After some days, just before the king’s return, the life process of the Paccekabuddhas came to an end. So the eldest one, Mahā Paduma, spent all three watches of the night in absorption (jhāna), and standing and leaning against the wooden backrest, attained Parinibbāna with no grasping remaining. In the same manner the rest of Paccekabuddhas attained Parinibbāna.

On the next day, the queen prepared the seats for the Paccekabuddhas by applying cowdung, strewing flowers and pervading the air with perfumes, and waiting for their arrival. As she did not see any signs of their approaching, she sent a male servant, saying: “Go, my son, and find out the reason. Is there any mental or physical discomfort for the venerable ones?”

When the royal servant went to the garden and looked for Paccekabuddha Mahā Paduma, after opening the door of his dwelling, he did not see him there. So he went to the walk and saw him standing and leaning against the wooden board. After paying homage to him, the servant invited the Paccekabuddha saying: “It is time to have a meal, venerable sir!” There was no reply at all. Thinking that the Paccekabuddha was sleeping, the servant moved nearer and felt the back of his feet. After making such investigations, he came to know full well of the Paccekabuddha’s attainment of Parinibbāna, for his feet were cold and stiff. So he went to the second Paccekabuddha and then subsequently, to them all until the last one. When he investigated thus, he realized that the Paccekabuddhas had all reached the state of Parinibbāna. On his return to the palace, the Queen asked him: “Where are the Paccekabuddhas, son?” – “They have all attained Parinibbāna, madam,” answered the servant. The queen wept bitterly and went out from the city to the royal garden with the citizens and performed funeral rites and cremation. She took their relics and had a shrine built and the relics enshrined.

Having brought the border areas to normalcy, the king returned to the city and on seeing the queen who had come to meet him, he asked: “Dear queen, did you attend to the Paccekabuddhas without any negligence? Are the noble ones well?” When the queen replied that they had passed into Parinibbāna, the king was shocked and reflected: “Even to these wise ones, of such a nature, death occurred! How can there be liberation from death for us!”

The king did not proceed to the city but immediately went to the royal garden. He called his eldest son and handed the kingship over to him and himself adopted the life of a recluse, like a monk in the Dispensation of a Buddha. The queen too, thinking: “If the king becomes a recluse, what is there for me to do? There is nothing!” and she followed suit as a female ascetic in the royal garden. Having developed the absorptions (jhāna), both were reborn in the realm of the Brahmas.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

While they were still in the Brahma realm, the time had come for our Buddha to arise. At that time, Pippali the youth, the future Mahā Kassapa, took conception in the womb of the wife of a wealthy Brahmin, named Kapila, in the Brahmin village of Mahātitha, in the Magadha country whereas, his wife, the future Bhaddā Kāpilānī, took conception in the womb of the wife of another wealthy Brahmin, a Kosiyan descendant, in the city of Sāgala, also in the Magadha kingdom.

When they grew up, the young Pippali, being 20 years of age and Bhaddā Kāpilānī being sixteen, the former’s parents noticed that their son had come of age and insisted that he be married, saying: “Dear son, you have come of an age to raise a family. One’s lineage should last long!” As Pippali had come from the Brahma world, he refused to agree and [1214] said: “Please do not utter such words into my ears. I shall attend to you as long as you live, and when you are gone, I shall take up a homeless life as a recluse.” After two or three days, the parents again spoke to him. The son remained resolute. Another persuasion took place but that too fell on deaf ears. From that time onwards, the mother was insistent.

When the insistence became too unbearable, Pippali thought: “I shall let my mother know how much I want to become a monk!” So he gave 1,000 ounces of gold to the goldsmiths, asking them to create a gold statue of a girl out of it. When the statue had been created and polishing had been done, he dressed the statue with red garments and adorned it with colourful flowers and brilliant ornaments. Then he called his mother and said: “Mother, I shall remain at home until I get a girl as beautiful as this statue! If not, I shall not do so.”

Since the Brahmin mother was wise, she considered: “My son is one who has done good works, who has performed alms giving, who has expressed his noble aspiration. While he was engaging in deeds of merit in his past existence, it was unlikely that he did them alone. Indeed my son must have had an excellent woman, very pretty like the golden statue, with whom he did meritorious deeds.” So considering, she summoned eight Brahmins, had great honour made to them and had the gold statue placed on a chariot and said: “Go, brothers! If you see a girl resembling this gold statue in a family who equals ours in caste, lineage and wealth, give the statue to her as a gift or as a pledge.” With these words she sent the Brahmins away.

The eight Brahmins concurred, saying: “This indeed is a task to be done by the wise like us.” So saying, they left the village and discussed among themselves on the destination of their journey. Then they decided unanimously thus: “In this world, the country of Madda is the home of beautiful women. Let us go to Madda.” So they went to the city of Sāgala which lay in that state. Having left the statue at the bathing ford in that city, they watched from a remote place.

At that time, the female attendant of Bhaddā Kāpilānī, the daughter of a wealthy Brahmin, bathed her and bedecked her with ornaments and left her in the chamber of splendour before she went to the bathing ford. On seeing the statue she thought: “My mistress has come ahead of me!” Then she scolded her and grumbled in various ways. “Hey, you stubborn daughter! Why are you here alone?” As she said: “Go home quick!” she raised her hand to strike her mistress. When she actually did strike the back of the statue, the whole of her palm hurt as though she had struck a stone slab. The female attendant stepped back and spoke harshly to pick a quarrel: “Although I saw this woman with such a thick neck, how foolish I have been to mistake her for my mistress! She is not worthy ever to hold my lady's skirt!"

Then the eight Brahmins surrounded the attendant, asking: "Is your mistress of such beauty?" – "What beauty is this lady? Our lady's beauty is more than 100 times or 1,000 times superior to that of this lady," retorted the attendant, "if she sits in a room of twelve cubits, it is not necessary to light a lamp there; darkness can be expelled by her natural complexion." – "In that case," said the Brahmins, "come, let us go!" So saying they took the attendant, and having brought the gold statue, they went to the house of the wealthy Brahmin of the Kosiya clan and stopped at the doorway to announce their visit.

The Brahmin treated them well as a host and asked them as to where they came from. They replied that they came from the home of the wealthy Brahmin Kapila of Mahātīttha village, in the kingdom of Magadha. When the host asked the reason, they told him of the purpose of their visit. "Friends," said Brahmin Kosiya: "It is a welcome purpose. Brahmin Kapila is equal to me by birth, by descent and by wealth. I shall give our daughter as a bride." Having promised thus, Brahmin Kosiya took the statue. The visiting Brahmins then sent a message to Brahmin Kapila, saying: "The bride has been found. Go ahead with whatever is necessary."

Getting the news, the servants of Pippali transmitted it to him gleefully, saying: "Master, it is learnt a bride has been found for you, who looks like your gold statue!" But Pippali reflected: "I thought it was impossible to find such a one, but now they say: 'The bride has been [1215] found!' As I do not want her, I shall write a letter and send it to her."

So he went to a secluded place and wrote a letter as follows: "I would like my dear sister to marry another man equal by birth, descent and wealth. I will adopt the life of a recluse in a forest. I do not wish you to be in distress later on." Then he sent the letter secretly to Bhaddā Kāpilānī.

When Bhaddā Kāpilānī, learnt the news that her parents were desirous of giving her in marriage to Pippali the youth, the son of the wealthy Brahmin Kapila of Mahātīttha village in Magadha country, she similarly went into seclusion and wrote the following letter: "I would like my brother to get married with another woman of equal caste, family and wealth. I am going forth and will become a female recluse. I do not want you to be unhappy afterwards.” She then sent the letter in secret to Pippali.

When the two parties of messengers met midway, Bhaddā Kāpilānī’s men asked: “From whom is the letter you are carrying, friends, and to whom is it going?” Pippali’s men replied honestly: “The letter is sent by our master Pippali to Bhaddā Kāpilānī.” They also asked in return: “From whom is the letter you are conveying and for whom is it meant?” Bhaddā Kāpilānī’s men gave a straightforward reply: “It is from our mistress to Pippali.”

Then the messengers from both sides agreed to open and read the letters, and they were amazed to know the spiritual sense of the letters and said: “Look what the groom and the bride are doing!” Then they tore up both the letters and threw them away in the forest. They also wrote two new letters expressing reciprocal agreement and gladness and sent them to their respective senders. In this way, the time for marriage between Pippali, the son of a wealthy merchant, and Bhaddā Kāpilānī, the daughter of another wealthy merchant, came about as arranged by their parents and the middlemen, despite their unwillingness to be joined in the household life.

On the day of their marriage both of them brought a garland of flowers each; he placed his and she hers in the middle of their bed. Having had their dinner both simultaneously went to their bed and got on to it, Pippali on his right side and Bhaddā Kāpilānī on her left. They made an agreement thus: “The garland of whose side withers is to be regarded as having lustful thoughts. And the garlands should be left untouched.” Both of them spent the night without being able to sleep throughout all three watches lest one should unconsciously touch the other. The garlands remained unwithered. By day, they behaved like brother and sister even without a smile tinged with pleasure.

Both the wealthy son and the wealthy daughter kept themselves aloof from fondness of sensual pleasure (lokāmisā) and took no care of their household business at the same time. Only when their parents passed away did they manage the business. The wealth belonging to Pippali was great: his gold and silver was worth 870 million. Even the gold dust which he threw away each day after using it for rubbing his body would amount to twelve Magadha cups if collected. He owned sixty mechanized dams. The measurement of his farm was twelve leagues. He had fourteen large villages as the colony of his servants and workers,

One day, the wealthy Pippali went to his farm riding a fully equipped horse and while he was stopping at the edge of the farm, he saw crows and birds picking up earthworms and insects and eating them. He asked his servants what the crows and birds were eating and the servants answered that they were eating earthworms and insects. Again he asked: “Who is responsible for the evil deeds of the crows and birds?” – “As the farm is ploughed for you, [1216] sir, you are responsible for those evil deeds,” replied the servants. The reply stirred up Pippali’s spiritual urgency, causing him to reflect seriously thus: “If I am responsible for the evil deeds done by the crows and birds, what is the use of 870 million worth of gold and silver. Indeed none! Nor is there any use of my riches, such as the vast twelve-league farm, the sixty mechanized dams and the fourteen large villages of my workers. Indeed there is no use of them all! Therefore, I shall hand over these riches to my wife Bhaddā Kāpilānī and go forth to become a monk!”

At that moment, his wife, Bhaddā Kāpilānī, had sesame from three big jars spread out on mats and placed in the sun. While seated and surrounded by her maids, she saw crows and other birds picking and eating sesame worms. When she asked her maids, she came to know what the birds were eating. On further enquiry she was informed that she must be responsible for the evil deeds done by the birds as the job was done for her sake. She too reflected seriously thus: “Oh, it is enough for me, if I just get four cubits of cloth to wear and a cupful of cooked rice to eat. I cannot wear more than four cubits of cloth; nor can I eat more than one cupful of cooked rice. If I am responsible for these wrongdoings done by others, surely I will not be able to remove myself from Saṃsāra, the cycle of suffering, even after 1,000 existences. When my husband comes, I shall give all my wealth to him and leave household life and become a female recluse.”

The Couple’s Going Forth

The wealthy Pippali returned home and had a bath, went up to the upper terrace and sat down on a high seat, which only noble personalities deserve. Then a feast worthy of a Universal Monarch was arranged and served to the merchant. Both the wealthy Pippali and his wife Bhaddā Kāpilānī ate the meal, and when their servants went away, they retired to their quiet resort and stayed quietly at ease. Thereafter, the two discussed the situation between themselves as follows:

Pippali: Madam Bhaddā, when you came to this house, how much wealth did you bring?

Bhaddā: I brought my wealth in 55,000 carts.

Pippali: The wealth brought by you and the wealth extant here in this house, such as 870 million in riches, sixty mechanized dams, etc., I entrust them all to you.

Bhaddā: Oh, but where are you going?

Pippali: I am going to become a recluse, madam.

Bhaddā: Oh, sir, I too have been readily waiting for the time of your coming back. I too shall become a female recluse.

To these two individuals who were endowed with the perfections, the three existences of sense (kāma), form (rūpa) and the formless (arūpa) realms manifested as three leaf-huts blazing with fire. The two great personalities endowed with the perfections, therefore, had the robes and bowls bought from the market and had their hair shaved by the other. Saying: “We dedicate our renunciation of the world to the noble Arahats.” They came down from the main terrace with their bags, in which were put their bowls, hanging from their left shoulders. None of the servants and workers at home, male or female, recognized the two renunciants.

Then the couple left the Brahmin village of Mahātittha and went out by the servants’ village gate. There they were seen and it was recognized from their behaviour that they were the master and mistress. Crying bitterly the servants fell at their feet and asked sorrowfully: “Master and mistress, why do you make us helpless?” The couple replied: “We have become recluses as we were shocked by the likeness between the three existences and a leaf-hut on fire. If we were to set you free from servitude, one after another there will be no end even after 100 years. Wash your heads and be liberated from servitude and live free.” So saying, they left while the servants were wailing. [1217]

Parting Company with Each Other

While he was going ahead, the noble Pippali thought in retrospect thus: “This beautiful Ven. Bhaddā Kāpilānī, who is as precious as the whole Jambudīpa has been following me. There could be a reason for somebody to misunderstand us, thinking: “These two cannot part from each other even though they have become recluses; they are doing something which is not in harmony with their ascetic guise.” And if one misunderstands us, one is in danger of been reborn in a state of woe. Therefore I should desert this fair lady, Bhaddā Kāpilānī.”

As he went on ahead, the noble Pippali found a junction of two roads and stopped there. Having followed from behind, Bhaddā Kāpilānī stopped there too and stood with her hands joined in reverence. Then the noble Pippali addressed her: “Bhaddā, people seeing a beautiful lady like you following me might offend against us by thinking: ‘These two individuals cannot part from each other despite their ascetic life,’ and then they would be reborn in a suffering state. So take whichever road you choose between these two. I shall go by the road you do not prefer.”

Bhaddā too replied thus: “Oh, yes, sir! Womankind is a blemish for a monk. People would also blame us, saying that we are unable to leave each other even after becoming ascetics. You, sir, follow one road. I shall follow the other. Let us be separated.” Then she circumambulated exactly three times, and paid homage respectfully with the five kinds of veneration at the four places, such as the front, the back, the left and the right of Pippali. With her hands joined and raised, she said: “Our love and intimacy as husband and wife that started 100 aeons ceases today.” She added: “You are of nobler birth, so the road on the right befits you. We womenfolk are of lesser birth, so the left one suits me.” Saying thus she proceeded by the left road.

When the two walked on separate paths, the great earth quaked, roaring echoingly as if it were uttering: “Though I can bear up the Cakkavāḷa mountains and Mount Meru, I cannot do so with regard to the virtues of these two marvellous personages!” There appeared thundering sounds in the sky, too. The Cakkavāḷa mountains and Mount Meru grew up higher and higher because of the earthquake.

Meeting with the Buddha

By that time, the Buddha had arrived in Rājagaha after observing the first Rains Retreat (Vassa) and in the year of his Awakening was still sojourning in the Veḷuvana monastery, before his journey to Kapilavatthu. While he was staying in the fragrant chamber of the monastery, he heard the noise of the quake of the great earth and he reflected as to the cause of the earthquake, and came to know: “It is on account of the power of the virtues of Pippali the young man and Bhaddākāpilāni the young woman who have become ascetics after unflinchingly renouncing their incomparable wealth, and dedicating their lives to me. The quake took place at the junction where they parted. On my part, it will be proper only if I do a favour to them.” So he went out of the fragrant chamber, personally carrying his bowl and robe. And even without asking any of the 80 great disciples to accompany him, he travelled alone for a distance of three miles to extend his welcome. He sat cross-legged at the foot of the banyan tree, known as Bahuputtaka, between Rājagaha and Nālanda.

What was peculiar to the Buddha now was that he did not sit there as an unknown monk practising austerities (dhutaṅga). In order to promote the faith of Ven. Mahā Kassapa, who had never seen him before, the Buddha did not conceal his natural splendour that shone forth with the major and minor marks, and he sat there emanating the Buddha-radiance and illuminating everything brilliantly up to a distance of 80 cubits. The radiance that was of the size of a leafy umbrella, or that of a cart-wheel or that of a pinnacled gable, spread from place to place brightening the whole forest grove, as though it were a time when 1,000 moons or 1,000 suns rose with all their brightness. Therefore, the whole forest grove was very pleasant with the splendour of the 32 marks of a great man, like the sky brightened by stars, or like the water surface with the five kinds of lotus blossoming in groups and clusters. Though the natural colour of the [1218] trunk of the banyan tree must be white, that of the leaves green and the old leaves red, by the splendour of the Buddha’s body the whole of the Bahuputtaka banyan trees, with many branches, was all golden and yellow on that very day, as they were bathed with the luminous radiance of the Buddha’s light.

Ven. Mahā Kassapa thought: “This venerable one must be my teacher, the Buddha. Indeed I have become a monk, dedicating my monkhood to this very teacher.” From the spot on which he stood and saw the Buddha, Ven. Mahā Kassapa walked nearer. At all three places he adoringly venerated the Buddha and received his discipleship by declaring three times thus: Satthā me Bhagavā, sāvako haṃ asmi, “exalted Buddha, you are my teacher! I am your disciple!”

Then the Buddha replied: “Dear son Kassapa, if you showed such immense reverence to the great earth, it might not be able to withstand it. As for me, who have fared well like former Buddhas, the tremendous reverence shown by you, who are aware of the immensity of my qualities, cannot make a single hair of my body tremble. Dear son Kassapa, be seated, I shall give you an inheritance.”

This is how the exposition of the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) commentary and the exposition of the commentary on Mahā Kassapa’s Verses of the Elder Monks (Thera-gāthā) records it. In the Discourse about Robes (Cīvara-sutta, SN 16.11), however, it is said as follows: When Ven. Kassapa solemnly declared his discipleship thrice, the Buddha said: “Kassapa, if a man, without knowing a pupil of all-round perfect mentality, says: ‘I know,’ or, without seeing him, says: ‘I see,’ his head will fall off. As for me, I say: ‘I know,’ because I do know him, or I say: ‘I see,’ because I do see him.”

Herein the meaning is: If a teacher, outside the Dispensation of the Buddha, claimed that he knew or saw without actually knowing or seeing an extremely faithful disciple who showed extreme veneration like Ven. Mahā Kassapa did, the head of that teacher would drop off from his neck, as a ripe toddy-palm fruit does from its stem. Or it might split into seven pieces.

Herein, it may further be explained as follows: If Ven. Mahā Kassapa were to direct his great veneration, generated by such faith, to the great ocean, its water might disappear like drops of water falling into a tremendously hot iron pan. If he were to direct his veneration towards the mountain of the universe, it would break up into pieces like a ball of husks. If he were to direct it to Mount Meru, the mountain would be destroyed and tumble down in disarray like a lump of dough pecked by a crow’s beak. If he were to direct it towards the great earth, its soil would be scattered like a great pile of ashes being blown off by the wind.

But Ven. Mahā Kassapa’s veneration of such might could not make a hair on the back of the Buddha’s instep tremble. Let alone Ven. Mahā Kassapa, even thousands of monks equal to Ven. Mahā Kassapa, would be unable to do so by performing their veneration. They were powerless even to disturb a soft hair on the Buddha's instep, or even to shake a single thread of the robe made of rags that the Fortunate One was wearing. So great was the might of the Buddha.

Ordination as a Monastic

[This is based on the Discourse about Robes (Cīvara-sutta, SN 16.11).]

Having said: “Dear son Kassapa, be seated. I shall give you my inheritance,” as has been mentioned before, the Buddha gave Mahā Kassapa three pieces of advice: “Kassapa, you must therefore practise thinking thus: ‘I shall abide by conscience and concern (hiri-ottappa) in dealing with those monks of higher standing, lower standing, or of equal standing.’ Kassapa, you must, therefore, practise thinking thus: ‘I shall listen to all teachings on wholesomeness. I shall listen attentively to all these teachings respectfully, reflecting on them and bearing them well.’ [1219] Kassapa, you must therefore practise, thinking thus: ‘Mindfulness of the body (kāyagatā-sati) accompanied by happiness (sukha) shall never desert me!’ ”

The Buddha gave him these three pieces of advice. Kassapa also received them respectfully. These pieces of advice amounted to Mahā Kassapa's ordination, lower as well as higher. Mahā Kassapa was the only one to receive this kind of ordination in the Buddha's Dispensation, which is known as ordination through acceptance of the Buddha's advice (ovāda-paṭiggahaṇa-upasampadā).”

Herein the Buddha granted Mahā Kassapa ordination as a monastic by means of these three pieces of advice. Of these three, the first is: “Dear son Kassapa, you must develop first the two effective virtues of conscience and concern (hiri-ottappa) as you encounter the three classes of fellow monastics: those of higher standing, those who are senior to you by age and ordination; those of lower standing, those who are junior to you; and those of medium standing, who are equal to you.” By this first advice, Ven. Mahā Kassapa was taught to abandon pride in birth, for he was of the Brahmin caste.

The second advice is: “Dear son Kassapa, while you are listening to the faultless teaching, you must be respectfully attentive by lending both your ears, the wisdom ear as well as the natural one, in all three phases of the teaching, the beginning, the middle and the end.” By this second advice

Ven. Mahā Kassapa was taught to abandon arrogance springing from his wide knowledge, for he was highly intelligent.

The third advice is: “Dear son Kassapa, you must strive not to let the first absorption (jhāna) get away from your mental process, the absorption (jhāna) which is accompanied by feelings of happiness (sukha-vedanā) originates in mindfulness of the body (kāyagatā-sati) and the sense object of breathing-in and out (ānāpāna-ārammaṇa).” By this third advice Ven. Mahā Kassapa was taught to abandon craving and greed (taṇhā-lobha) developing from possession of a strong personality (upadhi), for he was good looking.

Having made Mahā Kassapa a monk upon receiving advice at the foot of the Bahuputtaka banyan tree, the Buddha left and set out on a journey with the noble Ven. Mahā Kassapa as his follower. While the Buddha had 32 marks of a great being on his body and was thus exquisitely splendored, Ven. Mahā Kassapa was graceful with the seven marks. The latter closely followed the Buddha like a small golden boat trails a big golden one. After going some distance, the Buddha came down from the main road and gave a hint that he would like to sit at the foot of a tree. Knowing that the master was desirous of sitting, Ven. Mahā Kassapa folded his very soft upper robe fourfold and spread it saying: “May the exalted Buddha be seated here. The act of the exalted Buddha’s sitting will bring me welfare and happiness for a long time.”

The Exchange of Robes

Having sat on the double robe folded in four, the Buddha felt the edge of the robe with his hand, which had the colour of a lotus blossom, and said: “Dear son Kassapa, this upper robe of yours, made of an old piece of cloth, is very soft indeed!”

If you are thinking: “Why did the Buddha utter these words of praise?” The answer is: Because he wanted to exchange robes with Ven. Mahā Kassapa. “Why did the Buddha want to make exchange of robes?” The answer is: Because he wanted to install Ven. Mahā Kassapa in his position.

“For such installation were there not Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Moggallāna?” one might argue. The answer is: “Yes, they were there.” But it occurred to the Buddha thus: “Both of them will not live long. They will attain Parinibbāna before me. Kassapa, however, will live for 120 years, four months after my Parinibbāna, in the cave where the seven leafed (sattapanni) tree grows, he will hold a Council (Saṅgāyana) at which a mass recital, in approval of the Dhamma and the Vinaya, will [1220] be made. He will thus render service to my Dispensation so that it may last for 5,000 years.” The Buddha also was of the opinion that: “If I install him in my monastery, monks will show obedience to him.” For this reason the Buddha desired to install Ven. Mahā Kassapa in his own position. It was for this reason that the Buddha was desirous of an exchange of robes. It was because of this desire that the Buddha spoke in praise of Ven. Mahā Kassapa.

If somebody spoke admiringly of the good quality of the bowl or that of the robe, it was a natural practice of the noble Ven. Mahā Kassapa to say: “Please accept the bowl, venerable sir,” or “Please receive the robe, venerable sir.” Therefore, knowing by hint that: “The exalted Buddha would like to put on my double robe, for he admired its softness,” Ven. Mahā Kassapa said: “Exalted Buddha, may the Fortunate One please put on this double robe.” – “Dear son Kassapa, which robe will you don then?” asked the Buddha. “If I get the kind of robe you are wearing, I will don it,” replied Ven. Mahā Kassapa. Then the Buddha said: “Dear son Kassapa, can you do that? This robe made of rags has become very old because of long use. Indeed, when I picked it up, that day saw this great earth quake down to the waters. Those of less virtue are unable to wear this kind of robe that is worn out. Only those who engage themselves in the Dhamma practice and who, by nature, are used to such attire, deserve it.” So saying the Buddha gave his robe to Ven. Mahā Kassapa. After the exchange of robes was done in this way, the Buddha put on Ven. Mahā Kassapa’s robe and Ven. Mahā Kassapa donned the Buddha’s robe. At that moment, the great earth quaked violently down to the waters as if it were saying, though it lacks mind and volition: “Exalted Buddha, you have done something difficult to do. There has never been in the past such an occasion in which a Buddha gives his robe to his disciple. I cannot bear up this virtue of yours.”

Foremost Title Achieved

On the part of Ven. Mahā Kassapa, no arrogance arose in him by receiving the Buddha’s robe; he never thought: “Now I have obtained the robe previously used by the Fortunate One: I have nothing to strive for now, either for higher paths and fruitions.” Instead, he made a vow to practise the thirteen austere practices (dhutaṅga) most willingly as taught by the Buddha. Because he put great efforts into developing the ascetic practices, he remained only for seven days as a worldling and on the eighth day, at early dawn, he became an Arahat with the fourfold analytical knowledges (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa).

Setting Ven. Mahā Kassapa as an example, the Buddha delivered many discourses as contained, for example, in the Thematic Discourses concerning Kassapa (Kassapa-saṃyutta, SN 16).

The Buddha admired Ven. Mahā Kassapa through many discourses such as the Like the Moon Discourse (Candūpama-sutta, SN 16.3), in which the Buddha says: Kassapo bhikkhave candūpamo kulāni upasaṅkamati, “monks, Kassapa approached his supporters of the four social classes by controlling his deeds, words and thought like the moon, being absolutely free from physical, verbal and mental roughness, in this way does he approach his supporters.”

Later on the Buddha declared, by citing the noble Ven. Mahā Kassapa as the foremost (etad-aggā) in ascetic (dhutaṅga) practices, as preserved in the Thematic Discourses concerning Kassapa (Kassapa-saṃyutta, SN 16):

dhuta-vādānaṃ yad-idam Mahākassapo.*

Monks, among my disciples, monastics, who practise by themselves and who teach and exhort others to practise the excellent ascetic practices (dhutaṅga) which shake off the defilements (kilesa), Mahā Kassapa is the foremost.

5. Ven. Anuruddha

Aspiration in the Past

100,000 aeons ago, in the lifetime of the Buddha Padumuttara, the future [1221] Anuruddha was an unknown householder. One afternoon, he went along with a crowd of people to the monastery to listen to the Dhamma. Having respectfully paid homage to the Buddha, he stood at the edge of the audience, paying attention to the Buddha’s discourse. After delivering his discourses in serial order, the Buddha declared a monk foremost in achieving the psychic power of the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu-abhiññā).

Then it occurred to the householder: “This monk was declared foremost in achieving the psychic power of the divine eye by the Buddha himself, therefore, he is indeed superior. What if I were to become the best among the monks who achieved the divine eye in the Dispensation of some future Buddha?" So thinking, he went through the audience, and invited the Buddha and his Saṅgha. The next day, he performed a great alms giving to the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha.

Thinking: "I have aspired for a very high post," he invited the Buddha as before, day after day, saying: "Please come today for my act of merit." "Please come tomorrow for my act of merit." Having invited thus, he gave a great alms giving (dāna) for seven days.

Offering excellent robes to the Buddha and his company of monks, he expressed his aspiration as follows: "Exalted Buddha, I made these offerings, not to obtain divine luxuries, nor to enjoy human pleasure. Seven days ago you declared a monk as the foremost in the divine eye. I wish to be like him, as the foremost among those with similar power in the Dispensation of a Future Buddha."

Having expressed his aspiration thus, the householder fell at the feet of the Buddha. When the Buddha surveyed the future, he foresaw that the fulfilment of the householder's wish, and so he predicted: "Supporter, at the end of 100,000 aeons in future, Buddha Gotama will appear. In the Dispensation of that Buddha, you will be Anuruddha by name, the foremost of those who acquire the psychic power of the divine eye." Having predicted this, the Buddha gave a discourse in appreciation of the meal-offering and returned to the monastery.

The householder did good works for as long as he lived and after the Buddha Padumuttara's attainment of Parinibbāna, he built a golden shrine which was seven leagues high. He approached the Saṅgha and asked: "Venerable sirs, what is the preparatory wholesome deed for acquiring the psychic power of the divine eye?" – "Supporter," replied the noble monks, "the gift of light should be given." He then had 1,000 big illuminated trees made first, each bearing 1,000 torches; just beyond these trees, he had 1,000 illuminated trees of medium size made; just beyond them, 1,000 illuminated small trees. In this way, 1,000s of trees and torches were offered. His other gifts of lights were innumerable.

Offering of Lights to Buddha Kassapa's Shrine

Having performed such meritorious deeds throughout his life, the householder, the future Anuruddha, was reborn either in the worlds of Devas or humans.

When 100,000 aeons had elapsed, in the lifetime of the Buddha Kassapa, in this Fortunate Aeon (Bhadda-kappa), he was reborn as a householder in the city of Bārāṇasī. After the Buddha's Parinibbāna, he built a shrine of one league and had numerous gold cups made, each cup was filled with butter oil. In the middle of the cups, he placed a cake of solidified molasses and lighted it. He also lighted the gold cups around the shrine, the round brim of each cup touching that of the next. For himself, he had the biggest vessel made of gold and had it filled also with butter-oil. A thousand wicks placed around the brim were lighted. For the middle wick, however, he had a piece of cloth twisted and lighted it. Holding on his head the bowl of 1,000 lights, he went round the shrine and honoured it for all three watches of the night. In that existence too, he performed wholesome deeds as long as he lived, and upon his death he was reborn in the realm of the Devas.

Life as Annabhāra

Again, before the lifetime of our Buddha, he was reborn in a poor family, also in Bārāṇasī, and lived depending upon a wealthy merchant named Sumana. The poor man's [1222] name was Annabhāra. The merchant Sumana gave lavish alms at the gate of his house to destitute, travellers and beggars.

One day a Paccekabuddha by the name of Upariṭṭha engaged in the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti) at Mount Gandhamādana, and when he emerged from that absorption (jhāna), he pondered: "Whom should I help today?" Paccekabuddhas are very kind by nature to the poor. So, the Paccekabuddha Upariṭṭha decided to help poor Annabhāra for the day. Knowing that the man was about to come back from the forest, the Paccekabuddha, taking his alms bowl and robes disappeared from Mount Gandhamādana and reappeared before Annabhāra at the village gate.

Seeing the Paccekabuddha carrying an empty bowl, he respectfully made obeisance to him and asked: "Venerable sir, would you obtain food?" When the Paccekabuddha replied that he would, Annabhāra said: "Please wait here for a while," and quickly went home and asked his wife: "Lady, is there a portion of food you set aside for me? Or is there not?" When the wife said there was, he returned to the Paccekabuddha and took the bowl from his hand. On returning home, he said to his wife: "Lady, because we did not perform deeds of merit in the past we are now always yearning for food. Though we have the desire to give, we have nothing to give. And when we have something to give, there is no recipient for it. Today I encountered the Paccekabuddha Upariṭṭha, and there is also my portion of food. Put that food of mine into his bowl.”

The intelligent wife thought: “As my husband is giving his food to the Paccekabuddha, I should also do something for my share of merit.” So she too put her portion of food in the bowl and handed it to the Paccekabuddha. He also said, expressing his desire: “Venerable sir, may we be liberated from such troublesome living.” The Paccekabuddha replied predicting his future: “Supporter of great merit! May your desire be realised!” Having spread out his top mantle at one place, Annabhāra said further: “Please sit down here, venerable sir, and have your meal.”

After sitting down on the seat made by Annabhāra, the Paccekabuddha had his meal, reflecting on the nine disgusting things which are:

1. Going on alms round (gamana).
2. Searching for alms (pariyesana).
3. Eating (paribhoga).
4. Excretions, such as phlegm, bile, blood and pus (āsaya).
5. Stomach into which comes newly eaten food (nidhaha).
6. Food in undigested state (aparipakka).
7. Food in digested state (paripakka).
8. Discharge and flowing or trickling from here and there from the body (phala-nissanda).
9. Smearing or soiling (makkhana).

If discharge (phala) and flowing (nissanda) are taken separately, the number will be ten. Reflection on these nine or ten disgusting things is mentioned in the exposition of the Perception of the Disgusting Nature of Food (Āhāre-paṭikūla-saññā) of the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) in general, and in the section on the same in the Break Down of Form into its Ultimate Parts (Paramattha-sarūpa-bhedāni), authored by Mahāvisuddhārāma Sayādaw, in particular.

When the Paccekabuddha had taken the food, Annabhāra offered the water for washing the bowl. Having finished his meal, Paccekabuddha Upariṭṭha gave his blessing in appreciation of the food:

Icchitaṃ patthitaṃ tuyhaṃ, sabbam-eva samijjhatu, sabbe pūrentu saṅkappā, cando pannāraso yathā.

May all your desires and longings be realized. Just as the bright, round moon of the waxing fortnight is full, even so may all your right plans be successful!

Having said this, the Paccekabuddha proceeded on his journey.

Applause of a Goddess

At that moment, the guardian goddess of the ceremonial umbrella belonging to Sumana the merchant gave her applause three times by uttering a solemn utterance of joy: Aho dānaṃ paramadānaṃ, Upariṭṭhe supatiṭṭhitaṃ, “an excellent gift has been given to the Paccekabuddha Upariṭṭha!” The merchant asked: “Goddess! Did you not see me performing alms giving for such a long time?” – “Merchant,” replied the goddess, “I am not applauding your alms giving. I am doing it for Annabhāra the poor man’s, as I am so pleased with it.” It then occurred to the merchant thus: “This is something marvellous indeed! Though I have been giving alms for so long, I am not able to cause deities to [1223] applaud. But the poor Annabhāra, despite his dependence on me, by giving alms food just once when he encountered a proper recipient received applause. I should make his gift of food of mine by giving him something suitable.” Accordingly, he summoned Annabhāra and asked: “Did you give somebody something today?” – “Yes, I did, sir,” answered Annabhāra, “I gave my share of food to the Paccekabuddha Upariṭṭha.” – “Take this, dear Annabhāra, take a coin and hand over your gift of food to me,” demanded the merchant.

When Annabhāra refused, saying: “I cannot do so, sir,” Sumana, the merchant, gradually raised his offer up to 1,000 pieces of money. Annabhāra remained firm in his rejection, saying: “Even for 1,000 pieces of money, I cannot give it away.” Then Sumana gave up his attempt to buy, but demanded yet again: “Brother Annabhāra, if you cannot give it to me, let it be so. Accept the 1,000 coins and share your merit with me!” – “I do not know clearly whether I should share my merit with you. I will consult the Paccekabuddha Upariṭṭha and I will share, provided he advises me to do so.” After saying this, he rushed after the Paccekabuddha and when he reached him, he asked: “Venerable sir, the merchant Sumana, is offering me 1,000 pieces of money and seeking a share of the merit I have earned by giving you alms food. Shall I give his share or shall I not?”

Then the Paccekabuddha said: “Wise man, I shall give you a simile. Suppose there is only one house where the lamp is lighted in a village of 100 households. If the remaining 99 householders came with their respective wicks soaked in oil and lighted their lamps by means of yours, will the light remain in that house as it was before or will it be reduced?”

“It will not be reduced, venerable sir. The light will shine even brighter than before,” answered the man.

Then the Paccekabuddha explained clearly: “In the same manner, wise man, if a man shares the merit accrued to him from his offering of alms food, be it a spoonful or a ladleful, whether he shares it with 100 persons or 1,000, his merit will only increase and become greater in accordance with the number of persons who have their shares. Now you have given one meal. If you share your merit with him, there will be two acts of giving alms food, one is yours which is the original, and the other is Sumana’s which is an augment.”

Freed from doubt but inspired and encouraged, Annabhāra respectfully made obeisance and went back to his master. He gladly shared his merit by saying: “Sir, take your share from the merit earned by me from my giving of alms food.”

Then followed a dialogue between the wealthy merchant Sumana and Annabhāra the poor man:

Merchant: Well, brother, take the 1,000 coins.

Annabhāra: Master, I am not selling my alms food. In fact, with great pleasure I am sharing my merit with you.

Merchant: Brother, you share your merit with me with great pleasure. On my part, I give you the 1,000 coins as I wish to do honour to your virtue. Do take it, brother.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1835

When asked thus, Annabhāra accepted the money, saying: “All right, as you like, sir.” Thereafter Sumana said: “Brother from the time of your acceptance of the coins onwards, you have no work with your hands, you are no longer my employee. Build a house for yourself on the main road. I shall provide you with whatever material you need. Take it from my house.” Thus the merchant added his promise.

Annabhāra, a Man of Great Wealth

The alms food offered to a Paccekabuddha who has just emerged from the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti) is a gift which has results on the day of offering (diṭṭha-dhamma-vedanīya). Therefore, that very day, by virtue of his gift of alms food, the merchant took Annabhāra to the king’s palace though he did not do so on previous days.

On arrival at the palace, because of Annabhāra’s act of merit, the king overlooked the merchant and gazed upon Annabhāra. Then a conversation between the merchant and the [1224] king took place as follows:

Merchant: Great King, why are you gazing at this man?

King: Because I did not see him on the other days, merchant.

Merchant: Great King, this man is worth gazing on.

King: What are his virtues that make him worth gazing on, merchant?

Merchant: Great King, he did not have his portion of food today but sacrificed it to the Paccekabuddha Upariṭṭha, and he has won 1,000 pieces of money from me.

King: What is his name?

Merchant: Annabhāra, Great King.

King: As he has 1,000 pieces of money, he should win another 1,000 from me as well. I too would like to honour him. So saying, the king also awarded Annabhāra 1,000 pieces of money.

Later on, the king ordered his men to build a house for Annabhāra. Obeying the king’s order, the men cleared an old site and, at every spot they dug they found jars of gold, the neck of one jar touching that of another, to their amazement. So they reported the matter to the king. The king ordered them to excavate but as they were digging, the jars sank further. The men told the king about it and he ordered them to continue their digging, saying: “Do it not in my name, but do it under Annabhāra’s instructions.” The men went back to the site and did the digging again while uttering: “We are doing this under the instructions of Annabhāra.” As a result, at every spot dug, the jars of gold rose together like huge mushrooms.

The king’s men collected the treasure of gold and silver and brought them, and piled them up near the king. The king held a meeting with his ministers and asked: “Leaving aside Annabhāra, who else possesses treasures of such proportions in this city of Bārāṇasī?” When the ministers answered that there was none, the king issued an order stating: “Ministers, in that case, let Annabhāra be the royal merchant bearing the title Dhanaseṭṭhi in this Bārāṇasī city of mine.” On that very day Annabhāra became the royal merchant known as Mahā Dhanaseṭṭhi, and was entitled to a white umbrella, a symbol of wealth, from the king.

Since he became the royal merchant Dhanaseṭṭhi by name, he performed good works till the end of his life, and upon his death, he was reborn in the realm of the Devas. This virtuous man, who was the future Anuruddha, was reborn only in the divine and human abodes for a long time.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

When our Buddha was about to appear, he was reborn in the royal residence of Sukkodana, a Sakyan prince. On his naming day, he was given the name of Anuruddha. Prince Anuruddha was the son of the Buddha’s uncle Sukkodana and the brother of Prince Mahānāma. He was very gentle and yet very powerful at the same time.

The Buddha visited the city of Kapilavatthu for the first time and while sojourning on his return in the grove of Anupiya, Prince Anuruddha visited him together with Princes Bhaddiya, Ānanda, Bhagu, Kimila, Devadatta and the barber Upāli, and they became monks.

[These events have been given in detail in chapters 19-20a.]

Attainment of Awakening

The six Sakyan princes went together with Upāli the barber to the grove of Anupiya and they became monks in the presence of the Buddha. Of these seven monks, Ven. Bhaddiya became an Arahāt in that Rains Retreat (Vassa). Ven. Anuruddha gained the psychic power of the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu); Ven. Devadatta developed the eight mundane attainments; Ven. Ānanda was established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala); Ven. Bhagu and Ven. Kimila became Arahats later. The resolutions made in the past by these monks will be described in their respective sections.

As for Ven. Anuruddha, after becoming a monk he acquired in his first Rains Retreat (Vassa) the eight attainments [1225] and developed the psychic power and higher divine eye by which he was able to see 1,000 universes.

One day, he went to Ven. Sāriputta and said: “Friend Sāriputta,

1. I can see 1,000 universes by means of the particularly pure divine eye, which surpasses the eyesight of human beings.
2. I put forth effort unflinchingly. Not being unmindful, I possess mindfulness. There is no anxiety in my person and I am calm. My mind is one-pointed and well-concentrated.
3. Even then, my mind is not unattached to craving (taṇhā) and wrong views (diṭṭhi) and not liberated yet from the pollutants (āsava).

Then Ven. Sāriputta taught Ven. Anuruddha concerning meditation:

1. “Friend Anuruddha, the very fact that you are conscious and thinking: ‘I can see 1,000 universes by means of the particularly pure divine-like eye, which surpasses the clear eyesight of human beings,’ reveals that you have conceit (māna).
2. Friend Anuruddha, the very fact that you are conscious and thinking: ‘I put forth effort unflinchingly. Not being unmindful, I possess mindfulness. There is no anxiety in my person and I am calm. My mind is one-pointed and well concentrated,’ reveals that you have mental restlessness (uddhacca).
3. Friend Anuruddha, the very fact that you are conscious and thinking: ‘Even then, my mind is not unattached to craving and wrong views and not liberated yet from the pollutants (āsava),’ reveals that you have doubt and worry (saṃsaya-kukkucca).

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1838

Therefore I would like to give you words of advice as follows: ‘Discard these three things, conceit, restlessness and doubt that are developing in your mind. Without being conscious of these things, direct your mind to the deathless Nibbāna!’ ”

Having learnt meditation, Ven. Anuruddha, after seeking permission from the Buddha, went to the country of Cetiya. Living in the Eastern Bamboo Grove in that country, he practised asceticism. For fifteen days or half a month, he did not sleep but put effort into his meditation by walking to-and-fro. He then became weary from his meditation so much so that he took rest by sitting under a bamboo thicket. While sitting, the thoughts of a great man (mahā-purisa-vitakka) arose in his mind as follows:

1. The nine supermundane states (dhamma) can be realised only in one who is of few wants, i.e., one who has no desire (icchā) and craving (taṇhā), but not in one who is greedy.
2. The nine supermundane states can be realised only in one who is easily contented, but not in one who is discontented.
3. The nine supermundane states can be realised only in one who is quiet, but not in one who takes delight in company.
4. The nine supermundane states can be realised only in one who is energetic, but not in one who is indolent.
5. The nine supermundane states can be realised only in one who is evidently mindful, but not in one who is far from being mindful.
6. The nine supermundane states can be realised only in one who is of concentrated mind, but not in one who is not of concentrated mind,
7. The nine supermundane states can be realised only in one who is wise, but not in one who is foolish.

With regard to the individual who is of few wants; there are four kinds:

1. One who is of few wants concerning the four requisites (paccaya-appiccha).
2. One who does not let others know of one’s attainment of path and fruition but keeps it secret (adhigama-appiccha).

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1839

3. One who does not let others know of one's learning but keeps it secret (pariyatti-appiccha).
4. One who does not let others know of one's austere practice but keeps it secret (dhutaṅga-appiccha). [1226]

1. The one who is of few wants concerning the four requisites (paccaya-appiccha) accepts only less, though offered much; when offered, he accepts less than what is offered; he never takes all.

2. The one who does not let others know of their attainment of path and fruition but keeps it secret (adhigama-appiccha), like Ven. Majjhantika, does not tell others of his spiritual attainment of path and fruition but remains quiet.

The story of Ven. Majjhantika in brief is as follows: He was an Arahat. But his alms bowl and robes were worth only a quarter of a coin. On the day of King Asoka's dedication of a monastery, he was heading a community of monks. Seeing his bowl and robes too old and worn out, people thought he was an inferior and aged monk; so they asked him to wait for a moment outside. Then only he thought: "If an Arahat like me does not make a contribution to the king's welfare, who else will?" So thinking, he instantly sank into the earth and received the first portion of alms food, which was meant for the head of monks, and was offered to him respectfully. Then he reappeared while others were unaware. In this way, the Ven. Majjhantika did not want others to know he was an Arahat prior to his acceptance of food.

3. The one who does not let others know of one's learning but keeps it secret (pariyatti-appiccha) does not want to reveal to others his knowledge of the scriptures though he himself is highly learned in the Three Baskets. He is like Ven. Tissa, a resident of Sāketa.

The story of Ven. Tissa in brief is as follows: Ven. Tissa was requested by other monks to teach them the texts and their commentaries. But he rejected their request, saying that he had no time to do so. Then the monks asked him, somewhat reproachfully: "Have you got no time even to die?" So he deserted his followers and left his dwelling for the Kaṇikāravālikasamudda monastery. He stayed there for the three month Rains Retreat (Vassa) like an unknown and illiterate monk. He fulfilled his duties there towards all his co-residents, be they senior or junior to him or be they of mid-standing. On the full moon day of October (Assayuja), at the meeting oot the Great Invitation (Mahā-pavāraṇā-uposatha) occasion, he taught, causing gooseflesh to rise on people’s skin. They shouted with cheers and threw up their headdresses into the air. Thus he created wild acclaim among the audience. But lest the people should know he was the one who taught that night, he secretly went back to his original dwelling, for he was of the type keeps his leaning secret (pariyatti-appiccha).

4. The one who does not let others know of one’s austere practice but keeps it secret (dhutaṅga-appiccha) does not like to inform others of his practice of austerity.

He is like the elder of two brothers. A brief account of the two brothers goes as follows: The two brother monks were dwelling on the Cetiya hill. The younger brother went to his brother with a stalk of sugar cane which was offered by a supporter to the elder one. “Please have it, sir,” said the younger brother. As the elder brother had already finished eating and washed his mouth, he replied: “Enough, dear brother.” – “Why,” asked the younger brother, “have you taken a vow to observe the austere practice of eating one meal a day (ekāsanika-dhutaṅga)?” Then only did the elder brother ask his younger brother to bring the sugar-cane. Though he had observed this particular practice for 50 long years, he partook of the sugar-cane as he wished to keep his brother in the dark about his practice. After that, he washed his mouth and renewed his vow again.

These descriptions of the four types of persons of few wants (appiccha) are given in the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) commentary, and the stories are reproduced from the Collection of the Middle Length Discourses (Majjhima-nikāya) commentary. In the latter, further details of the three kinds of wishes (icchā), the four with few wants (appicchatā), the twelve kinds of contentment (santosa), the three kinds of seclusion (paviveka), the five kind of contact (samsagga), etc. are given.

At the time, while Ven. Anuruddha was struggling with the seven thoughts of a great man (mahā-purisa-vitakka), the Buddha was sojourning in a forest sanctuary, Bhesakaḷā by name, near Susumāragiri town in the Bhagga country. The forest was to the west of the bamboo grove where Ven. Anuruddha was. Therefore, this place was known as the Eastern Bamboo Grove.

After working out the seven thoughts, Anuruddha was too tired to take a further step to think about the eighth one. It was true that the disciples, who had thought of the previous seven, such as few wants, easy contentment, calm, energy, mindfulness, mental concentration, and wisdom, were reluctant to go higher and ponder still another state (dhamma). For them, it is a rule that they should end up with wisdom. That was why Ven. Anuruddha, having reflected on the seventh item of wisdom which is a thought of a great man (mahā-purisa-vitakka), was too tired to go on reflecting on the eighth thought.

Then the Buddha, while in the Bhesakaḷā forest, knew that: “Anuruddha is weary of reflecting on the eighth thought of a great man,” and thought: “I shall cause Anuruddha’s wish to be satisfied.” Accordingly, he instantly appeared in Ven. Anuruddha’s presence and sat down on the seat that had been already prepared.

Then the Buddha presented the missing eighth thought, saying: “Anuruddha, well done! Well done! The nine supermundane states can be fulfilled only in him who has few wants, but not in him who has many ... the nine supermundane states can be fulfilled in him who is wise, but not in him who is foolish. Anuruddha! Your reflections belong to the noble ones.

Anuruddha, as it is the case with you, proceed to the eighth reflection. Which is: ‘The nine supermundane states can be fulfilled in him who takes delight in Nibbāna that is free from Saṃsāra, from the expanding (papañca) factors: craving (taṇhā), conceit (māna) and wrong view (diṭṭhi), but not in him who takes delight only in the expanding (papañca) factors.’”

Thus, did the Buddha provide the missing eighth thought of a great man. The Buddha then continued to preach elaborately to Ven. Anuruddha so that, while engaging in these eight reflections, he could easily be absorbed in the first, second, third and fourth mundane absorptions (jhāna), and that while absorbed in the four mundane absorptions (jhāna), he could easily have the fourfold course of practice belonging to the lineage of the noble ones (ariya-vamsa-paṭipadā):

1. Contentment in robes (cīvara-santosa).
2. Contentment in food (piṇḍapāta-santosa), including medicine.
3. Contentment in dwelling (senāsana-santosa).

4. Delight in meditation (bhāvanārāma).

The elaborate preaching of the same may be read in the commentary to the Discourse on the Lineage of the Noble Ones (Ariya-vamsa-sutta, AN 4.28).

After teaching this, the Buddha thought about the right dwelling for Ven. Anuruddha, a place that would suit his meditation and he came to know that the bamboo grove would be the right place. Accordingly he advised Ven. Anuruddha, saying: “Anuruddha, as the bamboo grove is suitable for your dwelling observe the Rains Retreat (Vassa) in this bamboo grove in the country of Cetiya.”

Having advised him thus, the Buddha disappeared and reappeared at Bhesakaḷā forest where he expounded the eight thoughts of a great man (mahā-purisa-vitakka) in detail to the monks there.

After the Buddha’s departure, Ven. Anuruddha put great efforts into his ascetic practice and soon, during the next Rains Retreat (Vassa), became an Arahāt, the exhaustion of the pollutants (āsava), the state endowed with the threefold knowledge of knowledge of previous lives (pubbe-nivāsa-ñāṇa), knowledge of the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu-ñāṇa) and knowledge of the destruction of the pollutants (āsavakkhaya-ñāṇa). He then became elated and thought: “Oh, seeing my mental conditions, the exalted Buddha came and provided me with the eight thoughts of a great man (mahā-purisa-vitakka). My heart’s desire also has now been fulfilled to the highest degree indeed!” Paying attention to the Buddha’s discourse and the supermundane states, Ven. Anuruddha uttered a solemn utterance as in the Discourse on the Great Thoughts (Mahā-vitakka-sutta, AN 8.30):

Mano-mayena kāyena, iddhiyā upasaṅkami.*

The Fortunate One, who is the teacher of Devas and humans, who is peerless in the three worlds, knew my thoughts and, in his mind-made body, approaching by means of his psychic powers, and through his supernormal powers, he came to my presence in a moment.

Yathā me ahu saṅkappo tato uttari desayi, nippapañca-rato Buddho nippapañcam-adesayi.

To me occurred the thoughts of the noble one in the sevenfold manner. The exalted Buddha taught me, out of compassion, the eighth thought which is higher than the seven reflections of mine. The Buddha, who is named the omniscient one, the best of the world, who delights in the unconditioned Nibbāna that is truly free from the three Saṃsāra expanding factors (papañca), taught me, out of compassion, the unconditioned Nibbāna that is truly free from the three Saṃsāra expanding factors (papañca).

Tassāham Dhammam-aññāya vihāsim Sāsane rato, tisso vijjā anuppattā kataṃ Buddhassa Sāsanam.

I, Anuruddha, having comprehended the Dhamma taught by that Buddha, named the omniscient one, the best of the world, lived in bliss in this very existence always being delighted in the attainment of fruition in the Dispensation of the three trainings. The threefold knowledge starting with knowledge of past lives (pubbe-nivāsa-ñāṇa) is known by me, I have laboured and put it into practice, reaching the goal of becoming an Arahāt, the teaching of the threefold training of the omniscient Buddha, the head of the world.

Foremost Title Achieved

Thereafter, when the Buddha was staying at the Jetavana monastery, he convened a meeting, in which he declared a large number of monks as foremost (etad-agga) in their respective attainments, and he admired Ven. Anuruddha, saying:

*Etad-aggaṃ bhikkhave mama sāvakānaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ
dibba-cakkhukānaṃ yad-idaṃ Anuruddho.*

Monks among my disciples who are endowed with the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu), Anuruddha is the foremost.

Saying thus, the Buddha declared Ven. Anuruddha as the foremost (etad-agga) in acquiring the divine eye.

Herein it may be asked: Why did the Buddha appoint Anuruddha only, despite the presence of other Arahats with the three understandings and Arahats with the six deep knowledges who had attained the divine-eye too? The answer is: It was true that other Arahats with the three understandings and the six deep knowledges had attained divine-eye too, but they did not make use of it as much as Ven. Anuruddha did. When Ven. Anuruddha went on alms round, except in partaking of food, at all times, he developed the light-kasiṇa (āloka-kasiṇa) and surveyed beings by the psychic powers of his divine-eye.

In this way, Ven. Anuruddha gained the fivefold mastery of the divine eye and became more experienced than the other Arahats. This was the reason for the Buddha declaring him the foremost (etad-aggā) in this particular field of attainment.

The alternative answer is this: Ven. Anuruddha had done meritorious deeds for a period of [1229] 100,000 aeons with the aim of acquiring this particular declaration of being foremost in attaining the divine-eye. Accordingly, in this existence too, which was his last, in which his perfections and aspirations were fulfilled, he made use of the divine-eye more than any other Arahāt, as he had inclination to do so which was derived from his past resolution, and so the declaration was made by the Buddha.

Picking Up a Rag Robe Offered by a Deva

While the Buddha was sojourning at Veḷuvana, Rājagaha, Ven. Anuruddha was looking for rags, from which a robe was to be made, at dust heaps and other places. A deity, named Jālinī, who happened to be his wife three existences ago, was living in Tāvātimsa. Seeing that Ven. Anuruddha was searching for rags, she brought three pieces of divine cloth, each thirteen cubits long and four cubits broad. But she thought: “If I offer these pieces of divine cloth, in this shape, Ven. Anuruddha may not accept them.” So she left them at a dust heap ahead of Ven. Anuruddha who was seeking rags; she did so in such a way so that only the edges of the pieces could be seen. When Ven. Anuruddha went there in search of rags, he saw the edges of the pieces of divine cloth, he picked them up at that very place and departed thinking that they were the best quality.

On the day Ven. Anuruddha was making robes, the Buddha, in the company of 500 monks, visited Ven. Anuruddha’s dwelling and took his seat. The senior venerables, belonging to the community of 80 disciples, were also seated at the same place where the robe making was undertaken. Ven. Kassapa, Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Ānanda helped him in making the robes, taking their seats at the starting part, at the middle and at the far end respectively. Other monks also came to assist him by making sewing threads while the Buddha himself put the thread through the eye of the needle. Ven. Moggallāna roamed about collecting other necessary things for the stitching.

The deity Jālinī entered the city and announced: “Citizens, the exalted Buddha, in the company of the 80 Arahat disciples, together with the 500 monks, is staying at the monastery to stitch robes for our master Ven. Anuruddha. Go to the monastery and offer rice gruel and other edible things.” Thus the deity urged the womenfolk to assemble with the food. Ven. Moggallāna brought bunches of Jambu plums during the rest period, just before the meal-time. The 500 monks could not finish the fruit. Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, levelled the ground at the stitching site. Therefore, the ground looked like a place spread with liquid lac. The leftover food, such as gruel, solid things and rice, were plenty.

Then the monks blamed Ven. Anuruddha saying: “What is the use of bringing these kinds of food in such large quantities. In fact, you should have noted the amount of food required and should have asked your relatives, male and female servants and supporters, saying: ‘Bring only this much.’ Perhaps Ven.

Anuruddha wanted us to know that he has a large number of relatives, servants and supporters.” Then the Buddha asked them what they were talking about and when they told him what they were talking about, the Buddha asked them: “Monks, do you think all these foods were caused to be brought by Anuruddha?”

When the monks replied in the affirmative the Buddha said: “Monks, never does my dear son Anuruddha beg the four requisites in this amount. As a matter of fact, Arahats never speak with an emphasis on the requisites. This food occurred by the power of a deity!”

Having thus responded, the Buddha uttered the following verse in order to give a discourse (Dhp 93):

*Yassāsavā parikkhīṇā, āhāre ca anissito, suññato animitto ca, vimokkho yassa gocaro, [1230]
ākāse va sakuntānaṃ padaṃ tassa durannayaṃ.*

O monks, my dear sons! An Arahat, in whom the four pollutants (āsava): sense desires (kāma), continuation (bhava), wrong views (diṭṭhi) and ignorance (avijjā), are destroyed, without leaving even the slightest traces, is not attached to food with craving (taṇhā) and wrong views (diṭṭhi).

In his attainment of fruition, he always resorts to Nibbāna, known as the freedom of emptiness (suññata-vimokkha), as there is no passion (rāga), hatred (dosa) or delusion (moha) in it. Nibbāna, also known as the causeless freedom (animitta-vimokkha) is absolutely liberated from such causes as passion, hatred and delusion. Nibbāna is also known as freedom of desirelessness (appañihita-vimokkha) as it is absolutely liberated from such desires as passion, hatred and delusion. Just as what is in the air, is trodden by the feet, touched by the breath, the head and the wings of the bird that flies in the air, is impossible to know, even so his attainment of the element of Nibbāna after death, is impossible to know for ordinary individuals.

By the end of the discourse a large multitude attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) and other attainments.

6. Ven. Bhaddiya

This chapter on the Jewel of the Saṅgha contains two Ven. Bhaddiyas: one being this Bhaddiya, and the other being Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya, about whom we will tell his story next. The former Bhaddiya was one of the six Sakyan princes who became monastics as has been told in the story of Ven. Anuruddha.

Aspiration in the Past

This Bhaddiya was a son of a wealthy family in the lifetime of the Buddha Padumuttara, 100,000 aeons ago. He went to the monastery in the same way as was told in the story of Anuruddha, to listen to the Dhamma.

That day he saw the Buddha declare a monk as the foremost (etad-agga) among those belonging to high family (uccā-kulika). He became instantly inspired, thinking: “I should also become one like him in the Dispensation of a Future Buddha.” Accordingly, he invited the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha to a great alms giving (mahā-dāna) performed for seven days. Thereafter, prostrating at the feet of the Buddha, he said: “Exalted Buddha, I do not long for a luxurious life as a result of my great gift (mahā-dāna) but I do wish to become a monk who is foremost among those of high family.”

Surveying the future, the Buddha foresaw that his wish would be fulfilled and said: “This wish of yours will be fulfilled. A 100,000 aeons from now, the Buddha Gotama will arise. Then will you become one declared foremost among the monks who come from a superior family.” Having predicted this, the Buddha gave a discourse of appreciation concerning the meal and left for the monastery.

After receiving the prediction, he acquired good works conducive to that end and had seats for teachers made and donated, he had coverings for the seats made and donated. He donated fans for teachers’ use while teaching, he gave offerings in honour of teachers, and lights outside the Hall of Discipline (Sīmā). In this way, he performed deeds of merit till the end of his life. On passing away, he was reborn either in divine or human abodes. Some time between the Buddhas Kassapa and Gotama, he was reborn as a householder’s son in the city of Bārāṇasī.

At that time, a large number of Paccekabuddhas came from Mount Gandhamādana to Bārāṇasī and, having taken their seats on the bank of the river Ganges, where water was plenty, [1231] they partook of their food. Knowing that the Paccekabuddhas always went to that site and had their meals, the householder, the future Bhaddiya, placed eight great stone slabs there as his donation and gave the Paccekabuddhas food as long as he lived.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

During the interval between the two Buddhas, Kassapa and Gotama, lasting innumerable aeons (Buddhantara-asankhyeyya), he was reborn only in the realms of Devas and human, and in the lifetime of this Buddha, his rebirth was that of a Sakyan Prince in the city of Kapilavatthu. He was named Bhaddiya by his parents.

When he came of age, he became a leading Prince amongst the six Sakyan princes, who all ordained along with the barber Upāli. While the Buddha was sojourning in the Mango Grove near the town of Anupiya, he received ordination as a monastic and became an Arahat in the Rains Retreat (Vassa) of the same year.

After attaining, as he lived in the bliss of fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti) and uttered with joy: “Blissful I am! Blissful I am!” Worldling monastics did not know of his attainment and misunderstood him, thinking he uttered it from recalling his previous princely luxuries. They reported it to the Buddha. The account of this may be read in the Exalted Utterances (Udāna, 2.10).

Foremost Title Achieved

At a later time, while the Buddha was staying at the Jetavana monastery, he addressed the monastics regarding Ven. Bhaddiya:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ
uccā-kulikānaṃ yad-idaṃ Bhaddiyo Kāḷi-godhāya-putto.*

Monks, among my monastic disciples belonging to a high family, Bhaddiya, son of Kāḷigodhā, is the foremost.

Speaking thus in praise of him, the Buddha declared that Ven. Bhaddiya was the foremost (etad-aggā) among those of high birth.

Herein, the original name of Ven. Bhaddiya's mother was Godhā. As she was slightly dark, she was called Kāḷigodhā, the Sakyan Princess. Hence Ven. Bhaddiya's name Kāḷigodhaputta Bhaddiya, "Bhaddiya, the son of Kāḷigodhā."

Kāḷigodhā was the oldest of all Sakyan princesses. At the time the Bodhisatta became a Buddha, his father, King Suddhodana, was over 90.<sup>269</sup> He was not strong enough then to perform his duties as a leading monarch unlike when he was younger. Therefore, he must have been the nominal head of the Sakyan princes.

So Bhaddiya was elected king, the choice was made from the senior to the junior families, and it therefore fell upon him. But the Prince gave up his kingship of the Sakyans and became a monk; hence, his appointment as the foremost amongst the monks belonging to a high family.

Alternatively, Ven. Bhaddiya had been king for 500 successive existences as a result of his resolution made in the past; hence, his title as foremost amongst those belonging to a high family.

7. Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya

Aspiration in the Past

This Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya was a son of a wealthy householder in the city of Hamsavati, in the lifetime of Buddha Padumuttara, and in the way mentioned in the story of Ven. Anuruddha he went to the monastery to listen to a discourse.

At that time, the Buddha declared a monk as the foremost (etad-aggā) in having a very sweet voice. Seeing this, he became inspired to become like that monk in the lifetime of a Future Buddha. So he invited the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha and gave them a great alms giving (mahā-dāna) [1232] for seven days.

Thereafter, he made supplication: “Exalted Buddha, I do not wish for any other result on account of this alms giving but to be declared a monk who is foremost (etad-aggā) among those who has a sweet voice, in the Dispensation of a Future Buddha.” So saying, he prostrated at the Buddha’s feet.

Surveying the householder’s future, the Buddha saw that his wish would be fulfilled. He therefore said: “Your wish will come true. A 100,000 aeons from now, Buddha Gotama will appear. Then you will become a monk in his Dispensation and be declared foremost among those possessing a sweet voice.” Having predicted thus, the Buddha returned to the monastery.

Life as Cittapatta Cuckoo

Having received the prediction, the son of the wealthy man performed good deeds till his death and was reborn only in the realms of Devas and humans. When the Buddha Vipassī appeared, he was a cuckoo named Cittapatta and lived in the Khemā Deer Park. One day, he flew to the Himavanta and came back carrying a sweet mango in his beak. While seeing the Buddha surrounded by monks, it occurred to him: “On other days, I saw the Buddha but I had nothing to offer. However, I have brought this ripe mango today for my children to eat. I shall bring them some other fruit, but this mango I shall offer the Buddha.” Then he flew down and was hovering overhead, but not resting on the ground yet. Perceiving the cuckoo’s thought, Buddha Vipassī looked at his attendant, Ven. Asoka, who took out the alms bowl from its bag and placed it in the hand of the Buddha. Then the cuckoo put the mango, which he had brought in his beak, into the Buddha’s bowl as his offering. At that very place, the Buddha ate it while sitting. Filled with faith (saddhā), the cuckoo repeatedly reflected on the attributes of the Buddha as much as he had understood them and having paid respects to the Buddha, he returned to his nest where he remained for a week without even searching for food, instead spending the time feeling joyous and happy. In his life as Cittapatta Cuckoo, this much of his good deeds was done. As a result of this, Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya voice was very sweet and pleasant.

Life as a Master Carpenter

During the time of the Buddha Kassapa, the future Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya became a master carpenter. After the Buddha's Parinibbāna, his devotees discussed building the only shrine for the single body relic. The main disagreement was about the size of the shrine. Some said: "It should be seven leagues." Some said: "Seven leagues is too big, and the construction will not be finished. Let us make it six leagues." Some said: "Six leagues is still too big, and the construction will not be finished. Let us make it five leagues." In this way, the size was reduced to four leagues, three leagues, two leagues. Then the master carpenter, the future great elder Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya, as he was chief at the meeting decided: "Friends, come. No matter who said what, let us built a shrine (cetiya) which is easy to repair in the future." So saying, he took the measuring rope and went to the construction site. While measuring, he made the length of one mile and said: "Let each side of the shrine be one mile so that the four sides will make a league. As it will be a league at the base, so will be its height." The carpenter thus brought the discussion to an end.

In agreement with him, the people built the relic shrine (dhātu-cetiya), which was one mile on each side and one league in total and was one league in height. In this way, the master carpenter decided the size and the construction of the shrine dedicated to the Buddha who possessed incomparable attributes.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

As a result of his decision on the small size of the shrine of the Buddha, the possessor of unique attributes, he was small-bodied, shorter than others, in all his subsequent existences, and in his last existence in the lifetime of our Buddha, he was born in a wealthy family in the city of Sāvattihī. His parents named him Bhaddiya.

When the wealthy son Bhaddiya came of age, and while the Buddha was residing at Jetavana, he went to the monastery and listened to the Dhamma. So great was his faith that he [1233] was ordained and learned a meditation subject from the Buddha. Putting effort into insight (vipassanā) practice, he became an Arahāt.

Teachings around Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya

Herein, the worthy and inspiring discourses in connection with the great elder will be reproduced in brief.

This is a summary of the First Discourse about Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya (Paṭhama-Lakuṇḍaka-Bhaddiya-sutta, Ud 7.1).

After becoming a monk, he took a meditation subject from the Buddha and engaged in insight practice and attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) first. At that time, learners (sekha), such as Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna), Once-returners (Sakadāgāmi) and Non-returners (anāgāmi), approached Ven. Sāriputta to ask him for meditation subjects, or sermons, or answers to their problems for the sake of higher attainments. In complying with their requests, Ven. Sāriputta explained to them how to meditate; he gave them sermons and answered their questions. As the monks continued to strive, some became Once-returners (Sakadāgāmi), some Non-returners (Anāgāmi), some became Arahats and acquired the threefold knowledge, the sixfold psychic power or the four analytical knowledges.

Seeing these monks and poising himself to seize an opportunity for his own uplift, Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya reflected on his stoutness of heart and his being almost devoid of defilements; and reflecting thus, he approached Ven. Sāriputta and exchanged greetings with him and made a request for a discourse. Ven. Sāriputta on his part gave a discourse that was in harmony with the young Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya's inclination.

In accordance with Ven. Sāriputta's discourse, Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya developed his insight (vipassanā) wisdom along the lines set out in the teaching. On account of the two factors: The might of Ven. Sāriputta's teaching and Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya's possession of deeds of merit done in the past, the latter's insight knowledge improved, culminating in Awakening. Fully aware of this, the Buddha, at that time uttered a solemn utterance as follows (Ud 7.1):

ayaṃham-asmī ti anānupassī,*

*evaṃ vimutto udatāri oghaṃ,
atiṅṅa-pubbaṃ apunabbhavāya.*

An Arahāt, who has destroyed the pollutants (āsava) is freed from above (uddham) from the material elements (rūpa-dhātu) and the immaterial elements (arūpa-dhātu), as well as from below (adho) from the elements of sensual pleasure (kāma-dhātu) and also with regard to all kinds (sabbadhi) of formations, is freed in the manner of the three kinds of deliverance: deliverance by elimination (vikkhambhana-vimutti), deliverance by cutting off (samuccheda-vimutti) and deliverance by calming (paṭipassaddhi-vimutti). That Arahāt, who has destroyed his pollutants (āsava), no longer wrongly sees through conceit and false view, with regard to the five aggregates of form, feeling, perception, volitions and consciousness, taking it as: “This really I am!” The Arahāt, who has thus been delivered in all ways from the ten fetters and all unwholesome things, has crossed the fourfold whirlpool or the whirlpool of Samsāra which he had never dreamed to do before the attainment of the noble path. He had crossed over to the other shore through total extinction (anupādisesa-nibbāna) and stands blissfully there, taking no new birth.

As has been described in the first discourse (sutta), while meditating based on the first advice received from Ven. Sāriputta, Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya became an Arahāt. But Ven. Sāriputta was unaware of this through lack of reflection, and still thought [1234] that Bhaddiya was a learner.

On a later day Ven. Sāriputta taught him again in detail, how to reach Awakening, by doubling the length of the discourse and touching upon many points, just as a very generous supporter, when asked for a little, would lavishly give more than what was required. On his part, Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya did not react by thinking: “Now that I have done my duty as a monk, what is the use of this teaching of his,” instead he listened to the teaching as before, with all reverence to the Dhamma (Dhamma-gāra).

Seeing the situation, the Buddha, staying at the Jetavana monastery of Sāvattihī, uttered a solemn utterance by means of his supernormal power so that Ven.

Sāriputta might come to know of the destruction of the moral pollutants by Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya (Ud 7.2):

Acchecchi vaṭṭaṃ vyagā nirāsaṃ, visukkhā saritā na sandati, chinnam vaṭṭaṃ na vattati, esevanto dukkhassa.

In an Arahāt, who has destroyed the pollutants (āsava), the round of moral defilements (kilesa-vaṭṭa) is cut off.<sup>270</sup> An Arahāt, who has destroyed the pollutants (āsava), and reached the wonderful bliss of Nibbāna, is free from craving. In an Arahāt who has destroyed the pollutants (āsava), the morally defiling river of craving that has flowed steadily has been dried up by the fourth sun of the Arahāt path in the way the five great rivers were, because of the rising of the fourth sun when the world was on the verge of devolution.<sup>271</sup> By no means does the river-like craving flow any longer. The round of action that has been cut, the way the tree is uprooted, and never repeats its being.<sup>272</sup> The absence of the round of results due to the cutting off of the round of passion and actions, is the end of suffering.

Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya's Virtues

This is a summary of the Further Discourse about Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya (Apara -Lakuṇḍaka-Bhaddiya-sutta, Ud 7.5).

Once, while the Buddha was staying at Jetavana in Sāvattihī a large number of monastics visited him. At that time, Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya, after going on alms round with many other monks in a village, having finished his meal, washed his alms bowl, dried it, put it in its bag, and carried it on his shoulder by means of a sling. He folded his outer garment and put it on his left shoulder. He

had all forms of pleasant deportment, such as stepping forward, stepping backward, looking straightforward, looking sideward, bending, stretching, and casting down his eyes. He set out on foot to the Buddha with his mind well concentrated by both mindfulness (sati) and clear comprehension (sampajañña) treading evenly on the fore footstep with the hind footstep.

When he went thus, he did not mix with others but followed behind them because he led a solitary life (eka-cārī). Another explanation: His ugly dwarfish body structure brought jeers and contempt from such worldly monks as the Group-of-Six (Chabbaggiya). Remembering this, the considerate Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya thought: “May these few worldly monks not develop unwholesomeness, on account of me!” and hence he followed behind them. In this manner, these monastics and Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya arrived in Sāvathī and entered the Jetavana monastery and approached where the Buddha was.

Seeing from a distance the pleasant deportment of Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya who was following behind the monks, it occurred to the Buddha thus: “These monks do not know the greatness of my son. Therefore, some of these worldly monks have overwhelmed my son with contempt and jeers. Such actions will bring them no benefit but cause suffering for a long time. Now, the time has come for me to reveal the virtues of my son to them and thereby [1235] set him free from their acts of contempt.”

So the Buddha asked the monks: “Do you see, monks, that monastic who came behind you and who was bullied by some worldly monks with their mocking remarks because of his ugly dwarfish frame?” – “Yes, we do, exalted Buddha,” answered the monks. Then the Buddha said: “Monks, this monastic is of great supernormal power. There is almost no absorption (jhāna) in which he has not engaged.

That is to say, the monk had experience in all the absorptions (jhāna), such as the attainment of form absorption (rūpa-samāpatti), the attainment of formless absorption (arūpa-samāpatti), the attainment of the four sublime states (brahma-vihāra-samāpatti), the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti) and fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti). By this statement, Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya’s possession of supernormal powers is indicated.

Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya has personally become an Arahat, even in this present life, by realizing it through extraordinary intelligence, the Arahat fruition that is the goal of the peerless and noble practice sought after by those clansmen who rightly chose to leave household life for monkhood.

That is to say he is a monk who has continuously been absorbed in Arahat fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti). By this statement, Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya's possession of might was manifested. Arahat fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti) was enjoyed by the noble Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya; hence it was his splendour (ānubhāva).”

After saying thus, the Buddha also spoke a solemn utterance in verse as follows (Ud 7.5):

Nelaṅgo seta-pacchādo, ekāro vattatī ratho, anīghaṃ passa āyantāṃ, chinna-sotaṃ abandhanāṃ.

Behold carefully this chariot-like body frame of my son Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya. It consists of the wheel, the principal component part of the chariot equal to the flawless morality of an Arahat; the coverings of the chariot are equal to the white and clean emancipation of an Arahat, the spokes of the wheel of the chariot equal to the incomparable mindfulness of an Arahat; the chariot-like body frame of my bosom son Bhaddiya moves about in full swing, even without lubrication. Following from behind a large number of monks, he has no suffering of defilement; all the oil of craving has been eliminated. He had none of the ten fetters.

Here, the Buddha was so overjoyed because of the virtues of Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya that he urged others to have a look at Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya's body.

Others accounts and teachings concerning Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya may be noted from commentary to the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, Dh 260-261), the commentary to the Verses of the Elder Monks (Lakuṇḍaka-bhaddiyathera-gāthā, Thag 466), etc.

Foremost Title Achieved

At a later time, while the Buddha was staying at Jetavana and holding a meeting, he declared, in respect of Ven. Lakuṇḍaka Bhaddiya:

*Etad-aggāṃ bhikkhave mama sāvakānaṃ, bhikkhūnaṃ
mañjussarānaṃ yad-idaṃ Lakuṇḍaka-bhaddiyo.*

8. Ven. Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja

Aspiration in the Past

The future Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja was reborn in a family of lions during the lifetime of Buddha Padumuttara and lived, moving about for food at the foot of a mountain. One morning, when the Buddha surveyed the world, he saw the lion having the potential to attain the paths, the fruitions and Nibbāna. Accordingly, the Buddha made his alms round in [1236] the city of Hāmsavatī and in the afternoon, while the lion was in search of food, he entered the lion's den and sat absorbed in the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti), with his legs crossed, in midair.

When the lion came back from his search for food and stood at the entrance of the den, he saw the Buddha miraculously sitting in midair and it occurred to him thus: “This man, who has come to my place, is able to sit in midair. This noble personage must be great and worthy of honour indeed! As he is worth honouring, he is able to sit cross-legged in midair in the cave. His body light also spreads and flashes everywhere. I have never seen such a miracle. This noble individual must be the best of all who ought to be honoured. I too should do honour to him to the best of my ability.” So thinking, the lion brought all kinds of terrestrial and watery flowers from the forest and spread them on the ground up to the height where the Buddha was sitting. Then he stood right in front of the Buddha, worshipping him. The next day, he discarded the withered flowers and replaced them with fresh ones to make a similar seat and with it, honoured the Buddha.

In this way, the lion made floral seats for seven days and he took great delight in it. At the same time, he acted as a guard at the entrance of the cave honouring the Buddha thereby. On the seventh day, the Buddha emerged from his attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti) and stood at the cave's entrance. Then the lion circumambulated him three times keeping him to his right and paid homage to him from the four cardinal points and stood still after stepping back. The Buddha, having realized that such a performance of meritorious deeds was efficacious enough for his attainment of the paths and fruitions, rose into the sky and returned to the monastery.

Life as Son of a Wealthy Merchant

As for the lion, because he was separated from the Buddha, he felt very unhappy and after his death took rebirth in the family of a wealthy (mahā-sāla) merchant in Hāmsāvātī city. On coming of age, he went along one day with other citizens and while listening to the Buddha's teaching, he saw him declaring a monk, the best among those who spoke boldly on the paths and fruitions. As in the case of the previous venerables, the merchant's son performed a great alm giving (mahā-dāna) to the Buddha for seven days and aspired after a similar position in future.

Seeing that the man's wish would be fulfilled, the Buddha predicted to that effect. After receiving the prophecy, the merchant's son did good works till his death. When he passed away from that life, he was never reborn in the suffering states for 100,000 aeons but, instead, alternatively in the realms of Devas and human beings.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

Having been reborn thus from the human realm to the Deva realm and vice versa, Piṇḍola was born into the family of a wealthy Brahmin, in the city of Rājagaha, during the lifetime of the present Buddha and was named Bhāradvāja.

When Bhāradvāja came of age, he studied the three Vedas and when he had accomplished his studies, he became a teacher, going from place to place and teaching 500 Brahmin youths. As he himself was a teacher, at every feeding-place he personally received the food rather aggressively. As he was somewhat greedy with regard to food, he emphatically looked for food together with his students, asking: "Where is gruel available? Where is rice obtained?" On account of his wandering and longing for food wherever he was, he came to be known as Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja, "Bhāradvāja, the seeker of food."

At a later time, Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja suffered economic misfortune and became poor. One day, the Buddha went to Rājagaha and gave a discourse. After listening to the discourse, the Brahmin developed faith and took ordination as a monastic. [1237]

Those who had joined the Buddhist Saṅgha were generally known by their clan name. Therefore, the monastic should have been known as Bhāradvāja. But he was not, instead he was called Ven. Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja. The reason for this was that he carried a pot-like bowl and ate a bowlful of gruel, or a bowlful of cakes and a bowl of rice. Then other monks told the Buddha of the monk's gluttony.

The Buddha forbade his use of the bag for the bowl. So the poor monk had to keep it upside down under the couch. When he kept it, he pushed it under the couch causing a friction between the brim of the bowl and the rough ground. When he took it out the same thing happened. As time went by, because of the repeated frictions, the bowl which originally was big like an enormous pot became a bowl with the capacity of cooked rice from a small measure (ambañā) of uncooked rice. Then the monks reported the matter to the Buddha, who from that time onwards permitted Ven. Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja to use the bag. Thus Ven. Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja was like one who adopted monkhood for food, hence he was called Piṇḍola. Because he belonged to the Bhāradvāja clan, he was named Bhāradvāja. Therefore, after becoming a monastic he was called Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja, a two-word name.

At a later time, when he strove to engage in development of the sense-faculties (indriya-bhāvanā), he became an Arahāt (Arahatta-phala). After becoming an Arahāt, he went from one dwelling place to another, from one monastic compound to another, carrying a curved iron rod used as a key and fearlessly roaring a lion's roar: "Those who have doubt as regards the path and the fruition, let them ask me!"

A detailed account of this should be taken from the translation of the Discourse concerning Piṇḍola-bhāradvāja (Piṇḍola-bhāradvāja-sutta, SN 48.49).

One day, he brought down,<sup>273</sup> by means of his supernatural power, the sandalwood bowl that was hanging in the air from the top of a bamboo pole which was supported by a series of other poles to the height of 60 cubits by a wealthy merchant of Rājagaha. Surrounded by applauding people, Ven. Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja went to the Veḷuvana monastery and placed the bowl in the hand of the Buddha. Although knowing about it the Buddha asked: "Dear son Bhāradvāja, from where did you get this bowl?" When Ven. Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja explained, the master said: "You, dear son, have shown a superhuman state (uttari-manussa-dhamma), the absorptions (jhāna), paths (magga) and fruitions (phala), that surpass the ten wholesome courses of action belonging to men (kusala-kamma-patha) just for an unworthy gain. You, dear son, have done something that should not be done!” Beginning with these words, the Buddha rebuked Ven. Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja in many ways and set up a rule that forbade the performance of miracles.

Afterwards, three kinds of talk occurred amongst the monastics with regard to his virtues:

1. Ven. Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja, who was also known as the great elder Sihanādi, as he was in the habit of making bold speeches, on the day he became an Arahat, fearlessly announced: “Those who have doubts about the paths and the fruitions, let them ask me!”
2. He reported his attainment of Awakening to the Buddha whereas other venerables kept silent.
3. He flew up and brought down the sandalwood bowl of the Rājagaha merchant.

The monastics told the Buddha of these three virtues put together. As it was the nature of Buddhas to reproach what should be reproached and to admire what should be admired, the Buddha only selected what was worth admiring, and said in praise: “Monks, by developing his three faculties and by repeatedly reflecting on them, the monk Bhāradvāja declared his Awakening, saying: ‘I know that there is no more rebirth for me, I have practised the noble practice, that what was to be done has been done and I have nothing else to do concerning the path!’

What are the three faculties? The faculty of mindfulness (satindriya), the faculty of concentration (samādhindriya), the faculty of wisdom (paññindriya), by developing and by repeatedly reflecting on them, he declares he is an Arahat, saying: ‘I know that there is no more rebirth for me, concerning the [1238] path! I have practiced the noble practice, that what was to be done has been done, and I have nothing further to do concerning the path!’

Monks, in what do these three faculties end? They end in bringing about destruction; but destruction of what? The destruction of rebirth, old age and death. Monks, as he knew full well that he had no more rebirth, old age and death, the monk Bharadvāja speaks of his being an Arahat: ‘I know that there is no more rebirth for me, that I have practised the noble practice, that what was to be done has been done, and that I have nothing else to do concerning the path! ” The Buddha spoke thus in praise of Ven. Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja. It was this very great elder who gave a discourse to King Udena of Kosambī and established him as a lay devotee in the Three Treasures (see the Discourse concerning Piṇḍola-bhāradvāja (Piṇḍola-bhāradvāja-sutta, SN 48.49).

Foremost Title Achieved

While holding a ceremony at a later time, the Buddha declared admiringly of Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja as follows:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakanam bhikkhunam
sīha-nādikānam yad-idam Piṇḍola-bhāradvājo.*

Monks, of my disciple monastics, who fearlessly speak like a lion’s roar, Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja is the foremost (etad-aggā)!

Thus the Buddha appointed Ven. Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja as the foremost (etad-aggā) amongst those “making a lion’s roar” (sīha-nādikā).

9. Ven. Mantāniputta Puṇṇa

The venerable’s original name was Puṇṇa. Since he was the son of Ven. Koṇḍañña’s sister, Mantānī, the Brahmin lady, he was known as Ven. Mantāniputta Puṇṇa.

Aspiration in the Past

The man of good family, who would become Mantāniputta, was born into the wealthy Brahmin family, in the city of Hamsavatī, before Buddha Padumuttara appeared 100,000 aeons ago. On his naming day, his parents and relatives gave him the name Gotama.

On coming of age, the Brahmin youth Gotama, son of a wealthy Brahmin, studied the three Vedas and also became skilful in all crafts. While going from place to place in the company of 500 youths who were his pupils, he reflected on the Vedas and on seeing in them no means for liberation from Saṃsāra, it occurred to him: “Like the trunk of a banana plant, these Vedas are smooth outside but there is no substance inside. My wandering with attachment to them resembles an act of grinding the chaff in the hope of getting rice. What is the use of these three Vedas? There is no use at all for me.” Again he pondered: “I shall adopt an ascetic life and develop the absorptions (jhāna) based on the sublime states (Brahma-vihāra). Being one who never falls off from such absorptions, I shall take rebirth in the Brahma realm. Pondering thus he went together with his 500 pupils to the foot of a hill and lived there as an ascetic.

The followers of the ascetic Gotama were matted-hair recluses numbering 18,000. The master Gotama himself was accomplished in the five mundane psychic powers and the eight mundane absorptions and taught his 18,000 disciples how to develop concentration of mind by means of certain meditation devices. Following the teaching of their master, the 18,000 disciples also became accomplished in the five mundane psychic powers and the eight mundane absorptions.

In this way, as time went by, when the master Gotama became old, the Buddha Padumuttara was living amidst them with 100,000 monastics and having his native Hamsavatī city as his resort for food. One day at daybreak, when the Buddha surveyed the world of sentient beings, he saw the potentials of the recluse disciples of [1239] Gotama.

He also foresaw that: “With my visit to the ascetic Gotama, he will aspire to be foremost (etad-agga) among those who could proclaim the Dhamma well in the Dispensation of a Buddha to come.” Accordingly, he cleansed himself, took his bowl and robe and went in the guise of an insignificant man and stood at the entrance of Gotama’s hermitage, while the recluse’s disciples were away in search of herbs and fruit.

Although he had not known beforehand that the Buddha Padumuttara had appeared, the ascetic teacher Gotama, on seeing the Buddha, guessed it was the great man from a distance: “Considering the physical perfection of this noble visitor, such a personality could become a Universal Monarch if he were to live a household life, but if he were to live an ascetic life, he could become a genuine omniscient Buddha, who burst opens the roof of the defilements (kilesa). Therefore, this man appears to me as one liberated from the three worlds.” As soon as he saw the Buddha, he bowed his head most respectfully and said: “Exalted Buddha, please come this way!” So saying, he prepared and offered a seat to the Buddha, who then took the seat and taught Gotama.

At that time, his pupils, the matted-hair ascetics, returned. They had the thought: “We shall offer choice fruit and roots to our master and, as for us, we shall eat what remains,” but, they were surprised by the sight of the Buddha sitting in a high place and their master in a lower place.

“Look, we have been roaming about under the impression that there was nobody else who was nobler than our master in the world. Now we have clearly seen a great man who let our master take a lower seat and who himself took a higher one. This noble person must be most honourable!” So thinking, they went on, bringing their fruit baskets. The master Gotama, fearing that the pupils might respect him in the presence of the Buddha, asked them from a distance: “Pupils, do not pay homage to me! The Supreme One in the world of sentient beings, together with the Devas and Brahmās, who deserves the homage of all, is seated here. Pay homage to him!” Trusting their teacher that he would not have spoken without knowing, they bowed at the feet of the Buddha.

“Pupils, I have no other food to give to the Buddha. Let us offer him these fruits and roots.” So saying, he put the choice ones into the Buddha’s bowl. Only when the Buddha had partaken of the fruits and roots did the recluse and his pupils eat their shares.

After partaking of the fruits as his meal, the Buddha wished: “May the two chief disciples come to me with 100,000 monastics.” At that moment the chief disciple, Ven. Mahā Devala, considered: “Where has the Fortunate One gone?” and knowing that “the Buddha wishes for our visit,” he appeared in front of the Buddha with his head bowed, together taking 100,000 monastics.

Gotama addressed his pupils: “Pupils, we have nothing to offer to the assembly of monks. They have no choice but to stand miserably. Let us make seats of flowers for the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha. Bring aquatic flowers and terrestrial flowers quickly!” The ascetic pupils instantly brought beautiful and fragrant flowers by their supernatural powers from the foot of the hill. And, in the way stated in the story of the great elder Sāriputta, they made floral seats.

The engagement in the attainment of cessation absorption (nirodha-samāpatti-jhāna) by the Buddha and his monks, the holding of floral umbrellas over them by the recluses and all the other accounts should also be understood in the way as mentioned in the story of great elder Sāriputta.

On the seventh day, when the Buddha emerged from the attainment of cessation absorption (nirodha-samāpatti-jhāna), he saw the recluses, who were surrounding him, and asked a monastic disciple, who was foremost (etad-agga) in teaching: “Dear son, these recluses have done a great honour. Dear son, give them a discourse in appreciation of the floral seats.” The Arahats took the command respectfully and gave an appreciative discourse after reflecting on the teaching. At the end of the discourse, the Buddha himself taught in addition the means leading to attainment of the paths and the fruitions in a voice that resembled a Brahma’s. When the teaching ended, the 18,000 matted-hair recluses became Arahats, except only for their master, Gotama. [1240]

As the master, however, was unable to realize the truth in that life, he asked the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, who is the monastic that gave a discourse earlier?” When the Buddha answered: “Ascetic Gotama, the monk who taught first is the foremost (etad-aggā) among those who are able to teach well in my Dispensation.” Gotama said: “Exalted Buddha, as the result of the merit of the service (adhikāra) given to you, may I, like the monk who taught me first, become the foremost (etad-aggā) among excellent teachers in the Dispensation of a Future Buddha.” Having said thus, he prostrated at the feet of the Buddha.

The Buddha surveyed the future and saw that the wish of the ascetic Gotama would be fulfilled without any doubt. Accordingly, he predicted: “In the future, 100,000 aeons from now, Buddha Gotama will appear. Then you will become foremost among those who are excellent in teaching the Dhamma!” And he called the ascetic pupils who had now become Arahats: “Come, monks (etha bhikkhavo).” Then the hair and beard of all the recluses disappeared immediately without being shaved, and they were instantly robed and readily equipped with alms bowls and robes created by miraculous power. Their ascetic appearance vanished and they became like great disciples who were of 60 years’ standing or 80 years of age. Buddha Padumuttara returned to the monastery accompanied by the whole company of monks.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

Having rendered his service to the Buddha till the end of his life and performed good works to the best of his ability, the ascetic Gotama took rebirth only in the realm of Devas or that of humans for 100,000 aeons. At the time of our Buddha’s appearance, he was reborn in a wealthy family in the Brahmin village of Doṇavatthu. The child was named Puṇṇa by his parents and relatives.

Having attained the path and wisdom and become an Arahāt having omniscience, the Buddha taught the first discourse and in the course of his journey, he stayed somewhere, with Rājagaha as his resort for alms food. While the Buddha was staying there, Ven. Aññāsi Koṇḍañña came to the Brahmin village of Doṇavatthu, near Kapilavatthu, and ordained Puṇṇa the youth, the son of his sister, and taught him how to practise as a monk. The next day, Ven. Koṇḍañña visited the Buddha and having venerated him respectfully and sought permission, he went to the Chaddanta forest, residing there till his death.

Ven. Mantāniputta Puṇṇa, however, did not go along with his uncle to the Buddha, for he thought: “I shall go to the Buddha only after attainment of Awakening, the culmination of my duties as a monk.” So he stayed behind in the city of Kapilavatthu. And when he put great efforts in his endeavours, he soon became an Arahāt.

From Ven. Mantāniputta Puṇṇa, 500 clansmen took ordination. As he himself followed and practised the ten bases for speech (kathā-vatthu), he gave an exhortation to the 500 monks involving the ten bases for speech.

The ten forms of speech (kathā-vatthu) are: 1) Speech concerning few wants (apiccha-kathā); 2) speech concerning easy contentment (santaṭṭhi-kathā); 3) speech concerning seclusion (paviveka-kathā); 4) speech concerning freedom from the fivefold contact (asamsagga-kathā); 5) speech concerning industriousness (virīya-kathā); 6) speech concerning morality (sīla-kathā); 7) speech concerning mental concentration (samādhi-kathā); 8) speech concerning wisdom (paññā-kathā); 9) speech concerning liberation (vimutti-kathā); and 10) speech concerning reflective wisdom (paccavekkhaṇa-kathā). As he himself engaged in these ten forms of speech, so did he advise these ten to his followers.

Being established in the exhortation of their teacher, all 500 monks worked to fulfil their ascetic duties and became Arahats. Knowing about the culmination of becoming Arahats by their performance of the ascetic duties, the 500 monks went to their preceptor (upajjhāya), Ven. Mantāniputta Puṇṇa, and waited upon him. And they said: “Venerable sir, our ascetic works have culminated in their highest point by our becoming Arahats. We also practised the ten bases for speech quite easily. The time has come for us to visit the Fortunate One.”

On hearing the words of the monks, [1241] Ven. Mantāniputta Puṇṇa thought: “The Fortunate One knows my practice of the ten bases for speech. When I teach, I always make it a point to give such a speech. If I now go with them, surely they will surround me. It is not befitting for me to visit the Buddha when surrounded by such a community of monastics. Let them go earlier and visit the Fortunate One first.” So thinking, he said to the monks: “Dear friends, you please go ahead and visit the Fortunate One before me. Also, worship at the feet of the Fortunate One in my name. I shall follow along after you on the same road.”

The 500 monastics, who were all the natives of Kapilavatthu where the Buddha was born, who were all Arahats, free from the pollutants (āsava), and who had all made easy acquisition of the ten bases for speech, accepted the advice of their preceptor. They arrived at the Veḷuvana monastery of Rājagaha after covering a distance of 60 leagues, and having venerated the feet of the Buddha they sat down at a proper place.

Since it was a natural law (dhammatā-āciṅṅa) of Buddhas to exchange greetings with visitors, the Buddha spoke sweet introductory words by asking: “How are you, monks? Are you fit and well?” and so on. He also put another question: “Where did you come from?” – “We came from the region of Kapilavatthu, your birthplace,” replied the monks. Then the Buddha asked: “Among the monks of the region of Kapilavatthu, my birthplace, who is admired by his fellow monastics as one of few wants, who speaks words of Dhamma connected with few wants?” As a priority, the Buddha asked this question of monastics who easily practised the ten bases for speech. The answer, given unanimously by the 500 monks was: “Ven. Mantāṇiputta Puṇṇa is like that, venerable sir.” Overhearing the answer, Ven. Sāriputta was very keen to meet Ven. Mantāṇiputta Puṇṇa.

The Buddha, thereafter, went from Rājagaha to Sāvattḥī. Learning of the Buddha’s visit to Sāvattḥī, Ven. Mantāṇiputta Puṇṇa went alone to Sāvattḥī and met the Buddha personally without any monks leading him. The Buddha gave him a discourse with reference to the ten bases for speech (kathā-vatthu). Having listened to the discourse, Ven. Mantāṇiputta Puṇṇa paid his respects to the Buddha, and went to Andhavana forest in order to live in seclusion and spent the day at the foot of a tree. Hearing that Ven. Mantāṇiputta Puṇṇa was on his way to Andhavana, Ven. Sāriputta followed him, continuously watching the head of the foregoing Ven. Mantāṇiputta Puṇṇa from behind, lest he should lose sight of him. After waiting for a chance, Ven. Sāriputta, in the evening, approached the tree where Ven. Mantāniputta Puṇṇa was. Having exchanged greetings with him, Ven. Sāriputta asked him about the seven purities (visuddhi). Ven. Mantāniputta Puṇṇa answered each and every question. Then one expressed to the other his appreciation of their Dhamma talks, see the Discourse on the Relay-Chariots (Ratha-vinīta-sutta, MN 24) for more details.

Foremost Title Achieved

At a later time, in an assembly of monks, the Buddha spoke in praise of Ven. Mantāniputta Puṇṇa:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ
Dhamma-kathikānaṃ yad-idaṃ Puṇṇo Mantāniputto.*

Monks, among my monastic disciples who teach the Dhamma, Mantāniputta Puṇṇa is the foremost.

Speaking thus, the Buddha placed the great elder foremost (etad-aggā) among all excellent Dhamma teachers.

10. Ven. Kaccāyana

Aspiration in the Past

The good man, the future Kaccāyana, was brought up in a family of [1242] householders during the lifetime of the Buddha Padumuttara. One day, he went to the monastery and stood at the edge of the audience listening to a discourse. Seeing the Buddha declare someone as foremost (etad-aggā) among those who were good at elaborately and analytically teaching the Dhamma which had been spoken of in brief, it occurred to him thus: “This monk is supreme indeed! He was praised by the Fortunate One as the best among those who can elaborate and teach in detail what is briefly taught by the Buddha, I too should become a monk with such a title in the Dispensation of a Future Buddha.”

So thinking, he invited the Buddha and performed a grand alms giving (mahā-dāna) for seven days in the way mentioned above. “Fortunate One,” said the man, “as a result of this seven days great alms giving, I do not wish for any other bliss but to be the foremost (etad-aggā) like the monk, who, seven days ago, was declared as the best among those who can elaborately and analytically explain what has been briefly spoken.” Having said thus, he prostrated at the feet of the Buddha.

When the Buddha Padumuttara surveyed the future, he saw that the man of good family’s wish would be fulfilled. He therefore predicted saying: “Friend, at the end of 100,000 aeons from now, there will appear the Buddha Gotama. In his Dispensation, you will become the foremost (etad-agga) among those monastics who are able to expound in detail the meaning of the doctrines taught briefly.” After giving an appreciative discourse the Buddha left.

Donation of Gold Bricks

Having performed meritorious deeds till he died, the man of good family was reborn either in the realm and the human world for 100,000 aeons and was then reborn in a good family, in the city of Bārāṇasī, during the lifetime of the Buddha Kassapa. When the Buddha entered Parinibbāna, the man of good family went to the site where a gold shrine (cetiya) was being built. There he donated bricks of gold worth 100,000 pieces of money in honour of the Buddha and made the following wish: “Exalted Buddha, in whichever plane of existence I am born may the colour of my body be gold!”

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

Having performed deeds of merit, he was reborn either in the realm or the human world for one immeasurable period (asaṅkhyeyya-kappa) during the interval between two Buddhas. In the lifetime of our Buddha, he was a son of the Brahmin chaplain in the city of Ujjenī. On his naming day, his father remarked: “My son, having a golden complexion, brings his own name.” He was, therefore, named Kañcana (Gold) by his parents and relatives.

On reaching adulthood, the golden boy was accomplished in the three Vedas. When his father, the Brahmin chaplain, died he succeeded him in the same post. As the Brahmin chaplain, he was also known by the name of his clan, which was Kaccāna, which is a contracted form of Kaccāyana.

King Caṇḍapajjota summoned his ministers and said: “Ministers, a Buddha has emerged in the world. Those of you who are able to bring him to me may do so.” The ministers unanimously replied: “Great King, no one except the Brahmin chaplain Kaccāna is able to do so. He may be sent to bring the Buddha.” The king then summoned him and said: “Friend Kaccāna, go and bring the Buddha to me.” – “Noble King,” replied Kaccāna, “I shall go, provided I have your permission to become a monk.” – “Friend Kaccāna, do whatever you want, but bring the Buddha.” So saying, the king gave his permission.

Thinking: “Those who go to a Buddha should not do so in a large company,” he went to the Buddha with the seven others, he being the eighth. The Buddha taught a discourse, at the end of the discourse, the chaplain Kaccāna became an Arahat together with his seven companions, all being endowed with the analytical knowledges (paṭisambhidā-patta). Then the Buddha stretched out his right hand and called out: “Come, monks.” The hair and the beard of all eight instantly disappeared; and alms bowl and robes created by a miracle (iddhi-maya) appeared on their bodies. They achieved the ascetic life and their appearances became like that of great disciples of 60 or 80 years’ standing.

Having reached the apex of his monk’s life, which was becoming an Arahat, Ven. Kaccāna did not forget, but requested the Buddha to visit the city of Ujjenī by reciting verses in [1243] praise of the journey, as did Ven. Kāḷudāyī. Hearing the words of Ven. Kaccāna, the Buddha came to know: “Kaccāna wants me to go to Ujjenī. Buddhas do not set out to a place which is not worth visiting due to any reason.” Therefore, he asked Ven. Kaccāna: “Dear son, you alone go to Ujjenī. If you go, King Caṇḍapajjota will be pleased.”

Being aware that: “Buddhas speak no word of ambiguity,” Ven. Kaccāna made obeisance most respectfully and left for Ujjenī city with the seven monastics who were once his companions.

Two Daughters of Different Merchants

While on the way to Ujjenī, Ven. Kaccāna went on an alms round in the township of Telapanāḷi, which was situated in the middle of his journey. In that township lived two ladies whose fathers were merchants. Of them one belonged to the family of a merchant whose business had failed. When her parents died, she had to live depending upon her nurse. But she possessed a full and beautiful body; her hair was longer than that of others, softer and more pliant as well and jet black, resembling the colour of a bee. The other lady, living in the same township, had less hair. Prior to Ven. Kaccāna’s visit, she tried to buy some hair from the lady with luxuriant hair through a messenger saying that she would pay her 100 or 1,000 pieces of money or any price demanded. But she had refused to sell.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1869

On the day that Ven. Kaccāna came for alms food, the lady with the beautiful hair saw him together with the seven monastics, and noticed they had empty alms bowls. Then it occurred to her: “A golden descendant of Brahma has come with a bowl that has been washed; it is empty, but I have no other things to offer. This lady sent somebody to buy my hair. Now I shall get enough to make offerings for the noble one with the money from the sale of my hair.” So she sent her nurse to invite the venerables and gave them seats in her house.

When the venerables began to sit down, the lady went into her chamber and asked her nurse to cut her hair and she sent her away, saying: “Mother, go and sell my hair to the lady of such and such a name and bring back whatever amount of money paid by her. We shall offer food to the venerables.” The sad nurse wiped her tears with the back of the palm of her hand and holding up her breast with the other hand, she went to the other lady, secretly carrying the hair so that the venerables might not see it.

It is a usual way of dealing on the part of the buyer to have no appreciation for the thing personally brought by the seller however much the merchandise is excellent and valuable, so the buyer tries to get it at a very low price. Hence, the wealthy lady lacking in hair thought: “Formerly I was unable to obtain the hair although I was willing to pay a lot of money for it. Now the hair has been cut off but she will not get the original price. She must accept any amount I am going to pay.” Accordingly she said to the nurse: “Nurse, I failed to get the hair despite my offer of so much money to your mistress. The lifeless hair, which might have fallen from anywhere, is worth only eight coins.” So she paid the nurse only eight coins, an unreasonably low price.

The nurse brought the money to her mistress who offered a portion of food worth a coin to each of the eight monks. When Ven. Kaccāna reflected, he saw the lady’s act of merit was full of potential. So he asked: “Where is the lady now?” – “In her chamber, sir,” answered the nurse. Ven. Kaccāna then asked the nurse to bring the lady before him.

The lady who gave the alms food came out at Ven. Kaccāna’s request, made but once, for she had much respect for the monks and having bowed before them, she developed strong faith in them. The seeds of an alms giving sown in the Buddha’s Dispensation is likened to the fertile soil which yields good results even in the present life. Hence, as soon as the lady bowed down, her hair became luxuriant as before. The venerables then received the food and rose into the sky even while she was watching them; and they descended at King Caṇḍapajjota's garden called Kañcanavana. [1244]

Having seen Ven. Kaccāna, the gardener went to the king and informed him: "Great King, our master, the chaplain Kaccāna, became a monk and is visiting the royal garden." King Caṇḍapajjota went to the garden and made obeisance to Ven. Kaccāna, who had finished his meal, venerating him with the hands, knees and forehead touching the ground and sat at a suitable distance and asked: "Venerable sir, where is the Fortunate One?" Ven. Kaccāna answered: "Noble King, the Buddha himself has not come yet, but he has sent me." The king asked again: "Venerable sir, from where did you get the meal today?" In replying to the king's question, Ven. Kaccāna told the king all about the hard-earned merit of the lady who was his alms food giver.

Having provided Ven. Kaccāna with accommodation, King Caṇḍapajjota invited him to the next day's meal and returned to the palace where he called up the lady, the food donor, by royal order and made her his Chief Queen. This was the acquisition of wealth and happiness in the present life by the lady as the result of the first impulsive wholesome volition (paṭhama-javana).

Herein the meaning is: In performing alms giving (dāna), there are seven impulsive moments concerning a great wholesome volition (mahā-kusala-cetanā). Of them, the first impulsive volition results in the present life, if there are favourable circumstances. Hence, the first impulsive volition is called a deed resulting in the present life (diṭṭha-dhamma-vedanīya-kamma).

The seventh impulsive volition has a result in the second life, if there are favourable circumstances. Hence it is called the deed resulting in the immediately following life (upapajja-vedanīya-kamma).

The volition of the middle five impulses give results in successive lives from the third, if there are favourable circumstances; hence, any volition of these middle five impulses is called a deed giving results in successive lives (aparāpariya-vedanīya-kamma). It means a deed that has results in successive existences.

When a deed brings about its result, the result is of two kinds: existence (bhava) and acquisition of wealth (bhava-samāpatti). The resultant mental aggregates and the body formed by deeds (kamma) that emerge at the time of conception (paṭisandhi) and at the time of growing (pavatti) are called the existence (bhava) result. The mental aggregate and the body generated by deeds (kamma) are called the attainment of existence (patti-bhava). Various forms of wealth enjoyed in life are called the acquisition of wealth (bhava-samāpatti).

Of the three kinds of resulting deeds, the deeds resulting in the immediately following life (upapajja-vedanīya-kamma) and the deed resulting in successive lives (aparāpariya-vedanīya-kamma) bring their respective existence result and acquisition of wealth result.

As regards the first impulsive volition or the deed resulting in the present life, when it results presently, it brings only acquisition of wealth, the various forms of wealth to be enjoyed in that life, but not existence (bhava) because that result has already been given by the birth-generation (janaka-kamma) that created conception as its result in this life. Therefore, the first impulsive volition or the deed resulting in the present life of the lady in question brought her only the acquisition of wealth (bhava-samāpatti) result which was wealth and property in the same existence.

From that time onwards, King Caṇḍapajjota did great honour to Ven. Kaccāna. Pleased with the teaching of Ven. Kaccāna, many became monks in his presence. Since then, the whole city of Ujjenī had been covered with the colour of the robes and blown by the breeze caused by the movements of the going and coming of the monks. The queen conceived a son and she gave birth to him after ten months, the prince was named Gopāla after his grandfather. Subsequently the queen became well-known by the name of Gopālamātā in relation to her son. As Queen Gopālamātā was so impressed by Ven. Kaccāna, she built a big monastery for him, in the garden of Kaccānavana and donated it to him with the king's permission. Having made the people of Ujjenī faithful in the Buddha's Dispensation, Ven. Kaccāna returned to the Buddha.

Foremost Title Achieved

At a later time, while staying at Jetavana, in the assembly of monks, the Buddha spoke in praise of Ven. Kaccāna and declared him foremost (etad-agga), in connection with the three discourses: 1) the Discourse on the Honey Ball (Madhupiṇḍika-sutta, MN 18, 2) the Kaccāna repetition (Kaccāna-peyyāla, probably MN 133ff) and the Discourse on the Way to the Beyond (Pārāyaṇa-sutta, [1245] SN 43.44).

saṃkhittena bhāsitassa vitthārena atthaṃ vibhajantānaṃ yad-idaṃ Mahākaccāno.*

Monks, among my disciples who are able to elaborate what has been taught briefly, Mahā Kaccāna is the foremost (etad-aggā).

The sermons given by Ven. Mahā Kaccāna may be taken from the Traditions (Apādāna, Tha-ap 35) text and its commentary, the Verses of the Elder Monks (Thera-gāthā, Thag 8.1) and its commentary, etc.

11-12. Ven. Mahā Panthaka and Ven. Cūḷa Panthaka

Aspiration in the Past

100,000 aeons ago, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara, two householder brothers, who were native of Hamsavatī city, having profound faith in the Three Treasures, constantly went to the Buddha to listen to the Dhamma. One day, the younger of the two saw a monk being declared foremost (etad-aggā) in two qualities: 1) Among those who created mind-made images and 2) those who were skilful in form absorption (rūpāvacara-jhāna). It then occurred to him thus: “Great, indeed is this monk. Despite his being such, he roams about practising two things. It would be nice if I too should roam about practising these two things in the Dispensation of a Future Buddha.”

The younger brother invited the Buddha and performed a grand alms giving to him for seven days. Then he expressed his wish to the Buddha, saying: “Venerable sir, seven days ago, you declared a certain monk foremost (etad-aggā) in the Dispensation by virtue of his two qualities: The ability of creating mind-made images and skill in form absorption (rūpāvacara-jhāna). As a result of this specially performed act of merit, may I be foremost with those two qualities also.’”

When the Buddha surveyed the future, he saw that this householder’s wish would be fulfilled and said: “In the future, 100,000 aeons from now, there will arise the Buddha Gotama. That Buddha will declare you as the foremost concerning these two qualities.” And after giving an appreciative discourse, the Buddha departed. This was the wish expressed by the younger brother.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1873

As for the older householder brother, one day he saw a certain monk being declared by the Buddha the foremost (etad-agga) in the field of having skill in developing formless absorption (arūpāvacara-jhāna), and like his younger brother, he too performed special deeds of merit and, thereafter, expressed his wish: “May I be the foremost (etad-agga) in the field of formless absorption (arūpāvacara-jhāna)!” – “Your wish will be fulfilled,” predicted the Buddha.

Both householder brothers did good works during the lifetime of the Buddha and when the Buddha attained Parinibbāna, they did homage by offering gold at the shrine which was built for the Buddha’s bodily relics. Upon their death, they were reborn in the abode of Devas. While they were being reborn either in the divine or human worlds only, and 100,000 aeons elapsed.

Of the two brothers, an account of the meritorious deed done by the elder brother, Mahā Panthaka, in that interval, was not given particularly in the Great Commentary (Mahā-aṭṭhakathā).

As for the younger brother, Cūḷa Panthaka, he became a monk in the Dispensation of Buddha Kassapa, and for 20,000 years he practised meditation on a white meditation device (odāta-kasiṇa) and was reborn again in a Deva realm. Later, our Buddha attained Awakening, and, after teaching the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, he went to stay in the Veḷuvana at Rājagaha.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

The daughter of Dhanaseṭṭhi, a wealthy merchant in the city of Rājagaha, fell in love with her male servant, and fearing that others would come to know about their affair, she discussed with her lover: “We shall no longer live here. If my parents were to know of this affair of ours, they would kill me, and cut me into pieces. Let us go and live elsewhere!” [1246] They agreed with each other, and secretly taking her jewellery, she went out through the door that was left open. They then fled to live in another place where they were unknown to others.

While the two were living in this unknown place, the lady became pregnant owing to their intimacy. When her pregnancy reached maturity, she consulted with her husband, saying: “Sir, my pregnancy is now mature. It is too miserable for both of us if I give birth at a place away from our relatives or friends. Let us return to our parents’ house.” Her husband delayed the decision by saying, just to please his wife: “We shall go today,” or “We shall travel tomorrow.” Then the lady thought: “This stupid man dares not go, for his guilt is so serious. Parents certainly desire the welfare of their children. Whether the stupid man follows me or not, I should go.” So thinking, while her husband was out, the lady departed alone after storing up her belongings and leaving a message with her next-door neighbour that she was going to her parents.

When her husband returned later and found that his wife had left for her parents’ residence, he followed her in haste and eventually caught up with her midway. At the very spot of their meeting, the lady gave birth to a child. Asked by her husband: “What is this dear?” the lady answered: “Sir, a son has been born.” – “What shall we do now?” they discussed between themselves and decided, saying: “We were going to our parents’ home to deliver the child. Now the delivery of the child has taken place in the middle of the journey. What is the use of going to our parents’ place? Let us go home!” So the two agreed and went home, and they named the baby Panthaka (Highway), as he was born along the highway.

Before long, the lady conceived again, when the second son was nearing his birth, he too was born on the way to the home of his mother’s parents. Hence the first son was renamed Mahā Panthaka (Big Highway), and the second named Cūḷa Panthaka (Small Highway).

The husband and wife then returned home, each carrying a son. While they were living there, hearing such terms as “younger uncle,” “older uncle,” “grandfather,” “grandmother,” etc. in the conversation of other children, the older son, Mahā Panthaka, asked his mother: “Mother, other children mention, ‘grandfather,’ ‘grandmother,’ and so forth. Do we also have relatives?” The mother said: “Well, you are right, dear son! You have no relatives here. But in Rājagaha, however, your grandfather is a great merchant of wealth. Your relatives are many in that city.” – “Mother, why do we not go to Rājagaha?” asked Mahā Panthaka.

The mother did not give her son the reason for not going to the city of Rājagaha. When she was repeatedly asked by her sons, she said to her husband: “Sir, the children are troubling me very much. On seeing us, our parents will not cut our flesh and eat us. Let us go! Let us show our sons their grandparents’ house. Let us send them there!”

“Madam, I dare not go to your parents’ house,” said the husband, “but I shall manage to send you, so that you will certainly get there.” – “All right sir,” said the wife, “the house of their grandparents should be shown to the children in one way or another.” The couple then headed for Rājagaha, carrying their boys and in due course they arrived in the city. They lodged at a rest house, near the city-gate. The mother took the boys and informed her parents through somebody of their visit.

When the grandparents received the information, they considered as follows: “For those who roamed in Saṃsāra there is none who has not been their son, or their daughter. These two, however, have committed a great offence against us. They cannot live in our presence. They do not deserve to be with us. But let them take this much of money and live in a comfortable place, and let them send the two boys to us.” Then they sent a messenger. The lady took the money sent by her parents and handed over the two little sons to the messengers, to be taken to their grandparents. The two brothers, Mahā Panthaka and Cūḷa Panthaka grew up in comfort in the house of their grandparents.

Their Ordinations

Of the two brothers, Cūḷa Panthaka was very young and tender, while Mahā Panthaka [1247] always went along with his grandfather to the Buddha to listen to his discourses. As he had always been listening to the discourses in the presence of the Buddha, he was inclined to become a monk. Therefore, he sought permission from his grandfather, Dhanasetṭhi, saying: “Grandfather, if you will permit me, I would like to become a monk.” – “What a wonderful thing you have said,” replied the wealthy merchant, “for me, your becoming a monk is far better than the whole world! Go ahead, as you wish, grandson!” Replying thus gladly, the merchant accepted Mahā Panthaka’s request and took him to the Buddha. “Merchant,” addressed the Buddha, “how is it? Have you brought a boy?” – “Yes, exalted Buddha,” answered the merchant, “this boy is my older grandson. He is asking me to make him a monk under you.”

Then the Buddha ordered a nearby monk who used to go on alms round: “Have the boy ordained!” After explaining the meditation on the five component parts of the body “with skin as the fifth” (taca-pañcaka-kammaṭṭhāna) to the boy, the monk made him a novice. After he became a novice Mahā Panthaka learnt the words of the Buddha, and having completed 20 years of age, he took higher ordination upon himself. After becoming a monk, he engaged seriously in meditation that led him to mastery over the four formless absorptions (arūpāvacara-jhāna). Having emerged from the absorptions (jhāna), he assiduously devoted himself to insight (vipassanā) meditation and finally became an Arahāt. In this way the Arahāt Mahā Panthaka became foremost among those monastics who were extremely skilful in engaging in formless meditation.

Ven. Mahā Panthaka spent his time enjoying the bliss of fruition. One day, after considering whether it would be possible for him to give his younger brother such wonderful bliss, he went to the wealthy merchant, his grandfather, and requested: “Dear sir, if you agree, I would like to make Cūḷa Panthaka a novice.” When the grandfather gave his consent, saying: “Do as you wish! You may make him a novice!” Ven. Mahā Panthaka had him initiated and established in the ten precepts. Novice Cūḷa Panthaka tried to learn from his older brother the following verse (SN 3.12):

pāto siyā phullam-avītagandhaṃ.
Aṅgīrasaṃ passa virocamaṇaṃ, tapanta-ādiccam-ivantalikkhe.*

Just as the lotus flower named Kokanada, because of its many petals and beauty, and pervading sweet smell, is lovely with splendour and ever-present fragrance as it opens at daybreak, even so, the Buddha’s fragrance, by his body and his personal virtue, shining by his glory, splendid whenever one sees him, emanates radiance of light from his body, resembling the round sun that rises and appears in the sky during the season of Sarada in November.

Whatever words he had been learnt previously disappeared from his memory whenever he proceeded to learn the next one. For four months, he was still trying to commit the verse to memory, but although four months had passed, he still could not learn it by heart.

It is explained in the commentary to the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) that during the lifetime of Buddha Kassapa, Cūḷa Panthaka was a learned monk. He jeered at a dull monk in his learning of Pāḷi. As a result, the dullard gave up his pursuit in learning, for he felt so ashamed on account of the jeering, and he lost self-confidence. Owing to that evil act, as Cūḷa Panthaka, he became a dullard after becoming a novice. Hence, he forgot all that had been memorised as soon as he went on to the next portions.

Thereupon the elder brother, Mahā Panthaka, drove him out, saying: “Cūḷa Panthaka! In this Dispensation you are not capable (adhabba) of the paths and the fruitions. You cannot learn even a single verse in four months. How are you, who cannot learn a verse in [1248] four months, going to be able to become an Arahant in your monastic life? Get out of this dwelling!” Driven out by his elder brother, the novice Cūḷa Panthaka dared not stay there and stood, weeping, at the edge of the dwelling where his brother would not see him.

A Meditation Subject Given by the Buddha

At that time, the Buddha was sojourning in the Mango Grove monastery, built and dedicated by the physician Jīvaka, with Rājagaha as his resort for alms food. Then Jīvaka sent a man to the Buddha to invite him along with 500 monks for the next day’s meal. At that moment Ven. Mahā Panthaka was in charge of food distribution (bhattuddesaka). The man therefore referred the matter to him, saying: “Venerable sir, please accept the food offerings for 500 monks.” – “I accept the food for the monks” he replied, “except for Cūḷa Panthaka.”

Hearing the reply, Ven. Cūḷa Panthaka was extremely dejected. Seeing Ven. Cūḷa Panthaka’s plight and knowing that he would achieve liberation if he visited him, the Buddha went to him and, showing himself from a distance neither too near nor too far, asked: “Dear son Cūḷa Panthaka, why are you weeping?” – “Because, venerable sir, my brother Ven. Mahā Panthaka expels me,” answered Cūḷa Panthaka. “Dear son Panthaka,” addressed the Buddha, “your brother does not possess the power of knowing the intentions and inclinations of beings (asayānusaya-ñāṇa). But you are an individual who is able to be led by a Buddha (Buddha-veneyya-puggala). With these encouraging words, the Buddha gave him a piece of clean, but rough, cloth created by his spiritual power, and the Buddha added: “Dear son Panthaka, keep this in your fist, muttering: Rajo harañam, rajo harañam, ‘This cloth is liable to stain! This cloth is liable to stain.’ Meditate on it in this way.”

Herein, Ven. Cūḷa Panthaka in a previous birth was a king and while touring the city for inspection, his forehead sweated and he wiped the sweat with his clean waist-garment. The garment became dirty. The king then spoke to himself:

Thus he gained the perception of impermanence. Hence for Cūḷa Panthaka, the meditation subject of: ‘This cloth is liable to stain!’ was a forceful contribution to his becoming an Arahat. Therefore the Buddha gave him the clean, rough cloth as he saw that Ven. Cūḷa Panthaka’s previous good act and as he wished to urge him to engage in meditation on a subject that matched with that good act.

Attainment of Awakening

Ven. Cūḷa Panthaka sat down rubbing with his hand the cloth given by the Buddha and muttering: Rajo haraṇaṃ, rajo haraṇaṃ! “This cloth is liable to stain! This cloth is liable to stain.” When he rubbed it several times, the threads of the garment began to get dirty. When he repeated the rubbing, the cloth became even dirtier like a kitchen cloth. As the time came for his wisdom to ripen, the law of extinction and destruction manifested itself in his mind. And he reflected: “This piece of cloth was originally white and clean. But on account of its association with my body (upādinna), it is now full of dirt. My mind is also like this cloth. It is just like the cloth. The mind, originally pure and clean in its unperturbed state, tends to become soiled on account of its association with such unwholesome concomitant factors as greed, hate, delusion, etc. Having thus reflected on himself and his heart, he proceeded to strive for mental concentration and gained the four form absorptions (rūpāvacara-jhāna). When he, on the basis of these absorptions, engaged in insight (vipassanā) meditation, he became an Arahat together with the fourfold analytical knowledge. As he had mastered the form absorption involving mentally produced form (manomaya-rūpāvacara-jhāna), he was able to create many bodies from one or one body from many, and had other similar powers. Besides, he was accomplished in the teaching of the Three Baskets and endowed with the six psychic powers.

Such happenings are called path accomplished learning (magga-siddha-pariyatti) and path accomplished powers (magga-siddha-abhiññā), without particularly learning and without particularly striving, one becomes learned in the teaching and possessed of psychic powers as soon as one attains the Arahat path (Arahatta-magga). Both learning and powers took place by the force of the path (magga). [1249]

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1879

The following day, the Buddha visited the house of the physician Jīvaka together with 499 monastics and sat there for meal offerings. Ven. Cūḷa Panthaka could not go along as his brother Ven. Mahā Panthaka did not accept the invitation for him. The physician Jīvaka managed first to make offerings of rice gruel. The Buddha did not take the gruel but covered his alms bowl with his hand. When Jīvaka asked: “Exalted Buddha, why do you not accept the gruel?” he said: “There is a monk left behind at the monastery.”

Thereupon Jīvaka sent a man saying: “Go, friend! Bring the monk who has been left behind at the monastery.” Prior to the arrival of the man, Ven. Cūḷa Panthaka had created, by his own power, 1,000 monastics, each different from the other in shape as well as in occupation, such as making a robe, etc.

Because the man sent by Jīvaka saw too many monastics at the monastery, he did not invite them all, for he had been asked by Jīvaka to bring just one monk. So he went back and said to the physician: “Master Jīvaka, the monks left behind at the monastery are more than all these monks who are in your house. I was at a loss and could not find the right one to bring.” Jīvaka asked the Buddha: “What is the name of the venerable who was left behind at the monastery, exalted Buddha?” When the Buddha said that it was Cūḷa Panthaka, Jīvaka sent the man again, saying: “Go again, friend! And ask: ‘Which of you is the noble venerable named Cūḷa Panthaka?’ and when he answers bring him along.”

The man returned to the monastery and asked: “Which of you is the noble venerable named Cūḷa Panthaka?” – “I am Cūḷa Panthaka! I am Cūḷa Panthaka!” answered all of the thousand monks. The man returned again and said to Jīvaka: “Master, all of the thousand monks replied: ‘I am Cūḷa Panthaka! I am Cūḷa Panthaka!’ I am puzzled as to whom I should invite, not knowing this one from that one?” As the physician Jīvaka was a noble (ariya) supporter who had realized the four truths, even by the way the man informed him, he came to know that the one left behind at the monastery was of supernormal power. “Go again, friend,” said Jīvaka, “tell the one who answers first that he is summoned by the Buddha, and bring him along by holding the edge of his robe.” Saying thus, Jīvaka sent the man back once more. The man went again to the monastery and did as his master had ordered. Instantly the thousand monastics disappeared. Then only could the man bring Cūḷa Panthaka. Then only did the Buddha accept the gruel and partake of it.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1880

Having gone back to the monastery after partaking of the food, a discussion took place at a meeting of the monks thus: “Supreme indeed are the Buddhas. He could cause a monk, who failed to learn by heart a single verse in four months, to become such a powerful monk!” Knowing the minds of the monks, the Buddha came to the meeting and sat on the Buddha’s seat. Then he asked: “Monks, what are you talking about?” When the monks replied: “Exalted Buddha, we were talking about nothing but your grace. We were saying that Cūḷa Panthaka has received a big favour from you!” The Buddha said: “Monks, receiving supermundane inheritance now by following my advice is not so wonderful. While he was of immature wisdom long, long ago in the past, Cūḷa Panthaka received mundane inheritance by taking my advice.” – “When was it, exalted Buddha?” asked the monks. And at their request the Buddha related the Birth Story about the Little Merchant (Cūḷa-seṭṭhi-jātaka, Ja 4) to the monks in the following manner:

The Story about the Little Merchant

Monks, once upon a time, King Brahmadata was ruling over the city of Bārāṇasī. At that time, a wise merchant known as Cūḷa Seṭṭhi was an expert in reading omens. One day, on his way to the palace to wait upon the king, he saw a dead rat and, upon observing and reflecting at that time on the planets in the sky, he read the omen thus: “Any intelligent man, who takes this dead rat, will be able to maintain his family and will prosper in business.” An unknown poor man, hearing the wise merchant’s reading of the omen and being aware that this wise merchant would not say so without knowing it, picked up the dead rat, went to an inn and sold it as food for the cats and received a coin. With that coin, he bought some molasses and carried a pot of drinking water. Seeing some flower sellers, who had come back from the forest after collecting flowers, he gave a little portion of molasses and a cup [1250] of clean water to each of them for their refreshment. Out of gratitude, each flower seller gave a handful of flowers to the poor man.

From this point onwards, the poor man will be referred to as the “talented pupil,” partly because he was of talented mind and partly because he was a pupil receiving the instruction given by the wise merchant Cūḷa Seṭṭhi.

After selling those handfuls of flowers, he bought molasses as much as the flower money could buy and went to a park carrying the molasses and a pot of clean drinking water. On that day, the flower sellers equally shared their flowers with him and departed. In this way, the talented pupil had soon saved eight silver coins.

Again, on a stormy day, the talented pupil went to the big, old deserted garden and while he was making piles of branches, which were broken and cut down by the strong winds, for firewood, he received sixteen coins from the royal potter. With the eight coins accrued from the flowers, he now had 24 coins, and thought to himself: “I have some good means of obtaining money, by making myself a water-supporter to the grass-cutters. Having thought thus, he set up a water jar at a place neither too near nor too far from the city-gate. Then he gave the drinking water free to the 500 grass-cutters who came from the outskirts of the city. The grass-cutters said to him: “Friend, you have done a great service to us. What can we do for you?” The talented pupil replied: “When some occasion arises, you may help me.” After saying these words of acceptance, he wandered about and made friends with the official of highways and the official of waterways.

One day, the highway official brought him the good news that a horse merchant would visit Bārāṇasī city with 500 horses. Getting the news, the talented pupil transmitted it to the grass-cutters and asked them each to bring an extra bundle of grass in addition to what they had brought in the previous days. When the time for the entry of the horses came, the talented pupil piled up the thousand bundles of grass near the inner doors of the city so that the grass was visible to the horse-merchant, after which he sat down. The horse merchant could not get fodder even though he roamed about the whole city in search of it. So he gave 1,000 pieces of money to the talented pupil and took away the thousand bundles of grass.

Two or three days later, his other friend, the waterway official had the information sent to him that a big cargo boat had moored inside the harbour. So he thought to himself: “Some means of earning money has come up again!” Then he hired a fully furnished chariot for eight coins of silver and went in it to the port. He gave a ring to the captain of the boat as an advance payment. At a place near the port, he had a curtain hung up, as though it was a house of brokerage. Sitting there, he gave orders to his employees saying: “If other merchants come to me, tell me by way of three stages, so that there are three places which the information must pass through to me.”

Hearing of the arrival of the cargo boat, merchants numbering 100, rushed from the city of Bārāṇasī to the port with an idea to buy the merchandise. The employees of the talented pupil were there before the other merchants came, and readily said to them: “You will not get the goods, for the merchant sitting in such and such a place has made an advance payment for the whole lot.” On hearing these words, the hundred merchants of Bārāṇasī came to the talented pupil, who was now being called a great merchant.

The servants of the talented pupil respectfully informed him of the visit of the merchants, passed through the three stages, as they had been told beforehand, just to aggrandize the matter. Each of the hundred merchants gave him 1,000 pieces of money as gifts to become shareholders in the business. Again each of them offered another thousand coins to him as a profit by which method they made him resign as a shareholder and managed to pass the whole lot of goods on the boat to their monopoly. The talented pupil earned 200,000 in one sitting and brought the money to Bārāṇasī, thinking: “I should do something out of gratitude.” He took 100,000 pieces of money and went to the wise merchant Cūla Setṭhi.

Then the wise merchant asked the talented pupil: “Dear son, how did you get such a lot of money?” The talented pupil related the whole story, saying: “Following the advice you [1251] gave on seeing the dead rat, I have become rich by 200,000 and 24 coins.” The wise merchant then considered: “A young man of such a talent should not belong to others; he should be mine.” So he gave him his daughter, who had come of age, in marriage and helped him become head of the household. Upon the death of the wise merchant, he was given the rank of that merchant and lived according to his lifespan and was reborn as determined by his deeds.

Having related both the present story and the past, the Buddha spoke words regarding the two events and uttered the following verse for the present life (Ja 4):

*Appakenapi medhāvī, pābhatena vicakkhaṇo,
Samuṭṭhāpeti attānaṃ, aṇuṃ aggiṃ va sandhamāṃ.*

My dear sons, monks! As a wise man, by putting fuel into a very small fire and making efforts to blow repeatedly and continuously, turns it into a big mass of fire, so the wise man, who is far-sighted as well as retrospective, who is prudent and reflective, can create a great wealth out of a small and insignificant investment and he can raise himself in that wealth to the state of a millionaire.

In this way the Buddha delivered this Birth Story (Jātaka) to the monks in the Dhamma Assembly Hall.

Foremost Title Achieved

At a later time, while the Buddha was sitting on the Dhamma throne, surrounded by monks, he spoke in praise of Ven. Cūḷa Panthaka as follows:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakanāṃ bhikkhūnaṃ
mano-mayaṃ kāyaṃ abhinimminantānaṃ yad-idaṃ Cūḷa-panthako, ceto-vivaṭṭa-kusalānaṃ yad-idaṃ Cūḷa-panthako.*

Monks, among my disciples who are able to create mind-made bodies through psychic powers, Cūḷa Panthaka is the foremost; and among my disciples who are skilful in mind transformation leading to form absorption (rūpāvacara-jhāna)<sup>274</sup> Cūḷa Panthaka is the foremost.

Thus the Buddha declared Ven. Cūḷa Panthaka the foremost (etad-aggā) in two qualities.

With regard to Ven. Mahā Panthaka, the Buddha spoke in praise of him as follows:

saññā-vivaṭṭa-kusalānaṃ yad-idaṃ Mahā-panthako.*

Monks, among my disciples who are skilful in perception transformation leading to formless absorption (arūpāvacara-jhāna), Mahā Panthaka is the foremost.

Herein, when other monks created mind-made bodies through psychic powers, they were able to create only a few, say, three or four, etc., but they could not create a large number of such bodies. And when they did, they could bring about only the figures that resembled the creator and in the case of action, theirs was the one and the only kind.

Cūḷa Panthaka, however, created 1,000 figures at one stroke of advertence in the process of consciousness. Such mentally created figures were different in shape from one another, and that was why he was declared the foremost (etad-aggā) in creating mind-made bodies. Though the words are explained in the commentary in various ways, the explanations are omitted here lest the reader should get confused.

The sermons connected with these two monastics should be taken in detail from the commentaries on the Traditions (Apadāna, Tha-ap 16), the Verses of the Elder Monks (Thera-gāthā, 8.3, 10.4), the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, 407), and the Exalted Utterances (Udāna, 5.10). [1252]

13. Ven. Subhūti

Aspiration in the Past

This Subhūti, a virtuous man of good family, was born in the family of a Brahmin householder before the appearance of Buddha Padumuttara, 100,000 aeons ago, his name then was Nanda.

When the young Nanda came of age, he was educated in the three Vedas but since he could not find any beneficial substance in them, he became an ascetic with other youths, numbering 44,000, at the foot of the mountain named Nisabha. He attained the five mundane psychic powers and reached the eight mundane attainments. He also helped his companions, the 44,000 ascetics, attain the absorptions and psychic powers.

At that time, Buddha Padumuttara appeared in the world and while he was sojourning in the royal city of Hāmsavatī, he surveyed the world of sentient beings one morning and saw the potentials of Nanda's pupils, the 44,000 matted-hair ascetics, to become Arahats. As for Nanda himself, the Buddha also saw that he would aspire to be a great disciple endowed with a twofold honour. Hence, he cleansed himself early in the morning and set out for the hermitage of Nanda, taking his bowl and robe by himself, in the way mentioned in the story of Ven. Sāriputta. The offering of various fruits, the spreading and offering of seats of flowers and the engagement in the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti) that took place at the hermitage was similar to that described in the account of Ven. Sāriputta.

What was different here was that when the Buddha rose from his attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti), he instructed a disciple, who was endowed with the twofold honour of living free from mental defilements and blissfully and being worthy of receiving excellent offerings, saying: “Dear son, deliver a discourse in appreciation of the offering of floral seats to me by the whole group of ascetics!” Remaining seated, the venerable delivered the discourse, reflecting on the Baskets (Piṭaka). At the end of the venerable’s discourse, Buddha Padumuttara himself taught them. When this was over, all 44,000 ascetics became Arahats. As regards their teacher, the ascetic Nanda, he could not follow the Buddha’s discourse attentively, as he was admiring the teaching monastic. As he was taking interest in the teaching monk, he could not pay full attention to the teaching of the Buddha. Stretching out his hand to the 44,000 pupils, the Buddha summoned them: Etha bhikkhavo, “come, monks.” All of them instantly lost their head hair and beards and became equipped with the requisites made by supernormal powers, and turned into solemn monks with their sense-faculties well controlled, like great disciples of 60 years standing and 80 years of age.

Having saluted the Buddha, the ascetic Nanda stood in his presence and asked: “Venerable sir, who is the monk that gave the talk in appreciation of the offering of the floral seats.” – “That monk,” answered the Buddha, “is the foremost (etad-agga) who is free from the moral defilements, and is worthy of accepting excellent offerings in my Dispensation.” The venerable Nanda made his aspiration: “I do not wish for any other human or divine pleasure as the result of this meritorious (adhikāra) act of mine, performed for seven days, but I do wish to become the foremost (etad-agga) in twofold virtue, in the Dispensation of a Future Buddha, like this venerable who has just given an appreciative talk.” Seeing that his wish would come true without any obstacles, the Buddha made a prophecy and departed. As Nanda always listened to the Dhamma discourses in the presence of the Buddha and kept his absorptions (jhāna) in their undiminished state, he immediately took rebirth in the realm of the Brahmās on his passing.

This was Ven. Subhūti's resolution and meritorious act performed in the past. His good works done during the interim period of 100,000 aeons are not mentioned in the commentary.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

When 100,000 aeons had elapsed and when the present Dispensation came into existence, the man of good family, who would become the great elder Subhūti, was reborn as a son of Sumana, the wealthy merchant, who was the brother of Anāthapiṇḍika, in the city of Sāvattthī and [1253] was named Subhūti. When our Buddha appeared and while he was staying with Rājagaha as his resort for alms food, Anāthapiṇḍika the merchant arrived at the house of his friend and brother-in-law, the merchant of Rājagaha, bringing with him goods produced in Sāvattthī. On his arrival, he heard of the emergence of the Buddha.

After going to the Buddha, who was staying now in Sītavana forest, he became established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) in his first meeting with him. And after becoming a noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna), he requested the Buddha to visit Sāvattthī and had lodgings built, one at every league, along the journey of 45 leagues between Sāvattthī and Rājagaha, at the expense of 100,000 pieces of money. He also bought Prince Jeta's garden of 14 acres, for which the payment was made by placing gold coins, touching each other, covering the garden area. Then on the whole garden site, he built the Jetavana monastery for the Buddha and dedicated it to him.<sup>275</sup>

On the day of the dedication of the monastery, Subhūti went along with his older brother and listened to the Dhamma, and so strong was his faith that he adopted the monk's life. Having become a monk, he studied and was accomplished in the Two Rules for monks and nuns (Ubhato-Pātimokkha), after which he learned meditation and strove to perfect the ascetic practices (dhutaṅga). All this led him to become an Arahat via the development of insight (vipassanā) based on absorption on the meditation on loving-kindness (mettā-jhāna).

Two Foremost Titles Achieved

When he gave a discourse, Ven. Subhūti did so objectively by concentrating on the Dhamma itself, and by not making any reference to an individual, the way the Buddha did. This led him to be declared the foremost (etad-aggā) in living free from mental defilements (araṇa-vihārī).

When Ven. Subhūti went on alms round, thinking: “If I adopt this method, great benefits will accrue to the supporters.” At every house, he habitually engaged in loving-kindness absorption (mettā-jhāna) before he received the alms food. This caused him to be the foremost (etad-aggā) in being worthy of excellent gifts (dakkhiṇeyya).

Later on, therefore, when the Buddha held a meeting with the assembly of monks, he spoke in praise of Ven. Subhūti as follows:

*Etad-aggam̐ bhikkhave mama sāvakānaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ
araṇa-vihārīnaṃ yad-idaṃ Subhūti, dakkhiṇeyyānaṃ yad-idaṃ Subhūti.*

Monks, among my monastic-disciples who live detached from defilements, Subhūti stands foremost; and also he stands foremost among those who are worthy of the best offerings.

Herein, with reference to those who live detached from the moral defilements (araṇa-vihārī-etad-aggā), such as passion (rāga), hatred (dosa), etc., are called lamenters (raṇa) because they lead to lamentation. Arahats, who live enjoying bliss, as they are free from moral defilements, are said to be non-lamenters (araṇa-vihārī).

Apart from Ven. Subhūti, there were other Arahats who lived such a life too. But when they taught, they did so by employing the method which considered making reference to a certain person (puggalādhiṭṭhāna-dhamma-desanā) whom they either praised or censured. But Ven. Subhūti adopted the method which required him to speak of the Dhamma itself as his objective (Dhammādhiṭṭhāna) – the Dhamma taught by the Buddha. That was why he was declared the foremost among the monastics who lived detached from defilements (araṇa-vihārī).

The Analysis of Non-Conflict (Araṇa-vibhaṅga-sutta, MN 139) enumerates the six factors of living detached from conflicts (araṇa-vihāra), as follows:

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1888

1) He follows the middle path (majjhima-paṭipadā) which avoids the two evil extremes; 2) following the method which has Dhamma itself as his objective (Dhammadhiṭṭhāna), one says: “This is the thing to be praised. This is the thing to be censured.” If following the method which considers making reference to a certain person (puggalādhiṭṭhāna-dhamma-desanā), one says: “He is the person to be praised,” and this amounts to flattering; and if one says: “He is the person to be censured,” this amounts to humiliation. Hence he avoids both flattery and humiliation; 3) development of internal happiness (ajjhata-sukha) after distinguishing between the two [1254] kinds of happiness; internal happiness derived from tranquillity (samatha) and insight (vipassanā) meditation and external happiness (bahiddha-sukha) derived from the five senses; 4) speaking of any person, either in his presence or in his absence only, if one’s speech is truthful and profitable; 5) speaking or teaching not in haste but smoothly; and 6) not arguing in a foreign land about a foreign language, which may be different from one’s native language.

With regard to being worthy of excellent gifts (dakkhiṇeyya etad-agga), other Arahats were also worthy of receiving excellent gifts, but on receiving food at every house, Ven. Subhūti was aware that: “If I do in this way, special benefits will accrue to the supporters.” Therefore, he first meditated on loving-kindness, then rose from his meditation and received the food. This, therefore, earned him the foremost amongst those worthy of receiving excellent gifts.

In this connection, it should be mentioned that the Captain of the Dhamma, Ven. Sāriputta, did the cleansing of the objects. “Cleansing of the object” means: “Cleansing of one’s own self,” so that one becomes worthy of the gift and the enhancement of its result. In this connection, it may be stated that Ven. Sāriputta, the Captain of the Dhamma, used to purify the object, and by “the object” is meant Ven. Sāriputta’s own self, that was worthy of the gift and that was what enhanced the result of the gift through his engagement in the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti).

Ven. Subhūti, however, purified the act of giving and by “the act of giving” this is meant: When Ven. Subhūti engaged in meditation on loving-kindness, the supporters mentally reacted to his meditation; their hearts became softer and their respect more enthusiastic before they made the offering. Hence the purification of the charitable act and the development of its result took place also through the supporter, as the supporter is led by his mental tenderness and highly developed respect.

Elaboration: When Ven. Sāriputta went on alms round, he stood at the door and engaged in loving-kindness meditation for sometime until the supporter came out bringing the food. Only when the supporter came out did he emerge from his meditation and receive the food. Ven. Subhūti, however, engaged in meditation on loving-kindness and only when the supporter reached him, did he emerge from his meditation and receive the food.<sup>276</sup>

The exposition of the Analysis of Non-Conflict (Araṇa-vibhaṅga-sutta, MN 139) in the commentary may be noticed in particular. Also the sermons with reference to Ven. Subhūti should be noted from the Traditions (Apādāna, Tha-ap 23) and commentary, etc.

14. Ven. Khadiravaniya Revata

Aspiration in the Past

The original name of this great elder was Revata. He was a younger brother of Ven. Sāriputta. As he dwelt in an acacia forest which was uneven and full of stones, he was thus known as Khadiravaniya Revata, “Revata of the acacia forest.” In giving his account only the name Revata will be used for convenience sake.

The great elder Revata was a citizen of Hamsavatī and a virtuous person during the lifetime of the Buddha Padumuttara, 100,000 aeons ago. He was operating a ferry at the port of Payāga, on the river Ganges. Buddha Padumuttara, in the company of 100,000 monks, arrived at Payāga port to cross over the river.

On seeing the Buddha, it occurred to the virtuous Revata thus: “It is impossible for me to see the Buddha always. Now that the Buddha has come, it is a good chance for me to do a meritorious deed.” So he made a huge barge with a white canopy and he hung fragrant flowers on it. On the barge floor were spread exquisite coverings made of fibre of excellent quality. Then he ferried the Buddha and his 100,000 monastics to the other shore on that barge.

At that time, the Buddha declared a certain monk as the foremost forest-dweller (arañṇaka). Seeing this, the boatman thought: “I too should become like this monk in the Dispensation of a Buddha in the future.” So he invited the Buddha, performed a grand alms giving (mahā-dāna) for him and, prostrating at the foot of the Buddha, he expressed his aspiration thus: [1255] “Exalted Buddha, like the monastic whom you have declared the foremost forest-dweller (araññaka), I too wish to become the foremost among those living in a forest in a Buddha’s Dispensation in future.” Seeing that his wish would be fulfilled in the future, the Buddha made the prophecy: “In the future, during Buddha Gotama’s Dispensation, you will become the foremost forest-dweller!” and then he departed.

Ven. Revata’s further good works done during the interval were not mentioned in the Great Commentary (Mahā-aṭṭhakathā).

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

Due to his meritorious deeds, the good boat-man was reborn either in the divine or human worlds and never in any suffering state, and was conceived in the womb of his mother, Rūpasārī, the Brahmin lady, in the Brahmin village called Nālaka, in the country of Magadha. He was younger than the three brothers: Upatissa, Cunda and Upasena, and he had three sisters: Cālā, Upacālā and Sīsūpacālā, and was given the name Revata.

Thereafter, Revata’s parents discussed between themselves and agreed thus: “Our children, wherever they grew up, are taken away and turned into novices by monks, sons of the Buddha. Let us bind him with the fetters of household life while he is still young, before he is made a novice by the monks.”

Herein, after becoming an ascetic himself, Ven. Sāriputta had his three younger sisters: Cālā, Upacālā and Sīsūpacālā and two younger brothers: Cunda and Upasena, ordained. Only Revata, as a boy, was left behind.

Having discussed and agreed upon it, the parents brought a bride from a family of equal birth, wealth, and distinction and made them pay homage to the aged grandmother and they gave their blessings, saying: “Dear daughter, may you live longer than your grandmother here!”

The parents gave such a blessing because they wished for the longevity of the bride. At that time, their grandmother was 120 years of age with white hair, broken teeth, wrinkled skin, her whole body was covered with black moles and her back was extremely bent like a rafter of a decaying house.

Mentally Stirred

On hearing that blessing given by the parents, it occurred to Revata thus: “This girl is young and in the first age of life. Such a youthful appearance of hers, it is implied, will become sinewy and old like that of my grandmother! I shall first ask about the desire of my parents.” Then he asked: “With what in your mind did you say so?” The parents replied: “Dear son, we wish this girl, your spouse, the attainment of longevity like your grandmother. That was why we uttered our blessing.” – “Mother and father!” asked Revata again, as he truly did not understand, “will the youthful look of the girl become old like grandmother’s?” – “What are you talking about, son? Only those who are of great merit, such as your grandmother, enjoy long life.” Thus the parents tried to reason with him.

Revata then reflected: “It is said that such a fair and tender looking girl will decay, and end up resembling my grandmother. She will become white-haired, toothless and have wrinkly skin. What is the use of being infatuated with physical beauty that has the nature of growing old and wrinkled? There is none! I shall follow the footsteps of my older brothers. So he pretended to play games as boys would naturally do, he called friends of his own age, saying: “Come on friends, let us play runners-and-chasers.” The parents prohibited him, saying: “Do not go outside the house on the day of your wedding!” Nevertheless, Revata pretended to play with his friends. When it was his turn to run, he ran only a little and delayed his return by pretending that he had to answer the call of nature. When a second time came for him to run, he ran and came back somewhat faster. On a third time, however, he considered that it was his best chance to run away for good and he ran as fast as he could in the direction he was facing. Arriving at a forest-dwelling of some monks who were observing the dust-robe (pāṃsukūlika) form of asceticism (dhutaṅga) he paid respect to them and asked for the going-forth.

When the monks rejected his request, saying: “Virtuous young man, we do not know [1256] whose son you are. And you come here in full attire and with ornaments as on a special occasion. Who would dare to ordain you as a novice? Nobody would.” Revata raised his two hands, crying: “I am being robbed! I am being robbed!”

Other monks then gathered around him and said: “Virtuous young man, no one is robbing you of your garments or ornaments. But you are crying that you are being robbed! What do you mean by so saying?”

The boy Revata then said: “Venerable sirs, I do not mean that I am being robbed of my garments or ornaments. In fact, I am being robbed of the threefold bliss of Devas, humans and Nibbāna<sup>277</sup> as the going-forth has been denied to me. I am referring to the robbery of the threefold bliss. Let it be so, if you do not want to ordain me. However, do you know my eldest brother?” – “What is the name of your eldest brother?” asked the monks. “My eldest brother’s name was Upatissa while a layman,” replied Revata, “now he bears the name Sāriputta, so they say, venerable sirs.”

Then the monks discussed among themselves: “Friends, in that case, this young man of good family happens to be our younger brother! Our elder brother, Ven. Sāriputta, the Captain of the Dhamma, has formerly left a message with us, saying: “My relatives are all heretics. If somebody comes and says that he is a relative of ours, let him be ordained in any possible manner.” This boy is our brother, Ven. Sāriputta, the Captain of the Dhamma’s very own younger brother, his closest relation. Let us therefore ordain him!” So they gave him the five objects ending with skin (taca-pañcaka) meditation subject and ordained him as a novice. Later on, when he completed 20 years of age, they ordained him as a monastic and made him make effort in meditation.

Having taken the meditation subject, Ven. Revata entered a forest of acacia trees, a rough and uneven place full of stones and pebbles, neither too near nor too far from his preceptors, and engaged in meditation practice. With a determination: “I will not see either the Fortunate One or my elder brother venerables until I attain the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala).”

Revata practised meditation assiduously and while he was so doing, three months elapsed. For a tender man of good family who was the son of a wealthy man the food he ate was so coarse that his mind became perplexed like wrinkled skin, and he could not achieve attainment of the Arahata fruition. But Revata was not discouraged, when the three months were over, he observed the Invitation (Pavāraṇā); he did not move to another place at the end of the Rains Retreat (Vassa) but remained in the same forest and continued to follow the ascetic practices. The more he strove with energy and perseverance, the more his mind became concentrated. When Ven. Revata proceeded to work with insight (vipassanā), and reached the state of an Arahat.

The Buddha's Visit

Even at the time when Ven. Sāriputta learnt the news about the ordination of his younger brother Revata, he said to the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, I have learned that my younger brother Revata has been ordained. He may or may not be happy in this Dispensation of yours. Let me go and see him.” At that time, Ven. Revata was strongly practising insight (vipassanā) meditation and knowing this, the Buddha prohibited his going twice. When the third request came, knowing that Revata had become an Arahat, the Buddha said: “I too shall go along with you, dear son Sāriputta. Inform the monks!”

Having gathered the monks, Ven. Sāriputta told them all this: “Friends, the Buddha is going on a journey. Those who wish to go along, may do so!” Whenever the Buddha travelled, the monks who stayed behind were very few. But those who went, thought: “We shall get a chance to have a continuous look at the golden complexion of the Buddha and also to listen to his sweet sermons!” As expected, the number of those who wished to follow the Buddha was overwhelming. The Buddha therefore left the monastery in a great company of monks with the intention: “I shall see Revata.”

Supernatural Power of Ven. Sīvali

When they were setting out thus, while coming to the juncture [1257] of two roads at one place Ven. Ānanda asked: “Exalted Buddha, here is the juncture of two roads. By which road do you want the Saṅgha to go?” – “Dear son Ānanda, of the two roads which one is straight?” enquired the Buddha. “Exalted Buddha, the straight one, the shortcut, is 30 leagues. It is in the domain of Yakkhas, having scarce food and being rather dangerous. The curved road, the beaten track of the majority, is 60 leagues, safe, with plenty of food,” replied Ven. Ānanda. Then the Buddha asked further whether Ven. Sīvali came along with them, Ven. Ānanda answered in the affirmative. “In that case, Ānanda,” said the Buddha, “let the Saṅgha take the straight road full of danger and with less food. We shall test his supernatural power founded on his past meritorious deeds.”

Having said thus, the Buddha took the dangerous road with food scarcity in the grove. From the time they took the road, Devas had created a large city in advance at every league, as the lodgings for the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha. At every lodging occupied by the monks, Devas in the disguise of workers sent by the king of the city, brought rice-gruel, hard and soft food, etc. and enquired: “Where is Ven. Sīvali? Where is Ven. Sīvali?” Ven. Sīvali had all these offerings collected and went to the Buddha. Together with the monks, the Buddha partook of the food of various kinds offered to Ven. Sīvali by the Devas.

Having the offerings in this way, the Buddha travelled a league each day and covered the difficult journey of 30 leagues in one month, and eventually reached the agreeable dwelling which was prepared in advance by Ven. Revata, in the forest of acacia trees. As he knew beforehand of the Buddha’s visit, Ven. Revata had created in his acacia forest, by his supernatural power, dwellings adequate for the monks headed by the Buddha. For the Buddha, he had made a fragrant chamber, places for day, as well as for night resort, and so on. Then he welcomed the Buddha, who entered the dwelling through a decorated and orderly way. Thereafter, he went into the fragrant chamber. Then only did the remaining monks bed according to their seniority in monkhood. Knowing that it is not a time to partake of food, the Devas offered eight kinds of juice to the monks, and half a month had passed from the arrival of the Buddha.

The Misunderstanding of Restless Monks

At that time, some restless monks sat down together, gossiping among themselves. “The exalted Buddha, the teacher of Devas and humans, came to see the one whom he refers to as a younger brother of the chief disciple, but who spends his time doing odd jobs. What are the Jetavana, Veḷuvana and other monasteries near Revata’s dwelling for? This monk Revata is only a chore man busying himself with unimportant things. What kind of ascetic practice does such a busy man follow? Of course, it is nothing.”

Then the Buddha considered: “If I stay here long, the place will be crowded with visitors of the four kinds. Forest-dwellers want to be in quietude, if I remain too long, uneasiness will occur for Revata.” So he went to Ven. Revata’s day-resort. Ven. Revata saw the Buddha coming from a distance where he was sitting alone on a stone slab and leaning against a wooden board at the end of the walk. Then he welcomed the Buddha and made obeisance to him respectfully.

The Buddha asked: “Dear son Revata, this is a place inhabited by wild animals, such as lions, leopards, and tigers. What do you do when you hear the sounds of wild elephants, wild horses, etc?” – “Exalted Buddha,” answered Revata, “to me the sounds of wild elephants, wild horses, etc. repeatedly bring delight in the forest (arañña-rati).” The Buddha taught Revata a discourse on the benefits of forest-dwelling in 500 verses. Next day, he went on alms round in the nearby area, without returning to Revata’s dwelling in the forest of acacia trees. The Buddha let Ven. Revata go back; besides, he managed his supernatural power in such a way that the restless monks, who had spoken ill of Revata, forgetfully left behind their staffs, footwear, bottles of ointment and umbrellas.

These restless monks went back to Revata’s dwelling to get back their belongings. Though they took the route by which they came, they could not remember the place. In [1258] fact, the monk on the previous days travelled by the decorated road created miraculously, and on the day of their return journey they had to take the naturally uneven road and could not help taking rest here and there as they were so weary.

At some places, they were compelled to walk on their knees. With such trouble and difficulty, they were bound to tread on small plants, bushes and thorns. When they reached a place which resembled their residence, they saw their umbrellas, footwear, ointment bottles and staffs, some hanging and others standing by acacia stumps. Then only did the restless monks realise that the monk Revata is a man of supernatural power indeed! Getting back their paraphernalia, they talked among themselves in great astonishment before they travelled to Sāvattthī: “Oh, what a wonder is the honour done to the Buddha.”

The monastic supporter, lady Visākhā, invited the monks, who arrived ahead in Sāvattthī, as they went ahead of others, and when they were seated, she asked them: “Venerable sirs, is Ven. Revata’s residence pleasant?” The monks replied: “Yes, dear supporter, Ven. Revata’s residence is pleasant and delightful. It is exactly like the celestial gardens of Nandana and Cittalatā.”

Later on, she asked the restless monks who were late-comers: “Venerable sirs, is Ven. Revata’s residence pleasant?” The reply given by these monks was: “Do not ask us, dear lady supporter. The residence of Revata is not worth talking about.

Apart from being a barren high ground, his place is a great acacia forest with an extremely uneven surface full of pebbles, stone slabs and rocks. There Revata lives miserably.” Thus they recounted their experiences that they had very recently.

Noticing the difference between the two answers; one given by the earlier group monks and the other by the latter, and wanting to know clearly which answer was right, she paid a visit to the Buddha, bringing with her unguent and flowers. Having sat down in a suitable place, she asked the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, some monks praise Ven. Revata’s residence while others ill-speak of it. Why are the two speeches different from each other, exalted Buddha?” Then the Buddha said: “Visākhā, a place in which the minds of the noble ones take delight is pleasant, whether it is pleasant or unpleasant in worldly terms.” Then the Buddha uttered the following verse (Dhp 98):

*Gāme vā yadi vāraññe, ninne vā yadi vā thale;
yattha Arahanto viharanti, tam bhumi-rāmaṇeyyakam.*

Visākhā, supporter of Pubbārāma and mother of Migāra! Whether it is a village that is thickly surrounded by the five worldly pleasures, or a forest away from these pleasures, or a low valley, watered by streams and green with dwelling at ease, in harmony with the four physical postures, the dwelling site of noble Arahats is truly a delightful place on the surface of the earth.

Foremost Title Achieved

At a later time, in an assembly of monks, the Buddha declared Ven. Revata the foremost (etad-agga) in forest dwelling, by praising him as follows:

*Etad-aggaṃ bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ
ārañṇakānaṃ yad-idaṃ Revato Khadiravaniyo*

Monks, among my disciples who dwell in forests, Revata of the Acacia Forest is the foremost!

Herein, though other venerables dwelt in the forest, they did so only after studying the suitability of the place, the suitability of the water and the suitability of the village as an alms resort. But Ven. Revata ignored these conditions and dwelt in an acacia grove on a barren high ground with an uneven surface, full of pebbles, stone slabs and rocks. Hence it was he alone who was foremost in the practice of forest-dwelling. [1259]

The discourses connected with Ven. Revata Khadiravaniya may be taken from the Verses of the Elder Monks (Thera-gāthā, Thag 14.1), the Traditions (Apādāna, Tha-ap 11), the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, Dhp 98) and their commentaries, etc.

15. Ven. Kaṅkhā Revata

Aspiration in the Past

100,000 aeons ago, during the lifetime of Buddha Padumuttara, the future Kaṅkhā Revata went to the monastery along with many other people, like those virtuous future great disciples of old times. And while standing at the edge of the audience and listening to a discourse, he saw the Buddha declaring a certain monk the foremost (etad-agga) among meditators. Thinking: “I too should become like this monk,” he invited the Buddha for alms giving on a grand scale (mahā-dāna) for seven days. At the end of the discourse on the last day, in the wake of former aspirants, he made the aspiration: “Exalted Buddha, I do not wish for any other forms of bliss as a result of this wholesome meritorious (adhikāra) act but to be the foremost (etad-agga) among those engaged in meditation in the Dispensation of a Buddha in the future, like the monastic whom you declared such seven days ago.”

When Buddha Padumattara surveyed the future, he saw that the man of good family’s wish would be fulfilled and so he predicted before his departure: “At the end of 100,000 aeons, there will appear the Buddha Gotama. In the Dispensation of that Buddha, you will become the foremost (etad-agga) among the monks engaged in meditation!”

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

Due to his deeds of merit throughout his life, the man of good family was reborn either in the worlds of Devas or humans and, in the lifetime of our Buddha, he was reborn in the family of a wealthy household in Sāvattthī and was named Revata. One afternoon the rich man’s son, Revata, went along with other people to Jetavana. While standing at the edge of the gathering and listening to the Buddha’s discourse, confidence arose in him and he was ordained as a monastic fulfilling the monastic duties. After taking a meditation subject from the Buddha, while preparing himself for mental concentration, he became a man of mundane absorption (jhāna). Using those absorptions (jhāna) as a base, he engaged in insight (vipassanā) meditation and became an Arahat.

Foremost Title Achieved

Ven. Revata was able to absorb most forms of meditation which the Buddha engaged in during day and night. Thereafter, in the meeting of monks, the Buddha declared Ven. Kaṅkhā Revata the foremost (etad-aggā) in meditation, praising him:

jhāyīnaṃ yad-idaṃ Kaṅkhā-revato.*

Monks, among my disciples who habitually engage in meditation, Kaṅkhā Revata is the foremost.

Account of the Name Kaṅkhā Revata

Once, the Buddha was travelling from Sāvattihī to Rājagaha and on the way Ven. Revata entered a hut in which molasses were made. Seeing that the molasses were mixed with dough and bran as part of the process, which was necessary to solidify the molasses, he became doubtful as to the permissibility of the solidified molasses which had the two other ingredients, for the latter two were raw food (āmisa). Saying: “The molasses with the raw ingredients is improper as it contains dough and bran, which are raw. It is against the Discipline, it is unlawful to enjoy such molasses in the afternoon.” As such, he and his followers did not take the molasses that had been made thus into lumps.

Neither did the monastics who believed Ven. Revata’s word and practised according to it. Other monastics reported the matter to the Buddha who asked: “Monks, why did people [1260] put dough and bran into the molasses?” – “To harden it, exalted Buddha,” answered the monks. “Monks, if dough and bran are put into the molasses in order to harden it, then the dough and the bran put into the molasses are only to be held as molasses. Monks, I allow you to take molasses, whenever you like,” and the Buddha promulgated a rule (anuññāta-sikkhāpada).

On the journey, Revata saw mung beans (mugga) sprouting in some human faeces and said: “Mung beans are unsuitable for consumption, for cooked beans can sprout too.” Thus, he doubted and, along with his followers, he did not take mung beans. The monastics, who trusted him, avoid eating those beans too. The matter was reported to the Buddha who laid down another rule allowing the eating of such beans whenever one desired. These accounts are given in the Chapter about Medicines (Bhesajjakkhandhaka, Vin Mv 6). In this way, Revata doubted even things that were permitted. Because he had great doubt as far as the Vinaya was concerned, he was known as Kaṅkhā Revata, Revata the Doubter.

The doctrines with reference to Kaṅkhā Revata may be taken from the Traditions (Apādāna, Tha-ap 544) and commentary, the Verses of the Elder Monks (Thera-gāthā, Thag 1.3) and its commentary, the Exalted Utterances (Udāna, Ud 5.7) and its commentary, etc.

16. Ven. Soṇa Koḷivisa

Aspiration in the Past

The virtuous man, who was to become Soṇa Koḷivisa, during the lifetime of Buddha Padumuttara, was reborn in the family of merchants in a remote past and was named Sirivaḍḍha. When Sirivaḍḍha came of age, as in the manner of former aspirant great disciples, he went to the monastery and listened to the Buddha’s teaching, standing at the edge of the audience. Seeing the Buddha declaring a monk the foremost (etad-aggā) among those putting forth strenuous effort (āradḍha-viriya), he was inspired, saying to himself: “I too should become like this monk in the future!” When the teaching was over, he invited the Buddha and performed a great alms giving (mahā-dāna) for a week. Thereafter, he made known to the Buddha his aspiration. Foreseeing the fulfilment of Sirivaḍḍha’s wish, the Buddha predicted as before and then left for the monastery.

Life as a Clansman of Bārāṇasī

Due to his meritorious deeds, Sirivaḍḍha was reborn only in the realm of Devas or that of humans. When 100,000 aeons had elapsed, and Buddha Kassapa had attained Parinibbāna in this Fortunate Aeon (Bhadda-kappa) and before our Buddha appeared, Sirivaḍḍha was reborn as a man of good family in a virtuous family. One day, while the man of good family was enjoying a water-sport with his friends in the river Ganges, a Paccekabuddha appeared.

The Paccekabuddha, wearing an old robe, was thinking: “I shall spend the Rains Retreat (Vassa) with Bārāṇasī as the food-resort, after building a dwelling on the bank of the river Ganges.” Therefore he went to collect sticks and cane stalks that were brought by the river-currents. Thereupon, Sirivaḍḍha with his friends went to the Paccekabuddha, paid homage to him and while standing asked: “What are you doing, venerable sir?” – “Dear young man,” replied the Paccekabuddha, “as the Rains Retreat (Vassa) is drawing near, a dwelling is required for a monk.”

Sirivaḍḍha then said: “Venerable sir, please wait a day by all means. Tomorrow we shall build a dwelling and offer it to you.” Saying to himself: “I should grant my favour to this virtuous man of good family,” which was the main purpose of his visit, the Paccekabuddha accepted his offer. Knowing the Paccekabuddha’s acceptance, Sirivaḍḍha returned home. The next day, he prepared all kinds of offerings and waited, while standing, for the coming of the Paccekabuddha. The latter thinking about where he should collect food came to know of Sirivaḍḍha’s idea and went to the gate of his house.

On seeing the Paccekabuddha’s coming, Sirivaḍḍha was very pleased and took the alms bowl and offered food in it. He supplicated him, saying: “Please come to the gate of my house for food for the three months of this Rains Retreat (Vassa).” Getting the promise, and after the Paccekabuddha had left, he completed the construction of the dwelling with his friends [1261] with a walk-way, both day and night resorts for the Paccekabuddha and offered them to him.

What was peculiar about Sirivaḍḍha was this: When the Paccekabuddha entered the dwelling, Sirivaḍḍha, with the idea not to let the former’s feet touch the mud on the ground, smeared the ground with wet cowdung and then spread over it his red cloak, which he had put on and which was valued at 100,000 pieces of money. On seeing the colour of the red cloak and that of the Paccekabuddha’s body were one and the same, he was very pleased, so he said: “Just as my cloak has become more beautiful since you stepped on it, even so may the colour of my hands and feet be red and beautiful like the colour of Hibiscus flowers! May the touch of my body be like the cotton wool that has been dressed 100 times!”

Sirivaḍḍha served the Paccekabuddha for the three months of the Rains Retreat (Vassa). When the Paccekabuddha held the Invitation (Pavāraṇā) ceremony at the end of the Rains Retreat (Vassa), he offered him a set of three robes. Equipped completely with bowl and robes, the Paccekabuddha returned to Mount Gandhamādana.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

Without being reborn in the four suffering states, Sirivaḍḍha was reborn in the realms of Devas or humans, and was finally conceived in the house of the merchant Usabha, in the city of Kāḷacampā, during the lifetime of our Buddha. Since the time of his conception, thousands of gifts had come to the merchant's house. On the day of his birth too, the whole of Kāḷacampā city was overwhelmed by gifts and offerings too. On his naming day, the two parents said: "Our son has brought his own name. His complexion is like something bathed in the liquid of red gold," and they called him Soṇakumāra or Soṇa, the merchant's son. But as he belonged to the clan of Koḷivisa, he was better known as Soṇa Koḷivisa. Then 60 nurses were appointed for him, and he was brought up blissfully like a celestial being.

Food Prepared for Soṇa

The following was the way food for Soṇa was prepared: First, the field, extending to 105 royal acres was ploughed and the finest rice (sāli) paddy was grown watering it with cow-milk, scented water and ordinary water.

Into the drain in the field, cow milk and scented water were poured from a large number of jars. When the stalks had absorbed the milk, in order to protect them against the danger of being eaten by birds and insects, and in order to make the crops tender, posts were erected in the field, leaving space between one pole and another. On the poles were rafters, which were covered by mats. Screens were then erected for shelter and guards were placed at the corners.

When the crops ripened, granaries were renovated by smearing them with four kinds of unguent: saffron, cloves, rhododendron and turmeric powder. The air was laden with fragrance by applying precious unguent above the previous kind. Then only did farm workers go down to the farms and collect the crops carefully, tying it with strings and drying it. A layer of unguent was spread on the floor of the granaries; the dried bundles of stems were spread on the layer of unguents. In this way, the layers of unguent and the layers of crops were made alternately until the granaries became full. The doors were then closed and the crops kept for three years.

On completion of three years, the doors of the granaries were opened. The whole city of Campā was then diffused by the fragrance. When the best rice (sāli) paddy was pounded, drunkards rushed to buy the paddy husks and bran. The broken rice was, however, taken by the servants and workers. Only whole grains were collected for Soṇa.

The way of cooking rice was as follows: Whole grains were put in the washing-basket made of gold threads, and then, after filtering 100 times, the rice was immersed in the boiling water and, without letting it remain long, it was taken out. As the rice was cooked as [1262] soon as it was taken out from the water the cooked rice resembled jasmine flowers.

The rice was then put in a gold bowl which was then put on a silver cup which was full of boiled sweet rice-milk, free of water and boiled thoroughly so that the cooked rice remained hot. The food was then placed before Soṇa.

Soṇa Koḷivisa ate the best rice (sāli) food moderately. He washed his mouth and hands and feet with scented water. He was then given quids of betel of all kinds and other things to make his mouth smell sweet.

Wherever he went, fine and exquisite carpets were spread out. The palms of his hands and the soles of his feet were red like the colour of Hibiscus. His touch was very soft like that of the cotton wool that has been combed 100 times. The soles were covered with soft hair having the colour of the lotus threads in a spiral shape and existing in a ruby ear-plug. Whenever he was angry with somebody, he would threaten, saying: “You think about it carefully! Or I shall put my feet down on the ground.” On coming of age, three palaces were built for him, as in the case of Yasa the merchant’s son, each for a particular season. His parents also made him enjoy the entertainment of female dancers. Taking pleasure in great luxury, the wealthy son was blissfully living a Deva-like life.

At that time, our Buddha had attained Awakening and had taught the Discourse setting the Dhamma Wheel Turning (Dhamma-cakkappavattana-sutta, SN 56.11) and was staying with Rājagaha as his resort for alms food. Meanwhile, the righteous King Bimbisāra summoned Soṇa and sent him, in the company of 80,000 village-headmen, to the Buddha. Having listened to the Buddha's discourse, and developing immense faith, Soṇa asked the Buddha for ordination.

The Buddha then asked him as to whether he had obtained his parent's permission. When the answer was negative, the Buddha advised him saying: "Dear son Soṇa, Buddhas do not ordain those who do not have the permission of their parents." – "Very well, exalted Buddha," said Soṇa and in obedience he went back to his parents and obtained their permission before he approached the Buddha again. Under the instruction of the Buddha, he was ordained by a monastic.

This is a brief account. A detailed account may be read in the Chapter about Skins (Cammakkhandhaka, Vin Mv 5).

While living in Rājagaha, after gaining monkhood, his relatives and friends adoringly made offerings in his honour. They spoke in praise of his handsome personality, and so it occurred to Soṇa: "Many people come to me. If they keep on coming to me, how will I engage in tranquillity and insight meditation? I will not be able to do so any longer. What if, after hearing a meditation discourse from the Buddha, I go to the cemetery at the Sītavana and put effort into practising asceticism! People will not go there for they abhor the cemetery. Then will my ascetic performance reach its apex, which is to become an Arahāt." Accordingly, after listening to a meditation discourse from the Buddha, he went to Sītavana where he was inspired to begin his ascetic engagement.

Strenuous Engagement

"My body is so tender," thought Ven. Soṇa, "I am not in a position to attain the bliss of the paths and the fruitions easily. Therefore, I should apply energy working strenuously." So thinking, he did his meditation by indulging only in the two postures of standing and walking, and rejecting entirely the other two postures of lying down and sitting. Then callouses appeared at the edges of his very soft soles of his feet and the whole terraced walk became deep red as the callouses burst and bled. When he was unable to walk, he practised by crawling on his elbows and knees which also were cut and the entire walk became doubly red.

In spite of such strenuous effort, he could not see any sign of positive result of his meditation. As a result, he conceived the following idea: "If somebody else were to put in strenuous effort, he too would do like me but not more than what I have done. Despite my effort, I was unable to make the paths and the fruitions. Perhaps I am not one who attains path and fruit after hearing the gist of a discourse on the Dhamma (ugghaṭitaññū), one who realizes path and fruit after hearing an explanation of the Dhamma (vipañcitaññū) or even one who gradually comes to comprehend the truth after getting further elaboration and guidance (neyya). Perhaps, I am one who will make no spiritual progress in spite of my effort either in the forest or the village monastery (pada-parama). As such, what is the use of being a monk? There's probably none. I shall revert to lay life. I shall enjoy worldly pleasures and while doing so, I shall do good works." [1263]

The Parable of a Harp

Knowing Ven. Soṇa's thought, the Buddha went in the evening in the company of the monastics to Soṇa's dwelling, and on seeing the walkway was red he asked: "Monks whose walkway is this that is red like a slaughter house?" The Buddha knew the answer but he asked with an intention of delivering a discourse. The monastics replied: "Exalted Buddha, the soles of Ven. Soṇa, who had put so much effort into his practice of walking meditation, must have been injured. The walkway that is now deep red like a slaughterhouse belongs to that monastic, Soṇa." The Buddha proceeded to Ven. Soṇa's meditation place and sat down on the seat made ready.

Ven. Soṇa came and made obeisance to the Buddha and took his seat at a suitable distance. When the Buddha asked him whether it was true that he had conceived the idea of returning to lay life, Ven. Soṇa admitted that it was true. Thereafter, the Buddha gave a discourse on the parable of a harp (vīnovāda), explaining that the harp's strings should be set neither too loose nor too tight.

Buddha: Dear son, what do you think of the question that I am now going to ask? You may answer as you like. You are clever, are you not, in playing a harp formerly while a layman?

Ven. Soṇa: Yes, exalted Buddha.

Herein, when Ven. Soṇa was young, his parents thought: "If Soṇa, would learn any other form of art, he would be weary. But playing a harp is something that can be learnt while sitting comfortably in a seat." So they made him learn to play the harp and he became an accomplished harpist.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1905

The Buddha knew: “Other forms of meditation would not benefit this monk Soṇa. While a layman, he was accomplished in the harp. He will quickly gain spiritual knowledge, if I teach him with reference to that art.”

Buddha: Dear son Soṇa, what do you think of the question I am now going to ask? Suppose your harp-strings are too tight, will your harp make a pleasant sound? Will it last long?

Ven. Soṇa: Exalted Buddha, it is impossible. It will neither make a pleasant sound nor will it last long.

Buddha: Dear son Soṇa, what do you think of the question I am now going to ask? Suppose the strings are too loose, will your harp make a pleasant sound? Will it last long?

Ven. Soṇa: It is impossible, exalted Buddha. It will neither make a pleasant sound nor will it last long.

Buddha: Dear son Soṇa, how do you think of the question I am now going to ask? Suppose the strings are neither too tight nor too loose but set in perfect balance, will your harp make a pleasant sound? Will it last long?

Ven. Soṇa: It is possible, exalted Buddha, that the harp will make a pleasant sound and it will last long.

Buddha: In the same way, dear son Soṇa, if the effort put forth is too much it causes restlessness (uddhacca), because excess energy brings about restlessness. If the effort put forth is too little it causes indolence (kosajja), because inadequate energy brings about indolence. Therefore, dear son Soṇa, set up energy (virīya) and concentration (samādhi) in equal amounts, and try to keep the balance of your energy and concentration. Know that your faculties such as faith (saddhā), energy (virīya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā) be in equal degree. Make the five faculties of equal proportion. When they are well balanced, try to have signs of tranquillity, etc. [1264]

Ven. Soṇa: Very well, exalted Buddha.

Having admonished Ven. Soṇa by setting the art of the harp as an example and having taught him the meditation practice involving the perfect balance of energy and concentration, the Buddha returned to the monastery on the Gijjhakūṭa hill.

Foremost Title Achieved

Considering in retrospect, the way of Ven. Soṇa Koḷivisa's meditation practice, the fact manifests itself that while others' energy had to be increased as it was deficient, his was to be decreased as it was too much. Therefore, at a later time, the Buddha praised him and declared him the foremost (etad-aggā) in having strenuous energy (āradḍha-viriya):

āradḍha-viriyaṇaṃ yad-idaṃ Soṇa Koḷiviso.*

Monks, among my disciples who possessed strenuous energy, Soṇa of the Koḷivisa clan is the foremost.

17. Ven. Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa

Aspiration in the Past

The virtuous man, the future Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa, during the lifetime of the Buddha Padumuttara, also went along with people to the monastery in the aforesaid manner. While standing at the edge of the audience and listening to the Buddha's discourse, he saw a monk being declared the foremost (etad-aggā) among those who taught in a sweet voice. Soṇa then thought: "I, too, should become the foremost among those who teach in sweet voice in the Dispensation of a Future Buddha." So he invited the Buddha and performed a great alms giving (mahā-dāna) for seven days and at the end of which, he said: "Exalted Buddha, seven days ago you declared a monk as the foremost (etad-aggā) among those who teach in a sweet voice (kalyāṇa-vākkaraṇa), I too wish to be like that monk in the Dispensation of a Future Buddha as a result of this act of merit of mine." Seeing that the man's wish would be fulfilled without any hitch, the Buddha predicted: "Later, in the Dispensation of Buddha Gotama, your wish will be fulfilled." After saying this, the Buddha departed.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

Having performed meritorious deeds until his death, Soṇa was reborn only in the worlds of Devas and humans, without any rebirth in the four suffering states, and finally took conception in the womb of a devotee, named Kālī, the wife of a merchant, in the town of Kuraraghara, in the country of Avanti, before the appearance of our Buddha. When the pregnancy was in an advanced stage, Kālī went back to her parents in Rājagaha.

At that time, our Buddha had attained omniscient Buddhahood and had taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) in the Deer Park at Isipatana. The date then was the full moon day of July (Āsāḷha) 528 BCE. On the occasion of the teaching of the discourse, Devas and Brahmas from the 100,000 world-element gathered together in the Deer Park. Present at the gathering were 28 Yakkha generals who were listening to the Buddha's discourse, and one of them was Sātāgiri.

A detailed account of the two Yakkha generals may be found in chapter 10. The account given there is based on the commentary on the Discourse concerning Hemavata (Hemavata-sutta, Snp 9). According to that exposition, while Sātāgiri was listening to the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, he remembered his friend Hemavata. He, therefore, was inattentive and failed to realize the paths and fruitions. Only when [1265] he returned with Hemavata to listen to the discourse, did both of them eventually become noble Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna).

The story that is based on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya) commentary begins from his attainment of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti). Thereafter, he went to fetch Hemavata and met him on the way in the sky above the house of Kālī of Kuraraghara, near Rājagaha, who was the daughter of a merchant. On meeting with Hemavata, he was asked by the latter about the physical conduct (kaya-samācāra), livelihood (ājīva) and mental practices (mano-samācāra) of the Buddha, and he answered each and every question. In this way, when the questions and answers on the Buddha's virtues and attributes contained in the Discourse concerning Hemavata came to an end, Hemavata reflected on his friend's pious words step by step and became established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). The difference of the two accounts is due to the different reciters (bhāṇaka).

Not seeing his friend Hemavata on the occasion of the Buddha's teaching of the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, Sātāgiri went to look for him and met him on the way, in the sky above Kālī's house. And the questions and answers on the Buddha's physical conduct (kaya-samācāra), livelihood (ājīva) and mental practices (mano-samācāra) took place.

While Sātāgiri was talking about the Dhamma in his explanation of the Buddha's conduct, Kālī overheard all and began to have faith in the Buddha without having personally seen him and became established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala), just as somebody who has enjoyed the meal prepared and meant for another person. She was the first noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) and female lay devotee among women and the eldest sister to them all.

Having become a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna), Kālī gave birth to a son that very night. The son was given the name Soṇa. After living with her parents for as long as she wanted, Kālī returned to Kuraraghara. Since the son was one wearing earrings worth 10 million, he was also known as Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa.

Soṇa's Spiritual Urgency

At that time, Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana was staying in the hill known as Papāta,<sup>278</sup> depending upon Kuraraghara as his alms resort. The lay devotee, Kālī, was serving Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana who constantly visited her house. Her son, Soṇa, was also around Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana constantly and became friendly with him.

Whenever he had an opportunity, Soṇa would go to Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana to wait upon him. Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana also continuously taught him the Dhamma in return. The boy, therefore, felt a good deal of spiritual urgency (samvega) and became ardent in practising the Dhamma. At one time, he travelled with a caravan to Ujjenī for commercial purposes and while camping at night he became afraid to stay with the crowd. So, he went to another place and slept. The caravan moved on in the morning without him, as nobody remembered to wake him up before they proceeded.

When Soṇa awoke and didn't see anyone, he hurried to follow the caravan along the caravan road and reached a banyan tree. At the tree, he saw a male ghost (peta), who was disgusting, ugly and big-bodied, picking up and eating pieces of his own flesh that were falling off from his bones. So Soṇa asked him what he was and the ghost answered, giving his identity. Soṇa asked again why he was eating his own flesh, and he answered that he was doing so because of his past deeds (kamma). Soṇa then asked him to explain and his explanation was as follows: “Master, in the past, I was a wicked merchant of Bhārukaccha, earning my living by deceiving others. Besides, I abused monks who came for alms and said to them: ‘Eat your own flesh!’ As a result of these evil deeds, I am now undergoing the kinds of suffering you are now witnessing.” On hearing the incident, Soṇa was shaken a great deal.

Thenceforth, he continued his journey and came across two ghost (peta) boys, from whose mouth black blood was trickling. So he asked about them, as he had done before. To Soṇa, the young ghosts then related their evil deed done in the past: As humans they traded in perfumes to earn their living as youngsters, and while doing so, their mother invited and offered meals to certain Arahats. On coming home, they abused and cursed her: “Mother, [1266] why did you give our things to the monks? May bubbles of black blood ooze from the mouths of those who consumed the food given by our mother!” On account of their evil deed, they suffered in hell and as a residual result of that very evil deed they were reborn in the world of ghosts (peta), suffering in that manner when they were encountered by Soṇa. On hearing their story too, Soṇa was very shaken. In fact, the effect was even greater than on the previous occasion.

The stories of his spiritual urgency (saṃvega) are told in the Exalted Utterances (Udāna) commentary and the Vinaya sub-commentary the Light on the Essence of Meaning (Sārattha-dīpanī).

Soṇa arrived in Ujjenī and returned to Kuraraghara after going about his business. He then approached Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana and told him what he had seen. Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana gave Soṇa a religious talk on the disadvantages of birth in the cycles of Saṃsāra and its round of suffering, as well as on the advantages of not becoming, and the discontinuation of birth in these cycles of Saṃsāra and its round of suffering. Having paid his respects to Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana, Soṇa went home. He had his evening meal, and fell asleep for a while. Later, he woke up and began to reflect on the discourse given earlier by Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana. This reflection and his recollection of the states of the ghosts (peta) whom he had met made him feel a great fear of Saṃsāra and its suffering cycles. Thus, he was very much inclined to become a monastic.

At daybreak, he washed himself and went to Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana and reported to him what he thought: “Venerable sir, when I reflected in various ways on the discourse you gave, I found that it was not easy to undertake this noble threefold training, which resembles a newly polished conch shell, perfect and pure in the lay life.” He went on: “I would like to shave my hair and beard, put on the dyed robe and leave the lay life, to enter the monastic life.” Having thus spoken of his wish to become a monastic, he made a request: “Therefore, sir, I would like you to ordain me.”

Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana then investigated mentally whether Soṇa’s wisdom was ripe or not, and he came to know that it was not. Wishing to wait for the time when Soṇa’s wisdom would ripen, Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana said: “It is difficult, Soṇa, to take up for life the noble practice of sleeping alone and eating alone. Therefore, Soṇa, what I would like to ask you to do is this: practise first occasionally, while still a layman, the noble practice of solitary sleeping and solitary eating, as on Observance Days (Uposatha), etc. which is taught by the exalted Buddha.”

Then Soṇa’s eagerness to become a monastic subsided as his faculties were not mature yet and his consciousness of spiritual urgency (saṁvega) was not serious enough. Though his eagerness had subsided, he was not careless, but remained in the presence of Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana and constantly approached him to listen to his Dhamma teaching. As time went by, he became inclined for a second time to become a monastic, so he renewed his request. This time also Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana gave him the same advice.

When Soṇa requested for a third time, Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana knew it was time to ordain him because of the maturity of his wisdom, but Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana could only ordain him as a novice (sāmaṇera). Though he wanted to ordain Soṇa as a monastic (bhikkhu), such ordination could not take place because only two or three monastics lived in Kuraraghara and at that time ten were needed for the higher ordination. Although there were many in the Middle Country, those monastics were living very far and separately, one in a village or two in a market town. From there, Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana brought two or three monastics for Soṇa, his co-resident pupil. But while he was away trying to bring more monastics, the previous ones would leave for another place to attend to other matters. After waiting for some time for their return, he went out to bring back those who had left but the others who remained there, departed on some other matters.

As he had to repeat his attempt to organise the ordination in this way, it took him more than three years to get a group of ten monks together, which was needed to perform a higher ordination (upasampadā). Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana was staying alone then. It was only after three long and troublesome years that Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana managed to get the required number of monks to give his pupil, Soṇa, higher ordination.<sup>279</sup>

Having received ordination, Ven. Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa learnt and took a meditation subject, and when he assiduously engaged in insight (vipassanā) meditation, he became an Arahat even during that Rains Retreat (Vassa) and he studied the collection of teachings known as the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta) under Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana. After [1267] performing the Invitation (Pavāraṇā) at the end of Rains Retreat (Vassa), he wanted to pay homage to the Buddha and he asked his preceptor, Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana, for permission to do so.

His request in detail may be seen in the Story about Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa (Soṇa-kuṭikaṇṇa-vatthu, Vin Mv 5).

The preceptor Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana then said: “Soṇa, when you arrive there, the Buddha will let you stay in his Perfumed Chamber and ask you to give a discourse. Accordingly, you are bound to do that. Being pleased with your discourse, the Buddha will give you a reward. Take such and such a reward. Please pay homage to the exalted Buddha in my name!” Saying thus, Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana gave his permission whole-heartedly.

Having obtained his preceptor’s permission, Ven. Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa went to the residence of his mother, Kālī, the wife of a merchant, and told her of his plan. His mother consented and made a request: “Very well, dear son! When you go to meet the Buddha, please take this rug along as my donation, and spread it on the ground in the Perfumed Chamber!” With these words the mother handed him a rug.

Taking the rug with him, Ven. Soṇa packed his bedding and set out for Jetavana, Sāvathī. The Buddha was then seated on the Dhamma throne, a seat meant for the Buddha. Ven. Soṇa stood at a suitable distance and paid his respects to the Buddha. Having exchanged words of greeting with Ven. Soṇa, the Buddha emphatically asked Ven. Ānanda: “Arrange lodging for this monastic, dear son Ānanda!”

Herein, if the Buddha wished to stay with a visiting monastic in the same Perfumed Chamber, he would specially ask to provide lodging for him. But for a visitor with whom he has no reason for staying together, he would say nothing. For such a person, Ven. Ānanda or somebody else on duty would make an accommodation at another suitable place.

Knowing the wish of the Buddha, Ven. Ānanda provided accommodation for Ven. Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa in the Perfumed Chamber.

The Buddha spent time in absorption (jhāna) for several hours of the night and then he entered the Perfumed Chamber. Ven. Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa too spent a long time sitting in absorption during the night and then he too entered the Perfumed Chamber. Wishing to talk with Ven. Soṇa about engaging in absorption, the Buddha let the time pass by sitting and attaining all the absorptions that were common to disciples, in the open space. Having done so, he washed his feet and went into the dwelling. Sensing the wish of the master, Ven. Soṇa followed, after engaging in the absorption befitting the hours he had in the open space.

Having entered into the Perfumed Chamber, as permitted by the Buddha, he made a robe-screen and sat at the feet of the Buddha. In the last watch of the night, having lain down on the right side, which is lying like a lion (sīha-seyya), with mindfulness, the Buddha rose when it was near daybreak. He then sat down and thinking that Soṇa’s physical weariness must have subsided by this time, he asked him: “Dear son Soṇa, recite something for me!” Ven. Soṇa recited the sixteen discourses beginning with the Discourse about Sense Desires (Kāma-sutta, Snp 4.1), all of which formed the section known as the Section of the Eights (Aṭṭhaka-vagga) of the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta) in a very sweet voice without making any errors, not even in a single letter.

When the recitation had ended, the Buddha gave him a blessing and asked: “Dear son Soṇa, all sixteen discourses of the Section of the Eights you have learned wonderfully, you have got them well by heart! And as they contained correct articulation they have a pleasant sound. They are clean, flawless, full of words leading to understanding and meaning that is free from any impairment. Dear son Soṇa, how long have you been a monastic?” – “Just one Rains Retreat, exalted Buddha,” answered Ven. Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa.

Again the Buddha asked: “Dear son Soṇa, why did your monastic life start so late?” – “Exalted Buddha,” replied Ven. Soṇa, “I have long seen the disadvantages of sensual pleasures. But household life is so narrow, full of duties and things to attend to. Knowing that the mind of one who has seen the defects of sensual pleasures as they really are, I remained in the household life for a long time, but like drops of water falling from the [1268] lotus leaf, defiled thoughts finally slipped away from my heart.” So the Buddha uttered a solemn utterance as follows (Ud 5.6):

Disvā ādīnavam loke, ñatvā Dhammam nirūpadhim, ariyo na ramatī pāpe, pāpe na ramatī suci.

Because he has clearly seen through the eye of insight (vipassanā) the defects of impermanence, suffering and changeability everywhere in the world of formations (sāṅkhāra) and also because he has penetrated through the fourfold path wisdom, Nibbāna, which is the cessation of the fourfold substratum of existence (upadhi), the noble one, who is free from defilements, does not take pleasure in evil deeds.

Why? Because for such a swan-like individual whose deeds, physical, vocal and mental are pure, there is no precedent that such a person should find happiness in the aggregate of dirty, unwholesome things that resemble a place full of excrement.

Ven. Soṇa Kuṭṭikaṇṇa then thought: “The Fortunate One gave a joyous reply to me. Now is the time for me to transmit what my teacher has asked.” So thinking, he adjusted his upper robe on his left shoulder and bowed his head at the feet of the master, saying: “Fortunate One, my preceptor, Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana makes obeisance to you with his head, and he asks as follows:

1. “Exalted Buddha, the southern region of the country of Avanti has few monastics. My disciple Soṇa acquired the monastic life only after having ten monastics gathered from various places with great difficulty, which took me three years. I wonder if you, exalted Buddha, would allow higher ordination performed by less than ten monastics in that region.
2. Exalted Buddha, in the southern region of Avanti, the uneven ground rising from its surface, resembles the black hoof-print of a cow, it is so rough. I wonder if you, exalted Buddha, would allow sandals with layers of sole in that region.

3. Exalted Buddha, the people in the southern region of Avanti are fond of bathing. They regard water as a cleansing factor. I wonder if you, exalted Buddha, would allow a daily bath.
4. Exalted Buddha, in the region of Avanti, sheep-skin, goat-skin and deer-skin are used as spreads. Just as, Fortunate One, in the Middle Country (Majjhima-desa), mats made of various kinds of grass used, so are sheep-skin, goat-skin and deer-skin used in Avanti. I wonder if you, exalted Buddha, would allow these skins for spreads.
5. Exalted Buddha, people nowadays entrust monastics outside the Hall of Discipline (Sīmā) with robes, saying: “This robe is given to such and such a monastic.” The entrusted co-resident monastics goes to the monastic concerned and says: “Such and such a man, friend, gives a robe to you.” But the monastic does not accept the robe as he thinks that his acceptance would require him to perform an act of forfeiture and is therefore against the Vinaya. Because of such doubt, there is no such acceptance. Perhaps the Buddha might tell the correct way of accepting the robe.

Because of what had been reported by Ven. Soṇa Kuṭṭikaṇṇa, the Buddha then gave a Dhamma talk to him and addressed the monks as follows: “Monks, monastics are rare in the southern region of Avanti. In such bordering areas, I allow the performance of ordination by a group of five monks, the fifth being an expert in the Vinaya.”

The phrase “bordering areas” in that injunction means the areas outside the Middle Country, to the east of which is the market town of Gajāṅgala, beyond which is a great Sāla tree; beyond that Sāla tree begins the bordering areas. [1269] It means the area lying outside the Middle Country and beyond the river Salalavatī in the south-east. It means the area lying outside the Middle Country and beyond the market town of Setakaṇṇika in the south. It means the area outside the Middle Country and beyond the Brahmin village of Thūna in the west. It means the area outside the Middle Country and beyond the mountain called Usīraddhaja in the north.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1915

1. “Monks, in the bordering areas in such a situation I allow performance of ordination by a group of five monastics, the fifth one being an expert in the Vinaya.
2. Monks, in the southern region of Avanti, the uneven ground, swollen and full of black hoof-prints of cattle, is so rough. I allow you monks to wear sandals with layers of sole in all those bordering areas.
3. Monks, in the southern region of Avanti, people attach importance to bathing. They regard water as a cleansing factor. I allow monks a daily bath in all those bordering areas.
4. Monks, in the southern region of Avanti sheep-skins, goat-skins and deer-skins are used as spreads. As, monks, in the Middle Country, various mats made of grass are used, so are those animal skins used as spreads in that region of Avanti. I allow monks to use sheep-skin, goat-skin and deer-skin for spreads in all those bordering areas.
5. Monks, if people entrust monastics, who happen to be outside the Hall of Discipline (Sīmā), with a robe, saying: “This robe we give to such and such a monastic.” As long as the robe does not go into the hand of the monk concerned, the robe cannot be reckoned as something recognized by the would-be recipient for use. I allow you monks to accept that robe.

Again, as had been asked by his mother, Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa paid respects, in her name, to the Buddha and said: “Exalted Buddha, your supporter, my mother Kālī, the female lay devotee, has offered this rug for use as a mat on the floor in your fragrant chamber.” With these words, he handed the rug to the Buddha, and then he rose from his seat, made obeisance and returned to his monastery on Papāta Hill, near Kuraraghara town, in Avanti.

On returning to his preceptor, Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa reported all about the mission. Next day, he went to the house of his mother, Kālī, and stood at the entrance for alms food. Hearing that her son was at the door, she came out quickly, paid her respects, took the alms bowl from Ven. Soṇa’s hand, prepared a seat and offered food, and then followed a conversation between his mother and Ven. Soṇa:

Mother: Son, have you seen the Fortunate One?

Ven. Soṇa: Yes, I have, mother.

Mother: Have you also paid respects to the Fortunate One in my name?

Ven. Soṇa: Yes, I have. The rug given by you to the Fortunate One, I personally spread it as a mat, as you had asked, in the Fragrant Chamber which he occupies.

Mother: How about your visit to the Fortunate One? Is it true that you spoke about the Dhamma? Is it true that the Fortunate One gave you blessings?

Ven. Soṇa: How did you come to know about these things?

Mother: The guardian spirit of this house, son, told me the day the Fortunate One gave blessings to you, Devas and Brahmas of the 10,000 world-spheres did the same. I want you to relate to me, son, the Dhamma in the same words as you have addressed the Fortunate One.

Ven. Soṇa accepted the mother's request by being silent. Knowing of Ven. Soṇa's acceptance, the mother had a great pavilion built at the house-gate and let Ven. Soṇa [1270] repeat exactly what he had said to the Buddha; the mother thereby held a grand Dhamma-meeting.

Foremost Title Achieved

At a later time, sitting in the midst of his noble disciples, the Buddha spoke in praise of Ven. Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa as follows:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ
kalyāṇa-vākkaraṇaṃ yad-idaṃ Soṇo Kuṭikaṇṇo.*

Monks, among my disciples who give pious talks in a sweet and pleasant voice, Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa is the foremost.

18. Ven. Sīvali

Aspiration in the Past

This man of good family, who would become Sīvali, also went to the monastery during the lifetime of Buddha Padumuttara like many other former would-be great disciples and stood at the edge of the audience, listening to the Buddha's discourse. While he was doing so, he saw the Buddha declare a certain monk the foremost (etad-aggā) among those who received abundant gifts. Thinking that he too should become like that monk, he invited the Buddha to his house and offered a grand alms giving (mahā-dāna) for seven days, in the same manner as was done by the other future great disciples. Thereafter, he declared his aspiration, saying to the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, as a result of this great act of merit, I do not want any other form of welfare but I want to be the foremost (etad-agga) among those who receive many material gains, in the Dispensation of a Future Buddha, like the monk who was declared so seven days ago.”

Foreseeing that the man of good family’s wish would be fulfilled without any hitch, the Buddha predicted: “Your wish will be fulfilled later in the Dispensation of Buddha Gotama,” and then he returned to the monastery.

Life as a Countryman

Having performed meritorious deeds till his death, the future Sīvali took rebirth only in the realms of Devas and humans, without being reborn in the four suffering states. During the lifetime of the Buddha Vipassī, who appeared 91 aeons ago, he became a man of good family in a certain village not far away from the city of Bandhumatī. At that time, the citizens of Bandhumatī, in friendly competition with the king, discussed among themselves and gave a big alms giving to the Buddha.

One day, when they gave a collective alms giving, they inspected their offerings to see what was missing and discovered that there were no honey and milk curds. So they agreed to bring them from any possible place by all means and placed a man to watch the road leading to the city from the countryside.

Then a villager came, the future Sīvali, carrying a pot of milk curds from his village and thinking that he would exchange them for something he needed. But, before he entered the city, he wished to wash his face and hands and was looking for water everywhere but saw a beehive which was as big as the head of a plough but without bees. Believing that the beehive appeared because of his past act of merit, he took it and entered the city.

When the townsman, who was assigned to the road, saw the villager, he asked: “For whom, friend, are you carrying this honey and these curds?” – “Sir, they are not for any particular person. In fact, I am carrying them to sell,” the villager answered. “In that case, friend, take a coin from my hand and give me that honey and those curds,” said the townsman. [1271]

Then the villager thought: “These things, which I have brought now, are not much valuable, yet this man is buying them from me at a high price, even in his first offering. I do not know why!” So he said: “I cannot sell them at this price, sir.” When the townsman increased the price, saying: “If you cannot sell them for one coin, please take two coins and sell the honey and the curds to me.” The villager replied: “I cannot give them to you for two coins either,” in order to raise the price. In this way the price became higher and higher until it reached 1,000 pieces of money.

Realizing: “It is not fair to prolong the deal on my part. However, I shall ask him about his purpose,” the villager said: “The honey and the curds are not so valuable, yet you unduly make such an immense payment. Why do you want to offer so much?” The townsman told him the purpose: “In this royal city of Bandhumatī, friend, the citizens, in competition with their king, gave a grand alms giving to Buddha Vipassī. While they were doing so, they did not have honey and curds among the items of their offering. So they are trying desperately to get them by any means. If they fail to get them, they will lose in their competition with the king. Therefore, I would like to have them by giving you 1,000 pieces of money.” The villager then asked: “Sir, is such a charitable deed to be performed only by the people of the city and not by village folk?”

The townsman then answered: “No man’s gift, friend, is prohibited, everybody whether he belongs to town or village is entitled to give in generosity.” The villager then asked further: “Master, now that the citizens are performing deeds of giving, is there anyone who gives away 1,000 pieces of money in one day?” – “No, friend, there is none.” The villager put still another question firmly: “Master, you know that the honey and the curds that I have brought now are worth 1,000 pieces of money, do you not?” – “Yes, I do, friend.” – “Master,” said the villager, “in that case, go and tell the townsfolk that a rustic man is offering these two things: honey and milk curds, but not for money, instead he would like to make the offering with his own hands. Please also tell them that they should not be restless for wanting them and that they should now be happy as far as these two things are concerned. As for you, you should bear witness in person to the fact that in this magnificent alms giving, it is I who am the supporter of the most expensive item.”

Having said this, the villager bought five perfume ingredients with his money which were meant for his food. He made them into a powder. Then he squeezed the curds to extract water from them. Into that water, he put honey by squeezing the beehive and then seasoned the mixture of honey and curd-water with the perfumed powder. Finally, he put the mixed liquid food in a lotus leaf container. Having prepared the food properly, he brought it and sat down at a place that was not far from the Buddha, waiting for his turn to offer.

Amidst all the offerings that were brought by the citizens, the villager, knowing that it was his turn to make his offering, approached the Buddha and made a wish, saying: “Exalted Buddha, this offering is a gift from a poor man like me. Venerable sir, kindly accept this humble gift of mine.” Out of compassion for the villager, the Buddha received the offering with the marble bowl given by the Four Great Kings and resolved that the food should prove inexhaustible even after distributing it to 6,800,000 monastics.

When the Buddha had partaken of his food, the villager respectfully made obeisance to him and remaining at a suitable distance, said: “Exalted Buddha, all the people of the royal city of Bandhumatī saw and know that today I brought and made an offering to you. As a result of this act of merit, may I become, throughout Samsāra, a great recipient of gifts, possessing a large retinue and fame. After saying: may it be so, man of good family (evam hotu kula-putta),” the Buddha gave an appreciative talk to the villager and the citizens and then he returned to the monastery.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

The villager, having done meritorious deeds till his death, was reborn only in Deva and human worlds, and finally, during the lifetime of our Buddha, he took conception in the womb of a Koliyan Sakyan Princess named Suppavāsā. [1272] Since his conception, hundreds of gifts arrived continuously, day and night, to his mother, Princess Suppavāsā. The Princess became wealthier than before.<sup>280</sup>

Then one day, in order to investigate the fortunate past deeds of the princess, her royal relatives took the baskets of seeds touched by her hand. When these seeds were scattered, thousands of sprouts appeared from each seed. It was a plot of land, measuring two royal acres, yielding some 50 or 60 cartloads of paddy.

<sup>280</sup> According to the Sinhalese version, 500 gifts came by day and 500 by night.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1920

Also, at a time when the crop was put into the storehouse, they let the door of the storehouse be touched by the hand of the princess. When removing the crop, the place from where it was taken out became full as before. This was because of the glorious deeds done in the past by the princess. Besides, when ladling the cooked rice from the full pot and uttering: “This is the fortune of the princess,” and distributing the food to all visitors, their supplies never ran short. While these strange events were happening the child remained in the mother’s womb, and seven years passed by.

When the foetus became mature on the completion of seven years, the princess suffered severely from a fainting owing to her pregnancy (gabbha-mūlha-dukkha). The princess endured the serious agony without a sound, but by reflecting on the attributes of the Buddha, the Saṅgha and Nibbāna as follows (Ud 2.8):

Sammā-sambuddho vata so Bhagavā, yo imassa evarūpassa dukkhassa pahānāya Dhammaṃ deseti.

He, that master of ours, the Fortunate One, taught us the abandoning of all kinds of suffering; that master of ours has been perfectly Self-Awakened indeed by attaining omniscience and knowing the truths and all that is to be known!

Suppaṭipanno vata tassa Bhagavato sāvaka-saṅgho, yo imassa evarūpassa dukkhassa pahānāya paṭippanno.

The Saṅgha, who are the disciples of the Fortunate One, work hard for abandoning all kinds of such suffering, these disciples of the exalted Buddha underwent the threefold training very well indeed!

Susukhaṃ vata taṃ Nibbānaṃ, yatthidaṃ evarūpaṃ dukkhaṃ na saṃvijjati.

That state in which the slightest tinge of suffering is absent, that Nibbāna is indeed extremely happy!

Through reflecting on the attributes of the three entities: The attributes of the Buddha, the Saṅgha, and the peaceful happiness of Nibbāna, the Princess bore the pains.

On the seventh day, the Koliyan Princess Suppavāsā called her husband the Koliyan prince and thinking she would like to give alms, she said: “Go my lord!

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1921

Tell the Fortunate One about my happenings and give my invitation to the master. Please note carefully all that he has to say and report it to me!”

The prince went and told the Buddha what was happening to Princess Suppavāsā. The Buddha then uttered: “May the Koliyan Princess Suppavāsā be sound and healthy. Being healthy herself, may she give birth to a healthy son!” No sooner had the Buddha made the utterance than the princess gave birth to a healthy son, and without any pain.

The miserable mood of those who surrounded the princess changed into a happy one, and they went to the prince to give him the news about the baby. The prince, having listened to what the Buddha had said, paid respects to him and returned to the village. When he saw on the way the servants were jubilantly approaching him, he became certain, thinking: “The word of the Fortunate One seems to have come true.”

He went to the princess and transmitted the Buddha’s speech. The princess said: “My Lord, the life-saving [1273] alms food to which you have been invited, will be an auspicious meal. Go again! Request the Buddha to come and have a meal for seven days.” The prince did as he had been told. They offered a grand alms giving (mahā-dāna) to the Buddha and his monks for seven days.

The boy was born and the anxiety of all their kinsfolk was removed thereby. Accordingly, he was given the name Sīvali, which means auspicious. Since he had stayed in the mother’s womb for seven years, from the time of his birth onwards, he was able to do all that was to be done by a seven year old. For instance, he purified the water by means of a filter (dhama-karaṇa) and gave it to the monks during the great alms giving (mahā-dāna) all week long.

On the seventh day, Ven. Sāriputta, the Captain of the Dhamma, had a conversation with the boy. While doing so Ven. Sāriputta asked: “Sīvali, is it not befitting for you to become a monk after suffering all that trouble in the womb?” – “Venerable sir, if only I can get permission from my parents, I would like to become a monk,” the boy answered. Seeing her son conversing with Ven. Sāriputta, Sīvali’s mother thought: “How is it? My son is speaking with Ven. Sāriputta who is the Captain of the Dhamma!” So she joyfully approached Ven. Sāriputta and asked him what they were talking about. Ven. Sāriputta said: “He spoke to me about the misery caused by his stay in his mother’s womb and promised me that he would live an ascetic life provided he gets permission from his parents.” The princess then gave her permission replying: “Very well, venerable sir, kindly make him a novice.”

Ven. Sāriputta then took the boy Sīvali to the monastery and when he was making him a novice, after giving him the meditation subject of the fivefold material aggregate with the skin as the fifth (taca-pañcaka), he said: “You do not need any other exhortation to follow. Just remember the pains that you suffered for seven years.” – “Giving ordination to me is your duty, venerable sir. Let the reflection on the Dhamma be mine. I shall meditate on whatever I can recollect.”

The moment the shaving of hair for the first round was done, Sīvali was established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala), the moment the shaving for the second round of hair was done, he was established in Once-returning (Sakadāgāmi-phala), the moment the shaving for the third round was done, he was established in Non-returning (Anāgāmi-phala) and as soon as the shaving was complete, he became an Arahat. The completion of the hair-shaving and the attainment of the Arahat fruition took place almost simultaneously.

Since the day Sīvali was ordained a novice, the four requisites: clothing, food, dwelling and medicine became increasingly available to the Saṅgha whenever needed. The story of such happenings to the novice Sīvali started in the town of Kuṇḍikā.

Herein the present story of Ven. Sīvali may be taken from the Discourse concerning Suppavāsā (Suppavāsā-sutta, Ud 2-8). The story, in detail, of his evil deed that caused the seven years long misery of lying in his mother’s womb (gabbhāvāsa-dukkha) and that of his mother’s fainting (gabbha-mūḷha) may be taken from the commentary to the same discourse.

What is to be noted in brief is: The mother and the son, in one of their past existences were the Chief Queen and the son respectively to the King of Bārāṇasī. Once, the King of Kosala attacked the King of Bārāṇasī and took his Chief Queen and placed her in a similar position. When the King of Bārāṇasī was defeated and died, his son, the Prince of Bārāṇasī, escaped through a drain. After organizing an army, he went back to the city of Bārāṇasī and gave an ultimatum asking the new king to return the city to him or he would wage a war.

The mother, who was inside the city, advised her son to besiege the city lest there should occur trouble to many people. In accordance with the mother's advice, the prince did so by blocking the four main gates so that there could be no exit or entrance. Though he did so for seven years, the citizens went out from smaller gates to collect grass, wood, etc. The blockage proved useless. Hearing that, the mother gave her son further advice to block the smaller gates as well.

When the prince did, following his mother's advice, the citizens found their movement badly limited. Seven days later they beheaded King Kosala and [1274] offered it to the prince. The prince entered the city and crowned himself king. As a result of these aforesaid evil deeds, the son and the mother had to face their respective miseries.

Self-Investigation of his Good Deeds

At a later time, when the Buddha arrived in Sāvattihī, Ven. Sīvali paid obeisance respectfully to him and sought permission, saying: “Exalted Buddha, I would like to investigate my own good deeds (kamma). Kindly give me 500 monks as my companions.” The Buddha permitted, saying: “Take them along, dear son Sīvali.”

Ven. Sīvali headed for the Himavanta by following a forest route with 500 companions. Then he came across:

1. A great banyan tree on the way.
2. The Paṇḍava Hill.
3. The river Aciravatī.
4. The ocean known as Varasāgara.
5. The Himavanta.
6. The lake in the Chaddanta forest.
7. Mount Gandhamādana.
8. Ven. Revata's dwelling.

At all these places, Devas gave a great alms giving (mahā-dāna) to Ven. Sīvali for seven days. Particularly, when they arrived on Mount Gandhamādana, a Deva, named Nāgadatta, offered him milk rice and butter-rice alternately for seven days. Then the monks said among themselves: “Friends, we do not see cows being milked by Devas nor we see the milk-curds being stirred to make butter.” So they asked the Deva for an explanation of what good deed he did to obtain so much milk rice and butter-rice. Nāgadatta answered: “Venerable sirs, I am able to give you milk rice and butter-rice without having milch cows because I performed meritorious gifts of milk-rice by lot during the lifetime of Buddha Kassapa.”

Foremost Title Achieved

At a later time, when the Buddha visited Ven. Khadiravaniya Revata, as has been told in the story of that venerable, Devas provided supplies, day after day, which were mainly intended for Ven. Sīvali on the deserted and dangerous journey. With reference to that episode, the Buddha placed Ven. Sīvali as the foremost among those who received plenty of gifts. The Buddha spoke in praise of Ven. Sīvali by saying:

lābhīnaṃ yad-idam Sīvali.*

Monks, among my monastic disciples who receive the four requisites in abundance, Sīvali is the foremost.

The doctrinal passages in connection with Ven. Sīvali may be extracted from the Traditions (Apādāna, Tha-ap 545), the Verses of the Elder Monks (Thera-gāthā, Thag 1.60), the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, Dh 414) and their respective commentaries, etc.

Similarly the Dhamma teachings involving later great disciples should be noted in like manner. In this Chronicles of the Buddhas, from now on only three points will be discussed: Each venerable’s aspiration expressed in the past, his ascetic life in the final existence, and the foremost title achieved.

19. Ven. Vakkali

Aspiration in the Past

This Vakkali was a man of good family during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. Like all [1275] other great disciples, he went to the Buddha’s monastery, sat at the edge of the audience and while listening to his discourse, he saw a monastic being honoured by him as the foremost (etad-agga) among the monastics who were devoted to him. He felt a keen desire to be honoured likewise by some Future Buddha. As with the other aspirants, he invited the Buddha to his home and made great offerings for seven days. Thereafter, he expressed his wish before the Buddha: “For this good deed, may I, venerable sir, be declared by some Future Buddha as the foremost among the monastics who are very devoted to the Buddha.” The Buddha saw that the aspiration of the man of good family would be fulfilled and assured him of it, after which, he returned to the monastery.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

The worthy man devoted himself to deeds of merit till his death. When he passed away from that existence, he was reborn only in the fortunate destinations, and during the time of Buddha Gotama, he was reborn in a Brahmin family in Sāvattthī. He was named by his parents Vakkali.

When he grew up, he was educated in the three Vedas. One day, he saw the Buddha, accompanied by many monastics, going on alms round in the city of Sāvattthī. He was captivated by the majesty of the Buddha’s physical appearance, so much so that he followed the Buddha and entered the Buddha’s monastery along with the line of monastics. There he kept gazing at the splendour of the Buddha. At the time the Buddha was delivering a discourse, he sat right in front of him.

Vakkali’s devotion became so deep that he could not stay away from the Buddha for any length of time. He, therefore, decided that he would not remain in household life, because as a householder he would not be able to see the Buddha all day long, but as a monastic he could get that opportunity. So he went to the Buddha and pleaded with him that he be admitted into the Saṅgha. He was then admitted.

As a monastic, Ven. Vakkali never missed a chance of looking at the Buddha except at the meal time. He did nothing in the conduct of a monastic either in learning or in meditation, but spent all of his time gazing at the Buddha. The Buddha knew that the time for Ven. Vakkali’s Awakening was not yet due and therefore did not say anything about the negligence of his duties.

When the right time arrived, the Buddha said to Ven. Vakkali: “Vakkali, what is the use of you gazing at this putrid body of mine? Vakkali, he who sees the Dhamma, indeed sees me; he who sees me, sees the Dhamma. Vakkali, one who looks at the Dhamma, actually looks at me. He that really wishes to see me must be one who looks at the Dhamma.”

Although the Buddha exhorted Ven. Vakkali with these words, Ven. Vakkali could not tear himself away from the Buddha. The Buddha saw that the monastic needed to be emotionally awakened for Awakening. So, on the eve of the Rains Retreat (Vassa) period, the Buddha went to Rājagaha and there he said to Ven. Vakkali on the day the Rains Retreat began: “Vakkali, go away! Leave my presence!”

It is impossible to disobey an order given by the Buddha. Ven. Vakkali had to obey for at least three months during the Rains Retreat period. There was nothing he could do about it. He felt desperate and forlorn. Thinking: “Better to die than be denied the presence of the Buddha,” he left for the Gijjhakūṭa mountain which had steep cliffs.

The Buddha saw in his mind the despondency that had overtaken Ven. Vakkali. “Without getting mental succour from me, Ven. Vakkali would have wasted his great merit which is now sufficient for him to gain Awakening,” thought the Buddha. Accordingly, he emitted the Buddha radiance towards Ven. Vakkali so that he could see him again. That vision brought immediate relief to Ven. Vakkali’s burning heart, as though the dart of sorrow that had pierced it had suddenly been removed. Then to fill Vakkali’s heart with delightful satisfaction and gladness, the Buddha uttered the following verse (Dhp 381): [1276] adhigacche padaṃ santaṃ, saṅkhārūpasamaṃ sukhaṃ.*

Being overjoyed and full of confidence in the Buddha’s teaching consisting of the threefold training, the monastic will attain the tranquil Nibbāna, the cessation of conditioning, the blissful.

According to the commentary of the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) the Buddha extended his hand to Ven. Vakkali and ordained him by summoning him with: “Come, monastic.”

The commentary on the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada) adds that after saying the above verse, the Buddha, extending his hand to Ven. Vakkali, and uttered these verses (DhpA XXV.11, PTS 4.119):

*Ehi Vakkali mā bhāyi, olokehi Tathāgatam,
aham taṃ uddharissāmi, pañke sannaṃ va kuñjaram.*

Come, Vakkali, do not be afraid, look at the Realised One, I will lift you to Nibbāna from the depths of the beginningless Samsāra, just as one lifts a tusker from the mire.

Ehi Vakkali mā bhāyi, olokehi Tathāgatam, aham taṃ mocayissāmi, rāhuggaṃ va sūriyam.

Come, Vakkali, do not be afraid, look at the Realised One. I will free you from the captivity of the defilements, just as I would free the sun from the captivity of Rāhu.

*Ehi Vakkali mā bhāyi, olokehi Tathāgatam,
aham taṃ mocayissāmi, rāhuggaṃ va candimam*

Come, Vakkali, do not be afraid, look at the Realised One. I will free you from the captivity of the defilements, just as I would free the moon from the captivity of Rāhu.

Then Ven. Vakkali said to himself: “I am now seeing the Buddha in person, and he has extended his hand to me. Oh, how glad I am! Where should I go now?” And not being able to decide on which direction he should proceed, he moved up skyward in the direction of the Buddha, and just as his first foot was resting on the mountain, he reflected on the verses uttered by the Buddha, and overcoming delightful satisfaction through insight into the three characteristics of conditioned phenomena, he became an Arahat, together with analytical knowledge. Then he descended to the ground and stood worshipping the Buddha.

Foremost Title Achieved

On one occasion, in the midst of a congregation, the Buddha declared:

Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakāmaṃ bhikkhūnam saddhādhimuttānam yad-idam Vakkali.

Monastics, among the male monastic disciples who are very devoted to the Buddha, Vakkali is the foremost (etad-aggā).

In the case of other monastics, their devotion to the Buddha had to be bolstered up. With Vakkali, his conviction and devotion was too strong, so that the Buddha had to temper it by expelling him from his presence.

Hence he was the foremost monastic in the degree of devotion to the Buddha. [1277]

20-21. Ven. Rāhula and Ven. Raṭṭhapāla

Aspiration in the Past

During the early part of the aeon of Buddha Padumuttara, the future Rāhula and the future Raṭṭhapāla were born into well-to-do families in Hamsavatī, however their names and clans are not mentioned in the old commentaries.

When they came of age, they married and at the death of their fathers, they became heads of their respective households. In taking over the family properties from the custodians of their family estates, they came to know the immense wealth they had inherited. They pondered: “Our forbears have amassed these vast fortunes but have not been able to take them along when they left the present existence. As for us, we would take them along into the hereafter in whatever way we can. So they started to practise generosity. They erected distribution stations at the four gates of the city, where all the needs of destitute and travellers were provided liberally.

Of the two friends, one was in the habit of inquiring into the needs of the recipients who came to receive his generosity and would give according to their needs, and he was therefore known as Āgatapāka, “the discriminative giver.” The other never asked about the needs of the recipient but let them take however much they wanted, and hence he was known as Anaggapāka, “the liberal giver.”

One early morning, the two friends went out from their village to wash their faces. At that time, two recluses, using their supernormal powers, disappeared from the Himavanta mountains and reappeared at a place not far away from the two friends. They made themselves invisible and stood by the roadside and were visible only when they were heading to the village with their alms bowls and other vessels seeking for alms. The two friends went near and paid homage to the recluses, who asked them: “Men of great merit, when did you come here?” And the two friends replied: “Venerable sirs, we have just arrived.” Then they each invited a recluse to their respective homes, offered them alms food, after which they asked and received the promise from the recluses to receive their offerings every day thenceforth.

One of them, the recluse who had agreed to be the regular recipient to the future Rāhula was phlegmatic, and to cool his heated body, he used to spend the daytime in the abode of a Nāga, named Pathavindhara, which lay beneath the ocean. The recluse went there by making the ocean water cleft into a dry passage-way. On returning from his watery sojourn, where he had enjoyed the favourable weather, to the human abode, on the occasion, he gave an appreciative talk about the daily food offerings. After hearing the repeated reference to “the abode of the Nāga Pathavindhara,” the supporter became curious to know what the expression denoted. This recluse explained to him: “Ah, it is our wish that you be as great as the lord of Nāgas named Pathavindhara,” and told him the grandeur of the Nāga from under the seas. From that day onwards, the future Rāhula’s mind was inclined to the Nāga existence, as he visualized it from the recluse’s description.

The other recluse used to spend his daytime at a Deva mansion, named Serisaka, after the big celestial tree that stood in front of it in Tāvatiṃsa. And this recluse, who saw the palace of Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, mentioned it in his words of appreciation and felicitation about the daily food-offering he received at the future Raṭṭhapāla’s house. When the future Raṭṭhapāla asked him to explain what he was referring to, he explained the greatness of Sakka and his wish that his supporter will be as great as Sakka. Thenceforward the future Raṭṭhapāla’s mind was inclined to the celestial state of Sakka.

When the two rich friends passed away from their existence, future Rāhula, whose mind was inclined to the Nāga lord’s existence, was reborn as the Nāga lord Pathavindhara and future Raṭṭhapāla, whose mind was inclined to Sakka’s existence, was reborn as Sakka in the Tāvatiṃsa Realm.

Past Aspiration of the Future Rāhula

At the moment of his rebirth as a Nāga, Pathavindhara looked at his own body and felt sorry that he had indeed become a reptile. He thought of the limited vision of his benefactor, the recluse in his previous existence: “Ah, my teacher would seem to know no [1278] higher ideal for me than the reptilian existence.” Just then he was attended on by a troupe of Nāga dancers and musicians, all in celestial garb, who were there to entertain him wherever he was. He himself then took on the appearance of a celestial youth, his reptilian form having been discarded.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1930

A significant activity in his Nāga existence was that Pathavindhara had to attend, as part of his Nāga King Virūpakkha's entourage, the half monthly meetings presided over by Sakka, where the Four Great Kings paid their homage to the Lord of the Devas. Sakka saw his old friend, Pathavindhara, and even from a distance recognized him. He asked him: "Friend, in which realm were you reborn?"

"Lord, unfortunate is my destination. I was reborn as a reptile in the realm of the Nāgas. But you were fortunate to have a good teacher in the past, and have been reborn in the Deva realm."

"Do not be disappointed for your unfortunate destination. There has arisen in the world, Buddha Padumuttara. Go to him, perform great deeds of merit, and wish for the state of Sakka, so that we would live together in this Tāvātimsa Realm." – "Very well my Lord," said Pathavindhara, "I will follow your advice."

Then he went to see Buddha Padumuttara, and invited him to his undersea realm. He made preparations for a great offering the whole night together with his followers.

Early in the next morning, at dawn, the Buddha said to his personal attendant: "Sumana, the Realised One is going to a far-off land to collect alms food. Let only Arahats who have memorised the Dhamma-Vinaya and have attained the fourfold analytical knowledge and the six supernormal powers, accompany me, and not the worldly monastics." The attendant announced this order among the monastics.

Then the Buddha, accompanied by Arahats, who had memorised the Dhamma-Vinaya and had attained the fourfold analytical knowledge and the six supernormal powers, rose into the sky and went to the abode of Pathavindhara, the lord of the Nāgas. As Pathavindhara waited to welcome the Buddha, he saw him and his company of Arahats walking above the wavy waters of emerald green of the great ocean. There was a procession of majestic Arahats with the Buddha at the head and a young novice, named Uparevata, who was the son of the Buddha. Pathavindhara was particularly overawed by the young novice for having such supernormal powers just like the elder monastics. He felt thrilled with joy at the magnificent sight.

When the Buddha took the seat prepared for him and the Arahats took their respective seats according to seniority, the seat assigned for novice Uparevata was high in front of the Buddha. As the young novice was sitting there, Pathavindhara, while serving the food to the Buddha and the Saṅgha, looked keenly at the Buddha and the young novice in turn. He noticed that the novice had the 32 distinct marks of a great man just like those on the body of the Buddha. That was the reason for his keen inspection of the Buddha and the novice in turn.

Pathavindhara was wondering why the young novice resembled the Buddha so much and how both were related to each other. He asked one of the Arahats: “Venerable sir, how is this young novice related to the Fortunate One?” The Arahata replied: “Lord of Nāgas, he is the son of the Fortunate One.” Pathavindhara was deeply impressed by the novice. “What a superb status this novice occupies! The son of the greatest man in the whole world, unrivalled in personal glory! His body is partly like that of the Fortunate One himself. Oh, how I would like to be the son of a Buddha at some future time.”

Having been moved by this aspiration, the lord of Nāgas invited the Buddha to his residence for seven days and made great offerings to him. Thereafter, he made his aspiration before the Buddha: “Venerable sir, for this great deed of merit, may I become the son of some Future Buddha, just like novice Uparevata.” The Buddha saw that the Nāga lord’s aspiration would be fulfilled and made the prediction: “You will become the son of Buddha Gotama in the future,” then he departed. [1279]

Past Aspiration of the Future Raṭṭhapāla

At the next half-monthly Deva meeting to pay homage to Sakka as a member of the Nāga King Virūpakkha’s retinue, Sakka asked his old-time friend Pathavindhara: “Well, friend, have you made your aspiration for the Tāvātimsa Realm?” Pathavindhara answered: “No, my lord.” – “But why didn’t you do that? What disadvantage do you see in Deva existence?” – “My lord, it is not for any disadvantage I see in Deva existence. The fact is I have seen the novice Uparevata, the son of the Buddha who was just wonderful. Since I had cast my eyes on him, I have no aspiration other than to become the son of a Future Buddha, exactly like this novice Uparevata. So I made my aspiration before the Buddha to become the son of some Future Buddha. My lord, I would ask you to make some aspiration before the Buddha. Let us live together in future existences in Saṃsāra.”

Sakka accepted Pathavindhara’s suggestion and as he was thinking about his ideal aspiration, he saw a monastic endowed with great powers. He reviewed the lineage of that monastic and saw that the monastic was the son of a noble family that had the ability to unite a country that had been divided, and that the monastic had to obtain parental consent to join the Saṅgha, only after starving himself in protest for seven days. He decided to emulate that monastic.

He asked the Buddha about the monastic, even though he knew it by his own divine powers. Then he made great offerings to the Buddha for seven days, at the end of which he expressed his great wish thus: “Venerable sir, for this great deed of merit may I be declared by some Future Buddha as the foremost monastic among those who took up the monastic life through their conviction just like that monastic whom the Fortunate One declared as such.” The Buddha saw that Sakka’s aspiration would be fulfilled and said: “Sakka, you will be declared as the foremost among monastics who joined the Saṅgha, through sheer conviction under Buddha Gotama in the future.” After pronouncing that prediction the Buddha departed. And Sakka also returned to his celestial abode.

Raṭṭhapāla as Manager of Offerings

The future Raṭṭhapāla and the future Rāhula passed away from their existences as Sakka and Pathavindhara respectively, faring in the Deva realm and the human world for thousands of aeons. Ninety-two aeons prior to the present aeon was the time of Buddha Phussa. The father of Buddha Phussa was King Mahinda. The Buddha had three half-brothers from different mothers. The king monopolised the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha because he would not share the meritorious deed of attending to the needs of the Buddha with anyone.

One day, a rebellion broke out in a remote area of King Mahinda’s country. The king said to his three sons: “Sons, there is a rebellion in a far-away region. Either I myself, or the three of you, must go and put the region in order. If I am to go, you must see that attendance on the Buddha be kept up in the usual manner.” The three sons unanimously said: “Dear father, it is not for you to go. We will go and put that region in order.” They made obeisance to their father and went to the disturbed area, quelled the rebels and returned in triumph.

On the way home, the three princes sought counsel of their trusted lieutenants: “Men, back in the capital, our father will bestow some boon on us. What sort of boon should we name?” The lieutenants said: “My lords, at the death of your royal father, nothing will be unattainable to you. The right to attend on your eldest brother, the Buddha, is indeed the boon you should ask for.” – “Very well, my men, your advice is sound.” And they went before their royal father.

The king was very pleased with them and said they would be rewarded with whatever they wished for. The princes asked for the privilege of attending on the Buddha as their boon. “That, I cannot give, sons,” the king said, “name any other.” – “We want no other boon. That is the only thing we yearn for.” After some refusals by the king and affirmations on the part of the three princes, the king at last felt obliged to concede, lest he would be going back on his word. He warned his sons, though, in these words: “I will now comply with your request. But I wish to warn you, the Buddha is in the habit of staying in seclusion, just like the lion in his own den. So you have to be fully attentive in waiting on him. Do not ever be amiss about your duties.” [1280]

The three princes, on being permitted the task of waiting on the Buddha for three months, discussed among themselves: “Since we are going to wait on the Buddha, we ought to don robes and take up the monastic life as novices.” They decided to be absolutely free from the stench of demerit.

“Free from the stench of demerit (nirāma-gandha)” according to the commentary. The sub-commentary elaborates on this term thus: Stench is to be interpreted as demerit, and also as defilement. Stench is inseparable from defilement: Whenever defilement arises, it produces a bad smell. Stench means a mind where defilements arise continuously. The metaphor stench is used to denote something obnoxious, impure as though polluted by excreta, frowned upon by the wise and virtuous, it is an agent that makes everything stink. This last quality of the defilements is also manifested by evil persons whose body literally stinks, whereas the dead body of a purified one has no bad smell.

Accordingly, they did so and took part in the daily offering of food to the Buddha and the Saṅgha but entrusted the job to a committee of three trusted men to supervise the task.

Among these three supervisors, one was in charge of procuring rice and cereals, the second in charge of issuing groceries to meet the daily needs of the meals, and the third in charge of cooking and other preparations for the offering. The three men were reborn during the time of Buddha Gotama as King Bimbisāra, Visākha the merchant, and Ven. Raṭṭhapāla, respectively.

Rāhula's Life as Prince Pathavindhara

The future Rāhula was reborn as the eldest son of King Kikī of the Kāsi country during the time of Buddha Vipassī. He was named by his parents as Prince Pathavindhara. He had seven sisters, namely:

1. Princess Samaṇī = the future Ven. Khemā.
2. Princess Samaṇaguttā = the future Ven. Uppalavaṇṇā.
3. Princess Bhikkhunī = the future Ven. Paṭācārā.
4. Princess Bhikkhadāyikā = the future Ven. Kuṇḍalakesī.
5. Princess Dhammā = the future Ven. Kisā Gotamī.
6. Princess Sudhammā = the future Ven. Dhammadinnā.
7. Princess Saṅghadāyikā = the future lay supporter Visākhā.

Prince Pathavindhara became the heir-apparent after his seven sisters had donated seven monastic complexes to Buddha Kassapa. The heir-apparent requested his sisters to let him donate the cost of one of the seven monastic complexes, but his seven sisters pointed out to their eldest brother that he had means to donate another monastic complex. So Prince Pathavindhara built 500 monastic complexes on an appropriate scale according to his status. He spent all his life in deeds of merit. On his death, he was reborn in the Deva realm.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

During the time of Buddha Gotama, Prince Pathavindhara was reborn as Prince Rāhula, son of Prince Siddhattha and his chief Princess Yasodharā. Rāhula's boyhood friend was Raṭṭhapāla, the son of Raṭṭhapāla, the wealthy merchant of the market town of Thullakoṭṭhika in the kingdom of Kuru.

The admission of Rāhula into the Saṅgha, an interesting episode, can be read in chapter 18. Many discourses that are connected with Rāhula, such as the Long Discourse giving Advice to Rāhula (Mahā-rāhulovāda-sutta, MN 62) and others can be found in chapters 31 and 32b.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1935

After the Buddha had admitted his son, he used to admonish the young novice every day as follows: “Rāhula, seek the company of a good friend. Dwell in the forest abode. Be [1281] moderate in eating. Do not be attached to any of the four monastic requisites. Be flawless in regard to the observance of the monastic restraint. Guard the six faculties well. Be constantly mindful about mind-and-body so as to become thoroughly tired of sentient existence. Cultivate the mind to give up any idea of the attractiveness of the body; gain concentration of mind. Once the signs of permanence are given up, reflect on the falsity of an ego. If you train yourself thus, the three rounds of the vicious cycle of suffering existences will fall away.”<sup>281</sup>

The above sutta is entitled the Continual Advice to Rāhula (Abhiñha-rāhulovāda-sutta, Snp 2.11).

It was the custom of the novice Rāhula to pick up a handful of sand early in the morning and say to himself: “May I get admonitions from the Fortunate One or from my preceptor in number comparable to the grains of sand in my hand.” This habit of his gained him the reputation as a novice inclined to good advice as befitting the son of the Fortunate One and as such a worthy son of a worthy father.

This recognition of Rāhula’s noble character trait became the topic of discussion among the monastics. The Buddha knew it, and thinking that that would very well make a ready subject for another discourse and would also highlight Ven. Rāhula’s qualities even better, he taught a discourse at the audience hall. Having seated himself on the Dhamma throne of the Buddha, he asked the monastics what they had been talking about before he went in. The monastics replied: “Venerable sir, we were discussing the noble trait in the novice Rāhula’s readiness to receive admonition.” The Buddha then related a past existence of Rāhula where he had displayed the same noble trait, as mentioned in the Story about the Deer having Three Postures (Tipallattha-miga-jātaka, Ja 16).

The Buddha taught the young novice Rāhula at the tender age of seven to be truthful at all times, to refrain from untruth even by way of jesting. The discourse on this subject goes by the title of the Advice to Rāhula given in Ambalaṭṭhika Park (Ambalaṭṭhika-rāhulovāda-sutta, MN 61), see chapter 20a.

When Rāhula was eighteen, the Buddha taught him a discourse entitled the Long Discourse giving Advice to Rāhula (Mahā-rāhulovāda-sutta, MN 62), see chapter 31.

To give practical lessons in insight-meditation, 22 suttas were directed at Rāhula, compiled in the Collection of the Thematic Discourses (Samyutta-nikāya), forming the chapter entitled the Thematic Discourses connected with Rāhula (Rāhula-samyutta, SN 18); and there is also another discourse entitled the Discourse concerning Rāhula (Rāhula-sutta, AN 4.177).

As Rāhula became spiritually more mature, when he had just been admitted into the Saṅgha as a full-fledged monastic, the Buddha taught him another discourse entitled the Short Discourse giving Advice to Rāhula (Cūḷa-rāhulovāda-sutta, MN 147), see chapter 31.

On one occasion, in the congregation of monastics where the Buddha named outstanding monastics, he declared:

Sikkhā-kāmaṇaṃ yad-idaṃ Rāhulo.*

Monastics, among the monastics who welcome admonition concerning the threefold training, Rāhula is the foremost (etad-aggā).

Ven. Rāhula was designated as the foremost among those monastics who welcomed admonition concerning the threefold training because from the day he became a novice he always had a most keen desire to be instructed. Every morning, he awaited admonition and advice from the Buddha or from his preceptor. He wanted as many words of advice as they would give, even as many as the grains of sand he used to hold in his hand every morning.

Raṭṭhapāla's Monastic Life

In his tour of the kingdom of Kuru, the Buddha arrived at the market town of [1282] Thullakoṭṭhika, which means the town where all households have their granaries full of paddy. On hearing the Buddha's discourse, Raṭṭhapāla, the merchant's son, was overwhelmed by religious conviction and had an intense desire to renounce the world. After much persuasion and protestation with his parents, he finally obtained their consent to become a monastic, as in the case of Ven. Sudinna which has been described earlier on, and he went to the Buddha. Under the Buddha's order, he was admitted into the Saṅgha.

Although they had permitted their son to leave household life, Raṭṭhapāla's parents were still unhappy about it. Whenever monastics arrived at their door on the alms round, the father would say to them: "What business do you have here? You have taken away my only son. What more do you want to do from us?"

The Buddha stayed at Thullakoṭṭhika for fifteen days only and returned to Sāvathī. There, at Sāvathī, Raṭṭhapāla meditated on insight and became an Arahat.

Ven. Raṭṭhapāla then asked permission from the Buddha to visit his parents. Hence, he went to Thullakoṭṭhika. While going for alms collection in the town, he stood at the door of his father, where, as in the case of Ven. Sudinna, he received stale cakes, but he ate them as if they were the food of Devas. His father felt guilty about the alms food he had offered and invited his monastic son to his house to take a wholesome meal but Ven. Raṭṭhapāla said that since he had finished the day's meal, he would come the next day.

On the following day, after finishing his meal at his father's house, he gave a discourse to the womenfolk of the household who were fully garbed, and enabled them to perceive loathsomeness of the body. Then all of a sudden, like an arrow, he flew up to the sky and descended in the royal gardens of King Korabya where he sat on a rock platform. He sent word to the king through the gardener about his presence there. King Korabya went to pay homage to him. Ven. Raṭṭhapāla gave a discourse, in detail, on the four principles of loss or decay (pārijuṇṇa). After which, he returned to Sāvathī, travelling by stages, and arrived at the Buddha's monastery.

This is a brief account of Ven. Raṭṭhapāla. Full details may be gleaned from the Discourse to Raṭṭhapāla (Raṭṭhapāla-sutta, MN 82).

On one occasion, in a monastic congregation where the Buddha named foremost monastics, he declared:

saddhā-pabbajitānaṃ yad-idaṃ Raṭṭhapālo.*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who take up the monastic life through sheer religious conviction, Raṭṭhapāla is the foremost (etad-aggā).

Ven. Raṭṭhapāla had to stay away from food for seven days as a token of his strong desire to renounce the household life. That was why he was declared the foremost monastic who took up the monastic life through faith.

22. Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna

Aspiration in the Past

The future Kuṇḍadhāna was born into a worthy family in the city of Hamsavatī during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. Like all other future great disciples, he went to the Buddha's monastery to listen to his discourse. There he saw a monastic [1283] named by the Buddha as the foremost among those who were first to be selected for invitation to offerings of alms food by the supporters. The worthy man's heart was bent on receiving similar honours under some Future Buddha and so he made a great offering to the Buddha for seven days and on the seventh day, he expressed his aspiration for that honour in the future. Buddha Padumuttara saw that this aspiration of his would be fulfilled and made the prediction accordingly. After which, he returned to the monastery.

Evil Action Committed in the Past

The future Kuṇḍadhāna passed away from the human existence in which he received the Buddha's prediction after spending a life performing meritorious deeds. He was reborn either in the Deva realm or the human realm for a great many aeons. During the time of Buddha Kassapa, he became a terrestrial Deva. Buddha Kassapa appeared during the time when the human lifespan was 20,000 years, unlike Buddha Gotama's time when the human lifespan was 100 years and the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) was recited bi-monthly on the Observance Day (Uposatha), the Observance Day congregations to recite the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) took place only once in six months during the time of Buddha Kassapa.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1939

Two monastic friends, living at different places, went to the Observance Day congregation where the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) were recited. The terrestrial Deva, who was the future Kuṇḍadhāna, knew the strong tie of friendship that existed between these two monastics. He wondered if anybody could ruin this friendship and waited for a chance to do so by following the two monastics for some distance.

Then one of the monastics, leaving his alms bowl and robes with the other, went off to a place where water was available, to answer the call of nature. After finishing the personal ablutions, he came out of the bush. The Deva, in the guise of a very beautiful woman, followed close to the monastics, tidying up her dishevelled hair and rearranging her skirt, and appearing to have come out of the same bush.

The monastic companion saw this strange scene from a distance where he was left waiting, and was very upset. He thought to himself: “I never knew him to be so vile. My affection for him that has lasted so long is now ended. If I had known him to be such a rogue, I would not have extended my friendship to him.” As soon as the former monastic came back to him, he handed back to him his property, saying: “Here are your alms bowl and robes, I will never go the same way with you again.”

From now on we shall refer to the two monastics as the complainant or accuser (codaka) and the accused (cuditaka).

The accused, who was actually a well-disciplined monastic and had no fault whatsoever, was taken aback by his friend’s harsh words which seemed to smite his heart as if someone were to deal a vicious thrust at it with a sharp spear. He said: “Friend, what do you mean? Never have I committed any breach of the monastic discipline, not even the trivial ones. Yet, you call me a knave. What have you seen me doing?” – “If I had seen anything else, I would have ignored it. But this is serious, you came out of the same bush, having spent the time together there with a very attractive woman dressed in fine clothes and decorations.” – “No, no, my friend, that is not true! Nothing of that sort happened. I have never seen the woman you mention.” But the complainant was quite sure of himself. The accused denied thrice any misdoing. But the complainant believed what he had seen. He parted company with the accused there and then. Each went his own way to the Buddha’s monastery.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1940

At the Assembly Hall for the Observance Day ceremony, the accused was seen inside and so [1284] the complainant said: “This Hall of Discipline (Sīmā) is profaned by the presence of a fallen monastic. I cannot join the Observance Day ceremony with that wicked monastic.” And he went outside.

On seeing this, the terrestrial Deva was remorseful: “Oh me! I have made a grave mistake. I must atone for it.” So he assumed the form of an elderly lay-disciple and, going near to the complainant, said: “Why, venerable sir, do you remain outside the Hall of Discipline?” The monastic replied: “This Hall of Discipline contains a vile monastic. I cannot join the Observance Day ceremony together with him. So I keep myself away.” The Deva then said: “Do not think so, venerable sir. That monastic is of pure morality. The woman you saw was none other than myself. I wanted to test the strength of your mutual affection and to see whether you are moral or not. I accompanied the accused in a woman’s guise for that purpose.”

The monastic said: “Virtuous man, who are you?” – “I am a terrestrial Deva, venerable sir,” and so saying, he prostrated at the monastic’s feet. “Kindly excuse me, venerable sir. The accused knows nothing about what had happened. So, may the venerable one go ahead with the Observance Day ceremony with a clear conscience.” Then he led the monastics into the Observance Day hall. The two monastics performed the Observance Day ceremony at the same place, but the complainant did not remain together with the accused in their previous cordial relationship.

The accused practised meditation for insight and gradually became an Arahāt. The terrestrial Deva suffered the evil consequences of that evil deed during the whole of the interval (Buddhantara) between the arising of Buddha Kassapa and Buddha Gotama through a long period. He was reborn in the lower worlds (apāya) most of the time. When he regained human existence, he was subjected to blame for the misdeeds others had perpetuated.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

The terrestrial Deva, having paid dearly for his misdeed, was reborn as a Brahmin in Sāvattihī during the time of Buddha Gotama. His parents named him Dhāna. He learned the three Vedas as a youth but later in life, he became devoted to the Buddha after listening to the Buddha’s discourses and took up the monastic life.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1941

From the very day Dhāna became a monastic, a fully adorned woman, an apparition of a woman created as the result of his past misdeed, always followed him wherever he went. Wherever he went, the woman went; when he stopped, she stopped. This woman, though not seen by him, was seen by everybody else. So dreadful is the work of evil-doing.

When Ven. Dhāna went on the daily alms round, his female lay supporters would say jestingly: “This spoonful is for you, sir, and this spoonful is for the female friend who accompanies you, sir. This made him miserable. Back at the monastery, too, he was an object of ridicule. Novices and young monastics would surround him and jeer at him, saying: “Ven. Dhāna is a lecher!” From such jeering, he came to be called Kuṇḍadhāna or “Dhāna the lecher.”

As these jeerings became more and more frequent, Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna could not bear it any longer and retorted: “You only are lechers, not me; your preceptors are lechers, your teachers are lechers.” Other monastics who heard him say these harsh words reported the matter to the Buddha, who sent for Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna and asked him whether the report was true or not. “It is true, venerable sir,” Kuṇḍadhāna admitted. “Why did you use such abusive language?”

“I could not bear their jeerings any longer, venerable sir,” Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna explained and he related his story. “Monastic, your past evil deed still needs retribution. Do not use such harsh words in future.” And on that occasion, the Buddha uttered the following two verses (Dhp 133-134):

*Māvoca pharusaṃ kañci, vuttā paṭivadeyyu taṃ,
dukkhā hi sārambha-kathā, paṭidaṇḍā phuseyyu taṃ. [1285]*

Monastic Dhāna, do not use harsh words to anyone; those who are thus spoken to will retort. Painful to hear is severe talk, and retribution will come to you from those co-residents to whom you have used harsh words, just as ashes thrown against the wind will fly back.

Sace neresi attānaṃ, kaṃso upahato yathā, esa pattosi Nibbānaṃ, sārambho te na vijjati.

Monastic Dhāna, if you can keep your calm and quiet like a gong whose rim has been broken you will have attained Nibbāna. Then there will be no vindictiveness in you.

By the end of the discourse many listeners attained various levels of the path-knowledge.

Investigation by King Pasenadi Kosala

The news of Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna's regular association with a woman was brought to the attention of King Pasenadi of Kosala by the monastics. The king ordered an investigation while he personally kept watch on Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna's monastery together with a small group of his men.

He saw Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna was stitching a robe and the reputed woman also was seen standing near him. The king was enthralled by this sight. He drew near her. Then that woman was seen going into the monastic dwelling. The king followed her into the dwelling and searched for her everywhere but he could find no one inside. Then he made the correct conclusion that the woman that he saw earlier was not a real human being but only an apparition that appeared due to some past deed that belonged to Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna.

When the king first entered the monastery, he did not pay respects to Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna. Only after discovering the truth of Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna's innocence did he make obeisance to him and say: "Venerable sir, are you well provided by way of daily alms food?" – "Not too bad, Great King," replied Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna. "Venerable sir, I know what you mean. Since you have are seen always accompanied by a woman, who would be kindly disposed towards you? But from now on, you need not go on alms round. I will be a lay supporter to you and see to the provision of the four requisites. May you uphold the religious practice diligently and well." From that time onwards, the king made an offering of daily alms food to Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna.

Being free of anxiety about livelihood, regularly enjoying the support of the king, Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna gained concentration and developed insight, and became an Arahat. From the time of attaining Awakening the apparition of the woman disappeared.

Mahā Subhaddā, the daughter of Anāthapiṇḍika in the householder of Sāvattihī, was obliged to live in the house of a man, in the town of Ugga, who had no confidence in the Buddha. One day, intending that the Buddha show compassion on her, she took the Observance Day (Uposatha) precepts and kept her mind free from defilements. Standing at the upper storey of her mansion, she threw out eight handfuls of jasmine into the air and wished: “May these flowers go straight to the Fortunate One and form themselves into a canopy above him. May the Fortunate One, out of consideration for this floral tribute, come to my residence tomorrow to receive my offering of alms food.” The flowers flew straight to the Buddha and formed themselves into a canopy above him even while he was delivering a discourse.

The Buddha, on seeing the flower canopy offered by Mahā Subhaddā, perceived her wish and decided to receive her food offering. Early the next morning, the Buddha called [1286] Ven. Ānanda and said: “Ānanda, we shall go to a distant place to receive alms food. Include only Arahats, and not worldlings in the list of invitees.” Then Ven. Ānanda announced to the monastics: “Friends, the Fortunate One is going to a distant place to receive alms food today. Let no worldling monastic draw lots to be included as an invitee; only Arahats may do so.”

Then Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna said: “Friend, bring me the lots,” and stretched out his hand to make a draw. Ven. Ānanda thought Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna was still a worldling and informed the matter to the Buddha who said: “Ānanda, let him draw the lot if he wishes.”

Then Ānanda thought: “If Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna were unfit to draw the lots, the Fortunate One would disallow the draw. Now that he has been allowed him there must be some reason. I should let him draw.” And as he was retracing his steps to Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna, the latter entered into the fourth absorption (jhāna), the basic mental state for supernormal powers and stood in mid-air and then he said to Ven. Ānanda: “Friend Ānanda, bring me the lots. The Fortunate One knows me. The Fortunate One does not say anything against my drawing the lot first before other monastics.”

When on another occasion, Cūḷa Subhaddā, the younger daughter of Anāthapiṇḍika, invited the Buddha to Sāketa to receive alms food offering too, Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna made the first draw among the 500 monastics.

Then again, when the Buddha went to a market town in the country of Sunāparanta, flying through the sky by using his psychic power, Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna was also the first to draw the lots for receiving alms food.

On another occasion, in the assembly of monastics, the Buddha spoke of Ven. Kuṇḍadhāna:

*Etad-aggaṃ bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ
paṭhamam salākaṃ gaṇhantānaṃ yad-idaṃ Kuṇḍadhāno.*

Monastics, among those of my monastic disciples who successfully draw lots ahead of all others for alms food offering, Kuṇḍadhāna is the foremost (etad-agga).

23. Ven. Vaṅgīsa

Aspiration in the Past

The future Vaṅgīsa was born into a wealthy family in the city of Harṃsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. Like all other future great disciples, he went to the Buddha's monastery. In the course of listening to a discourse, he witnessed a monastic being named by the Buddha as the foremost among those monastics who were endowed with quick wit. The son, the future Vaṅgīsa, admired that monastic and after making a great offering to the Buddha, he expressed his aspiration to him: "May I, for this good deed, become the foremost monastic among those endowed with quick wit, at some time in the future." The Buddha saw that the aspiration of the supporter would be fulfilled and therefore, made the prediction before returning to the monastery.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

After a life of good deeds, the man passed away and was either reborn as a Deva or a human being. At the time of Buddha Gotama, he was reborn in a Brahmin family in Sāvattihī, by the name of Vaṅgīsa. When he came of age, he learnt the three Vedas. He served the teacher to the latter's satisfaction so that he also received a secret formula or chant called the skull (chava-sīsa) mantra, by intoning which he could tell the destination of a departed one by gentle rapping on the skull of a dead person.

The Brahmins knew well how to capitalise on Vaṅgīsa's art. So they put him in an enclosed carriage, and would encamp at the gate to a town or village, and when a crowd had formed, [1287] they advertised Vaṅgīsa's greatness saying: "He who sees Vaṅgīsa comes upon wealth and fame and goes to the heavens at death." Many people were taken in by such sayings and they would go to the visiting Brahmins: “Sirs, what is master Vaṅgīsa’s special knowledge?” Then the Brahmins would say: “Men, there is no wise one equal to master Vaṅgīsa because he can tell you the destination of a departed person. Just by rapping the skull of a dead person with his finger nails, he will tell you in what clan or in what realm he is reborn.” And Vaṅgīsa was actually able to make good the claim of his men. He called upon the spirit of the dead person, make it possess someone near him, and tell from that person’s mouth where the subject was, for instance where that dead person was reborn. For this miraculous feat, he reaped big sums of money from his clients.

Vaṅgīsa’s Time for Liberation

After a tour of the land covering cities, towns and villages, Vaṅgīsa’s men carried him to the city of Sāvattthī. Vaṅgīsa stopped near the Jetavana monastery and thought: “Ascetic Gotama is reputed to be wise. It would not be to my advantage just to carry on touring around Jambudīpa. I might as well go and see someone who is said to be wise.” So he sent his men away saying: “You go ahead. I do not want company when visiting the Buddha, let me go alone.” – “But sir,” the attendants of Vaṅgīsa protested, “by using his trickery, ascetic Gotama has a way of winning over people over who go to see him.” But, Vaṅgīsa paid no attention to those words. Going before the Buddha, and after saying courteous words of greeting, he sat at a suitable distance.

The Buddha asked Vaṅgīsa, the youth: “Vaṅgīsa, are you skilled in some art?” “Reverend Gotama,” said Vaṅgīsa, “I know a certain mantra called the skull (chava-sīsa).” – “What use do you make of that mantra?” – “Venerable Gotama, while chanting that mantra, if I rap with my finger-nails the skull of a dead person who had died more than three years ago, I can tell in which existence he is now reborn.”

Thereupon, the Buddha, by his powers, procured four human skulls: 1) One belonged to somebody in Niraya; 2) one belonged to somebody in the human realm; 3) one belonged to somebody in the Deva realm; 4) one belonged to an Arahāt. Vaṅgīsa, rapping the first skull, said: “Reverend Gotama, the person, whose skull it once was, is now reborn in Niraya.” – “Good, good, Vaṅgīsa,” said the Buddha, “you see rightly.” The Buddha, pointing to the second skull, asked: “Where is this person now whose skull it once was?” – “Reverend Gotama, that person is now reborn in the human realm.” The Buddha made another test about the third skull, and Vaṅgīsa said: “Reverend Gotama, that person is now reborn in the Deva realm.” All three revelations were correct.

When, however, the Buddha pointed out to the fourth skull and tested Vaṅgīsa’s skill, the Brahmin youth was in a quandary. Although he repeatedly rapped the skull and reflected on it, he could make neither head nor tail of the present existence of the person whose skull it was.

The Buddha asked: “Vaṅgīsa, are you at your wit’s end?” – “Wait on, Reverend Gotama,” said Vaṅgīsa, “let me try again.” He made further attempts, with more recitals of his famous mantra and more vain rappings on the skull. He found that the matter was clearly beyond his capability. Beads of sweat flowed down from his forehead. Looking a complete fool, the great Vaṅgīsa remained silent.

“Do you find it tiring, Vaṅgīsa?” asked the Buddha. “Verily, reverend Gotama, I find it most tiring. I cannot say the designation of the person whose skull it was. If your reverence knows it, kindly tell me.” – “Vaṅgīsa,” said the Buddha, “I know this being, and much more, too.” Then the Buddha uttered the following two verses (Dhp 419-420):

Cutiṃ yo vedi sattānaṃ, upapattiṃ ca sabbaso, asattaṃ Bhagavaṃ Buddhaṃ, tam-ahaṃ brūmi brāhmaṇaṃ.

Vaṅgīsa, he who knows clearly the death and rebirth of beings in all respects, who is free from attachment, who has walked the right path and realized Nibbāna, who knows the four noble truths, him I call a Brahmin.

[1288]

Yassa gatiṃ na jānanti, devā Gandhabba-mānusa, khīṇāsavaṃ Arahantaṃ, tam-ahaṃ brūmi Brāhmaṇaṃ.

Vaṅgīsa, he whose destination the Devas of the celestial abodes or the Gandhabbas of the terrestrial abodes, or men know, who has destroyed the four kinds of the pollutants, and is an Arahat, him I call a Brahmin.

In the present situation these verses, which are from the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada), were uttered for the benefit of Vaṅgīsa to let him know that the fourth skull belonged to an Arahat whose destination after death is not found in any of the five kinds of destinations.

Then Vaṅgīsa, the youth, said to the Buddha: “Reverend Gotama, there is no loss to him who exchanges a mantra for a mantra. I will give you my skull (chava- sīsa) mantra in exchange for your Buddha-mantra which you have just uttered.” The Buddha replied: “Vaṅgīsa, we Buddhas do not make any exchange of mantras. We give it free, out of good will, to those who want it.” – “Very well, Reverend Gotama,” said Vaṅgīsa, “may the Reverend Gotama give the mantra to me,” and he made an unmistakable gesture of reverence to the Buddha, with his two palms together which resembled a young tortoise.

Then the Buddha said: “Vaṅgīsa, in your Brahminic customs, is there a period of probation as a comprehensive way of fulfilling an obligation by someone who asks for and receives a favour?” – “There is, reverend Gotama.” – “Vaṅgīsa, do you think there is no probationary period for one who wishes to learn a mantra in our teaching?” It was in the Brahmanic tradition not to be satisfied in learning mantras. Vaṅgīsa felt he must get the Buddha-mantra at any cost. So he said: “Reverend Gotama, I will abide by your rules.” – “Vaṅgīsa, when we teach the Buddha-mantra we do so only to one who takes on the appearance like that of ourselves.”

Vaṅgīsa had set his mind on learning the Buddha-mantra after fulfilling the condition required by the Buddha, so he said to his followers: “Now, do not take it amiss about my becoming a monastic. I must learn the Buddha-mantra. Having learnt it, I will become the greatest master in this Jambudīpa, and that will be a good thing for you too.” After consoling his associates thus, Vaṅgīsa became a monastic for the purpose of learning the Buddha-mantra.

The preceptor who sponsored Vaṅgīsa in the formal ceremony of admission was Ven. Nigrodhakappa, an Arahāt, who happened to be near the Buddha at that time. The Buddha said to Ven. Nigrodhakappa: “Nigrodhakappa, Vaṅgīsa wishes to become a monastic. See to his admission into the Saṅgha.” Ven. Nigrodhakappa taught the meditation practice on the five aspects of the loathsomeness of the body to Vaṅgīsa and led him into the monastic life.<sup>282</sup>

Then the Buddha said to Ven. Vaṅgīsa: “Vaṅgīsa, now observe the probationer’s practice as a learner of the mantra,” and taught him how to reflect on the 32 parts of the body. Vaṅgīsa, being a man of keen intellect, uttering the 32 parts and meditating on the arising and dissolution of physical phenomena comprising the 32 parts, gained insight into physical phenomena and became an Arahat.

After Vaṅgīsa had become an Arahat, his Brahmin friends visited him to find out how he was progressing. They said to him: “Vaṅgīsa, how now? Have you learnt the mantra from ascetic Gotama?” – “Ah, yes, I have,” replied Ven. Vaṅgīsa. “Then let us go,” they said. “You go yourselves. I have no more business to be in your company.” On hearing this plain answer, the Brahmins said: “We had forewarned you that ascetic Gotama had a way of winning over his visitors by trickery. Now you have fallen under the spell of ascetic Gotama, What business is there for us with you?” Vituperating their erstwhile friend thus, [1289] they returned by the way they had come.

Ven. Vaṅgīsa was one of the most prominent of the monastic disciples of the Buddha. For his wonderful verses, refer to the Thematic Discourse concerning Vaṅgīsa (Vaṅgīsa-saṃyutta, SN 8).

Foremost Title Achieved

Ven. Vaṅgīsa was a born poet. Whenever he went before the Buddha, he always uttered verses in praise of the Buddha, comparing him in poetic similes to the moon, the sun, the sky, the great ocean, the noble tusker, the lion, etc. These verses which he sang extempore at the moment of casting his eyes on the Buddha, ran into thousands. Therefore, on an occasion when the Buddha mentioned the names of outstanding (etad-aggā) monastics to the congregation, he declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakanam bhikkhūnam
paṭibhānavantānam yad-idam Vaṅgīsa.*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples endowed with quick wit, Vaṅgīsa is the foremost (etad-aggā).

24. Ven. Upasena Vaṅgantaputta

Aspiration in the Past

In the past, Upasena Vaṅgantaputta was born into a worthy family in the city of Hamsavatī during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. When he came of age, he went to the Buddha’s monastery, like all the great future venerables, to listen to the Buddha’s discourse. There, he witnessed a monastic being declared by the Buddha as the foremost (etad-aggā) among those who gained the esteem of a wide following. The worthy man admired that monastic and made his aspiration to that honour in some future existence. The Buddha saw that the aspiration of the man would be fulfilled and made the prediction as in the cases of other similar aspirants. Then he returned to the monastery.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

That worthy man, after leading a life filled with good deeds, passed away into the fortunate destinations. At the time of Buddha Gotama, he was born into a family in the Brahmin village of Nālaka, in the country of Magadha. His mother was Sārī, the wife of a rich Brahmin. He was named Upasena in his boyhood. He grew up and learned the three Vedas, but after hearing the Dhamma from the Buddha, he was deeply devoted to the Buddha and became his disciple.

Ven. Upasena, who had one Rains Retreat (Vassa) in the monastic life, had a desire to increase the number of monastics. He admitted a man into the state of a novice and then raised him to full monastic life. Ven. Upasena, at the end of the Rains Retreat, after attending the usual congregation of monastics, went to see the Buddha together with his own close disciple who was then of one Rains Retreat as a monastic and, himself, as preceptor to that monastic, of two Rains Retreat as a monastic, thinking that the Buddha would be pleased with him for his well-intended act of admitting a newcomer into the Saṅgha.

As Ven. Upasena was sitting in a suitable place before the Buddha, the Buddha said to him: “Monastic, how many Rains Retreats have you spent as a monastic?” “Two Rains Retreats, venerable sir,” Upasena replied. “How many Rains Retreats has that monastic who accompanies you?” – “One Rains Retreat, venerable sir.” – “How are you two related?” – “He is my close disciple, venerable sir.” – “You vain man, you are bent on gaining the four requisites very quickly.” The Buddha then denounced Ven. Upasena on many grounds.

Then the Buddha pronounced a rule thus: “Monastics, let no monastic, who has not completed ten Rains Retreats (Vassa) in the Saṅgha, admit a person into the monastic life. He who infringes this rule incurs a minor breach of the [1290] discipline (dukkata). Monastics, I allow a monastic with ten Rains Retreats (Vassa) or more to act as preceptor to a new monastic in the admission of that person into the monastic life.” These two Vinaya rules came about concerning Ven. Upasena (Vin Mv 1, PTS 1.59).

Upasena, on being reprimanded by the Buddha, thought of receiving praise from the Buddha on account of the following. “I will make the words of praise, with reference to this very question of following, come out of the same mouth of the Fortunate One, which is splendid like the full moon,” so he encouraged himself. On that same day, he went into seclusion, meditated with diligence, cultivated insight and in a few days became an Arahāt.

Upasena was a monastic with a celebrated family background. With his reputation throughout the land as an able expounder of the doctrine, he earned the confidence and good will of many boys of worthy families who were his blood relations or friends. These young boys became novices under his guidance. But he made an understanding with them at the outset: “Boys, I am an avowed dweller in the forest. If you can live in the forest like me, you may become novices,” and he told them the elements of the thirteen kinds of austere practice (dhutaṅga). Only those boys who could take up the austere practices were admitted as novices by him, but only to such an extent as their tender ages could take. When Ven. Upasena himself had completed ten Rains Retreats (Vassa) as a monastic he mastered the Vinaya and admitted the novices into full monastic life, acting as their preceptor. The number of those monastics under his preceptorship grew to as many as 500.

During those days, the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattthī. At one time, the Buddha said to the monastics: “Monastics, I wish to remain alone for half a month,” and stayed in seclusion. Then the Saṅgha made a mutual agreement amongst themselves that any monastic who went near the Buddha alone would have to make a formal confession of his guilt for doing so.

Ven. Upasena, accompanied by his disciples, went to the Jetavana monastery to pay homage to the Buddha, and after paying respects to the Buddha, they sat in a suitable place. Then the Buddha, intending to start a conversation, asked a young monastic who was a close disciple of Ven. Upasena: “Monastic, do you like wearing rag robes?” The young monastic made a preliminary statement: “I do not like it, venerable sir,” but went on to explain that although he did not personally like it, out of his high regard for his preceptor, he observed the austere practice of wearing rag robes. The Buddha praised Upasena for that, and also said many words in praise of Upasena on various other counts.

This is only a brief account of Upasena’s earning the Buddha’s approbation. For details refer to the Vinaya (Vin Pār, PTS 3.230). It may be noted that in that text, the Buddha is recorded to have said: “I wish to go into seclusion for three months,” whereas the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) says the Buddha wished to have “half a month of seclusion.” We would recommend the three months version of the text as more authoritative.

Foremost Title Achieved

On one occasion, sitting in the congregation to declare outstanding monastics, the Buddha declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakanāṃ bhikkhūnaṃ
samanta-pāsādikānaṃ yad-idaṃ Upaseno Vaṅgantaputto.*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who win the high esteem of their following, Upasena Vaṅgantaputta is the foremost (etad-aggā). [1291]

Upasena’s Tragic Demise

At one time Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Upasena were dwelling near Rājagaha at the Sappasoṇḍika Cave, the cave resembling a snake’s hood, in the ebony forest. At that time, a poisonous snake fell onto the body of Ven. Upasena.

Ven. Upasena was stitching a double robe near the entrance of the cave where a light breeze was blowing. At that moment, one of the two poisonous snakes that were mating on the roof of the cave fell down onto his shoulder. It was a highly poisonous snake whose venom was so potent that mere contact with it was lethal. So the body of Ven. Upasena burnt like a wick in a lamp, spreading its heat all over the body. He knew that his body would be burnt away in no time but he made a wish that his body should remain intact inside the cave, and thereby prolonged the decay.

Then Ven. Upasena called the monastics, saying: “Friends, come! Put this body of mine on the cot and carry it outside before this body disintegrates here like a ball of chaff.”

Thereupon Ven. Sāriputta said to Ven. Upasena: “We do not see any change in the body and any change in the faculties of Ven. Upasena. Yet Ven. Upasena said: ‘Friend, come! Put this body of mine on the cot and carry it outside before this body disintegrates like a ball of chaff.’”

This was said by Ven. Sāriputta because there was no change in the bodily appearance and the facial expression of Ven. Upasena, as is usual with ordinary people at the hour of death.

Then Ven. Upasena said: “Friend Sāriputta, as a matter of fact, only in one who views through wrong view and craving, such as: ‘I am the eye, the eye is mine,’ or, ‘I am the ear, the ear is mine; I am the nose, the nose is mine; I am the tongue, the tongue is mine; I am the body the body is mine; I am the mind, the mind is mine,’ do changes in the body and changes in the faculties occur.

Friend Sāriputta, I do not have any view either through wrong view or through craving, such as: ‘I am the eye, the eye is mine’ or ... ‘I am the mind, the mind is mine.’ Friend Sāriputta, how should there be any change in the body or any change in the faculties in me who does not hold such views?”

Ven. Sāriputta said: “It is indeed so, friend Upasena. Since you, friend Upasena, have long ago removed the wrong view of ‘my self,’ the craving to ‘mine,’ and the conceit ‘I,’ it is not possible for such views to arise, either through wrong view or through craving, such as: ‘I am the eye, the eye is mine’ or ... ‘I am the mind, the mind is mine.’”

Then the monastics put the body of Ven. Upasena on a cot and carried it outside. There and then Ven. Upasena’s body disintegrated like a ball of chaff and he passed away realizing the exhaustion of rebirth.

This account is also on record in the Discourse on Upasena and the Snake (Upasena-asivisa-sutta, SN 35.69) and the commentary thereon.

25. Ven. Dabba

Aspiration in the Past

The future Dabba was born as a worthy man in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. On coming of age, he visited the Buddha’s monastery and while listening to a discourse by the Buddha, he witnessed a monastic being declared by him as the foremost among those monastics who prepared living places for the Saṅgha. He admired that monastic and after making great offerings to the Buddha, he expressed his aspiration for a similar distinguished recognition during the time of some [1292] Future Buddha. The Buddha saw that the supporter's aspiration would be fulfilled and made the prediction before returning to the monastery.

Meditating on Top of a Mountain

The future Ven. Dabba, having received the prediction from the Buddha, lived a full life filled with good deeds. On his death, he was reborn in the Deva realm and subsequently either in the Deva realm or the human realm. During the waning years of the teaching of Buddha Kassapa, he was reborn as a worthy man and took up the monastic life. He found six other monastics who shared the view that living amongst people was not the correct way for gaining Awakening and that a real monastic must live in seclusion, and so they went up a high steep mountain by means of a ladder. Once at the top, they discussed among themselves: "He who has self-confidence, let him push away the ladder. He who clings to his life, let him go down by the ladder before it has been pushed away." All seven monastics chose to remain on the mountain top until they attained Awakening and so they pushed away the ladder. "Now, friends, be diligent in your monastic practice," they exhorted one another before choosing a place of their own on the mountain to strive for path-knowledge, ignoring the danger of death.

Of these seven monastics, the eldest became an Arahant on the fifth day. He knew he had finished what was required of the noble practice and went to Uttarakuru, the northern island continent, by means of his powers, to collect alms food. Having collected the alms food, he came back and offered it to his six monastic companions with these encouraging words: "Friends, have this meal. Let me be responsible for alms food collection. You devote yourselves to your meditation." Then the remaining six replied: "Friend, have we made an agreement among us that he who first realises the supermundane Dhamma would be responsible to feed those who still have to reach that same goal?" The Arahant said: "No, friends, there was no such agreement." Then the six monastics said: "Venerable sir, you have become an Arahant according to your past merit. We too would make an end of the suffering round of Saṃsāra if we could. May the venerable go wherever he pleases."

The eldest monastic, being unable to persuade the six monastics into accepting the alms food, took the meal at a suitable distance and left them. On the seventh day, the second eldest monastic attained the state of Non-returner (Anāgāmi-phala). He too went to the northern island-continent by means of his powers and offered the alms food to the remaining colleagues. Being refused by his friends, he ate his meal at some suitable place and left. After the death and dissolution of his body, he was reborn in the Pure Abodes of the Non-returning (Anāgāmī) Brahmas.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

The remaining five monastics did not achieve path-knowledge during that existence. After passing away from that existence, they were reborn in the Deva realm and the human realm throughout the long aeons in the interval period between Buddha Kassapa and Buddha Gotama. During the time of Buddha Gotama, they were reborn in various countries:

1. One was born in Gandhāra, in the city of Takkasilā, as a member of the royal family, and later became King Pukkusāti.

2. Another in Pabbateyya, also called the Majjhantika region, as the son of a female wandering ascetic, later he became Sabhiya, the wandering ascetic.

[His story is not told in these Chronicles, but see the Verses of the Elder Monks (Thera-gāthā, Thag 188), and its commentary.]

3. The third one, in a household in Bāhiya country, later became Ven. Bāhiya.
4. The fourth one, in a Rājagaha household was later known as Kumāra Kassapa.
5. The last in the Malla Country, in the city of Anupiya, in the royal family of a Malla Prince, later became Ven. Dabba.

The mother of the future great elder Dabba died when she was about to deliver the child. When her dead body was being cremated on a pyre, the womb burst open due to heat but, thanks to his past merit, he was shot up into the air and fell safely on a heap of dabba grass, and was thus named by his grandmother Dabba.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1955

The term dabba has two meanings: “A kind of grass” and “a pile of faggots.” In the Traditions (Apādāna) in verse 143, it is said: Patito dabba-puñjamhi taro Dabbo ti vissuto, “I fell on a pile of grass, therefore I became well-known as Dabba.” In the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya), in the Light on the Essence of Meaning (Sārattha-dīpanī), and the commentary on the Verses of the Elder Monks (Thera-gāthā), he is [1293] said to have fallen on faggots. The present author prefers the meaning “grass” here.

When the young Dabba was seven years of age, the Buddha, in the company of many monastics, arrived in Anupiya during a tour of the Malla Country where he took up a temporary abode in the Anupiya Mango Grove. Young Dabba was enthralled at seeing the Buddha and asked his grandmother for permission to enter the Saṅgha. The grandmother consented and she took the boy to the Buddha and asked for the boy’s admission into the Saṅgha.

The Buddha gave a monastic near him the task of admitting the boy into the Saṅgha, saying: “See to this boy’s admission as a novice.” The elder then taught him how to reflect on the loathsomeness of the body, which was represented by its five parts: hair, body hair, nails, teeth and skin.

As shaving the head in a first step in ordaining a boy into a novice, this reflection is a most appropriate thing, which the preceptor invariably enjoins on the potential novice, asking him to say the five words out loud and reflect on their meaning.

Young Dabba reflected on them while his head was being shaved. Young Dabba had sufficing conditions for Awakening; moreover, he had aspired to a distinguished monastic life 100,000 aeons ago during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. Hence, as soon as the first circle of hair on his head was shaved, he attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala); by the time the second circle of hair was shaved, he attained Once-returning (Sakadāgāmī-phala); by the time the third circle of hair was shaved, he attained Non-returning (Anāgāmi-phala); and when the head was clean-shaven, he became an Arahāt. In short, the completion of the shaving of his head and the attainment of his becoming an Arahāt took place simultaneously.

After spending such time as was needed for bringing Awakening to those deserving release from Saṃsāra, the Buddha returned to Rājagaha to dwell at the Veḷuvana monastery. Novice Dabba, now an Arahat, also accompanied the Buddha there.

Once settled in Rājagaha, Ven. Dabba, going into seclusion, thought to himself: “I have nothing more to do to become an Arahat. It would be well if I served the Saṅgha by arranging for their living places and directing them to their respective supporters of alms food.” He disclosed his idea to the Buddha. The Buddha lauded him for it and assigned him the double task: the preparation of living places for the members of the Saṅgha, for which the Saṅgha was to recognize him as such (senāsana-paññāpaka) and directing members of the Saṅgha to their respective supporters of alms food, for which the Saṅgha was to recognize him as such (bhattuddesaka).

The Buddha was pleased to see the seven-year-old Dabba having attained such eminence in his teaching as being endowed with the four analytical knowledges, the six supernormal powers and the three knowledges. Therefore, although very young, the Buddha raised the novice, Arahat Dabba, to the monastic life.

Incidentally, there were also other novice Arahats, such as novice Paṇḍita, novice Saṅkicca, novice Sopāka, novice Revata, the youngest brother of Ven. Sāriputta, who were raised to full monastic life although under 20 because they had become Arahats. Although young in age, these monastics had attained the acme of the monastic life, and hence deserved to be called elders (thera).

From the time of becoming a full monastic, Ven. Dabba arranged living places and allocated alms food among the various supporters to the Saṅgha for all the monastics residing at Rājagaha. This, he did with competence, not allowing a slip in the alms distribution which had to be done by seniority.

The good name of the young Arahat monk, who came of the Malla royal family, who was very caring to monastics, who was very considerate in finding places where like-minded monastics could stay together, who was able to get living places at far-off locations for visiting monastics according to their instructions, helping disabled or sick monastics by his own supernormal power, spread to all directions.

Many visiting monastics would ask for normally impossible living places at odd hours, at far-off locations, such as the Mango Grove monastery of Jīvaka, the sanctuary at [1294] Maddakucchi monastery, etc., and to their astonishment, they got them through the supernormal powers of Ven. Dabba. Ven. Dabba, by his powers, created as many mind-made replicas of himself, as his tasks demanded. Then, by his psychic power, with his fingers emitting light in the darkness of night, and serving as bright lamps, he, or rather, a replica of himself, would lead his guests to the places of their choice, show them their living place and sleeping place.

This is a brief description. For details see the section giving the Training Rule about Anger (Duṭṭha-dosa-sikkhāpada, Vin Pār, PTS 3.158).

Foremost Title Achieved

In consideration of Ven. Dabba's noble services to the Saṅgha with experience and competence, the Buddha, on one occasion, declared to the congregation of monastics:

senāsana-paññāpakānam yad-idam Dabbo Mallaputto.*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who make arrangements for living places for the Saṅgha, Dabba of the Malla royal family is the foremost (etad-aggā).

Since the Buddha assigned Ven. Dabba the duties of seeing to the accommodation of monastics, Ven. Dabba kept all the eighteen big monastic compounds around Rājagaha clean, both inside the dwelling places and around them. He never missed cleaning a sitting place or a sleeping place or placing water for drinking and washing for the monastics.

Dabba as a Victim of Slander

Even though Ven. Dabba was a truly virtuous monastic, he was a victim of slander perpetrated by a group of evil monastics led by Ven. Mettiya and Ven. Bhummajaka who accused him of complicity with a nun named Ven. Mettiyā.

For details refer to the Vinaya (Vin Pār, PTS 3.158); and the Chapter on Settlements (Samathakkhandhaka, Vin Cv 4, PTS 2.74). This unhappy event was the consequence of his own past misdeed. Ninety-one aeons previously, during the time of Buddha Vipassī, he had slandered an Arahat, although knowing him to be pure.

Ven. Dabba's Parinibbāna

[Based on the Udāna and its commentary (Udāna, Ud 8.9-10).]

On the day Ven. Dabba was to pass away, he returned to the Veḷuvana monastery from his alms round, having taken his meal, and after paying respects to the Buddha, washed his feet to cool them; then he sat on the small mat at a secluded spot, and entered into the attainment of cessation for a specified period.

After rising from the absorption (jhāna) at the pre-determined time, he reviewed his life-faculty and knew that he was going to live just for only a few moments (muhutta) more. He thought it improper for him to pass away in seclusion without saying farewell to the Buddha and his co-residents. He felt obliged to say farewell to the Buddha and to display miracles before he died, in the future interest of those who had wrong opinions of him due to the slanderous attack of the monastics Mettiya and Bhummajaka, who would thereby be enabled to see his true worth. So he went before the Buddha, made obeisance, and sitting in a suitable place, said: “Fortunate One, my time to pass away has arrived.”

The Buddha reviewed the life-faculty of Ven. Dabba, knew that he was just about to pass, and said: “Dabba, you know the time for your passing.” Ven. Dabba then made obeisance to the Buddha, walked around him thrice, with him on his right, and then he stood at a suitable distance and said: “Venerable sir, we had fared in the world together in various existences for a period of 100,000 aeons. My performance of good deeds had been aimed at becoming an Arahat. The goal is already achieved. This is the last time I am seeing the Fortunate One.” It was a touching moment. From among the monastics, those who were worldlings, Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna), or Once-returners (Sakadāgāmī), felt very miserable, while some others wept.

The Buddha knew what was in the mind of Ven. Dabba and said: “Dabba, that [1295] being so, display miracles for us and the Saṅgha to witness.” No sooner had the Buddha said these words than all members of the Saṅgha of monastics were present on the scene. Then Ven. Dabba displayed the miracles pertaining to the disciples of the Buddha, such as: “From one, he became many; from many, he became one; now he was visible, and now he was invisible, etc.” Then he made obeisance to the Buddha again.

Then Ven. Dabba rose in the air and created mind-made earth in mid-air, on which he sat cross-legged and meditated on the heat device (tejo-kasiṇa) as the preliminary step. After emerging from the absorption (jhāna), concentrating on the element of heat, he made his solemn wish that his body rise up in flames. Then he entered into the absorption of the element of heat (tejo-dhātu) which is the basis of attaining supernormal powers. On emerging from that absorption, the thought-process pertaining to supernormal power arose in him. At the first impulse thought-moment of that thought process, his body became ablaze and consumed his entire corporeality, comparable in power to the world-destroying fires, so that not a trace of the body, the conditioned physical phenomenon, remained. No ash whatsoever was to be seen. Then the blaze was completely extinguished as desired by Ven. Dabba. At the end of the supernormal thought-process, the mind reverted to life-continuum, which, in this moment, was identifiable with death. Thus ended the life of Ven. Dabba, who passed away and realized Nibbāna, making an end of suffering (dukkha).

26. Ven. Pilinda Vaccha

Aspiration in the Past

The future Ven. Pilinda Vaccha was born into a rich family in the city of Hamsavatī during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. As with the other future great venerables, he went to the Buddha's monastery, where, in the course of a discourse, he witnessed a monastic being proclaimed by the Buddha as the foremost among the monastics who were adored by Devas. As such, he had a strong desire to become such a great monastic in the future and made his aspiration before the Buddha. The Buddha saw that his aspiration would be fulfilled in future and made the prediction to that effect.

Homage Paid to a Shrine and the Saṅgha

The future Ven. Pilinda Vaccha, after a life of good deeds, passed away and was reborn in the Deva realm and subsequently, either in the Deva realm or human realm. During the time of Buddha Sumedha, he was reborn as a human being. He made great offerings at the great shrine, which was erected in honour of the Buddha who had passed away. He also made great offerings to the Saṅgha.

During a certain period, before the advent of the Buddha, the future Ven. Pilinda Vaccha was also reborn as a Universal Monarch, who profitably used his great opportunity and power in establishing the people in the five moral precepts.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

This is from the commentary to The Discourse about Pilindi Vaccha (Udāna, Ud 3.6).

When Buddha Gotama was about to appear, the future Ven. Pilinda Vaccha was reborn as a Brahmin in Sāvattthī. His name was Pilinda; his clan name being Vaccha, thus he was called Pilinda Vaccha. Since young Pilinda Vaccha had a natural disenchantment with the world, he became an ascetic and studied the magical art known as the Cūḷa Gandhāra, which consisted of some powerful mantras. Having gained mastery of these mantras, he became adept at reading the minds of other people and was able to travel in the air. He became the greatest sage in Rājagaha, commanding a big following and amassing much wealth.

Then Buddha Gotama appeared in the world, and after a tour of the country, he reached Rājagaha. From the time the Buddha arrived in Rājagaha, the powers of Pilinda Vaccha were visibly impaired. However much he chanted his mantras, he could not travel in [1296] the air and he could not read other people's minds. He had heard that although a master in his own way, his art belonged to the lower grade, and that when someone who had mastered the art of a higher grade happened to come near him or within his range, he would meet with a waning of his own powers. He bethought himself: "That statement that I had heard from my teacher's teachers must be true, for since ascetic Gotama came to Rājagaha, my art has been visibly impaired. Ascetic Gotama certainly must be a master of the higher art. It would be well if I approached ascetic Gotama and learned his art." He then went to the Buddha and said: "Venerable sir, I wish to learn a certain art from you. May the venerable one agree."

The Buddha said: "If you wish to learn the art, you must become a monastic." Pilinda Vaccha thought that becoming a monastic was the preliminary step in learning the art that he had in mind, and he agreed to become a monastic. The Buddha gave Pilinda Vaccha the meditation subject which suited his temperament and he, being endowed with sufficing conditions for Awakening, gained insight and soon became an Arahāt.

Ven. Pilinda Vaccha's use of Harsh Words

Ven. Pilinda Vaccha had a unique habit of calling other persons “outcaste” (vasala-samudācara), in such ways as: “Come, you outcaste,” or “Go, you outcaste,” or “Bring it, outcaste” or “Take it, outcaste,” etc.

The monastics referred this strange habit of Ven. Pilinda Vaccha to the Buddha. They asked: “Venerable sir, do noble ones (ariya) use such harsh language?” And the Buddha said: “Monastics, noble ones (ariya) do not use harsh words in derision. Yet, due to ingrained habit that has been acquired in successive past existences, harsh words may come to be used inadvertently.” The monastics said: “Venerable sir, Ven. Pilinda Vaccha, when speaking to other persons, whether with lay persons or monastics, always calls the other person an outcaste. What is the reason for this?”

“Monastics, Pilinda Vaccha, in his previous 500 successive existences was born a high class Brahmin who was used to calling every other person an “outcaste” (vasala). That habit became ingrained in him. He does not mean what he says in using the word “outcaste.” He has no evil intent. His word, though harsh to hear, is harmless. A noble one (ariya), being without a trace of malice, incurs no blame for using such habituated harsh language.” Further, the Buddha, on that occasion, spoke the following verse (Dhp 408):

*Akakkasam̐ viññāpanim̐, giram̐ saccam-udīraye,
yāya nābhisaje kañci, tam-aham brūmi brāhmaṇam̐.*

He who speaks gently, informative and true words and who does not offend anyone by speech, him I call a Brahmin.

At the end of this verse by the Buddha, many hearers gained Awakening at various levels, such as Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala), and so on.

It should be remembered that the word “outcaste” is harsh for someone to be used against him, but since Ven. Pilinda Vaccha had no malice in using it, it is not called a form of demeritorious speech.

Pepper to Rat's Droppings

One day, in the course of collecting alms food in Rājagaha, Ven. Pilinda Vaccha met a man entering the city with a bowl full of pepper, and asked him: “What is that in your bowl, you outcaste?” The man was offended. He thought: “How inauspicious, early in the morning to be called an outcaste. This monastic deserves rude language to match his rudeness.” So thinking, he replied: “It is rat’s droppings, venerable sir.”

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1962

Herein, Ven. Pilinda Vaccha used a harsh word without malice but in a friendly attitude, spoken out of sheer habit only; hence his word “outcaste” does not [1297] amount to the use of harsh language. However, the man’s reply was full of anger and his intended harsh language used against an Arahat has dire consequences that took immediate effect.

Ven. Pilinda Vaccha said: “So be it, outcaste.” When that man went out of sight of Ven. Pilinda Vaccha, he found to his astonishment that the bowl in which he had put the pepper, was now filled with rat’s droppings! Since the pepper had a rough resemblance to rat’s droppings, to make sure he placed a few of the contents in his hands and crushed it, and surely it proved to be rat’s droppings only. He felt very unhappy. He was carrying his merchandise of pepper in a cart. He wondered whether all the pepper in the cart had also turned into rat’s droppings. He went back to the cart and found that the cartload of pepper had also turned into rat’s droppings. His spirits sank. With his hand pressed against his pained heart, he reflected: “This is a mishap befallen on me after meeting that monastic. I am sure there must be some way to redeem this misfortune.”

Or, according to the Sinhalese reading, he thought: “That monastic certainly knows some magic. I should follow the monastic, find out about him, and see what it is all about.”

Someone then noticed the pepper merchant in a deeply agitated state and said to him: “Hey, man, you look so cross. What’s the matter with you?” The merchant related what had passed between him and Ven. Pilinda Vaccha. The man then said: “Friend, do not worry. You must have met our teacher Ven. Pilinda Vaccha. Go with your bowl of rat’s droppings and stand in front of him. He will ask you: ‘What is that in your bowl, you rascal?’ Then you say to him: ‘That’s pepper, venerable sir.’ Ven. Pilinda Vaccha will say: ‘So be it, rascal,’ and you will find your bowl full of pepper again, and so the whole cartload.” The merchant did as instructed and all his pepper returned to its original state.

Foremost Title Achieved

Ven. Pilinda Vaccha, during the period before the Buddha appeared in the world, had been a Universal Monarch. He then established people in the five moral precepts, thereby leading them to the Deva Realms. Most of the Devas, in the six Deva realms pertaining to the sensual sphere, were indebted to him as the Universal Monarch who had brought them to those fortunate destinations. They paid homage to him day and night. That was why when the occasion arose for the Buddha to announce distinguished disciples, he declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakanāṃ bhikkhūnaṃ
Devatānaṃ piya-manāpānaṃ yad-idam Pilindavaccho.*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who are adored by Devas, Pilinda Vaccha is the foremost (etad-agga).

27. Ven. Bāhiya Dārucīriya

The original name of this elder was Bāhiya which indicated the country he was born in. Later, he was known as Bāhiya Dārucīriya, “Bāhiya-clad-in-fibres,” because he wore wood fibre as his garment, the circumstances for which will be related here.

Aspiration in the Past

The future Bāhiya Dārucīriya was born into a worthy family in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. As with other future great venerables, he visited the Buddha’s monastery and while listening to a discourse, he witnessed a monastic being declared by the Buddha as the foremost among the monastics who attained Awakening quickly. He was wished to emulate that monastic. So after making a great offering, he expressed his aspiration before the Buddha to receive that distinction in the future. The Buddha saw that the aspiration would be fulfilled and made the prediction. [1298]

Meditating on Top of a Mountain

The future Bāhiya Dārucīriya spent all his life in doing deeds of merit and after his death, he was reborn in the Deva realm and subsequently, either in the human world or the Deva realm.

During the waning years of the teaching of Buddha Kassapa, he was reborn as a worthy man and took up the monastic life. He found six other monastics who shared the view that living amongst people was not the correct way for gaining

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1964

Awakening and that a real monastic must live in seclusion, and so they went up a high steep mountain by means of a ladder. Once at the top, they discussed among themselves: “He who has self-confidence, let him push away the ladder. He who clings to his life, let him go down by the ladder before it has been pushed away.” All seven monastics chose to remain on the mountain top until they attained Awakening and so they pushed away the ladder. “Now, friends, be diligent in your monastic practice,” they exhorted one another before choosing a place of their own on the mountain to strive for path-knowledge, ignoring the danger of death.

Of these seven monastics, the eldest became an Arahat on the fifth day. He knew he had finished what was required of the noble practice and went to Uttarakuru, the northern island continent, by means of his powers, to collect alms food. Having collected the alms food, he came back and offered it to his six monastic companions with these encouraging words: “Friends, have this meal. Let me be responsible for alms food collection. You devote yourselves to your meditation.” Then the remaining six replied: “Friend, have we made an agreement among us that he who first realises the supermundane Dhamma would be responsible to feed those who still have to reach that same goal?” The Arahat said: “No, friends, there was no such agreement.” Then the six monastics said: “Venerable sir, you have become an Arahat according to your past merit. We too would make an end of the suffering round of Samsāra if we could. May the venerable go wherever he pleases.”

The eldest monastic, being unable to persuade the six monastics into accepting the alms food, took the meal at a suitable distance and left them. On the seventh day, the second eldest monastic attained the state of Non-returner (Anāgāmi-phala). He too went to the northern island-continent by means of his powers and offered the alms food to the remaining colleagues. Being refused by his friends, he ate his meal at some suitable place and left. After the death and dissolution of his body, he was reborn in the Pure Abodes of the Non-returning (Anāgāmī) Brahmas.

The remaining five monastics did not achieve path-knowledge during that existence. After passing away from that existence, they were reborn in the Deva realm and the human realm throughout the long aeons in the interval period between Buddha Kassapa and Buddha Gotama. During the time of Buddha Gotama, they were reborn in various countries:

1. One was born in Gandhāra, in the city of Takkasilā, as a member of the royal family, and later became King Pukkusāti.
2. Another in Pabbateyya, also called the Majjhantika region, as the son of a female wandering ascetic, later he became Sabhiya, the wandering ascetic.
3. The third one, in a household in Bāhiya country, later became Ven. Bāhiya.
4. The fourth one, in a Rājagaha household was later known as Kumāra Kassapa.
5. The last in the Malla Country, in the city of Anupiya, in the royal family of a Malla Prince, later became Ven. Dabba.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

During the interval between the two, Buddha Kassapa and Buddha Gotama, he remained in Deva existences. When Buddha Gotama was about to appear, he was reborn into a worthy family in the country of Bāhiya. When he grew up, he married and went on a sea voyage to Suvanṇabhūmi on a trading venture. The ship was wrecked on the high seas and all except Bāhiya perished and became the food of fishes and turtles.

As for him, being destined to fare in Saṃsāra till the last existence, he survived holding on to a piece of the wrecked ship for seven days. He was driven awash on the sands of Suppāraka, a seaport town. Before meeting anyone, he had to cover up his naked body. So he wrapped himself with a shroud of water plant from a reservoir. Then he picked a used old vessel for his alms bowl.

His austere appearance attracted the attention of the people. “If there is an Arahat in the world, this must be him!” so they said about him. They wondered whether the man, who was a holy man in their judgment, was observing an austere practice of the extreme type, and therefore was denying himself proper clothing. To verify their perception, they offered fine clothing to him. But Bāhiya thought to himself: “These people receive me because of my austere clothing only. It is well if I remain ill-clad so that their esteem for me will continue.” So he refused the fine clothes. As a result, the people had even greater respect for him and honoured him lavishly.

After having his meal, collected as alms from the people, Bāhiya retired to a traditional shrine. The people followed him there. They cleaned up the place for him to stay. Bāhiya then thought: “Just because of my external appearance these people show so much reverence to me. It behoves me to live up to their perception. I must remain an ascetic, well and true.” He collected fibres from wood and, stringing them up with twine, clothed himself after his own mode of clothing, and from that time, he got the name “Bāhiya Dārucīriya,” Bāhiya-in-wood-fibres.

Brahma’s Admonition

Of the seven monastics who went to the top a mountain to meditate for insight during the later part of Buddha Kassapa’s time, the second monastic attained Non-returning (Anāgāmi-phala) and was reborn in the Suddhāvāsa. As soon as he was reborn in that Brahma realm, he reviewed his previous life and saw that he was one of the seven monastics who had gone to the top of a steep mountain to meditate and that one had become an Arahat in that existence. Of the remaining five, he took an interest in their present existence and saw that all of them were reborn in the Deva Realms.

Now seeing that one of them had become a bogus Arahat at Suppāraka, living on the credulity of the people, he felt it was his duty to put his former friend on the right course. He felt sorry for Bāhiya Dārucīriya because, in his former life, this monastic was of a very high moral principle, even refusing the alms food collected by his colleague, the Arahat. He also wished to draw Bāhiya’s attention to the appearance of Buddha Gotama in the world. He thought of causing spiritual urgency in his old friend and in that instant he descended from the Brahma realm and appeared before Bāhiya Dārucīriya in all his personal splendour.

Bāhiya Dārucīriya was suddenly attracted by the strange luminosity and came out of his dwelling. He saw the Brahma and, raising his joined palms together, asked: “Who are you, sir?” – “I am an old friend of yours. During the later part of Buddha Kassapa’s time, I was one of the seven monastics, including yourself, who went up a steep mountain and practised [1299] meditation for insight. I attained Non-returning (Anāgāmi-phala), and have been reborn in the Brahma world. The eldest of us became an Arahāt then and has passed away from existence. The remaining five of you, after passing away from that existence, were reborn in the Deva Realms. I have come to you to admonish you against making a living on the credulity of people.

O Bāhiya, you have not become an Arahāt; you have not attained the Arahāt path (Arahatta-magga); you have not even started training yourself to become an Arahāt. You have not got an iota of the right practice to become an Arahāt. The Buddha has now appeared in the world, and is residing at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattihī. I urge you to go and see him.” After admonishing him thus, the Brahma returned to his abode.

Attainment of Awakening

Bāhiya Dārucīriya was stirred with spiritual urgency by the words of the Brahma and decided to seek the path that leads to Nibbāna. He went straight to Sāvattihī. Covering the 120 league distance in just one night, he reached Sāvattihī in the morning.

The Buddha knew that Bāhiya Dārucīriya was coming to see him but seeing that his faculties, such as faith, were not ripe enough to receive the truth and in order to let them ripen, he delayed receiving Bāhiya Dārucīriya and went into the city to collect alms food, accompanied by many monastics.

After the Buddha had left the Jetavana monastery, Bāhiya Dārucīriya entered the monastery and found some monastics strolling in the open after having had their breakfast, so as to prevent drowsiness. He asked them where the Buddha had gone, and was told that he had gone on alms round in the city. The monastics inquired from him which place he had come from. “I come from Suppāraka port, venerable sirs.” – “You have come from quite afar. Wash your feet, apply some oil to smooth your legs, and rest a while. The Fortunate One will not be long returning and you will see him.”

Although the monastics very kindly extended their hospitality, Bāhiya Dārucīriya was impatient. He said: “Venerable sirs, I cannot know if I am to meet with some danger to my life. I have come post-haste, covering the 120 league distance in just one night, not allowing myself any rest on the way. I must see the Fortunate One before thinking of any rest.” So saying, he proceeded into the city and got a full view of the Buddha who commanded an unrivalled personality. As he viewed the Buddha proceeding along the road, he reflected thus: “Ah, what a long time had passed before I have the opportunity of seeing a Fortunate One!” He stood rooted on the spot from where he was watching the Buddha, his heart filled with delightful satisfaction, his eyes never so much as winking, and riveted on the person of the Buddha. With his body bent down in salutation to the Buddha, and himself immersed in the glorious aura of the Buddha, he drew himself towards him, prostrating on the ground with the hands, knees and forehead touching the ground and worshipping and caressing the Buddha’s feet reverentially, kissed them enthusiastically.

He said: “Venerable sir, may the Fortunate One give me a discourse. The discourse of the Fortunate One will be of benefit to me for a long time.” The Buddha said: “Bāhiya, this is not the time for giving a discourse. We are in the city on alms round.”

Herein it might be asked: “Has the Buddha any inappropriate time for seeing to the welfare of the sentient world?” The answer: “The inappropriate time,” here refers not to the Buddha, but only to the recipient of the Buddha’s message. It is beyond the ordinary person, even for an ordinary Arahāt for that matter, to know the ripeness of a person’s faculties to be able to receive the Buddha’s message. Bāhiya’s faculties were not yet ripe to receive it. But it would be futile to say so to him, for he would not make head or tail out of it. That was why the Buddha only gave the reason: “We are on alms round,” for not giving a discourse and did not mention the faculties. The point is that although the Buddha is ever ready to give a discourse to a person who is ready to understand it. The Buddha knows [1300] when that person is ready and when he is not. He does not give a discourse until the hearer’s faculties are ripe because by doing so, the discourse would not bring Awakening to him.

When this was said by the Buddha, Bāhiya Dārucīriya said for a second time: “Venerable sir, it is not possible for me to know if the Fortunate One were to meet with some danger to his life, or if I were to meet with some danger to my life. Therefore, may the Fortunate One give me a discourse. The discourse of the Fortunate One will be of benefit to me for a long time.”

And for the second time the Buddha said: “Bāhiya, this is not the time for giving a discourse. We are in the city on the alms round.”

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1969

Herein, Bāhiya had such great concern for his safety because he was destined to live this life as his last existence and his past merit prompted him to mention the extreme urgency about his safety. The reason is that for one destined to live his last life in Samsāra, it is not possible that he dies without becoming an Arahāt. The Buddha wanted to give a discourse to Bāhiya and yet had to refuse for a second time for these reasons: He knew that Bāhiya was overwhelmed by delightful satisfaction on seeing him which was not conducive to gaining insight and Bāhiya's mind needed to be calmed down into a state of equanimity. Besides, Bāhiya's arduous journey of 120 leagues that was made in a single night had rendered him very weak physically. He needed some rest before being able to listen to the discourse profitably.

For a third time, Bāhiya Dārucīriya made his ardent request to the Buddha. And the Buddha, seeing:

1. That Bāhiya's mind had calmed into a state of equanimity.
2. That he had enjoyed some physical rest and had overcome his fatigue.
3. That his faculties had ripened.
4. That danger to his life was imminent.

So the Buddha decided that the time had arrived to give him a discourse. Accordingly, the Buddha made his discourse briefly as follows:

1. "That being so, Bāhiya, you should train yourself thus: in seeing visible objects, be aware of the seeing as just seeing; in hearing sounds, be aware of the hearing as just hearing; likewise in experiencing odours, tastes and tangible objects be aware of the experience of smelling, tasting, and touching, as just smelling, tasting and touching respectively; and in cognizing mind objects, i.e., thoughts and ideas, be aware of them just as cognized objects.

2. Bāhiya, if you are able to remain aware of the seeing, the hearing, the experiencing, and the cognition of the four categories of sense objects, you will then be one who is not associated with attachment, hatred or delusion on account of the visible object that is seen, the sound that is heard, the palpable object that is experienced, or the mind-object that is cognized. In other words, certainly you will not be one who is attached, who hates, or who is bewildered.

3. Bāhiya, if on account of the visible object that is seen, the sound that is heard, the palpable object that is experienced, the mind-object that is cognized, you become not associated with attachment, hatred or delusion, i.e., if you should indeed have become one who is without attachment, hate, or delusion, then Bāhiya, you will indeed become one who is not subject to craving, conceit or wrong view on account of the sense object that is seen, heard, experienced, or cognized. You will then have no thought of: ‘This is mine’ due to craving, no concept of ‘I’ due to conceit, or no lingering idea or concept of ‘my self’ due to wrong view.

4. Bāhiya, if you should indeed become one not subjected to craving, conceit or wrong view on account of the visible object that is seen, the sound that is heard, the palpable [1301] object that is experienced, the mind-object that is cognized, then Bāhiya, due to the absence of craving, conceit and wrong view, you will no more be reborn here in the human world, nor will you be reborn in the four remaining destinations: the Deva realm, the lower worlds, the world of animals and the world of Petas. Apart from the present existence in the human world and the four remaining destinations, there is no other destination for you. The non-arising of fresh mind-and-matter is the end of the defilements that are suffering (dukkha) and the resultant round of existences that are suffering.”

The Buddha discoursed on the doctrine culminating in the ultimate cessation or Nibbāna where no substrata of existence remain. Herein, Bāhiya Dārucīriya was one who liked a brief exposition (saṅkhitta-ruci-puggala). Therefore, the Buddha in expounding the six sense objects did not go into all the six in detail, but combined odour, taste and tangible object as “palpable objects.” Thus the sense objects are grouped here under four headings only: What is seen (diṭṭha), what is heard (suta), what is experienced (muta) and what is cognized (viññāta).

1. Regarding the four steps in the above exposition, in the Buddha’s admonition to be just aware of the seeing as mere seeing, the hearing as mere hearing, the experiencing as mere experiencing, the cognition as mere cognition in respect of the four classes of respective sense objects which are conditioned phenomena, connotes that as eye-consciousness arises in seeing a visible object, as ear-consciousness arises in hearing a sound, as nose-consciousness arises in smelling an odour, as tongue-consciousness arises in tasting a flavour, or as mind-consciousness arises in cognizing a mind-object, there is just consciousness and there is no attachment, hatred or delusion there.

The reader should acquaint himself with the nature of the five-door cognition process and the mind-door process. Eye-consciousness, ear-consciousness, nose-consciousness, tongue-consciousness and body-consciousness, these five kinds of consciousness are called the five kinds of sense-consciousness.

The Buddha enjoined Bāhiya that he should strive diligently, not to let craving, hatred and delusion creep into the impulsion thought-moments that follow the five-door cognition process and the mind-door processes that arise at the instant of the arising of those five kinds of sense-consciousness, at which stage, there is no craving, hatred or delusion, but pure sense-cognition alone. For at the impulsion moment, the appreciation of these sense objects naturally tend to let in greed, hatred and delusion.

The Buddha enjoined Bāhiya to strive diligently and not to allow greed, hatred and delusion to arise at the moment of impulsion in the thought-process because he wanted Bāhiya to understand that erroneous concepts, such as: “This is permanent,” “This is happy,” “This is beautiful,” or “This is substantial,” tend to creep into an unguarded mind, in respect of these four categories of sense objects. Only if one considers them as impermanent, miserable, ugly, and insubstantial, can there arise no erroneous impulses to conceive them as permanent, happy, beautiful and substantial. Then only can insight arise, whereby great meritorious impulses follow the neutral thought-process at the sense-cognition stage. The Buddha warned Bāhiya to guard against thinking wrongly about the conditioned phenomena which represent the four categories of sense objects as being permanent, happy, beautiful and substantial, and to view them, as they truly were, as being impermanent, miserable, ugly and insubstantial, and thus to cultivate insight so as to let the great meritorious impulses follow the sense-cognition.

By showing right view in regard to the four kinds of sense objects which are conditioned phenomena, as being impermanent, miserable, ugly and insubstantial, the Buddha teaches Bāhiya Dārucīriya the six lower stages of purity and the ten stages of insight. [1302]

Where it is said: “Bāhiya, if you are able to remain aware of the seeing, the hearing, the experiencing, and the cognition of the four categories of sense objects, which are conditioned phenomena, through the ten stages of insight and attain the path-knowledge, then you will have eradicated greed, hatred and delusion; you will not be one who craves, who hates, or who is bewildered. In other words, you will be free from greed, hatred and delusion.” This indicates the four paths.

Where it is said: “Noble ones (ariya) on attaining the noble fruitions (ariya-phala) are totally uninfluenced by craving, conceit and wrong view, so that they never conceive any conditioned phenomena represented by the four categories of sense objects as ‘I,’ ‘Mine’ or ‘Myself.’” This indicates the noble fruitions.

Where it is said: “An Arahāt, after the death-consciousness moment, ceases to be reborn either in this world of human beings or in any of the four other destinations; this is the total cessation of the aggregates of mind and matter, and is called Nibbāna, without leaving any trace of the aggregates.” This step indicates this ultimate Nibbāna, the remainderless cessation.

Bāhiya Dārucīriya even while listening to the Buddha’s discourse, had the four kinds of monastic morality purified, and had the mind purified through concentration and insight, having cultivated during that short moment, he gained the Arahāt fruition (Arahatta-phala) with the fourfold analytical knowledge (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa). He was able to destroy all the pollutants (āsava) because he was of a rare type of person who, through past merit, was destined to gain Awakening quickly, being endowed with inherent knowledge.

After becoming an Arahāt, Bāhiya Dārucīriya, on reviewing himself with the reviewing knowledge (paccavekkhaṇa-ñāṇa) of 19 factors, felt the necessity, as in the usual way of an Arahāt, to become a monastic and requested the Buddha to admit him into the Saṅgha. The Buddha asked him: “Have you got the monastic alms bowl and robes?” – “Not yet, venerable sir,” he replied. “In that case,” said the Buddha, “go and find them first.” After saying so the Buddha continued his alms round in the city of Sāvattihī.

Bāhiya had been a monastic during the time of Buddha Kassapa’s teaching. He remained a monastic and strove for Awakening for 20,000 years. During that time, whenever he received monastic requisites, he thought that the gains he made were due to his own past merit of alms giving and did not consider it necessary to share them with fellow monastics. For that lack of generosity in giving away robes or alms bowl to other monastics, he lacked the necessary merit to be summoned by the Buddha in the “Come, monastic” way.

There are other teachers according to the commentary on the Discourse to Bāhiya (Bāhiya-sutta, Ud 1.10) who explain differently about why the Buddha did not summon Bāhiya with the words: “Come, monastic.” According to them, Bāhiya was once reborn as a robber in a world-element where no Buddha had arisen. He robbed a Paccekabuddha of his robes and alms bowl by killing him with a bow and arrow. The Buddha knew that on account of that evil deed, Bāhiya Dārucīriya could not enjoy the benefit of mind-made robes and bowl even if the Buddha summoned him, saying: “Come, monastic.” However, the evil consequence of that evil deed is more relevant with the fact of Bāhiya’s fate in having no proper clothing but only fibres of wood.

Bāhiya’s Tragic Demise

Bāhiya left the Buddha and roamed the city looking for an alms bowl and pieces of rags for making robes, etc. While doing so, he was gored to death by a cow which had a suckling calf.

According to the commentary on the Discourse to Bāhiya in some past existences, four sons of rich men hired a prostitute and enjoyed themselves in a park. When the day was out, one of them suggested that they should rob the girl in the darkness, where nobody was around, of her possessions in the form of jewellery and 1,000 silver coins. The three friends agreed. They attacked her brutally. The girl had angry thoughts while being hit by them: “These wicked and shameless men have used me under passionate impulse and now try to kill me out of greed. I have done no wrong to them. I am helpless now. Let them kill me this time. May I become a Yakkhinī in my future lives and be able [1303] to kill these men many times over!” She died making this curse.

In a later existence, one of those four wicked men was reborn as Pukkusāti in a worthy family; another was reborn as Bāhiya Dārucīriya; another one was reborn as Tambadāṭhika, a robber; another one was reborn as a leper named Suppabuddha. The prostitute had been reborn as a Yakkhinī in hundreds of various forms of existences of the four murderers whom she gored to death assuming the form of a cow. Bāhiya thus met untimely death; he was killed on the spot.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1974

When the Buddha had finished the alms round and left the city in the company of many monastics, he found the dead body of Bāhiya in a refuse dump, and he said to the monastics: “Go now, monastics, get a stretcher from some house and carry the body of Bāhiya, give him a proper funeral by cremation, and enshrine the relics.” The monastics carried out the Buddha’s instructions.

Back at the monastery, the monastics reported to the Buddha the completion of their tasks and asked the Buddha: “Venerable sir, what is the destination of Bāhiya?” By this question they were inquiring whether Bāhiya died a worldling, or a noble one (ariya) who had not done away with rebirth, or an Arahāt who had lived his last life, the Buddha explained: “Monastics, Bāhiya is wise. He trained himself in accordance with the gaining of the supermundane. He caused me no trouble on account of the doctrine. Monastics, Bāhiya has made an end of suffering (dukkha).”

Herein the Buddha’s instructions to the monastics to enshrine the relics of Bāhiya was a plain indication of the fact that Bāhiya died an Arahāt. But some of the monastics failed to understand the implication of the instructions, or it is possible that they asked the Buddha in order to make the fact even clearer.

The Buddha’s Verse on the Occasion

On hearing that Bāhiya Dārucīriya had died an Arahāt, the monastics were full of wonder. They said to the Buddha: “When did Bāhiya Dārucīriya become an Arahāt, venerable sir?” – “From the moment he heard my discourse,” replied the Buddha. “When did the Fortunate One give him a discourse?” – “Today, on my alms round.” – “But, venerable sir, then the discourse must have been rather insignificant. How could such a brief discourse make him Awaken?” – “Monastics, how can you judge the effect of my discourse whether long or short? A thousand verses of unprofitable words are not worth a single verse that is replete with benefit to the hearer.” And the Buddha on that occasion uttered the following verse (Dhp 101):

*Sahassam-api ce gāthā, anatta-pada-samhitā;
ekam gāthā padaṃ seyyo, yaṃ sutvā upasammati.*

Monastics, better than 1,000 verses that are not conducive to knowledge is a single verse such as: “Mindfulness is the way to Deathlessness,” by hearing which the hearer is calmed.

By the end of the discourse many beings gained the various levels of path-knowledge, such as Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).

Foremost Title Achieved

On one occasion, when the Buddha was amidst the congregation, he declared:

khippābhiññānam yad-idam Bāhiyo Dārucīriyo.*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who gain path-knowledge quickly, Bāhiya Dārucīriya who is now no more was the foremost (etad-aggā). [1304]

28. Ven. Kumāra Kassapa

Aspiration in the Past

The future Kumāra Kassapa was born into a wealthy family in the city of Hamsavatī during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. As with future great disciples, he went to the Buddha and listened to his discourse, in the course of which he saw a monastic being declared by him as the foremost among the monastics who employ energy in expounding the doctrine. He was fired by a desire to become such a distinguished monastic, and after making a great offering, he made his aspiration known to the Buddha, that he would like to be honoured by some Future Buddha as the foremost monastic who employed energy in expounding the doctrine. The Buddha saw that his aspiration would be fulfilled, and made the prediction.

Meditating on Top of a Mountain

The future Kumāra Kassapa devoted himself to deeds of merit for the whole of his life and after that existence, he was reborn either in the Deva realm or the human world.

During the waning years of the teaching of Buddha Kassapa, he was reborn as a worthy man and took up the monastic life. He found six other monastics who shared the view that living amongst people was not the correct way for gaining Awakening and that a real monastic must live in seclusion, and so they went up a high steep mountain by means of a ladder. Once at the top, they discussed among themselves: “He who has self-confidence, let him push away the ladder. He who clings to his life, let him go down by the ladder before it has been pushed away.” All seven monastics chose to remain on the mountain top until they attained Awakening and so they pushed away the ladder. “Now, friends, be diligent in your monastic practice,” they exhorted one another before choosing a place of their own on the mountain to strive for path-knowledge, ignoring the danger of death.

Of these seven monastics, the eldest became an Arahat on the fifth day. He knew he had finished what was required of the noble practice and went to Uttarakuru, the northern island continent, by means of his powers, to collect alms food. Having collected the alms food, he came back and offered it to his six monastic companions with these encouraging words: “Friends, have this meal. Let me be responsible for alms food collection. You devote yourselves to your meditation.” Then the remaining six replied: “Friend, have we made an agreement among us that he who first realises the supermundane Dhamma would be responsible to feed those who still have to reach that same goal?” The Arahat said: “No, friends, there was no such agreement.” Then the six monastics said: “Venerable sir, you have become an Arahat according to your past merit. We too would make an end of the suffering round of Saṃsāra if we could. May the venerable go wherever he pleases.”

The eldest monastic, being unable to persuade the six monastics into accepting the alms food, took the meal at a suitable distance and left them. On the seventh day, the second eldest monastic attained the state of Non-returner (Anāgāmi-phala). He too went to the northern island-continent by means of his powers and offered the alms food to the remaining colleagues. Being refused by his friends, he ate his meal at some suitable place and left. After the death and dissolution of his body, he was reborn in the Pure Abodes of the Non-returning (Anāgāmī) Brahmas.

The remaining five monastics did not achieve path-knowledge during that existence. After passing away from that existence, they were reborn in the Deva realm and the human realm throughout the long aeons in the interval period between Buddha Kassapa and Buddha Gotama. During the time of Buddha Gotama, they were reborn in various countries:

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1977

1. One was born in Gandhāra, in the city of Takkasilā, as a member of the royal family, and later became King Pukkusāti.
2. Another in Pabbateyya, also called the Majjhantika region, as the son of a female wandering ascetic, later he became Sabhiya, the wandering ascetic.
3. The third one, in a household in Bāhiya country, later became Ven. Bāhiya.
4. The fourth one, in a Rājagaha household was later known as Kumāra Kassapa.
5. The last in the Malla Country, in the city of Anupiya, in the royal family of a Malla Prince, later became Ven. Dabba.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

That worthy man, the future Kumāra Kassapa, was never reborn in the lower realms throughout the interval of an infinite aeon between the two Buddhas, but in the Deva Realms and human realm. About the time of the appearance of Buddha Gotama, he was conceived in the womb of the daughter of a merchant. This young woman had always been inclined on becoming a recluse but her parents gave her in marriage to a son of another wealthy man and she had to live in her husband's house. She became pregnant but did not know it. She pleaded with her husband to allow her to become a nun, and with her husband's consent she went to the nunnery of female monastics who were disciples of Ven. Devadatta.

When the pregnancy became visible, the female monastics reported the matter to Ven. Devadatta and sought his advice. Devadatta said: "She is no more a nun," and expelled her from his community. The young female monastic then went to stay in the nunnery of female monastics who were the disciples of the Buddha. There, the nuns reported her case to the Buddha who authorized Ven. Upāli to investigate and give a decision.

Ven. Upāli called up a group of respectable ladies of Sāvattihī, including Visākhā, and let them investigate into the case, to find out whether the pregnancy took place before or after becoming a nun. With sufficient evidence, the ladies reported to Ven. Upāli that the pregnancy took place during lay life. Ven. Upāli then gave the unequivocal ruling that since the pregnancy took place before entering the Saṅgha, she still stood as a pure nun. The Buddha praised Ven. Upāli for his competent judgment in the controversy.

This young nun gave birth to a bonny baby boy who looked like a golden statuette. King Pasenadi of Kosala took care of the child and brought him up in his palace like a princeling. The boy was named Kassapa, and at the age of seven, he was dressed finely and sent to the Buddha's monastery for novitiation. For details of the story see the Birth Story about the Deer named Nigrodha (Nigrodha-miga-jātaka, Ja 12).

The Name Kumāra Kassapa

As the young boy entered the Saṅgha at the age of seven, he was referred to by the Buddha as Kumāra Kassapa: “Boy Kassapa,” in distinction to other novices by the name of Kassapa. In another sense, “Kumāra” also means: “Prince.” Since Kassapa was fostered by King Pasenadi, Kumāra Kassapa may also be taken to mean: “Prince Kassapa.”

The Discourse about the Anthill

[The following is based on the Discourse about the Anthill (Vammika-sutta, MN 23) and its commentary.]

Kumāra Kassapa started insight-meditation since he was made a novice in the Saṅgha, and [1305] also learned the teaching of the Buddha. Thus, he diligently pursued both the learning and the practice of the doctrine. When the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattthī, Kumāra Kassapa was dwelling in the Andhavana forest which was not far from the Jetavana monastery. At that time, the Mahā Brahma of the Pure Lands, who had been a colleague in pursuit of knowledge, who went up a steep mountain to meditate, reviewed the lot of his erstwhile friends. And seeing Kumāra Kassapa striving for Awakening, he decided to give some practical guidance to him in his meditation for insight. Even before leaving his Brahma abode for the human world, he planned a fifteen-point puzzle. In the middle of the night, he appeared in all his splendour before Ven. Kumāra Kassapa in the Andhavana forest.

Ven. Kumāra Kassapa asked the Brahma: “Who has appeared here before me?” – “Venerable sir, I am a colleague of yours who previously during the time of Buddha Kassapa went into meditation in pursuit of knowledge, and have been reborn in the Pure Lands (Suddhāvāsa), after having attained Non-returning (Anāgāmi-phala).” – “What is your purpose of your coming to me?” The Brahma then made his purpose plain in the following words:

“Monastic, 1) this ant-hill 2) emits smoke by night; 3) by day it rises up in flames. 4) The Brahmin teacher says 5) to the wise pupil: 6) ‘Get hold of the sword and 7) dig diligently.’ The wise pupil does as is asked by the teacher and 8) discovers a door-bolt. And he reports to the teacher: ‘Sir, this is a door-bolt.’

The Brahmin teacher then says to the pupil: ‘Wise pupil, cast away the door-bolt. Get hold of the sword and dig on diligently.’ The wise pupil does as asked by the teacher, and 9) discovers a toad. He reports to the teacher: ‘Sir, this is a blown-up (uddhum-āyika) toad.’

The Brahmin teacher says again: ‘Wise pupil, cast away the blown-up toad. Get hold of the sword and dig on diligently.’ The wise pupil does as is asked by the teacher, and 10) discovers a forked road. He reports to the teacher: ‘Sir, this is a forked road.’

The Brahmin teacher says again: ‘Wise pupil, abandon the forked road. Take hold of the sword and dig on diligently.’ The wise pupil does as is asked by the teacher, and 11) discovers a water-strainer for sifting off soapy sand. He reports to the teacher: ‘Sir, this is a water strainer for sifting off soapy sand.’

The Brahmin teacher says again: ‘Wise pupil, cast away the water strainer. Get hold of the sword and dig on diligently.’ The wise pupil does as is asked by the teacher, and 12) discovers a tortoise. ‘Sir, this is a tortoise,’ he reports to the teacher.

The Brahmin teacher says again: ‘Wise pupil, cast away the tortoise. Get hold of the sword and dig on diligently.’ The wise pupil does as asked by the teacher, and 13) discovers a knife and a mincing-board. He reports to the teacher: ‘Sir, these are a knife and a mincing-board.’

The Brahmin teacher says again: ‘Wise pupil, cast away the knife and the mincing-board. Get hold of the sword and dig on diligently.’ The wise pupil does as asked by the teacher and 14) discovers a lump of meat. He reports to the teacher: ‘Sir, this is a lump of meat.’

The Brahmin teacher says again: ‘Wise pupil, cast away the lump of meat. Get hold of the sword and dig on diligently.’ The wise pupil does as asked and 15) discovers a Nāga. He reports to the teacher: ‘Sir, this is a Nāga.’ The Brahmin teacher then says to the wise pupil: ‘Let the Nāga remain. Do not intrude upon him. Worship him.’

Monastic, ask the Buddha for the answers to these questions. Note the answers as given by the Buddha. With the exception of the Buddha, his disciples, and someone who has heard the answers from me, I do not see anyone in the world of the various abodes with Devas, Māras and Brahmas, and the sentient world of [1306] recluses, Brahmins, kings and other human beings, who can answer them satisfactorily.”

After saying so, the Brahma vanished. Early the next morning, Ven. Kumāra Kassapa went to the Buddha, made obeisance to him, and related the meeting with the Brahma the previous night. Then he asked:

1. Venerable sir, what is meant by the “ant-hill?”
2. What is meant by “emitting smoke by night?”
3. What is meant by “rising up in flames by day?”
4. What is meant by the “Brahmin teacher?”
5. What is meant by the “wise pupil?”
6. What is meant by the “sword?”
7. What is meant by “digging diligently?”
8. What is meant by the “door-bolt?”
9. What is meant by the “blown-up toad?”
10. What is meant by the “forked road?”
11. What is meant by the “water-strainer for sifting off soapy sand?”
12. What is meant by the “tortoise?”
13. What is meant by the “knife and the mincing-board?”
14. What is meant by the “lump of meat?”
15. What is meant by the “Nāga?”

To these fifteen questions that were puzzles to Ven. Kumāra Kassapa, the Buddha gave the answers as follows:

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1981

1. Monastic, ‘ant-hill’ is the name for this body.
2. Monastic, one ruminates at night what one has done in the day; this is ‘emitting smoke by night.’
3. Monastic, one does physically, verbal, mentally, deeds by day as one has thought out at night; this is the ‘rising of flames by day.’
4. Monastic, ‘Brahmin teacher’ is the name for the Realised One.
5. Monastic, the ‘wise pupil’ is a monastic who is still training himself for to become an Arahat according to the threefold training.
6. Monastic, ‘sword’ is the name for knowledge, both mundane (lokiya) and supermundane (lokuttara).
7. Monastic, ‘digging diligently’ means ‘persistent effort.’
8. Monastic, ‘door-bolt’ is the name for ignorance. ‘Cast away the door-bolt’ means ‘getting rid of ignorance.’ – ‘Wise pupil, take hold of the sword and dig diligently,’ means ‘strive well with knowledge to get rid of ignorance.’
9. Monastic, ‘blown-up toad’ is a name for wrath. ‘Cast away the blown-up toad’ means ‘get rid of deep anger.’ ‘Wise pupil, take hold of the sword and dig diligently,’ means ‘strive well with knowledge to overcome deep resentment.’
10. Monastic, ‘forked road’ is the name for uncertainty (vicikicchā). ‘Abandon the forked road’ means ‘strive well with knowledge to overcome uncertainty.’
11. Monastic, ‘water-strainer for sifting off soapy sand’ is the name for the five hindrances (nīvaraṇa) that stand in the way of absorption (jhāna) and path-knowledge, namely: sensual desire (kāmacchanda), ill-will (vyāpāda), sloth and torpor (thina-middha), distractedness (uddhacca-kukkucca) and uncertainty (vicikicchā). ‘Cast away the water-strainer’ means ‘strive well with knowledge to overcome the five hindrances.’
12. Monastic, ‘tortoise’ is the name for the five objects of clinging (upādāna), namely: [1307] the aggregate of corporeality (rūpakkhanda) that is subject to change; the aggregate of sensation (vedānakkhandha) that is capable of feeling; the aggregate of perception (saññākkhandha) that has the nature of perceiving; the aggregate of volitions (sāṅkhārakkhandha) that help in the formation of all actions; the aggregate of consciousness (viññāṇakkhandha) that has the nature of knowing things. ‘Cast away the tortoise’ means ‘strive well with knowledge to get rid of the five aggregates which are the objects of clinging.’

13. Monastic, ‘knife and mincing-board’ are the names for the five kinds of sense-pleasure that appear desirable, agreeable, attractive and lovely and that cause the arising of sensual attachment to them, namely: visual objects (rūpārammaṇa) cognizable by eye-consciousness (cakkhu-viññāṇa); sounds (saddārammaṇa) cognizable by ear consciousness (sota-viññāṇa); odours (gandhārammaṇa) cognizable by nose-consciousness (ghāna-viññāṇa); tastes (rasārammaṇa) cognizable by tongue consciousness (jivhā-viññāṇa); tangible objects (phoṭṭhabbārammaṇa) cognizable by body-consciousness (kāya-viññāṇa). ‘Cast away the knife and the mincing-board’ means ‘strive well with knowledge to get rid of the five kinds of sense-pleasure.’
14. Monastic, ‘lump of meat’ is the name for sensual attachment or craving (nandī-rāga-taṇhā). ‘Cast away the lump of meat’ means ‘strive well with knowledge to get rid of sensual attachment or craving.’
15. Monastic, ‘Nāga’ is the name for the Arahat. You are enjoined to let alone an Arahat without intruding upon him. You are also enjoined to revere the Arahat.

Some more elaboration:

1. The body is likened to an “ant-hill” because just as an ant-hill lets out snakes, mongoose, rodents, lizards and ants, the body discharges all kinds of loathsome matter through its nine holes.

There are also other reasons that explain the simile. Refer to the commentary on the discourse.

2. “Emitting smoke by night,” signifies the things thought out in the night for the next day’s activities.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1983

3. “Flames rising up by day,” signifies physical, verbal, and mental actions that are performed in the day as thought out in the night.

4, 5, 6 & 7: These similes do not need elaboration.

8. The “door-bolt” at the city gate stops the passage of people. So also ignorance stops the arising of knowledge that leads to Nibbāna.

9. The “blown-up toad” exemplifies wrath: A toad gets angry and puffs itself up whenever something strikes against it. It may get overblown with anger and lie flat on its back, unable to move about, and it then falls a prey to crows or other enemies. Likewise, when anger begins to arise, one becomes muddled. If one is careful, one may curb it by wise reflection. If not checked in this way, the resentment shows in one’s expression, and if left unchecked, it leads one to evil verbalisation: cursing or using harsh speech. If anger is allowed to grow, one starts thinking of some dreadful physical action. At that, one is apt to look around to see if there is anyone to join the other side. Then one picks a fight, and unless one restrains oneself, one is apt to find some weapons to strike the other party. If there is no effective checking of oneself, one is apt to commit assault. In extreme cases death may result, either of the adversary or of oneself, or both.

Just as the blown-up toad renders itself immobile, lying on its back, and becomes a ready victim of crows and other enemies, so also a person, under the influence of deep anger, cannot concentrate in meditation and knowledge is thus hampered. Lacking knowledge, he is liable to be the ready victim of all kinds of wickedness (māra) and [1308] become the docile slave of baser instincts.

10. When a traveller, carrying valuable possessions, comes to a forked road and wastes much time there, being unable to choose which way he should proceed, he is inviting highway robbers who would cause him ruin. Similarly, if a monastic, who has taken instruction from his teacher on the basic method of meditation and has started practicing, entertains doubts about the truth of the Three Treasures, he is incapable of meditating. As he sits alone with a mind troubled by uncertainty, he succumbs to defilements and other wicked forces.

11. When a washer-man pours water into a water-strainer to sift soapy sand, the water flows down the strainer freely. Not a cupful of water that is poured into it, be it 100 potfuls, remains in it; likewise, in the mind of a meditator which has the five hindrances, no merit can remain.

12. Just as a tortoise has five protrusions: the head and four limbs, so also all the conditioned phenomena, under the eye of knowledge, resolve into five aggregates which are objects of clinging.

13. Meat is minced with a knife on a mincing-board. Sensual enjoyment or the defilements seek the sense objects. The defilements are likened to the “knife” and sense objects to the “mincing-board.”

14. A lump of meat is sought after by everyone, high or low, kings or commoners, birds and beasts also like it. All sorts of trouble originate from pursuit of a lump of meat. Similarly, sensual attachment or craving is the source of all woes. But this truth is shrouded by ignorance. Craving or sensual attachment lures all beings into the cycle of rebirth which runs on relentlessly. Taken in another sense, a lump of meat becomes attached to anywhere it is placed. So also, sensual attachment tends to bind beings to the cycle of rebirth which is cherished by them, not realizing its suffering nature.

15. An Arahāt is called a “Nāga” because an Arahāt is not led astray by the four misleading factors: fondness or liking, hatred, fear and bewilderment (chandādīhi na gacchantī ti Nāga). In another sense, an Arahāt never reverts to those defilements that have been got rid of at the four levels of purification (tena tena maggena pahīne kilese na āgacchantī ti Nāga). Yet in another sense, an Arahāt is incapable of committing any kind of evil (nānappakāraṃ āgumī na karontī ti Nāga).

In paying homage to the Buddha, the Nāga, the Arahāt, who is free from the pollutants, the commentary recommends this mode of veneration:<sup>283</sup>

<sup>283</sup> [This is a versification of words found in the discourses, and doesn't quote them literally, see the Short Discourse about Saccaka (Cūḷa-saccaka-sutta, MN 35): Buddho so bhagavā bodhāya dhammaṃ deseti, danto so bhagavā damathāya dhammaṃ deseti, santo so bhagavā samathāya dhammaṃ deseti, tiṇṇo so bhagavā taraṇāya dhammaṃ deseti, parinibbuto so bhagavā parinibbānāya dhammaṃ deseti.]

Buddho bodhāya deseti, danto yo damathāya ca, sathāya santo Dhammaṃ, tiṇṇo va taraṇāya ca, nibbuto Nibbānatthāya, taṃ loka-saraṇaṃ name.

The Buddha, the Awakened One, the refuge of the three worlds, the Arahāt, having known the four noble truths by himself and wishing to enlighten others that deserve to be Awakened like himself; having tamed himself in respect of the six faculties and wishing to tame others that are fit to be tamed like himself; having attained peace himself and wishing others that are worthy to attain peace like himself; having crossed over to the other side of the ocean of Saṃsāra and wishing others that are worthy to cross over to the other shore like himself; having extinguished the fires of defilement at the four stages and wishing others who are worthy to extinguish the fires of defilement like himself; out of compassion, expounded the glorious Dhamma to Devas and humans for 45 years. To him, the Buddha, the Nāga, the refuge of the three worlds, I pay homage physically, verbally and mentally in all humility with joined palms raised.

Attainment of Awakening

The Ant-hill Discourse (Vammika-sutta, MN 23), the commentary notes, is the meditation lesson for Ven. Kumāra Kassapa. Ven. Kumāra Kassapa learnt the Buddha's answer to the fifteen point puzzle, retired into seclusion into the Andhavana forest, meditated with diligence and not long after he became an Arahāt.

Foremost Title Achieved

From the time of his becoming a monastic, Ven. Kumāra Kassapa in his discourses to the four classes of disciples: male monastics, female monastics, male lay devotees and female lay devotees, used a variety of similes and allegories.

When Ven. Kumāra Kassapa discoursed to Pāyāsi, who held wrong views, by employing fifteen similes, the Buddha, referring to the Discourse to Pāyāsi (Pāyāsi-sutta, DN 23), declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakanāṃ bhikkhūnaṃ
citta-kathikānaṃ yad-idaṃ Kumāra-kassapo.*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who employ imagery in their discourses, Kumāra Kassapa is the foremost (etad-aggā).

29. Ven. Mahā Koṭṭhita

Aspiration in the Past

The future Koṭṭhita was born into a wealthy family in the royal city of Haṁsavatī during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. While he was listening to the Buddha's discourse, he witnessed a monastic being named by the Buddha as the foremost monastic among those who attained the fourfold analytical knowledge. He was very enthusiastic to become such a great monastic in the future. As with all future great venerables, he made a great offering and, after which, he expressed his aspiration before the Buddha. The Buddha made the prediction that his aspiration would be fulfilled in the future, before leaving for his monastery.

The future Ven. Koṭṭhita lived a life filled with good deeds, passed away and was reborn in the Deva realm and subsequently, either in the human realm or the Deva realm.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

At the time of Buddha Gotama, he was reborn into a Brahmin family in Sāvattihī, and was named Koṭṭhita. When he came of age, he mastered the three Vedas. One day, on hearing the Buddha's discourse, he became so devoted to the Buddha that he joined the Saṅgha. Since then, he meditated for insight and became an Arahat and was endowed with the fourfold analytical knowledge (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa).

Foremost Title Achieved

After attainment of Awakening, Ven. Koṭṭhita, as an adept at the fourfold analytical knowledge, usually posed his question on these forms of knowledge. Thus, with reference to the Long Discourse giving an Elaboration (Mahā-vedalla-sutta, MN 43) the Buddha declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakanam bhikkhunam
paṭisambhidā-pattānam yad-idam Mahākoṭṭhito.*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who attained the fourfold analytical knowledge, Mahā Koṭṭhita is the foremost (etad-agga). [1310]

30. Ven. Ānanda

Aspiration in the Past

100,000 aeons ago, from the present aeon, there appeared in the world, Buddha Padumuttara, who was born in the city of Haṁsavatī as the son of King Ānanda and Queen Sujātā. The two chief disciples of the Buddha were Ven. Devala and Ven. Sujāta. His two female disciples were Ven. Amitā and Ven. Asamā. The personal attendant to the Buddha was Ven. Sumana. The Buddha had 100,000 monastic disciples and the privilege of attending to his needs was extended to his royal father. He and the Saṅgha stayed near the city, from which they collected their daily alms food.

Before renouncing the world, Buddha Padumuttara had a younger half-brother by the name of Prince Sumana, who was the future Ven. Ānanda. King Ānanda appointed Prince Sumana, lord of a district, which was 120 leagues from the capital. The prince visited his father and his elder brother Buddha Padumuttara occasionally.

Once, there broke out a rebellion in the border region. The prince reported the matter to the king, who said: “Were you not placed there to keep law and order?” The prince, on receiving the king’s reply, took upon himself the quelling of the uprising and restored peace. The king was pleased and summoned his son to his presence.

Prince Sumana left for the capital accompanied by 1,000 officers. On the way, he discussed with them what reward he should ask, if his royal father were to grant him a boon. Some of the officers suggested elephants, horses, towns, gems, etc. but a few wise ones among them said: “Prince, you are the king’s son. Material prizes are of no consequence to you. You may get them but you must leave them behind at death. You should ask for a boon that is meritorious. Your deed of merit alone will be your real possession when you leave this existence. So, if the king were to grant you a boon, ask for the privilege of attending on the Buddha, your own elder brother, for one Rains Retreat (Vassa).”

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1988

The prince was pleased with the idea. “You are friends indeed to me. I had never thought about such a noble idea. I accept your advice.” Once in the capital, he was received with great love and esteem by his royal father who embraced him, kissed him on the forehead, and said: “Dear son, name any boon and I will grant it.” The son replied: “Great King, I wish to make my present life highly productive in the future, instead of going barren. To that end, I wish to attend on my elder brother, the Buddha, for one Rains Retreat. May my dear father grant this privilege to me!” The king replied: “Dear son, I cannot grant this wish. Name any other.” – “Dear father,” Prince Sumana said, “a sovereign’s word is steadfast as a rock. I do not want any other thing. I stand by my wish.”

The king then said: “Dear son, no one can know what the Buddha has in mind. If the Buddha does not accept your invitation what good is my concession to you?” – “In that case, dear father, I will go and ask the Buddha myself and find out what he thinks of my request,” replied Prince Sumana. Having thus made the king committed to his obligation, Prince Sumana went to the Buddha’s monastery.

When he arrived there, the Buddha had just gone into his Perfumed Chamber after having had his meal. Prince Sumana went to the Assembly Hall and met the monastics who asked him the purpose of his visit. “I have come, venerable sirs,” he said, “to see the Fortunate One. Would anyone show me where the Buddha is now.” – “Prince,” the monastics said, “we have no right to see the Buddha as and when we want to see him.” – “Who, then, has that right?” the Prince inquired. “Ven. Sumana has, prince,” they said. “Where is Ven. Sumana now?” And having been directed to where the monastic was, the prince went to him, made obeisance, and said: “Venerable sir, I would like to see the Fortunate One. Would you present me to the Fortunate One?”

Ven. Sumana then entered upon the absorption of a water-object (āpo-kasiṇa-jhāna) in front of the prince, and making [1311] his wish that the earth turn into water, he dived into the mind-made water and appeared inside the Buddha’s Perfumed Chamber. The Buddha asked the monastic his purpose. Ven. Sumana answered: “Venerable sir, Prince Sumana is here to see the Fortunate One.” – “If so, prepare a seat for me,” said the Buddha. Ven. Sumana then disappeared into the water from the Buddha’s Chamber and emerged from the water right in front of the prince, in the monastic compound, and prepared a seat for the Buddha. Prince Sumana was very much impressed by the supernormal powers of the monk.

Buddha Padumuttara came out of his Perfumed Chamber and sat on the seat prepared for him. Prince Sumana made obeisance to the Buddha and exchanged cordial greetings with him. “When did you come, prince?” asked the Buddha. “Venerable sir, I arrived here just when the Fortunate One retired into the Perfumed Chamber,” replied the prince, “the monastics told me that they had no right to see the Fortunate One as and when they wished, and directed me to Ven. Sumana. As for Ven. Sumana, by saying just one word, he announced my presence to the Fortunate One and also arranged for my seeing the Fortunate One. I presume, venerable sir, that Ven. Sumana is close to the Fortunate One in this teaching.”

“Prince, what you say is true. This Sumana is close with the Realised One in this teaching.” – “Venerable sir, what kind of meritorious action leads one to become a close disciple to the Buddha?” – “Prince, by giving in generosity, by keeping morality and by observing the precepts, one may aspire to become a close disciple to the Buddha.” Prince Sumana now had the right opportunity to invite the Buddha to his place to receive an offering. He said: “Venerable sir, I wish to become an intimate disciple to some Future Buddha, just like Ven. Sumana. May the Fortunate One accept my offering of food tomorrow.” The Buddha signified the acceptance of the invitation by remaining silent. The prince returned to his temporary quarters in the city and made preparations for a great offering which lasted for seven days at his temporary quarters.

On the seventh day, Prince Sumana paid homage to the Buddha and said: “Venerable sir, I have obtained consent from my father, the king, to have the privilege of attending to the Fortunate One during the three-month Rains Retreat (Vassa) period. May the Fortunate One accept my attendance on him for the Rains Retreat (Vassa).” The Buddha reviewed the benefit that would accrue to the prince if the request be allowed, and seeing that it was going to be beneficial for him, said: “Prince, the Fortunate One likes to stay in a quiet place.”

“Exalted Buddha, I understand! Fortunate One, I understand!” said the prince. “I shall now build a monastery for the Fortunate One. When completed, I shall send messengers to the Fortunate One. Then may the Fortunate One and 100,000 monastics come to our monastery.” The prince left after obtaining consent from the Buddha. He then went to see his royal father and said: “Dear father, the Buddha has agreed to come to my town. When I send messengers to inform the time for the Buddha to come, may you see to the escorting of the Buddha on the journey.” He made obeisance to his father and left the city. Then he built a resting place for the Buddha and his company at intervals of one league along the 120 leagues stretch of the road from the city to his town. Back in his own town, he chose a suitable site to build a monastery for the Buddha. He bought the site, a garden owned by a rich householder Sobhana, for 100,000. And he spent another 100,000 for the building.

He built a Perfumed Chamber for the Buddha, sleeping places for 100,000 monastics, latrines, huts, small caves and sheds, some for use by day and others by night and an enclosure to the monastic compound with gates. When everything was completed, he sent messengers to the king to escort the Buddha at the start of the journey.

King Ānanda made food offerings to the Buddha and 100,000 monastics. Then he said to the Buddha: “My son, exalted Buddha, the venerable’s younger brother has made all the necessary preparations to receive the Fortunate One, and is eagerly expecting your arrival.” The Buddha then made the journey accompanied by 100,000 monastics, and resting for the nights at the rest houses put up along the route at intervals of one [1312] league. The 120 leagues distance was made without hardship.

Prince Sumana welcomed the Buddha from a league’s distance along the way from his residence. Giving a ceremonial welcoming with flowers and scents, he escorted the Buddha and the company of monastics to the monastery. Then he offered the monastery to the Buddha, speaking this verse recorded in the Story about the Elder Ānanda (Ānandatthera-vatthu, AA, PTS 1.291):

Sata-sahassena me kītaṃ, sata-sahassena māpitaṃ, Sobhanam nāma uyyānam, paṭiggaṇha Mahā-muni.

Great Sage of Sages, I, Sumana, have bought the Sobhana Park for 100,000 pieces of money, and built this monastery at the cost of a further 100,000. May the Great Sage accept my gift of the monastery.

Prince Sumana donated the monastery on the day of the beginning of the Rains Retreat (Vassa). After the offering was completed, he called his family and followers and said: “The Fortunate One has come from a distance of 120 leagues.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1991

Buddhas attach importance to the Dhamma and not to material gifts. That being so, I will stay in this monastery during these three months using only two sets of clothing and observe the ten precepts. You will attend to the Buddha and 100,000 monastics for the three months as you have done today.” And so he spent the retreat at the monastery.

Prince Sumana ensured that the Buddha stayed not far away from his personal attendant, Ven. Sumana, who attended to all his needs. He admired the monastic and set his mind on becoming such a close monastic-disciple some time in the future. So, about a week before the end of the retreat, he gave a great offering to the Buddha and the Saṅgha. On the seventh day of this great offering, he placed a set of three robes before every one of the 100,000 monastics and paying respects, said to the Buddha: “All my meritorious deeds that began in the city of Haṃsavatī, at my temporary quarters, are not aimed at future worldly glory as Sakka or a Deva or a Māra. My aspiration in doing these deeds is to become the personal attendant to a Buddha of some future period.”

The Buddha reviewed the matter and seeing that the Prince’s aspiration would be fulfilled, made the prediction and then departed. On hearing the prediction of Buddha Padumuttara, the prince was so convinced of the certainty of the Buddha’s pronouncement as if he were to become the personal attendant of Buddha Gotama immediately as predicted by Buddha Padumuttara, carrying the Buddha’s alms bowl and robe.

Deeds of Merit in the Interim Period

Prince Sumana spent 100,000 years during the time of Buddha Padumuttara doing deeds of merit. At his death, he was reborn in the Deva realm. During Buddha Kassapa’s time, he donated his cloak to a monastic who was on alms round, to be used as the base for the alms bowl to rest on.

Upon his death in that existence, he was reborn in the Deva realm. After his Deva existence, he was reborn in the human world as the king of Bārāṇasī. When he saw, from the upper storey of his palace, eight Paccekabuddhas travelling in the air coming from Mount Gandhamādana, he invited them to his palace and offered food. He also built eight monastic dwellings in the royal gardens as residences for these eight Paccekabuddhas. Moreover, he made eight jewelled seats for them to be used on their visits to the palace as well as the same number of ruby stands for placing their alms bowls. He attended upon the eight Paccekabuddhas for 10,000 years. These are some outstanding deeds of merit during the intervening period of 100,000 aeons; many other meritorious deeds also were done by him in that period.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

After performing various good deeds and thereby sowing seeds of merit during the intervening period of 100,000 aeons, the future Ven. Ānanda was reborn in Tusita Realm along with the Bodhisatta Gotama. After passing away from that existence, he was reborn as the son of Prince Amitodana of Kapilavatthu. He was named Ānanda or Joy, signifying the pleasure he caused to the family by his birth.

On the first [1313] visit of Buddha Gotama to Kapilavatthu, a number of Sakyan princes headed by Prince Bhaddiya renounced worldly life and became monastics as the Buddha's disciples when the Buddha was sojourning at Anupiya Grove near the town of the same name.<sup>284</sup>

Ven. Ānanda Established in Stream-Entry

Not long after becoming a monastic, Ven. Ānanda listened to a discourse by Ven. Mantāṇiputta Puṇṇa and attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). This is on record in the Discourse about Ānanda (Ānanda-sutta, SN 22.83). The gist of that discourse is as follows:

During the time when the Buddha was staying at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvathī, Ven. Ānanda addressed the monastics: “Friend monastics,” and the monastics responded, saying: “Friend.” Ven. Ānanda then said: “Friends, Ven. Mantāṇiputta Puṇṇa was very helpful to us when we were new monastics. He admonished us with this instruction: ‘Friend Ānanda, it is through having a cause that the conceit “I am” arises through craving and wrong view. The trio of craving, conceit and wrong view perpetuate the rounds of rebirth. They do not arise without a cause. Through what cause does the conceit “I am” arise? Because of corporeality (rūpa), the conceit “I am,” along with its associates craving and wrong view arises; without such cause, the conceit “I am” does not arise. Because of sensation (vedanā) ... perception (saññā) ... volitions

(saṅkhāra) ... Because of consciousness (viññāṇa), the conceit “I am,” along with its associates craving and wrong view arises; without such cause the conceit “I am” does not arise.

Friend Ānanda, let me give an example. If a young woman or man, who is fond of adorning herself or himself, looks at the image of their face in a clean and bright mirror or a bowl of clear water, they will see it depending on a cause: their own image and the reflecting surface of the mirror or the water, and not otherwise.

Friend Ānanda, even so, because of corporeality, the conceit (mānā), “I am,” along with its associates craving (taṇhā) and wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi) arises; without such cause, it does not arise. Because of sensation, perception, volitions and consciousness the conceit “I am,” along with its associates, craving and wrong view, arises; without such cause, it does not arise.

Friend Ānanda, what do you think of what I am going to ask you: “Is corporeality permanent or impermanent?” – “Impermanent, friend.” This dialogue continues as in the Discourse about the Characteristics of Non-Self (Anatta-lakkhaṇa-sutta, SN 22.59), there is nothing more to do for the realization of the path.

“Friends, Ven. Mantāṇiputta Puṇṇa was very helpful to us when we were new monastics. He admonished us with the above instruction. By hearing the exposition of Ven. Mantāṇiputta Puṇṇa, I gained knowledge of the four noble truths, and attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).”

With reference to the above discourse, it is clear that Ven. Ānanda became Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) after listening to Ven. Mantāṇiputta Puṇṇa’s discourse on the simile of the mirror.

Ven. Ānanda Appointed Personal Attendant

There were no permanent personal attendants to the Buddha during his first 20 years after becoming a Buddha, called the first period after Awakening. During that period, a number of monastics acted as personal attendants, carrying the Buddha’s alms bowl and robe; they were: Vens. Nāgasamāla, Nāgita, Upavāṇa, Sunakkhatta, who was formerly a Licchavī Prince, Cunda, a younger brother of Ven. Sāriputta, Sāgata, Rādha, and Meghiya.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1994

On a certain occasion, the Buddha, attended by Ven. Nāgasamāla, was making a [1314] long journey when they reached a forked road. Ven. Nāgasamāla, departing from the main route, said to the Buddha: “Venerable sir, I am taking this road on the left of the forked road.” The Buddha said: “Monastic, come, let us take the other road.” Ven. Nāgasamāla then, saying impatiently: “Venerable sir, take that road, I am going this way,” and he made a move to put the Buddha’s alms bowl and robes on the ground. Thereupon, the Buddha said to him: “Monastic, bring them to me,” and he had to carry them himself, and then went by the way he chose while Ven. Nāgasamāla took the other way, leaving the Buddha. When he had gone a short distance, Ven. Nāgasamāla was robbed by a gang of robbers who took away his alms bowl and robes and also hit him on the head. With blood streaming down from his head, he remembered the Buddha as his only refuge and went back to him. The Buddha asked him: “Monk, what has befallen you?” Ven. Nāgasamāla related his story to the Buddha and he said to him: “Monk, take heart. Foreseeing this danger, I had asked you not to take that road.”

This is one of the incidents that led to the appointment of a permanent personal attendant.

On another occasion during the 13th Rains Retreat (Vassa) when the Buddha was staying on the mountain abode at Cālikā hill, after the alms round in Jantu village, the Buddha, with the temporary attendant Ven. Meghiya, was going by the side of the river Kimikālā when, on seeing a Mango Grove, Ven. Meghiya said to the Buddha: “Venerable sir, take the alms bowl and the double robe yourself, I want to meditate in that Mango Grove.” The Buddha tried to dissuade him three times not to do so, but he would not listen. Then, no sooner had Ven. Meghiya sat on a rocky platform to start meditating, than three demeritorious thoughts oppressed him. He returned to the Buddha and related what had occurred in his mind when he tried to meditate. The Buddha solaced him saying: “Seeing that was going to happen to you, I told you not to resort to that place.”

For details about this event, read chapter 32a. This is another instance that led to the appointment of a permanent attendant.

On account of such mishaps, the Buddha, on another occasion, sitting on the Buddha’s seat at the Assembly Hall in the precincts of his Perfumed Chamber at the Jetavana monastery, said to the monastics: “Monastics, I have grown old now.<sup>285</sup> Some of the monastics attending upon me would take a different route from what I chose; some monastics would even think of putting down my alms bowl and robes on the ground. Now please think of a monastic who will attend upon me on a permanent basis.” On hearing these words, many of the monastics became emotional.

Then Ven. Sāriputta rose from his seat, paid homage to the Buddha, and said: “Venerable sir, for one incalculable and 100,000 aeons, I have fulfilled the perfections simply to become a disciple of the Fortunate One. A person of great knowledge like myself must be deemed as one fit to be the permanent personal attendant to the Fortunate One. May I be allowed to attend on the Fortunate One.” The Buddha said: “That will not do, Sāriputta, wherever you are, there is the doctrine. For you expound the doctrine in the same way as the Realised One does. You ought not to attend upon the Realised One.” After the Buddha had extolled the virtues of Ven. Sāriputta, he repeated the offer to attend on him. Ven. Moggallāna offered himself for the post but was likewise rejected. Then the 80 great monastic disciples all offered themselves, all sharing the same result.

Ven. Ānanda’s Eightfold Boon

Ven. Ānanda remained silent without offering himself for the post. The monastics then urged him: “Friend Ānanda, each member of the Saṅgha is offering himself for the privilege of attending on the Fortunate One, you should also offer yourself.” Ven. Ānanda said to them: “Friends, a position relating to the Fortunate One is not something to be asked for. Does the Fortunate One not notice me? If the Fortunate One so wishes, he will say: ‘Ānanda, be my personal attendant.’ ”

Then the Buddha said to the monastics: “Monastics, Ānanda does not need anybody’s advice to attend upon the Realised One. He will do so on his free will.” Thereupon the monastics [1315] pleaded with Ven. Ānanda, saying: “Friend Ānanda, now rise up, and offer yourself to be the personal attendant.” Then Ven. Ānanda rose from his seat and asked the Buddha to grant him these eight boons: “Venerable sir, if the Fortunate One would agree to these four refraining conditions, I will become personal attendant to the Fortunate One:

<sup>285</sup> He was at that time past 55.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 1996

1. The Fortunate One should refrain from giving me the fine robes that he has received.
2. The Fortunate One should refrain from giving me fine food.
3. The Fortunate One should refrain from letting me stay in the same dwelling place reserved for him.
4. The Fortunate One should refrain from taking me to lay supporters' houses when they invite him.

The Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Ānanda, what disadvantages do you see in these four matters?” And Ven. Ānanda explained thus: “Venerable sir, if I were given the four requisites enjoyed by the Buddha, then there is bound to arise the criticism that Ānanda has the privilege of receiving the fine robes received by the Fortunate One, receiving the fine food received by the Fortunate One, getting to stay together in the Buddha’s Perfumed Chamber, and having the privilege of accompanying the Buddha who visits to the houses of lay supporters. I see those criticisms as disadvantages.”

Further, Ven. Ānanda requested from the Buddha these four special privileges: “Venerable sir, if the Fortunate One would grant me these four special privileges, I will become the personal attendant to the Fortunate One:

1. The Fortunate One should agree to go to the places I invite him to.
2. The Fortunate One should give audience to visitors immediately upon their arrival.
3. The Fortunate One should explain to me any points of the doctrine that need elucidation.
4. The Fortunate One should recount to me all the discourses he makes while not in my presence.

The Buddha asked Ven. Ānanda again: “Ānanda, what benefits do you see in these four favours?” Ven. Ānanda explained thus: “Venerable sir, in this teaching which has eight marvellous quantities, certain lay supporters, who have great devotion to the Buddha, do not have direct access to invite him personally to their houses. They would ask me, as the Buddha’s personal attendant, to make their invitations and if I will accept their invitations on your behalf; those devotees, who come from afar to pay homage to the Fortunate One, should be allowed to see the Buddha without much waiting; whenever I am not satisfied with a certain saying of the Fortunate One I, as his personal attendant, ought to be allowed to ask the Fortunate One to have those unclear points of the doctrine elucidated.

Venerable sir, if the Fortunate One were not to comply with my requests to accept the invitations that are made by lay supporters through me; or not to comply with my request on behalf of pilgrims to give early audience; not to comply with my request to have the right to ask for elucidation on doctrinal problems, then people would say: ‘What is the purpose of Ānanda’s personal attendance to the Fortunate One, if he is devoid of even these things?’ These are the reasons in my asking for the first three boons. As regards the fourth boon, if other monastics were to ask me: ‘Friend Ānanda, where was this verse, or this discourse or this Birth-story given by the Fortunate One?’ and if I should be unable to answer their query, they would say: ‘Friend, you have been as close to the Fortunate One as his very shadow, and yet you do not know even this much.’ Venerable sir, to avoid such criticism, I am asking the Fortunate One this fourth favour, to relate to me all the discourses made by the Fortunate One not in my presence. Venerable sir, these are the advantages I see in four boons I am asking.”

The Buddha granted Ven. Ānanda all eight boons which comprised the four restraints and the four favours.

Thus Ven. Ānanda, after being granted the eight boons by the Buddha, became his permanent [1316] attendant. Hence he saw the realization of his aspiration, for which he had fulfilled the perfections over 100,000 aeons.

His daily routine consisted of getting cold and hot water for the Buddha, making ready the three sizes of woodbine tooth-brushes to suit the occasion, massaging the arms and legs of the Buddha, scrubbing the Buddha’s back when he took a bath, cleaning up the precincts of the Buddha’s Perfumed Chamber, etc.

Moreover, he was always by the Buddha’s side, seeing to the Buddha’s needs at all times and charting out an appropriate activity to be performed by the Buddha.

Not only did he keep a close loving supervision on the Buddha’s activities by day and at night, he also would keep himself awake by holding up a lamp and going round the precincts of the Buddha’s Chamber. Every night, he made nine rounds with the lamp in hand, his intention being to be ever ready when called by the Buddha at any hour. These are the reasons that lay behind his being designated as a foremost monastic.

Foremost Titles Achieved

On one occasion, when the Buddha was staying at the Jetavana monastery, he extolled the virtues of Ven. Ānanda, the custodian of the doctrine, in many ways:

1. Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ bahu-sutānaṃ yad-idaṃ Anando.

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who have wide learning, Ānanda is the foremost (etad-aggā).

2. Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ satimantānaṃ yad-idaṃ Anando.

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who have mindfulness in retaining my discourses, Ānanda is the foremost.

3. Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ gatimantānaṃ yad-idaṃ Anando.

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who comprehend my teaching, Ānanda is the foremost.

4. Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ dhitimantānaṃ yad-idaṃ Anando.

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who are diligent in learning, remembering and reciting my teaching, Ānanda is the foremost.

5. Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ upaṭṭhākānaṃ yad-idaṃ Anando.

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who render personal service to me, Ānanda is the foremost (etad-aggā).

Thus in Buddha Gotama's teaching, Ven. Ānanda was named by the Buddha as the foremost (etad-aggā) monastic-disciple in five areas: wide learning, mindfulness in retaining the doctrine, comprehending the teaching, diligence in bearing the teaching, and in caring for the teacher, by giving personal service to the Buddha.

[A section on the First Council which includes many details about Ven Ānanda has been removed from here and placed after the Buddha's Parinibbāna in chapter 41a.]

Ven. Ānanda's Parinibbāna

At the time of the First Council, in 483 BCE, Ven. Ānanda who was born on the same day as the Buddha was already 80 years of age. On the fortieth year after the First Council, when he was 120 years old, he reviewed his life-maintaining faculty and saw that he had only seven more days to live. He told this to his pupils.

When people learned this news, those living on one side of the river Rohiṇī, the bone of contention between the Sakyans and the Koliyans concerning the distribution of its waters that led to the Buddha's discourse known as the Discourse on the Great Assembly (Mahā-samaya-sutta, DN 20) said that Ven. Ānanda had benefited much from them and so he would pass away on their side of the river. And those living on the other side of the river also said so.

On hearing these words from both sides, Ven. Ānanda thought: "Both groups have done much to benefit me. None can dispute this fact. If I were to pass away on one side of the river, those living on the other side would fight for possession of my relics. Then I would become the cause of strife between them. If there be peace I will have to be the cause of peace. It now depends on how I handle the matter."

After reflecting thus, he said to both groups: "Male and female supporters, those of you who live on this side of the river have done me much benefit. Likewise, those of you who live on the other side of the river have done me much benefit. There is none among you who have not benefited me. Let those who live on this side gather together on this side, and let those who live on the other side gather together on that side."

Then on the seventh day, he remained aloft in the sky at about seven palm trees' height, sitting cross-legged above the middle of the river Rohiṇī and delivered a discourse to the people. At the end of the discourse, he willed that his body should split into two, with each portion falling onto each side of the river. He then entered into the absorption (jhāna) on the fire element (tejo-dhātu) which is the basis of attaining supernormal powers. On emerging from that absorption, the thought process pertaining to supernormal power arose in him. At the impulsion moment of that thought process, his body became ablaze and immediately after the end of that thought process, the death-consciousness arose and he passed away, realizing Nibbāna and making an end of all traces of existence.

His body split into two, as he had willed, one portion falling on one side of the river and the other portion falling on the other side. People on both sides wailed wildly. The outburst of their emotion sounded as if the earth itself were crumbling. The lamentation on this occasion would seem even more pitiable and desperate than it was on the death of the Buddha. They wailed for four whole months, muttering: “So long as we saw the Buddha’s personal assistant who went about holding the Buddha’s alms bowl and robes, we got some solace about the absence of the Buddha, but now that person himself is dead and no more, we have no means to solace ourselves. The Buddha’s passing away is now complete for us.”

Verses of Urgency

Dreadful indeed is grief, lamentation, etc. All forms of association between spouses, kinsmen, friends, teachers and pupils, end because there inevitably comes the parting between those dear ones either through death or through severance. [1326]

Hā aniccā va saṅkhatā.

Dreadful indeed is grief, lamentation, etc. All conditioned phenomena, mind, temperature and nutriment all end, due to their impermanence.

Hā uppannā ca bhaṅgantā.

Dreadful indeed is grief, lamentation, etc. All conditioned phenomena that have the nature of arising end because they are subject to decay and dissolution.

Hā hā saṅkhāra-dhammatā.

Dreadful indeed is it to be liable to sink in the turbulent ocean of woes is the unalterable course of mind and matter of conditioned phenomena, which all have the characteristics of impermanence, suffering and non-self.

31. Ven. Uruvelā Kassapa

Aspiration in the Past

The future Uruvelā Kassapa was born into a worthy family in the city of Hāmsavatī during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. When he came of age, he listened to a discourse by the Buddha. While doing so, he witnessed a monastic being named by the Buddha as the foremost monastic in having a large following. He was inspired by that monastic to become someone similar in the future. He made great offerings to the Buddha and his Saṅgha for seven days, at the end of which, he made an offering of a set of three robes to the Buddha and each of the members of the Saṅgha and, thereafter, he expressed his aspiration to become a foremost monastic at some future time, having a big following. The Buddha reviewed his aspiration and saw that it would be fulfilled and thus made the prediction: “You will be named by Buddha Gotama as the foremost monastic in his teaching with a big following.” After making the august pronouncement Buddha Padumuttara returned to his monastery.

Life as Royal Brother to Buddha Phussa

In that existence of receiving Buddha Padumuttara’s prediction, the future Uruvelā Kassapa lived a meritorious life until he died and was reborn in the Deva realm and subsequently either in the human world or the Deva realm. Then 92 aeons prior to the present aeon, when Buddha Phussa appeared in the world, the future Uruvelā Kassapa was reborn as the half brother of the Buddha. The Buddha had three younger half-brothers and this prince, the future Uruvelā Kassapa, was the eldest of the three.

The three brothers attended upon the Buddha with the four monastic requisites for one Rains Retreat (Vassa), the details of which have been described in Ven. Raṭṭhapāla’s story, section 20-21, above. Also refer to chapter 14 for more information on the Kassapa brothers.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

The three royal brothers gave a great offering of valuable articles to the Buddha and his Saṅgha at the end of the Rains Retreat (Vassa). They also spent their whole lives in doing meritorious deeds, and were reborn in the fortunate destinations only. During the present aeon, before the advent of Buddha Gotama, they were reborn into a Brahmin family whose clan name was Kassapa. On coming of age, they become masters of the three Vedas and the eldest brother had 500 pupils; the second brother had 300 pupils; and the youngest brother had 200 pupils who became their disciples.

When they reviewed their learning they realised that the Vedas offered teachings for the present life but lacked knowledge that was of benefit in the hereafter. The eldest Kassapa brother, together with his 500 disciples, renounced the world and led the life of a recluse. They retired into the Uruvelā forest and he became known by the name of his [1327] place as Uruvelā Kassapa. The second brother and his 300 disciples likewise became recluses and lived at the river bend of the Ganges and he came to be known as Nadī Kassapa. The youngest brother also became a recluse together with his 200 disciples and they dwelled at a place called Gayāsīsa, and hence he became known as Gayā Kassapa.

The three Kassapa brothers became famous as teachers of their own religious sects. During the time when the three Kassapa brothers were giving guidance to their respective groups, the Buddha Gotama appeared in the world. The Buddha passed the first Rains Retreat (Vassa) at the Deer Park, also known as Isipatana, where he caused the Awakening of the Group-of-Five ascetics and the 55 youths led by Yasa, son of a merchant, and these 60 disciples become the first Arahats in this world.

At the end of the Rains Retreat (Vassa), the Buddha enjoined the 60 Arahata monks to spread the good doctrine while he headed toward the Uruvelā forest alone. On his way, he met the 30 princes, all brothers, at Kappāsika forest, whom he summoned as monastics using the words: “Come, monastic,” and caused their Awakening as noble ones (ariya) of various grades, training them for Awakening.

The Buddha then proceeded alone to the Uruvelā forest because he saw the ripeness of Uruvelā Kassapa for Awakening and also saw that all three Kassapa brothers and their followers would gain Awakening. When the Buddha met Uruvelā Kassapa, he had to display 3,500 miracles to convince him, the most remarkable of which was the taming of the powerful Nāga. Finally, Uruvelā Kassapa and his 500 disciples were summoned by the Buddha into the monastic life. On learning the news of the eldest brother becoming a follower of the Buddha, the younger brothers and their followers likewise became followers. All of them were summoned by the Buddha into the monastic life.<sup>286</sup>

The Buddha took the 1,000 newly admitted monastics to Gayāsīsa. He sat on the rock platform there and considered the appropriate discourse for them. He remembered that these recluses of Brahmin origin had all along been indulging in fire worship, and accordingly delivered them a discourse giving the simile of the fire that relentlessly burns through the three forms of existence: The sense, form and formless realms. The discourse entitled the Instruction about Burning (Āditta-pariyāya, SN 35.235) had the desired effect of turning all the monastics into Arahats.

Then the Buddha saw that the time was opportune for him to visit Rājagaha, where before his Awakening, as he had promised King Bimbisāra that he would visit his city after becoming a Buddha. He journeyed to Rājagaha accompanied by 1,000 Arahats and rested in the toddy palm grove. King Bimbisāra, on hearing about the arrival of the Buddha, went to meet him, in the company of 120,000 Brahmin householders. After paying respects to the Buddha, he sat in a suitable place. On that occasion, the fame of Uruvelā Kassapa had become so well established that the Brahmin retinue of the king paid their homage to Uruvelā Kassapa. The Buddha knew that the audience were unable to decide which of the two, himself or Uruvelā Kassapa, was superior. He was also aware that the people, having doubts, could not pay attention to the Dhamma. So he said to Uruvelā Kassapa: “Kassapa, your followers are in a quandary. Clear up their mental confusion.” Thus, the Buddha indicated to Ven. Uruvelā Kassapa to show his allegiance.

Ven. Uruvelā Kassapa respectfully responded: Rising from his seat, he made obeisance to the Buddha with the hands, knees and forehead touching the ground, and rose up to the sky about a palm tree’s height. There, remaining in mid-air, he took on various forms as he wished, and said to the Buddha: “The Fortunate One is my teacher; I am his pupil, his disciple. The Fortunate One is my teacher; I am his pupil, his disciple.” Then he descended to the ground and paid homage to the Buddha at his feet. Then he rose up again to twice the height of a palm tree, created a variety of forms, came down and paid homage at the Buddha's feet. On the seventh time of repeating this miraculous feat, he rose to a height of seven palm trees, and after descending to the ground, and paying respects to the Buddha, he sat in a suitable place.

The big audience were now in no doubt about the supremacy of the Buddha and acclaimed him as the great ascetic. Then only the Buddha gave a discourse to them, at the [1328] end of which, King Bimbisāra and 110,000 Brahmin householders attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) and the remaining 10,000 Brahmins took the Three Treasures as their refuge; in that way they acknowledged the Buddha.

Foremost Title Achieved

The 1,000 pupils who had served Ven. Uruvelā Kassapa, after attaining Awakening, thought that since they had reached the peak of monastic practice, they did not need to go anywhere else for their religious advancement and so they remained in the company of their erstwhile leader.

On one occasion, the Buddha, in a monastic congregation at the Jetavana monastery, declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ
mahā-parisānaṃ yad-idaṃ Uruvela-kassapo.*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who have a big following, Uruvelā Kassapa is the foremost (etad-aggā).

The Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya) commentary, notes that Ven. Uruvelā Kassapa had the unique position of having a constant following of 1,000 monastics, taking into account the followers of his two younger brothers. If each of the 1,000 monastics were to act as preceptor and admit one monastic, Uruvelā Kassapa's following would become 2,000, and if the original 1,000 were to admit two new monastics each into the Saṅgha, his following could become 3,000. Hence he was in an unrivalled position in the number of following.

32. Ven. Kāḷudāyī

Aspiration in the Past

The future Kāḷudāyī was born into a worthy family in the city of Hamsavati, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. While he was listening to a discourse by the Buddha, he happened to witness the Buddha appoint a monastic as being the foremost disciple who could arouse devotion in the Buddha's kinsmen, even before they had met the Buddha. The worthy man, the future Kāḷudāyī, aspired to such an honour during the time of some Future Buddha. After making the great offerings, he expressed his aspiration before the Buddha. Later, the Buddha uttered words predicting the fulfilment of his aspiration.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

Future Kāḷudāyī devoted himself to meritorious deeds till the end of his life. He was reborn in the fortunate destinations only. Finally, he was conceived in the womb of the mother who was of a high official family in Kapilavatthu. This took place simultaneously with the conception of the Bodhisatta, Prince Siddhattha, as the two boys were born on the same day. His parents placed him on a white cloth and presented him to King Suddhodana to become an attendant to Prince Siddhattha.

The Name Kāḷudāyī

On the day of naming the boy, they named him Udāyī because he arose (udaya) on the same day the Bodhisatta was born, and the whole city was filled with joy and excitement because of that. Since the boy had a somewhat darker skin, the word kāḷa (dark), was prefixed to the original name of Udāyī and he was therefore called Kāḷudāyī. As a boy, Kāḷudāyī lived in the royal palace and he played games privately with Prince Siddhattha in the place of Kapilavatthu.

Later on, Prince Siddhattha renounced the world and spent six harrowing years in pursuit of the truth. He eventually attained Awakening and delivered his first discourse, the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka). He was then residing at Rājagaha which was his place for collecting alms food.

When King Suddhodana heard the good news that his son, the Buddha, was [1329] residing at the Veḷuvana monastery in Rājagaha, he sent a courtier with an entourage of 1,000 men, whose order was to request the Buddha to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu. The royal messenger made the 60 league journey to Rājagaha and entered the Veḷuvana monastery. At that time, the Buddha was teaching a discourse to the audience which consisted of the four types of listeners. The royal messenger sat at the edge of the audience and paid attention to the Buddha's discourse, thinking he would communicate the king's message to the Buddha after the discourse. But even while he was listening attentively to the discourse, he, as well as his entourage of 1,000 men, gained Awakening. Then the Buddha, extended his hand and said to them: "Come, monastics," and all the men instantly became monastics with the grave appearance of those with 60 years of monastic standing and fully equipped with the requisites, created magically (iddhi-maya-parikkhāra).

As it is in the nature of noble ones (ariya) to become indifferent to worldly matters, the thousand monastics did not impart King Suddhodana's message to the Buddha. They dwelt in the bliss of the attainment of Awakening. King Suddhodana felt annoyed to hear nothing from his messenger and sent another courtier with 1,000 men on the same mission.

This messenger also went before the Buddha, became absorbed in his discourse, and became an Arahant together with his 1,000 men. In this way, King Suddhodana sent a total of nine missions, one after another, each headed by a courtier with an entourage of 1,000 men to the Buddha and all the nine messengers and their 9,000 men neglected their mission because they became Arahants before they could extend the king's invitation to the Buddha.

Kāḷudāyī's Mission to Kapilavatthu

King Suddhodana then reflected on the situation: "The nine courtiers had no affection for me and so they said nothing to my son, the Buddha, about his visit to this city of Kapilavatthu of ours. Others would also fail to do so. But Kāḷudāyī, born on the same day as the Buddha, was his playmate in their childhood. This young man is affectionate to me." And so he summoned him and said to Kāḷudāyī, now an official at his court: "Son, go to the Buddha with 1,000 men, and invite him to Kapilavatthu."

Courtier Kāḷudāyī said to the King: "Great King, if you would give me permission to become a monastic, like the previous royal messengers, I will see to the Buddha's visit to Kapilavatthu." To which the king readily responded: "Son, do as you wish. Only see that my son, the Buddha, visits me."

"Very well, Great King," said Kāḷudāyī, "I shall do so," when the king gave his permission. He left the city accompanied by 1,000 men and eventually reached Rājagaha. Sitting at the edge of the audience, he listened to the Buddha who was teaching a discourse. After hearing it, he and his thousand men became Arahats and were called up by the Buddha into the monastic life.

But minister Kāḷudāyī did not forget his mission. He thought that the cold season was not suitable for the Buddha to make the long journey to Kapilavatthu, and that, when spring had appeared, and the forest flowers were blooming forth and the grass and foliage putting on fresh greenness, then only should the Buddha travel to Kapilavatthu. So he waited till the full moon of March (Phagguna) and then he sang 60 verses giving a picturesque portrayal of the pleasantness of the season, indicating to the Buddha that the time was right for him to visit Kapilavatthu.

The Buddha knew Ven. Kāḷudāyī's mind and decided that it was time that he visited Kapilavatthu. Then, accompanied by 20,000 Arahats, he took the journey of 60 leagues at a leisurely pace (aturita-desa-cārikā).

Ven. Kāḷudāyī, noting the Buddha's departure from Rājagaha, appeared at King Suddhodana's palace. The king was delighted on seeing him standing mid-air above the palace, and offered his throne for his seat. Then he filled the alms bowl of the [1330] venerable with cooked rice and dishes prepared for himself. Ven. Kāḷudāyī then moved as if to depart. The king said to him: "Son, take your meal here." To which the venerable said: "I shall take it when I get back to the Fortunate One." – "Where is the Buddha now?" asked the king. "The Buddha is now on his way, with 20,000 Arahats, to visit you." – "Then, son, take your meal here. Then carry the food prepared in my palace to the Buddha daily, till he arrives."

Henceforth, Ven. Kāḷudāyī took his meal at the palace and then received the alms food on behalf of the Buddha. In doing so, he gave a discourse to the king and the royal household on the noble qualities of the Buddha, thereby giving them a foretaste of the unparalleled pleasure they were to experience on meeting with the Buddha. Then, just as the people were watching him, he threw up into the air his alms bowl filled with food for the Buddha. He also rose into the air, took the alms bowl and offered it to the Buddha on the way. The Buddha received it in his hands and took his meal for the day.

Ven. Kāḷudāyī took upon himself the task of receiving alms food for the Buddha, and making the appropriate discourses to warm up the feelings of King Suddhodana and the royal household towards the Buddha, for the entire journey of his memorable journey to Kapilavatthu which was 60 leagues long, taken leisurely at the rate of one league a day.

This remarkable routine that Ven. Kāḷudāyī set for himself, to bring food to the Buddha, was the basis of his receiving a special mention from the Buddha.

Foremost Title Achieved

On a later occasion, in a congregation of monastics, the Buddha reflected on the role that Ven. Kāḷudāyī had played in warming up the feelings of King Suddhodana and the kinsmen of the Buddha, declared:

kulappasādakānaṃ yad-idaṃ Kāḷudāyī.*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who are able to kindle devotion to me in the hearts of my kinsmen, Kāḷudāyī is the foremost (etad-aggā).

33. Ven. Bākula

Healing a Buddha

The future Bākula was born in a Brahmin family on the eve of the advent of Buddha Anomadassī, one incalculable period and 100,000 aeons before the present aeon. When he came of age, he learned the three Vedas and gained mastery in them. But he found that this learning lacked the essence of what he was looking for. “I will seek welfare in the hereafter,” he decided, and so he renounced the world, became a recluse and resorted to a remote mountain. After due diligence, he gained the five kinds of super knowledges (abhīññā) and the eight absorption (jhāna) attainments. He spent his time in dwelling in the bliss of absorption.

Then the Buddha Anomadassī appeared in the world and went from place to place in the company of a big number of noble disciples. The recluse, who was to become Ven. Bākula aeons later, was thrilled by the news of the appearance in the world of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha. He went to Buddha Anomadassī and on hearing his discourse, became established in the three refuges. He did not want to leave his mountain abode and remained a recluse, but often visited the Buddha to hear his Dhamma.

One day, the Buddha suffered from an attack of colic. On his visit to him, the recluse, the future Bākula, was told by the Buddha of his ailment. The recluse went back to his mountain gladly, grasping the opportunity of earning merit by collecting herbs to cure the Buddha. He delivered the medicine to the attendant monastic who then administered it to the Buddha. A single dose of the medicine completely cured the colic. [1331]

When the Buddha had recovered, the recluse approached him and made his solemn wish: “Venerable sir, I have brought the cure for the Fortunate One’s disease. For this deed of merit, may I be free of disease at all times in my farings in Saṃsāra, and never subject to the slightest ailment even for the duration of the milking of a cow.” This was the remarkable merit done by the future Bākula in that past existence.

Aspiration in the Past

After passing away from that existence, the recluse was reborn in the Brahma world, and after this Brahma existence, he was reborn only in the Deva realm and the human world over the entire length of one immeasurable period (asaṅkhyeyya-kappa). During the time of Buddha Padumuttara, he was reborn into a worthy family in the city of Hāmsavatī. On one occasion, he saw the Buddha name a monastic as the foremost monastic in perfect health or freedom from disease, and so he aspired to that honour at some future time. He made great offerings to the Buddha and the Saṅgha, as was usual with aspirants to such unique statuses, and later expressed his aspiration. The Buddha made the prediction that his aspiration would be realized.

Healing as a Recluse

The future Bākula spent the whole of his life doing deeds of merit and passed away to good destinations only. Then 91 aeons prior to the present aeon, he was born into a Brahmin family, in the city of Bandhumatī, on the eve of the appearance of Buddha Vipassī. As in his former existence during Buddha Anomadassī, he became a recluse and took up his dwelling at the foot of a mountain, enjoying the bliss of absorption.

Then Buddha Vipassī appeared in the world and went about in the company of 6,800,000 monastic Arahats, with Bandhumatī as the resort for collecting daily alms food, where he benefited his father, King Bandhuma, with discourses on the doctrine. Later he resided in the Deer Park known as Khemā, “the Sanctuary.”

The recluse, the future Bākula, heard the news of the appearance of the Buddha in the world. He approached Buddha Vipassī, and on hearing his discourse, became a disciple of his. Although he took refuge in the three refuges, he did not want to leave his mountain abode and remained there as a recluse, but frequenting the monastery of the Buddha to attend on him.

One day, the Saṅgha, with the exception of the two chief disciples and the Buddha himself, developed headaches, which was due to contact with poisonous pollen wafted in the air from a certain poisonous kind of plant growing in the Himavanta. When the recluse visited the Buddha and saw the infected monastics lying down with their heads covered, he inquired from a monastic about the cause of the ailment. On being told the cause, he thought that an opportunity presented itself for him to tend to the sick monastics and earn merit. He gathered the necessary herbs, prepared a medicine, and administered it to the sick monastics who were immediately cured.

Repairing an Old Monastery

After living the full lifespan as a recluse, he passed away and was reborn in the Brahma realm. After that existence, he was reborn only in the fortunate destinations for a period of 91 aeons (kappa) only, when Buddha Kassapa appeared. Then he was born a householder in Bārāṇasī.

One day, he went to a remote country together with a team of carpenters to fetch timber for repairing his house. On the way, he came across an old monastery in a state of disrepair. He considered that repairing his own house had no particular merit to his life hereafter, but by repairing the monastery he could earn much merit. Therefore he sent his team of carpenters to find timber from the countryside and had the old monastery fully renovated, adding a new kitchen, a new eating place, a new fire-house for the cold season, a new walkway, a new hot bathroom, a new larder, a new latrine, a new clinic, a store of medicines and medicinal requisites comprising drugs, ointments, snuffs, inhalants. All these he dedicated to the Saṅgha. [1332]

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

The worthy man, the future Bākula, devoted himself to good deeds till the end of his life. And for the whole of the interim period between the two Buddhas, lasting infinite aeons, he was reborn in the Deva realm and the human world only. During the era of Buddha Gotama, just before he attained Perfect Awakening, future Bākula was conceived in the womb of the wife of a merchant of Kosambī. His parents reached the height of fortune and fame from the time of his conception. His mother believed that her child was endowed with great past merit, and on the day she gave birth to him, she had the infant bathed in the River Yamunā for the sake of his health and long life. This was done with ceremony.

The reciters of the Collection of the Middle Length Discourses (Majjhima-nikāya) say that the infant was sent to bathe in the river on the fifth day after his birth.

The nurse, who took the baby to the Yamunā, amused herself by dipping the baby in and out of the water. As she was doing so, a big fish drew near it, mistaking the baby for food. The nurse was frightened and ran away, leaving the baby to be swallowed by the fish.

But, as the baby was endowed with great past merit, he suffered no pains in being swallowed by the fish, but felt quite comfortable in the stomach of the fish, as though he were lying in bed.

If it were any other child it would die instantly. But since this baby was destined to be an Arahāt, the power of the path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa) which was dormant in him, saved his life. This is the kind of super-natural power (iddhi) called the super-natural spreading of knowledge (ñāṇa-vipphāra-iddhi). The fish suffered great pain due to the power of the supposed victim inside it. It felt as if it had swallowed an iron ball and swam downstream for 30 leagues where, at Bārāṇasī, it was caught in a fisherman's net.

Big fish usually do not die in the net but are beaten to death. In this case, due to the power of the baby inside it, it died on its own accord so that no beating was necessary. The usual practice of fishermen was to cut up such a big fish to pieces for sales. But, in this case, the child inside it had great power to prevent it from being cut. Therefore, the fisherman carried it on his shoulder by means of a yoke and went about calling for prospective buyers, declaring the price as 1,000 pieces of money. This was an unusually high price and the citizens of Bārāṇasī could not buy it.

In Bārāṇasī, there was a merchant, worth 800 million, who had no child born to his family. His household servants purchased the fish for 1,000 pieces of money. Normally, preparing of food such as cutting a fish was left to her servants by the merchant's wife. But, in this case, she went into the kitchen and cut open the big fish, not at the stomach as was usually done, but at the back. This too was due to the great power of the baby inside. She was pleasantly surprised to find a bonny baby inside the fish. She took the baby, who was golden-hued, and carrying him in her arms crying: "I've got a baby! I got him from inside the fish!" She showed him gleefully to her husband, who had the strange find of the living baby announced with the beat of the drum in the city. Then he reported the matter to the king who said: "The baby, who has survived in the stomach of a fish, must surely be of a person of great past merit. Let it remain in your care."

The Name Bākula

The natural parents of the baby in Kosambī learnt the news of a living baby being found in a fish in Bārāṇasī and they went to Bārāṇasī to investigate. They found the baby richly adorned, playing in the house of the rich man in Bārāṇasī. "What a lovely child this is!" the mother remarked, and said that it was her child. The foster mother disagreed and said: "No, it is my child."

Natural mother: "Where did you get this child?"

Foster mother: "I got it from the stomach of a fish."

Natural mother: "If so, this is not your child. It is mine."

Foster mother: "Where did you get yours?"

Natural mother: "I conceived it and it was born out of my womb after ten months of pregnancy, I sent it to the River Yamunā to bathe and it was swallowed by a big fish." [1333]

Foster mother: "Maybe it was another fish that swallowed your child. It is however true that I got this child from inside a fish."

Thus the two mothers each claimed the child as their own. This matter was brought before the king for decision.

The King of Bārāṇasī gave his decision as follows: “The wife of the merchant of Kosambī is the natural mother whose claim to the child is unshakable. On the other hand, the wife of the merchant of Bārāṇasī is not groundless in her claim to the child. For, when one buys fish, it is customary that the entrails of the fish are not taken out by the seller so that the buyer gets the whole fish. The child she got from inside the fish is legally her property. The former has the right to the child as a natural mother. The latter has right to the child as a son by way of a gift. Each is entitled to claim the child, and he is entitled to inherit from both families.” From that day onwards, both the families enjoyed unprecedented fortune and fame. And the child was brought up in luxury by both families. His name was Bākula Kumāra, meaning the child of two families.

When Bākula came of age, his two pairs of parents built three mansions each; each for his seasonal residence at Kosambī and Bārāṇasī. He spent only four months at each of the two cities, attended by a big retinue of girls for entertainment. When he moved from one city to the other at the end of a four-month stay, he travelled in pomp in a grand barge with dancing girls. The entertaining girls at each city divided the transit period equally between them, so that the sending-off team served on the barge for two months after which they were relieved about half-way by the welcoming team. The merchant’s son then spent four months in great ease and comfort at the each place. He completed 80 years of age living in that manner.

Bākula’s Monastic Life and Awakening

When Bākula was 80 years old, Buddha Gotama had attained Perfect Awakening. After teaching his first discourse, the Dhamma Wheel, the Buddha toured the country and, travelling by stages, reached Kosambī.<sup>287</sup> On learning of the arrival of the Buddha, his previous meritorious deeds prompted Bākula to go and see the Buddha. Making offerings of flowers and perfumes to the Buddha, he listened to his discourse which heightened his devotion so much that he took up the monastic life. As a monastic, he remained a worldling for seven days only because, at the dawn of the eighth day, he became an Arahat with the fourfold analytical knowledge.

At that time, the former ladies who waited upon him had returned to their parents' homes in Bārāṇasī and Kosambī. They were devoted to Ven. Bākula and made robes for him. He wore their robes in turns; a half month using those offered from Kosambī, another half month on those from Bārāṇasī. Besides, the citizens of both the cities made special offerings to him of whatever fine food or articles which they had.

Foremost Title Achieved

During the 80 years of household life, Bākula never experienced any ailment, even for a fleeting moment such as it takes to hold a piece of solid unguent and savour its smell. On the completion of his 80th year, he became a monastic with great satisfaction and as a monastic, he also enjoyed perfect health. Moreover, he was never in want of any of the four monastic requisites. Thus, on one occasion, when the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattihī, in a monastic congregation, he declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakānam bhikkhūnam
appābādhānam yad-idam Bākulo.*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who enjoy good health, and are free from disease, Bākula is the foremost (etad-aggā). [1334]

Wonders of Bākula

Some marvellous facts concerning Ven. Bākula, as mentioned in the Discourse concerning Bākula (Bākula-sutta, MN 124), are reproduced here.

Once, Ven. Bākula was staying in Rājagaha in the Veḷuvana monastery, when the naked ascetic Kassapa, who had been his friend during his lay life, visited him. After the usual exchange of greetings, he sat in a suitable place and said to Ven. Bākula: “Friend Bākula, for how long have you been a monastic?” – “Friend, I have been a monastic for 80 years.” – “Friend Bākula, during these 80 years, how many times have you had sexual intercourse?” This was a rude question. Then Ven. Bākula revealed some marvellous and extraordinary things about himself as follows:

1. “Friend Kassapa, you should not have put the question to me thus: ‘Friend Bākula, during these 80 years, how many times have you had sexual intercourse?’ Instead, friend Kassapa, you should have put the question to me in this way: ‘Friend Bākula, during these 80 years, how many times has perception concerning sense-pleasures (kāma-saññā) arisen in you?’ Friend Kassapa, I have been a monastic for 80 years.<sup>288</sup> All through these 80 years, never has there arisen in me any perception concerning sense pleasures.”

That no consciousness concerning sense-pleasures had ever arisen in Ven. Bākula is one marvellous fact about him.

2-3. “Friend Kassapa, I have been a monastic for 80 years. All through these 80 years, there never has arisen in me any perception concerning ill-will (vyāpāda-saññā) or any perception concerning harmful thoughts (vihimsa-saññā) towards anyone.”

That no perception concerning ill-will had ever arisen in Ven. Bākula is also a marvellous fact and that no perception concerning harmful thought towards others had ever arisen in him is yet another marvellous fact concerning him.

4. “Friend Kassapa, I have been a monastic for 80 years. All through these 80 years, there never has arisen in me any sensual thought.”

The fact that no sensual thought had ever arisen in Ven. Bākula is a marvellous fact concerning him.

5-6. “Friend Kassapa, I have been a monastic for 80 years. All through these years, no thought of harming has ever arisen in me.”

The fact that no thought of harming had ever arisen in Ven. Bākula is a marvellous fact concerning him.

7. “Friend Kassapa, I have been a monastic for 80 years. All through these 80 years, I have never accepted any robe offered by lay supporters who are not related to me.”

That he had not accepted robes offered by non-relatives is a marvellous fact concerning Ven. Bākula.

8. “Friend Kassapa, I have been a monastic for 80 years. All through these 80 years, I have never cut robe-material with a knife.”

This non-cutting of robe-material is a marvellous fact concerning Ven. Bākula.

<sup>288</sup> Ven. Bākula’s age was 160 years by that time.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 2016

“Friend Kassapa, I have been a monastic for 80 years. All through these 80 years:

9. I have never sewn a robe with a needle.

10. I have never dyed a robe.

11. I have never sewn a Cloth (Kaṭhina).

12. I have never taken part in the making of robes of companion monastics.

13. I have never accepted an offering of alms food at any lay person’s house.

14. I have never had any such thought as: ‘It would be well if somebody were to invite me.’

15. I have never sat in a house.

16. I have never taken a meal in a village or a town.

17. I have never cast my eyes on a woman, noticing her feminine characteristics.

18. I have never given a discourse to any woman, even a verse of four lines.

It is proper for a monastic to discourse to a woman in five or six words. If a doctrinal question be asked by a woman, a monastic may answer it in as many as 1,000 verses. Yet Ven. Bākula did not discourse to a woman. Discoursing to lay supporters is mostly the job of those monastics who have attachment to them.

19. I have never gone near a nunnery.

It is proper for a monastic to visit a sick female monastic. And yet Ven. Bākula did not do so. In such a rule, where exceptions are allowed, he never bothered with those exceptions.

20. I have never given a discourse to a nun.

21. I have never given a discourse to a probationer female monastic.

22. I have never given a discourse to a female novice.

23. I have never initiated anyone into the Saṅgha as a novice.

24. I have never acted as a preceptor to a candidate for full monastic life.

25. I have never given any instruction to any monastics.

26. I have never allowed myself to be served by a novice.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 2017

27. I have never bathed in a bath-house.
28. I have never used bath-powder.
29. I have never allowed myself to be massaged by a companion monastic.
30. I have never been ill, even for the duration taken to draw a drop of milk.
31. I have never taken even a bit of herbal medicine.
32. I have never leaned against a support.
33. I have never lain on a bed.

These are also marvellous facts about Ven. Bākula.

34. Friend Kassapa, I have been a monastic for 80 years. All through these 80 years, I have never taken up residence for the Rains Retreat period near a village.

This mode of dwelling in the forest throughout the whole period of the monastic life is another marvellous fact about Ven. Bākula.

35. Friend Kassapa, I remained in a defiled state as a worldling only for the first seven days of the monastic life, eating the alms food from the people. On the eighth day, knowledge of the Arahat fruition arose in me.

That Ven. Bākula became an Arahat on the eighth day of his monastic life is also a marvellous fact concerning him.

After hearing the marvellous and extraordinary facts about Ven. Bākula, the naked ascetic Kassapa requested Ven. Bākula to admit him into the Saṅgha as a monastic under this teaching. Ven. Bākula did not act as preceptor to him, but he found a suitable monastic to be preceptor to Kassapa, who was admitted into the Saṅgha. Not long after, Ven. Kassapa, by diligently engaging in the noble practice, became an Arahat.

36. Then one day Ven. Bākula, holding his key, went from one monastery to another and announced thus: “Venerable ones, come forth! Venerable ones, come forth! Today I shall realize Parinibbāna!”

The fact that Ven. Bākula was able to do so is also a marvellous thing concerning him.

37. When the Saṅgha was thus apprised and the companion monastics had gathered themselves, Ven. Bākula, reflecting that during his whole life he had never caused any monastics any inconvenience, and that at his death also he did not wish any monastic to bear the burden of his dead body, he wished that his body be consumed by fire. He sat in the midst of the gathering of monastics, entering into the absorption (jhāna) on the element of heat and passed away. As soon as he passed away his body was consumed by a flame which arose from the body and there was [1336] just a small collection of relics resembling Jasmine buds.

This way of passing away in the midst of a gathering of monastics is also a marvellous thing concerning Ven. Bākula.

34. Ven. Sobhita

Aspiration in the Past

The future Ven. Sobhita was born into a worthy family, in the city of Hāmsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. While listening to a discourse by the Buddha, he saw a monastic being designated as the foremost among the male monastic disciples who could remember their past lives. He aspired to that honour in some future existence. After making extraordinary offerings to the Buddha, he expressed this wish. The Buddha predicted that his wish would be fulfilled.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

The future Sobhita spent his life in doing deeds of merit and passed away into good destinations only. During the time of Buddha Gotama, he was reborn in the Brahmin caste in Sāvattihī. He was named Sobhita.

Young Sobhita had occasions to listen to the Buddha's discourses. His devotion grew to such an extent that he became a monastic and engaged in the noble practice well and eventually became an Arahāt. He was especially endowed with a keen power of remembering past existences (pubbe-nivāsa-ñāṇa).

Foremost Title Achieved

Five hundred aeons ago, from the present aeon, the future Sobhita, under the teaching of other faiths, had practised absorption (jhāna) on the form sphere which is devoid of consciousness. While dwelling in the fourth absorption of that description, he passed away without relapsing from absorption and was reborn in the form realm where he lived for 500 aeons, which is the full lifespan in that existence.

After passing away from that existence, he was reborn in the human world as Sobhita, the Brahmin youth. As he was ripe for Awakening, he became a monastic in the teaching of Buddha Gotama. He strove diligently for Awakening and eventually attained it and was endowed with the three powers: the power of remembering past existences, the power of divine sight and the power of the destruction of the pollutants (āsava).

One day, as he exercised his power of remembering past existences, he could see his rebirth in the present existence and on going back he could see his death, or the death-conscious moment, at the existence in the second last existence. But he could not see the existence before that which was in the form realm, which is without consciousness.

Power of remembering past existences is founded on the recalling of the death-consciousness moments and the rebirth-consciousness moments of past existences. This power pertains only to mental phenomena such as understanding the causal relation of mental processes by way of proximity. The form realm which is devoid of consciousness (asañña-satta), does not lend itself to this scrutiny.<sup>289</sup>

Thus, his second last existence being devoid of mental phenomena and hence unknowable even by the power of remembering past existences, Ven. Sobhita used his intuition thus: “Any being who still fares in the round of rebirth has not a single moment when the aggregates (khandha) do not arise. A being, reborn in the form realm, is devoid of consciousness, has a lifespan of 500 aeons.

Therefore, I must have been reborn in that sphere and remained alive without consciousness. That was surely my second to last existence.” That was how Ven. Sobhita arrived at the knowledge of his past existence.

Recollecting past existence of one who is reborn in the form realm that is devoid [1337] of consciousness, is a matter falling within the province of the Buddhas only. The conclusion drawn by Ven. Sobhita was an extraordinary mental faculty, which is like hitting a yak’s hair with a dart of yak’s hair, or like printing a foot track in the sky. Therefore, referring to this unparalleled power of Ven. Sobhita, the Buddha, on another occasion when naming foremost monastics, declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakanāmaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ
pubbe-nivāsaṃ anussarantānaṃ yad-idaṃ Sobhito.*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who have the power to recollect their past existences, Ven. Sobhita is the foremost (etad-aggā).

For more information on this extraordinary faculty of Ven. Sobhita, refer to the Vinaya (PTS 3.109), and the commentary and sub-commentary thereon.

35. Ven. Upāli

Aspiration in the Past

The future Upāli was born into a worthy family, in the city of Hāmsavati, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. While he was listening to a discourse being delivered by the Buddha, he witnessed a monastic being designated as the foremost among the male monastic disciples who strictly lived by the Vinaya Rules. He wished to be honoured by the same title by some Bodhisatta. After making extraordinary offerings to the Buddha, he expressed his aspiration before him, and the Buddha predicted that the aspiration would be fulfilled.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

The future Upāli spent his whole life in meritorious actions and passed away to good destinations only. During the time of Buddha Gotama, he was reborn in the barber caste and was named Upāli. When he came of age, he served as barber to the six Sakyan princes: Bhaddiya, Anuruddha, Kimila, Bhagu, Ānanda and Devadatta. When the six Sakyan princes renounced the world and joined the Buddha at the Anupiya Mango grove in order to get admission into the Saṅgha, Upāli also became a monastic together with them.

For details of the episode about the group of Sakyan princes taking up the monastic life, refer to chapter 19.

After becoming a monastic, Ven. Upāli listened to a discourse by the Buddha and said to him: “Venerable sir, may the Fortunate One allow me to dwell in the forest.” To which the Buddha replied: “Son, if you live in the forest you will be pursuing insight-cultivation only. If you live by my side you will be pursuing insight-cultivation as well as pursuing learning.” Ven. Upāli gladly agreed, and with due diligence he became an Arahat not long afterwards. Then the Buddha personally taught the Vinaya extensively to Ven. Upāli.

Ven. Upāli proved himself the greatest disciple in the Vinaya Rules by his decisions on three cases, namely: 1) The Story of Bhārukacchaka; 2) the Story of Ajjuka; and 3) The Story of Kumāra Kassapa.

Of these three, the story of Kumāra Kassapa appears in section 28 of this chapter. The remaining two stories are briefly given below.

The Story of a Venerable from Bhārukaccha

A monastic from Bhārukaccha, a seaport town, dreamt that he had sexual intercourse with his previous wife in his lay life. He had qualms of conscience, and considered himself no longer a monastic. He returned to his native seaport town, Bhārukaccha, intending to return to lay life. On his way, he met Ven. Upāli and related his experience to [1338] him. Ven. Upāli said: “Friend, what you committed in a dream does not amount to a breach of the Vinaya Rules.” This episode is recorded in the Vinaya (Vin Ss1, PTS 3.39).

Ven. Upāli was giving judgment on a matter regarding which no decision had been pronounced by the Buddha because the Vinaya does not take dreams as acts of volition. But he knew that having a wet dream is not a fault and so he rightly decided that the monastic from Bhārukaccha was not at fault. When the Buddha learnt of that decision, he lauded Ven. Upāli, saying: “Monastics, Upāli has ruled on the matter correctly. He has done something like one who has made a foot-track in the sky.”

The Story of Ven. Ajjuka

Once, in the city of Vesālī, a certain lay supporter of Ven. Ajjuka, who had a son and a nephew as his possible heirs, entrusted Ven. Ajjuka with a weighty personal affair. He said to Ven. Ajjuka: “Venerable sir, here is my son and here is my nephew. Of these two boys, may Ven. Ajjuka show where my property is located to the one who has devotion to the Three Treasures.” Having thus created a private trust, the lay supporter died.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 2022

Ven. Ajjuka found that the nephew of the deceased man was devoted to the Three Treasures and so he showed him where the property of the man was located. The boy made proper use of his inheritance by engaging in business, which resulted in the preservation of his uncle's wealth and enabled him to do deeds of generosity.

The son of the deceased man brought this question to Ven. Ānanda, asking: “Venerable sir, as between a son and a nephew, who is the rightful heir to a deceased person?”

“Venerable sir, Ven. Ajjuka has shown the property which is rightfully mine to my brother-in-law, my father's nephew.”

Ven. Ajjuka then said to Ven. Ānanda: “Friend Ānanda, give me your decision on the matter.” Ven. Ānanda, without going into the details of this matter, said hastily: “In that case Ven. Ajjuka is no longer a monastic, he has fallen from the monastic life.” But on this problem Ven. Upāli sided with Ven. Ajjuka.

Herein, Ven. Upāli was not taking sides without a just cause. He was simply taking up the righteous cause of Ven. Ajjuka who was blameless under the Vinaya Rules. In other words, he was upholding the Vinaya.

Ven. Upāli put this question to Ven. Ānanda: “Friend Ānanda, where a certain monastic was told by someone: ‘Show my property to such and such a person,’ and the monastic did as he was told, what fault does he incur?”

“There is no fault whatsoever, venerable sir, not even a minor offence.”

“Friend Ānanda, Ven. Ajjuka was under instructions by the owner of the property to show it to such and such person, and he showed it to the nephew. Therefore, friend Ānanda, Ven. Ajjuka incurs no wrong under the Vinaya.”

The news of this bold decision reached the Buddha who said: “Monastics, Upāli has given a right decision,” and lauded him.

There are many more remarkable events that revealed the greatness of Ven. Upāli which may be found in the Traditions about the Elder Monks (Thera-apadāna, Tha-ap 8).<sup>290</sup>

Foremost Title Achieved

The Buddha endorsed the three Vinaya rulings given by Ven. Upāli, lauding him each time. Based on these three instances, on another occasion, the Buddha, sitting in a congregation of monastics, declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakanam bhikkhūnam
Vinaya-dharānam yad-idaṃ Upāli. [1339]*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who strictly uphold the Vinaya, Upāli is the foremost (etad-aggā).

36. Ven. Nandaka

Aspiration in the Past

The future Nandaka was born into a worthy family in the city of Hāmsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. While listening to a discourse by the Buddha, he witnessed a monastic being honoured by the Buddha with the title of foremost monastic in giving admonition to female monastics. He had an ardent desire to be designated with the same title by some Future Buddha. He therefore made extraordinary offerings to the Buddha and later expressed his wish before him. The Buddha saw that his aspiration would be fulfilled and made the prediction accordingly.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

The future Nandaka devoted himself to meritorious deeds till his death and after passing away from that existence, he was reborn only in good destinations. During the time of Buddha Gotama, he was reborn into a worthy family in Sāvattihī. When he attained adulthood, he listened to the Buddha's discourse which aroused his devotion so much that he renounced lay life and took up the monastic life. Soon after, striving strenuously in monastic practice, he became an Arahāt. He had a special competence in exercising the power of remembering past existences. He also was a gifted orator who could draw the attention of the four types of devotees who gathered before the Buddha or the Saṅgha by his skill in exposition. Thus, he came to be popularly known as Ven. Nandaka, the Expounder of the Doctrine.

At one time, the Buddha had to intervene between the two warring groups of Sakyan princes: the Koliyan clan and the Kapilavatthu clan. They were living on each side of a small river called the Rohinī. They could not amicably decide on the distribution of the scanty water to each clan's cultivators. After pacifying both sides, the Buddha asked for 250 princes from each clan to take up the monastic life. These 500 Sakyan princes were young, and attached to their families, and did not find happiness as monastics. Hence, the Buddha took them to a far-away forest in the midst of which lay Lake Kuṇāla. There, he delivered the Birth Story about the King of the Cuckoos, Kuṇāla (Kuṇāla-jātaka, Ja 536) and aroused spiritual urgency in them. The Buddha knew about this and expounded the four noble truths to them which caused them to be established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). Then he taught them the Discourse on the Great Assembly (Mahā-samaya-sutta, DN 20) in the Great Wood, at the end of which, the 500 monastics became Arahats.<sup>291</sup>

The 500 wives of the monastics who had renounced their lay lives, did not see any reason to remain in their lofty mansions. So they all gathered around Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī, the Buddha's foster mother, to plead with the Buddha for admission into the Saṅgha.

They went to the Great Wood where, at the ardent request by Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī, the Buddha allowed them to become female monastics after laying down eight cardinal principles to be observed by them. Since there were no female monastics before them, their admission ceremony was performed by monks only.<sup>292</sup> The important thing relating to Ven. Nandaka is that all these 500 female monastics were, in one of their former existences, queen consorts to Ven. Nandaka who was then a king.

Then the Buddha enjoined the monastics to admonish the female monastics. When it was Ven. Nandaka's turn to give admonition to the 500 female monastics, he did not go to them but deputed another monastic to carry out the task. This was because he knew, by his knowledge of recollecting past existences, that these 500 female monastics had been [1340] his consorts in his former existence. He was concerned that if some other monastic who was endowed with similar knowledge saw him surrounded by these female monastics, he might be misunderstood as being still attached to his former consorts.

The 500 female monastics were keen on receiving admonition from Ven. Nandaka. The Buddha then said to Ven. Nandaka: "Nandaka, admonish the female monastics personally, do not depute another monastic when it is your turn." Ven. Nandaka, in respectful compliance with the Buddha's words, went to the female monastics on the allotted day, the fourteenth day of the lunar month, which was an Observance (Uposatha) day. He admonished them on the subject of the six internal sense bases (āyatana) at the end of which, the 500 female monastics, former Sakyan princesses, attained the fruition of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).

The female monastics were pleased and delighted with Ven. Nandaka's discourse. They approached the Buddha and expressed their appreciation of the supermundane path and the fruition which they had experienced. The Buddha then reviewed their case, and saw that the same discourse by Ven. Nandaka, if repeated, would lead them to becoming Arahats. So, on the following day the Buddha let them hear the same discourse from Ven. Nandaka. As the result of which, the 500 female monastics became Arahats.

On the day when the 500 female monastics approached the Buddha, he knew that the repeated discourse had benefited them and so he said to the monastics: "Monastics, the discourse by Ven. Nandaka yesterday is like the full moon that appears on the fourteenth day of the month whereas the discourse he made today is like the full moon that appears on the fifteenth day of the month." Thus the Buddha extolled the merit of Ven. Nandaka's discourse.

The full text of the discourse by Ven. Nandaka is found in the Discourse giving Nandaka's Advice (Nandakovāda-sutta, MN 146).

Foremost Title Achieved

With reference to the above episode, the Buddha, on another occasion, sitting in the monastic congregation, declared:

bhikkhunovādakānam yad-idam Nandako.*

Monastics, among the male monastic disciples who give instruction to female monastics, Nandaka is the foremost (etad-aggā).

37. Ven. Nanda

Aspiration in the Past

The future Nanda was reborn into a worthy family in the city of Hāmsavatī during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. When he came of age, he had the occasion to listen to a discourse by the Buddha. As he was listening to the discourse, he witnessed the Buddha name a certain monastic as foremost in guarding his sense-faculties. He aspired to that distinction in the teaching of some Future Buddha. After making extraordinary offerings to the Buddha, he expressed his aspiration. The Buddha predicted that the aspiration would be fulfilled.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

The future Nanda was reborn as the son of Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī, the foster-mother of the Buddha, in the city of Kapilavatthu.

He was born two or three days after the Bodhisatta, Prince Siddhattha, was born by Queen Māyā, who was the elder sister of Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī. On the third day of his first visit to Kapilavatthu, the Buddha admitted Prince Nanda into the Saṅgha. The details of Ven. Nanda's story have been given in chapter 20b.

Although Prince Nanda had taken up the monastic life, the pitiable words of Princess [1341] Janapadakalyāṇī were always ringing in his ears: “My Lord, came back to me soon!” Quite often he imagined his erstwhile beloved wife was standing by his side. Finding no comfort in the teaching, he tried to run away from the Nigrodhārāma monastery. But he had not gone beyond a thicket when he thought the Buddha was standing in his way, and he was obliged to go back to the monastery with a mind crumpled like a burnt feather.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 2027

The Buddha knew the distress of Ven. Nanda, his utter negligence and his dissatisfaction in the monastic life. To give immediate relief to his boredom and despair, the Buddha said to him: “Come, Nanda, let us pay a visit to the celestial world.” – “Venerable sir, the celestial world is accessible to powerful beings only. How would I be able to visit there?” asked Ven. Nanda. “Nanda, just make your wish to go there and you will get there and see the celestial realms.”

The above account is taken from the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya). The following account about Ven. Nanda will be based on the Discourse about (Nanda-sutta, Ud 3.2) and the commentary thereon.

The Buddha’s objective was to allay the pangs of attachment in Nanda’s mind by a strategy. Then, as if taking Nanda by the arm, the Buddha, by means of his supernatural powers took Ven. Nanda to the Tāvātimsa Realm. On the way, the Buddha let him see a decrepit old female monkey sitting desolately on the stump of a burnt tree in a burnt paddy field, with her nose, ears and tail burnt away after a big forest fire.

In this matter, the Buddha took Nanda personally to the Tāvātimsa Realm to let him experience the stark contrast between the nature of human existence and Deva existence, how lowly in birth the former is when compared with the latter. Just by letting him see the Tāvātimsa Realm, the Buddha could have opened up the vista of the Deva realm while remaining at the Jetavana monastery, or else he could have sent Nanda alone by his Buddha-power to the Tāvātimsa Realm. The magnificence of the Deva realm was purposely impressed on Nanda so as to make him take up, as an object of his goal, the task of the threefold training of a monastic which he would consider enjoyable and worthwhile.

At the Tāvātimsa Realm, the Buddha showed him Devakaññā, or divine maidens, who had crimson feet like the colour of the feet of the pigeon, who were entertaining Sakka, the Lord of the Devas. Then followed a dialogue between the Buddha and Ven. Nanda:

Buddha: Nanda, do you see those 500 Devakaññā whose feet are crimson like the colour of pigeon’s feet?

Nanda: I do, venerable sir!

The Life Stories of the Monks – 2028

Buddha: Now, answer my question honestly. What do you think of this: who is more beautiful, these Devakaññā or your one-time wife the Sakyan Princess Janapadakalyāṇī? Who is more attractive?

Nanda: Venerable sir, compared to these Devakaññā, Janapadakalyāṇī would seem to me just like the decrepit old female monkey we saw on our way here. She cannot stand beside these girls who are much too superior to her, who are much more lovely, much more attractive.

Buddha: Nanda, take up your monastic practice well. Make yourself happy in the teaching. I assure you that if you do so, you will have these 500 Devakaññā.

Nanda: Venerable sir, if the Fortunate One assures me of getting these lovely girls with crimson feet, I will make myself happy in the teaching and stay with the Fortunate One.

After that dialogue in the Tāvatiṃsa Realm, the Buddha brought along Ven. Nanda instantly to the Jetavana monastery as if taking him by the arm.

The Buddha's strategy needs to be understood here. As a good physician would administer some purgative to purge out the toxic waste inside his patient, before administering milder medicine, so as to vomit out the remaining harmful matter [1342] that causes the disease, so also Ven. Nanda's sensual attachment for his ex-wife had first to be purged by means of his desire for the Devakaññā. After that, the Buddha would direct Ven. Nanda's efforts to the practice of the noble path whereby he could get rid of the remaining defilements.

Again, the reason for setting up some sexual object, such as divine maidens for Nanda, whom the Buddha wishes to get established in the noble practice marked by celibacy, needs to be understood. The Buddha is giving a temporary visual object of a much greater attractiveness so that Nanda could readily forget his erstwhile wife. By giving his assurance to Nanda to get that objective, the Buddha sets the mind of the youthful monastic at ease. Incidentally, the course of the Buddha's discourse, which usually progresses from attainment of celestial glory on the part of a supporter towards path and fruit, should also be understood likewise.

From the time he got back to the Jetavana monastery, Ven. Nanda arduously pursued monastic practice, with the object of getting Devakaññā. Meanwhile, the Buddha had given instructions to the monastics to go about Ven. Nanda's meditation place and say: "A certain monastic is said to be striving hard in monastic practice to get Devakaññā under the assurance of the Fortunate One.” The monastics said: “Very well, venerable sir.” And they went about within earshot of Ven. Nanda, saying: “Ven. Nanda is said to be striving hard in monastic practice to get Devakaññā. The Fortunate One is said to have given him the assurance that 500 Devakaññā with crimson feet like the colour of pigeon’s feet will be his prize. What a mercenary monastic Ven. Nanda is! What an undignified trader Ven. Nanda is!”

When Ven. Nanda heard those stinging epithets, “mercenary” and “undignified trader,” being applied to his name, he was greatly agitated, thinking: “Ah, how wrong I have been! How unbecoming for a monastic! Due to a lack of control of my sense-faculties, I have become the laughing stock of my companion monastics. I must guard my sense faculties well.” From that moment, Ven. Nanda trained himself to be mindful with clear comprehension in all things that he looked at, whether looking east or west, south or north, upwards or downwards, across or at any intermediate point of the compass, not to allow any thought of greed, hatred, or any other demeritorious thought arise in him due to whatever he saw. By restraining himself with respect to his sense-faculties to a most exacting degree, his pursuit of monastic practice culminated in Awakening not long afterwards.

Then at about midnight, a Brahma went to the Buddha and gave the good news that Ven. Nanda had become an Arahat. The Buddha directed his mind to Ven. Nanda and confirmed that what the Brahma had said was true.

The Buddha’s Freedom from Obligation

The thought that he was practising the noble path with the object of getting divine maidens, brought to his rude awakening by his companion monastics, made Ven. Nanda remorseful and the sense of spiritual urgency corrected his attitude and made him ever more ardent in the right practice culminating in Awakening. Then he remembered how he had made the Buddha a guarantor to get him the Devakaññā. He thought it necessary to relieve him of that undertaking. So the next morning he went to the Buddha, made obeisance, and sitting in a suitable place, said: “Venerable sir, the Fortunate One had undertaken to see that I get the 500 Devakaññā with crimson feet like the colour of the feet of the pigeon. Venerable sir, I do not want the Fortunate One to be bound any more on that account.”

The Buddha said: “Nanda, I know, in my own mind, by reading your mind, that you are now established in the Arahāt fruition (Arahatta-phala). Moreover, a Brahma also brought this news to me. Nanda, from the moment of your freedom from the pollutants (āsava), from your attainment of Awakening, I have been released of that bond. This is a natural thing. You need not free me from it.” The Buddha saw the unshakable nature of an Arahāt, in the face of the vicissitudes of life rendered possible through the extinction from the pollutants, [1343] and feeling very delighted with the present status of Ven. Nanda, uttered this joyous verse (Ud 3.2):

*Yassa nittiṇṇo paṅko, maddito kāma-kaṇṭako,
mohakkhayaṃ anupatto sukha-dukkhesu na vedhatī sa bhikkhu.*

The Arahāt has crossed over the mire of rebirth by means of the noble path which serves as a bridge. He has completely destroyed with the noble path as the weapon the darts of sensuality that torment Devas and humans alike. He has reached by progressing along the four stages of the path-knowledge the end of delusion, and attained Nibbāna. That enlightened monastic, unlike a worldling, does not flutter when faced with pain or pleasure.

Foremost Title Achieved

On another occasion, when the Buddha was in congregation with the monastics at the Jetavana monastery, he declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ
indriyesu gutta-dvārānaṃ yad-idaṃ Nando.*

Monastics, among the male monastic disciples who guard their sense-faculties well Nanda is the foremost (etad-aggā).

Other monastic disciples also guarded their sense-faculties well. Ven. Nanda excelled all others in that whenever he looked in any of the ten directions to look at something, he did so only after making sure that he had the four kinds of clear comprehension: Clear and wise comprehension as to the pros and cons of an action beforehand (sāthaka-sampajāñña); clear and wise comprehension as to whether an action, even though beneficial, would be proper for oneself to do (sappāya); clear and wise comprehension so as not incur fault in one’s going about various places (gocara); clear and wise comprehension so as to avoid any action influenced by delusion (asammoha).

He applied the rigorous self-discipline because he felt repentant about his lack of such control which lay at the root of his unhappiness in the monastic life. Moreover, he had an innate sense of shame to do evil and dread to do evil. And above all, there was also his past aspiration to attain this distinction which he expressed before Buddha Padumuttara 100,000 aeons previously, which was now fulfilled.

38. Ven. Mahā Kappina

Aspiration in the Past

The future Mahā Kappina was born into a worthy family in the city of Haṃsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. While he was listening to a discourse by the Buddha, he witnessed the honouring by the Buddha of a monastic as the foremost in admonishing other monastics. He aspired to that distinction at some future time. After making extraordinary offerings to the Buddha, he expressed his aspiration before the Buddha. The Buddha predicted that the aspiration would be fulfilled.

The following account of the future Mahā Kappina's meritorious actions is taken from the commentary on the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, Dh 79). The commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) gives only a brief description of his meritorious action during the time of Buddha Kassapa, and then proceeds to his last existence.

Life as a Chief Weaver

After passing away from the existence where he received the Buddha's prediction, the future Mahā Kappina was reborn only in the fortunate destinations. In one such [1344] existence, he was the chief weaver in a big village, near the city of Bārāṇasī. During that time, there were 1,000 Paccekabuddhas who used to live at the Himālayas for four months of the cold season and four months of the hot season, but lived near the town in the countryside during the four rainy months.

On one occasion, the thousand Paccekabuddhas descended near Bārāṇasī and deputed eight among them to go and ask the King of Bārāṇasī to provide workmen for construction of monastic dwellings. It so happened that the time of this request was made when the king was preparing for the annual ritual of ploughing. As soon as the king heard the news of the arrival of the Paccekabuddhas, he went to meet them and asked about the purpose of their visit. Then he said: “Venerable sirs, there is hardly any time to start building monasteries immediately because tomorrow I shall be engaged in the annual ploughing ceremony. Therefore, may the venerables allow us to start on the third day from now.” After saying so, the king returned to his palace without remembering to invite the Paccekabuddhas to receive food offerings on the next day.

The Paccekabuddhas left the palace, thinking of going elsewhere. At that time, the wife of the chief weaver happened to be in the city on business. When she saw the Paccekabuddhas, she made obeisance to them and asked them why they were in the city at that untimely hour. The Paccekabuddhas told her about their meeting with the king. The weaver’s wife, being possessed of conviction in the Buddha and having innate wisdom, invited the Paccekabuddhas to accept her food offerings the next day. To which, they said: “Sister, we are rather too many.” – “How many, venerable sir?” – “There are 1,000 of us.” – “Venerable sir, there are 1,000 households in my village. Each household will offer food to each of the Paccekabuddhas. Just allow us to make the offerings. We shall also build monastic dwellings for your reverences, for which, I am going to take a lead.” The Paccekabuddhas agreed to accept the invitation.

The wife of the chief weaver then went about in the village announcing to everyone: “Brothers! O sisters! I have met 1,000 Paccekabuddhas and invited them to receive our food offerings tomorrow. Please prepare rice gruel and cooked rice for them.” The next morning she went to the Paccekabuddhas and led them to a big pavilion which was at the centre of the village. After having seated them in their respective places, the offering of choice food and delicacies was made. At the end of the meal, she and the other ladies from the village made obeisance to the Paccekabuddhas and said to them: “Venerable sirs, may the revered ones agree to dwell at this village for the Rains Retreat (Vassa) period of three months.” The Paccekabuddhas agreeing, the weaver’s wife went about in the village, announcing: “Brothers! Sisters! Let us build a monastery for the Paccekabuddhas. Let every household lend a hand in this work. Let a man from every house bring axes, adzes and necessary tools. Let them go into the forest and gather timber. Let them join in this construction.”

There was a very good response to her call for action, the whole village joined in the noble effort of putting up a humble monastic dwelling with thatched roofs for each of the thousand Paccekabuddhas, complete with living space for the night's shelter and for spending the day time. Every householder was eager to serve the Paccekabuddhas, with requests that their services be accepted. Thus they happily arranged for the three month period, tending to the needs of the thousand Paccekabuddhas.

At the close of the Rains Retreat period, the weaver's wife called upon the village: "Brothers! Sisters! Make ready the cloth for robes for each Paccekabuddha who had stayed at each of the monastic dwellings during the Rains Retreat period." Thus each household, which had built a dwelling for a Paccekabuddha, donated robes to its respective Paccekabuddha. Each robe was worth 1,000 pieces of money. After the offering of robes, the Paccekabuddhas delivered a discourse in appreciation of the donations, wished them well, and returned to their Himālayan abodes.

Life as a Chief Householder

All the residents of the weaver's village, after passing away from that existence, were reborn together in the Tāvātimsa Realm. After enjoying the full lifespan of a Deva, the whole group was reborn into families of rich householders in Bārāṇasī. The chief weaver was reborn into the family of the chief householder, and his wife of the former existence [1345] also was reborn into the family of a senior householder. When they were of marriageable age, the spouses in their previous existence in the weaver's village became spouses again.

One day, this community visited the monastery of Buddha Kassapa to listen to his discourse. As soon as they had stepped into the monastic compound, there came a deluge of rain. Then, those other people, who had members of the Saṅgha related to them, went into their premises for shelter from the rain. The thousand couples, who were householders, had nowhere to go for shelter but to remain in the monastic compound and were drenched thoroughly. Then the chief of these householders said to them: "Look, friends, how helpless we are. Considering our social standing, what we now find ourselves in is a total disgrace." – "What good work do we need to do?" This question was raised by the community. "We meet with this disgrace because we are total strangers to the Saṅgha in this monastery. So let us build a monastery by our joint efforts.” – “Very well, chief,” the men agreed.

Then the chief householder started a fund with his 1,000 pieces of money. The rest of the householders put in 500 each. The wives of the householders donated 250 each. With this initial outlay they started constructing a big pinnacled monastery for Buddha Kassapa. It was a big project and the funds fell short. So they each donated an additional amount, which was half of what they donated initially. And in this way they were able to complete the project. Then they held a grand inauguration ceremony for seven days to mark the transfer of the monastery to the Buddha and his Saṅgha. They also offered a robe each to the 20,000 Arahats.

The wife of the chief householder had innate wisdom. She showed greater devotion to the good work undertaken by the community of 1,000 rich householders. When robes were offered to the Buddha and the Saṅgha, she also offered golden-hued flowers of the Asoka tree to the Buddha besides the golden-hued robe, which was made especially for offering to the Buddha, and which was worth 1,000 pieces of money. When Buddha Kassapa delivered a discourse in appreciation of the donation of the Great Monastery, the wife of the chief householder, placing her specially made robe at the feet of the Buddha, made her aspiration thus: “Venerable sir, in all my future existences, may I have a complexion as golden-hued as these Asoka (Anojā) flowers, and may I also have the name of that flower, Anojā.” And the Buddha replied: “May your wish be fulfilled.”

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

This community of householders filled their lives with good deeds. After passing away from that existence they were reborn in the Deva realm. At the time of the appearance of Buddha Gotama, they passed away from the Deva existence, and the chief of them was reborn into the royal family in Kukkuṭavatī and was called Prince Mahā Kappina. When he came of age, he ascended the throne as King Mahā Kappina. The remaining householders were reborn into the noble families and became courtiers at the court of King Mahā Kappina. The wife of the chief householder was born into the royal family at Sāgala in Madda country. Princess Madda had a golden complexion and she was called Princess Anojā, the golden-complexioned, as she had aspired.

When Princess Anojā came of age, she became the Chief Queen of King Mahā Kappina. The wives of the householders in their previous existence were again united with their spouses of the past existence. The thousand ministers and their wives enjoyed the same glories of life as the king and the queen. When the king and queen rode on elephant-back, the thousand ministers and their wives rode on elephant-back too. When the king rode on horseback, they also rode on horseback, and when the king rode on a chariot, they also rode on chariots. This was because all of them had done meritorious deeds together in their past existences.

Looking for Wonderful News

King Mahā Kappina had five thoroughbred horses: Bala, Balavāhana, Puppha, [1346] Pupphavāhana and Supatta. The king used only Supatta and let his royal riders use the other four. It was the duty of his royal riders to gather daily information for him. They were properly fed in the morning, after which the king sent them out on their daily mission with the command: “Go ye, my good men, go to a distance of two to three leagues around this city of Kukkuṭavatī, each in his own direction to the four quarters, and see if there is news of the appearance of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha in the world. As soon as you hear the happy news, bring it to me with great haste.” The four riders would gallop away to the four quarters from the four city gates, went three leagues distance each day, and then returned to the palace, but without the good tidings the king eagerly awaited.

Then one day, as King Mahā Kappina visited the royal gardens riding his horse, Supatta, accompanied by his 1,000 ministers, he saw a caravan of 500 merchants, all looking tired, enter the city. The king thought: “These merchants had a weary journey. Probably they must have some fresh news to tell.” He summoned them and addressed them: “Good men, where have you come from?” – “Great King, there is the city of Sāvattthī which is 120 leagues away from this city of Kukkuṭavatī. We have come from that Sāvattthī.” – “Good men, tell me if there is some special news, current in Sāvattthī.” – “Great King, there has appeared a Buddha at Sāvattthī.”

On hearing the word “Buddha,” the king was so overwhelmed by the five stages of delightful satisfaction that he was senseless for a short while. “What, what did you say?” – “Great King, the Buddha has appeared in the world.” For three times, the news had the same stunning effect on the king. This was due to his intense delight. For the fourth time, the king asked again: “What did you say?” – “Great King, the Buddha has appeared in the world.” – “Men, you have brought me the good news that the Buddha has appeared in the world. For bringing this precious news to me, I award you 100,000 pieces of money of silver.”

Then King Mahā Kappina further asked: “Any other strange news?” – “Yes, Great King, the Dhamma has appeared in the world.” On hearing the word “Dhamma,” the king was so overwhelmed by intense delight that he was senseless for a short while. Three times he repeated his question and three times he seemed to have lost his senses for a while. On the fourth time, after being told: “Great King, the Dhamma has appeared in the world,” the king said: “For bringing this precious news to me, I award you 100,000 pieces of money.”

Then the king further asked: “Good men, have you any other strange news?” – “Yes, Great King,” they said, “The Saṅgha has appeared in the world.” On hearing the word “Saṅgha,” the king was so overwhelmed by intense delight he became senseless for a while as before. This happened three times when he was told of the good news. On the fourth time, he said to the merchants: “Good men, for bringing this precious news to me, I award you 100,000 pieces of money.”

Renunciation of King Mahā Kappina

Then the king looked at his 1,000 ministers and said: “My good men, what would you do now?” The ministers repeated the same question to the king: “Great King, what would you do now?” – “Good men, now that we have been told that the Buddha has appeared, the Dhamma has appeared, the Saṅgha has appeared, we do not intend to return to our palace. We will go from here to the Buddha, and I will become a monastic as his disciple.” The ministers said: “Great King, we too will become monastics together with you.”

King Mahā Kappina had a gold plate etched with his order to disburse 300,000 pieces of money and handed it to the merchants. “Go, you good men,” he said to them, “present this message to the queen at the palace, and she will disburse to you on my behalf 300,000 pieces of money. Also tell Queen Anojā, that the king has relinquished the throne and the country to her and that she may reign supreme in the land. If she asks: [1347] ‘Where is the king?’ you should tell her that the king has gone to the Buddha to become a monastic.” The thousand ministers likewise sent messages of their renunciation to their wives. When the merchants went to the palace, the king rode his horse, Supatta, and, accompanied by his thousand ministers, went forth to become a monastic.

Mahā Kappina Welcomed by the Buddha

The Buddha, on his daily reviewing of the sentient world, saw that King Mahā Kappina had learnt of the appearance of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha from the merchants, that he had honoured the Three Treasures by making an award of 300,000 pieces of money, and that he was renouncing the world and would be arriving the next day. The Buddha also saw that King Mahā Kappina and his 1,000 ministers would become Arahats together with the four analytical knowledges. “It would be well if I go and welcome King Mahā Kappina,” reflected the Buddha. And like the Universal Monarch welcoming a vassal lord, the Buddha, taking his alms bowl and robes, left the monastery alone to welcome King Mahā Kappina on the way, at a distance of 120 leagues from Sāvattihī, where he sat underneath a Bodhi tree by the side of the River Candabhāgā, displaying the six Buddha-radiances.

King Mahā Kappina and his 1,000 ministers, mounted on horseback, went for renunciation when they came across a river. “What is this river?” he asked of his ministers.

“This is the river Aparacchā, Great King,” they said.

“How big is it?”

“Great King, it is one mile deep and two miles wide.”

“Is there any craft to cross?”

“There is none, Great King.”

The king pondered thus: “While we are looking for some boats to cross this river, birth is leading us to ageing, and ageing is leading us to death. I have implicit faith in the Three Treasures and have gone forth from the world. By the power of the Three Treasures, may this expanse of water prove no obstacle to me.” Then reflecting on the supreme attributes of the Buddha, such as: “The Buddha, the Arahāt, the Perfectly Self-Awakened, the Fortunate One,” he uttered the following verse (Mahākappinatthera-apadāna, Th-ap 530):

*Bhava-sotaṃ sace Buddho, tiṅṅo lokantagū vidū,
etena sacca-vajjena, gamanaṃ me samijjhatu.*

The all-knowing Buddha indeed has crossed over the floods of the recurring existences in the three worlds. Having crossed over the floods, the Buddha has reached the end of the world and known all things analytically. By this asseveration of the truth, may my journey to the Buddha, on my renunciation be accomplished without any problems.

King Mahā Kappina, uttering this verse, crossed the river with his 1,000 ministers on horseback. The waters of the river which was two miles wide did not even wet the tips of the hoofs of their horses. As the king proceeded, he came across another river.

“What is this river?” he asked his ministers.

“This is the River Nīlavāhinī, Great King,” they said.

“Great King, it is half a league deep and half a league wide.”

The king’s further inquiry about boats and his pondering on the urgency of his journey should be read as before. Then reflecting on the supreme [1348] attributes of the Dhamma, such as: “The Dhamma is well propounded,” etc., he uttered the following verse and crossed the river together with his 1,000 ministers:

*Yadi santi-gamo maggo, makkho caccantikaṃ sukhaṃ,
etena sacca-vajjena, gamanaṃ me samijjhatu.*

The noble path (ariya-magga), the supermundane path, indeed leads to the peace of Nibbāna. The release attained through the noble path is absolute happiness. By this asseveration of the truth, may my journey to the Buddha on my renunciation be accomplished without any problems.

Uttering this verse, King Mahā Kappina crossed the river with his 1,000 ministers on horseback. The waters of the river which was half a league wide did not even wet the tips of the horses’ hoofs.

Beyond that River Nīlavāhinī lay another river to be crossed. He asked his ministers, “What is this river?”

“This is the River Candabhāgā, Great King,” they said.

“Great King, it is one league deep and one league wide.”

As with the previous two rivers, the king pondered on the urgency of his journey. Then reflecting on the supreme attributes of the Saṅgha, such as: “The noble disciples of the Fortunate One are endowed with right practice,” he uttered the following verse and crossed the river together with his 1,000 ministers:

*Saṅgho ve tiṅṅa-kantāro, puññakkhetto anuttaro,
etena sacca-vajjena, gamanaṃ me samijjhatu.*

The noble Saṅgha has indeed crossed the wilderness of Saṃsāra, and are the incomparable field for sowing seeds of merit. By this asseveration of the truth, may my journey to the Buddha on my renunciation be accomplished without any problems.

Uttering this verse, King Mahā Kappina crossed the river with his 1,000 ministers on horseback. The waters of the river which was one league wide did not even wet the tips of the horses’ hoofs.

The three verses uttered by King Mahā Kappina are taken from the Traditions about the Elder Mahā Kappina (Mahā Kappina-thera-āpadāna, Tha-ap 533).

Adoption of the Ascetic Life

As the king had crossed over the River Candabhāgā he saw, to his great wonder, the six Buddha-radiances emanating from the Buddha, who was sitting at the foot of a Bodhi tree. The entire tree, the trunk, the boughs, branches and foliage was awash with the golden glow. The king rightly knew that: “This golden glow is not the sun’s radiance nor the moon’s, nor that of any Deva or Māra or Nāga or Garuḍa, but must be that of Buddha Gotama, for the Fortunate One has seen me coming and is welcoming me!”

At that instant, King Mahā Kappina dismounted and bowing himself, approached the Buddha, being drawn towards the Buddha-radiance. He felt as though he were immersed in a mass of cool liquid realgar as he walked through the Buddha-radiance. He and his 1,000 ministers made obeisance to the Buddha and sat in a suitable place. Then the Buddha gave them a discourse by gradual stages of exposition, through the merit in giving, the merit in morality, the merit leading to the Deva realm, and the gaining of path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa). By the end of the discourse, King Mahā Kappina and his 1,000 ministers attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). [1349]

Then they all rose up and asked the Buddha to be admitted into the Saṅgha as monastics. The Buddha reviewed their past to find out whether they were fit to receive robes and alms bowl created by his supernormal powers and he saw that their past merit of having donated robes to 1,000 Paccekabuddhas and that, during Buddha Kassapa's time, they had donated robes to 20,000 Arahats, were their merits, and that they could receive robes and alms bowls created by supernormal powers. Then the Buddha stretched out his right hand and said: "Come, monastics, receive the monastic life as you request. You have heard the doctrine. Now work out your release with diligence through the threefold training." At that very instant King Mahā Kappina and his 1,000 ministers were transformed from laymen into that of monastics of seemingly 60 years' standing, equipped with the monastic paraphernalia, such as alms bowls, which were created by the will of the Buddha. They rose into the air, then descended to the ground and, paying obeisance to the Buddha, sat at a suitable distance.

Queen Anojā

The merchants of Sāvattthī went to the court of Kukkuṭavatī and sought audience with Queen Anojā, informing her that they were seen by the king. Having obtained the queen's assent to see them, they entered the palace, saluted her, and sat at an appropriate place. Then a dialogue took place between the queen and them:

Queen: Men, what brought you to our court?

Merchants: Queen, we are being directed to you by the king to claim 300,000 pieces of money as reward.

Queen: Men, you are making a big claim. What good turn have you done for the king so as to be granted such a rich reward?

Merchants: Queen, we have not done any good turn for the king except to impart some strange news, which gladdened him.

Queen: Will you be able to tell me what that strange news was?

Merchants: Yes, we can, queen.

Queen: Then go ahead.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 2041

Merchants: Queen, a Buddha has appeared in the world.

On hearing that news, the queen, was overwhelmed with delight and remained senseless for a short while, just like the king. This happened three times. On the fourth time that she heard the news, she asked the merchants: “Men, how much did the king reward you for bringing to him the news about the Buddha?” – “The king rewarded us 100,000 pieces of money for that.” – “The king’s reward of 100,000 for bringing such extraordinary and wonderful news is improper and inadequate. For my part, I reward you, as poor subjects of mine, 300,000 pieces of money.

But what further news did you tell the king?” The merchants told her that they also apprised the king of the appearance of the Dhamma and the appearance of the Saṅgha, one by one. The queen, being overwhelmed by delight, was senseless for a short while, for three times, on hearing each of those wonderful tidings. On the fourth time of mentioning the news about the Dhamma, and about the Saṅgha, the queen rewarded them with 300,000 pieces of money for each piece of wonderful news. Thus the merchants received 900,000 pieces of money as the queen’s reward, in addition to the King’s reward of 300,000, making a total of 1,200,000.

Then the queen asked the merchants where the king was, and they told her that the king had gone forth to become a monastic, as a disciple of the Buddha. The queen added: “What message did the king leave for me?” The merchants told her that the king was leaving the throne and the country to the queen who was to succeed him as sovereign. Then the queen inquired after the thousand ministers. The merchants told her that the ministers also had gone forth to become monastics. [1350]

The queen sent for the wives of the 1,000 ministers and a discussion took place as follows:

Queen: Dear sisters, your husbands have renounced the world and become monastics along with the king. What are you going to do now?

Wives: Great Queen, what was the message to us by our husbands?

Queen: Your husbands have bequeathed all their properties to you. You are lords of the household now.

Wives: Great Queen, what do you intend to do?

The Life Stories of the Monks – 2042

Queen: Sisters, my lord, King Mahā Kappina, was greatly delighted by the news of the appearance of the Three Treasures and rewarded 300,000 pieces of money to the conveyors of the news as token of honouring the Three Treasures, even while he was on his journey. Now he has renounced the world considering the glory of kingship as if it were saliva. As for me, the news of the appearance of the Three Treasures was equally welcome. I have rewarded 900,000 pieces of money to the merchants who brought me the news as token of honouring the Three Treasures. The glory of a sovereign is a source of suffering for me, as much as it is for the king. Now that the king has bequeathed sovereign power to me, if I were to accept it, it would be like receiving saliva with relish. I am not as foolish as that. I too will renounce the world and become a recluse, as a disciple of the Buddha.

Wives: Great Queen, we will also join you in going forth as recluses.

Queen: It is well and good, if you are capable of it.

Wives: Great Queen, we are capable of it.

Queen: Then let us go.

The queen mounted on a chariot, each of the wives of the ministers also mounted on their chariots and departed forthwith for Sāvattḥī. On the way, they came across the first river. She inquired, as the king did before, about the possibility for crossing it. She asked her charioteer to look for the footprints of the king's horses but no trace could be found. She rightly surmised that since her husband had a deep devotion for the Three Treasures and for the sake of which he was renouncing the world, he must have made some asseveration in getting across the river. "I too have renounced the world for the sake of the Three Treasures. May the power of the Three Treasures overcome this stretch of water and let the water lose its property as water." And reflecting on the supreme attributes of the Three Treasures, she drove her chariot and accompanied by 1,000 other chariots, across the river. And lo! the water did not stay as water but hardened itself like a piece of rock so that not even the rims of the chariots were wet. At the two further rivers that lay across her path, she crossed them without difficulty, with the same devotion as the king.

The above material is gleaned from the commentary on the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada). From this point on, we shall be drawing on the commentary to the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅuttara-nikāya).

After she had crossed over the River Candabhāgā, the third obstacle, Queen Anojā saw the Buddha sitting beneath a Bodhi tree. The Buddha knew that if these women were to see their husbands, they would be torn by attachment to them which would render them unable to listen to the discourse which he taught, which would be great disadvantage for attaining the path-knowledge. So, he employed his supernormal powers whereby the women could not see their spouses who were with him. Then he taught them a discourse, at the end of which, all of them attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). At that moment, they were able see their spouses. The Buddha then willed that the elder nun Uppalavaṇṇā appeared where the women were sitting. The elder nun Uppalavaṇṇā admitted Queen Anojā and her companions into the Saṅgha of female monastics. After which, she took them to the nunnery. The Buddha took the 1,000 monastics to the Jetavana monastery by his psychic power. [1351]

Verse Spoken about Mahā Kappina

Then Ven. Mahā Kappina practised the noble path and became an Arahat. Knowing that he had finished his task as a monastic, Ven. Mahā Kappina dwelt most of the time in the Arahat fruition, and did not bother to discourse to his 1,000 followers, his erstwhile ministers. Resorting to seclusion, whether underneath a tree or elsewhere, he would utter words of ecstasy: “Blissful it is! Blissful it is!” When other monastics heard this they thought that Ven. Mahā Kappina was ruminating on his kingly pleasures and they reported to the Buddha what they had heard. The Buddha said to these monastics: “Monastics, Mahā Kappina is extolling the bliss of the paths and fruitions (magga-phala) only, and on that occasion he uttered this verse (Dhp 79):

Dhamma-pīti sukhaṃ seti, vip̐pasannena cetasā, ariyappavedite Dhamme, sadā ramati paṇḍito.

Monastics, he who drinks of the supermundane lives happily with a serene mind. The wise man always finds delight in the Dhamma, the 37 constituents of Awakening, expounded by the noble ones (ariya) such as the Buddha.

At the end of the discourse many listeners attained path-knowledge at various levels.

Ven. Mahā-Kappina's Instruction to his Pupils

Then one day, the Buddha called the 1,000 monastics who had been ministers and asked them whether Ven. Mahā Kappina had given them any instruction. The monastics said that their teacher, Ven. Mahā Kappina, never gave them any instruction, but dwelt in the attainment of the Arahāt fruition most of the time, and that he did not even give an admonition to any of his pupils.

The Buddha then asked Ven. Mahā Kappina: “Kappina, is it true that you do not give an admonition even to your close pupils?” Ven. Mahā Kappina replied: “Venerable sir, that is correct.” – “Kappina, do not remain like this. From now on, give discourses to your close pupils.” – “Very well, venerable sir,” replied Ven. Mahā Kappina. And, just by him giving a discourse, the 1,000 monastics became Arahats.

This is the achievement that entitled Ven. Mahā Kappina to be designated the foremost monastic.

Foremost Title Achieved

On one occasion, when the Buddha held a congregation of monastics, he declared:

bhikkovādakānaṃ yad-idaṃ Mahākappino.*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who gives instruction to monastics, Mahā Kappina is the foremost (etad-aggā).

39. Ven. Sāgata

Aspiration in the Past

The future Sāgata was born into a worthy family in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. On a certain occasion, while he was listening to the Buddha's discourse, he witnessed the Buddha honouring a monastic as the foremost among the monastics who were adept at the attainment of concentrating on the element of the heat meditation device (tejo-kasiṇa-dhātu). He aspired for that honour and expressed his aspiration to become the foremost monastic in the mastery of that concentration to the Buddha. The Buddha predicted that his aspiration would be fulfilled. [1352]

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

The future Sāgata devoted himself to works of merit throughout his life. After his death, he was reborn in the Deva realm and the human world only, and during the time of Buddha Gotama, he was reborn into a Brahmin family in Sāvattthī. The young Brahmin, named Sāgata, had occasion to listen to a discourse by the Buddha which caused him to become steadfastly devoted to the Buddha and hence become a monastic. He mastered the eight mundane absorption attainments and became adept at the five mundane supernatural powers.

Taming of a Nāga

The following is an extract from the Training Rule about Strong Drink (Surāpāna-sikkhāpada, Vin Pāc 51, PTS 4.108).

Once, on his tour of the country, in the province of Cetiya, the Buddha arrived at Bhaddavatikā village, which was so named because of its strong fencing. Cow-herds, goat-herds, cultivators and passers-by saw the Buddha coming at a distance and warned him urgently that there lived a swift, vicious, poisonous serpent at the ferry-crossing, which was marked by the mango tree, and that they were concerned that the Buddha might face danger if he went that way. The Buddha did not say anything to them.

The vicious serpent at the mango tree ferry was, in its former life, a ferry man plying there. He quarrelled with some travellers and was killed in the fray. He swore vengeance on his attackers before his death and consequently he was reborn as a powerful serpent there.

Since the man held a grudge against the local populace, when he was reborn as a powerful serpent, he exercised his powers in such a way that he would cause draught in the rainy season and heavy rains to fall in the wrong season. Crops failed and people resorted to propitiating him every year. They also put up a shrine for him at the ferry point.<sup>293</sup>

The Buddha crossed the river at the mango tree ferry with his company of monastics, meaning to put up for the night at that place. Then the Buddha, going by stages, arrived at Bhaddavatikā village. Ven. Sāgata stayed at the shrine dedicated to the serpent at the mango tree ferry. He went into the den where the serpent lived, placed a grass mat on the ground, sat down with legs crossed, and with his body held erect, he entered into absorption (jhāna).

The serpent was very angry with the intruder and sent out hot fumes. Ven. Sāgata responded with fumes of even greater power. The serpent got furious and sent out flames. But Ven. Sāgata, who was entering into the absorption attainment of concentration on the element of heat, produced flames of greater intensity.

Then the serpent realized that he was up against someone who was more powerful than himself. He said: “Venerable sir, I take refuge in your reverence.” Ven. Sāgata said: “You need not take refuge in me. Take refuge in the Buddha.” – “Very well, venerable sir,” the serpent said. Hence, he became a disciple of the Buddha and was established in the three refuges, and became friendly to the local populace. Rains fell during the proper season and bumper crops were harvested. After Ven. Sāgata had tamed the serpent, he joined the Buddha at Bhaddavatikā village.

The Buddha’s Visit to Kosambī

After bringing Awakening to many deserving persons, the Buddha proceeded to Kosambī. The citizens of Kosambī had learnt about the conquest of Ven. Sāgata over the serpent, after a great battle. When the Buddha entered Kosambī, he was welcomed by the citizens. They also visited Ven. Sāgata, made obeisance to him, and sitting in a suitable place, said to him: “Venerable sir, what sort of thing is a rare thing for your reverence? What sort of thing would please your reverence? What sort of thing shall we prepare for your reverence?” Although Ven. Sāgata did not say anything, monastics of the Group-of-Six intervened and said: “Lay supporters, there is a red beverage with the [1353] colour of the pigeon’s feet and which is clear. That alcoholic drink is a rare thing for monastics; it is delightful. So prepare that kind of beverage.”

A Note on the Group-of-Six Monks

There were in Sāvattihī six friends who considered earning a living burdensome and preferred a life of ease as monastics. They were the pair Paṇḍuka and Lohitaka; the pair Mettiya and Bhūmajaka; and the pair Assaji and Punabbasuka.

They sought elders of great authority: the two chief disciples, as their preceptors whom they could look to in case of trouble.

After five years' standing in the monastic life and having mastered the fundamental Rules for monastics (Pātimokkha), they agreed among themselves to split up into three sub-groups to be stationed at prosperous places. This was to ensure a regular livelihood for themselves.

The first sub-group with Paṇḍuka and Lohitaka as leaders was, by agreement among the Group-of-Six, assigned to Sāvattthī with these considerations: Sāvattthī is a city of 5,700,000 houses resided in by worthy families. It has suzerainty over the provinces of Kāsi and Kosala with 80,000 villages, Paṇḍuka and Lohitaka were to set up monastic compounds at advantageous sites at Sāvattthī, where fruit trees of all sorts were to be cultivated and gardens, to attract lay supporters. These fruits and flowers would be presented regularly to lay supporters who, thus befriended, would send their boys to the monastery to become novices and then admitted into the Saṅgha. In this way, a big following of monastic pupils was to be raised by the two leaders.

Likewise, Mettiya and Bhūmajaka, the second subgroup was assigned to Rājagaha with these considerations: Rājagaha was a city where 130,000,000 people lived. It had suzerainty over the provinces of Aṅga and Magadha, which were 300 leagues wide, and had 80,000 villages. Similarly, Mettiya and Bhūmajaka were to set up monastic compounds at advantageous sites at Rājagaha, where fruit tree of all sorts were to be cultivated and gardens to attract lay supporters. By making gifts of fruits and flowers, the people would be befriended. And they would send their boys to the monastery to become novices and then be admitted into the Saṅgha. In this way, a big following of monastic pupils was to be raised by the two leaders.

Kīṭṭāgiri was a market town with a big area around it. Since it received rains during the rainy season as well as during the cold season, it produced three crops of paddy a year. There the third sub-group, headed by Assaji and Punabbasuka would settle down. They were given the same assignments and objectives as the previous leaders.

The six leaders carried out the above plan with some success. Each of the three sub-groups were able to raise 500 or more monastic pupils, making a total of over 1,500 monastic pupils in their fold, who were known as the sect of the Group-of-Six monastics.

Of the six leaders of the sect, Paṇḍuka and Lohitaka with their 500 pupils were of good morality. They used to accompany the Buddha on his tours. Although they might commit fresh infringements of the monastic precepts, they would do so because there was no specific ban on that particular action. If the precept clearly prohibited something, they did not infringe it. The other four leaders of the sect and their people did not care at all about the precepts.

The citizens of Kosambī were simple folk. They took the advice of the monastics of the Group-of-Six in all sincerity. They made a clear red brew, like the colour of the pigeon's feet, and hence called Kāpotikā. As Ven. Sāgata passed their door, each house offered a rare drink to him. At that time there was no Vinaya rule prohibiting monastics from [1354] taking liquor. Ven. Sāgata did not consider it improper to drink it. He obliged his supporters by drinking a little of the brew at each house. When he left the city, he collapsed at the city door.

As the Buddha was leaving the city in the company of monastics, he saw Ven. Sāgata lying on the ground. He had him carried to the monastery, where the other monastics laid him with his head turned towards the Buddha. But Ven. Sāgata, who was intoxicated with liquor, turned himself such that his feet were towards the Buddha. Then the Buddha addressed the monastics thus:

Buddha: “Monastics, Sāgata usually has respect and deference for me, does he not?”

Monastics: “He does, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Now, does Sāgata show any respect and deference for me?”

Monastics: “No, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Monastics, Sāgata had vanquished the serpent at the mango tree ferry, did he not?”

Monastics: “Yes, he did, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “In his present state, would Sāgata be able to vanquish the serpent?”

Monastics: “No, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Monastics, by taking liquor one is rendered senseless through intoxication, would it be proper for one to take liquor?”

Monastics: “No, venerable sir.”

The Buddha continued: “Monastics, taking alcoholic drinks is improper, wrong, unwarranted, unbecoming for a monastic, and yet Ven. Sāgata, possessed of the five supernormal powers, took it. Why did he do it? Monastics, this is an act which does not lend itself to reverence by those who do not already have reverence for monastics.” After denouncing the act, the Buddha declared that any monastic who takes alcoholic drink is liable to incur a confessable (pācittiya) offence against the precepts.

Attainment of Awakening

On the next day, Ven. Sāgata recovered his senses and repented his mistake. A sense of shame and dread overcame him. After admitting his fault to the Buddha and paying respects, he had a deep sense of spiritual urgency. And with diligence in the development of insight, he soon became an Arahāt.

Foremost Title Achieved

On one occasion, when the Buddha held a congregation of monastics at the Jetavana monastery, he declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ
tejo-dhātu-kusalānaṃ yad-idaṃ Sāgato.*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who are adept at dwelling in the absorption on the element of heat, Sāgata is the foremost (etad-aggā).

40. Ven. Rādha

Aspiration in the Past

In describing the past aspiration of Ven. Rādha, we draw from the commentary on the Verses of the Elder Monks (Thera-gāthā, Thag 127) as it is more informative than the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya).

The future Ven. Rādha was born into a worthy family in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time [1355] of Buddha Padumuttara. When he came of age, he visited the Buddha’s monastery and, after paying respects to the Buddha, sat in a suitable place. While sitting there, he witnessed the Buddha honour a monastic as the foremost in the field of illuminating the doctrine to his audience. As such, he had a great desire to be honoured with the same recognition by some Future Buddha. He made exceptional offerings to the Buddha and, thereafter, he aspired to that honour. The Buddha predicted that his aspiration would be fulfilled.

Life as a Clansman during Buddha Vipassī's Time

The future Rādha, after aspiring to the senior discipleship at the time of Buddha Padumuttara, and after many more existences of meritorious deeds, was reborn as a worthy man again during the time of Buddha Vipassī. When he came of age, he met Buddha Vipassī who was going on alms round. He had an intense devotion to the Buddha and offered him a mango of a very delicious type.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

Future Rādha was reborn in the Deva realm because of that meritorious deed. After the Deva existence, he was reborn only in the Deva realm and the human world, where he engaged himself in further deeds of merit. During the time of Buddha Gotama, he was reborn as a Brahmin youth by the name of Rādha, in the city of Rājagaha. He married and when he became old, he did not enjoy the usual care from his wife. Wishing to become a monastic, he went to the monastery but his requests for admission into the Saṅgha were refused by all the monastics because they were not interested in having an aged pupil who would not be able to serve them personally.

Rādha the Brahmin, already decrepit due to old age, looked even more aged because of his frustrations in being refused repeatedly to be admitted into the Saṅgha. He was a pitiful sight as he was being reduced to a mere skeleton, completely worn out, pale like a withered leaf with veins running over his whole body, like netting. One day, he went to the Buddha and after an exchange of courteous greetings, sat in a suitable place. The Buddha saw that the old Brahmin had sufficient merit to gain path-knowledge. And to start a dialogue, the Buddha asked: “Brahmin, are you being taken good care of by your wife and children?” The old Brahmin replied: “Gotama, I am far from being taken care of by my wife and children. In fact, they have been treating me as a total stranger because I am too old to be of any use to them.” – “Brahmin, in that case, had you not better take up the monastic life!”

Ven. Sāriputta’s Sense of Gratitude

“Gotama, who would admit me as a monastic? There is no monastic who is willing to be my preceptor due to old age.” The Buddha then asked the monastics why the old Brahmin looked so haggard and wasted. The monastics answered that he looked so desperate and forlorn because he could not find a preceptor. “Monastics, is there any monastic who, is in some way, obligated to this Brahmin?”

Thereupon, Ven. Sāriputta said: “Venerable sir, I remember a good turn done to me by this Brahmin.” – “What was that?” asked the Buddha. “Venerable sir, when I went on alms round in Rājagaha, he offered me a spoonful of cooked rice. I remember that good turn done to me.” – “Very good, Sāriputta, very good. Virtuous persons do not forget a good turn done to them, and they feel obliged to repay the debt of gratitude. In that case, Sāriputta, see that the Brahmin is made a novice and then admitted into the Saṅgha.”

“Venerable sir, by which mode of admission may I admit him?” the Buddha gave a discourse concerning the question of Ven. Sāriputta and declared thus: “Monastics, from now on, the mode of admitting a person into full monastic life by getting him established in the three refuges is to be discontinued. Henceforth, a novice should be admitted by a Saṅgha, after a formal proposal three times and, if there be no objection, then the novice shall be admitted.” This was the first instance of the new mode of admission called the admission following an announcement and three proposals (ñatti-catuttha). [1356]

The Buddha<sup>294</sup> attained Perfect Self-Awakening on the full moon day in May (Vesākha), 528 BCE. He passed his first Rains Retreat (Vassa) in the Isipatana Deer Park. At the end of that Rains Retreat (Vassa), he sent the first 60 of his monastic disciples, all Arahats, to the four corners of the land to propagate the Dhamma.

He admitted into the Saṅgha new monastics, first as novices, and then as full monastics, sponsored by these 60 Arahats, by having them established in the three refuges. The Buddha himself adopted the same mode. Later, considering the great distances the new entrants had to travel to the Buddha's monastery, admissions by this mode were allowed by the Buddha by other members of the Saṅgha.

On the full moon day in January (Phussa) of the same year, the Buddha went to reside at Rājagaha. A fortnight later, the two chief disciples together with their pupils became monastics. On the seventh day of their monastic life, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna became an Arahāt. On the fifteenth day in February (Māgha), Ven. Sāriputta became an Arahāt. The Brahmin Rādha's admission into the Saṅgha took place during the month falling between the full moon day in February and the full moon day in March (Phagguṇa).

Ven. Sāriputta had known that when the Buddha lived in the Isipatana Deer Park, admission as novices and as full monastics was done by getting the incumbent established in the three refuges. And yet why did he ask about the mode of admission in this case?

The answer is: Ven. Sāriputta, as a constant companion to the Buddha, knew the Buddha's wishes, as was the usual competency of those companions. As a matter of fact, he was the most competent among those close companions. He had foresight that the Buddha was thinking of instituting a stricter mode of admission than the simple mode of getting the incumbent established in the three refuges. Since the Buddha's residence at Rājagaha, the number of Arahats had also grown to more than 20,000.

The remarkable acuteness of Ven. Sāriputta's understanding of the Buddha's mind was revealed on another occasion too. It was in connection with Rāhula, the Buddha's son. In 528 BCE, at the close of the year, the Buddha travelled to his native place, the city of Kapilavatthu. The journey took two months. On the seventh day, after arrival in that city, his son, Rāhula, who was aged seven, demanded his inheritance. The Buddha gave him the most worthy inheritance by requesting Ven. Sāriputta to admit Rāhula as a novice. On that occasion, Ven. Sāriputta, knowing well that being made a novice was done by making the incumbent established in the three refuges, asked the Buddha: "Venerable sir, by what mode shall I admit Prince Rāhula as a novice?"

The earlier practice adopted at the Deer Park was to give admission to novices as well as to full monastics by getting them established in the three refuges. But in the later case of Rādha, the admission into the monastic life was done by a congregation of the Saṅgha making formal proposal for admission by the preceptor thrice, and then if the Saṅgha agreed by remaining silent, admission was effected. But, in the case of making a novice, Ven. Sāriputta fathomed the Buddha's intention that being made a novice should be done either by getting the incumbent established in the three refuges or by a formal Saṅgha. Otherwise, the Saṅgha might be under the impression that being made a novice would be valid only by congregation. Therefore, to get the express consent from the Buddha to perform making a novice by getting Rāhula established in the three refuges, Ven. Sāriputta put that question to the Buddha.

Ven. Rādha's Ascetic Life and Awakening

Ven. Sāriputta, respectfully complying with the orders of the Buddha, acted as preceptor in the formal congregation which admitted Brahmin Rādha into the Saṅgha. He knew that the Buddha had a high regard for the Brahmin and so after the admission, he looked after the personal welfare of the aged monastic. [1357]

He took Ven. Rādha to a forest abode. A monastic, who is junior in monastic standing, has little privileges in the matter of the four requisites. Ven. Sāriputta, who was a senior monastic, enjoyed priority in receiving these requisites but he shared them with Ven. Rādha, while he himself lived on the daily alms food. Thus, sharing monastic dwellings and food with his preceptor, Ven. Sāriputta, Ven. Rādha recovered physically into a healthy state. Then taking instructions in the practice of the noble path from his preceptor, he worked with diligence and soon became an Arahat.

Then Ven. Sāriputta took Ven. Rādha to pay homage to the Buddha. Although the Buddha knew how Ven. Rādha was doing, he asked Ven. Sāriputta: "Sāriputta, I had given Rādha to your care. How is Rādha doing? Is he happy in the monastic life?" Ven. Sāriputta replied: "Venerable sir, if one were to point to a monastic who finds full satisfaction in the teaching, one has only to point to a monastic of Rādha's type."

Then words of praise by Ven. Sāriputta became common among the monastics, who said: "Friends, Ven. Sāriputta has a strong sense of gratitude and is also apt to repay the debt of gratitude he owes to others.” When the Buddha heard these words, he said to the monastics: “Monastics, it is not so great a wonder that Sāriputta, in his last existence, should remember his debt of gratitude and repay it. Even in the long past, when he was a mere animal, he had this sense of gratitude.” The monastics then requested the Buddha to relate to them a past-life story concerning Ven. Sāriputta. The Buddha related to them the Birth Story about Prince Alīnacitta (Alīnacitta-jātaka, JA 156).

The Story about Prince Alīnacitta

Monastics, in the past, there lived 500 carpenters who used to fell trees in the forest at the foot of a hill. They would cut them into suitable sizes and then float the lumber downstream in rafts. At one time, an elephant was wounded in the forest by a piece of heavy bough which it tore off from the tree. The pointed piece of wood pierced its foot and he was in great pain.

After two or three days, the wounded elephant noticed that there were a big group of men passing its way everyday, and hoped that they might be able to help it. It followed the men. When the men saw it following them, they were frightened and ran away. The elephant then did not continue to follow them but stopped. When the carpenters stopped running, the elephant drew near them again.

The head of the carpenters, being wise, pondered on the behaviour of the elephant: “This elephant comes to us as we do not move on, but stops when we run away from it. There must be some reason.” Then the men went up the trees and observed the movements of the elephant. The elephant went near them and, after showing them the wound at its foot, lay down. The carpenters understood the elephant’s behaviour then, it was badly wounded and was seeking help. They went to the elephant and inspected the wound. Then they cut the end of the big wooden spike piercing into the elephant’s foot into a neat groove, tied a strong rope around the groove, and pulled the spike out. They washed the wound with herbs, applied medicinal preparations to the best of their ability and then dressed the wound. Soon the wound healed and the elephant was well.

Deeply grateful to its healers, the elephant thought about repaying the debt of gratitude. It went back to its den and brought back a young calf which was white all over. This was a most auspicious kind of white elephant one of the Gandha species. The carpenters were very glad to see the elephant returned with a calf.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 2055

The elephant was not merely showing them the noble calf but it meant to make a gift of it to the benefactors. To make its intention clear, it left the place alone.

The calf followed it but the father elephant gave a signal to the calf to go back to the men. The calf obeyed. The men then said to the calf: “Dear boy, we have no use with you. Just go back to your father.” The calf went back but the father would not take him back. Three times the carpenters sent him back, only to be refused by the father. So they were obliged to keep it. The 500 carpenters each gave a handful of cooked [1358] rice to the calf which was sufficient nourishment for it. It would help them by piling up the cut-up logs, ready to be rafted.

The commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) relates the story up to this point only, to show the sense of gratitude of Ven. Sāriputta when he was an elephant. We now continue the story as described in the Birth Story (Ja 156).

From that time on, the white elephant calf became part of the team of carpenters. Obeying their commands, he assisted them in all their tasks. The carpenters fed him with their share of cooked rice. At the close of the day’s work, the men and the calf went into the river to bathe and play together.

There is a noteworthy thing about noble elephants or noble horses or noble humans: they never defecate or urinate in the water, but go up to dry ground for the purpose.

One day, a great torrent came down from upstream to Bārāṇasī. In that current, there floated down a piece of dried dung excreted by the white calf, and was caught in a bush at the public washing place in Bārāṇasī. The tenders of the royal elephants brought to the river 500 elephants to be washed. These elephants sniffed around, got the smell of the dung of the white elephant and panicked. They dared not enter the water but tried to run away with raised tails. The elephant tenders reported the strange behaviour of the elephants to the physicians in charge of elephants. They knew that there must be something in the water that caused the panic of the king’s elephants. A close search was made and they discovered the piece of dung in the bush. Thus, the reason for the fright of the 500 elephants was ascertained. A big jar was filled with water and in it the white elephant’s dung was made to dissolve. The 500 elephants were then washed in that solution which had a pleasant odour. Then only the elephants would enter the water.

The elephant physicians reported their experience to the king and strongly suggested to him that the noble white elephant should be searched for. The king led the expedition in a big flotilla upstream until they reached the place where the carpenters were working, at the foot of the hill. The white elephant calf was then bathing in the river. He heard the sound of the royal drums and ran to its masters, the carpenters, who welcomed the king. “Great King,” they said, “you do not need to come up personally to obtain timber. You could send someone for that.” The king answered: “Friends, we have not come here for timber. We have come to take this white elephant calf that is in your possession.” – “Then, king, take it by all means.”

The young calf, however, was not willing to leave its masters, and would not budge from where it was standing. The elephant physicians were consulted. They explained to the king that the young calf would like to see its masters fully compensated for its upkeep. The king then ordered that 100,000 pieces of money in silver be placed at each of the six parts of the body of the calf, at the four feet, at the trunk and at the tail. Still the calf would not budge. It wanted the king to give personal presents as well. When every man in the party of carpenters, and their wives were given a piece of clothing and playthings for their children, who were his playmates, it then agreed to go with the king. It cast long parting looks at the men, their wives and children as it went along with the king.

The calf was escorted to the city which it was made to go round clockwise thrice in pomp and ceremony, the whole of the city and the elephant-yard was decorated. He was then housed at the elephant-yard, fitted with the paraphernalia of a royal mount. Then it was anointed as the king’s personal associate, as well as the royal mount. It was assigned half of the royal estate, with every aspect of regal status. From the day of its arrival, Bārāṇasī acquired the dominance of the whole Jambudīpa.

After some time, the Bodhisatta was conceived in the womb of the Chief Queen of Bārāṇasī. When the gestation period was due the king died. The news of the king’s demise was not revealed to the white elephant for fear that it might suffer a broken-heart.

However, the news could not be kept secret for long. For when news of the king's death became known to the neighbouring province of Kosala, the king of Kosala besieged Bārāṇasī. The citizens of Bārāṇasī sent an envoy to the Kosalan King with the message [1359] which purported to say: "Our queen is due to give birth to a child seven day's hence, according to persons adept at reading people's appearance. If the queen gives birth to a son, we shall wage war. Meantime, would the Kosalan King hold his peace just for seven days?" The Kosalan King agreed.

The queen gave birth to a son on the seventh day. The birth of the child was marked by the citizens of Bārāṇasī being in cheerful spirits, hence the boy was named Prince Alīnacitta, meaning "the Prince who brings good cheer."

The war started, as mutually agreed, on the day of the birth of the prince. The warriors of Bārāṇasī, lacking a general on the field, fought bravely yet their morale was running low. The ministers confided with the queen that to avert defeat, the white elephant should be told of the death of the king, and the plight of the kingless city that was under siege by the Kosalan King. The queen agreed. Then fitting the royal infant in regalia, placing it on a piece of white cloth, she carried it to the elephant-yard accompanied by her ministers and put down the child near the foot of the white elephant. She said: "Great White Elephant, we have kept the news of the king's death from you because we feared you might suffer a broken heart. Here is the prince, the son of your deceased friend, the king. Now our city is under siege by the Kosalan King, your little child, the prince, is in danger. The people defending the city are in low spirits. You may now destroy the child, or save him and his throne from the invaders.

Thereupon the white elephant fondled the baby with his trunk, took it up, and placing it on his head, wailed bitterly. Then he put down the baby and placed it in the arms of the queen. It made a signal of his readiness for action, which meant: "I will capture the Kosalan King alive," then it went out of the elephant yard. The ministers fitted the white elephant with chainmail and, opening the city gate, led it out, surrounded by them. After coming out of the city, the white elephant gave out a shrill sound like that of the crane, and ran through the besieging forces, taking the Kosalan King by his hair knot, put him at the feet of the princeling Alīnacitta. Frightening off the enemy troops who threatened to harm the princeling, it seemed to say to the Kosalan King: "From now on, Kosalan King, be mindful. Do not take the princeling as someone to trifle with.” The Kosalan King was thus properly subdued.

From that time on, the suzerainty of the entire Jambudīpa became secure in the hands of Prince Alīnacitta. No rival king dared challenge the authority of the prince. When the prince, the Bodhisatta, was aged seven, he was anointed King Alīnacitta. He ruled righteously and at the end of his lifespan, he was reborn in the Deva realm.

The Birth Story about Prince Alīnacitta (Alīna-citta-jātaka, Ja 156) was originally related by the Buddha in connection with a certain monastic who was faltering in the observance of the noble practice. At another time, in connection with the sense of gratitude shown by Ven. Sāriputta in the case of Ven. Rādhā, this episode was partially related, up to the noble tusker giving up its white elephant calf to its benefactors.

After discoursing on the story that had taken place in the past, the Buddha, in the present context, uttered these two verses (Ja 156):

*Alīna-cittam nissāya, pahaṭṭhā mahatī camū,
Kosalam senāsantuttham, jīvaggāham agāhayi.*

Monastics, dependent on Prince Alīnacitta, the Bodhisatta, the big army of Bārāṇasī had captured alive, through the might of the royal white elephant, the Kosalan King who was unsatisfied with his own domain.

Evaṃ nissāya sampanno, bhikkhu āradḍha-vīriyo, bhāvayam kusalam Dhammam, yogakkhemassa pattiyā, pāpuṇe anupubbena, sabba-saṃyojanakkhayam.

Similarly, with the good fortune in having the virtuous ones, such as the Buddha and the noble ones, as friends, a monastic who puts forth earnest effort [1360] may cultivate the good doctrine, the 37 constituents of Awakening and become an Arahat which is characterized by the extinction of all fetters, and by gradual stages reach Nibbāna, the end of the four bonds.

After ending the discourse with the attainment of the deathless as its highest objective, the Buddha continued to show the four noble truths, at the end of which, the faltering monastic attained path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa). The Birth Story ended with the usual identification of the personalities involved: The Chief Queen, the Bodhisatta’s mother, was Queen Māyā in the present existence; the King of Bārāṇasī, King Suddhodana; the royal white elephant, the faltering monastic; the noble tusker, the father of the white calf, Ven. Sāriputta; the Kosalan King, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna; Prince Alīnacitta, the Buddha.

The Buddha related the Birth Story (Jātaka) in connection with Ven. Sāriputta's sense of gratitude, how in the past existence he repaid his debt of gratitude. As regards Ven. Rādha, the Buddha had made 46 discourses in connection with him (Rādha-saṃyutta, SN 23).

Further, when Ven. Sāriputta took Ven. Rādha before the Buddha after Ven. Rādha's attainment of Awakening, both of them knelt before the Buddha, and the Buddha asked Ven. Sāriputta: "Sāriputta, does your close pupil Rādha take kindly to your admonition?" Ven. Sāriputta replied: "Venerable sir, Rādha is very amenable to admonition. Whenever a fault of his is pointed out, he does not show the slightest resentment." – "Sāriputta, how many amenable pupils like Rādha would you be prepared to accept?" – "Venerable sir, if I am to receive pupils as amenable as Ven. Rādha, I would accept as many as they might come to me."

Then, after relating the past story of Ven. Sāriputta, as described in the Birth Story about Prince Alīnacitta, how, even as an animal, Ven. Sāriputta had shown his sense of gratitude, which was the subject-matter of their fellow monastics' remarks, the Buddha extolled the virtues of Ven. Rādha thus: "Monastics, a monastic should be amenable to admonition like Ven. Rādha. When the teacher points out a fault of the pupil, the latter should not show resentment but should take it as if rich treasures had been revealed to him." In this connection, the Buddha uttered this verse (Dhp 76):

*Nidhānaṃ va pavattāraṃ, yam passe vajja-dassinaṃ,
niggayha-vādiṃ medhāviṃ, tādisaṃ paṇḍitaṃ bhaje, tādisaṃ bhajamānassa, seyyo hoti na pāpiyo.*

Monastics, if you should meet with a man of wisdom who points out faults and reproves you, you should associate with such a wise person as someone who reveals to you hidden treasures. It will be to the advantage, and not a disadvantage, of one who seeks the company of such a wise man.

By the end of the discourse, many hearers attained path-knowledge at various levels.

Foremost Title Achieved

On one occasion, when the Buddha named foremost monastics, he declared:

paṭibhāṇeyyakānaṃ yad-idaṃ Rādho.*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who inspire me to amplify my discourses, Ven. Rādha is the foremost (etad-aggā).

Ven. Rādha's perspicacity and deep conviction in the doctrine was a source of inspiration to the Buddha to amplify his discourses. This fact may be [1361] gathered from the Thematic Discourses concerning Rādha (Rādhasaṃyutta, SN 23), particularly the six last discourses (SN 23:5-10) and the whole of the fourth chapter (SN 23:35-46).

The designated term has been defined as: Paṭibhānaṃ janentī ti paṭibhāṇeyyakā, “those disciples who arouse the Buddha's facility in giving discourses.”

41. Ven. Mogharāja

The story of Ven. Mogharāja is gleaned from the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) and the commentary on the Way to the Beyond (Pārāyaṇa-vagga, Snp 5).

Aspiration in the Past

The future Mogharāja was born into a worthy family in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. On one occasion, while he was listening to a discourse by the Buddha, he witnessed a monastic being declared by him as the foremost monastic among his disciples who wear robes that were inferior in three ways: of inferior rag material, of inferior thread, and of inferior dye. The future Mogharāja had a strong desire to be acknowledged likewise as a foremost monastic in some future time. He made extraordinary offerings to the Buddha and expressed this aspiration before him. The Buddha predicted that the aspiration would be fulfilled.

Life as Minister to King Kaṭṭhavāhana

The future Mogharāja spent a meritorious life and passed away into the realm of Devas and then in the realm of humans and Devas. Prior to the appearance of Buddha Kassapa he was reborn in the city of Kaṭṭhavāhana, into a noble family.

When he was of certain age, he became a courtier at King Kaṭṭhavāhana's court and later was appointed as a minister.

We shall now relate the story of King Kaṭṭhavāhana, the details of which are found in the commentary on the Way to the Beyond (Pārāyaṇa-vagga, Snp 5).

Before the advent of Buddha Kassapa, there was an accomplished carpenter, a native of Bārāṇasī, whose carpentry skill was unrivalled. He had sixteen senior pupils, each of whom had 1,000 apprentices. Thus, together with this master carpenter, there were 16,017 carpenters, who made their living in Bārāṇasī. They would go to the forest and gather various kinds of timber to make various kinds of articles and high class furniture, which were fit for royalty and nobility in the city. They brought their wares to Bārāṇasī in a raft. When the king wanted to have palaces built, ranging from a single-tiered mansion to a seven-tiered mansion, they did it to the satisfaction and delight of the king. They also built other structures for other people.

Construction of a Flying Machine

The master craftsman conceived an idea one day: "It would be too hard for me to live on my carpenter's trade in my old age; I must do something." He ordered his pupils to gather species of light wood with which he built a flying machine resembling the Garuḷa bird. After assembling the machinery in it, he started the engine which made the contraption fly in the air like a bird. He flew in it to the forest where his men were working and descended there.

He said to his pupils: "Boys, let us build flying machines like this and with our superior power, we can rule Jambudīpa. Now, copy this flying machine. We must escape from the drudgery of our carpenters' existence." The pupils successfully built similar flying machines and reported it to the master. "Now, which city shall we conquer?" asked the master. "Let us conquer Bārāṇasī, master," they suggested. "That would not do, boys. We are known as carpenters in Bārāṇasī. Even if we were to conquer and rule it, everybody will know our origin as carpenters. Jambudīpa is a vast place, let us find our fortune elsewhere," thus advised the master, and the pupils agreed.

Ascension to the Throne as Kaṭṭhavāhana

The carpenter guild of 16,017 members had each of their families put aboard a flying machine, and wielding arms, flew in the direction of the Himālayas. They entered a city, [1362] grouped together in the royal palace and dethroned the king. They then anointed the master craftsman as king. Because he was the inventor of the flying machine made of wood, he came to be known as King Kaṭṭhavāhana, “one who rode on a vehicle made of wood.” Based on this personal name of the king, the city and the country also acquired the same name. An heir-apparent and a council of sixteen ministers were appointed. The king and all these top leaders of the country conducted themselves with righteousness. The king extended necessary assistance to the people according to the principle of the four means of help, with the result that the people were happy and prosperous and had few dangers and hazards. Everybody spoke in praise of the king and his staff who were loved, respected and relied upon.

Friendship with the King of Bārāṇasī

One day, a group of merchants from Bārāṇasī went to Kaṭṭhavāhana with their merchandise. When they were given audience by King Kaṭṭhavāhana, the king asked them where they lived. Being told that they lived in Bārāṇasī, the king said to them: “Men, I would like to be on cordial terms with the king of Bārāṇasī. Would you render your service to that end?” The merchants gladly undertook to help.

During their stay in Kaṭṭhavāhana, the king provided them with all their needs and at the time of their departure, they were again reminded courteously to help promote friendship between the two cities.

When the merchants arrived at Bārāṇasī, they conveyed to their king the message of the King of Kaṭṭhavāhana. The king was delighted. He made public announcement by the beat of the drum that the merchants of Kaṭṭhavāhana, who were selling their goods in Bārāṇasī, would be exempt from taxes. Thus, the two kings, who had never met, were already in the bonds of friendship. The King of Kaṭṭhavāhana reciprocated by proclaiming that merchants of Bārāṇasī, who were doing business in his city, would also be exempt from taxes. He also issued standing orders that merchants of Bārāṇasī would be provided with all their needs out of the king’s coffers.

The King of Bārāṇasī then sent a message to the King of Kaṭṭhavāhana to the effect that if there should occur within the domains of Kaṭṭhavāhana something noteworthy, whether seen or heard, King Kaṭṭhavāhana see to it that that event is also seen or heard by the King of Bārāṇasī. The King of Kaṭṭhavāhana also sent to the King of Bārāṇasī a similar message.

An Exchange of Gifts

One day the King of Kaṭṭhavāhana obtained a certain fabric of most rare quality which was not only extra-fine but had a sheen that dazzled like the rising sun. He remembered the message received from the King of Bārāṇasī and thought it fit to send this extraordinary fabric to Bārāṇasī. He had eight caskets of ivory carved out for him, and in each he put a piece of the fabric. Outside the ivory caskets, he had a lac ball cover each casket. The eight lac balls were placed in a wooden box which was wrapped in very fine fabric. On it was written the inscription: “To be presented to the King of Bārāṇasī.” An accompanying message suggested that the King of Bārāṇasī open this gift himself on the palace grounds where all the ministers should be present.

The royal delegation from the court of Kaṭṭhavāhana presented the gift box and the message to the King of Bārāṇasī who caused a meeting of the ministers at the courtyard. He opened the box in their presence. On finding just eight balls of lac, he was disappointed, thinking that the King of Kaṭṭhavāhana had played a practical joke on him. He struck one of the lac balls hard against the throne which he was sitting on and to his amazement when the lac broke open and the ivory casket and its lid came apart. Inside, the king saw the fine fabric. The seven other lac balls yielded similar ivory caskets with the fabric inside. Each piece of fabric measured 16 by 8 cubits.

When these fabrics were unfolded, they presented a most spectacular scene as though the entire courtyard were glimmering in the sun. The onlookers snapped their fingers in amazement and some threw up their head-gear [1363] into the air in joy, saying: “King Kaṭṭhavāhana, the unseen friend of our king, has sent such a marvellous gift! Truly that king is a worthy friend of our king.”

A Gift from Bārāṇasī

The King of Bārāṇasī sent for valuers and referred the fine fabrics to them for their appraisal. The valuers were at a loss to name a value for them. Then the king thought to himself: “My good friend, the King of Kaṭṭhavāhana has sent me a priceless gift. A return gift should be somehow superior to the gift received. What should that gift be?”

It was the time when Buddha Kassapa had appeared in the three worlds and was residing at Bārāṇasī. The king considered that there is nothing as adorable as the Three Treasures. “I should send the news of the appearance of the Buddha to King Kaṭṭhavāhana. That would make the most appropriate return gift.”

So he had the following verse consisting of six lines inscribed with vermilion on gold plate:

*Buddho loke samuppanno, hitāya sabba-pāṇinaṃ.
Dhammo loke samuppanno, sukhāya sabba-pāṇinaṃ.
Saṅgho loke samuppanno, puññakkhettaṃ anuttaraṃ.*

Friend Kaṭṭhavāhana, for the welfare of all living beings, the all-knowing Buddha has appeared in our world, like the rising of the sun at Mount Udaya in the east; for the happiness of all living beings, the Dhamma, comprising the four paths, four fruits, Nibbāna and the doctrine, has appeared in our world like the rising of the sun at Mount Udaya in the east; the Saṅgha, the incomparable fertile field for all to sow seeds of merit, has appeared in our world, like the rising of the sun at Mount Udaya in the east.

Besides these lines, the king had an inscription containing the practice of the Dhamma, beginning from getting established in morality for a monastic, progressively towards becoming an Arahat. The above gold plate was: 1) First put inside a casket wrought with the seven kinds of gems; 2) then the jewel casket was placed inside a casket of emerald; 3) then the emerald casket was placed inside a casket of cat’s-eye gem; 4) the cat’s-eye casket was then placed inside a casket of red ruby; 5) the red ruby casket was then placed inside a gold casket; 6) the gold casket was then placed inside a silver casket; 7) the silver casket was then placed inside an ivory casket; and 8) the ivory casket was then placed inside a casket of scented musk wood. This casket was put inside a box, wrapped with fine fabric and on it the royal seal was affixed.

This gift was sent to Kaṭṭhavāhana in state. A noble tusker in musk was fitted with golden ornaments, covered with gold lace, and a golden flag flew on his majestic body. On its back, they secured a raised platform, on which the gift box was placed. A white umbrella was hoisted above it. It was sent off after performing deeds of honour with flowers and scents, dancing and music. The king himself headed the group of royal escorts in sending it off up to the border of Kāsi Country, the king's domain. Moreover, the King of Bārāṇasī sent presents with his messages to other rulers of neighbouring states on the route, requiring them to pay homage to the special return gift of his. All those rulers complied gladly till the carrier tusk reached the border of Kaṭṭhavāhana.

King Kaṭṭhavāhana went out to some distance to welcome the return gift; paying homage to it. The gift was opened in the courtyard before the people. After removing the thin cloth wrapper and opening the box, a scented hard-wood casket was found. Inside it, the eight caskets were opened, one after the other in turn till the gold plate informing of the appearance of the Three Treasures was revealed. "This is the rarest gift that one comes by, and only over an immense period of time. My good friend, the King of Bārāṇasī, has been very thoughtful in sending this news to me together with an outline on the practice of the Dhamma," reflected King Kaṭṭhavāhana joyfully. "The appearance of the Buddha, never heard of [1364] before, has taken place. It were well if I should go and see the Buddha and learn his doctrine," he reflected. He consulted about the idea with his ministers who advised him to stay awhile in the city during which they would go and inquire.

The Ministers' Mission

The sixteen ministers, together with 1,000 followers each, said to the king: "Great King, if the Buddha has actually appeared in the world, there is no likelihood of our seeing you again at your palace, as we are all going to become monastics. If the Buddha has not actually arisen, we shall come back to you."

Among the ministers was the king's own nephew, the son of his sister, who said: "I am going too." The king said to him: "Son, when you have found that the Buddha has appeared, come back to me and tell me the news." His nephew agreed: "Very well, king."

The sixteen ministers with their 16,000 followers went hastily, resting only once at a night camp on the way and reached Bārāṇasī. However, before they got there, Buddha Kassapa had passed away. The ministers entered the Buddha's monastery and asked: "Who is the Buddha? Where is the Buddha?" But they found only the male monastic disciples who had been living together with the Buddha.

The monks told them: “The Buddha has passed away.” The ministers then wailed, saying: “We have come from afar and we missed the chance to even see the Buddha!” They said to the monks: “Venerable sirs, are there some words of advice or admonition of the Buddha left for the world?” – “Yes, lay supporters. They are: ‘Be established in the three refuges. Observe the five precepts all the time. Also keep the Observance Day (Uposatha) precepts of eight constituents. Give in generosity. If you are capable, take up the monastic life yourself.’ ” – “Thereupon, all the ministers, with the exception of the king’s nephew, together with their followers, took up the monastic life.

King Kaṭṭhavāhana’s Demise

King Kaṭṭhavāhana’s nephew returned to Kaṭṭhavāhana after having obtained an article that had been used by the Buddha, as an object of veneration. It was a water strainer. In this connection, it may be noted that the articles that had been used by the Buddha include the Bodhi tree, alms bowl, robes, water-strainer, etc. The nephew also arranged for a monastic who had learnt by heart the Dhamma, the Vinaya and the Abhidhamma to accompany him to Kaṭṭhavāhana.

Travelling by stages, the nephew reached Kaṭṭhavāhana and reported to the King: “Uncle, the Buddha actually has appeared in the world, and it is also true that he had passed away.” He related the Buddha’s advice as he had learned from the Buddha’s disciples. The king resorted to the monastic learned in the Three Baskets (Tipiṭaka) and listened to his discourses. He built a monastery for the teacher, erected a relic shrine (stūpa) where the Buddha’s water strainer was enshrined and planted a new Bodhi tree. He was established in the five precepts and kept the Observance Day precepts on the appropriate days. He gave freely in generosity; and after living till the end of his lifespan, he passed away and was reborn in the Deva realm. The sixteen ministers, who had become monastics together with their 16,000 followers, also practised the noble teaching, died as worldlings, and were reborn in the Deva realm as followers to the Deva who had been King Kaṭṭhavāhana. Among the sixteen followers of the Deva King there was the future Ven. Mogharāja.

Ascetic Life in His Final Existence

During the aeon that intervened between the two Buddhas, the master craftsman and all his followers had existence in the Deva Realms. Then on the eve of the advent of Buddha Gotama, they were reborn in the human world. Their leader was born as a son of the king's Brahmin chaplain at the court of King Mahā Kosala, father of Pasenadi Kosala, and he was named Bāvarī, and was endowed with three distinguishing marks of a great man. Being a master of the three Vedas, he succeeded to the office of Brahmin chaplain at the death of his father. The remaining 16,000 men were reborn in Sāvattihī in the Brahmin clan. Among them [1365] were:

*Ajito Tissa-metteyyo, Puṇṇako atha Mettagū, Dhotako Upasīvo ca, Nando ca atha Hemako.
Todeyya-kappā dubhayo, Jatukkaṇṇī ca paṇḍito,
Bhadrāvudho Udayo ca, Posālo cāpi brāhmaṇo.
Mogharājā ca medhāvī, Piṅgiyo ca mahā isi.*

1) Ajita, 2) Tissa Metteyya, 3) Puṇṇaka, 4) Mettagū, 5) Dhotaka, 6) Upasīva, 7) Nanda, 8) Hemaka, 9) Todeyya, 10) Kappa, 11) Jatukkaṇṇī, 12) Bhadrāvudha, 13) Udaya, 14) Posala, 15) Mogharāja, 16) Piṅgiya.

These sixteen Brahmins learned the three Vedas from master Bāvarī. The 1,000 followers under each of them, in turn, learned from them. Thus, Bāvarī and his company of followers making a total of 16,017 Brahmins became united again in their last existence.

Renunciation by Bāvarī and his Followers

At the death of King Mahā Kosala, his son, Pasenadi Kosala, was anointed king. The king's Brahmin chaplain Bāvarī retained his office under the new king, who granted fresh privileges to him in addition to those given by his father.

The new king, as a prince, had been a pupil under Bāvarī so that his relationship with the old Brahmin chaplain was not only official but also personal.

One day, Bāvarī, remaining in seclusion, took a cool assessment of the learning that he possessed. He saw that the Vedas were not of any value to him in good stead in the hereafter. He decided to renounce the world as a recluse. When he revealed this plan to King Pasenadi Kosala, the king said: "Master, your presence at our court gives me the assurance of elderly counsel which makes me feel I am still under the eyes of my own father. Please don't leave me."

But, since past merit had begun to ripen into fruition, old Bāvarī could not be persuaded against his plan, and insisted that he was going. The king then said: "Master, in that case, I would request you to stay as a recluse in the royal gardens so that I might be able to see you by day or by night." Bāvarī acceded to this request and he and his company of sixteen senior pupils together with the 16,000 followers resided in the royal gardens as recluses. The king provided them with four requisites and paid his master regular visits, in the morning and evening.

After some time, the pupils said to their master: "Master, living near the city makes a recluse's life unsatisfactory because of the many troubles. The proper place for a recluse is somewhere remote from the town. Let us move away from here." The master had only to agree. He told this to the king but the king would not let him leave him alone. Three times Bāvarī made persistent requests to the king, and at last the king had to yield to his wishes. He sent along two of his ministers with 200,000 pieces of money to accompany Bāvarī and his followers to find a suitable site for their hermitage, on which all monastic dwellings for them were to be built.

The recluse Bāvarī, together with 16,016 pupils, under the care of the two ministers, left in the southerly direction from Sāvattthī. Then they went to south Jambudīpa to a place which lay between the two kingdoms of Assaka and Aḷaka, which was a big island where the two streams of the river Godhāvarī parted, a three-league wide forest of edible fruits, Bāvarī said to his pupils: "This is the spot where ancient recluses have lived. It is suitable for us." As a matter of fact, it was the forest where famous recluses, such as Sarabhaṅga, had made their dwellings.

The king's ministers paid 100,000 pieces of money of silver each to King Assaka and [1366] King Aḷaka for possession and use of the land. The two rulers gladly ceded the property and also added the two-league wide land adjoining the forest, thereby granting a total area of five leagues. The ministers from the court of Sāvattthī caused a dwelling to be built there. They also brought some necessary materials from Sāvattthī and set up a big village for the recluses to gather daily alms food. When their task was completed, they returned to Sāvattthī.

The Life Stories of the Monks – 2069

The above account is what is stated in the commentary on the Way to the Beyond (Pārāyaṇa-vagga, Snp 5). The commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) tells us of further incidents concerning recluse Bāvarī which are described now.

On the day, after the two ministers had returned to Sāvattḥī, a man appeared at the dwelling and sought permission from the recluses to build a house for his dwelling on the estate. He was allowed to do so. Soon other families followed suit and there were 100 houses on the estate. And so, with the kindness of Bāvarī, the community of lay householders flourished, providing a source of daily alms food for the recluses, who also got daily sustenance from the fruit trees.

Yearly Charity Worth a Hundred Thousand

The village at the hermitage had become prosperous. Revenues from agriculture and other activities amounted to 100,000 every year which the villagers paid to King Assaka. But King Assaka said to them that the revenue should be paid to recluse Bāvarī. When they took the money to Bāvarī, the recluse said: “Why have you brought this money?” The householders said: “Reverend sir, we pay this sum as a token of our gratitude for the right of occupancy of your land.” Bāvarī replied: “If I cared for money, I would not have become a recluse. Take back your money.” – “But, sir,” the householders said, “we cannot take back what has been given to you. We shall be paying you the sum of 100,000 every year. We may humbly suggest that you accept our annual tribute and make your own donations with the money as you please.” Bāvarī was obliged to agree. And so every year there took place a big alms giving by the good recluse for the benefit of destitutes, peasants, travellers, beggars and mendicants. The news of this noble act spread to the whole of the Jambudīpa.

A Bogus Brahmin’s Threat

After one such annual occasion, in a certain year, while Bāvarī was exulting in the good deed at his dwelling, he was roused up from his short slumber by a hoarse cry of a man demanding: “Brahmin Bāvarī, give something in generosity. Give something in generosity.” It was the voice of a bogus Brahmin who was a descendant of Brahmin Jūjaka of The Birth Story about the Great King Vessantara (Vessantara-jātaka, Ja 547), who came from Dunniviṭṭha Brahmin village in the kingdom of Kālīṅga. He had come at the behest of his nagging wife who said to him: “Don’t you know that Brahmin Bāvarī is giving away freely in generosity? Go and get gold and silver from him.” The bogus Brahmin was a hen-pecked husband. He could not help but do her bidding.

Bāvarī said to him: “Brahmin, you are late. I have distributed everything to those who came for help. I have not a penny left now.” – “Bāvarī, I do not want a big amount of money. For you, who are giving away such big sums, it is not possible to be penniless as you say. Give me just 500.” – “I don’t have 500. You will get it at the next round.” – “Do I have to wait till the next time you chose to give?” he was clearly angry in saying those words for he started to utter a curse with some elaboration. He fetched some cowdung, red flowers, coarse grass into the dwelling, and hastily smeared the floor at the entrance to the residence of Bāvarī with cowdung, strewed it with red flowers, and spread the coarse grass all over. Then he washed his left foot with water from his water pot, made seven steps on the floor and, stroking his left foot with his hand, uttered the following curse as when a holy man would chant a mantra (Snp 989):

Sace me yācamānassa, bhavaṃ nānupadassati, sattame divase tuyhaṃ, muddhā phalatu sattadhā.

If you refuse to give me the money I asked for, may your head splinter into seven pieces on the seventh day from now.

Bāvarī was deeply disturbed. “Perhaps his curse might take effect,” he pondered as he lay [1367] on his bed, unable to sleep. Then Bāvarī’s mother in the immediately previous existence, who was now the guardian goddess of the hermitage, seeing her former son in distress, said:

Na so muddhaṃ pajānāti, kuhako so dhanatthiko, muddhani muddha-pāte vā, nāṇaṃ tassa na vijjati.

Son, that Brahmin does not know what is called “the head.” He is merely a bogus Brahmin who is out to get your money. Neither does he understand the meaning of “the head” (muddha) nor the factor that can cause “the head” to split asunder (muddhādhipāta).

Then Bāvarī said: “Mother, if you know what is meant by ‘the head’ and the factor that can cause ‘the head’ to split asunder, may I know them.”

The goddess said: “Son, I do not know these things.” – “Who in this world knows them? Please direct me to that person.” – “There is the all-knowing Buddha, Lord of the Three Worlds.” When the word “Buddha” was heard, Bāvarī was extremely delighted and all worries left him. “Where is the Buddha now?” – “The Buddha is residing at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattthī.”

Early next morning, Bāvarī called his sixteen pupils and said: “Men, the Buddha is said to have appeared in the world. Go and verify the fact and let me know. I mean to go to the Buddha myself but at my advanced age, I am expecting death at any moment. Go and see the Buddha and put these seven questions to him.” The questions arranged in verse known as the head-breaker (muddha-phālana), which is also known as the destruction of the head (muddhādhīpāta) were then taught them in detail.

Note that it was on the eighth year of Bāvarī’s settling down by the banks of river Godhāvarī, that the Buddha appeared in the world.<sup>295</sup>

Then Bāvarī pondered thus: “All of my sixteen pupils are wise persons. If they have attained the ultimate goal of the monastic life, Awakening, they might or might not come back to me.” And so he said to Piṅgiya, his nephew: “Nephew Piṅgiya, you ought to come back to me without fail. Do tell me the benefit of the supermundane when you have attained it.”

Then the 16,000 followers of Bāvarī under the leadership of Ajita, one of the sixteen pupils, together with their sixteen teachers, made obeisance to Bāvarī and left their dwelling in the northerly direction.

The Journey to the Buddha

They proceeded on their journey through the royal city of Aḷaka Mahissati, Ujjenī, Gonaddha, Vedisa, Pavana, Kosambī, Sāketa, Sāvattthī, Setabya, Kapilavatthu, Kusinārā, Pāvā, Bhoga, Vesālī and Rājagaha, which was in Magadha country. It was a long journey covering many leagues.

As they passed a city, the people asked them where they were going and when they said that they were going to see the Buddha to clarify certain problems, many people joined them. By the time they passed Kosambī and reached Sāketa, the line of pilgrims was six leagues long already.

The Buddha knew of the coming of the recluses, the pupils of Bāvarī, and that they were being joined by many people along the way. But as the faculties of the recluses were not ripe yet, the Buddha did not stay in Sāvattihī to receive them, as the proper place for their Awakening was the Pāsāṇaka Shrine in Magadha. By having to pass through more cities to that particular place, the number of pilgrims would have grown larger and that all of them would benefit from his discourse there, and gain knowledge of the four noble truths. Taking into consideration this great advantage to the pilgrims, the Buddha left Sāvattihī and went in the direction of Rājagaha ahead of the arrival of the pilgrims there.

When the big crowd reached Sāvattihī, they entered the Buddha's monastery and inquired where the Buddha was. At the entrance to the private quarters of the Buddha, the scented chamber, they noticed the footprint of the Buddha, which was left there by the Buddha's [1368] will to remain intact till they came there. They were adept at reading the footprints of all types of persons (Sn̐A PTS 2.544):

Rattassa hi ukkutikaṃ padaṃ bhava, duṭṭhassa hoti avakaḍḍhitaṃ padaṃ, mūlhassa hoti sahasānupīlitaṃ vivaṭacchadassa idam-īdisaṃ padaṃ.

A person who is lustful has his or her footprint with a hollow at the middle. A person who is full of hatred has his or her footprint inclined backwards. A person who has much bewilderment has his or her print very markedly impressed at the toes and at the heel. The present footprint is surely that of the all-knowing Buddha who has destroyed all the defilements.

By their own learning, the recluses were sure that they had come across the footprint of the Buddha.

The Buddha travelled by stages through Setabya, Kapilavatthu, and so on and reached the Pāsāṇaka Shrine near Rājagaha, letting a big number of persons follow him. The recluses then left Sāvattihī as soon as they had ascertained for themselves the footprint of the Buddha, and travelling by stages through Setabya and Kapilavatthu, and so on reached the Pāsāṇaka Shrine near Rājagaha.

The Pāsāṇaka Shrine was a pre-Buddhist shrine. It was built on a vast rock in honour of a local deity. When the Buddha appeared, the people built a new temple and donated it for the use by Buddhist devotees. The old name however was retained.

Sakka had prepared sufficient room to have the huge crowd accommodated at the Pāsāṇaka temple. In the meanwhile, the recluses tried their best to catch up with the Buddha, travelling in the cool hours of the mornings and evenings. When they saw the Pāsāṇaka Shrine, the destination where the Buddha was understood to be residing, they were extremely happy like a thirsty man seeing water, or like a merchant who has realized a good fortune, or like a weary traveller seeing a cool shade. They rushed into the shrine in all haste.

Questioning the Buddha

They saw the Buddha delivering a discourse in the midst of many monastics with a voice that reminded them of a lion roaring. Ajita, the leader of the Brahmins, was greatly delighted on seeing the Buddha emitting the six Buddha-radiances while expounding the Dhamma, and was further encouraged by the Buddha's amiable words of greetings, such as: "How did you find the weather? Was it tolerable?" and so on.

Sitting in a suitable place, he put the first question to the Buddha without speaking it aloud but directing his mind to the verse taught by his master Bāvarī, thus (Snp 1024):

*Ādissa jammanam brūhi, gottam brūhi salakkhanam;
mantesu paramim brūhi, kati vāceti Brāhmaṇo.*

May I be told: How old is our master Bāvarī? What distinguishing bodily marks is our master endowed with? What is his lineage? How accomplished is he in the three Vedas? How many pupils are learning the Vedas under him?

Bāvarī had instructed Ajita to put those questions mentally. And he did as he was told. The Buddha, as expected by Bāvarī, knew Ajita's questions and gave the following answers without hesitation in two verses (Snp 1025-6):

*Vīsam vassa-satam āyu, so ca gottena Bāvarī;
tīṇissa lakkhanā gatte, tiṇṇam vedāna' pāragū.*

Ajita, your teacher's age is 120 years, he belongs to the clan of Bāvarī, he has three distinguishing marks of a great man, he has mastered the three Vedas.

*Lakkhaṇe itihāse ca, sanighaṇḍusa-keṭubhe; [1369]
pañca-satāni vāceti, sadhamme paramim gato.*

He has mastered the glossaries (nighaṇḍu), the liturgy (ketubha), the characteristics of the great man (lakkhaṇa), the Ancient Histories (Itihāsa), he is teaching the three Vedas to 500 pupils who are lazy and dull.

Ajita wanted to know what three characteristics are possessed by his master, with reference to the third answer above, and put the following question mentally (Snp 1027):

Lakkhanānaṃ pavicayaṃ, Bāvarissa naruttama, kaṅkhacchida pakāsehi, mā no kaṅkhāyitaṃ ahu.

O supreme man endowed with the faculty of dispelling doubts of all beings, please specify in detail what are the three distinguishing marks of Bāvarī. Do not let us have any scepticism.

The Buddha made the following reply (Snp 1028):

Mukhaṃ jivhāya chādeti, uṇṇassa bhamu-kantare, kosohitaṃ vattha-guyhaṃ, evaṃ jānāhi mānava.

Ajita, your teacher Bāvarī can cover his face with his tongue, there is the spiral auspicious hair between his eyebrows, his genital organ is sheathed like that of the Chaddanta elephant. Ajita, note these three distinguishing marks on him.

This the Buddha answered in precise terms. Then the audience, which covered an area of twelve leagues, were amazed, for they heard no one asking questions except the Buddha's prompt and detail answers. Raising their joint palms above their heads, they wondered aloud: "Who is the questioner? Is he a Deva or a Brahma, or Sakka the beloved husband of Sujā?" Having heard the answers to his five questions, Ajita asked two more questions mentally (Snp 1031):

Muddhaṃ muddhādhīpātāñ-ca, Bāvarī paripucchati, taṃ vyākaroḥi Bhagavā, kaṅkhaṃ Vinaya no ise.

O virtuous one, our teacher wishes to ask two questions: First, what is meant by "the head" (muddha)? Secondly, what is the factor that can destroy "the head" (muddhādhīpāta)? Kindly answer these two questions and dispel our doubts.

To Ajita's mental question the Buddha answered aloud thus (Snp 1032):

Avijjā muddhā ti jānāhi, vijiā muddhādhipātini, saddhā-sati-samādhī, chanda-viriyena saṃyutā.

Ajita, ignorance (avijjā) of the four noble truths is the head (muddha) of repeated rebirths. Understanding (vijiā) of the noble path (muddhādhipātini) that is associated with confidence (saddhā), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhī), strong will (chanda) and endeavour (viriyā), is the factor that destroys the head. Thus you should know.

On hearing the exact answers, Ajita was overjoyed. And, placing the antelope's skin on his left shoulder, touched the Buddha's feet with his head. Then he said aloud (Snp 1034):

Bāvarī brāhmaṇo bhoto, saha sissehi mārisa, udagga-citto sumano, pade vandati Cakkhuma. [1370]

The venerable one who has made an end of suffering (dukkha), endowed with the eye of knowledge, Brahmin Bāvarī, together with his pupils numbering 16,000, being in high spirits, worships at your feet!

The other pupils of Bāvarī joined Ajita in these words of praise and made obeisance to the Buddha. The Buddha had compassion on Ajita and wished him well in these terms (Snp 1035):

Sukhito Bāvarī hotu, saha sissehi brāhmano, tvañ-cāpi sukhito hohi, ciraṃ jīvāhi māṇava.

May Bāvarī and his pupils be happy and well! Young Brahmin, may you also be happy and well. May you live long!

Then the Buddha continued (Snp 1036):

Bāvarissa ca tuyhaṃ vā, sabbesaṃ sabba-saṃsayāṃ, katāvakāsā pucchavho, yaṃ kiñci manasicchatha.

If Bāvarī or yourself, Ajita, or anyone of you would like to clear up any problem that may arise in your mind, I allow you to ask.

When this opportunity was extended to them, all the Brahmins sat down, made obeisance to the Buddha, and took turns to ask. Ajita was the first to do so. The Buddha answered his questions and those answers gradually culminated in the realization of Awakening. Ajita and his 1,000 pupils became Arahats at the end of the discourse; 1,000s of others also attained the paths and fruitions at various levels.

As soon as Ajita and his pupils became Arahats, they were called up by the Buddha into the monastic life. They instantly assumed the form of elders of 60 years' standing, complete with monastic equipment which appeared by the supernormal power of the Buddha. They all sat before the Buddha in postures of worship.

The rest of Bāvarī's pupils asked their own questions to the Buddha, the details about which may be found in the Way to the Beyond (Pārāyana-vagga, Snp 5). Here we shall continue only with what is concerned with Ven. Mogharāja and Bāvarī.

Bāvarī's pupils, mentioned above, asked questions in turn to which the Buddha gave answers and which ended in the attainment of Awakening by the questioner and his 1,000 pupils. All of them, becoming monastics, were called up by the Buddha.

Mogharāja was a very conceited person who considered himself as the most learned among the sixteen close pupils of Bāvarī. He thought it fit to ask his questions only after Ajita because Ajita was the eldest among the close pupils. So after Ajita had finished, he stood up to take his turn. However, the Buddha knew that Mogharāja was conceited and was not yet ripe for Awakening, and that he needed chastisement. So the Buddha said to him: "Mogharāja, wait till others have asked their questions." Mogharāja reflected thus: "I have all along been thinking of myself as the wisest person. But the Buddha knows best. He must have judged that my turn to ask questions has not become due." He sat down silently.

Then after the eight pupils of Bāvarī, viz., Ajita, Tissametteyya, Puṇṇaka, Mettagū, Dhōtaka, Upasīva, Nanda and Hemaka, had finished their turns, he became impatient and stood up to take his turn. Again, the Buddha saw him still not ripe yet for Awakening and asked him to wait. Mogharāja took it silently. But when the remaining six pupils of Bāvarī, Todeyya, Kappa, Jatukaṇṇi, Bhadrāvudha, Udaya, and Posala, had finished their turns, Mogharāja was concerned about the prospect of his becoming the most junior monastic among Bāvarī's disciples and took the fifteenth turn. And now that Mogharāja's faculties had ripened, the Buddha allowed him. Mogharāja began thus (Snp 1122-1125):

Dvāham sakkam apucchissam, na me vyākāsi cakkhumā, yāva-tatiyañ-ca devīsi, vyākarotī ti me sutam. [1370]

Twice have I put my questions to the Buddha of Sakyan descent, but the possessor of the five eyes, has not replied to me. I have heard it said that the Buddha answers, out of compassion, at the third time.

Ayam loko paro loko, Brahma-loko sadevako, diṭṭhim te nābhijānāti, Gotamassa yasassino.

Neither this human world nor the world of Devas and Brahmās understand the view held by Buddha Gotama of great fame and following.

Evaṃ abhikkanta-dassāvim, aṭṭhi pañhena āgamaṃ, katham lokam avekkhantaṃ, Maccu-rājā na passati.

To the one who sees the excellent Dhamma, the knower of the inner tendencies (āsaya), supreme release (adhimutti), destinies (gati) and Nibbāna, of the sentient world, we have come to ask a question: How should one perceive the world so that Māra cannot see him any more?

He asks by what manner of perceiving the conditioned world does one become an Arahat which is liberation from death?

To the question contained in the second half of Mogarāja's three verses above, the Buddha replied:

Suññato lokam avekkhassu, Mogharāja sadā sato, attānudiṭṭhim ūhacca, evaṃ maccu-taro siyā, evaṃ lokam avekkhantaṃ Maccu-rājā na passati.

Mogharāja, be mindful all the time, and abandoning the wrong view concerning the five aggregates, the delusion of self, perceive the world animate or inanimate as naught, as empty; by perceiving it in this way, one will be liberated from Death. One who perceives the world thus cannot be seen by Death.

The wrong view of a personal identity as “oneself” which is the mistaken concept of the present body (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), must be discarded and all conditioned phenomena should be viewed as insubstantial and not-self (anatta), and in truth and reality, a mere nothingness. When this right perception has struck root, death is conquered. When the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala) is realised, the Arahata passes beyond the domain of Death. “Passing beyond Death’s domain,” is a metaphor which means attainment of Awakening. This verse has as its main object the attainment of Awakening.

After hearing this verse which culminated in the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala), Mogharāja and his 1,000 followers became Arahats, as did the previous pupils of Bāvārī. They became monastics who were summoned. Thousands among the audience gained the paths and fruitions at various levels, too. [1372]

Foremost Title Achieved

Since he became a monastic by being summoned by the Buddha, Ven. Mogharāja had the habit of wearing only inferior or poor robes that were stitched out of coarse rags, dyed poorly just enough to meet the Discipline, and stitched with inferior thread. Therefore, on one occasion, when the Buddha was holding a congregation of monastics at the Jetavana monastery, he declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakanam bhikkhunam
lūka-cīvara-dharanam yad-idam Mogharājā.*

Monastics, among my monastic disciples who always wear coarse robes of poor material, poor dye and poor thread, Ven. Mogharāja is the foremost (etad-aggā).

Bāvārī the Brahmin Teacher

Of the sixteen close pupils of recluse Bāvārī, the first fifteen, up to Mogharāja, after putting forwards their questions to the Buddha and receiving the answers, became Arahats along with their respective pupils of 1,000 each. All were monastics summoned by the Buddha. Piṅgiya, the sixteenth close pupil and a nephew of Bāvārī, who was then 120 years of age, asked the Buddha this question (Sn 1126):

*Jiṅṅham-asmi abalo vīta-vaṅṅo, nettā na suddhā savanam na phāsu,
māham nassam momuho antarāva, ācikkha Dhammam yam-aham vijaññam, jāti-jarāya idha vippahānam.*

Venerable sir, I am worn out with age, weak and wan. My eyes and ears are failing me. I do not wish to die in ignorance before having the benefit of your teaching. So please show me, here in your very presence, the supermundane Dhamma that can abandon rebirth and ageing.

Piṅgiya was very much concerned about his physical deterioration as he had attachment to his body. To gain a detached view of the body, the Buddha taught him thus (Snp 1127):

*Disvāna rūpesu vihaññamāne, ruppanti rūpesu janā pamattā,
tasmā tuvaṃ Piṅgiya appamatto,
jahassu rūpaṃ apunabbhavāya.*

Piṅgiya, the heedless multitudes are brought to ruin on account of corporeality. Having seen for yourself how corporeality is the cause of the suffering of those heedless persons, be heedful and mindful and abandon attachment to corporeality so that fresh existence may not arise.

The Buddha expounded the necessary practice (paṭipatti) that leads one to Awakening by the expression: “So that fresh existence (apunabbhava) may not arise.”

The hearer, Piṅgiya, however was old and getting mentally slow. So he did not gain Awakening at once. He put a further question in the following verse, extolling the immense wisdom of the Buddha (Snp 1128):

*Disā catasso vidisā catasso, uddhaṃ adho dasa disā imāyo, na tuyhaṃ adiṭṭhaṃ asutaṃmutaṃ, atho aviññātaṃ kiñcanam-atthi loke, ācikkha Dhammaṃ yam-ahaṃ vijaññaṃ, [1373]
jāti-jarāya idha vippahānaṃ.*

Venerable sir, in all the four cardinal directions, in all the four intermediate directions, above, and below, in all the ten directions, there is nothing whatsoever in the world that the Fortunate One does not see, hear, know, or understand. Do show me, here in your very presence, the supermundane Dhamma that can abandon rebirth and ageing.

The Buddha again pointed to the necessary practice leading to Nibbāna thus (Snp 1129):

*Tañhādhipanne manuje pekkhamāno, santāpajāte jarasā parete,
tasmā tuvaṃ Piṅgiya appamatto,
jahassu taṇhaṃ apunabbhavāya.*

Piṅgiya, the multitudes are afflicted by craving. Having seen yourself how they are worn out and ruined by the relentless process of ageing, be heedful and mindful and abandon craving for sense pleasures, for continued existence, and for non-existence so that fresh existence may not arise.

At the end of the discourse, which was directed towards the Arahāt fruition, Piṅgiya became a Non-returner (Anāgāmi-magga), having path-knowledge at the third level. While listening to the discourse, Piṅgiya's mind was wandering: he felt sorry that his uncle, Bāvarī, had missed the opportunity to hear such a profound exposition, and hence his failure to become an Arahāt. However, his 1,000 pupils became Arahats. All of them, Piṅgiya as a Non-returner (Anāgāmi) and his pupils as Arahats, were summoned as monastics by the Buddha.

The question posed by each of the sixteen pupils of Bāvarī and the Buddha's answers to them were compiled as distinct discourses by the reciters at the Council, such as the Questions of the Young Man Ajita (Ajita-māṇava-pucchā), etc. The background story and the sixteen discourses have been given the title of the Way to the Beyond because they lead to the yonder shore of Saṃsāra, to Nibbāna.

By the end of the Way to the Beyond 16,016 recluses became Arahats, i.e., all but Piṅgiya became Arahats. 140 million hearers also attained path and fruit at various levels of path-knowledge, having understood the four noble truths.

The huge audience, on the occasion of the Way to the Beyond, who came from different places, found themselves back at home at the end of the discourse due to the Buddha's powers. The Buddha returned to Sāvathī accompanied by thousands of Arahāt disciples, with the exception of Ven. Piṅgiya.

Piṅgiya's Discourses to Bāvarī

Ven. Piṅgiya did not accompany the Buddha to Sāvattthī because he had undertaken to report back his experience to his uncle. Buddha granted him permission to return to his dwelling. He appeared at the bank of river Godhāvārī by his psychic power, and thence went to his dwelling on foot.

As Bāvarī awaited the return of his nephew, sitting and watching the road, he saw Ven. Piṅgiya, in the guise of a monastic, instead of his former appearance as a recluse with the usual equipment. He rightly conjectured that the Buddha indeed had appeared in the world. When Ven. Piṅgiya got into his presence, he asked him: “How is it? Has the Buddha appeared?” – “It is true, Brahmin, the Buddha has appeared in the world. He gave us a discourse while residing at the Pāsāṅka Shrine. I shall pass on the teaching to you.” On hearing this, Bāvarī and his 500 pupils prepared a special seat for Ven. Piṅgiya, showing him great respect. Then Ven. Piṅgiya took his seat and delivered a discourse consisting of 15 verses to Bāvarī, which is known as the Verses on the Recital of the Way to the Beyond (Pārāyaṇānugīti, Snp 1130-45).<sup>296</sup> [1374]

1. “I will recite the Buddha’s Discourse on the Way Beyond (Pārāyaṇa): The Buddha who is an Arahat, untainted by the filth of delusion, endowed with vast knowledge which is comparable to the earth, released from sensuousness, barren of the forests of defilements, expounded the Dhamma as he has understood it. Why should the Buddha say something which is untrue?
2. Come, now, I will sing in praise of the Buddha, the one purified of the dirt of delusion (moha), the one purged of conceit (māna) and ingratitude (makkha).
3. Brahmin, the Buddha has dispelled the darkness of the defilements. He is endowed with the all-seeing eye. He has reached the end of the world. He has passed beyond all forms of existence. He is free of the pollutants. He has exhausted all suffering (dukkha). He has earned the name of ‘the Awakened One.’ This man, Brahmin, is the man I have resorted to.

4. Brahmin, like a bird that leaves the lowly bushes of scanty fruit and resorts to a fruitful grove, so also I have left the company of lesser minds, and like a golden swan, have reached a great lake of immense wisdom.

5. Brahmin, before the time of Buddha Gotama's teaching, religious teachers proclaimed their views to me saying: 'This is how it has always been, and this is how it will always be.' They were mere hearsay knowledge, gaining ground as oral tradition. They only serve as sources of unwholesome speculation bearing on sensuality, and so on.

6. Brahmin, that Buddha Gotama whom I have followed is unrivalled. He is committed to dispelling darkness. He has a halo around his person and sheds the light of knowledge everywhere. My teacher, Buddha Gotama, has awe-inspiring wisdom. His intelligence is infinite like the earth.

7. Brahmin, the Buddha expounded to me the Dhamma which can be personally apperceived, which is not delayed in its result, which leads to the end of craving, and to the security of Nibbāna. That Buddha, my teacher, is beyond comparison."

8-9. Thereupon Bāvarī asked Piṅgiya thus: "Piṅgiya, whereas the Buddha expounded to you the Dhamma which is personally appreciable, which is not delayed in its result, which leads to the end of craving, and to security against all defilements and, whereas the Buddha is beyond comparison; has awe-inspiring wisdom, and infinite intelligence like the earth, yet why do you ever stay away from him?"

Bāvarī scolded his nephew for not staying close to such a great man as the Buddha.

10-11. "Brahmin, that Buddha, my Teacher, expounded to me the Dhamma which can be personally perceived, which is not delayed in its result, which leads to the end of craving, and to security against all defilements. He has awe-inspiring wisdom, and infinite intelligence like the earth. In fact, I do not stay away from him even for a moment.

12. Brahmin, with mindfulness, I am seeing the Buddha in my mind as clearly as with my eyes, I am seeing him by day or by night. By night I remember his greatness with reverence. That is why I never consider myself away from the Buddha, even for a moment.

13. Brahmin, my conviction, my delightful satisfaction, and my mindfulness, never leave the Buddha Gotama’s teaching. Wherever the Buddha, endowed with infinite wisdom, goes, I bow in my mind in that direction in homage.

14. Brahmin, it is due to my old age that I am not physically able to go to the Buddha. But I always go to him in my thoughts. My mind is always connected with his presence.

15. Brahmin, I was laying in the mire of sensuousness, agitated all the time, while drifting from one island to another, while taking refuge in one teacher now, and then another teacher next. Now I have met the teacher, at the Pāsāṅka Shrine who is free of the pollutants, who has crossed over the floods of Saṃsāra.” [1375]

Ven. Piṅgiya having become a noble one (ariya), could address his uncle only as “Brahmin,” and not “uncle.” On the part of Bāvarī, he was used to calling his nephew, “Piṅgiya” and did not mean to be disrespectful to the monastic in calling him by his name.

Buddha’s Delivery of a Discourse

At the end of the fifteenth verse above, the Buddha knew that Ven. Piṅgiya and his uncle, Bāvarī, had become fit enough to receive higher knowledge, their five faculties of confidence (saddhā), energy (virīya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā) had matured, and he sent his Buddha-radiance to them while remaining at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattihī. The golden-hued radiance appeared before them. Just as Ven. Piṅgiya was describing the noble qualities of the Buddha to his uncle, he saw the golden shaft of radiance and, paying attention to it carefully, he saw the presence of the Buddha as if the Buddha was standing in front of him. “Look! The Buddha has come!” he exclaimed in wonderment.

Bāvarī then stood up and paid homage to the Buddha with palms joined and raised to his forehead. The Buddha then intensified the radiance and let his person be seen by Bāvarī. Then he made a discourse suited to both Bāvarī and his nephew, but addressed it to Ven. Piṅgiya (Snp 1152):

Yathā ahū Vakkali mutta-saddho, Bhadravudho Āḷavī Gotamo ca.

Piṅgiya, there have been monastics who became Arahats through sheer force of confidence in the Three Treasures such as Vakkali, Bhadrāvudha, who was one of the sixteen close pupils of Bāvarī, and Gotama of Āḷavī.

Evam-eva tvam-pi pamañcassu saddham, gamissasi tvaṃ Piṅgiya Maccu-dheyyassa pāraṃ.

Likewise, you should place your confidence in the Three Treasures and by directing that confidence towards Nibbāna, cross over from the other shore of Samsāra, which is the domain of Death.

At the end of the discourse, Ven. Piṅgiya became an Arahāt. Bāvarī became a Non-returner (Anāgāmi-phala) and his 500 pupils attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). Ven. Piṅgiya responded to the above admonition of the Buddha thus (Snp 1153-5):

Esa bhiiyo pasīdāmi, sutvāna munino vaco, vivaṭṭacchado Sambuddho, akhilo paṭibhanavā.

Venerable sir, the words of the Great Recluse (Mahā-muni), the Buddha, makes me deeply satisfied. My confidence in the Three Treasures is strengthened. The Buddha has removed the roof of Samsāra. He is free from the darts of the defilements. He is endowed with elaborate and analytical knowledge.

*Adhideve abhiññāya, sabbaṃ vedi varo-varaṃ.
pañhānantakaro Satthā, kañkhīnaṃ paṭijānataṃ.*

The Perfectly Awakened One, who resolves all problems and who is the teacher of those that falsely claim to be free from doubt, knows the pure ones who are superior to the greatest of Devas and humans, having understood through his extraordinary wisdom all factors that lead to purity.

*Asaṃhīraṃ asaṅkappaṃ, yassa natthi upamā kvaci, [1376]
addhā gamissāmi na mettha kañkhā, evaṃ maṃ dhārehi adhimutta-cittaṃ.*

Great Recluse, imperturbable, immutable, and beyond any standards of comparison is Nibbāna with no trace of existence remaining. And I have no doubt that I am bound for that Nibbāna. May the Fortunate One recognize me as one who has directed his confidence to Nibbāna, whose mind is free from defilements. [1377]

44: The Life Stories of the Nuns

1. Ven. Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī

Aspiration in the Past

The future Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī was born into a worthy family in the city of Haṁsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. On one occasion, she was listening to a discourse by the Buddha when she happened to see a nun being named by the Buddha as the foremost among the female monastics who were Awakened earliest.

She aspired to the same distinction in a future existence. So, she made extraordinary offerings to the Buddha and expressed that wish before him. The Buddha predicted that her aspiration would be fulfilled.

Rattaññū-puggala: one who was Awakened earliest. This is a technical term which means the monastic who is the senior-most in the Saṅgha. It also means the monastic who understands the four noble truths earliest. It also may mean the monastic who attains the Arahat fruition earliest.

The Head of Water-Carriers

The future Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī led a life of generosity and observed the moral precepts and at the end of her life she was reborn in the Deva realm. When she passed away from the Deva existence during the interval between the two Buddhas, she was reborn into the slave class in Bārāṇasī, as the head of water carriers.

Then, when the Rains Retreat period was drawing near, five Paccekabuddhas who lived in Nandamūla Cave, descended at the Deer Park near Bārāṇasī, from the sky and went into the city to gather alms food. They stayed at the Isipatana Deer Park after the alms round and discussed among themselves about seeking help in making dwelling places for use during the Rains Retreat.

A monastic, who vows to remain at a chosen place during the Rains Retreat period, is required by the Vinaya Rules to live in a dwelling with some roof, maybe made of slate, or baked tile, or cement tile, or grass or leaves, and with a door. This rule has no exception even for those monastics who have vowed to observe such austere practices as the Nālaka or Moneyya practice. If a dwelling for the purpose is not offered to them ready-made, they have to seek assistance in getting one built. This dwelling is the place where they determine to live during the three-month Rains Retreat period, and is essential for making the determination.

The five Paccekabuddhas, who had to fulfil the need for a dwelling for use during the Rains Retreat, arranged their robes in the evening and entered the city of Bārāṇasī to seek assistance. Their going into the city was noted by the chief of the water carriers. The Paccekabuddhas stood at the door of the rich man of Bārāṇasī but when they told him about their need, the rich man said: “We were not prepared to help; may the reverend ones go elsewhere.”

The chief of the water carriers met the Paccekabuddhas as they came out of the city at the gate and putting down the water pot, she made obeisance. Then she asked the purpose of the reverend ones in going into the city and coming out so soon from it. The Paccekabuddhas told her that they were seeking assistance to have a small dwelling built for use during the Rains Retreat period. And also on further inquiry, she learnt that the need was still unfulfilled. She asked them: “Is this dwelling to be the gift of only well-to-do supporters? Or is it proper for a slave like me to donate one?”

“Very well, venerable sirs, we shall donate the dwellings tomorrow. Meantime, may the venerables accept my offering of food tomorrow.”

After making the invitation, she picked up her water pot and, instead of returning to the city, she went back to the water-hole and gathered her company of water carriers there. Then she said to them: “Now girls, do you want to be slaves to others all the time? Or do you want freedom from servitude?”

They answered in unison: “We want freedom from servitude!”

She said: “If so, I have invited five Paccekabuddhas to an alms giving tomorrow. They are in need of dwellings. Let your husbands give helping hands for one day tomorrow.”

“Very well,” they all said. They told this to their husbands in the evening after the latter had come home from the forest where they worked. The men all agreed to help and made an appointment at the door of the chief of the male slaves. When they had assembled there, the head of the water carriers urged them to lend a hand in building dwellings for the five Paccekabuddhas during the Rains Retreat period, and thus extolling the great benefits of such a contribution. A few of the men, who did not agree to help at first, were admonished by her and persuaded into the task.

The next morning, the head of the water carriers offered food to the five Paccekabuddhas. After that, she signalled the 500 male slaves to start work. They promptly went to the forest, cut down trees, and each group of 100 men built a modest dwelling unit for one Paccekabuddha, complete with an adjacent walkway near to it. They filled the water pots and saw to the bare essentials in five dwellings for the five Paccekabuddhas. They then offered them to the Paccekabuddhas, requesting them to dwell there during the Rains Retreat period. Having received the consent of the revered ones, they also took turns to offer food to them daily.

If there was some poor water carrier who was unable to prepare a meal for the five Paccekabuddhas on her appointed day, the head of the water carriers would give her the necessary provisions. The three months of the Rains Retreat (Vassa) thus passed. Near the end of the Rains Retreat, the head of the water carriers asked the 500 slave girls each to weave a piece of rough cloth. The 500 pieces collected from them were exchanged for five sets of fine robes which were offered, one set to each of the five Paccekabuddhas. The Paccekabuddhas, after receiving the robes, rose to the sky in the presence of their supporters and went away in the direction of Mount Gandhamādana.

Past Existence as a Chief Weaver

These water carrier slave girls spent the rest of their life in doing meritorious deeds. On their death, they were reborn in the Deva realm. The head of the Deva girls, on her passing away, was reborn into the family of the chief weaver, in a weaver's village, near Bārāṇasī. One day, the 500 sons of Queen Padumā, all Paccekabuddhas, went to the door of the royal palace at Bārāṇasī on invitation. But there was no one to attend to them, to offer seats or to offer food. They had to return to their abode. As they left the city and were at the weaver's village, the chief weaver, who had much devotion for them and after paying obeisance to them, offered food. The Paccekabuddhas accepted her offering of food and, after finishing the meal, left for the Mount Gandhamādana. The chief weaver spent the rest of her life in deeds of merit. After passing away from that existence, she was reborn in the Deva realm or the human realm in turns.

Ascetic Life in Her Final Existence

On the eve of the appearance of Buddha Gotama, she was reborn into the Sakyan royal family as the younger daughter of King Mahā Suppabuddha in Devadaha. She was named Gotamī and was the younger sister of Princess Mahā Māyā. Court astrologers, learned in the Vedas and adept at reading human forms, marks and palmistry, after scrutinizing the distinctive bodily features of the two sisters predicted that the sons born of the two sisters would become Universal Monarchs.

When the two sisters came of age, they were betrothed to King Suddhodana and they were taken to Kapilavatthu where Princess Mahā Māyā was made the Chief Queen. Later, [1379] the Bodhisatta passed away from the Tusita Realm and was conceived in the womb of Queen Mahā Māyā. Seven days after the Queen had given birth to her son on the full moon of May (Vesākha) in 563 BCE, she passed away and was reborn in Tusita Realm with the name of Santusita. On the death of Queen Mahā Māyā, King Suddhodana made her younger sister, Gotamī, the Chief Queen.

After Queen Mahā Māyā had given birth to Prince Siddhattha, two or three days later, Queen Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī, the step mother of Prince Siddhattha, gave birth to Prince Nanda. So, at the time Queen Mahā Māyā died, Prince Siddhattha was only seven days old while Prince Nanda was only four or five days old. Queen Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī nursed her nephew, Prince Siddhattha, from her own breast, while leaving her own son, Prince Nanda, to be nurtured by nurses. She devoted her whole attention to the bringing up of her little nephew, the Bodhisatta. Later, the Bodhisatta renounced the world and attained Supreme Awakening.

While he was on his mission to bring welfare to the world, the Buddha made his first visit to Kapilavatthu. On the next day, after his arrival, he went into the city to collect alms food. His father, King Suddhodana, had the opportunity to listen to the Buddha's discourse while he was still on his alms round which resulted in him attaining Stream-entry knowledge. Then on the second day,

Prince Nanda was admitted into the Saṅgha. On the seventh day, the Buddha's son, Rāhula, was admitted as a novice.<sup>297</sup>

The Buddha spent his fifth Rains Retreat (Vassa) in Kūṭāgāra monastery in the Great Wood, near Vesālī. During that time King Suddhodana became an Arahat under the regal white umbrella at the court of Kapilavatthu and passed away the same day.

Then Queen Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī renounced the world and become a nun. Later, the 500 Queen consorts of the 500 Sakyan princes, who became monastics on the occasion of the expounding of the Discourse about the Great Assembly (Mahā-samaya-sutta, DN 20), unanimously decided to become female monastics. They made Queen Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī their spokeswoman to request the Buddha for admission into the Saṅgha. The first attempt by the Queen, the Buddha's step-mother, failed. Then she and the 500 Sakyan princesses shaved their heads, donned dyed robes, and marched on foot from Kapilavatthu to Vesālī. They sought Ven. Ānanda's support in pleading for their admission. Finally, the Buddha admitted them into the Saṅgha as female monastics or nuns.

Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī was admitted by administering the eight principal vows (garu-dhamma). The 500 Sakyan princesses were admitted by an assembly of monastics only.

Later under normal procedure, a nun had to be admitted by an assembly of female monastics also. The details about this may be found in chapter 32.

The Buddha's step-mother, Ven. Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī, became an Arahat after hearing the Discourse: 'In Brief' (Saṅkhitta-sutta, AN 8.53). The 500 female monastics later attained Awakening at various levels after hearing the Discourse giving Nandaka's Advice (Nandakovāda-sutta, MN 146).

Foremost Title Achieved

On one occasion when the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana monastery and naming the foremost female monastics, he declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvikanam bhikkhunānam
rattaññūnam yad-idam Mahā-pajāpati-gotamī.*

Monastics, among my female monastic disciples who are of long standing in the Saṅgha, Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī is the foremost (etad-agga).

Herein, the name “Gotamī” represents the Gotama clan. “Mahā Pajāpati” is the epithet which means: “Mother of great offspring.” This epithet was based on the prediction of physiognomists and palmists that, from the special features observed on her person, she was to be the mother of a Universal Monarch if she gave birth to a son, or the mother of the wife of a Universal Monarch if she gave birth to a daughter.<sup>298</sup> [1380]

The Passing of Ven. Gotamī

When Ven. Gotamī was 120 years of age, she was residing at a nunnery which was in the city of Vesālī.<sup>299</sup> The Buddha was then staying at the Great Wood monastery near Vesālī. One morning, after collecting alms food in the city and finishing her meal, Ven. Gotamī entered into the attainment of the Arahat fruition (Arahatta-phala) for a predetermined period. After rising from the absorption (jhāna) attainment, she remembered the long series of acquisitions of merits in her past existences and felt very delighted. Then she reviewed her lifespan. She saw that it had come to an end. She thought it proper to inform the Buddha at Great Wood about her approaching death, as well as bidding leave of her passing away to her colleagues who had been a source of her inspiration such as the two chief disciples and co-resident noble ones (ariya). Then only she would return to her nunnery and pass away. The same idea also arose in the minds of the 500 female monastics of Sakyan origin.

The touching events concerning the passing away of Ven. Gotamī will now be told based on: 1) The Covering of Faults (Chidda-pidhānānī, 1:12) by Mahā Visuddhārāma Sayādaw, and the Traditions (Apadāna, Thi-ap 17). Only the gist of those texts is given here.

The Buddha’s step-mother, Ven. Gotamī thought: “I am not going to live to see the passing away of my son, the Buddha, nor that of the two chief disciples, nor that of my grandson Rāhula, nor that of my nephew Ānanda. I am going to predecease them. I shall seek permission to pass away from my son, the Buddha now.” The same thoughts also occurred in the minds of the 500 nuns of Sakyan origin.

At that moment, the earth quaked violently. Unseasonable rains thundered in the sky. The guardian spirits of the nunneries wailed. The 500 nuns went to Ven. Gotamī and told her about the wailing of the guardian spirits and Ven. Gotamī told them of her plan to pass away. The 500 nuns also told her their plan likewise. They all asked the guardian spirits of the monastery to pardon them if they had offended them in any way. Then, casting her last glance at the nunnery, Ven. Gotamī uttered this verse:

I shall now proceed to the unconditioned Nibbāna where there is no ageing or death, no association with beings or things one dislikes, no separation from beings or things one holds dear.

Among those who heard these words, those who had not rid themselves of attachment, Devas and humans alike, wailed miserably.

The touching scene of their lamentation is vividly described in the Traditions (Apadāna).

When the nuns came out of their nunnery, along the main street, devotees came out of their homes, and kneeling themselves before Ven. Gotamī, wailed, expressing their deep distress. The Buddha’s step-mother, Ven. Gotamī, spoke words that help quell their sorrow.

Her words, rich with the doctrine, may be gleaned from the Traditions (Apadāna). This remark also applies to other stanzas that she was to utter later on.

She uttered nine and a half verses to allay the lamentation of the citizens of Vesālī. When she arrived before the Buddha, she informed him of her impending death and asked the Buddha’s approval to release her life-maintaining thought process, in verse, sixteen in all, beginning with the words: Ahaṃ Bhagavā te mātā tvañ-ca Vīra pitā mama, “Happy One, I am your mother, Hero, you are my father.” (Thi-ap 17, 33-49). The Buddha gave his approval in a verse. After that, she recited five verses in praise of the Buddha.

Then she asked permission of the Saṅgha, Ven. Rāhula, Ven. Ānanda and Ven. Nanda, to approve of her passing away in two verses, beginning with the words: Āsī-visālaya-same, “like a serpent’s den,” (Thi-ap 17, 58-59), describing the balefulness of sentient existence. Ven. Nanda and Ven. Rāhula who were then Arahats took the words of the great elder as inspiring spiritual urgency; but as for Ven. Ānanda, who was still training for Awakening, they caused much sorrow and lamentation. He expressed his grief in a verse beginning with: Hā santim Gotamī yā ti, “Gotamī is going, peaceful,” and the great elder solaced her nephew with words of wisdom.

Thereafter, the Buddha asked Ven. Gotamī, in the following verse, to display her [1381] supernormal powers:

Gotamī, for the sake of those who have doubts about female devotees attaining Awakening in my teaching, to enable them to shed those doubts, display your supernormal powers.

The 120 year old nun complied by showing her supernormal powers as described in the text, such as from being one becoming many; from being many becoming one; becoming visible and becoming invisible; passing through a wall or a mountain, etc. Then she walked in mid-air holding Mount Meru as the prop on which the great earth rested as an umbrella, and turned upside down this miraculous umbrella. She created an atmosphere of intense heat as when six suns arise simultaneously, etc. Having complied with the Buddha’s request, she came down and paying respects to him, sat in a suitable place. She said: “Venerable son I am 120 years of age. I have grown old, I have lived long enough. May I be allowed to pass away.”

The audience, stunned by the miraculous powers displayed by Ven. Gotamī, asked her: “Ven. Gotamī, what was the extent of the merit you performed to be endowed with such power and capability?” Then Ven. Gotamī related the successive deeds of merit she had performed since the days of Buddha Padumuttara to her last existence to them. Those events ran into a number of verses.

Then the 500 nuns rose up into the sky as a cluster of stars, captivating the eye of the audience, displayed their supernormal powers, and having obtained the Buddha’s approval to end their miraculous feats, they made obeisance to him and sat in a suitable place. They recounted to the Buddha in verses how much they owed to Ven. Gotamī. Then they asked the Buddha’s permission to pass away.

The Buddha said: “Nuns! You know the time to pass away.” Thus having obtained the Buddha’s approval, they made obeisance to him and returned to their nunnery. The Buddha, accompanied by a large company of devotees, saw Ven. Gotamī off up to the entrance to his forest abode. There, the great elder and her 500 nun disciples made their last obeisance to the Buddha together. Then the 500 nuns entered the city and sat cross-legged in their respective dwellings in the nunnery.

At that time, many male and female lay disciples of the Buddha, seeing the time had come to see the noble ones, gathered around to pay their last respects, beating their chests in great sorrow. They threw themselves down on the ground like a tree uprooted. Ven. Gotamī caressed the head of the eldest of the female devotees and uttered this verse:

Daughters, lamentation leads only to Māra’s domain and is therefore in vain. All conditioned things are impermanent; they end up in separation, they cause endless agitation.

Then she told them to go back to their homes. When alone, she entered into the first absorption (jhāna) of the form realm and then, stage by stage, till the absorption of neither-consciousness-nor-nonconsciousness, and then back, stage by stage, to the first absorption of the form realm. Thus, back and forth, she dwelt in the eight mundane absorption attainments. Then she dwelt in absorption attainment beginning from the first absorption up to the fourth absorption.<sup>300</sup> Arising from that absorption she realized the complete cessation of the aggregates, just as a lamp goes out when the oil and the wick become exhausted. The remaining 500 female monastic disciples also realized complete cessation.

At that moment, the great earth quaked violently and meteors fell from the sky. The skies rumbled with thunder. The celestial beings wailed. Celestial flowers rained from the sky. Mount Meru tottered like a dancer swaying. The great ocean roared, as if deeply troubled. Nāgas, Asuras, Devas and Brahmas expressed their spiritual urgency in such terms as: “Impermanent are all conditioned things; they have the nature of dissolution.”

Devas and Brahmas reported the death of Ven. Gotamī and the 500 nuns [1382] to the Buddha. The Buddha sent Ven. Ānanda to inform the matter to the monastics. Then, accompanied by many monastics, the Buddha joined the funeral procession which took this order: 1) Devas, humans, Nāgas, Asuras and Brahmas marched at the head, followed by; 2) the 500 golden hearses of the 500 nuns with multi-tiered roofs created by Deva Vissakamma wherein were placed the remains of the nuns on their cots, and these hearses were borne by Devas; 3) then followed the hearse of Ven. Gotamī, the Buddha's step-mother, which was borne by the Four Great Kings; 4) then followed the Saṅgha and the Buddha.

The whole route from the nunnery to the funeral ground was canopied and all along the route were placed streams, pennants, while all the ground was strewn with flowers. Celestial lotus flowers came down, thick and fast, as though they were hanging loosely in the sky. All sorts of flowers and perfumes wafted in the air. All sorts of music, singing and dancing took place in honour of the departed noble Arahats.

During the progress of the funeral procession, both the sun and the moon were visible to the people. Stars were shining in the sky. Even at noon, the sun's radiance was cool like that of the moon. In fact, the occasion of Ven. Gotamī's funeral was surrounded by even more wonderful happenings than on the occasion of the funeral of the Buddha himself. On the occasion of the Buddha's funeral the Buddha and Ven. Sāriputta and certain other elders were not there to supervise the funeral proceedings, whereas on the occasion of the funeral of Ven. Gotamī, the Buddha and the elders, such as Ven. Sāriputta, were there to supervise the proceedings.

At the charnel-ground, after the remains of Ven. Gotamī were incinerated, Ven. Ānanda picked up the relics and uttered this verse (Thi-ap 17, 79):

Gone now is Gotamī. Her remains have been burnt up. And soon the passing away of the Buddha, a most anxiously awaited event, will take place.

Ven. Ānanda collected the relics in the alms bowl used by Ven. Gotamī and presented them to the Buddha. Thereupon, the Buddha held up the relics of his step-mother for the audience to view and spoke to the assembly of humans, Devas and Brahmas thus (Thi-ap 17, 82):

Just as a big tree full of hard core, standing firmly, has a great trunk and that great trunk, being of impermanent nature, falls down, so also Gotamī who had been like a big tree trunk to the female Saṅgha is calmed now, and has entered Nibbāna.

The Buddha uttered altogether ten verses for the benefit of the audience on that memorable occasion. These ten verses with text and word-for-word meanings may be gleaned by the reader in the Covering of Faults (Chidda-pidhānānī).

2. Ven. Khemā

The story of Ven. Khemā is treated briefly in the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya), the commentary on the Verses of the Elder Nuns (Therī-gāthā) and the commentary on the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada). In the Traditions (Apādāna), however, it is related in detail by the great elder herself. What follows is mainly based on the Traditions with selections from the other three commentaries.

Aspiration in the Past

The future Khemā was born into a worthy family in the city of Haṃsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara, 100,000 aeons ago. One day, she listened to the Buddha's discourse and became a devotee of the Buddha, being established in the three refuges.

Then she had her parents' approval to offer an extraordinary feast to the Buddha and his Saṅgha. At the end of seven days of the great offering, she saw the elder nun Sujātā whom the Buddha named as the foremost female monastic in knowledge. She was inspired by that. She gave an extraordinary offering again before expressing her wish to become such a foremost female monastic herself later. Buddha Padumuttara predicted that 100,000 aeons hence she would become the foremost female monastic with regards to knowledge in the time of Buddha Gotama. [1383]

Various Existences

The future elder nun Khemā, on passing away from that existence, was reborn in five Deva realms: Tāvatiṃsa, Yāma, Tusita, Nimmānarati, and Paranimmitavasavatī successively, as Queen of the Devas. When she passed away from there, she was reborn as the Queen of a Universal Monarch or as the queen of a Great King. Wherever she was reborn, she was born as queen. She enjoyed the most glorious states in the Deva realm and the human world for many aeons.

After being reborn in the fortunate existences only, during the time of Buddha Vipassī, 91 aeons previous to the present aeon, she was reborn into a worthy family. She had the opportunity of hearing the Buddha's Dhamma which made her solely devoted to the pure life and she became a nun who was learned in the doctrine, skilful in the knowledge of conditional origination (paṭicca-samuppāda), a bold exponent of the four noble truths, and a persuasive teacher besides being diligent in the practice of the Dhamma. Thus she was a model to those who took up the threefold training in the Buddha's teaching. She spent this life of purity during her lifespan of 10,000 years.

Passing away from there, she was reborn in the Tusita Realm. After that, wherever she was reborn, the great merit which she acquired in her existence during the time of Buddha Vipassī endowed her with the best that that particular existence could offer, such as making her talented, pure in morality, rich in resources, attended by a wise following, well provided with ease and comfort. Further, the religious practices observed in that existence led her to a superior social status such as making her a queen, whether in a Deva existence or a human existence and being loved and respected by her king.

During the time of Buddha Koṇāgamaṇa, in the present aeon, she was reborn into a rich family in Bārāṇasī. Together with two other rich ladies by the name of Dhanañjānī and Sumedha,<sup>301</sup> they built a monastic complex for the Saṅgha as a whole. At their death, they were reborn in the Tāvātimsa Realm, and after that existence, they were reborn in the human world and the Deva realm, enjoying superior social status every time.

The Eldest of the Seven Daughters of King Kikī

During the time of Buddha Kassapa, in the present aeon, King Kikī of Bārāṇasī, in the province of Kāśī, was an ardent supporter of the Buddha. He had seven daughters by the names of: 1) Princess Samaṇī, 2) Princess Samaṇaguttā, 3)

Princess Bhikkhunī, 4) Princess Bhikkhadāyikā, 5) Princess Dhammā, 6) Princess Sudhammā and 7) Princess Saṅghadāsī. Later, during the time of Buddha Gotama, they became respectively 1) Ven. Khemā, 2) Ven. Uppalavaṇṇā, 3) Ven. Paṭācārā, 4) Ven. Kuṇḍalakesī, 5) Ven. Kisā Gotamī, 6) Ven. Dhammadinnā and 7) Visākhā, the donor of the Eastern monastery in Sāvattihī.

The future Ven. Khemā, Princess Samaṇī, on hearing a discourse by Buddha Kassapa, was very keen to become a nun but her father would not give her permission to do so. So, as the eldest, together with her six younger sisters, they made a common resolve not to marry and remained spinsters throughout their lives which lasted 20,000 years. They supported Buddha Kassapa with the four monastic requisites for life.

On one occasion, the Buddha made a marvellous discourse entitled the Long Discourse on Causation (Mahā-nidāna-sutta, DN 15), Princess Samaṇī was so absorbed in hearing it that she learnt it by heart, and recited it often. As the result of these good deeds, on her death, she became Sakka's Chief Queen in Tāvātimsa.

Ascetic Life in Her Final Existence

During the time of Buddha Gotama, she was reborn in her last existence as the daughter [1384] of King Maddarāja of Sāgala. Since her birth brought peace to the land, she was named “Khemā,” which means peace. When she came of age, she became the queen of King Bimbisāra and was adored by her husband. But she became conceited about her beauty.

The Buddha was then residing at the Veḷuvana monastery in Rājagaha. Queen Khemā had heard people saying that the Buddha always made discourses pointing out the faults of physical beauty, so she never went to see him for fear that her beauty might well come under his censure.

King Bimbisāra thought: “While I am the most important lay supporter to the Buddha, it is inconceivable that my queen has never visited the Buddha.” He contrived a plan by having a song composed by an able poet, in praise of the Veḷuvana monastery, which he ordered songsters to sing within earshot of the queen.

Eulogy about the Veḷuvana Monastery

1. Anyone who is not fortunate enough to see the Veḷuvana monastery, the Bamboo grove residence of the Buddha, we consider them as one who has never seen the Nandana Park of the celestial realm.
2. He or she who has seen the Veḷuvana Grove, which is so much cherished by King Bimbisāra of Rājagaha, the people's favourite ruler, the cynosure of the whole world, has truly seen the Nandana Park, the favourite resort of Sakka, the Lord of the Devas.
3. Many of the Tāvatiṃsa Devas, having abandoned the Nandana Park and descended to Jambudīpa and cast their eyes on the Veḷuvana Grove, are astonished and all their cares are forgotten, they are never satisfied with seeing it.
4. That Veḷuvana Grove has appeared due to the king's past merit and is adorned by the Buddha's majesty. What poet could adequately describe its endless merits?

When Queen Khemā heard that song, although she had been to the Veḷuvana Grove on a pleasure visit with the king, her interest in the grove was aroused afresh. She was very keen to visit it again. She asked the king's permission to go there and went there with a big retinue. She chose the hour of the day that she presumed the Buddha was surely not there, during the morning, when the Buddha usually went to the city for collecting alms food. She roamed about the Veḷuvana which was full of all kinds of flowering trees and fruit trees, where bumble bees busied themselves collecting honey, and where the cuckoos sang and the peacocks preened their feathers in the quiet seclusion of the park. She also visited the monastic dwellings of the religiously inclined men, their meeting halls, rest houses and walks.

She came across a youthful monastic sitting in meditation at the foot of a tree and thought that young man should be enjoying the pleasures of life at present and take up the religious life only in his old age. Feeling sure that the Buddha was not in his private chamber, she went near it. Instead, the Buddha knew that she would come and he had remained in his private chamber. He had created, by his powers, a young maiden whose beauty surpassed that of Queen Khemā and who was fanning him.

The Life Stories of the Nuns – 2100

When Queen Khemā saw that lovely maiden, she abandoned attachment to her own good looks but become fascinated and enamoured of the strange beauty in front of her. But even as she was gazing at the girl, due to the Buddha's powers, the beauty of the girl diminished perceptibly and within a few moments, she turned old and decrepit with wrinkled skin, gray hair, broken teeth, black spots all over the skin, floppy breasts, bony joints protruding, veins twining about the body, bent double, and soon the old woman was trembling and breathing hard struggling for life and finally she gasped and collapsed. She was dead.

This vivid sight caused spiritual urgency (samvega) in Queen Khemā. She realized thus: "Oh, this body is impure. It is indeed loathsome. Foolish women relish this [1385] impure, loathsome body."

Then the Buddha spoke to Queen Khemā in these verses:

1. "Khemā, look at the body that is afflicted with pain, impure, putrid, discharging impurities upwards and downwards, which foolish persons take so much delight in.
2. Cultivate the mind to get it fixed on an object of meditation, so as to be able to perceive the loathsomeness of the body. Be mindful of the 32 constituent parts of the body; let there be weariness about them.
3. Khemā, just as the body of this woman by my side breaks up, so too will your body break up. Just as your body seems attractive for a while before death, so too the body of this woman by my side looked attractive before she died; therefore give up attachment to the body, both internally and externally.
4. Cultivate a perception of unsubstantiality and note closely the rising and falling of phenomena. Give up the notion of a self, by doing so, you will quell the eleven fires burning in you and reach Nibbāna.
5. Just as the spider follows the web of its own making, so also sentient beings, who have attachment, follow the stream of defilements that are of their own making. The wise do not have any desire or regard for sense pleasures, but cut off the stream of defilements and go forth to Nibbāna."

The Buddha knew that after listening to the discourse, the mind of Queen Khemā was delighted and receptive, so he continued with another discourse entitled the Long Discourse on Causation (Mahā-nidāna-sutta, DN 15) which was the very discourse Queen Khemā had heard and learnt by heart from Buddha Kassapa in her previous existence as Princess Samañī. Queen Khemā remembered this discourse and she attained Stream-entry knowledge immediately.

After becoming a noble one (ariya) as a Stream-enterer, she wanted to make amends for her mistaken conceit about her beauty. She prostrated before the Buddha and submitted her apology in these five verses:

1. “All-knowing one, I pay homage to you. The embodiment of compassion, I pay homage to you. The Buddha who has crossed the flood of Saṃsāra, I pay homage to you. Giver of the deathless, I pay homage to you!
2. I had been befuddled and led astray by attachment to sensuality, thus springing forward into the thicket of wrong view. By means of an appropriate device, you, the Fortunate One, have tamed me and made me happy in being so tamed.
3. Lacking an opportunity of meeting such a great one like yourself, who is endowed with morality, concentration, etc., sentient beings experience enormous suffering (dukkha) in the ocean of Saṃsāra.
4. Even though the pure one, who has reached the purity of Nibbāna, had been staying at the Veḷuvana monastery, I had failed to come and pay homage to the Lord of the Three Worlds. That failure, on my part, I now admit to the Fortunate One as a fault.
5. I had a mistaken idea about the great benefactor to the three worlds, the bestower of the ultimate boon of the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna as one who is unprofitably censorious because I was too fond of my beauty. My fault in having entertained such foolish thoughts and my failure to come and pay homage to you earlier, I now admit to the Fortunate One as a fault.”

The Myanmar renderings are by the late Mahā Visuddhārāma Sayādaw in his Covering of Faults (Chidda-pidhānānī).

Upon admission by Queen Khemā of her previous fault, the Buddha said: “Let it be, Khemā,” which cooled her heart as though ambrosial water were poured onto her person. Then Queen Khemā made obeisance to the Buddha and respectfully left him. Back at the royal palace, she saw King Bimbisāra and addressed him thus: [1386]

1. Great conqueror with golden complexion, you had employed a most apt strategy to persuade me to visit the Veḷuvana monastery. Marvellous indeed was your idea! I had become keenly desirous of seeing the Veḷuvana, with the consequence that I have seen with both my physical eye and the eye of wisdom the Buddha, the great sage.

2. King! If you would agree, I would become a nun in the teaching which is replete with the eight marvels of the Buddha of unrivalled wisdom, of the embodiment of the highest virtues. Thanks to the wise words of the Buddha, I have gained insight into the tiresome nature of my body.

On hearing the two verses spoken by Queen Khemā, King Bimbisāra, who had recognised even from her mien that she was a noble one (ariya), one who had attained path-knowledge, raised his joined palms to his forehead and said to his queen: “My dear queen, I allow you to become a nun. May your renouncing of the world come to its fulfilment, may you become an Arahāt.” Thereupon the king put Queen Khemā on a golden palanquin and sent her to the nunnery in great state.

Ven. Khemā Gains Awakening

On the fifteenth day of her monastic life, Ven. Khemā, during the Observance Day (Uposatha), contemplated on the lamp in front of her, how the flame arose and how it went out. A keen spiritual urgency took place in her mind. Applying the insight into the nature of the rise and fall of the flame to all conditioned phenomena, such as the mind-body complex that constituted her present existence, she gained Awakening together with the four discriminations and the six supernormal powers.

This account of the elder nun Khemā attainment of Awakening is as described in the Traditions about the Elder Nun Khemā (Khemā-therī-apādāna, Thi-ap 18). The commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya) and the commentary on the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada) tell this event in a somewhat different manner.

Ven. Khemā was devoted both to the learning and to the practice of the doctrine and so she was most proficient in the seven stages of purity, and was unrivalled in the exposition of the ten subjects of discussion (kathā-vatthu), most erudite in the application of the Abhidhamma method, outstanding both in learning and practice. The veracity of these statements may be gauged from the Discourse about Khemā (Khemā-sutta, SN 44.1).

Ven. Khemā Gives a Discourse to the King

At one time, when the Buddha was staying at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattihī, Ven. Khemā was making a tour of the Kosalan country, and was sojourning at Torāṇa, which lay between Sāvattihī and Sāketa. At that time, King Pasenadi of Kosala was camping for the night at Torāṇa. Then the king said to a courtier: “Make inquires in this place which ascetic or Brahmin is fit for my spiritual guidance today.” The courtier made thorough inquires in Torāṇa but could find no ascetic or Brahmin whom the king should go to for spiritual guidance. He only saw Ven. Khemā who happened to be sojourning there.

He went back to the king and said: “There is no ascetic or Brahmin in this place. But there is a nun named Khemā, a disciple of the Buddha. She is reported to be wise, skilful, learned, an expounder of the doctrine in a fascinating way, endowed with a remarkable perspicacity. I would humbly suggest that your majesty go to her for advice and guidance.” The king accepted the advice and went to Ven. Khemā. He made obeisance to her and sitting in a suitable place, addressed Ven. Khemā thus:

“Ven. Khemā, does a sentient being exist after death?”

“Great King,” replied Ven. Khemā, “the Buddha does not say that a sentient being exists after death.” [1387]

“If so, Ven. Khemā, does a sentient being not exist after death?”

“Ven. Khemā, does a sentient being both exist as well as does not exist after death?”

“Great King, the Buddha does not say that a sentient being both exists as well as does not exist after death.”

“If so, Ven. Khemā, does a sentient being neither exist nor does not exist after death?”

The king was at his wit’s end. He further put questions which were replied to as follows: “Ven. Khemā, when I asked: ‘Does a sentient being exist after death?’ you replied: ‘Great King, the Buddha does not say that a sentient being exists after death!’ When I asked: ‘If so, Ven. Khemā, does a sentient being not exist after death?’ you replied: ‘Great King, the Buddha does not say that a sentient being does not exist after death.’ When I asked: ‘Ven. Khemā, does a sentient being exist as well as not exist after death?’ you replied: ‘Great King, the Buddha does not say that a sentient being exists as well as does not exist after death.’ When I asked: ‘If so, Ven. Khemā, does a sentient being neither exist nor not exist after death?’ you replied: ‘Great King, the Buddha does not say that a sentient being neither exists nor not exist after death.’ Now, Ven. Khemā, why does the Buddha not say anything regarding these four questions? What is the reason for the Buddha’s refusal to answer these four questions?”

Ven. Khemā then said: “Great King, in that case, let me put a question to you. You may answer it as you wish. What do you think of what I am going to say now? Do you have within your dominion any man who can practically count things or an arithmetician who can say: ‘There are such and such number of grains of sand in the river Ganges?’ Or who can say: ‘There are so many hundreds, so many thousands, so many 100,000s of grains of sand in the river Ganges?’ ”

“Great King, do you have any man who can practically count things or an arithmetician who can say: ‘There are so many vessels or bowls of water in the great ocean.’ Or who can say: ‘There are so many hundred, so many thousands, so many 100,000s of bowls of water in the great ocean?’ ”

“Even so, Great King, the Buddha has given up corporeality which may be referred to as a sentient being; he has eradicated it completely. He has made it like an uprooted palm tree, has rendered it incapable of coming into being again, and has made it impossible to arise in the future.

The Buddha, who is liberated from being called an aggregate of corporeality or the phenomenon of materiality, is endowed with attributes and dispositions or intentions which are as great as the great ocean, beyond measure, incomprehensible. As for the Buddha, the statement: ‘A sentient being exists after death,’ is an irrelevant statement; the statement: ‘A sentient being does not exist after death,’ is equally irrelevant; the statement: ‘A sentient being exists as well as does not exist after death,’ is equally irrelevant; the statement: ‘A sentient being neither exists nor does not exist after death,’ is equally irrelevant.”

It is not proper for the Buddha to say that a sentient being exists after death; or, a sentient being does not exist after death; or, that a sentient being exists as well as does not exist after death; or, that a sentient being neither exists nor [1388] does not exist after death. This is a very profound matter.

“The Buddha has given up sensation ... perception ... volitions ... consciousness, which may be referred to as a sentient being; has eradicated it completely, has made it like a palm tree stump, has rendered it incapable of coming into being again, and has made it impossible to arise in the future.

The Buddha who is liberated from being called the aggregate of consciousness or the phenomenon of consciousness is endowed with attributes and dispositions or intentions which are as great as the great ocean, beyond measure, incomprehensible. As for the Buddha the statement: ‘A sentient being exists after death,’ is an irrelevant statement; the statement: ‘A sentient being does not exist after death,’ is equally irrelevant; the statement: ‘A sentient being exists as well as does not exist after death,’ is equally irrelevant; the statement: ‘A sentient being neither exists nor does not exist after death,’ is equally irrelevant.”

That was the discussion that took place between the Kosalan King and Ven. Khemā for the second round. Explanations regarding this will be given later.

King Pasenadi of Kosala was delighted with the words of Ven. Khemā. He made obeisance to her and respectfully departed. Later on, the king visited the Buddha and put the same questions as he did to Ven. Khemā. The Buddha answered them just as Ven. Khemā did.

When the king found that the Buddha’s answers and those of Ven. Khemā were exactly the same, down to the letter, he was greatly astonished and exclaimed:

“Marvellous it is, venerable sir! Astounding it is! The Buddha’s exposition is exactly the same as that of his disciple, both in meaning and in words. They are in full agreement without any discrepancy. Venerable sir, I had once put these questions to Ven. Khemā and she had answered me in exactly the same way, both in essence and in words. Marvellous it is, venerable sir! Astounding it is! The Buddha’s exposition is exactly the same with that of his disciple, both in meaning and in words. They are in full agreement without any discrepancy.” Then he begged leave of the Buddha. He was greatly delighted with the Buddha’s answers. He rose, made obeisance to the Buddha and respectfully departed.

Explanation of the Discourse

Why did the Buddha not give any reply to the questions which are so framed: “That a sentient being exists after death;” “That a sentient being does not exist after death;” “That a sentient being exists as well as does not exist after death;” “That a sentient being neither exists nor does not exist after death”?

1. There is, in truth and reality, nothing in the sentient world other than the five aggregates. There is nothing, in the ultimate sense a sentient being. Therefore, whether a “sentient being” exists or does not is not for the Buddha to say, see the First Discourse concerning Sāriputta and Koṭṭhita (Paṭhama-sāriputta-koṭṭhika-suttam, SN 44.3).

2. Only to one, who does not understand the nature of the five aggregates according to the four noble truths does there arise the problem of a sentient being and its existence or non-existence, in the said four questions, which occur to him due to wrong view. To one who understands the four noble truths there is no wrong view that gives rise to these four questions. Since the Buddha has the most complete understanding of the four noble truths there do not arise in him these four questions. That is why he does not say anything about them, see the Second Discourse concerning Sāriputta and Koṭṭhita (Dutiya-sāriputta-koṭṭhika-suttam, SN 44.4).

3. Such a question, based on wrong views, arises only in one who has not got rid of attachment, or craving for the five aggregates. To one who has no craving for the five aggregates, they do not occur. The Buddha, who has rid of craving for the five aggregates together with any trace of acquired habit, does not have these wrong concepts. Therefore, he remained silent when these questions were asked, see the Third Discourse concerning Sāriputta and Koṭṭhita (Tatiya-sāriputta-koṭṭhika-suttam, SN 44.5). [1389]

In the sixth discourse of the same Thematic Discourses, the Fourth Discourse concerning Sāriputta and Koṭṭhita (Catuttha-sāriputta-koṭṭhika-suttam, SN 44.6), the four questions are dealt with adequately.

In the Discourse about Khemā (Khemā-sutta, SN 44.1), Ven. Khemā’s answer was somewhat different; it had the undercurrent of reference to the Buddha. This was because she knew that the questioner, the Kosalan King, had the Buddha in mind when asking the four questions. So, Ven. Khemā’s answer in essence was: The Buddha, by getting rid of the cause of the five aggregates, got rid of the five aggregates so that what was usually called a “sentient being” was not coming into being after his death. He was freed from a future set of five aggregates, therefore, there was nothing that might be referred to as a being or a person. Since the Buddha knew this, a sentient being after death was irrelevant for him to speak of. Therefore, he remained silent about the four questions.

One might argue thus: Since the Buddha would not acquire a fresh set of the five aggregates, it is understandable that he refused to answer the first question: “Does a sentient being exist after death?” But why did he refuse to answer the second question: “Does a sentient being not exist after death?” Shouldn’t he say: “No, it does not”? He refused to answer this question too because a “sentient being” is not a real thing in the ultimate sense.<sup>302</sup> The Discourse about Khemā (Khemā-sutta, SN 44.1) is one of the most profound in the Dhamma. It is a matter for further inquiry for the virtuous.

Foremost Title Achieved

The discourse to the Kosalan King at Torāṇa was the immediate cause of Ven. Khemā’s being designated by the Buddha as the foremost female monastic in possession of profound knowledge. On one occasion, when the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana monastery, in a monastic congregation, while naming outstanding nuns as foremost in their own areas of proficiency, he declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvikanānaṃ bhikkhunīnaṃ
mahā-paññānaṃ yad-idaṃ Khemā.*

Monastics, among my female monastic disciples who have profound knowledge, Khemā is the foremost (etad-agga).

This declaration accorded her by the Buddha also had been happily recorded by Ven. Khemā herself in the following verses, in her own life history (Thi-ap 18, 89-91):

1. After I became a nun, I explained to King Pasenadi of Kosala in accordance with the doctrine on the profound questions he put to me at a place called Toraṇa.
2. Later the king approached and put these same questions to the Buddha, and he answered these profound questions exactly as I had answered.
3. The conqueror of the five deaths (māra), the supreme one among all men, being satisfied with my excellence in expounding the Dhamma, has designated me as the foremost female monastic among the eminently wise.

3. Ven. Uppalavaṇṇā

Aspiration in the Past

The future Uppalavaṇṇā was born into a worthy family in the city of Hāmsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. On one occasion, she listened to a discourse by the Buddha in the midst of a big audience, where she saw the Buddha name a nun as the foremost among those endowed with supernormal powers. She aspired to become such a great nun in the future. She made an extraordinary offering to the Buddha and his Saṅgha for seven days. At the end of seven days, she placed seven bunches of lotus flowers at the feet of the Buddha as her tribute and expressed her aspiration to be the foremost female monastic among those endowed with supernormal powers. Buddha Padumuttara predicted that her aspiration would be fulfilled. [1390]

Various Existences

After passing away from that existence in which she made a lifelong dedication to the Buddha and the Saṅgha, she was reborn in the Tāvātimsa Realm. Next, she was reborn in the human world where she offered lotus flowers and alms food to a Paccekabuddha.

Ninety-one aeons ago, there appeared Buddha Vipassī during which period the future Ven. Uppalavaṇṇā was born into a rich man's family in Bārāṇasī. She invited the Buddha and the Saṅgha to her residence and made an extraordinary offering of food. Making a gift of lotus flowers to Buddha Vipassī, she mentally wished for personal charm in her future existences.

Various Existences

After passing away from that existence, and as a result of her meritorious deeds, the rich man's daughter was reborn as a Deva, and subsequently in the Deva or human existence. During the time of Buddha Kassapa, in the present aeon, she was the second of the seven daughters of King Kikī of Bārāṇasī and was named Princess Samaṇaguttā. In that existence she, like her eldest sister, the future Ven. Khemā, remained a spinster for life, which lasted 20,000 years. They donated a monastic complex to the Saṅgha. At her death, she was reborn in the Deva realm again.

After passing away from the Deva realm, she was reborn into a worthy family in the human world. During that existence, she donated a gold coloured piece of cloth to an Arahat, who was a disciple of Buddha Kassapa.

She passed away from that existence to be reborn as Ummānantī, the exquisitely beautiful daughter of a rich Brahmin named Tiriṭivaccha in Ariṭṭhapura, in the Province of Sivi.

For details refer to the Birth Story about the Wealthy Man's Daughter Ummānantī (Ummānantī-jātaka, Ja 527).

Her next existence was as the daughter of a farmer in a small village. Early one morning, as she went to the farm house, she found in a pond, on her way, a freshly blooming lotus flower. She went into the pond and plucked it. In the farm house she gathered some ears of rice and roasted them into popcorn. She put the popcorn in a lotus leaf which was gathered from the pond.

At that moment, a Paccekabuddha, after rising from the attainment of cessation in his dwelling, came by way of the air and stood not far away from the farmer's daughter. She saw him and went to the farm house to get the popcorn and the lotus flowers, and she then put the popcorn into the Paccekabuddha's alms bowl, covered it with a lotus flower, and offered it to him.

The Life Stories of the Nuns – 2110

After the Paccekabuddha had gone on awhile, she thought: “A Paccekabuddha has no use for a flower, perhaps I should get it back and wear it.” Hence, she followed after the Paccekabuddha and then asked for the lotus flower back. But then she pondered: “Well, if the Paccekabuddha did not want my gift of the flower, he would have refused to accept it at the beginning. Now that he allowed me to put it on his alms bowl, he must have liked it as a gift.” So thinking, she placed the flower back into the alms bowl.

For this wavering act, her future existences, as we shall see, were marked by mixed fortunes.

Having thus returned the gift of the lotus flower, and admitting her fault for taking it back earlier, she expressed her wish: “Venerable sir, for offering this popcorn may I be blessed with 500 sons in my future existence. This is equal to the number of popcorn flowers that make up my gift. Furthermore, for my gift of the lotus flower, may lotus flowers rise up from the earth to receive every step I make in my future existences!”

According to the life history of Uppalavaṇṇā, while the farmer’s daughter was [1391] making her offerings to the Paccekabuddha, 500 farm workers, who were watching the field, offered some honey to the Paccekabuddha and made their wish that in a future existence they be reborn as the sons of the young lady.

The Paccekabuddha then rose into the sky even while the girl was watching him and returned to Mount Gandhamādana where he placed the lotus flowers at the entrance to Nandamūla Cave, for use by all Paccekabuddhas as a doormat at the foot of the flight of steps.

Queen Padumā Devī

As the result of that good deed, when future Ven. Uppalavaṇṇā passed away from that existence, she was reborn in an instantaneous full-grown birth as a Deva. There, in her own existence, a lotus flower arose from the earth at her foot at every step she made. When she passed away from that Deva existence, she was reborn in the human world from a lotus flower in a big lake of lotus flowers at the foot of a mountain. A recluse living nearby, early one morning, went to the lake to wash his face and saw a lotus flower in bud which was already bigger than the other buds. While the other buds had opened up their petals into full bloom, this bud remained closed. He thought it strange and so he went into the lake and plucked it.

While in his hand, the big bud opened its petals and inside he saw a female child lying. He felt a strong sense of paternal love for the child. He took her to the hermitage along with the lotus flower and put her on a small cot. Thanks to the past merits of the baby girl, milk oozed out from the big thumb of the recluse with which he nursed her. When the first lotus flower that she lay on became withered, a new lotus flower was placed underneath her.

When the young girl could walk and romp about, lotus flowers appeared from the earth under her feet wherever she went. She had a saffron-coloured complexion. Her personal charm was superhuman and would nearly equal that of a Devakaññā. Since she was born from the lotus, her foster father, the good recluse, named her Padumavatī, “Endowed with Lotus.” Whenever the recluse went out in search of fruit, she was left alone at the hermitage.

When Padumavatī came of age, one day, when the recluse was out gathering fruit, a hunter who happened to come to the hermitage saw her and thought: “There is no human being on earth as beautiful as this girl. I must find out what she is.” And so he waited for the return of the recluse. When the recluse was seen returning, the girl went out to meet him, took the yoke laden with fruits and the water pot from him, had her foster father seated and attended on him lovingly.

The hunter was now sure that the girl was, in fact, a human being, and after paying homage to the recluse, he sat nearby. The recluse gave him fruits and water, and then asked him: “Are you going to stay in the forest or, are you going back to your home?”

The hunter said: “I have no business in the future, sir, I am going back to my home.”

“Could you keep the experience of your meeting with the girl to yourself without letting anyone know about it?”

“If you would rather not let others know about this, sir, why should I tell others?” But he said this merely to please his kind host.

On his way home, after paying respects to the recluse, he carefully marked the trees and arranged some branches along the way from the hermitage so that he could easily recognize the path back.

Back at the city, he went to see the king who asked the purpose of his visit. He said: “Great King, I am your humble servant, a hunter. I come to report to you the presence of a most remarkable woman in the forest at the foot of the mountain, who would surely be an asset for your majesty.” He explained the circumstance of his discovery to the king. The [1392] king was deeply interested. He marched to the foot of the mountain without losing time. Having encamped at a place not far away from the hermitage, he waited till the recluse had finished his meal and went to see the recluse, accompanied by a few courtiers. The recluse was then sitting in his hermitage where the king greeted him, exchanged courteous words and sat in a suitable place.

The king made offering to the recluse, of articles used by recluses. And then he said: “Venerable sir, what is the use of living here? Let us go to the city.” – “I am not going, Great King,” said the recluse. “You may go.” To which the king said: “Very well, venerable sir, but I am given to understand that there is a woman in your company. It is not proper for a woman to be living in the company of a recluse. I would request that the woman be allowed to go with me.”

To this direct request made by the king the recluse replied: “It is not easy for one to please many people. How could my daughter fit in with the court life with its many queens and ladies in waiting?” The king allayed the fear of the recluse, saying: “Venerable sir, if I am allowed to marry her and have given my love to her, I will make her my Chief Queen.”

Thereupon the recluse called his daughter, as he usually addressed her since childhood: “Padumavatī, my little girl!” Young Padumavatī promptly responded; she came out of the hermitage and, saluting her father, stood before him, who said: “Dear girl, you have come of age. From the moment the king has cast his eyes on you, you should not stay here any longer. Go along with the king, my girl.” – “Very well, dear father,” she said, weeping, and still standing.

The King of Bārāṇasī, wishing to prove his sincerity, showered Padumavatī with gold, silver and jewellery and anointed her as his Chief Queen immediately.

At the court of Bārāṇasī, the king's heart was captivated by the Chief Queen so much so that since her arrival, all the other queens and ladies-in-waiting were totally neglected by the king. The womenfolk felt bitter about this and they tried to undermine the king's affection for the Chief Queen, saying: "Great King, Padumavatī is not a human being. Where on earth have you ever seen a human being whose every step is received by a lotus flower arising from the earth? She is a demon, for sure. She is dangerous. She ought to be banished forthwith!" But the king did not say anything.

At another time, when the king was called away by duty to suppress a rising in a remote part of the kingdom, he had to leave behind Padumavatī at the palace, knowing that she was pregnant. The womenfolk at court seized this opportunity to strike. They bribed Padumavatī's attendant into a wicked plot. She was instructed to remove the infant when the Chief Queen gave birth to her child and replace it with a piece of wood smeared with blood.

When Padumavatī delivered the child, Prince Mahā Paduma was the real offspring whom she gave birth to, as he was the only child conceived in her womb. The other sons, 499 of them, arose from the drops of her blood splattered about at child birth. The attendant duly carried out the instruction and informed the news of the Chief Queen's delivery to the other queens. The 500 womenfolk at the court stole one child each while their mother was still resting after her labour. Then they ordered 500 wooden caskets, made by turners, to put each child in one. They placed them inside the caskets, and put seals on each.

When Queen Padumāvātī woke up and asked her assistant about her child, the latter frowned and retorted: "When did you ever give birth to a child? This is what you have delivered," and produced the piece of wood smeared with blood. The queen was very unhappy and asked her to put it away quickly. The woman quickly complied as if eager to safeguard the queen's honour by splitting up the piece of wood and throwing it into the fireplace in the kitchen.

The king returned from his expedition and was camping outside the city waiting for an [1393] auspicious time, according to the astrological calculations. The women-folk went to greet the king there and pressed their case for banishing Queen Padumāvātī. "Great King, you did not believe our word about the Chief Queen. But now ask the assistant of Queen Padumāvātī who has given birth to a block of wood!” The king, without investigating the matter, believed that Padumavatī was a demon and ordered her banishment.

As she was banished from the palace, no lotus flowers appeared underneath her feet. Her good looks left her. She roamed about in the road, feeling forlorn. When an old woman saw her, she had an instinctive affection for her and said: “Where are you going, my daughter?” Padumavatī replied: “Mother, I am looking for some place for shelter.” The old woman said: “In that case, my daughter, come with me to my house,” and taking her home, fed her and put her up there.

When Padumavatī was staying at the old woman’s house, the women-folk at the court said to the king in one voice: “Great King, when you were on your military expedition, we invoked the guardian spirit of the river Ganges for your success and promised to make him offerings on your victorious return. So let the king and all of us go to the river Ganges and make offerings to the river spirit and have fun bathing in the river.” The king gladly consented and they all went to the river.

The 500 women of the court secretly carried the caskets with babies in them and went into the water with their garments on, underneath which were the hidden caskets. Once in the river, they released the caskets which floated downstream in the river. The 500 caskets grouped together in the current, floated down together, and were caught in a fishermen’s net downstream. After the king had finished bathing in the river, the fishermen also raised their net from the water and to their great surprise, found the 500 caskets, which they presented to the king. The king asked them: “What do the caskets contain?” And they answered: “We do not know what is inside them, Great King, we only believed it to be something strange.” When the 500 caskets were opened under the king’s orders, the first one to be opened happened to contain Prince Mahā Paduma.

The past merit of the 500 princelings was such that from the day of their confinement in the caskets, milk flowed from their thumbs to nourish them. Sakka also cleared the doubts in the king’s mind by inscribing inside the caskets the message: “These babies are born of Queen Padumāvātī and are the sons of the King of Bārāṇasī. They have been put inside the caskets by the 500 queens and their accomplices, who bore a grudge against the Chief Queen, and have them thrown into the river. Let the King of Bārāṇasī know these facts.”

The king, being thus enlightened, took up Prince Mahā Paduma, and ordered: “Men, harness the chariots and dress up the horses quickly! I shall now go into the city and show my love to some womenfolk.” So saying, he rode hastily into the city, entered his palace, and ordered the royal elephant fitted, for a tour of the land with a velvet bag of 1,000 pieces of money tied at the neck of the elephant, and ordered the proclamation read aloud to all the people, announcing that whoever has seen Queen Padumāvatī may take the king’s reward of 1,000 pieces of money.

Padumavatī, on hearing the proclamation, said to the old women: “Mother, take that 1,000 from the neck of the royal elephant!” The old women said: “Daughter, I dare not do it.” Padumavatī urged her thrice to do so. Then the old lady said: “Daughter, what should I say in taking the reward?” Just say, mother: “I have seen Queen Padumāvatī!” The old lady then made herself bold to claim the reward.

The king’s men asked her: “Have you actually seen Queen Padumāvatī?” – “I have not seen her myself,” she said, “but my daughter has.”

“Where is your daughter now?” the men asked. And they were let to her house by the old lady. They recognized their queen and prostrated themselves before her. The old lady, [1394] seeing only now the real identity of the young woman, affectionately chided her: “This noble lady has been so reckless. Notwithstanding her eminent position as the Chief Queen, she had chosen to live unattended in such a lowly place.”

The king’s men then made an enclosure of white cloth around the humble house which Padumavatī was staying, posted guards around it, and reported their discovery to the king. The king sent a golden palanquin to her.

Padumavatī, however, insisted that she deserved more ceremony on returning to the palace. She had a canopied walk decorated with gold stars set up all along the way to the palace with exquisite carpets. She also demanded that her regal paraphernalia be sent to her. “I am walking there,” she said, “let my greatness be seen by all the citizens.” The king ordered that every wish of the Chief Queen must be complied with. Then Queen Padumāvatī, outfitted with full regalia, announced: “I am now going to the palace.” Thereupon every step she made, a lotus flower arose from the earth through the exquisite carpets. Thus letting all the people witness her greatness as she entered the palace. After that, she gave the rich carpets to the old lady as a token of the gratitude she owed to her.

The king summoned the 500 women-folk to court and said to Queen Padumāvātī: “My Queen, I give these 500 women as slaves to you.” The queen said: “King, let the whole city know about this giving of the 500 ladies to me.” The king had the fact of this assignment of the 500 women to Queen Padumāvātī proclaimed throughout the city by the beat of the gong. Having been satisfied with the public knowledge of the assignment, Queen Padumāvātī said to the king: “Great King, do I have the authority of emancipating my own slaves?” To which the king replied: “Queen, you have the right to do whatever you wish with them.” – “In that case, king,” she said, “let those men, who had made the proclamation of the assignment, make another round of proclamation to the effect that all the 500 slaves assigned to Queen Padumāvātī are hereby granted their freedom by the queen.” Then the queen entrusted the 499 princelings to the care of the emancipated women while she took charge of looking after Prince Mahā Paduma.

When the 500 princelings were of playing age, the king provided all sort of things in the royal gardens for the boys to play with. When they were sixteen years of age, one day, while they were playing in the royal lakes, where the lotuses (paduma) were growing in profusion, they observed the blossoming of the lotus flowers as well as the withering away and dropping off of old flowers which, thanks to their acquisition of sufficient merit, struck their young hearts as a phenomenon worth reflecting on. And this was how they reflected: “Even these lotus flowers, dependent only on temperature and nutrient, are subject to ageing; how could our bodies, dependent on four factors: productive deeds (kamma), mind, temperature and nutrient, escape the same fate? We are likewise subject to ageing and death.”

They reflected deeply on that phenomena of the impermanence of conditioned existence, gained insight into the nature of mind-and-matter, and attained Awakening on their own, without being taught by anyone. This is called the knowledge of Independent Awakening (Pacceka-bodhi-ñāṇa), which leads to the four noble path-knowledges. In other words, they became Paccekabuddhas. Then rising from their respective seats, they each sat cross-legged on a lotus flower by means of their supernormal powers.

Late in the evening, the attendants of the princelings reminded them: “Lords, it is time to go home.” The 500 Paccekabuddhas did not say anything. So the attendants went to the palace and reported the matter to the king about how the princes remained silent, all of them sitting on the lotus flowers. The king merely said: “Let my sons remain as they wish.”

The 500 Paccekabuddhas were placed under guard during the whole night as [1395] they remained sitting on the flowers. At dawn, the attendants went near them and said to them: “Princes, it is time to go home.” Then the princes, who were Paccekabuddhas, said: “We are no more princes; we are Paccekabuddhas.” The men were sceptical and said: “You say that in an irresponsible way. Paccekabuddhas are not like you, they have only two finger-breaths of hair and moustache or beard, they have recluse’s paraphernalia on them. But you have your princely garb on, with long hair and moustaches, and with regal paraphernalia on you. How could you say you are Paccekabuddhas?”<sup>303</sup> Thereupon the princes passed their hands on their heads, and lo! their appearance turned into Paccekabuddhas, and they were fully equipped with the eight requisites of a Paccekabuddha. And while the people were looking at them, they rose into the air and went in the direction of Mount Gandhamādana.

Queen Padumāvati, after enjoying deep satisfaction on regaining her 500 sons, was now shocked by the sudden loss of them again, and she did not survive the shock.

Existence as a Farm Hand

After passing away from that existence, she was reborn, as a woman, into a family of labourers, in a village near a city gate in Rājagaha. She married, and went to live with her husband’s family. One day, while she was carrying some gruel for her husband, who was working in the field, she saw eight of the 500 Paccekabuddhas travelling through the air. She went quickly to her husband and said: “Lord, look at those Paccekabuddhas! Let us invite them to an offering of aims food.” But the husband, who was a simpleton, did not know what a Paccekabuddha was. He said to her: “Dear wife, they are called monastic-birds.

They are also found in other places too, and at other times are also seen flying about. They are not Paccekabuddhas, they are just strange birds.”

As the couple were still discussing this, the eight Paccekabuddhas descended to the ground not far away from them. The wife offered her share of meal for the day to the eight Paccekabuddhas and invited them for the next day’s offerings. The Paccekabuddhas said: “Very well, supporter, let your offerings be for eight recipients only. And let your accommodation be for eight invitees only. When you see many other Paccekabuddhas besides ourselves, your devotion will grow even greater.” Then the woman who in her previous existence had been the mother of the Paccekabuddhas, prepared eight seats and offerings for eight Paccekabuddhas.

The eight invitees said to the remaining Paccekabuddhas: “Do not go elsewhere today for alms food, but bestow welfare to your mother in your previous existence.” Those other Paccekabuddhas agreed, and all the 500 of them went through the sky to their former mother’s residence. The mother in her past existence who had wished to see all the 500 sons, now Paccekabuddhas, did not have any worry about the insufficiency of her offerings. She invited all 500 into her house and offered eight seats. When the eight had taken their seats the ninth Paccekabuddha created another eight seats through his supernormal powers and sat there; and so on until the last of the 500 was seated and her house was expanded through their supernormal powers.

The farm labourer, the mother in the previous existence, who had prepared alms food for eight Paccekabuddhas went on serving it to all 500, and as much as needed by them. Then she brought eight stalks of lotus flowers, and placing them before the original eight invitees, offered them, saying: “Venerable sirs, for this act of merit, may I be born with a complexion like the colour of the inside of the pollen chamber of this brown lotus.” The 500 Paccekabuddhas said complimentary words for her good deed, and went back to Mount Gandhamādana through the sky.

Ascetic Life in Her Final Existence

The farm hand, who was the future Ven. Uppalavaṇṇā, lived a life full of meritorious deeds and at the end of her lifespan was reborn in the Deva realm. During the time of Buddha Gotama, she was reborn into the family of a rich man in Sāvattḥī. She was born with a complexion like the inner side of the pollen chamber of the brown lotus and hence was [1396] named Uppalavaṇṇā. When she came of age, all the worthy families, rich men and princes of the whole of Jambudīpa, asked her father to give Uppalavaṇṇā in marriage to their sons.

Her father was in a quandary, he did not know how to reply to so many proposals from the worthy men. Not wishing to disappoint them, as a final resolve, he asked his daughter: “Dear daughter, would you become a nun?” Now Uppalavaṇṇā, being the bearer of the last burden of sentient existence, was extremely delighted to hear these words, as though rarefied scented oil, refined 100 times over, were poured upon her head. “Yes, father, I would like to become a nun,” she replied gladly.

As such, he sent his daughter Uppalavaṇṇā to the nunnery, after paying great honour to her. Uppalavaṇṇā became a nun. Not long after, she was assigned to tidy up and light up the outside of the Hall of Discipline (Sīmā). There she observed the flame arising in a lamp which she used as her subject of meditation. She concentrated on the element of heat in that flame, and achieved absorption (jhāna). Basing that concentration as object of insight meditation, through contemplating the three characteristics of physical and mental phenomena, she gained insight into conditioned phenomena and soon became an Arahāt. As the result of her past aspiration to be outstanding in supernormal powers, she became endowed with facility in absorption practice, which is the essential asset in bringing into effect her supernormal powers.

Foremost Title Achieved

The day Ven. Uppalavaṇṇā displayed her miraculous powers was during the Buddha’s seventh year after his Awakening. Before doing so, she first asked the Buddha: “Venerable sir, may the Fortunate One allow me to display my miraculous powers.” Referring to this, the Buddha, on another occasion when outstanding nuns were named at a congregation, declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvikanāṃ bhikkhunīnaṃ
iddhimantīnaṃ yad-idaṃ Uppalavaṇṇā.*

Monastics, among my female monastic disciples endowed with supernormal powers, Uppalavaṇṇā is the foremost (etad-aggā).

4. Ven. Paṭācārā

Aspiration in the Past

The future Paṭācārā was reborn into a rich man's family in the city of Hāmsavatī during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. On one occasion, while she was listening to a discourse by the Buddha, she saw a nun being named as the foremost among those who were most learned in the Vinaya Rules. She aspired to that honour. And after making an extraordinary offering to the Buddha, she expressed her desire for the honour of being declared as the foremost female monastic in Vinaya learning. Buddha Padumuttara predicted that her wish would be fulfilled.

One of the Seven Daughters of King Kikī

After filling her whole life with meritorious deeds, the future Ven. Paṭācārā passed away and was reborn in the Deva realm and subsequently the human world or the Deva realm in turn. During the time of Buddha Kassapa, she was reborn as the third of the seven illustrious daughters of King Kikī of Bārāṇasī. Her name was Bhikkhunī. She and the six sisters remained spinsters, living a life of chastity for their whole lifespan of 20,000 years. Together with her sisters, they donated a big monastic complex.

Ascetic Life in Her Final Existence

The king's daughter, the future Ven. Paṭācārā, after passing away from that existence, was reborn in the Deva realm. For the innumerable years of the intervening period between the two Buddhas she enjoyed celestial pleasures. During the time of Buddha Gotama, she was reborn as the daughter of a rich man of Sāvattihī.

When she came of age, she fell in love with a servant of her father's household. When [1397] her parents arranged for her betrothal to the son of another rich man, she warned her lover on the day before the betrothal, that unless he was prepared to elope with her, their love affair would be ended. The man was true to her. He eloped with her, taking whatever little savings he had set aside. The two lovers ran away stealthily and took shelter in a small village three or four leagues away from Sāvattihī.

Soon the rich man's daughter became pregnant and she said to her husband: "My lord, this is a desolate place for us to give birth to my child. Let us go back to my father's house." Her husband was a timid man. He dared not face the consequences of returning to his master's house and he therefore procrastinated. The wife then decided that her husband was not going to accompany her back to her father's house and she chose, during the absence of her husband, to return alone.

When the husband returned from his short trip and learnt that his wife had gone back to her parents' house, he felt pity for her. "She has to suffer because of me," he repented and went after her without delay. He caught up with her on the way but by then she had given birth. Then they agreed that since the purpose of her returning to her parents was for the safe birth of her child, and since she had given birth safely, there was no point in going there. So they went back to their small village.

When she was pregnant again, she asked her husband to take her to her parents' place. Her husband procrastinated as before, and getting impatient, she went alone. On the way, she gave birth to her second child safely before her husband could catch up with her. At that time, there were heavy rains everywhere. The wife asked her husband to put up some shelter from the rains for the night. He made a rickety shelter from whatever faggots he could find. He then went in search of some tufts of grass to build an embankment around the little hut. He started carelessly pulling out grass from a mound.

A cobra, which lay inside the mound, was annoyed and bit the husband who fell dead on the spot. The wife, who was waiting in the rickety hut, after waiting the whole night, thought that her husband had deserted her. She went to look for him and found him dead near the mound. "Oh, me! My husband met his death all on account of me!" She wailed. And holding the bigger child by the hand and putting the infant on her waist, she took the road to Sāvattthī.

On the way, she had to cross a shallow stream which seemed to be deep. She thought she might not be able to cross it with both the children together. So she left her elder boy on this side of the stream and after crossing it, placed the infant on the other side, wrapped up snugly. She waded the stream back for the elder son, but just as she was half-way through the stream, a hawk swooped down on the infant baby taking it for its prey. The mother became excited and tried to frighten away the hawk, but her throwing up her hands in the air was mistaken as beckoning by the elder son who ran into the stream. He slipped and was carried away by the swift current. Before the mother could reach her infant child, the hawk had flown away with it. She wailed her fate in half a verse thus:

“Both my two sons are dead and gone! And my husband too had died on the way!”

Wailing in these desperate words, she proceeded along her way to Sāvaththī. When she arrived in Sāvaththī, she was unable to find her parents’ home. This was partly due to her intense grief but there was a substantial reason for her failure to recognize her own childhood home. For, as she asked the people where the rich man’s house which used to be somewhere there, they answered: “What use is there if you find the house? It has been destroyed by last night’s gale. All the inmates of the house died inside the house when it collapsed. They were cremated on a single pyre, and that is the place of their burial,” the people showed her the thin smoke from the burnt pyre.

“What, what did you say?” Those were the only words she could say and she fainted. When she recovered, she was not in her own mind. She could not care about decency: With no clothes on, her hands raised in the air wildly, she went towards the burnt-up pyre and wailed: [1398]

“Both my two sons are dead and gone! And my husband too has died on the way! My mother, father and brother have been cremated on a single pyre.”

The rich man’s daughter went about the city naked. When other people tried to cover up her body, she would tear off the clothes. Thus, wherever she went, she was surrounded by astonished crowds. Hence, she came to be referred to as the naked woman (Paṭācārī); or in another sense of the word, the shameless woman. As she went about dazed and confused wailing the tragic verse, people would say: “Go away, mad woman!” Some would throw dirt and refuse on her head, and others would throw stones at her.

Meeting with the Buddha

The Buddha saw Paṭācārī roaming about aimlessly while he was making a discourse to an audience at the Jetavana monastery. Seeing that her faculties had now ripened, the Buddha willed that Paṭācārī come to him at the monastery.

People tried to prevent her going into the monastery but the Buddha said to them: “Don’t try to stop her.” When she went nearer, the Buddha said to her: “Paṭācārā, be mindful.”

As soon as she heard the Buddha’s words, Paṭācārā regained her senses. Aware of her nakedness, she sat down on her closed knees and remained with her body bent, and trying her best to cover up her naked body with her hands. Someone then threw to her a garment which she picked up, clothed herself, and drew near the Buddha.

In worshipping posture, she related the tragic story thus: “Venerable sir, may you be my refuge! My husband died on the way; my younger son was taken away by a hawk; my elder son drowned in the current of a stream; my parents and my brothers were killed in their house which collapsed and they were cremated on a single pyre.”

The Buddha said to her: “Paṭācārā do not vacillate. You have now come to one in whom you can take refuge. Just as you have shed tears for the loss of your husband, sons, mother, father and brother, so also had you shed much tears, even greater than the waters of the four great oceans, throughout the beginningless round of existences.” The Buddha also spoke in verse as follows:

“Paṭācārā, the waters of the four great oceans are little when compared to the amount of tears shed by one person on account of the grief suffered for loss of his or her beloved ones. Now, my daughter, why are you so negligent? Be mindful.”

On hearing the Buddha’s discourse containing a perspective on Saṃsāra, grief abated in the mind of Paṭācārā. The Buddha, knowing that Paṭācārā had been able to control her sorrow, discoursed further thus: “Paṭācārā, neither son nor husband can protect one on the journey through the afterlife, nor are they one’s refuge; that being so, even though sons or husband may be living, they are as good as non-existent for a wayfarer in Saṃsāra. Therefore a wise person should purify morality and be established in the noble practice leading to Nibbāna.” Then the Buddha spoke in verse as follows (Dhp 288-299):

“Paṭācārā, when one falls victim to death, neither one’s sons nor parents nor close relations can protect one; one’s kith and kin have no power to give protection.

Knowing this lack of protection against Death, the wise person restrained by morality, should make haste to clear the noble path that leads to Nibbāna.” [1399]

At the end of the discourse, Paṭācārā burnt up the infinite defilements and was established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga).

After becoming a Stream-enterer, Paṭācārā requested the Buddha that she be admitted into the Saṅgha of female monastics. The Buddha caused her to be taken to a nunnery and be admitted as a nun.

How Paṭācārā Became an Arahat

One day, Ven. Paṭācārā was washing her feet. As she poured down the water on her feet, the water flowed to a short distance and then stopped there. When a second cup was poured, the water flowed to a place slightly farther away than the first stream and then stopped. When a third cup was poured, the water flowed to a place slightly farther away than the second stream.

Ven. Paṭācārā, already a Stream-enterer, meditated on this phenomenon of the three streams of water, and applied it to the three periods of life thus: “Just as the first stream of water stopped after a short place, sentient beings are liable to die during their first period of life; just as the second stream flowed slightly farther than the first stream and then stopped, so also sentient beings are liable to die during their middle age; and just as the third stream flowed farther than the second stream and stopped, so also sentient beings are liable to die in their last period of life.”

She reflected further that just as all the three streams must end and disappear, so also living beings must give up their tenure of life and perish. Thus, the impermanence of things gave her insight into all conditioned phenomena. From that insight into impermanence, the characteristic of the suffering (dukkha) of all conditioned phenomena dawned on her conditioned mind and hence the non-self, the emptiness of conditioned phenomena was also perceived.

Pondering deeply on the three characteristics, she went into her monastic dwelling for a suitable change in temperature. There she placed the lighted lamp at its usual place and, wishing to extinguish it, she pulled down the wick into the oil with a pointed needle.

Just at that moment, the Buddha, while sitting in his private chamber, sent the Buddha-radiance to Paṭācārā making himself visible to her and said: “Paṭācārā, you are thinking rightly: all sentient beings are subject to death. Therefore, it is in vain to be living for 100 years without the right perception of the five aggregates, of their arising and dissolution, whereas it is really worthwhile to live even for a day with a full understanding of the five aggregates.” The Buddha put this point in verse as follows (Dhp 113):

“Paṭācārā, even if one were to live 100 years without perceiving with insight the arising and perishing of mind and body, yet more worthwhile indeed is a single day’s life of one who perceives the arising and perishing of mind and body.”

At the end of the discourse, Paṭācārā became an Arahat together with the four discriminative knowledges.

Foremost Title Achieved

After attaining Awakening, Paṭācārā learnt the Vinaya from the Buddha extensively and made wise judgments on matters concerning the Vinaya. Therefore, on one occasion when the Buddha named distinguished nuns in a congregation at the Jetavana monastery, he declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvikanānam bhikkhunīnam
Vinaya-dharānam yad-idaṃ Paṭācārā.*

“Monastics, among my female monastic disciples who are wise and adept in the Vinaya, Paṭācārā is the foremost (etad-aggā).” [1400]

5. Ven. Dhammadinnā

Aspiration in the Past

The future Dhammadinnā was born into a poor working class family in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. She was wise and virtuous. One day, when Ven. Sujāta, the chief disciple of Buddha Padumuttara, went on his alms round, she met him in the course of carrying water and personally offered him a share of her cake for the day. Ven. Sujāta, as a mark of appreciation for her devotion, and intending to bestow welfare on her due to her meritorious deed, sat down and ate the cake immediately. Ven. Sujāta had just arisen from dwelling in the attainment of cessation, a condition which is conducive to immediate fruition of the merit made.

The devotion in the slave girl grew by leaps and bounds so much that she cut her hair and sold it for whatever little price it could fetch. With that meagre but well-earned money, she bought a meal and offered it to Ven. Sujāta at her house. When the master of the slave girl heard this news, he was so pleased with her noble conduct that he gave his son in marriage to her and she became the rich man's daughter-in-law.

One day she visited the Buddha's monastery together with her mother-in-law. When listening to the Buddha's discourse, she saw the Buddha naming a nun as the foremost in expounding the doctrine. She had a great desire to be honoured with the same title in some future time. So, she made an extraordinary offering to the Buddha and his Saṅgha and aspired to that position. Buddha Padumuttara predicted that her wish would be fulfilled during the time of Buddha Gotama.

Her Existence as Royal Treasurer

The future elder nun Dhammadinnā lived a meritorious life and after her lifespan had ended, she passed away and was reborn in the Deva realm. Thereafter, she was reborn only in the human world or the Deva realm. Ninety-two aeons ago, she was reborn as the wife of a rich man, who was the official royal treasurer to three princes who were half brothers of the Buddha. She had a very generous mind so that when someone asked for one she would give two.<sup>304</sup>

One of the Seven Daughters of King Kikī

The rich man's wife had a life full of meritorious deeds. When she passed away, she was reborn in the Deva realm. During Buddha Kassapa's time, she was reborn as Princess Sudhammā, the sixth of the seven daughters of King Kikī of Bārāṇasī. Along with the other sisters, she remained unmarried, leading a noble chaste life for the whole lifespan of 20,000 years, and was a joint supporter, with her sisters, of a great monastic complex to the Saṅgha.

---

Ascetic Life in Her Final Existence

Princess Sudhammā spent the whole of her life doing meritorious deeds and at her death she was reborn in the Deva realm. Subsequently, for innumerable years, she was reborn either in the Deva realm or the human world. During the time of Buddha Gotama, she was reborn into the family of a rich man in Rājagaha. When she was of marriageable age, she married a rich man named Visākha and she was called Dhammadinnā, the rich man's wife.

Visākha and Dhammadinnā, 92 aeons ago, were also a rich couple, as the royal treasurer and wife during Buddha Phussa's time, and were noted for their liberality. Visākha, the rich man, was one of the 101 disciples of the Buddha, who gained Stream-entry knowledge on the day the Buddha arrived in Rājagaha, on the full moon in the month of January (Phussa) in the year 528 BCE. He was a close friend of King Bimbisāra.

After having become a noble one (ariya) as a Stream-enterer, Visākha, on a later occasion, listened to [1401] the Buddha's discourse and gained Once-returning (Sakadāgāmī-phala) and then on a later day Non-returning (Anāgāmi-phala). Once he became a Non-Returner, his outlook and behaviour changed visibly. For whereas he would go home with expectancy to see his wife, his face full of smiles, he was now looking staid, his mien composed and mind tranquil.

His wife Dhammadinnā was, as usual, looking through the window with a long motif carved at the sill, awaiting his return. When she saw the sedate attitude of her husband coming home, it struck her as strange. "What has gone wrong?" she thought. She went down the stairs and stretched out her hand to him at the landing. Although it was his custom to take hold of his wife's welcoming hand and go up the stairs and speak amiably together, on that day, he withdrew his hand instead of holding hers. "Perhaps I shall find out about this at the table," she thought to herself. But at the morning meal, he did not sit at table together with his wife as usual, but took his meal alone in silence, like an elderly monastic engaged in meditation. "Perhaps I shall find out about this in the evening," she thought to herself.

But when evening came, Visākha did not go into their inner chamber, instead, he had a separate room prepared for himself with a wooden cot on which he slept alone. His wife now started worrying. "Is my husband in love with another woman? Or has someone tried to cause some misunderstanding between us? Or has he seen some fault in me?” These wild unfounded speculations gnawed at her innocent heart. After two or three days she could not bear it any further, so silently and standing by his side meekly, her joined palms raised in salutation to her husband, she waited to learn how he would respond. Then he said:

“Untimely, yes, my lord, but you have changed now. What’s the matter with you? Is there another woman beside me?”

“No, Dhammadinnā, there is none.”

“Then, has someone put a wedge between us?”

“No, there is nothing of the sort.”

“In that case, do you see any fault in me?”

“No, Dhammadinnā, you have no fault whatever.”

“If so, why do you stay aloof from me as though we were total strangers and not husband and wife? You have not spoken to me much these few days.”

When confronted thus by his wife, Visākhā pondered: “The supermundane Dhamma is a profound thing, not easy to explain like mundane matters. If possible, it is better kept to oneself. But now, if I did not talk about it Dhammadinnā would certainly take it amiss and will be broken hearted.”

Thinking in this way, Visākhā said to her: “Dhammadinnā, after I listened to the Buddha’s discourses, I have comprehended the supermundane Dhamma. One who comprehends the supermundane finds mundane affairs incompatible with him. If you would agree, there are 400 million worth of treasures that your parents have endowed us with, and another 400 million worth of treasures that my parents have endowed us with, these 800 million worth of treasures, I would bequeath to you as sole owner, just be as a mother or an elder sister to me. I shall be content with whatever manner you might look after me. Or, if you so choose, you may take all this wealth with you and go back to your parents’ house. If you have no other man to give your heart to, I shall look after you as my younger sister or as my daughter.”

On hearing these momentous and frank words from her husband, Dhammadinnā was deeply satisfied. She thought to herself: “It is no ordinary man to say such things. My husband surely must have comprehended the supermundane Dhamma. But is the supermundane solely for men? Is it possible for a woman to understand it?” Pondering thus, she said to her husband: “My lord, is the supermundane Dhamma solely for men? Are women also capable of understanding it?” [1402]

“Why, Dhammadinnā, anyone, male or female, who practices the Dhamma according to the doctrine, with due diligence can become heirs to the Buddha, in the matter of the Dhamma. If one has sufficing conditions, an accumulation of past merit for attaining path-knowledge, the supermundane is realisable.” answered Visākha.

“Very well, my dear, I am glad you aspire for the supermundane. I have not suggested it to you only because I did not know your aptitude.”

Visākha then immediately went to see King Bimbisāra who asked him: “Rich man, what is your purpose in seeing me at this untimely hour?”

“Great King,” Visākha said, “Dhammadinnā wishes to become a nun.”

“What shall I provide Dhammadinnā with?”

“Great King, I want just two things: the golden palanquin and the tidying up of the city.” The king complied with these two requests.

Dhammadinnā Becomes a Nun

Visākha had Dhammadinnā bathed in scented water, fitted out gorgeously, and seated her in the palanquin. Then, surrounded by all her relatives, and the husband’s relatives, she was carried to the nunnery through the city whose environment was rich with the fragrance of incense and flowers. At the nunnery, Visākha requested the female elders to admit his wife Dhammadinnā into the Saṅgha of female monastics. “Rich man,” they said, thinking that Visākhā was forsaking his wife, “forbear if she has been at fault once or twice.”

Thereupon, a nun who was adept at the Vinaya gave Dhammadinnā instructions to reflect on the loathsomeness of the body, beginning with reflecting on the group of five constituent parts: head hair, body hair, nails, teeth, and skin. Then she shaved Dhammadinnā's hair, and donned her with robes. Visākha then made obeisance to Ven. Dhammadinnā and said: "Venerable, be happy in the monastic life in the teaching of the Buddha. The Buddha has taught us the doctrine which is superb in the beginning, in the middle, and in the end." Then he went home.

From the day Ven. Dhammadinnā became a nun, she received much respect and many gifts from the people. In seeing so many visitors, she had little time left to meditate alone.

This much of the account of Dhammadinnā, is taken from the commentary on the Short Discourse giving an Elaboration (Cūḷa-vedalla-sutta, MN 44).

Ven. Dhammadinnā considered thus: "Visākhā has made an end of suffering (dukkha) even while remaining in the household life. I as a nun, must make an end of suffering." She went to her preceptor and said: "Venerable, I am tired of living in this place which is full of the five kinds of sense pleasures. I would like to go and live in a nunnery in a small village." The preceptors knew well that Ven. Dhammadinnā's wish could not be ignored as she came of a high class family, and so they took her to a nunnery at a small village.

Due to her meditative exercises in her many past existences in seeing through the nature of conditioned phenomena Ven. Dhammadinnā did not take long to gain insight and became an Arahāt together with the four analytic knowledges. Then knowing her own attainment, she considered which place would suit her to help others attain Awakening. There was nothing much she could do in the small village whereas in Rājagaha she could help her own kith and kin. So she decided to return to Rājagaha and, requesting her preceptors to accompany her, she returned to Rājagaha.

Visākhā's Questions on the Doctrine

When Visākhā learnt that Ven. Dhammadinnā had returned to Rājagaha, he was eager to [1403] know why, after having gone to live in a small village, she returned so soon. He would go to her and find out but he did not wish to ask a plain question whether she was quite at home with monastic life. Rather, he would pose profound questions relating to the five aggregates that are the objects of clinging (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), and judge her mind from the way she answered. So after paying homage to her, he sat in a suitable place and asked doctrinal questions concerning the five aggregates that are the objects of clinging.

[See the Short Discourse giving an Elaboration (Cūḷa-vedalla-sutta, MN 44.)]

Ven. Dhammadinnā answered all the questions put to her by Visākhā as promptly as a racing horse gallops away, and so precisely as though lotus stems were cut down by a sharp blade. Visākhā realized the high intellect of Dhammadinnā and proceeded from matters relating to the three lower path-knowledges which was the limit of his knowledge. He then proceeded to matters relating to the Arahāt path (Arahatta-magga) which he had not attained himself but about which he had hearsay knowledge.

Ven. Dhammadinnā knew that Visākhā could properly ask about matters pertaining to the Non-returner (Anāgāmi-phala), and that he had exceeded his limitation of knowledge when he asked: “Venerable, what is the counterpart of Nibbāna?” She answered: “Friend Visākhā, your question has gone too far. It is not possible for you to reach the limit of such a question.<sup>305</sup> Indeed, friend Visākhā, the noble practice of purity consisting of three kinds of training tends to Nibbāna, has its ultimate goal in Nibbāna, and ends in Nibbāna. Friend Visākhā, if you so desire, go to the Fortunate One and ask him to explain this matter. And bear in mind the explanation of the Fortunate One.”

Then Visākhā approached the Buddha and related to the Buddha all that had been said between him and Ven. Dhammadinnā. When the Buddha heard the details of the questions and answers that took place between them, he said: “Dhammadinnā is free of all forms of craving for the aggregates (khandha), either of the past, or the future, or the present.” Then the Buddha spoke in verse thus (Dhp 421):

“Visākhā, he who does not cling to the aggregates that are past, future, or present, who is free from the pollutants and attachment, him I call a Brahmin.”

By the end of the discourse, many in the audience attained Awakening at the various levels.

Then the Buddha praised Ven. Dhammadinnā: “Visākha, layman devotee, the nun Dhammadinnā is wise. Visākha, she is of great knowledge. Visākha, had you asked me the answers to those questions I, too, would have answered them in the same way Dhammadinnā answered. These are the answers to the questions. Bear in mind the answers given by Dhammadinnā.”

This event was an immediate cause of Dhammadinnā being designated as the foremost female monastic in expounding the doctrine. Herein, it should be remembered that the discourse given by Ven. Dhammadinnā, when endorsed by the Buddha in those clear terms, becomes a discourse of the Buddha himself. It is like in the case of a message written by a writer properly endorsed and sealed by the king’s seal, becomes the king’s message. Other discourses by other disciples that have the Buddha’s endorsement also became the Buddha’s discourses.

Foremost Title Achieved

On one occasion, when the Buddha was staying at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattihī, and naming distinguished nuns, he declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvikanam bhikkhunnam
Dhamma-kathikanam yad-idam Dhammadinnā.*

Monastics, among my female monastic disciples who are skilled in expounding the Dhamma, Dhammadinnā is the foremost (etad-aggā).

6. Ven. Nandā

Nandā’s full name was Janapadakalyāṇī Rūpanandā. Her story has been told in detail in chapter 34 on the Discourse about Victory (Vijaya-sutta, Snp 1.11). In the present chapter, only a short account will be given, as described in the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya).

Aspiration in the Past

The future Nandā was reborn into a rich man’s family in the city of Hamsavattī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. On a certain occasion when she was attending a discourse by the Buddha, she witnessed the Buddha naming a nun as the foremost among nuns who enjoyed abiding in absorption (jhāna). She aspired to that distinction and after making an extraordinary offering she wished that she would be designated as the foremost nun in absorption herself, some time in the future. The Buddha predicted that her wish would be fulfilled.

Ascetic Life in Her Final Existence

After passing away from that memorable existence, she was reborn in the fortunate existences for 100,000 aeons. In her last existence, she was reborn as a Sakyan Princess who later was intended to be betrothed to Prince Nanda. She was named Princess Abhirūpanandā, and her extreme attractiveness also earned her the endearing name of Princess Janapadakalyāṇī. She was born of Queen Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī.

Prince Nanda, Prince Rāhula and some of the closest kith and kin of the Buddha were admitted into the Saṅgha during the Buddha's visit to Kapilavatthu. Later, after the death of King Suddhodana, her own mother, Queen Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī and Queen Yasodharā, her sister, mother of Prince Rāhula, also joined the female Saṅgha. As Princess Janapadakalyāṇī saw no point in her remaining at the royal palace, she joined her mother, Ven. Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī, as a nun.

After becoming a nun, she did not go to see the Buddha on the days scheduled for her to receive the Buddha's admonition, as other nuns did. This was because the Buddha was reputed to be derogatory of personal beauty. So, she would send some other nuns to receive the Buddha's admonition on her behalf. The Buddha knew that she was conceited about her personal beauty and ordered that nuns must go personally to him to receive admonition and not depute another. Ven. Rūpanandā had to abide by the rule and reluctantly she went to see the Buddha.

The Buddha had, by his powers, created a most attractive girl by his side, respectfully fanning him with a palm-leaf fan. When Ven. Rūpanandā saw her, her vanity about her own personal beauty vanished. "Why," she thought to herself, "I have been so conceited about my beauty! Shame on me! Here is a girl whose beauty I could not match, for I have not even 256th part of her beauty. How foolish of me it was to stay away from the Fortunate One." She stood there awestruck by the beauty of the mind-made girl near the Buddha.

Ven. Rūpanandā had sufficing conditions because of accumulated merit in the past. She heard one verse on the loathsomeness of the body (Dhp 150):

Aṭṭhīnaṃ nagaraṃ kataṃ, maṃsa-lohita-lepanaṃ, yattha jarā ca maccu ca, māno makkho ca ohito.

This fortress is made out of bones, plastered over with flesh and blood, but hidden within lie old age, death, also conceit and anger.

And she also heard the Discourse about Victory (Vijaya-sutta, Snp 1.11) beginning with: Caraṃ vā yadi vā tiṭṭhaṃ, “while walking, standing, sitting, or lying down ...” describing the constitution of the body which is basically no different from a corpse, she meditated diligently on the emptiness of this sentient existence and in two or three days, she became an Arahat.

Foremost Title Achieved

From the time of attaining Awakening Ven. Rūpanandā was unequalled by any other female monastic in abiding in absorption (jhāna). Accordingly, when on the occasion of naming foremost nuns during his residence at the Jetavana monastery, the Buddha declared: [1405]

jhāyīnaṃ yad-idaṃ Nandā.*

Monastics, among my female monastic disciples who derive pleasure from absorption, Nandā is the foremost (etad-aggā).

7. Ven. Soṇā Bahuputtika

Aspiration in the Past

The future Bahuputtika Soṇā was reborn into a rich man’s family in the city of Hāmsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. She had occasion to listen to a discourse by the Buddha when she saw a nun being named as the foremost female monastic in earnest endeavour. She then had a strong desire to become such a foremost nun in the future. So she made an extraordinary offering and later, aspired to the title. Buddha Padumuttara predicted that her aspiration would be fulfilled.

Ascetic Life in Her Final Existence

The future Bahuputtika Soṇā was reborn, for 100,000 aeons, in the fortunate destinations. During the time of Buddha Gotama, she was reborn into the family of a rich man in Sāvattihī. She was married to the son of a rich man and went to live in her husband's house. She bore ten children and was known as Bahuputtika Soṇā (Soṇā with many children).

When her husband took up the monastic life, she arranged for the marriage of her ten children and bequeathed all her property to them, leaving nothing for herself. The children were all ungrateful to her. None of them was willing to let her stay at their houses for more than two or three days, after which, they treated her unkindly.

The old lady became an unwanted, helpless mother, neglected by her own children. Realizing her dire position, she decided that she must renounce the world and become a nun. After she had become a nun, her seniors in the Saṅgha would scold her for any slight mistake or shortcoming in her community obligations. She was often required to serve out punitive measures by her seniors. When her unkind children saw her undergoing such punishment, instead of taking pity on their old mother, they made a laughing stock of her saying: "This old woman has still not learnt the monastic discipline!"

This ridicule by her own children caused great spiritual urgency in her. "I do not have long to live. I must safeguard myself against the unfortunate destinies." So reflecting, she let no time pass, whether sitting or walking, or standing or lying down, without uttering and contemplating on the 32 constituent parts of the body. Then, during all the free moments left to her, after discharging the communal duties to her co-residents, she went into meditation throughout the night. For she rightly realized that at her late age as a nun, she could not afford to let a moment pass without being mindful. When she sat meditating at night, she held onto a post on the ground floor of her nunnery, without losing hold of it. When she walked, meditating at night, she held a tree with her hand, never letting it go for fear that she might otherwise bump her head against something in the darkness.<sup>306</sup>

When she first became a nun, she was called Ven. Bahuputtika Soṇā. But later, her earnest endeavour in taking up the three kinds of training earned her the epithet “one with earnest endeavour” and she was known as Āraddhaviriya Soṇā.

Attainment of Awakening

One day, when the nuns went to the Jetavana monastery to receive the Buddha’s admonition, they told Āraddhaviriya Soṇā to boil some water for the community. But before attending to that task, the old nun walked up and down the kitchen and contemplated on the 32 aspects of the body, uttering each item. The Buddha saw her, while sitting in his private-chamber at the Jetavana monastery and sent forth the [1406] Buddha-radiance to her, making his person visible to her, and uttered this verse (Dhp 115):

Even though one should live 100 years without seeing the sublime Dhamma,<sup>307</sup> yet more worthwhile indeed is a single day’s life of one who perceives the sublime Dhamma.

After thus hearing the Buddha’s discourse made through the Buddha-radiance, which also enabled her to see the Buddha in person, Ven. Āraddhaviriya Soṇā became an Arahat. She now thought: “I have become an Arahat. Those who do not know this, on their return from the Jetavana monastery, will treat me with disrespect as usual which will result in them doing great demerit. I must let them know about my attainment of Awakening so as to forewarn them. She placed the pot of water for boiling on the fireplace but did not make the fire.

When the co-resident nuns returned from the Buddha’s monastery, they saw no fire at the fireplace and murmured: “We told the old woman to boil some water for the community but she has not even made the fire.” Then Ven. Soṇā said to them: “Friends, what use with the fire? Let anyone who needs warm water take it from that pot on the unlit fireplace.” The co-residents were surprised by these strange words and they realized that there must be some reason for the old nun to say so. They went to the pot and felt the water inside. It was quite warm. They took an empty pot to the fireplace and poured out the warm water into it. Whenever they took out the water from that pot, the pot filled up again.

Then only the nuns realized that Ven. Soṇa had become an Arahat. Those nuns who were junior in monastic standing to Ven. Soṇa made obeisance to her with with the hands, knees and forehead touching the ground, and said: “Ven. Soṇa, we have been foolish in being disrespectful to you and bullying you. For all these transgressions, we beg your pardon.” Those nuns, who were senior in female monastic standing, sat squatting before Ven. Soṇa, and said: “Ven. Soṇa, pardon us for our misbehaviour.”

Foremost Title Achieved

Ven. Soṇa became an example of how an elderly person could become an Arahat by dint of earnest effort. On one occasion, when the Buddha sat in congregation at the Jetavana monastery naming foremost nuns, he declared:

āraddha-viriyaṇam yad-idaṃ Soṇa.*

Monastics, among my female monastic disciples who have diligence and make earnest effort, Soṇa is the foremost (etad-aggā).

8. Ven. Sakulā

Ven. Sakulā is mentioned by the name of Bakulā in the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya) in the recorded version of the Sixth Council, whereas in the Sri Laṅkā version, the name is mentioned as Sakulā. In the commentary on the Verses of the Elder Nuns (Therī-gāthā) of the Sixth Council version, the name also appeared as Sakulā. Hence we have opted for the name Sakulā, and based our narration on the commentary on the Verses of the Elder Nuns which gives a more extensive coverage of her history.

Aspiration in the Past

The future Sakulā was reborn into the family of King Ānanda of Hāmsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. She was the half sister of Buddha Padumuttara and was named Princess Nandā. When she had come of age, she attended the Buddha’s discourse. She saw a nun being named by the Buddha as the foremost female monastic in the endowment of the supernormal power of the divine eye, which is characterized by knowledge of past existences. She then had a strong desire to become one like that nun with supernormal power of the divine eye and accordingly she made an extraordinary offering and made her aspiration before Buddha Padumuttara. Buddha Padumuttara predicted that her aspiration would be fulfilled during the time of Buddha Gotama.

For details of this part of the story, read [1407] the Traditions about the Elder Nun Sakulā (Sakulā-therī-apādāna, Thi-ap 24).

Past Existence as a Female Wandering Ascetic

Princess Nandā engaged herself in doing many great deeds of merit throughout her life, and, after passing away from that existence, she was reborn in the Deva realm. Subsequently, she was reborn in the human or Deva realm only. During Buddha Kassapa's time, she was reborn into a Brahmin family. She became a recluse and led a life of a secluded ascetic. After the passing away of Buddha Kassapa, his relics were enshrined in a great relic shrine (stūpa). The ascetic, who was the future Sakulā, one day obtained some oil on her round for alms oil. With that amount of oil she made an offering of lights throughout the night at the shrine where Buddha Kassapa's relics were enshrined.

Ascetic Life in Her Final Existence

The wandering ascetic passed away and was reborn in Tāvātimsa Realm, as a Deva endowed with the special Deva faculty of vision. For the whole period of the interval between the two Buddhas, she fared on in the Deva realm only. During the time of Buddha Gotama, she was reborn into a Brahmin family in Sāvattihī, by the name of Sakulā. When she came of age, she attended a ceremony which celebrated the donations of the Jetavana monastery by Anāthapiṇḍika to the Buddha where she listened to the Buddha's discourse and she became a lay disciple. Later, she received a discourse from an Arahat which kindled her spiritual urgency and resulted in her becoming a nun. She strove diligently in the noble practice of purity and soon became an Arahat.

Foremost Title Achieved

After becoming an Arahat, Ven. Sakulā, as the result of her past aspiration, was especially devoted to the exercise of the supernormal power of the divine eye (Deva-cakkhu), and was adept at it. On one occasion, when the Buddha was naming outstanding nuns at the Jetavana monastery, he declared:

Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvikanam bhikkhuninam dibba-cakkhukānam yad-idam Sakulā.

Monastics, among my female monastic disciples who are proficient in the supernormal power of the divine eye, Sakulā is the foremost (etad-aggā).

9. Ven. Bhaddā Kuṇḍalakesā

Aspiration in the Past

The future Kuṇḍalakesā was reborn into the family of a rich man in the city of Haṃsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. She was listening to the Buddha's discourse, when she saw the elder nun Subhā being named as the foremost monastic in attaining Awakening with the quickest insight. She wanted most strongly to be named such a foremost nun in future time. After making a great offering, she made known her aspiration in front of Buddha Padumuttara, who then made the prediction that her aspiration would be fulfilled during the time of Buddha Gotama.

A Daughter of the King of Bārāṇasī

After faring for 100,000 aeons, either in the Deva or human realms, the future Kuṇḍalakesā was reborn as the fourth daughter, named Bhikkhadāyikā, of the seven daughters of King Kikī of Bārāṇasī, during the time of Buddha Kassapa. In that existence, she, like her other sisters, led a life of chastity for her entire lifespan of 20,000 years, observing the ten precepts. She was also a joint supporter, together with her sisters, of a great monastic complex for the Saṅgha.

Ascetic Life in Her Final Existence

Princess Bhikkhadāyikā was reborn either in the Deva realm or the human realm for the whole aeon during the interim period between the two Buddhas. During the time of [1408] Buddha Gotama, she was reborn as a rich man's daughter in Rājagaha, by the name of Bhaddā. On the same day as she was born, a son was also born to the king's counsellor in Rājagaha. At the moment of the birth of the chief counsellor's son, all weapons throughout the city, beginning those at the king's palace, dazzled mysteriously.

The king's counsellor went to see the king early in the next morning and asked the king: "Great King, did you sleep well?" To which the king replied: "Master, how could I sleep well? All the weapons in the palace dazzled mysteriously the whole night making me nervous." – "Great King," the counsellor said, "do not be afraid. Dazzling of weapons took place last night not only in the palace but throughout the city." – "Why, master, did that happen?"

"Great King, last night a son was born to my family, whose time of birth coincided with the dominance of certain planets in the zodiac, and whose influence will determine the character of the new-born child. Due to that planetary influence, my son will grow into an incorrigible thief, an enemy to the whole city. But your majesty, if you so desire, I shall eliminate him." – "If there is no personal danger to me, there is no reason to eliminate the child."

The counsellor named his son, Sattuka, meaning Vile Enemy, as signifying the innate quality of the child which was acquired through the stellar influence at birth. As the future Kuṇḍalakesā grew to age, so also did young Sattuka. Even as a young boy of two or three years old, wherever he went, he would snatch anything that he could lay his hands on and take them home. His father admonished him not to do so but he would not listen.

Sattuka the Bane of Rājagaha

When Sattuka attained adolescence, his father, seeing that his son was truly beyond his correction, abandoned him. Giving the youth two pieces of dark cloth to use in nocturnal exploits, a tool for breaking open walls and fences and a sweep of twine ladders to his son, he mournfully said to him: "Take these, you useless boy, make your living by robbery. And be off!"

The young waif proved himself a formidable robber. Making use of the housebreaking tool and the rope ladder, he would execute housebreaking neatly and rob all the houses of the well-to-do. Before long every house in the city suffered from his exploits, showing gaping holes in the walls.

When the king made a chariot ride around the city, these holes were a curious sight for the king, who then asked the charioteer the reason for them. Being told by the charioteer that all of them were the work of Sattuka, the housebreaker, the king sent for the mayor and asked him why the robber was not apprehended. The mayor explained that nobody had ever caught the robber red-handed and hence he was not apprehended. The king ordered him: “Catch the robber today, or else your life is forfeit.”

His very life being at stake, the mayor posted undercover men throughout the city and was successful in catching the robber red-handed. Sattuka was apprehended and brought before the king who ordered: “Take Sattuka out of the city by the south gate and execute him.”<sup>308</sup> The mayor acknowledged the king’s sentence. He took Sattuka to every crossroads in the city where 1,000 lashes were administered to him at each crossroads. And thus he was taken towards the south gate, his hands bound at the back.

The Affection of Bhaddā

At that time, the tumult caused by the people watching the thief being punished aroused the curiosity of Bhaddā, the future Kuṇḍalakesā. She looked out through the window which was carved with a lion motif at the sill. When she saw Sattuka in bondage being savagely whipped owing to the mutual love and affection that had existed in their past existences, Bhaddā felt great pity for the robber, and she felt very unhappy. She went to her bedroom with her hands pressed on her bosom to check the mental pain and lay on her bed face downwards. As the only child, Bhaddā was the focus of the family. The [1409] slightest scowl on her forehead caused much concern on the part of the parents.

Her mother went to her and asked the reason for her despair. The daughter did not hide her emotions but opened her heart to the mother that she had such love and affection for Sattuka that she could not live unless she was married the man. The parents and the relations tried their best to make her see sense but to no avail. Finally they had to yield to her wishes coming to the conclusion: “At least giving the daughter to the culprit is better than her death.”

Her father approached the mayor with a bribe of 1,000 pieces of money to let the prisoner escape the death penalty, explaining that his daughter was hopelessly enamoured of the robber, and the mayor co-operated. He procrastinated, and put off the execution by all sorts of explanations until it was sundown. Then he substituted another prisoner with Sattuka, who was stealthily escorted to the rich man's house. The substituted prisoner was taken out of the city by the south gate and executed in lieu of Sattuka.

When the rich man secretly received Sattuka from the mayor's men, he decided to make his daughter happy by pampering the criminal. He had Sattuka bathed in scented water, dressed up finely, and sent to his daughter's mansion. Bhaddā was very happy for having obtained her prize. She made herself as lovely as possible with much adornment and attended on Sattuka fondly.

Sattuka's Wicked Plan

Sattuka's evilness was such that he coveted Bhaddā's personal adornments. He thought out a wicked plan and after two or three days, he said to Bhaddā: "I have to say something to you." – "Say it, my dear," said Bhaddā, anticipating some good words.

"You might think that you saved my life," Sattuka said. "As a matter of fact, I owe my life to the guardian spirit of Mount Corapapāta. I promised him an offering, if I came out of my captivity alive. Now I am bound by my word to make the spirit an offering. Make the necessary preparations."

Bhaddā, being innocent and loving, readily agreed to comply with the wish of her husband. She prepared offerings, adorned herself fully, and rode in a carriage with Sattuka. At the foot of Mount Corapapāta, she alighted from the carriage and made ready to go up the mountain, accompanied by her attendants. Sattuka, concealing his evil motive, persuaded Bhaddā to go up to the mountain alone because she must have no friend by her side. She carried the offering on her head and went up to the mountain with Sattuka.

Once they were alone together on the ascent to the mountain, Sattuka's tone suddenly changed in his conversation with Bhaddā. His oily tongue now gave way to harsh usage. Bhaddā was intelligent enough to fathom the evil motive of her robber-husband. When they got to the top of the mountain, Sattuka commanded in his natural harshness: "Now Bhaddā, take off all your personal ornaments and wrap them up in your upper garment." Bhaddā, pretending not to know the evil motive of Sattuka, sweetly replied: "What wrong have I done against you, my lord?" – "Foolish girl, do you think I came here to make offerings to the mountain spirit? Fie! I dare open the heart of the mountain spirit. I have brought you here alone to rob you of your ornaments."

Bhaddā's Wisdom

Now that Sattuka's true colours had been revealed, Bhaddā employed her wit to save herself. Politely she asked: "But, my Lord, whose ornaments are all these? Whom do I belong to?" – "Look here, I do not understand what you mean. I only know that your property belongs [1410] to you and you alone, and has nothing to do with me."

"Very well, my lord, my only request is that I be allowed to show my love before I take off my ornaments and make myself less beautiful to you. Allow me to embrace you from the front, from the sides, and at the rear," she begged him in a concerning voice. "Very well," said Sattuka unsuspectingly.

Bhaddā now quickly embraced Sattuka from the front, and then going to his rear, pretended to embrace him, she shoved him violently over the mountain top. He fell headlong into a deep crevice, his body torn up into parts all along the way down.

Here is a subtle point in analysing Bhaddā's mind in her act of self defence. At the moment of her actually pushing the villain off the mountain top, her mind is rooted in hatred and dominated by the mental concomitant of killing. However, the thoughts immediately preceding that killing impulsion and those which immediately follow it are meritorious thoughts called great types of moral consciousness, or sublime consciousness dominated by skill (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa) in strategy to ward off the danger to her life.

The mountain spirit who witnessed the astounding wit and courage of Bhaddā, sang two verses in praise of her astute wisdom thus:

A wise person may not always be a man. A woman, with discerning wit in a given situation, may also prove herself to be a wise person.

A wise person may not always be a man. A woman, who can quickly find a solution to a problem, can very well be a wise person.

After what had happened to her, Bhaddā had no desire to return home. She left the mountain, not knowing where she was going. Her only thought was to become a recluse. She happened to arrive at a place of some female ascetics, and asked them to let her join their Saṅgha. They asked her: "Which mode of admission would you prefer? The inferior mode, or the superior mode?" Being a person endowed with the destiny of winding up her existence, she replied: “Let me be admitted into your Saṅgha by the most valued mode of admission.”

Kuṇḍalakesā as a Doctrinaire Ascetic

“Very well,” the leading female ascetic said, and they pulled out Bhaddā’s hair one by one with the shell of the palmyra fruit. No doubt, shaving the head in this manner is most painful but it was the belief of those ascetics that shaving the head with a blade or a pair of scissors was an inferior mode of admitting one into their Saṅgha, and that plucking the hairs one by one was the superior mode. When fresh hair grew again they formed small clusters of rings that resembled earrings. Hence Bhaddā came to be called by her new name of Kuṇḍalakesā, “one with earring-like coils of hair.”

Kuṇḍalakesā learned all that her ascetic teachers could teach her and, being a person of innate wisdom, decided that there was no superior kind of learning that she could get from them. So she left them and roamed the country in search of further knowledge, learning from various teachers. In time, she became learned in various doctrines which were acquired at various places and was also unequalled in expounding doctrines. She would go from place to place to find her match in the exposition of doctrines. As a mark of open challenge, she would set up a heap of sand at the entrance to the town or village she visited, on the top of which she would plant a twig of rose-apple. She would tell the children nearby to let everybody know that anyone who could outwit her in the exposition of doctrines might signal his or her challenge by destroying the rose-apple twig. If after seven days there appeared no challenger, she would pluck up the rose-apple twig in triumph and go on to another place. [1411]

Ven. Sāriputta Tames Kuṇḍalakesā

By that time, Buddha Gotama had appeared in the world and was residing at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattihī. The wandering ascetic Kuṇḍalakesā, who wore only a single garment, after touring cities, towns and villages, arrived at Sāvattihī. At the entrance of the city, she set up her symbol of challenge, a heap of sand with a twig of rose-apple planted atop it. After giving word to the children nearby about the meaning of the twig of rose-apple being used, she entered the city.

At that time, Ven. Sāriputta, the Captain of the Doctrine, had entered the city for collection of alms food, after the other monastics had already entered the city. This was because he had been discharging the tasks set him of overseeing the tidiness of the entire Jetavana monastery such as putting monastics' beddings and articles of use in order, filling water pots, sweeping the grounds, tending to the sick monastics, etc. When he saw the rose-apple twig planted on a heap of sand he inquired from the children nearby what that meant. The children explained to him about Kuṇḍalakesā's message. Thereupon Ven. Sāriputta told them to destroy the rose-apple twig. Some children were reluctant to do so but a few daring ones trampled the rose-apple twig to pieces.

When Kuṇḍalakesā returned from the city after finishing her meal, she saw her rose-apple twig destroyed and asked the boys who was responsible for it. They told her that they did it, as asked by Ven. Sāriputta. Kuṇḍalakesā pondered thus: "Someone who does not know my ability would not dare to challenge me. This Ven. Sāriputta must be someone who has great wisdom and virtue. Now I will announce to all the people that I am going to engage in a test of wits with Ven. Sāriputta, the Captain of the Doctrine, and thus build up a following of my own before meeting him." She spread the news to the people and within a short time the whole city of 80,000 houses were informed of the event among themselves.

Ven. Sāriputta, after having finished his meal, sat underneath a tree, and waited for Kuṇḍalakesā. Then she arrived with a large crowd behind her. After exchanging cordial greetings with Ven. Sāriputta, she sat in a suitable place and said: "Venerable sir, did you ask the children to destroy rose-apple twig set up by me?"

"Yes, I did," replied Ven. Sāriputta.

"Venerable sir, if that is so, shall we enter into a debate?"

"So be it, female ascetic."

"Who should start putting the questions, sir?"

"It is my privilege to put questions. However, you can begin by asking me about what you know."

When she had the permission to ask, Kuṇḍalakesā asked Ven. Sāriputta all the doctrines that she knew. He answered them all. Then he said: "Bhaddā, I have answered all your questions. Now I shall ask you a question."

“Please do venerable sir.”

“What is the one factor that needs to be fully understood (ekam nāma kiṃ)?”

“Venerable sir, I do not know it.”

“Young female ascetic, you do not know even what a young novice knows in our teaching, what else would you know?”

Thereupon Kuṇḍalakesā, being a person of no mean past merit, knew the worth of her opponent. She said: “May your reverence be my refuge!”

“Kuṇḍalakesā,” said Ven. Sāriputta, “you should not take refuge in me. There is the Buddha, the supreme one among the three worlds, now residing at the Jetavana monastery, in his private chamber. Go and take refuge in the Buddha.”

“Very well, venerable sir, I will take your advice,” she said. [1412]

In that evening she went to the Jetavana monastery where she found the Buddha delivering a discourse. She made obeisance to the Buddha with the hands, knees and forehead touching the ground and sat in a suitable place. The Buddha, knowing her ripeness for Awakening spoke this verse (Dhp 101):

Better than 1,000 verses that deal with trash, not tending to edification, is a single verse, by hearing which one is calmed.

At the end of the verse, Kuṇḍalakesā became an Arahat and was endowed with the four analytic knowledges. She requested the Buddha to admit her into the Saṅgha of female monastics. The Buddha agreed. So, she went to a nunnery and was admitted as a nun.

Foremost Title Achieved

When the Buddha sat amidst the four kinds of assemblies, there was the lively topic among the audience about the marvellous facility of Ven. Kuṇḍalakesā in attaining Awakening after hearing just a verse comprising four lines. The Buddha, with reference to that topic, declared:

khippābhiññānam yad-idam Bhaddā Kuṇḍalakesā.*

Monastics, among my female monastic disciples who attain path-knowledge quickly Bhaddā Kuṇḍalakesā is the foremost (etad-aggā).

10. Ven. Bhaddā Kāpilānī

The story of Bhaddā Kāpilānī is connected with that of Ven. Mahā Kassapa an elaborate account of which has been given above. For that reason the commentary gives only a brief account of this elder nun. For a more complete account, the reader is advised to refer back to chapter 43.4.

Aspiration in the Past

The future Bhaddā Kāpilānī was born as the wife of Vedeha, a rich man of Hamsavatī, during the time of Padumuttara Buddha. When she was listening to a discourse by the Buddha, she saw a nun being named as the foremost female monastic having the supernormal power of remembering past existences. She aspired to be such a nun and, after making an extraordinary offering, mentioned that aspiration before the Buddha, who confirmed it.

The Wife of a Householder

After passing away from her existence as a rich man's wife, she was reborn in the Deva realm and subsequently either in the human world or the Deva realm, for 100,000 aeons. Eventually, she was reborn as the wife of a householder in Bārāṇasī. At one time, while she was having a quarrel with the sister of her husband, a Paccekabuddha arrived for alms food. The householder's sister offered alms food to the Paccekabuddha and said her wish which chafed his wife, the future Bhaddā Kāpilānī, who became furious and took the alms bowl from the Paccekabuddha, and threw away the alms food in it. Further, she put mud in it, and offered it back to the Paccekabuddha. Only when the astonished onlookers reminded her of her fault did she recover her proper senses. She threw out the mud from the Paccekabuddha's alms bowl, cleansed it thoroughly, applied scented powder to it and then put in the four sweet foods (catu-madhu). In addition, she added ghee that had been made pure white, like the inside of the pollen chamber of the lotus, with the result that the food she offered glistened in the alms bowl. In returning the alms bowl to the Paccekabuddha, she wished aloud that just as the food she offered glistened, so would she possess a glistening complexion.<sup>309</sup>

Ascetic Life in Her Final Existence

It is noteworthy that both husband and wife renounced the world together. The husband, [1413] Mahā Kassapa, at a forked road took the right turn while his wife, Bhaddā Kāpilānī, the left turn. The former, met the Buddha sitting under the great Bodhi tree, known as Bahuputtaka. At that time, women were not yet admitted into the Saṅgha, so Bhaddā Kāpilānī had to spend five years as a wandering ascetic.

This fact was recounted by herself in her life story: Pañca vassāni nivasim̃ paribbājavate aham̃, “for five years I lived as a wanderer” (Tha-ap 413, 60).

Foremost Title Acheived

Thanks to her past aspiration, Ven. Bhaddā Kāpilānī, after attaining Awakening, was exceptionally competent in remembering past existences. Therefore, on one occasion when the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana monastery and naming distinguished nuns, he declared:

*Etad-aggam̃ bhikkhave mama sāvikanam̃ bhikkhunīnam̃
pubbe-nivāsam̃ yad-idaṃ Bhaddā Kāpilānī.*

Monastics, among my female monastic disciples who can recall past existences, Bhaddā, who is now called Kāpilānī,<sup>310</sup> is the foremost (etad-aggā).

11. Ven. Bhaddā Kaccānā

As the Myanmar saying goes: “Masses of water follow the tide,” so it is also with the story of Bhaddā Kaccānā, who was also known as Yasodharā, whose story is inseparably linked with that of the Buddha. The commentary therefore treats her story only in a brief manner. We do likewise in this book.

Aspiration in the Past

The future Bhaddā Kaccānā, was reborn into a worthy family in the city of Hāmsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. When she was attending a discourse by the Buddha, she saw a nun being named by the Buddha as the foremost nun in attaining great supernormal power. She aspired to that attainment. After making an extraordinary offering to the Buddha, she made her aspiration in front of him, and received confirmation.

Ascetic Life in Her Final Existence

The future Bhaddā Kaccānā was reborn only in the Deva realm or the human realm for 100,000 aeons. During the time of Buddha Gotama, she was reborn as the daughter of the Sakyan Prince Suppabuddha, who was an uncle of the Buddha. She was named Bhaddā Kaccānā.

When she came of age, she was married to Prince Siddhattha and became his Chief Queen. She gave birth to Prince Rāhula. On the night she gave birth to Rāhula, Prince Siddhattha renounced the home life. After attaining Perfect Awakening at the foot of the Bodhi tree, the Buddha concerned himself with the spiritual welfare of the sentient world. He made a journey to Kapilavatthu where he caused the Awakening of his kith and kin.

During the Buddha's fifth year after Awakening, his father became an Arahat while reigning as a king and passed away the same day. Then, Queen Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī and the five Sakyan princesses, whose husbands had become monastics as a result of listening to the Discourse about the Great Assembly (Mahā-samaya-sutta, DN 20), became nuns in the Buddha's teaching. At that time, Princess Yasodharā, as a nun was referred to as Bhaddā Kaccānā. Bhaddā Kaccānā and Princess Janapadakalyāṇī or Nandā, became nuns with Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī as their preceptress. She strove to gain insight and in due time became an Arahat.

Foremost Title Achieved

Ven. Bhaddā Kaccānā, after attaining Awakening, was most proficient in the exercise of supernormal powers. At one sitting, in a single adverting of her mind (āvajjana), she could recall all her previous existences over one incalculable period and 100,000 aeons. This extraordinary feat of hers became the talk of the monastic world.

With [1414] reference to that wide reputation, the Buddha, in naming distinguished nuns in a congregation in Jetavana monastery, declared:

mahābhiññappattānam yad-idaṃ Bhaddākaccānā.*

Monastics, among my female monastic disciples who are endowed with great supernormal powers, Bhaddā Kaccānā is the foremost (etad-aggā).

Note that there are only four outstanding disciples of the Buddha who are endowed with such great supernormal powers. They have exceptional powers to recall past lives over one incalculable period and 100,000 aeons whereas other disciples can recall their past lives over 100,000 aeons only. The four such exceptional disciples were Ven. Sāriputta, Ven Mahā Moggallāna, Ven. Bākula and Ven. Bhaddā Kaccānā. The original name of the nun was Bhaddā Kaccānā but on account of her golden complexion she was also known as Bhaddā Kañcānā.

12. Ven. Kisā Gotamī

Aspiration in the Past

The future Kisā Gotamī was reborn into an unknown family in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. When she was listening to a discourse by the Buddha, she saw a nun being named as the foremost female monastic in wearing coarse, inferior robes. She aspired to be like that nun. After making an extraordinary offering, she expressed that wish before the Buddha. The Buddha predicted that her aspiration would be fulfilled during the time of Buddha Gotama.

A Daughter of King Kikī

The future Kisā Gotamī was reborn in the fortunate destinations, and never into lower worlds, for a period of 100,000 aeons. During the time of Buddha Kassapa in the present aeon which was graced by five Buddhas, she was reborn as the fifth daughter of King Kikī of Bārāṇasī. She was named Dhammā. For the whole of her lifespan of 20,000 years, she led a life of purity, observing the ten precepts.

Ascetic Life in Her Final Existence

Princess Dhammā was reborn in the Tāvatiṃsa Realm. In her last existence, she was born into a rich man's family, whose fortunes had dwindled and was in a state of poverty. Her original name was Gotamī but due to her lean and emaciated body she was called Kisā Gotamī, “Gotamī the lean one.”

How Kisā Gotamī became the daughter-in-law of a rich man will now be narrated, as told in the commentary on the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, Dhp 114).

Kisā Gotamī, the One with Great Past Merit

The Buddha said this in the Discourse on the Amount of Savings (Nidhi-kaṇḍa-sutta, Khp 8.5):

Yadā puññakkhayo hoti, sabbam-etam vinassati.

When merit is exhausted everything is lost.

There was a rich man in Sāvattī whose property were all strangely turned into charcoal due to the exhaustion of his merit. The man was in a despondent state. He lost his appetite and lay on a couch. A friend came to his house and gave him encouragement. He also gave a practical way out of the stark poverty of the once rich man.

His instruction was as follows: “Friend, spread out a mat in front of your house as a bazaar seller would, for you are going to sell the heaps of charcoal that are now your only property. Passers-by will say: ‘Oh, other people sell oil, honey, molasses, etc. but you, rich man, are selling charcoal.’ Then you just say to them: ‘One sells what one owns. What’s wrong with it?’ These people are the ordinary people with no great past merit. [1415] Someone will come and say to you: ‘Ah, other people sell oil, honey molasses, etc. but you, rich man, are selling gold and silver!’ To that person you should say: ‘Where are the gold and silver?’ Then that person will point to your heaps of charcoal and say: ‘There they are.’

Then you should say: ‘Bring them to me,’ and receive with your hands what that person has brought from your heaps of charcoal to you in his or her hands. Since that person is one endowed with great past merit, all he or she touches and delivers into your hands will be turned into gold and silver, as they originally had been.

I must mention the stipulation. It is this: If the person who mentions your gold and silver and turns them back to gold and silver is a young woman, you must marry your son to her, entrust all your property with 400 million to her and let her, as your daughter-in-law, manage your household. If that person is a young man, you must marry your daughter to him, entrust all your property worth 400 million to him, as your son-in-law, and let him manage your household.”

The ruined rich man took his friend’s advice. He sat as a bazaar in front of his house where every passer-by could see him sitting there selling his charcoal. People said to him: “Ah, other people sell oil, honey, molasses, etc., but you are selling charcoal.” To them he simply said: “One sells what one owns. What’s wrong with it?”

One day, Kisā Gotamī herself, the daughter of another ruined rich man, happened to come along to the charcoal vendor. She said: “Father, other people sell oil, honey, molasses etc., but you are selling gold and silver!” The ruined rich man said to her: “Where are the gold and silver?”

“Well, are you not dealing in them here?”

“Bring those gold and silver to me, daughter!”

Kisā Gotamī took a handful of the vendor’s goods and handed it to him and to his amazement, all of them turned into gold and silver as they originally had been!

The rich man asked Kisā Gotamī: “What is your family name?” – “I am known as Kisā Gotamī,” she replied. The rich man then knew her to be unmarried. He collected his riches from that place, took Kisā Gotamī to his house and married his son to her. Then every one of his former gold and silver items assumed its original form.

Kisā Gotamī’s Loss

In due course, Kisā Gotamī gave birth to a son. From that time onwards, she began to be treated with love and respect by her father-in-law’s family – at first she had been looked down by them as the daughter of a poor man. Just when her son could romp about, he died. Kisā Gotamī, who had never suffered the loss of a child, was overwhelmed with grief. She valued her son as the condition for her improved status and well-being. Her fortunes had improved with his birth. She could not think of her dead child being thrown away in the cemetery. So she held the dead child fondly in her arms, and muttering continuously: “Let me have the medicine to bring back life to my son!” she roamed about from house to house.

As she behaved in that senseless though pitiable manner, people had no sympathy with her. They said jeeringly, flipping their fingers: “Where have you ever seen a medicine that restores life to the dead?” These unkind but truthful words failed to bring her to her senses. A wise man then considered: “This young woman has lost her senses due to the death of her son. The right medicine for her can only be dispensed by the Buddha.”

He said to her: “Little daughter, the medicine that can bring back life to your son is known only to the Buddha and to no one else. Indeed, there is the Buddha, the greatest person among Devas [1416] and humans, residing at the Jetavana monastery. Go and ask him.”

Quelling Kisā Gotamī’s Sorrow

Kisā Gotamī had hope. She went straight to the Buddha’s monastery, holding her dead child in her arms. The Buddha was seated on his throne amidst an audience and was about to give his discourse when Kisā Gotamī shouted to the Buddha: “Venerable sir, give me the medicine that will bring back life to my child!” The Buddha saw the sufficiency of her past merit for attaining Awakening and said to her: “Gotamī, you have done the right thing in coming here to ask for the medicine to restore life to your dead child. Now you must go to the houses in Sāvattthī and ask for a small quantity of mustard oil from a house where no death has occurred, and bring it to me.”

Herein, the Buddha’s strategy is to be noted carefully. The Buddha merely says to Kisā Gotamī to bring him a small quantity of mustard oil from a house where no death had occurred. He did not say that he would restore the dead child to life when she has got the oil. The Buddha’s objective is to let the demented mother realize the point that loss is not a unique experience but that everybody has suffered the same sorrow of the loss of a loved one.

Kisā Gotamī thought that if she obtained the mustard oil, her son would be restored to life. She went to the first house and said: “The Buddha asks me to get a small quantity of mustard oil for making a medicine to restore life to my dead son. Kindly give me some mustard oil.”

“Here it is,” the householder said and gave some mustard oil.

“But, sir,” she said, “I must know one thing: has nobody died in this family?”

“What a question! Who can remember the number of people that have died in this family?”

“In that case, I am not taking the oil,” she said and went to another house. She heard the same reply there. At the third house she also heard the same reply. Now truth dawned into her mind. “There can be no family in this city where death has never occurred. Of course, the Buddha, the benefactor of the world, knew it.” A spiritual urgency arose in her. She went to the country and left her dead child there, saying: “Dear son, as a mother, I had thought quite wrongly that death came to you alone. But death is common to everybody.”

Then, muttering this soliloquy, the meaning of which will be given later, she went to see the Buddha (Thi-ap 22, 27):

*Na gāma-dhammo no nigamassa dhammo, na cāpiyaṃ eka-kulassa dhammo.
Sabbassa lokassa sadevakassa, eseva Dhammo yad-idaṃ aniccatā.*

She approached the Buddha who asked her: “Have you got the mustard oil?”

“I have no need for mustard oil, venerable sir, only give me firm ground to stand upon, let me gain a foothold!”

The Buddha, spoke this verse to her (Dhp 287):

Gotamī, one who is intoxicated with children and wealth and is attached to possessions, old and new, is carried away by Death, just as a sleeping village is swept away by a huge flood.

At the end of the discourse, Kisā Gotamī was established in the fruition of Stream-entry knowledge.<sup>311</sup>

In the life story of Kisā Gotamī, when she came back from her search for the mustard oil, [1417] the Buddha spoke to her in two verses (Thi-ap 22:26-27, PTS 2.566):

Gotamī, even if one were to live 100 years without perceiving with insight the arising and perishing of mind and body, yet more worthwhile indeed is a single day's life of one who perceives the arising and perishing of mind and body.

Gotamī, the impermanence of all conditioned things is not a peculiar phenomenon confined to any village, town, or family, but an inescapable fact that concerns all sentient beings including humans, Devas and Brahmas.

After hearing these two verses, Kisā Gotamī attained Stream-entry. Having been established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala), Kisā Gotamī requested the Buddha to be allowed to become a nun. The Buddha consented. Kisā Gotamī left the Buddha after going three rounds around him with him on her right. She went to the nunnery, and was admitted into the Saṅgha of female monastics. Then, she was known as Ven. Kisā Gotamī.

Attainment of Awakening

Ven. Kisā Gotamī worked diligently to gain insight. One day, it was her turn to look after lighting in and around the Assembly Hall. While watching a flame in a lamp, she had the perception of the flame as a series of rising and vanishings. Then she saw that all living beings are coming and going, that is, they are born only to die and that only those who attain Nibbāna do not come under this process of arising and falling.

The thoughts that were occurring in Kisā Gotamī's mind came to the notice of the Buddha who was sitting in his private chamber at the Jetavana monastery, and he sent his Buddha-radiance to her, making her see him sitting in front of her and said: "Gotamī, your thinking is right. All living beings rise and fall, just as the series of flames do. Only those who attain Nibbāna do not come under this process of arising and falling. It is a living in vain for those who may live 100 years without realizing Nibbāna through path-knowledge and its fruition." He made this point further in the following verse (Dhp 113):

Gotamī, even if one were to live 100 years without perceiving through path-knowledge the deathless Nibbāna, yet more worthwhile indeed is a single day's life of one who perceives through path-knowledge, the deathless Nibbāna.

At the end of the discourse, Ven. Kisā Gotamī became an Arahat, having extinguished all mental intoxicants.

Foremost Title Achieved

As aspired to in her previous existence, Ven. Kisā Gotamī devoted her entire monastic life to being content with inferior robes, robes made of inferior cloth, sewn in inferior thread, and dyed in an inferior colour. Therefore, on one occasion, when the Buddha was naming outstanding nuns during his residence at the Jetavana monastery, he declared:

lūkha-cīvara-dharānam yad-idam Kisā-gotamī.*

Monastics, among my female monastic disciples who make do with inferior robes, Kisā Gotamī is the foremost (etad-aggā).

13. Ven. Siṅgālakamātu

What follows is a synthesis of the account of Siṅgālakamātu in the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya) and her life story in the Traditions (Apādāna, Thi-ap 34). [1418]

Aspiration in the Past

The future Siṅgālakamātu was born as the daughter of a court official, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. She went to the Buddha's monastery and after listening to his doctrine she became a nun and flawlessly observed the morality consisting in the four kinds of purification. She had an exceptional devotion to the Three Treasures, was very keen to listen to the doctrine, and had an ardent desire to see the Buddha just like Ven. Vakkali had.

One day, she saw a nun being named by the Buddha as the foremost female monastic in faith (saddhā). She aspired to be like that foremost nun and redoubled her effort in the practice of the threefold training. The Buddha gave a discourse to her in three verses beginning with: Yassa saddhā Tathāgate, which in essence says (Thi-ap 34, 7-9, PTS 2.603):

One who has faith in the Three Treasures, morality and right view is not called a poor person, and so a wise person should cultivate devotion to the Buddha, morality, faith in the Dhamma and the Saṅgha, and perception or insight that enables one to see the Dhamma.

On hearing the discourse, the young nun was greatly encouraged and asked the Buddha if her aspiration would come true. Buddha Padumuttara predicted that her aspiration would be fulfilled during the time of Buddha Gotama. She was elated by the prediction and served the Buddha respectfully by living up to the Buddha's teaching.

It should be noted that putting effort into the right practice of the Dhamma with devotion or loving thoughts about the Buddha itself amounts to serving or attending on the Buddha.

Ascetic Life in Her Final Existence

The future Siṅgālakamātu was reborn in the fortunate destinations for 100,000 aeons. Then, during the time of Buddha Gotama, she was reborn as the daughter of a rich man in Rājagaha. When she came of age she was married to a son of another rich man of the same clan and went to live in her husband's residence. She gave birth to a child named Siṅgālaka, and so she acquired the name Siṅgālakamātu, Siṅgālaka's mother.

Her son, Siṅgālaka had a wrong view. He worshipped the eight directions daily. One day, as the Buddha was entering the city for alms food, he saw the young Siṅgālaka turning to the eight directions in the act of worshipping. The Buddha stood on the wayside and gave a discourse to the young boy (Siṅgāla-sutta, DN 31).

On that occasion, two billion listeners, both men and woman, realized the four truths. Siṅgālakamātu attained Stream-entry knowledge and joined the Saṅgha of female monastics. Since then, she came to be called Ven. Siṅgālakamātu. Due to her past aspiration, since she became a nun, her faculty of faith was exceptionally strong. Wherever she visited the Buddha's monastery to listen to the sermons, she could not turn her gaze away from the glorious person of the Buddha. The Buddha, knowing her intense devotion to him, gave discourses to her that tended to enhance her conviction. With faith as her stepping stone or springboard, she meditated on insight and became an Arahat, and became an Arahat who attains Awakening with conviction as the dominant factor.

Foremost Title Achieved

On one occasion, when the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana monastery and naming distinguished nuns according to their merits, he declared:

saddhādhimuttānam yad-idaṃ Siṅgālaka-mātu.*

Monastics, among my female monastic disciples who have strong conviction, Siṅgālakamātu is the foremost (etad-aggā). [1419]

45a: The Life Stories of the Male Lay Disciples

1. Tapussa and Bhallika

Aspiration in the Past

I shall describe the story of the brothers, Tapussa and Bhallika, based on the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) and the commentary on the Verses of the Elder Monks (Thera-gāthā).

The future Tapussa and Bhallika were reborn into a worthy family in the city of Hāmsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. When they were listening to a discourse by the Buddha, they saw two disciples being named as the foremost in being the first of the Buddha's disciples who were established in the refuges. The two brothers aspired to that distinction and after making an extraordinary offering to the Buddha, they wished for that goal.

Other Past Existences

The two brothers lived a life full of meritorious deeds and, after passing away from that memorable existence, they were never reborn into the lower worlds (apāya) but, instead, in the Deva realm or the human world only.

The future Bhallika was reborn, 31 aeons ago in a period which was devoid of any Buddhas, as a man who offered all kinds of fruits to a Paccekabuddha named Sumana. For that good deed, he was reborn only in the good destinations.

During the time of Buddha Sikhī, he was reborn into a Brahmin family in the city of Arunavatī. He heard the news that two merchant brothers, Ujita and Ojita, had the opportunity of offering the first alms food to Buddha Sikhī who had appeared from the seventh seven-day abiding in the attainment in cessation and who was about to begin his eighth seven-day abiding in the attainment of cessation. He went to visit Buddha Sikhī together with his friend, the future Tapussa, and after paying homage to the Buddha, requested him to accept their alms food offering the next day. On the next day, they made an extraordinary offering to the Buddha and said: "Venerable sir, for this good deed, let both of us have the opportunity of making the first alms food to a Buddha in the future."

The two friends were reborn in various existences, during which they performed meritorious deeds together, resulting in rebirth at the fortunate destinations.

During the time of Buddha Kassapa, they were born into the family of a cattle merchant. For a long period of life, lasting many years, they offered milk rice to the Saṅgha.<sup>312</sup>

Discipleship in Their Last Existence

The two friends were reborn into the fortunate destinations for the infinite years which constituted the interim period between the two Buddhas. During the time of Buddha Gotama, before the Buddha attained Perfect Awakening, they were reborn as two sons to a travelling merchant who carried his goods, using a big caravan, from place to place. Their native town was called Asitañcana.<sup>313</sup> The elder brother was named Tapussa, and the younger, Bhallika.

They became householders and carried on the trading together, using a caravan of 500 bullock carts. At that time, Buddha Gotama had attained Perfect Awakening and had passed seven times the seven days of abiding in the attainment of cessation, and was about to enter into the eighth seven-day period of abiding in the attainment of cessation at the foot of a Rājāyatana tree.<sup>314</sup>

The caravan of the two merchant brothers was then not far from that tree. At that [1420] moment, a Deva who had been the mother to the merchant brothers in the immediately previous existence, saw the dire need of the Buddha for sustenance, who, after having last taken Sujātā's milk rice in 49 morsels over 49 days, must eat that day for his survival. She thought that her two sons should be able to provide the food just in time. So, using her psychic powers, she made the bullocks unable to move.

The two brothers inspected the bullocks, the carts, and all relevant conditions which made the carts immobile. They were at their wit's ends to find the reason. Their Deva mother, seeing them disheartened, possessed a man in the caravan and said to them: "Dear sons, you are not harassed by any Bhūta or Peta or Nāga but it is me, a Deva of the terrestrial realm, who was your mother in your last

existence, who is doing this. The Buddha, who is endowed with the Ten Powers, is staying at the foot of a Rājāyatana tree. Go and offer alms food to the Buddha which will be the first food he takes after becoming a Buddha.”

The two brothers were delighted by the Deva’s word. And thinking that if they were to cook alms food it would take too much time, they took some of their choicest preserved food, put them on a gold salver, and approaching the Buddha, said: “Venerable sir, may you, out of compassion, accept this food.” The Buddha reviewed the situation and considered what action the previous Buddhas did in such a case. The Four Great Kings then visited the Buddha and each offered an alms bowl, which was made of granite and having the colour of green gram. The Buddha considered the great benefit that would accrue to the four Devas, and so accepted all the four bowls, and placing them one atop the other, willed that the four bowls became one, and accordingly, the four granite bowls became a single alms bowl with four rims.

The two brothers then put their alms food into the Buddha’s alms bowl, and the Buddha ate the food. After the Buddha had finished eating, the brothers offered water for drinking and washing. Then they made obeisance to the Buddha and sat in a suitable place. The Buddha gave them a discourse, at the end of which, both brothers were established in the two refuges.

The story of the establishment of the two brothers in the two refuges (dve-vācika-saraṇa-gamana) was described in chapter 8, and is repeated in the following paragrah.

The Buddha then received the rice-cakes and balls of honey-food with that alms bowl and partook of them and then delivered a discourse of appreciation which was suitable to the merchant brothers. Then the two brothers took refuge in the Buddha and the Dhamma only, as the treasure of the Saṅgha had not come into existence at that time, and thereby they became devotees who had only to pronounce the two-sentence refuge (devācika-saraṇa) with reference to the Buddha and the Dhamma, saying: Ete mayam bhante, Bhagavantaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāma Dhammañ-ca, “we take refuge, sir, in the Fortunate One and the Dhamma.” These two were the first devotees in whom the two-sentence refuge formula was established.

After having been established in the two refuges, before departing, the two brothers requested from the Buddha: “Venerable sir, may the Fortunate One, out of compassion, bestow on us something which we may revere every day.” The Buddha passed his right hand over his head and gave them eight hairs as relics. The brothers put the hairs in a gold casket and took them home. Back at their town, they erected a shrine at the entrance of the town of Asitañcana where the eight relic-hairs from the living Buddha were enshrined. On the Observance Days (Uposatha), the shrine emitted a Buddha-radiance.

Foremost Title Achieved

On one occasion, when the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana monastery and acknowledging distinguished lay disciples accordingly to their merits, he declared:

*Etad-aggam̐ bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ upāsakaṇaṃ
paṭhamam̐ saraṇaṃ gacchantānaṃ yad-idaṃ Tapussa-Bhallikā vāṇijā.*

Monastics, among my lay disciples who have taken refuge earliest in the Buddha and the Dhamma, the merchant brothers, Tapussa and Bhallika, are the foremost.

The Attainment of Path-Knowledge

Tapussa and Bhallika were the earliest of the Buddha’s lay disciples who took refuge in the Buddha and the Dhamma. Later, the Buddha made his first discourse, the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka), at the Deer Park near Bārāṇasī. After that, he went and resided in Rājagaha. The two brothers also arrived at Rājagaha on a trading journey. They visited the Buddha, made obeisance and sat in a suitable place. The Buddha gave a discourse to them, at the end of which, the elder brother Tapussa was established in Stream-entry knowledge and its fruition. The younger brother became a monastic and in due time became an Arahat and was endowed with the six supernormal powers.<sup>315</sup> [1421]

2. Anāthapiṇḍika the Rich Man

Aspiration in the Past

The future Anāthapiṇḍika was reborn into a wealthy family in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. When he was listening to a discourse by the Buddha, he saw a lay disciple being named as the foremost lay disciple among those who delight in generosity. He had a strong desire to become such a distinguished disciple and after making an extraordinary offering to the Buddha, he expressed his aspiration before him, and it was confirmed.

Discipleship in His Last Existence

The future Anāthapiṇḍika was reborn in fortunate destinations for 100,000 aeons and during the time of Buddha Gotama, he was reborn as the son of Sumana, a rich man of Sāvattī. His name, given by his parents, was Sudattha. Sudattha in time became the head of the family. He earned the reputation of Anāthapiṇḍika, “one who gives food to the destitute.”

For more details about this remarkable man refer to chapter 20c. Here, only a brief account will be given as described in the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya).

One day, Anāthapiṇḍika went to Rājagaha on a trading trip where he visited his friend a rich man in Rājagaha. There, he learned the news that the Buddha had appeared in the world. He could not wait till the city gates of Rājagaha were open the next morning so he could meet the Buddha. Such was his zeal. So he left the city at dawn with the Devas opening the gate for his visit. He met the Buddha, benefitted from a discourse by him, and was established in the fruition of Stream-entry knowledge. On the next day, he made a great offering to the Buddha and his Saṅgha and had the Buddha’s consent to visit Sāvattī.

He returned to Sāvattī, and on the way back he made arrangements with his friends of each location by providing them with 100,000 pieces of money to build a monastery at an interval of one league along the way for the temporary residence of the Buddha and his company of monastics. The distance between Rājagaha and Sāvattī being 45 leagues, he therefore spent 4,500,000 on the 45 temporary transit monasteries.

At Sāvattthī, he bought a large park, which was the pleasure garden of Prince Jeta. He paid a sum of money according to the number of gold coins laid out over the entire park, with their rims touching each other. This amounted to 180 million. On that piece of land, he built a golden monastery costing another 180 million. At the formal dedication ceremony of the Jetavana monastery, which lasted for three months,<sup>316</sup> a lavish feast was provided to guests, both in the mornings and in the daytime. This cost him another additional 180 million.

Foremost Title Achieved

The Jetavana monastery alone therefore cost 540 million. The regular donations to the Buddha and his Saṅgha consisted of the following offerings:

1. 500 monastics were offered alms food daily by the ticket system (salaka-bhatta).
2. 500 monastics were offered alms food once during the waxing period of the month and once during the waning period.
3. 500 monastics were offered rice gruel daily by the ticket system.
4. 500 monastics were offered rice gruel once during the waxing period of the month and once during the waning period.
5. Daily offerings of alms food were made to: 500 monastics who had arrived in Sāvattthī recently and who had not acquainted themselves with the daily route for collecting alms food; [1422] 500 monastics who were about to go on a journey; 500 monastics who were sick; 500 monastics who tended the sick monastics,
6. There was always a seating place for 500 monastics at any time at Anāthapiṇḍika's house.

Hence, on one occasion when the Buddha, while residing at the Jetavana monastery, was acknowledging lay disciples according to their merit, he declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakānaṃ upāsakānaṃ
dāyakānaṃ yad-idaṃ Sudatto gahapati Anāthapiṇḍiko.*

---

Monastics, among my lay disciples who delight in giving, Sudattha the householder, also known as Anāthapiṇḍika, is the foremost.

The Discourse Giving Advice to Anāthapiṇḍika

Here we shall give a condensed account of the Discourse giving Advice to Anāthapiṇḍika (Anāthapiṇḍikovāda-sutta) which Anāthapiṇḍika liked very much. A full account of this discourse is contained in the Collection of the Middle Length Discourses (Majjhima-nikāya, MN 143).

During the Buddha’s residence at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattḥī, Anāthapiṇḍika the householder was sick, in pain, and gravely ill. Then he called an attendant and said: “Please approach the Fortunate One. Prostrate yourself at his feet, and say to him: ‘Venerable sir, Anāthapiṇḍika the householder is sick, in pain, and is gravely ill. He pays homage with his head at the feet of the Fortunate One.’ Further, approach Ven. Sāriputta, and prostrate yourself at his feet, and say to him: ‘Venerable sir, Anāthapiṇḍika the householder is sick, in pain, and gravely ill. He pays homage with his head at the feet of Ven. Sāriputta.’ And also say thus: ‘Venerable sir, may Ven. Sāriputta, out of compassion, come to the house of Anāthapiṇḍika.’ ”

When Anāthapiṇḍika was in good health, he usually paid a visit to the Buddha at least once a day, and twice or thrice if he could manage it. But now that he was on his death bed, he was sending an attendant as messenger.

“Very well, sir,” replied the attendant to Anāthapiṇḍika, and went to the Buddha. He paid homage to the Buddha, prostrating himself at his feet, and said to him as instructed by his master. Then it was nearly sunset, and he next went to Ven. Sāriputta, approached him, prostrating himself at his feet, and said to Ven. Sāriputta as instructed by his master, requesting the venerable to visit Anāthapiṇḍika. Ven. Sāriputta signified his acceptance by remaining silent.

Then, Ven. Sāriputta robed himself up, and carrying his alms bowl and double robe, went to the house of Anāthapiṇḍika the householder, accompanied by Ven. Ānanda as his attendant in place of another monastic which was the custom. Upon arrival and after taking the seat prepared for him, he asked Anāthapiṇḍika: “Householder, are you feeling well? Are you feeling better? Is your pain decreasing and not increasing? Does it appear to be decreasing and not increasing?”

The Life Stories of the Male Lay Disciples – 2166

Anāthapiṇḍika, replied to Ven. Sāriputta how he was feeling unwell, how he was not feeling any better, how his pain was increasing and not decreasing, and how it appeared to be increasing and not decreasing, by giving four examples.

Ven. Sāriputta knew that the illness of the householder was not controllable but that it would end only with this death. So he considered it important not to talk about anything but to give a discourse that would be of benefit to him.

He gave the following discourse in a comprehensive manner: Since there is no possibility of checking an ailment which will end only with the death of the sufferer who, being under the influence of craving, conceit and wrong view, is attached to the six sense spheres, the six sense objects, the six kinds of consciousness, the six kinds of contact, the six kinds of sensation, etc.

So he said: “Householder, you should practise thus: ‘I will have no attachment for the eye, by way of either craving or conceit or wrong view, which is corporeality with sensitivity of seeing; then the consciousness which is dependent on the eye, through a subtle fondness (nikanti-taṇhā) for the eye [1423] will not arise in me!’ Householder, you should practise the threefold training in this way.”

Herein, “You should practise thus: ‘I will have no attachment to the eye,’ is said to exhort the householder to view the eye as impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and unsubstantial (anatta). This is so because if one views the eye as impermanent, conceit cannot gain any foothold, and it cannot arise; if one views the eye as suffering (dukkha), craving and attachment to the eye as “my eye” cannot arise; if one views the eye as unsubstantial, the wrong view of a personal identity or the ego as “my self” cannot arise. Hence to be free of the misconceptions through conceit, craving and wrong view, one should repeatedly view the eye as impermanent, suffering and unsubstantial.

The three misconceptions of conceit, craving and wrong view are crude mental states. Even when those misconceptions disappear, there is a subtle fondness (nikanti) for the eye that tends to persist. Ven. Sāriputta exhorts the householder to have his consciousness freed of this subtle fondness. The same applies to the other five sense bases, such as ear, nose, etc. and also to sense objects, etc.

Having exhorted Anāthapiṇḍika to train himself to be free of attachment from the eye through conceit, craving and wrong view, and also to have no lingering fondness for the eye, Ven. Sāriputta further exhorted him as follows:

“That being so, householder, you should practise thus: ‘I will have no attachment for the ear ... the nose ... the tongue ... for the mind, the mind-base; and not even a subtle fondness for the mind.’

That being so, householder, you should practise thus: ‘I will have no attachment for visual objects ... sounds ... odours ... tangible objects ... mind-objects; and not even a subtle fondness for mind-objects.’

That being so, householder, you should practise thus: ‘I will have no attachment for eye-consciousness ... ear-consciousness ... nose-consciousness ... body-consciousness ... mind-consciousness; and not even a subtle fondness for mind-consciousness.’

That being so, householder, you should practise thus: ‘I will have no attachment for eye-contact ... ear-contact ... nose-contact ... tongue-contact ... body-contact ... mind-contact; and not even a subtle fondness for mind-contact.’

That being so, householder, you should practise thus: ‘I will have no attachment for sensation arising out of eye-contact ... ear-contact ... nose-contact ... tongue-contact ... body-contact ... mind-contact; and not even a subtle fondness for sensation arising out of mind-contact.’

That being so, householder, you should practise thus: ‘I will have no attachment for the element of solidity ... the element of cohesion ... the element of heat ... the element of motion ... the element of space ... the element of consciousness; and not even a subtle fondness for the element of consciousness.’

That being so, householder, you should practise thus: ‘I will have no attachment for corporeality ... sensation ... perception ... volitions ... consciousness; and not even subtle fondness for consciousness.’

That being so, householder, you should practise thus: ‘I will have no attachment for the absorption (jhāna) of the infinity of space ... the infinity of consciousness ... nothingness ... neither-consciousness-nor-non-consciousness; and not even a subtle fondness for the absorption of neither-consciousness-nor-nonconsciousness.’

That being so, householder, you should practise thus: ‘I will have no attachment for the present world; then the consciousness which is dependent on the present world, [1424] through a subtle fondness for the present world, will not arise in me.’ Householder, you should practise the threefold training in this way.

That being so, householder, you should practise thus: ‘I will have no attachment for the hereafter; then the consciousness which is dependent on the hereafter, through a subtle fondness for the hereafter, will not arise in me.’ Householder, you should practise the threefold training in this way.”

From the first to the eighth round of exposition, the sentient world is being referred to. In the last, ninth round, “the present world” refers to volitions related to dwelling, food and raiment and other possessions; “the hereafter” means all forms of existence beyond the human existence. Ven. Sāriputta, by mentioning the hereafter, hints that the householder should not crave for grand mansions, gorgeous food and raiment, etc. in any of the celestial worlds.

Thus Ven. Sāriputta gave a comprehensive discourse in nine turns on the same theme. It may be noted that the three roots: craving, conceit and wrong view, are completely eliminated on becoming an Arahat. Of the three, wrong view is eradicated when Stream-entry knowledge is gained.

Ven. Sāriputta repeatedly exhorted Anāthapiṇḍika to practise so that no attachment to anything arises in the mind through any of these misconceptions. This connotes that becoming an Arahat should be the goal. This theme he impressed on the householder by nine different factors: sense spheres, sense-objects, consciousness, contact, sensation, elements, aggregates, absorption of the formless realm, and all things (sabbadhamma) knowable. The voidness, the emptiness, the unreality of these phenomena is comprehended when one becomes an Arahat.

When the discourse had ended, Anāthapiṇḍika, wept bitterly. Then Ven. Ānanda said to Anāthapiṇḍika: “Householder, are you attached to your possessions? Householder, are you wavering about your meritorious deeds?”

“Venerable sir,” replied Anāthapiṇḍika, “I am not attached to my possessions. Nor am I wavering. I have indeed, for a long time, attended upon the Fortunate One. I have also attended upon the monastics who are worthy of respect. But, I have never heard such words of Dhamma before.”

“Householder, the laity who wear white cloths cannot easily understand this word of the Dhamma.”

For lay persons it is not easy to follow the exhortation to break away from dear ones, such as wife and children, and various other possessions, such as valued attendants, fertile fields, etc.

“Householder, this word of the Dhamma can be understood easily only by monastics.”

“Ven. Sāriputta, I beg of you. Let this word of the Dhamma be made clear to the laity who wear white cloths. Venerable sir, there are many worthy men whose understanding is not clouded by the dust of defilements. For them, it is a great loss in not being able to see the supermundane through not having heard the Dhamma. There are likely to be people who will be able to fully understand the Dhamma and become Arahats, if only you expound the Dhamma to them.”

“I have never heard such words of the Dhamma before,” these words spoken by Anāthapiṇḍika needs to be explained. It is not that the householder was never before admonished by the Buddha using words of the same profound meaning. But the doctrine leading to becoming an Arahāt expounded by means of such a comprehensive arrangement involving nine different rounds, such as the six sense spheres, the six sense objects, the six kinds of consciousness, the six elements, the aggregates, the four absorptions (jhāna) of the formless realm, the present world and the hereafter, through all manner of knowing them, through seeing, hearing, attaining, cognizing, has never been taught him before.

To explain in another way: Charity and the delight in giving is the hallmark of Anāthapiṇḍika’s character. Never would he pay a visit to the Buddha or to monastics worthy of respect empty-handed. In the mornings, he would take gruel and edibles [1425] to them, in the afternoons, ghee, honey or molasses, etc. Even on some rare occasions when he had no offering to make to them, he would take his attendants along, carrying fine sand with them, which he let them spread about the monastic compound. At the monastery, he would make his offering, observe the precepts, and then go home. His noble behaviour was reputed to be one worthy of a Bodhisatta.

The Buddha, during the 24 years of his association with Anāthapiṇḍika, mostly praised him for his generosity: “I had practised generosity over four incalculable periods and 100,000 aeons. You are following my footsteps.” Great disciples, like Ven. Sāriputta, usually discoursed to Anāthapiṇḍika on the benefits of giving in generosity. That is why Ven. Ānanda said to him: “Householder, the laity who wear white clothes cannot easily understand this word of the Dhamma,” with reference to the present discourse by Ven. Sāriputta.

This should not be taken to mean that the Buddha never discoursed to Anāthapiṇḍika on the cultivating of insight, leading to path-knowledge and its fruition. In fact, the householder had heard the need for insight-development. Only that he had never listened to such an elaborate discussion running to nine rounds as in the present discourse. As the sub-commentary on the Discourse giving Advice to Anāthapiṇḍika has pointed out: “As a matter of fact, the Fortunate One had indeed discoursed to Anāthapiṇḍika on the subject of insight development as the straight course to the attainment of the noble path.”

Anāthapiṇḍika Reborn in the Tusita Realm

After admonishing Anāthapiṇḍika, Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Ānanda departed. Not long after they had left, Anāthapiṇḍika passed away and was reborn in the Tusita Realm.

Then, around the middle watch of the night, the Deva Anāthapiṇḍika approached the Buddha, and made obeisance to him.

Herein, the reason for Deva Anāthapiṇḍika’s visit to the Buddha should be noted. Being reborn in the Tusita Realm, Anāthapiṇḍika found out, was a great thing, full of sense pleasures. His body, three miles long, was shining like a mass of gold. His mansion, pleasure gardens, the wish-fulfilling tree where he could get anything by mere wishing, etc. were indeed alluring.

He reviewed his past existence and saw that his devotion to the Three Treasures had been the cause of this resplendent fresh existence. He considered his new Deva life. It was full of ease and comfort which could easily drown him in sense pleasures and forget the good doctrine. “I must now go to the human world and sing the praises of the Jetavana monastery, which was his past deed of merit, the Saṅgha, the Buddha, the noble path, and Ven. Sāriputta. Only on returning from the human world will I start enjoying this freshly acquired life.”

Four Verses Addressed to the Buddha

[These verses are found in the Discourse giving Advice to Anāthapiṇḍika (Anāthapiṇḍikovāda-sutta, MN 143)]

Venerable sir, this Jetavana monastery is the resort by day and by night of the Saṅgha, comprising monastics who are Arahats as well as those training themselves for Awakening. It is the residence of the Fortunate One, the King of the Dhamma. That is why it is source of delight to me.

The Jetavana monastery was a monastic complex comprising the Buddha's Perfumed Chamber, the square pinnacled monastery, a number of monastic dwellings with exquisite ornate designs with fruit trees, flowering trees and shrubbery and restful seats. It was a religious place of rare elegance, a visitor's delight. However, the real attraction of the Jetavana monastery lay in its residents, the taint-free noble ones (ariya) such as the Buddha and his noble disciples. And it was that spiritual beauty of the place rather than the sensual attraction that appealed to a noble one (ariya) like Anāthapiṇḍika. [1426]

In this verse, Anāthapiṇḍika extols the noble path of eight constituents.

That being so, the wise person, discerning his own welfare which culminates in Nibbāna, should contemplate, with right perception, the impermanence, the suffering and the unsubstantiality of the five aggregates which are the objects of clinging. Contemplating this, that person is purified through realizing the four noble truths.

The mind-body complex which one clings to as oneself, when brought to its ultimate analysis by means of insight-development, reveals its true nature. As insight fully develops into path-knowledge, the truth of the suffering (dukkha) of repeated existences, is seen through by the full understanding of phenomena. The truth of the origin of suffering is seen through and discarded. The truth of the cessation of suffering is realized by direct experience. The truth of the path is penetratingly understood by developing it. Then the yogi is free from the defilements and purity is achieved. In this verse, Anāthapiṇḍika extolled the development of insight and the realization of the path-knowledge.

A certain monastic reaches the other shore of Nibbāna. In this respect, he is equal to Ven. Sāriputta. But Ven. Sāriputta, with his knowledge (paññā), morality (sīla) and calm (upasama), through the pacification of the pollutants (āsava), is the noblest among those monastics who reach the other shore of Nibbāna.

In this verse, Anāthapiṇḍika extols the virtues of Ven. Sāriputta.

Deva Anāthapiṇḍika addressed these four verses to the Buddha. The Buddha listened to them without making any interruption, thus showing his approval. Then, Deva Anāthapiṇḍika thinking gladly: “The Teacher is pleased with these words, of mine,” made obeisance to the Buddha and vanished there and then.

Then, when the night had passed and morning had come, the Buddha addressed the monastics thus: “Monastics, last night, about the middle watch of the night, a certain Deva approached me, made obeisance to me, and stood in a suitable place. Then he addressed me with these verses.” The Buddha recited to the monastics the verses spoken by Deva Anāthapiṇḍika.

Here, the Buddha did not mention the name of Anāthapiṇḍika because he wanted the intuition of Ven. Ānanda to be brought to the fore.

Accordingly, as soon as the Buddha had spoken, Ven. Ānanda, without hesitating a moment, said: “Venerable sir, that Deva must have been the Deva Anāthapiṇḍika. Venerable sir, Anāthapiṇḍika the householder had much devotion to Ven. Sāriputta.”

“Well said, Ānanda, well said, Ānanda, you have the right intuition. Ānanda, that Deva was indeed Deva Anāthapiṇḍika,” so said the Buddha.

3. Citta the Householder

Aspiration in the Past

The future Citta the householder was reborn into a worthy family in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. On one occasion, while listening to the [1427] Buddha’s discourse, he saw a certain disciple being named by him as the foremost in expounding the doctrine. The worthy man aspired to that distinction. After making an extraordinary offering, he expressed his wish that, in some future existence, he would be designated by a Buddha as the foremost disciple in expounding the doctrine, and this was confirmed.

The Son of a Hunter

The future Citta was reborn either in the Deva realm or the human realm for 100,000 aeons. During the time of Buddha Kassapa, he was born as a son of a hunter. When he came of age, he took up the vocation of hunter. One rainy day, he went to the forest to hunt, carrying a spear. While searching for game, he saw a monastic with his head covered with his robe of dirt-rags, sitting on a rock platform inside a natural cavern. He thought that must be a monastic meditating. He hurried home and had two pots cooked simultaneously, one in which rice was boiled and the other for meat.

When the rice and the meat had been cooked, he saw two monastics come to his house for alms food. He invited them into his house, took their alms bowls, and requested them to accept his offering of alms food out of compassion for him. Having had the two monastics seated, he let his family take care of the offering of alms food to them while he hurried back to the forest to offer the alms food to the meditating monastic. He carried the rice and the meat in a pot properly covered with banana leaves. On the way, he gathered various kinds of flowers and wrapped them in some leaves. He went to the monastic in the cavern, filled his alms bowl with the alms food and offered it and the flowers to him reverentially.

Then he sat in a suitable place and said to the monastic: “Just as this offering of delicious food and flowers makes me very glad, may I, in future existences in the course of Saṃsāra, be blessed with all kinds of gifts. May flowers of five hues shower down on me!” The monastic saw that the supporter was destined to gain sufficient merit leading to attaining of path and fruit and taught him in detail the method of contemplating the 32 aspects of the parts of the body.

That son of the hunter, the future Citta, lived a life full of good deeds and at his death, he was reborn in the Deva realm. There, he was blessed with showers of flowers that rained down on him up to knee-deep.

Discipleship in His Last Existence

The future Citta was reborn in fortunate destinations throughout the aeon that intervened between the appearance of the two Buddhas, and during the time of Buddha Gotama, he was reborn as the son of a rich man in the town of Macchikāsaṅḍa, in the province of Magadha. At the time of his birth, flowers of five hues rained down over the whole town until they were knee-deep. His parents said: “Our son has brought his own name, for he has delighted the mind of the whole town by being blessed with the wondrous floral tribute of five colours. Let us call him Citta.”

When young Citta came of age, he was married and at the death of his father, he succeeded to the office of a rich man of Macchikāsaṅḍa. At that time, Ven. Mahānāma, one of the Group-of-Five ascetics, came to Macchikāsaṅḍa. Citta was full of reverence for Ven. Mahānāma for his serenity. He took the alms bowl of Ven. Mahānāma, and invited him to his house for an offering of alms food. After Ven. Mahānāma had finished his meal, Citta took him to his orchard, had a monastery built for him and requested him to reside there as well as to accept daily alms food from his house. Ven. Mahānāma consented out of compassion, and seeing that the householder was destined to acquire sufficient merit leading to the attainment of the paths and fruitions, he taught a discourse to him extensively on the six internal sense spheres and the six external sense spheres, that is, on the sense objects. This subject was taught to Citta because he was a person of middling intelligence (majjhima-puggala).

As Citta had, in his past existences, cultivated insight into the impermanence, suffering and unsubstantiality of mind and matter which are conditioned phenomena, his [1428] present efforts in insight-meditation led him to the stage of a Non-returner (Anāgāmī).

It is not mentioned in the scriptures by which method of meditation he attained Non-returning (Anāgāmi-phala). However, considering his training, it might be assumed that he attained path-knowledge by meditating on the sense spheres.

Incidentally, the difference in the attainments between Citta and Anāthapiṇḍika should be noted here. Anāthapiṇḍika, supporter of the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattihī, was a Stream-enterer who delighted in generosity (dānābhirata); whereas Citta, supporter of the Ambāṭaka monastery in Macchikāsaṅḍa, was a Non-returner who delighted in generosity (dānābhirata) as well as in Dhamma (Dhammābhirata).

Citta's Delight in Charity and in the Dhamma

A few instances of Citta's natural delight in generosity and in the Dhamma are mentioned here as recorded in the Thematic Discourses concerning Citta (Citta-samyutta, SN 41).

The Diversity of Elements

At one time, many monastics were living in the Ambāṭaka monastery which was donated by Citta the householder, in Macchikāsaṇḍa. One day, Citta went to the monastery and after paying respects to the elders, he invited them to an offering of food in his home the next day. Next day, when the elders were seated at the prepared seats, Citta made obeisance, sat in a suitable place, and said to the senior-most monastic present then: “Venerable sir, ‘diversity of elements,’ ‘diversity of elements’ (dhātu-nānattaṃ) has been said. To what extent is there the diversity of elements as taught by the Fortunate One?” The elder knew the answer but he was diffident to give a reply to the question, and so he remained silent. For a third time too the elder kept his silence.

Then Ven. Isidatta, the junior-most monastic among the monastics present, thought: “The elder does not answer the question, nor ask another monastic to answer. The Saṅgha, by not answering Citta's question, makes him appear to be harassing them. I shall save the situation by answering his question.” So, he went near the elder and said: “Venerable sir, may I be allowed to answer the question by Citta.” And the elder gave him permission to do so. Then, Ven. Isidatta returned to his seat and said to Citta: “Householder, you asked the question: “‘Diversity of elements,’ ‘diversity of elements,’ has been said; to what extent is there a diversity of elements?”

“Yes, venerable sir, that is so,” replied Citta.

“Householder, as taught by the Fortunate One there are various elements, such as the eye-element (cakkhu-dhātu), the element of visual object (rūpa-dhātu), the eye-consciousness element (cakkhu-viññāṇa-dhātu) ... the mind-element (mano-dhātu), the element of thought (dhamma-dhātu), the mind-consciousness element (mano-viññāṇa-dhātu). Householder, these are the various elements (dhātu-nānatta), as taught by the Fortunate One.”

Citta was satisfied with the answer given by Ven. Isidatta and personally attended to him at the food offering. When, after finishing the meal, the monastics returned to monastery, the elder said to Ven. Isidatta: “Friend Isidatta, you perceived the problem well. I have no such perception; therefore, friend Isidatta, when similar questions are asked of us, you may do the answering.”

Personality View

[The Second Discourse by Isidatta (Dutiya-isidatta-sutta, SN 41.3).]

On another occasion, when Citta the householder was making an offering of food to the Saṅgha in his residence, before serving the food he put this question to the elder: “Is the world permanent or is it impermanent?” The question is characteristic of wrong views, and implies the arising or otherwise of such a view. As in the previous case, the elder did not answer although he knew it. When he kept silence for three repeated questionings by Citta, Ven. Isidatta obtained the elder’s permission to answer and replied to him: “When there is the erroneous concept regarding the present [1429] body or the five aggregates, personality view (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) arises; when there is no erroneous concept regarding the five aggregates, personality view does not arise.”

Citta pursued the problem with questions as to how the erroneous concept regarding the present body of five aggregates arises, and how that concept does not arise. Ven. Isidatta gave analytical answers to his satisfaction.<sup>317</sup>

After that a conversation between Citta and Ven. Isidatta took place as follows:

Citta: “From which place do you come, venerable sir?”

Isidatta: “I come from Avanti country.”

Citta: “Venerable sir, in Avanti country there is a friend of mine, whom I have never met, by the name of Isidatta who had become a monastic. Have you met him, venerable sir?”

Isidatta: “Yes, I have, householder.”

Citta: “Venerable sir, where is that monastic now?”

<sup>317</sup> For the complete set of questions and answers the reader may read the complete Second Discourse to Isidatta (Dutiya-isidatta-sutta, SN 41.3).

Ven. Isidatta did not give a reply.

Citta: “Venerable sir, are you my friend whom I had never seen?”

Isidatta: “Yes, householder.”

Citta: “Venerable sir, may Ven. Isidatta be pleased to stay in Macchikāsaṅḍa. The Ambāṭaka monastery is pleasant to live in. I will see to all the four requisites, robes, alms food, dwelling and medicines.”

Isidatta: “Householder, you speak well.”

Ven. Isidatta said so merely to express his appreciation of the donation, but he did not say so with the intention of accepting the donation of any of the four requisites.

Citta was delighted with the answer given by Ven. Isidatta and personally attended on Ven. Isidatta in making offerings of alms food. When the monastics returned to the monastery the elder spoke to Ven. Isidatta in the same words as he did previously on the occasion of the First Discourse by Isidatta.

Then Ven. Isidatta considered that after revealing his identity as an unseen friend of Citta before becoming a monastic, it would not be proper for him to stay in the monastery donated by Citta. So after tidying up his living quarters and the monastery, he took his alms bowl and double robe and left the monastery for good, never to return to the town of Macchikāsaṅḍa.

Ven. Mahaka

[The Discourse on the Miracles of Mahaka (Mahaka-pāṭihāriya-sutta, SN 41.4).]

At one time, many monastics were living in the Ambāṭaka monastery, which was donated by Citta the householder, in Macchikāsaṅḍa. Then Citta went to the monastery and after paying respects to the Saṅgha, he invited them to his farmyard the next day, where his cows were kept. On the following day, the Saṅgha went to his farmyard and sat in the seats prepared for them. Then the householder personally offered milk rice to the Saṅgha.

He was served the milk rice in a gold vessel by his servants at the same time the Saṅgha were being served. As he was accompanying the Saṅgha, after the meal, to the monastery, he gave orders to his servants to make offerings of the remaining milk rice to suitable people. Then he accompanied the Saṅgha to their monastery.

It was scorching hot when the Saṅgha left the householder's farmyard. Walking in the hot sun, a rich meal was a rather inconvenient thing for the Saṅgha. Then Ven. Mahaka, the junior-most monastic, said to the senior-most monastic: "Elder, would a cool breeze in an overcast-sky with slight rain drops be convenient for everyone?" And the elder replied: "Friend Mahaka, a cool breeze in an overcast sky with slight rain drops would be convenient for everyone." [1430] Thereupon, Ven. Mahaka, by his powers, changed the weather, letting the cool breeze blow in an overcast sky with slight rain drops.

Citta noted this event as a marvellous power possessed by the junior monastic. When they arrived at the monastery, Ven. Mahaka said to the elder: "Elder, is that enough?" And the elder replied: "Friend Mahaka, that is enough. Friend Mahaka, that is something done well that deserves reverence." After this recognition of Ven. Mahaka's powers, all the monastics returned to their respective dwelling places within the monastery complex.

Then Citta requested Ven. Mahaka to display his miraculous powers. Ven. Mahaka said: "In that case, householder, spread your cloak at the door-step to my monastery. Put a pile of grass from the bundle of grass on the cloak." Citta did as was instructed by Ven. Mahaka. Then Ven. Mahaka entered the monastery, bolted the door from inside and sent out flames through the keyhole and through the edges of the door. The flames burned up the grass but the cloak remained unburnt. Then Citta picked up his cloak and, awestruck with goose-flesh appearing on his skin, he sat in a suitable place.

Thereafter, Ven. Mahaka came out of the monastery and said to Citta: "Householder, is that enough?" Citta replied: "Ven. Mahaka, that is enough. Ven. Mahaka, that is something accomplished. Ven. Mahaka, that deserves reverence. Venerable sir, may Ven. Mahaka be pleased to stay in Macchikāsaṅḍa. The Ambāṭaka monastery is pleasant to live in. I will see to the four requisites of robes, alms food, dwelling, medicines."

Ven. Mahaka said: "Householder, you say what is good."

However, Ven. Mahaka considered that it would not be proper for him to stay at the Ambāṭaka monastery. So after tidying up his living quarters and the monastery, he took his alms bowl and upper robe and left the monastery for good.

In the above two discourses, Citta the householder had great reverence and admiration for Ven. Isidatta and Ven. Mahaka in donating his monastic complex to the two monastics. However, from the point of view of the monastics, the four requisites they were donated were flawed because they amounted to rewards for their actions; Isidatta for expounding the Dhamma, and Mahaka for displaying miraculous power. Hence, out of regard for the monastic rules of conduct, they left the place for good.<sup>318</sup>

We have chosen these three discourses (sutta), the two about Ven. Isidatta and the one about Ven. Mahaka as examples of how Citta the householder cherished the Dhamma. The reader is advised to go through the rest of the discourses in the Thematic Discourses concerning Citta (Citta-saṃyutta, SN 41).

A Brief Story of Ven. Sudhamma

The following is mentioned in the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya). For details refer to the commentary on the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, Dh 73-74).

One day, the two chief disciples, accompanied by 1,000 monastic disciples, visited the Ambāṭaka monastery. At that time, Ven. Sudhamma was the Abbot of the monastery. Citta the householder, supporter of the monastery, made magnificent preparations to honour the visiting Saṅgha without consulting Ven. Sudhamma. Ven. Sudhamma took exception to it and remarked: “There is one thing missing in this lavish array of offerings and that is sesame cake.” This was an innuendo to belittle Citta, whose family, in the earlier generation, were sellers of sesame cakes.

Citta made a suitably rude response in vulgar language to the sarcastic remark of the Abbot, who was touched to the quick and took the matter to the Buddha. After listening to the Buddha’s admonition, the Abbot, Ven. Sudhamma, made amends to Citta. Then, staying at the Ambāṭaka monastery, and practicing the Dhamma, Ven. Sudhamma gained insight and became an Arahat. [1431]

Citta's Pilgrimage to the Buddha

The following account is also taken from the commentary on the commentary on the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, Dhp 73-74).

When Ven. Sudhamma became an Arahant, Citta the householder reflected thus: "I have become a Non-returner. But the stages of Awakening from Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) to Non-returning (Anāgāmi-phala) had been attained without even meeting the Buddha. It behoves me to go and meet him now."

He had 500 carts fully laden with provisions, such as sesame, rice, ghee, molasses, honey, clothing, etc., for the long journey to Sāvattthī. He made a public invitation to the populace in Macchikāsaṇḍa that anyone, male or female monastic, male or female lay disciple, might, if they wished, join him on a pilgrimage to the Buddha and that he would see to every need of the pilgrims. And, in response to his invitation, there were 500 monks, 500 nuns, 500 male lay disciples and 500 female lay disciples who joined him on the pilgrimage.

The 2,000 pilgrims who joined Citta plus the 1,000 of his entourage, totalling 3,000, were well provided for the 30-league journey. However, at every league of his journey, on the way Devas welcomed them with temporary shelter and celestial food, such as gruel, edibles, cooked rice and beverages and every one of the 3,000 pilgrims was attended on to his satisfaction.

By travelling a league a day, meeting with the Devas' hospitality at every stop, the pilgrims reached Sāvattthī after a month. The provisions carried in his 500 carts were not used. They even had surfeit of provisions which were offered by the Devas and human beings along the way, and which they donated to other persons.

On the day when the pilgrims were due to arrive in Sāvattthī, the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: "Ānanda, this evening Citta the householder, accompanied by 500 lay disciples, will be paying homage to me." Ānanda asked: "Venerable sir, will miracles happen then?"

"Yes, Ānanda, there will be miracles."

"In what manner will they happen, venerable sir?"

"Ānanda, when he comes to me, there will rain a thick floral tribute of five hues that will rise knee-deep over an area of fourteen acres."

The Life Stories of the Male Lay Disciples – 2181

This dialogue between the Buddha and Ven. Ānanda aroused the curiosity of the citizens of Sāvattthī. People passed on the exciting news of Citta's arrival, saying: "A person of great past merit by the name of Citta the householder is coming to town. Miracles are going to happen! He is arriving today! We will not miss the opportunity of seeing such a great person." With presents ready, they awaited on both sides of the road for the visitor and his friends.

When the pilgrim party arrived near the Jetavana monastery, the 1,000 monastics of the party went first. Citta told the 500 female lay disciples to stay behind, and follow later; and he went to the Buddha accompanied by 500 male lay disciples.

It should be noted that the disciples paying homage to the Buddha were not an unruly crowd but well-disciplined; whether sitting or standing, they left a passageway for the Buddha to go to his raised platform, and they would remain motionless and silent on either side of the aisle.

Citta then approached the aisle between the huge gathering of devotees. Whichever direction the noble disciple, who had been established in the fruition of the three lower paths glanced, the people murmured: "That is Citta the householder!" He became a thrilling object in that big gathering. Citta drew close to the Buddha and he was enveloped by the six Buddha-radiances. He stroked the Buddha's ankles with great reverence and vigour and then the floral tribute of five colours, described earlier, rained down. People cheered enthusiastically loud and long.

Citta spent one whole month in close attendance on the Buddha. During that time, he [1432] made a special request to the Buddha and the Saṅgha not to go out for alms food but to accept his offerings at the monastery. All the pilgrims that had accompanied him also were taken care of in every aspect. In his month-long stay at the Jetavana monastery, none of his original provisions were used, for Devas and humans made all sorts of gifts to Citta.

At the end of one month, Citta made obeisance to the Buddha and said: "Venerable sir, I came with the intention of making offerings of my own property to the Fortunate One. I spent one month on the way and another month here in the Jetavana monastery. Still I have had no opportunity to offer my own property for I have been blessed with all sorts of gifts from Devas and humans. It would seem that even if I were to stay here a year, I still may not have the chance to make offerings of my own property. It is my wish to deposit all the property I have brought here in this monastery for the benefit of the Saṅgha. May the Fortunate One be pleased to show me the place to do so.”

The Buddha asked Ven. Ānanda to find a suitable place for Citta to leave the 500 cart loads of provisions which were then offered to the Saṅgha. Then Citta returned to Macchikāsaṅḍa with the 500 empty carts, people and Devas, seeing the empty carts, remarked in mild rebuke: “Citta, have you done such deeds in the past as would lead to your going about with empty carts?” Then they loaded his empty carts to the full with the seven kinds of treasures. Citta also received sufficient gifts of all kinds, with which he catered to the needs of the pilgrims till he reached Macchikāsaṅḍa in ease and comfort.

Ven. Ānanda paid respects to the Buddha and said: “Venerable sir, Citta the householder took one month coming to Sāvattihī, and spent another month at the Jetavana monastery. During this period, he had made great offerings with gifts received from Devas and humans. He had emptied his 500 carts of all provisions which he had brought, and was returning home with empty carts. However, people and Devas who saw the empty carts said in mild rebuke: ‘Citta, have you done such deeds in the past as would lead to your going about with empty carts?’ And they are said to have filled Citta’s 500 carts with the seven kinds of treasures. And Citta is said to have returned home comfortably, looking after the needs of his companions with gifts received from Devas and humans.

Venerable sir, may I be allowed to ask a question: Does Citta meet with such abundance of honour and tribute only because he was on a pilgrimage to the Buddha? Would he meet the same kind of honour and tribute if he were to go elsewhere?”

The Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Ānanda, Citta the householder will receive the same kind of honour and tributes whether he comes to me or goes elsewhere. This is indeed so, Ānanda, because Citta the householder is one who has firm conviction about productive deeds (kamma) and their consequences, both in the mundane aspect and the supermundane aspect. Further, he is fully convinced about the supermundane benefits that the Three Treasures are capable of. For a person of such a nature, honour and tribute lines his path wherever he goes.” The Buddha further uttered this verse, which is translated in prose (Dhp 303):

Ānanda, the noble disciple who is endowed with conviction regarding the mundane and the supermundane aspects of one's own actions and morality, and is possessed of following and wealth, is held in reverence by men and Devas wherever he goes.

By the end of the discourse many hearers attained path-knowledge, such as Stream-entry, etc.

Foremost Title Achieved

From that time onwards, Citta the householder went about accompanied by 500 noble lay disciples. On one occasion, when the Buddha was naming distinguished lay disciples according to their merit, he declared, with reference to the discourses made by [1433] Citta as recorded in the Thematic Discourses concerning Citta (Citta-saṃyutta, SN 41):

*Etad-aggam̐ bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ upāsakaṇaṃ
Dhamma-kathikānaṃ yad-idaṃ Citto gahapati Macchikāsaṇḍiko.*

Monastics, among my lay disciples who are exponents of the Dhamma, Citta the Householder, of Macchikāsaṇḍa is the foremost.

The proficiency of Citta in expounding the Dhamma may be gleaned from the Discourse about the Fetters (Samyojana-sutta, SN 41.1), and the First Discourse concerning Kāmabhū (Paṭhama-kāmabhū-sutta, SN 41.5).

Seeing the Sick

[The following is based on the Discourse about Seeing the Sick (Gilāna-dassana-sutta, SN 41.10), and its commentary.]

As a Non-returner (Anāgāmi) who was the foremost expounder of the Dhamma among lay disciples, Citta the householder gave a discourse even on his deathbed.

When Citta was terminally ill many Devas who were guardians of his premises, guardians of the forest, guardians of certain trees and guardians who had power over herbs and trees, being of huge proportions, assembled before him and said to him: “Householder, now make a wish saying: ‘May I be reborn as a Universal Monarch when I die.’” Citta replied to them: “Being a Universal Monarch is impermanent in nature, unstable in nature. It is something that one must leave behind at last.”

His relatives and friends by his bedside thought he was uttering those strange words in a fit of delirium and said to him: “Lord, be careful; do not talk absent-mindedly.”

Citta asked them: “You say: ‘Lord be careful; do not talk absent-mindedly.’ With respect to what words of mine do you say so?” And the relatives and friends said: “Lord, you were saying: ‘Being a Universal Monarch is impermanent in nature, unstable in nature. It is something that one must leave behind at last.’”

Citta then said to them: “Men, Devas who are guardians of my premises, guardians of the forest, guardians of trees, guardians who have power over herbs and trees, came and said to me: ‘Householder, now make a wish saying: “May I be reborn as the Universal Monarch when I die.”’ So I told them: ‘Being a Universal Monarch is impermanent in nature, unstable in nature. It is something ones must leave behind at last.’ I was not saying these words absent-mindedly.”

Thereupon Citta’s friend and relatives asked him: “Lord, what advantages did these Devas see in advising you to wish for rebirth as Universal Monarch?”

Citta replied: “Men, these Devas thought: ‘This householder Citta has morality, has clean conduct, if he would wish for it he could easily have his wish fulfilled. One who is righteous can see benefits accruing to the righteous.’ This was the advantage they saw in advising me to wish for rebirth as a Universal Monarch. Thus, I replied to them: ‘Being a Universal Monarch is impermanent in nature, unstable in nature. It is something one must leave behind at last.’ I was not saying these words absent-mindedly.”

The friends and relatives of Citta then asked him again: “In that case, Lord, give us some admonition.” And Citta gave his last discourse thus: “In that case, friend and relatives, you should practise with the resolve: We will have perfect confidence in the Buddha, reflecting that:

1. The Buddha is worthy of homage by the greatest of humans, Devas and Brahmas.
2. The Buddha knows all things fundamentally and truly by his own perfect wisdom.
3. The Buddha is endowed with supreme knowledge and good conduct.

The Life Stories of the Male Lay Disciples – 2185

4. The Buddha speaks only what is beneficial and true. [1434]
5. The Buddha knows the three worlds.
6. The Buddha is incomparable in taming those who deserve to be tamed.
7. The Buddha is the teacher of Devas and humans.
8. The Buddha makes known the four noble truths.
9. The Buddha is endowed with the six great qualities of glory.

We will have perfect confidence in the Dhamma reflecting that:

1. The Dhamma of the Fortunate One is well expounded.
2. Its truths are evident.
3. It is not delayed in its results.
4. It can stand investigation.
5. It is worthy of being perpetually borne in mind.
6. Its truths can be realized by the noble ones individually by their own effort and practice.

We will have perfect confidence in the Saṅgha reflecting that:

1. The eight categories of noble disciples of the Fortunate One, the Saṅgha, are endowed with noble practice.
2. They are endowed with straightforward uprightness.
3. They are endowed with right conduct.
4. They are endowed with correctness in practice deserving reverence. Being thus endowed with these four attributes.
5. The eight categories of noble disciples of the Fortunate One consisting of four pairs are worthy of receiving offerings brought even from afar.
6. They are worthy of receiving offerings specially set aside for guests.
7. They are worthy of receiving offerings made for the sake of acquiring great merit for the hereafter.
8. They are worthy of receiving respect.

9. They are an incomparably fertile field for all to sow the seed of merit. And also you should practice with the resolve: ‘We shall always lay everything we have at the disposal of recipients who have morality and who conduct themselves well.’ ”

Citta the householder then made his friends and relatives established in paying reverence to the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha and in generosity. With these last words he expired.

The scriptures do not specifically say in which realm Citta the householder was reborn, but since he was a Non-returner (Anāgāmi), he was presumed to be reborn in one of the fifteen Brahma realms of the form realm outside of the formless realm, most probably in the Pure Abodes (Suddhāvāsa).

4. Hatthaka Āḷavaka, the Kind Prince

Aspiration in the Past

The future Hatthaka Āḷavaka was reborn into a worthy family in the city of Hāmsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. On one occasion, when he was listening to the Buddha’s discourse, he saw a lay disciple being named the foremost among those lay [1435] disciples who were accomplished in the practice of the four ways of kind treatment to others, through generosity, kindly speech, beneficial conduct and impartiality (Saṅgha-vatthu, see AN 4.256). He admired that man, and, making an extraordinary offering, he aspired to that distinction. The Buddha predicted that his aspiration would be fulfilled.

Discipleship in His Last Existence

The future Hatthaka Āḷavaka was reborn in the good destinations for the entire 100,000 aeons. During the time of Buddha Gotama he was reborn as Prince Āḷavaka, son of King Āḷavaka, in the city of Āḷavī, and it was decided to give the young prince to the Yakkha Āḷavaka as a sacrifice.

Before this could happen, however, the Buddha converted the Yakkha (see chapter 33c for details). The story of the young prince, which is reproduced from the same chapter continues:

When the king’s men from the city of Āḷavī heard the tumultuous acclaim, they thought to themselves: “Such a roar could not have occurred about any personage other than the Fortunate One. Could it be that the Fortunate One has come?” On seeing the bodily-radiance of the Buddha, they no longer remained outside the mansion but entered it without fear. There, in the Yakkha’s mansion, did they encounter the Buddha seated and the converted Yakkha Āḷavaka standing with his hands joined in adoration.

After seeing thus, the king’s men bravely handed the little Prince Āḷavaka over to the Yakkha Āḷavaka, saying: “Great Yakkha, we have brought this Prince Āḷavaka to give you in sacrifice. You may eat him if you wish. Do as you please.” As Āḷavaka had already become a noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) at that time and especially as he was told so in front of the Buddha, he felt greatly ashamed.

Then Āḷavaka tenderly took over the little prince with his two hands and offered him to the Buddha, saying: “Exalted Buddha, I offer this royal child to you. I give you the boy in generosity. Buddhas are kind and protective to sentient beings for their welfare. Exalted Buddha, please receive him, this Prince Āḷavaka, for his welfare and happiness.” He also uttered this verse (SnA, PTS 1.240):

Imaṃ kumāraṃ sata-puñña-lakkaṇaṃ, sabbāṅgupetaṃ paripuñña-byañjanaṃ, udagga-citto sumano dadāmi te, paṭiggaha loka-hitāya cakkhumā.

Exalted Buddha of the fivefold eye! Being elated and happy I, Āḷavaka by name, faithfully give you the Prince named Āḷavaka, who possesses more than 100 marks owing to his past meritorious deeds, who also has all the big and small limbs and a developed physical appearance. Buddhas look after the sentient beings for their benefit. Kindly accept the prince for his own welfare.

The Buddha accepted the little Prince Āḷavaka with his hands. While he was thus accepting, in order to give his blessing for the benefit of long life and good health of the Yakkha and the prince, the Buddha uttered three verses, each omitting a line to be filled up by somebody else. That blank in each verse was filled up three times as the fourth line by the Yakkha in order to establish the little prince in the three refuges. The incomplete verses [785] which were uttered by the Buddha and completed by the Yakkha are as follows:

Buddha:

The Life Stories of the Male Lay Disciples – 2188

*Dīghāyuko hotu ayaṃ kumāro, tuvañ-ca Yakkha sukhito bhavāhi,
abyādhitā loka-hitāya tiṭṭhatha.*

May this Prince Āḷavaka live long! Yakkha Āḷavaka, may you also have physical and mental happiness! May you both remain long, being free from the 96 diseases, for the welfare of many!

Yakkha:

Ayaṃ kumāro saraṇam-upeti Buddhāṃ.

Exalted Buddha! This Prince Āḷavaka takes refuge in the Fortunate One, lord of the world, and omniscient Buddha.

Buddha:

*Dīghāyuko hotu ayaṃ kumāro,
tuvañ-ca Yakkha sukhito bhavāhi,
abyādhitā loka-hitāya tiṭṭhatha.*

May this Prince Āḷavaka live long! Yakkha Āḷavaka, may you also have physical and mental happiness! May you both remain long, being free from the 96 diseases, for the welfare of many!

Yakkha:

Ayaṃ kumāro saraṇam-upeti Dhammāṃ.

Exalted Buddha! This Prince Āḷavaka takes refuge in the Dhamma consisting of the ten features, such as the four paths, four fruitions, Nibbāna and the entire body of teaching.

Buddha:

*Dīghāyuko hotu ayaṃ kumāro,
tuvañ-ca Yakkha sukhito bhavāhi,
abyādhitā lokahitāya tiṭṭhatha.*

May this Prince Āḷavaka live long! Yakkha Āḷavaka, may you also have physical and mental happiness! May you both remain long, being free from the 96 diseases, for the welfare of many!

Yakkha:

Ayaṃ kumāro saraṇam-upeti Saṅghāṃ.

Exalted Buddha! This Prince Āḷavaka takes refuge in the Saṅgha of the noble ones in the ultimate and noble sense of the word (paramattha-ariya).

Then the Buddha entrusted the little prince to the king's officers, ordering: "Bring up this royal child and later return him to me!"

The original name of the prince was Āḷavaka. As has been said, the day the Yakkha was tamed, the prince was passed from the hands of the royal officers to the Yakkha's hands, from the Yakkha's hands to the Buddha's hands, from the Buddha's hands back to the hands of the officers. Hence he was named Hatthaka Āḷavaka – Āḷavaka who has been handed over from person to person.

When the officers returned, carrying the little prince, they were seen by farmers and foresters and other people, who asked timidly: "How is it? Is it that the Yakkha does not want to devour the prince because he is too small?" – "Friends, do not be afraid," replied the officers, "The Fortunate One has made him free from danger," and they related the whole story to them.

Then the entire city of Āḷavī cheered, shouting: Well done! Well done! The people faced in the direction where the Yakkha Āḷavaka was and roared: "The Fortunate One has caused safety! The Fortunate One has caused safety!" When it was time for the Buddha to go to town for alms food, the Yakkha went along, carrying the Buddha's bowl and robe half the way down to see the Buddha off, and then he returned to his mansion. [786]

After the Buddha went on alms round in the city of Āḷavī and when he had finished his meal, he sat on the splendid seat which was prepared under a tree in quietude at the city gate. Then King Āḷavaka came with his hosts of ministers, troops and they were joined by the citizens of Āḷavī who did obeisance to the Buddha and sat down around him and asked: "Exalted Buddha, how could you tame such a wild and cruel Yakkha?"

The Buddha then delivered the Discourse to Āḷavaka (Āḷavaka-sutta, Snp 1.10) in twelve verses in which he started his narration with the attack made by the Yakkha and related in detail: "In this manner did he rain down nine kinds of weapons, in this manner did he exhibit such horrible things, in this manner did he put questions to me, in this manner did I answer his questions." By the end of the discourse 84,000 sentient beings realized the four truths and found emancipation.

Now King Āḷavaka and the citizens of Āḷavī built a shrine for the Yakkha Āḷavaka, near the original shrine of the Deva Vessavaṇa. And they regularly made offerings to the Yakkha of things worthy of divine beings (devatā-bāli) such as flowers, perfumes, etc.

When the little prince grew up into an intelligent youth, they sent him to the Buddha with these words: “You, prince, have secured a new lease of life because of the Fortunate One. Go and serve the master. Serve the Saṅgha of monks as well!” The prince approached the Buddha and the monks and rendered his service to them, practised the Dhamma, and was established in the Non-returning fruition (Anāgāmi-phala). He also learned all the teachings of the Three Baskets (Tipiṭaka) and acquired a retinue of 500 lay devotees for the Buddha.

Foremost Title Achieved

One day, Hatthaka Āḷavaka, who kept the Observance Day precepts, accompanied by 500 lay disciples, visited the Buddha. After paying respects to him, he sat in a suitable place. When the Buddha saw his big following, and very sedate manners of those that came with Hatthaka Āḷavaka, he said: “Āḷavaka you have a big following; what sort of kind treatment do you extend to them?” And Hatthaka Āḷavaka replied: “Venerable sir, I practise generosity towards those persons who would be delighted by my act of generosity; I use pleasant words to those who would be delighted by pleasant words; I give necessary assistance to those who are in need of such assistance and who would be delighted by my assistance; I treat those as my equals in respect of those who would be delighted by such treatment.

With reference to that conversation between the Buddha and Hatthaka Āḷavaka, on one occasion, during the Buddha’s residence at the Jetavana monastery when he was conferring titles to outstanding lay disciples, he declared:

catūhi saṅgha-vatthūhi parisam saṅgaṇhantānaṃ yad-idam Hatthako Āḷavako.*

Monastics, among my lay disciples who treat their followers kindly in four ways, Hatthaka Āḷavaka is the foremost.

5. Mahānāma, the Sakyan Prince

Aspiration in the Past

The future Mahānāma was reborn into a worthy family in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. One day, while he was listening to a discourse by the Buddha, he saw a lay disciple being named as the foremost lay disciple in offerings of the most delicious and palatable alms food, medicines and medicinal articles. He had a strong wish to become such a distinguished lay disciple in future. After making an extraordinary offering, he made known his aspiration to the Buddha who then predicted that his aspiration would be fulfilled.

Discipleship in His Last Existence

One day, the Buddha, after staying in Verañjā for the Rains Retreat (Vassa) period, made a journey to Kapilavatthu, travelling in stages. Upon arrival, he took up his abode at the Nirodhārāma monastery in Kapilavatthu, together with many monastics.

When Mahānāma, the Sakyan Prince, the elder brother of Ven. Anuruddha, learned of the arrival of the Buddha, he visited him, made his obeisance, and sat in a suitable place. Then he said to the Buddha: “Venerable sir, I have been told that the Saṅgha have had a hard time in gathering alms food in Verañjā. May I be allowed the privilege of offering daily alms food to the Saṅgha for a period of four months, so that I may provide the [1436] necessary nourishment to compensate for the deficiency of nourishment during the last three months or more.” The Buddha signified his assent by remaining silent.

Prince Mahānāma, understanding that the Buddha had accepted his invitation, made offerings of five kinds of very delicious foodstuffs and the four sweets (catu-madhu) which have medicinal effects to the Buddha and his Saṅgha from the following day onwards. At the end of the four months, he obtained the Buddha’s consent to make the same kind of offerings for another four months, at the end of which he obtained permission to continue with his offerings for a further four months, thus totalling twelve months in all. At the end of one year, he sought further approval but the Buddha refused.

The Life Stories of the Male Lay Disciples – 2192

At the end of the year, Prince Mahānāma sought and obtained the approval of the Buddha to let him have the privilege of offering medicinal requisites to the Saṅgha for life. Yet later, due to circumstances that led to a Vinaya provision in the matter, the Buddha did not extend the period beyond one year. After the Buddha had agreed to let Mahānāma provide medicinal requisites to the Saṅgha for life, the Group-of-Six monastics bullied Prince Mahānāma and caused much annoyance. When the Buddha heard this he rescinded the earlier privilege allowed to the Prince and laid down the rule known as An Invitation for Four Months (Catummāsappaccaya-pavāraṇā, Vin Pāc 47, PTS 4.101), that no monastic may, without further invitation and a standing invitation, accept medicinal requisites from a supporter. Breach of the rule entails a confession (pācittiya) offence.

Foremost Title Achieved

It became the routine practise of Prince Mahānāma to offer the five kinds of very delicious foodstuffs and the four sweets which have medicinal effects to every monastic who came to his door. This elaborate style of providing alms food and medicinal requisites to the Saṅgha became his hallmark which was recognised throughout Jambūdīpa.

Therefore, on a later occasion, when the Buddha, during his residence at the Jetavana monastery, was designating titles to outstanding lay disciples according to their merit, he declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakaṇaṃ upāsakaṇaṃ
paṇīta-dāyakaṇaṃ yad-idam Mahānāmo Sakko.*

Monastics, among my lay disciples who are in the habit of making offerings of delicious alms food and medicinal requisites, Mahānāma, the Sakyan Prince, is the foremost.

6. Uggā the Householder

Aspiration in the Past

The future Uggā was reborn into a worthy family in the city of Hāmsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. On one occasion, while he was listening to a discourse by the Buddha, he saw a disciple being named as the foremost among those who made gifts that delighted the receivers. He aspired to that distinction, and after making extraordinary offerings, he expressed his wish before the Buddha. The Buddha predicted that his aspiration would be fulfilled.

Discipleship in His Last Existence

After being reborn in the Deva realm or the human world for 100,000 aeons, the future Ugga was reborn into a rich man's family in the city of Vesālī, during Buddha Gotama's time.

The future Ugga was not given any name during his childhood. When he came of age, he possessed a majestic physique like an ornamental door-post, or a golden apparel hung for display. His exquisite masculine body and personal attributes became the talk of the town, as such people came to refer to him as Ugga the householder, "the mighty householder."

It is noteworthy that Ugga gained Stream-entry knowledge on his very first meeting with [1437] the Buddha. Later, he came to be established in the three lower paths and three lower fruits, and became a Non-returner (Anāgāmī).

When Ugga grew old, he resorted to seclusion and this thought occurred to him: "I shall offer to the Fortunate One only those things that I cherish. I have learnt directly from the Fortunate One: 'He who makes a gift of what he cherishes, reaps the benefit that he cherishes.'" Then his thought extended to the wish: "That the Fortunate One knew my thought and appeared at my door!"

The Buddha knew the thought of Ugga and at that very moment appeared miraculously at his door, in the company of many monastics. Ugga, on learning of the Buddha's arrival, went to welcome him, paid respects to him with the hands, knees and forehead touching the ground, took the alms bowl from his hands and invited him to the prepared seat in his house, at the same time, he offered seats to the accompanying monastics. He served the Buddha and the Saṅgha with various kinds of delicious food, and after the meal was finished, he sat in a suitable place and addressed the Buddha thus:

1. "Venerable sir, I have learnt directly from the Fortunate One that: 'He who makes a gift of what he cherishes, reaps the benefit that he cherishes.' Venerable sir, my cake made to resemble the Sāla flower is delightful. May the Fortunate One, out of compassion, accept this food." And the Buddha, out of compassion for the supporter, accepted it. Further Ugga said:

“Venerable sir, I have learnt directly from the Fortunate One that: ‘He who makes a gift of what he cherishes reaps the benefit that he cherishes.’ Venerable sir:

2. My specially prepared dish of pork with jujube is delightful ...
3. My vegetable dish of water convolvulus cooked in oil and water and done in oil gravy is delightful ...
4. My special rice, carefully discarded of black grains ...
5. My fine cloth made in Kāsi province is delightful ...
6. Venerable sir, my dais ... my big carpet of long-fleece ... woollen coverlets with quaint designs ... rugs made of black panther’s hide ... couches with red canopies and with red bolsters at either end are delightful. Venerable sir, I understand that these luxurious things are not proper for use by the Fortunate One. Venerable sir, this seat made of the core of sandalwood is worth over 100,000 pieces of money. May the Fortunate One, out of compassion, accept these pieces of furniture.” The Buddha out of compassion for the supporter accepted them.

Note here that Ugga the householder is offering the items of furniture after serving the gruel but before serving the main meal. His offerings are made not only to the Buddha but also to the Saṅgha. Under item 6) above, Ugga said: “I understand that these luxurious things are not proper for use by the Fortunate One.” There are also things that are not proper for use by the Buddha. He has caused them to be heaped together and assigned items, which are improper for use by the Buddha, to his store room, and donates only items which are proper. The sandalwood, being very dear and rare, is valued highly. After the Buddha had accepted it, he had it cut up into small bits and distributed to the monastics for use as a powder in preparing eye-lotion.

Then the Buddha spoke the following verses in appreciation of the donations (AN 5.44).

Ugga, one who gives in generosity with a delightful heart reaps the benefit of that deed in various delightful ways. One gives away clothing, dwelling place, food and various other things, strongly desirous of merit, to those noble ones who are straight in thought, word, and deed, who are Arahats.

That virtuous one who distinctly knows the Arahats as the fertile field for sowing seeds of merit and gives up delightful things that are hard to be given up, abandons them, releases them liberally with a delightful heart, reaps the benefit of that deed in various delightful ways. [1438]

After uttering these verses in appreciation of the householder's memorable offerings, the Buddha departed.

On that occasion, Ugga the householder said to the Buddha: “Venerable sir, I have heard from the Fortunate One's teaching that ‘He who makes a gift of what he cherishes, reaps the benefit that he cherishes.’ Venerable sir, whatever suitable articles are in my possession may be assumed by the Fortunate One as already donated to the Fortunate One and his Saṅgha.” Thenceforth, he always donated various suitable things to the Buddha and his Saṅgha.

Foremost Title Achieved

On account of this, when the Buddha, during his residence at the Jetavana monastery, was designating outstanding lay disciples according to their merit, he declared:

manāpa-dāyakaṇaṃ yad-idaṃ Uggo Gahapati Vesālīko.*

Monastics, among my lay disciples who are in the habit of giving delightful things in generosity, Ugga the Householder of Vesālī, is the foremost.

Householders Ugga of Vesālī has eight marvellous qualities.

A brief description of these qualities is given here. For a full account the reader is directed to the First Discourse about Ugga (Paṭhama-ugga-sutta, AN 8.21).

The Eight Marvellous Qualities of Ugga of Vesālī

At one time, while staying at the Kūṭāgārasāla monastery in the Great Wood, near Vesālī, the Buddha said to the monastics: “Monastics, note that Ugga the Householder of Vesālī, has eight marvellous qualities.” He then retired to his private chamber.

Later, a monastic went to the house of Ugga and sat at a place prepared for the Saṅgha.<sup>319</sup> Ugga greeted him, paid respects to the monastic, and sat in a suitable place. To Ugga, the monastic said: “Householder, the Fortunate One said that you are endowed with eight marvellous qualities. What are these eight qualities?”

Ugga replied: “Venerable sir, I am not sure which eight qualities the Fortunate One sees in me that he calls marvellous, but as a matter of fact, I have eight qualities that are most extraordinary. May your reverence listen to them and consider well.” – “Very well, householder,” the monastic said, and Ugga told his story:

1. “Venerable sir, from the moment I cast my eyes on the Buddha, I had explicit faith in him as the Buddha, with no vacillation. So, venerable sir, my confidence in the Buddha at first sight is the first extraordinary thing about me.
2. Venerable sir, I approached the Buddha with pure conviction. The Fortunate One discoursed to me in a step-by-step exposition on the merits of giving with generosity; the [1440] virtue of morality; the description about the celestial world, the world of the Devas; and the practice of the noble path leading to the paths, fruitions (magga-phala) and Nibbāna. That made my mind receptive, malleable, free of hindrances, elated and clear. The Fortunate One, knowing this, expounded to me regarding the exalted Dhamma, the four noble truths of suffering (dukkha), the origin of suffering, the cessation of suffering, and the way leading to the cessation of suffering. Consequently, I gained the eye of the Dhamma and attained Non-returning (Anāgāmi-phala). From the time I became a Non-returner (Anāgāmi) I took a lifelong vow of the supermundane refuge and observed the five precepts with a pure life of chastity (brahma-cariyā) as one of the routine precepts.<sup>320</sup> This is the second extraordinary thing about me.

The Life Stories of the Male Lay Disciples – 2197

3. Venerable sir, I had four teenage wives. When I returned home on the day I became a Non-returner (Anāgāmī), I called the four wives and said to them: ‘Dear sisters, I have taken a vow of chastity for life. You may continue staying in my house, enjoying my wealth and practising generosity, or you may return to your parents’ house, taking sufficient riches with you for a comfortable life. Or, if any one of you wishes to remarry, just tell me who is going to be your new bridegroom. Each of you are free to exercise these options.’ Thereupon, my first wife expressed her wish to remarry and she named the bridegroom. I then let that man come to me, and holding my first wife in my left hand, and the libation jug in my right hand, I offered my wife to that man and sanctified their marriage. In relinquishing my first wife, who was still very young, to another man, I felt nothing in my mind. Venerable sir, my detachment in giving up my first wife to another man is the third extraordinary thing about me.
4. Venerable sir, whatever possessions I have in my house, I deem them to be assigned to the virtuous ones with morality. I hold back nothing from the Saṅgha. It is as though they are already in the possession of the Saṅgha as a body. Venerable sir, this liberality towards the Saṅgha, in considering all my possessions as being assigned to the virtuous monastics, is the fourth extraordinary thing about me.
5. Venerable sir, whenever I attend to a monastic, I do so reverently and personally, but never irreverently, venerable sir. Reverentially attending to monastics is the fifth extraordinary thing about me.
6. Venerable sir, if that monastic teaches me a discourse, I listen reverentially, but never irreverently. If that monastic does not teach me a discourse, I will teach a discourse to him. Venerable sir, my listening reverentially to a discourse by a monastic, and my teaching a discourse to the monastic who does not teach me, is the sixth extraordinary thing about myself.
7. Venerable sir, Devas often come to me, saying: ‘Householder, the Fortunate One expounds the Dhamma which is excellent in the beginning, excellent in the middle, and excellent in the end.’ I would say to those Devas: ‘O Devas, whether you say so or not, the Fortunate

One expounds the Dhamma which is indeed excellent in the beginning, excellent in the middle, and excellent in the end.’ I do not think the Devas’ coming to me to say those words is extraordinary. I do not feel exhilarated by their coming to me and for the experience of conversing with them. Venerable sir, my indifference to the coming of Devas to me and the experience of conversing with them is the seventh extraordinary thing about me.

8. Venerable sir, I do not see any of the five fetters that tend to rebirth in the lower sensuous realms of existence that have not been discarded in me. Venerable sir, my having attained Non-returning (Anāgāmi-magga) is the eighth extraordinary thing about me.

Venerable sir, I know I have these eight extraordinary qualities. But I am not sure which eight qualities the Fortunate One sees in me that he calls marvellous.”

Thereafter, the monastic, having received alms food from Ugga the householder, departed. He took his meal and then went to the Buddha, made obeisance to him, and sat in a suitable place. Sitting thus, he related to the Buddha the full details of the conversation that [1441] took place between him and Ugga the householder.

The Buddha said: “Good, good, monastic. Anyone who could answer your questions well should be given these very answers that Ugga the householder did. Monastic, I say that Ugga the householder is endowed with those eight extraordinary qualities that are marvellous. Monastics, note that Ugga the householder has these very eight marvellous qualities that he told you.”

The Destination of Ugga the Householder

Thereafter, on a certain day, Ugga the householder of Vesālī died and was reborn in one of the five Pure Abodes (Suddhāvāsa) in the Brahma Realms. The Buddha was then residing at the Jetavana monastery. At that time, about the middle of the night, Brahma Ugga, with his resplendent body that flooded the whole of the Jetavana monastic complex, approached the Buddha, made his obeisance to him, and stood at a suitable distance. To that Brahma Ugga, the Buddha said: “How is it? Is your desire fulfilled?” And Brahma Ugga replied: “Venerable sir, my desire is indeed fulfilled.”

Herein, it might be asked: “What did the Buddha mean by ‘desire’? And what does the Brahma’s reply mean?” The answer is: the Buddha means becoming an Arahāt and the Brahma’s answer also means becoming an Arahāt. For the main desire of Uggata was becoming an Arahāt.

Then the Buddha addressed Brahma Uggata in these two verses (AN 5.44):

He who gives away a delightful thing begets a delightful thing. He who gives away the best begets the best. He who gives away what is desirable begets what is desirable. He who gives away what is praiseworthy begets what is praiseworthy.

He who is in the habit of giving away the best things, things that are desirable, things that are praiseworthy, is reborn as one who lives long and who has a big following.

7. Uggata the Householder

Aspiration in the Past

The future Uggata was reborn into a worthy family in the city of Hāmsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. On one occasion, he was listening to a discourse by the Buddha when he saw a lay disciple being named as the foremost in attending on the Saṅgha without discrimination. He admired that man. As such, he made an extraordinary offering to the Buddha and his Saṅgha and after that, he aspired to the same distinction in front of the Buddha who predicted that his aspiration would be fulfilled.

Discipleship in His Last Existence

The future Uggata was reborn in fortunate destinations for 100,000 aeons before being reborn into a rich man’s family in Hatthigāma, in the country of the Vajjis, during the time of Buddha Gotama. He was named Uggata, and when he came of age, he inherited his father’s estate.

At the time when the Buddha, after a tour of the country in the company of many monastics, arrived at Hatthigāma and was sojourning in the Nāga Park, Uggata was then [1439] indulging himself in a drinking spree, in the company of dancing girls, for seven days at the Nāga Park too. When he saw the Buddha, he was overwhelmed with shame and when he went before the Buddha, he became sober suddenly. He made obeisance to the Buddha and sat in a suitable place.

The Life Stories of the Male Lay Disciples – 2200

Then the Buddha taught him a discourse, at the end of which, he was established in the three lower paths and fruitions, and became a Non-returner (Anāgāmi).

From that moment on, he released the dancing girls from his service and devoted himself to generosity. Devas would come to him at the middle watch of the night and report to him as to the conduct of various monastics. They would say: “Householder, such and such a monastic is endowed with the three knowledges; such and such a monastic is endowed with the six kinds of super knowledges; such and such a monastic has morality; such and such a monastic has no morality, etc.” Uggata disregarded the failings of the monastics who lacked in morality as his devotion to the Saṅgha remained steadfast on account of the monastics of good morality. In making gifts therefore, he never discriminated between the good and the bad monastic, his devotion being directed to the Saṅgha as a whole. When he went before the Buddha, he never mentioned about the bad monastics but always extolled the virtues of the good.

Foremost Title Achieved

Therefore, on one occasion, during his residence at the Jetavana monastery, when prominent lay disciples were mentioned for their respective merits, the Buddha declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakanam upāsakanam
Saṅghupaṭṭhākānam yad-idam Hatthigāmakō Uggato gahapati.*

Monastics, among my lay disciples who devotedly attend on the Saṅgha without discrimination, Uggata the householder of Hatthigāma is the foremost.

Householders Uggata of Hatthigāma has eight marvellous qualities.

The Eight Marvellous Qualities of Uggata of Hatthigāma

At one time, when the Buddha was sojourning at Hatthigāma, in the country of the Vajjians, he said to the monastics: “Monastics, note that Uggata the householder of Hatthigāma has eight marvellous qualities.” After saying this brief statement, the Buddha went into the monastery.

Later, a monastic went to the house of Uggata and sat at a place prepared for the Saṅgha. Uggata greeted him, paid respects to the monastic, and sat in a suitable place. To Uggata, the monastic said: “Householder, the Fortunate One said that you are endowed with eight marvellous qualities. What are these eight qualities?”

Uggata replied: “Venerable sir, I am not sure which eight qualities the Fortunate One sees in me that he calls marvellous, but as a matter of fact, I have eight qualities that are most extraordinary. May your reverence listen to them and consider well.” – “Very well, householder,” the monastic said, and Uggata told his story:

1. “Venerable sir, while I was indulging myself in sensuous pleasures in my own Nāga Park, I saw the Buddha from a distance. As soon as I cast my eyes on the Buddha, I had explicit faith in him as the Buddha, and was deeply devoted to him. I became suddenly sober after my drunken bout. Venerable sir, my explicit faith in and devotion to the Buddha at first sight and my recovering sobriety at that moment is the first extraordinary thing about me.
2. Venerable sir, I approached the Buddha with a pure conviction. The Fortunate One discoursed to me in a most appropriate step-by-step exposition on: 1) The merits of giving in generosity, 2) the virtue of morality, 3) the description about the world of Devas, 4) the practice of the noble path. That made my mind receptive, malleable, free of hindrances, elated and clear. The Fortunate One, knowing this, expounded to me the exalted Dhamma, the four noble truths of suffering, the origin of suffering, the cessation of suffering, and the way leading to the cessation of suffering. Consequently, I gained the eye of the Dhamma, and attained Non-returning (Anāgāmi-phala). From the time I became a Non-returner (Anāgāmi), I took a lifelong vow of the supermundane refuge, together with the observance of the five precepts with abstinence (brahma-cariyā) as one of them. Venerable sir, my attainment of Non-returning (Anāgāmi-phala) after my first meeting with the Buddha and my subsequent taking up of the supermundane refuge of the five precepts with the vow of abstinence, is the second extraordinary thing about me.
3. Venerable sir, I had four teenage wives. When I returned home on the day I became a Non-returner (Anāgāmi), I called up my four wives and said to them: ‘Dear sisters, I have taken the vow of chastity for life. You may continue staying in my house, enjoying my wealth and practising generosity, or you may return to your parents' house, taking sufficient riches with you for a comfortable life. Or, if anyone of you wishes to remarry, just tell me who is going to be your new bridegroom. Each of you are free to exercise those options.' Thereupon, my first wife expressed her wish to remarry and she named the bridegroom. I then let that man come up to me, and, holding my first wife in my left hand, and the libation jug in my right hand, I offered my wife to that man and sanctified their marriage. In relinquishing my first wife, who was still very young, to another man, I felt nothing in my mind. Venerable sir, my detachment in giving up my first wife to another man is the third extraordinary thing about me.

4. Venerable sir, whatever possessions I have in my house, I consider them to be assigned to the virtuous monastics. I hold back nothing from the Saṅgha. Venerable sir, this liberality towards the Saṅgha, in considering all my possessions as being assigned to the virtuous monastics, is the fourth extraordinary thing about me.
5. Venerable sir, whenever I attend to a monastic, I do so reverently and personally, but never irreverently. If that monastic teaches me a discourse, I listen reverentially, but never irreverently. If that monastic does not teach me a discourse, I teach a discourse to him. Venerable sir, my reverentially attending to monastics, reverentially listening to [1442] their discourses, and my teaching a discourse to the monastic who does not teach me, is the fifth extraordinary thing about me.
6. Venerable sir, whenever I invite the Saṅgha to my residence, Devas would come to me and say: 'Householder, such and such a monastic is emancipated both ways from the corporeal body (rūpa-kāya) and the mental body (ubhato-bhāga-vimutta); such and such a monastic has attained emancipation through full knowledge and insight (paññā-vimutta); such and such a monastic is one who has realized Nibbāna in his own person (kāya-sakki); such and such a monastic has attained to the three higher paths (magga) and fruitions (phala) through right view (diṭṭhippatta); such and such a monastic is emancipated through faith (saddhā-vimutta); such and such a monastic is one who follows faith (saddhānusārī); such and such a monastic is one who pursues Dhamma (Dhammānusārī); such and such a monastic has morality, and is virtuous; such and such a monastic lacks morality and is vile.” I do not think the Devas’ coming to me to say these words is extraordinary. When I attend to the Saṅgha, it never occurred to me that such and such a monastic lacks morality, and so I will make only scant offering to him, or that such and such a monastic is virtuous and so I will make great offerings to him. I make offerings both to the virtuous monastics and the vile monastics in the same reverential spirit. Venerable sir, my indiscriminate offering and attendance on both the virtuous and the vile monastics is the sixth extraordinary thing about me.

7. Venerable sir, Devas often come to me, saying: ‘Householder, the Fortunate One expounds the Dhamma which is excellent in the beginning, excellent in the middle, and excellent at the end.’ And I would say to those Devas: ‘O Devas, whether you say so or not, the Fortunate One expounds the Dhamma which is excellent in the beginning, excellent in the middle, and excellent in the end.’ I do not think that the Devas coming to me to say those words is extraordinary. Venerable sir, my indifference to the coming of Devas to me and the experience of conversing with them is the seventh extraordinary thing about me.
8. Venerable sir, in the event of my predeceasing the Fortunate One, the Fortunate One’s remarks about me such as: ‘Uggata the householder of Hatthigāma has no fetters in him that tend to rebirth in the sensuous realm,’ will not be anything extraordinary. Venerable sir, the fact that there is no fetter in me that tends to rebirth in the sensuous realm is the eighth extraordinary thing about me.

Venerable sir, I know I have these eight extraordinary qualities. But I am not sure which eight qualities the Fortunate One sees in me that he calls marvellous.”

Thereafter, the monastic, having received alms food from Uggata the householder, departed. He took his meal and then went to the Buddha, made obeisance to him, and sat in a suitable place. Sitting thus, he related to the Buddha the full details of the conversation that took place between him and Uggata the householder.

The Buddha said: “Good, good, monastic. Anyone who could answer your questions well should be given these very answers that Uggata the householder did. Monastic, I say that Uggata the householder is endowed with those eight extraordinary qualities that are marvellous. Monastics, note that Uggata the householder has these very eight marvellous qualities that he told you.”

In the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) discourses both the above two householders are called “Ugga.” Here we are leaning on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) about the foremost disciples in calling the householder of Hatthigāma, Uggata, in contradistinction to Ugga, the householder of Veśālī. Since the noble and rare attributes of these two householders inspire devotion, these notes are somewhat more than summarized statements.

8. Sūrambaṭṭha the Householder

Aspiration in the Past

The future Sūrambaṭṭha the householder was born into a worthy family in the city of Hāmsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. While listening to a discourse by the Buddha, he saw a lay disciple being named by the Buddha as the foremost lay disciple who had firm conviction in the teaching. He aspired to that distinction, and, after making an extraordinary offering, he expressed his wish that at some future existence his aspiration would be fulfilled.

Discipleship in His Last Existence

The future Sūrambaṭṭha was reborn in the Deva or human realms for 100,000 aeons before being reborn into a rich man’s family of Sāvattḥī, during the time of [1443] Buddha Gotama. His name was Sūrambaṭṭha. When he came of age, he married and became a regular lay supporter of ascetics who were outside the Buddha’s teaching.

Early one morning, the Buddha, in his routine review of the world for individuals who were ready for Awakening, saw the ripeness of the past merit of Sūrambaṭṭha the householder to gain Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga). So, he went to Sūrambaṭṭha’s house for alms food. Sūrambaṭṭha thought to himself: “Ascetic Gotama comes from a royal family and has earned a vast reputation in the world. Perhaps, it is only proper for me to welcome him.” Thinking thus, he went to the Buddha, made obeisance at his feet, took his alms bowl, and conducted him to a raised couch which was set aside for noble persons. He made offerings of food and after attending on him, sat in a suitable place.

The Buddha taught a discourse, which suited the mental framework of Sūrambaṭṭha, at the end of which, he was established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). After bestowing Sūrambaṭṭha with Stream-entry knowledge, the Buddha returned to the monastery.

Then Māra thought: “This Sūrambaṭṭha the householder belongs to my fold and is a follower of the ascetics which are outside the Buddha’s teaching. But the Buddha has visited his house today. Why? Has Sūrambaṭṭha become a noble one (ariya) after hearing the Buddha’s discourse? Has he escaped from my domain of sensuality? I must find out.” Then, being possessed of powers of impersonating anyone, he assumed the form of the Buddha complete with the 32 marks of the great man and in perfect Buddha-style of holding the alms bowl and the robe. In that deceitful impersonation, he stood at the door of Sūrambaṭṭha the householder.

Sūrambaṭṭha wondered why the Buddha visited a second time, when he was informed by his attendants. “The Buddha never comes without some good reason,” he thought, and approached the impersonated Buddha in the belief that he was the real Buddha. After paying respects to the impersonated Buddha, he stood in a suitable place, and asked: “Venerable sir, the Fortunate One has just left this house after having a meal. For what purpose does the Fortunate One come again?”

The bogus Buddha, who was really Māra, said: “Lay supporter Sūrambaṭṭha, I made a slip in my discourse to you. I said that all of the aggregates are impermanent, suffering and insubstantial. But the five aggregates are not always of that nature. There are certain of the five aggregates that are permanent, stable and eternal.”

Sūrambaṭṭha, a Stream-enterer, was vexed by that statement. He pondered thus: “This is a statement of most serious import. The Buddha never makes a slip in his speech, for he never utters a word without proper consideration. They say that Māra is the opponent of the Buddha. Surely this must be Māra himself.” Thinking correctly thus, he asked bluntly: “You are Māra, are you not?” Māra was shocked and shaken as if struck with an axe because it was a confrontation by a noble one. His disguise fell off and he admitted it: “Yes, Sūrambaṭṭha, I am Māra.”

Sūrambaṭṭha rebuked him: “Wicked Māra, even 1,000 of your kind will not be able to shake my conviction. Buddha Gotama, in his discourse has said: “All conditioned things are impermanent.” And the Buddha’s discourse has led me to Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga). Get out of here!” He said it so sternly to Māra, snapping his fingers. Māra had no words to cover up his ruse, and vanished immediately.

In the evening, Sūrambaṭṭha went to the Buddha and related the visit of Māra to him and what Māra had said, and how he had dealt him. “Venerable sir,” he said to the Buddha, “in this way has Māra attempted to shake my conviction.” [1444]

Foremost Title Achieved

Referring to this incident, the Buddha, during his residence at the Jetavana monastery, on the occasion of naming outstanding lay disciples in accordance with their merits, declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvakānaṃ upāsakānaṃ
aveccappasannānaṃ yad-idaṃ Sūrambaṭṭho.*

Monastics, among my lay disciples who have unshakeable conviction in my teaching, Sūrambaṭṭha is the foremost.

9. Jīvaka the Physician

Aspiration in the Past

The future Jīvaka was reborn into a worthy family in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. While listening to a discourse by the Buddha, he saw a lay disciple being named as the foremost among those who had personal devotion to the Buddha. He aspired to that distinction in a future time. After making an extraordinary offering, he expressed his wish before the Buddha who then predicted its fulfilment.

Discipleship in His Last Existence

The future Jīvaka was reborn in the Deva realm or the human realm for 100,000 aeons, before being reborn, under strange circumstances, in the city of Rājagaha, during the time of Buddha Gotama. He was conceived in the womb of a courtesan named Sālavatī, the conception being caused by Prince Abhaya.

The Life Stories of the Male Lay Disciples – 2207

It was the custom of courtesans to nurture only female children whereas male children were discarded discreetly. Accordingly, Sālavatī, the courtesan, had her newly-born baby put on an old bamboo tray and thrown into a rubbish heap by a trusted servant without being noticed by anyone.

The child was observed from a distance by Prince Abhaya who was on his way to attend on his father King Bimbisāra. He sent his attendants: “Men, what is that thing surrounded by crows?” The men went to the rubbish heap and finding the baby, said: “My Lord, it is a newly-born baby boy!”

“Is he still alive?”

“Yes, my Lord, he is.”

Prince Abhaya had the child taken to his royal residence and taken care of. As the prince’s attendants replied to their master: “It is still alive” (jīvati), the child was named Jīvaka. And since he was brought up by Prince Abhaya, he was also called: “Jīvaka, Komārabhacca.”

Young Jīvaka, the adopted son of Prince Abhaya, was sent to Takkasilā for his education at the age of sixteen. He learned medicine and gained mastery of the subject. He became the king’s physician. At one time, he cured King Caṇḍapajjota of a grave illness, for which he was honoured by that king with 500 cartloads of rice, 16,000 pieces of money of silver, a pair of fine clothes made in the province of Kāsi, and 1,000 pieces of cloth to supplement it.

At that time, the Buddha was staying in the mountain monastery on the side of Gijjhakūṭa Hill, near Rājagaha. Jīvaka, the king’s physician, cured the constipation of the Buddha by administering a mild laxative. Then it occurred to Jīvaka: “It were well if all the four requisites of the Fortunate One were my donations,” and accordingly, he invited the Buddha to stay in his Mango Grove as a monastery. After curing the Buddha’s illness, he offered the fine Kāsi cloth to the Buddha and the 1,000 pieces of cloth that were supplementary to it were offered to the Saṅgha.

This brief account of Jīvaka is based on the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya). For a fuller account, the reader is urged to refer to the Vinaya (Vin Mv 8).

Foremost Title Achieved

On one occasion, during the Buddha's residence at the Jetavana monastery when he conferred titles to distinguished lay disciples in accordance with their merit, he declared: [1445]

puggalappasannānaṃ yad-idaṃ Jīvako Komārabhacco.*

Monastics, among my lay disciples who have personal devotion, Jīvaka, the adopted son of Prince Abhaya, is the foremost.

10. Nakulapitu the Householder

Aspiration in the Past

The future Nakulapitu was reborn into a worthy family in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. While he was listening to a discourse by the Buddha, he saw a lay disciple being named by him as the foremost among those who were close to the Buddha. He aspired to that title. After making extraordinary offerings, he expressed his wish in front of the Buddha, who then predicted that his aspiration would be fulfilled.

Discipleship in His Last Existence

The future Nakulapitu was reborn either in the Deva realm or the human realm for 100,000 aeons until, during the time of Buddha Gotama, he was reborn into a rich man's family in Susumāragira in the province of Bhagga. When he succeeded to the family estate, he and his wife were called by the name of their son Nakula, as “the father of Nakula” (Nakulapitu) and “the mother of Nakula” (Nakulamātu).

The Buddha, on his tour of the country in the company of many monastics, arrived at Susumāragira and was sojourning in the Bhesakaḷā Forest.

Susumāragira, “the sound of a crocodile,” was the name of the town because, at the time of the founding of the town, a crocodile's sound was heard. The forest was known as Bhesakaḷā because it was the domain of a female demon by the name of Bhesakaḷā.

Nakulapitu and his wife Nakulamātu went to the Bhesakaḷā forest along with other people of the town to visit the Buddha. At the first sight of Buddha, the couple took him as their own son and prostrating themselves before him, saying together: “Dear son, where have you been over this long time, away from us?”

Nakulapitu in the past 500 existences had been the father of the Bodhisatta; for 500 existences he had been his paternal uncle who was junior to his father; for 500 existences he had been his paternal uncle who was senior to his father; for 500 existences he had been his maternal uncle.

Nakulamātu for the past 500 existences had been the mother of the Bodhisatta; for 500 existences she had been his maternal aunt who was junior to his mother; for 500 existences she had been his maternal aunt who was senior to his mother; for 500 existences she had been his paternal aunt. These long blood-relations of the past existences had left such a strong sense of affection in the hearts of the Nakulapitu and Nakulamātu for the Buddha that they perceived him as their own son who had been somehow staying away from them.

The Buddha allowed the couple to remain at his feet holding them for as long as they wished, and waited until such time they were satisfied emotionally with the joy of seeing him again. Then, when the parents of his past existences had gained a mental state of equanimity, the Buddha, knowing their mental framework and their inclination, taught them a discourse, at the end of which, they were established in the fruition of Stream-entry knowledge.

On a later occasion, when the couple were advanced in age, they made another visit to Susumāragira. The old couple invited the Buddha to their house and on the next day offered delicious food of various kinds. When the Buddha had finished his meal, the old couple approached him, made their obeisance, and sat in a suitable place. Then Nakulapitu said to him: “Venerable sir, since in my youth I married my wife, I had never been disloyal to her even in my thoughts, not to speak of being disloyal physically. Venerable sir, we wish to see each other in the present existence, and we wish to see each other in our future existences.” [1446]

Nakulamātu also said likewise to the Buddha: “Venerable sir, since in my youth I became the wife of Nakulapitu, I had never been disloyal to him, even in my thoughts, not to speak of being disloyal physically. Venerable sir, we wish to see each other in our present existence, and we wish to see each other in our future existences.”

The Life Stories of the Male Lay Disciples – 2210

The commentary to the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya) gives only a brief account. We shall supplement it here.

Thereupon, the Buddha said to them: “Lay supporters, if a certain couple wish to see each other in the present existence as well as in the future existences, their wishes will be fulfilled on these four conditions: 1) They should have the same degree of conviction in the teaching; 2) they should have the same degree of morality; 3) they should have the same degree of giving in generosity; and 4) they should have the same degree of intelligence.”

Then the Buddha uttered the following verses (AN 4.55):

1-2. “For that couple, both of whom possess conviction in teaching, who have a liberal mind towards those who come for help, who have restraint in thought, word and deed, who use kind words towards each other, who lead a righteous life, benefits multiply, and a life of ease and comfort is their lot. Unfriendly people bear malice against such a couple with equal morality.

3. For such a couple with equal morality and good conduct who are desirous of sensual objects, living a life according to the Dhamma in the present existence, both of them find delight in this world and rejoice in the Deva realm.”

Foremost Titles Achieved

The above discourse stemming from the intimate statements made by the Nakulapitu couple is known as the First Discourse about Living in Balance (Paṭhama-sama-jīvī-sutta, AN 4.55). The discourse reveals the intimate relationship that existed between them and the Buddha in the nature of filial connection. The old couple evidently put great faith in and reliance on the Buddha, whom they considered as their own son. That was why they disclosed their inner sentiments to the Buddha, without any sense of diffidence.

That was why, while the Buddha was staying in the Jetavana monastery and outstanding lay disciples were designated by him as foremost in their own merit, he declared:

vissāsakanam yad-idam Nakulapitā gahapati.*

Monastics, among my lay disciples who are close to the Buddha, Nakulapitu, the householder, is the foremost. [1447]

45b: The Life Stories of the Female Lay Disciples

1. Sujātā, Wife of the Householder of Bārāṇasī

Aspiration in the Past

The future Sujātā was reborn into the family of a rich man in the city of Haṃsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. On one occasion, as she was listening to a discourse by the Buddha, she saw a female lay disciple being named by the Buddha as the foremost in getting established in the three refuges. She aspired to that distinction. After making an extraordinary offering, she expressed her aspiration before the Buddha who predicted that her aspiration would be fulfilled.

Discipleship in Her Last Existence

The future Sujātā was reborn either in the Deva realm or the human world for 100,000 aeons. Some time before the appearance of the Buddha Gotama, she was reborn as the daughter of Seniya, in the town of Senā, near the Uruvelā forest. When she came of age, she went to the banyan tree which was near her town and after making an offering to its guardian spirit, she vowed that if she should be married to a bridegroom of equal social status and if she bore a boy as her first child, she would make an offering to the guardian spirit yearly. Her wish was fulfilled.

Sujātā was married to the son of a rich man of Bārāṇasī and her first child was a boy whom was named Yasa. She kept her vow and made annual offerings to the guardian spirit of the banyan tree.

After making these annual offering at the banyan tree for 20 times or so, on the day the Buddha was to attain Perfect Awakening in the year 528 BCE, Sujātā went to make her annual offering to the guardian spirit of the banyan tree.

On that occasion, Sujātā's son, Yasa, was already married and was indulging in luxury in the three mansions. This is mentioned because Sujātā had been generally imagined as a young maiden when she offered the specially prepared milk rice to the Buddha.

On the full moon of May (Vesākha) in 528 BCE, after six years of self-tormenting practice in search of the truth, the Buddha attained Perfect Awakening. Sujātā rose early that morning to make an offering at the banyan tree. On that day, the young calves somehow did not go near their mothers for milk. When the housemaids of Sujātā brought the vessels to draw milk from the cows, the nipples of the cows automatically flowed freely with milk. On seeing the strange phenomenon, Sujātā herself collected the milk, put it in a new cooking vessel, kindled the fire and started cooking the rice milk.

When the milk was being boiled, extra-large bubbles arose in a series and rotated in clockwise direction in the pot and not a drop of milk overflowed. The Mahā Brahma held the white umbrella above the pot; the Four Great Kings guarded the pot with the royal swords in hand; Sakka attended to the fire which boiled the milk; Devas brought various nutrients from the four island continents and put them into the pot. In these ways, the celestial beings joined in the effort of Sujātā in preparing the milk rice.

While Sujātā was preparing the rice-milk, she called her servant Puṇṇā and said: “Good girl, Puṇṇā, I believe the guardian spirit of the banyan tree is in a particularly good mood because I had never seen such strange phenomena happen before in these long years. Now, go quickly and clean the precinct for offering at the banyan tree.” – “Very well, madam,” the servant girl responded and went to the banyan tree promptly.

The Bodhisatta sat at the foot of the banyan tree, earlier than the time for collection of his daily alms food. The servant girl, who went to clean the foot of the banyan tree, [1448] mistook the Bodhisatta for the guardian spirit of the tree and she reported to her mistress with excitement. Sujātā said: “Well, girl, if what you say is true, I will release you from bondage.” Then dressing and decorating herself, Sujātā went to the banyan tree, carrying on her head the milk rice, which was put into a golden vessel worth 100,000 pieces of money, covered with a golden lid and wrapped with a white piece of cloth and over which, garlands of fragrant flowers were placed so that they hang around the vessel. When she saw the Bodhisatta, whom she presumed to be the guardian spirit of the tree, she was intensely glad and approached him, bowing as she approached. Then she put down the vessel, took off the lid and offered it to the Bodhisatta, saying: “May your desire come to fulfilment as has mine!” Then she left him.

The Bodhisatta went to the River Nerañjarā, put down the golden vessel of rice-milk on its bank and bathed in the river. Then, coming out of the river, he ate the rice-milk in 49 morsels. After which, he placed the empty gold vessel on the River Nerañjarā. It floated against the river current and then sank.

He then went to the foot of the Bodhi tree. He attained Perfect Self-Awakening and remained there for seven weeks; each week at seven locations at and around the Bodhi tree. At the end of 49 days, during which the Buddha dwelled in the attainment of cessation, he went to Isipatana Deer Park where he set the Dhamma Wheel rolling by expounding the Dhamma to the Group-of-Five ascetics. Then he saw the ripeness of the past merit of Yasa, the son of Sujātā, wife of the householder of Bārāṇasī and he waited for him by sitting underneath a tree.

Yasa had grown weary of sensuous pleasure after seeing the unsightly spectacle in his harem in the middle of the night. “How suffering are these sentient beings with their mind and body being oppressed by all sorts of defilements! O, how terribly they are being tormented by defilements!” Yasa murmured and left his home in sheer disgust with life.

On leaving the town, he met the Buddha and after listening to his discourse, he gained penetrative knowledge of the truth and became established in the fruition of Stream-entry knowledge.<sup>321</sup>

Yasa’s father traced his son’s whereabouts almost behind his heels. He went and asked the Buddha whether his son came that way. The Buddha, by his power, hid Yasa from his father’s vision and taught a discourse to his father. At the end of which, Yasa’s father attained Stream-entry knowledge and Yasa became an Arahat. Then, the Buddha made Yasa a monastic by summoning him: “Come, monastic,” and Yasa’s appearance instantly changed into that of a monastic, complete with alms bowl, robes and essential items for monastic use. These were all mind-made by the Buddha’s power.

Yasa’s father invited the Buddha to his home the next day for an offering of alms food. The Buddha went, accompanied by Ven. Yasa. After the meal, he taught a discourse, at the end of which, Ven. Yasa’s mother, Sujātā, and his erstwhile wife were established in the fruition of Stream-entry knowledge. On the same day, they were established in the three refuges.

This is a brief account of Sujātā and her family. For fuller details, the reader may refer to chapter 12.

Foremost Title Achieved

On one occasion, while the Buddha was naming foremost female lay-disciples, he declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvikanam upāsikanam
paṭhamam saraṇam gacchantīnam yad-idam Sujātā Seniya-dhītā.*

Monastics, among my female lay-disciples who were the earliest to get established in the refuges, Sujātā, daughter of Seniya the householder, is the foremost. [1449]

2. Visākhā, Builder of Pubbārāma Monastery

Aspiration in the Past

The future Visākhā was reborn into a rich man's family in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. On one occasion, when she was listening to a discourse by the Buddha, she saw a female lay disciple being named by him as the foremost in giving in generosity. She aspired to that distinction. After making an extraordinary offering, she expressed her aspiration before the Buddha, who predicted that it would be fulfilled.

The Youngest Daughter of King Kikī

The future Visākhā was reborn either in the Deva realm or the human world for 100,000 aeons, where five Buddhas are to appear. During the time of Buddha Kassapa, she was reborn as the youngest of the seven daughters of King Kikī, in the province of Kikī.

Princess Saṅghadāsī, the youngest of the seven daughters of King Kikī was reborn in the Deva realm or the human realm for the entire interim period between the two Buddhas Kassapa and Gotama.

Discipleship in Her Last Existence

During the time of Buddha Gotama, she was conceived in the womb of Sumanadevī, the chief consort of Dhanañjaya the householder, son of Meṇḍaka the householder, in the town of Bhaddiya, in the province of Aṅga. She was named Visākhā by her parents and kinsmen. When Visākhā was seven years of age, the Buddha arrived in Bhaddiya in the company of many monastics on his religious mission in the country. He visited Bhaddiya for the purpose of causing the Awakening of Sela, the Brahmin, and other persons whose past merit had ripened for Awakening.

Five Personages with Great Past Merit

At that time, Meṇḍaka, the father-in-law of Visākhā, was the chief among the five remarkable personages endowed with great past merit: 1) Meṇḍaka the householder, 2) Candapadumā, his wife, 3) Dhanañjaya, the son of Meṇḍaka, 4) Sumanadevī, the wife of Dhanañjaya and 5) Puṇṇa, the servant of Meṇḍaka.

How remarkably endowed with great past merit these five persons were, will be described here, condensed from the commentary on the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, Dhṃ 252).

1. The miraculous power of Meṇḍaka the householder.

One day, Meṇḍaka, wishing to know his own power, had his 1,250 granaries emptied. Then, after washing his head, he sat in front of the door of his house and glanced skyward. Suddenly, there rained from the sky heavy showers of top quality red rice which filled his 1,250 granaries. Meṇḍaka further wished to know the miraculous powers of the members of his household and asked them to find out themselves.

2. The miraculous power of Candapadumā, wife of Meṇḍaka.

Then, Candapadumā, wife of Meṇḍaka, having adorned herself, took a measure of rice in the presence of everybody and had it cooked. She sat at a seat prepared at her front door and after announcing to all that anyone wishing to have cooked rice might go to her, she ladled it out with her golden ladle, to every caller. Her rice-pot never diminished more than one ladle-mark, even after the whole day's distribution.

In her past existence, during the time of some past Buddha, this remarkable lady had offered alms food to the Saṅgha, with her left hand holding the rice vessel and her right [1450] hand holding the spoon, filling the alms bowl full. As a result of that good deed, in her present existence, her left palm bore the mark of a lotus flower (paduma) while her right palm bore the mark of a full moon (canda). Further, she had, during the time of some past Buddha, offered filtered water with her hand holding the water-strainer and going about from one monastic to another. As the result of that good deed, her right sole bore the mark of a full moon while her left sole bore the mark of a lotus flower. On account of these distinctive marks on her palms and soles, she was named Candapadumā, “Moon and Lotuses,” by her parents and kinsmen.

3. The miraculous power of Dhanañjaya, son of Meṇḍaka.

Dhanañjaya the householder, after washing his hair, sat at his door with 1,000 pieces of money of silver by his side, after making a public proclamation to the effect that anyone wishing to have money, could ask from him. He filled the vessel of every caller with money. After having done so, his money of 1,000 pieces of money remained the same amount.

4. The miraculous power of Sumanadevī, the daughter-in-law of Meṇḍaka.

Sumanadevī adorned herself and sat in the open with a basket of seed grain, after making an announcement that anyone wishing to have seed grain could ask from her. She distributed the seed grain to every caller, filling their vessel. After having done so, her basket of seed grain remained the same amount.

5. The miraculous power of Puṇṇa, the trusted servant of Meṇḍaka.

Puṇṇa, after dressing decently as benefiting his status, yoked a team of oxen, on whose side he made his five-finger imprint of scented unguent and whose horns he decorated with gold, harnessing them to golden chains, and mounting a plough, he started ploughing Meṇḍaka’s field before the spectators. His plough made not just a furrow underneath his plough but made three extra furrows on either side, so that in one operation he accomplished seven times the effort.

Thus the whole populace of Jambudīpa obtained all their needs, such as rice, seed grain, money, etc., from Meṇḍaka’s house. This is a brief description of the five personages with great past merit.

Within the area of Rājagaha, King Bimbisāra's domain, besides Meṇḍaka, there were four other householders: Jotika, Jaṭila, Puṇṇa and Kākavaliya. King Bimbisāra had within his domain these five householders with inexhaustible resources.

Of these five, the story of Puṇṇa the householder will be included in the story of Uttarā. The other four will be briefly described in chapter 45c.

When Meṇḍaka heard of the arrival of the Buddha, he said to his granddaughter, the daughter of Dhanañjaya: “Granddaughter, what I am going to say is for the auspicious earning of merit for you and as well as for me. Go and welcome the Buddha, who is on his way, ride with your 500 female attendants in each of your coaches together with 500 maid servants.”

Visākhā Established in Stream-Entry at Age Seven

Visākhā gladly obeyed her grandfather and left home in 500 coaches. Her grandfather might have thought of her riding the coach to the presence of the Buddha, such being his sense of self-importance, but Visākhā was a person of innate wisdom and considered it improper to go to the Buddha's presence riding in a coach. As such, she dismounted at a reasonable distance from the Buddha, went on foot to him, made obeisance to him and sat in a suitable place.

The Buddha taught her a discourse which suited the mental frame of a seven-year old. At the end of the discourse, Visākhā and her 500 attendants attained Stream-entry knowledge and first fruition.

Meṇḍaka also visited the Buddha, made obeisance to him and sat in a suitable place. The Buddha taught a discourse to suit the mental frame of Meṇḍaka, at the end of which, he was established in the fruition of Stream-entry knowledge. He invited the Buddha to an [1451] alms food offering in his house the next day. The following day he made an offering of delicious food to the Buddha and his Saṅgha. He made the offerings on a lavish scale for fifteen days continuously. The Buddha stayed at Bhaddiya for as long as there were people who deserved to be Awakened.

Visākhā and Family Moved to Sāketa

Pasenadi of Kosala, King of Sāvattihī, wrote to King Bimbisāra saying that as there was no householder of inexhaustible resources in his kingdom, he requested him to send one such family to Kosala.

King Bimbisāra held a conference with his ministers, who said: “Great King, we cannot afford to spare any of our householders who are of inexhaustible resources. But, to satisfy the King of Kosalans, let us send the son of one of your five such householders.” King Bimbisāra agreed to the proposal. Dhanañjaya, son of Meṇḍaka, was requested to move to the Kosalan kingdom.

Herein, the commentary on the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada) states that the Kosalan King and King Bimbisāra were brothers-in-law, in a double sense. King Bimbisāra could not fail to satisfy the wish of the Kosalan King. He also could not offend his five famous householders, and so he requested Dhanañjaya to go and settle in the Kosalan kingdom. Dhanañjaya agreed and he was sent to the King of the Kosalans.

After moving his family from Bhaddiya to the Kosalan kingdom, Dhanañjaya identified a location which had great potential for human settlement. He asked the Kosalan King as to whose territory that location belonged to. And being told that it lay within the Kosalan kingdom, he further asked as to how far it was from Sāvattihī, the capital. The king answered: “It is one league from here to Sāvattihī.” Then Dhanañjaya said to the king: “Great King, Sāvattihī is not big enough for my householder to live in. If your majesty would agree, I would settle in this location so that my big following can live in comfort.” The king consented, and Dhanañjaya founded a town at that location. Since it was a location of the settler’s choice, it was named “Sāketa.”

In Sāvattihī, Puṇṇavaḍḍhana, son of Migāra the householder, had come of age. His father considered that it was time for his son to get married and he told his kinsmen to look for a bride for his son. The bride should come from a householder’s family. Intelligent and discreet scouts were sent to look for such a bride but none could be found in the city of Sāvattihī. The scouts therefore went to Sāketa.

One day, Visākhā went to a lake, which was outside Sāketa, accompanied by 500 attendant maidens who were of the same age as her, to bathe and frolic in the water. At that time, the scouts from Sāvattihī had left Sāketa, without success in looking for a suitable lady. They resorted to standing at the town’s gate. Then rain started to pour down. Visākhā and her companions left the town to seek shelter from the rain in a public rest house. The 500 maidens ran into the rest house. None of them caught the eyes of the scouts as promising. But, coming behind these maidens was young Visākhā, who was walking towards the rest house in her normal pace, disregarding the rain. The scouts recognized her beauty. They pondered: “As regards personal appearance, there can be no other girl in the world who can equal her. However, personal beauty is like a fresh ripe pomegranate. Her manner of speech needs to be assessed. We should start a conversation with her.” And so they addressed her in the following way:

Visākhā replied: “Fathers, why do you say so?”

“Your companions entered this rest house by running, fearing to get wet. As for you, you came at your normal pace, like an elderly lady. You do not seem to mind your dress being drenched. Supposing an elephant or a horse were after you, would you take the same leisurely steps?”

“Father, clothing may be bought without difficulty. What does my dress matter? But my [1452] person is important to me, for a girl is like a piece of merchandise. If by running, I were to stumble and break my limbs and become physically unsound, where is my worth as a likely bride? That was why I did not run.”

The scouts from Sāvattthī agreed amongst themselves that they had found a suitable bride for their master’s son; a girl fair in form as well as fair in speech, with a beautiful voice. They threw the bridal garland above Visākhā, who, understanding what it meant, acquiesced in the act by sitting on the spot. Migāra’s scout then put up a screen around the proposed bride. Having been thus ceremonially treated, Visākhā went back to her home accompanied by her maid servants. Migāra’s scouts went along to the house of her father, Dhanañjaya the householder.

A conversation between Migāra’s men and Visākhā’s father about the proposed betrothal took place as follows:

Dhanañjaya: O men, what is your native village?

Elders: Householder, we represent Migāra the householder of Sāvattthī. Our master has learnt that you have a young daughter who is of marriageable age and he wants her as the bride for his son. We came to request the hand of your daughter.

Dhanañjaya: Very well, men, your master is not our equal in wealth. However, he is of equal status by birth. It is a rare thing to meet one’s equal, both in status and wealth. Go back and tell your master that his proposal for betrothal is accepted.

Migāra’s representatives returned to Sāvattī and reported to him: “Householder, we have obtained the consent of Dhanañjaya, the householder of Sāketa, to have his daughter betrothed to Puṇṇavaḍḍhana.” Migāra was overjoyed to find a bride from such a great family for his son. He sent an urgent message to Dhanañjaya to the effect that he would come and fetch the bride in a few day’s time, and would Dhanañjaya made suitable arrangements? Dhanañjaya replied that he would made every arrangement and requested Migāra to do the needful.

The Kosalan King Honours the Betrothal

Migāra the householder went to the Kosalan King and sought permission to go to Sāketa to attend the wedding ceremony of his son, Puṇṇavaḍḍhana, a trusted servant of the king, to Visākhā, daughter of Dhanañjaya the householder of Sāketa.

The king said: “Very well, householder, need we go with you?”

“Great King,” Migāra said, “how could we expect the presence of such an important personage as yourself?” The king wanted to honour both parties to the betrothal with his presence and said: “So be it, householder, I will go with you.” And so the king went to Sāketa together with the householder.

When Dhanañjaya was informed of the arrival of Migāra and the Kosalan King, he greeted the king personally and escorted him to his house. He made careful arrangements to host the king and his army, Migāra and his entourage. Food, lodging, flowers, perfumes and every item of comfort was provided to all, according to their need and status. He attended to these details personally so that every guest had the impression that Dhanañjaya the householder was doing a special favour to them.

Later on, one day, the Kosalan King said to Dhanañjaya through a messenger: “Householder, we are here in too big a crowd. We might be causing a burden to you if we were to stay long. Maybe, you should think of the time for sending the bride to Sāvattī.” To which, Dhanañjaya replied through the messenger: “Great King, now is the rainy season. Your army will find it difficult to make a journey. Let the provision of every need of your army be my responsibility. I would request your majesty to return to Sāvattī only when I make the send-off.”

From the time of the arrival of Migāra and his party, the whole of Sāketa was in a festive atmosphere. Three months passed in gaiety. The rainy season ended in [1453] October. The great ornamental dress for the bride was still in the goldsmith's hand, nearing completion. Dhanañjaya's executives reported to him that although every item needed in hosting the big gathering from Sāvattihī was no problem but they had met with a shortage of fuel for cooking. Dhanañjaya ordered that all the stables for his horses and sheds for his elephants be dismantled for fuel. But these structures lasted only fifteen days as fuel and the matter was conveyed to Dhanañjaya again, who said: "Wood fuel would be hard to get during the rainy season. So, open all my textile stores, make strips of rough cloth into ropes, soak them in oil vats and use them as fuel." In this expedient way another fifteen days supply of fuel for cooking was made available, by which time the great ornamental dress for the bride was completed too.

The bride was sent to the bridegroom on the next day, after the great bridal dress was completed. On the day of her departure, Dhanañjaya called his daughter, Visākhā, to his side and gave this admonition: "Dear daughter, a housewife, who is to serve her husband faithfully in his household, should know these principles and practise them accordingly:<sup>322</sup>

Dear daughter, a daughter-in-law living in the parents-in-law's house:

1. Should not take out the fire from the inside of the house.
2. Should not take the fire from outside into the house.
3. Should lend only to those who returned what they borrowed.
4. Should not lend to those who do not return what they borrowed.
5. Should give to those whether they give you back or not.
6. Sit peacefully.
7. Eat peacefully.
8. Sleep peacefully.
9. Tend to the fire respectfully.

10. Worship the deities of the house.

On the following day, Dhanañjaya had all his guests assembled together and in the midst of the Kosalan army appointed eight learned householders to be patrons of Visākhā at Sāvattthī, with the request that they, as a body, gave hearing and settled any disputes that might arise concerning her daughter. Then, he had the bride garbed in the great bridal dress of gold lace and jewels, worth 90 million. He gave her 154 cartloads of money for her toiletry, 500 maid servants, 500 coaches which were drawn by thoroughbred horses and a variety of useful items in 100 pieces for each kind. Having bequeathed these things, as his wedding present, in front of the assemblage, he first made a send-off for the Kosalan King and Migāra the householder.

When it was time for Visākhā to start her journey, Dhanañjaya called the controller of his cattle yards and gave these instructions: “My men, my daughter will need in her new home milk cows and thoroughbred bulls for harnessing to her carts. Let a herd of cattle that will fill the road to Sāvattthī for an area of three miles in breadth and three miles in length be let out from the pens. The landmark for three miles is from the pens to a certain ravine. When the foremost cattle in the herd reached that ravine, let a drum signal be made so that the pens can be closed in time.” And the responsible persons complied faithfully. As soon as the pens were opened, the stoutest milk-cows only came out. But when the pens were closed, strong draught oxens and bulls jumped over the fence and followed Visākhā. This was the result of Visākhā’s past merit, because during the time of Buddha Kassapa, whenever she made an offering of food to the Saṅgha, she used to persuade the monastics to take various delicacies even after they had taken their fill. [1454]

Visākhā Enters Sāvattthī

When Visākhā’s carriage arrived at the city of Sāvattthī, she considered whether she should enter the city seated in her coach or stand up, exposing herself to public view. When she remembered the great bridal dress (mahā-latā) that she was wearing, she thought it wise to expose herself by standing in her carriage so that the greatness of her bridal dress would be seen by all. As she did so, every citizen of Sāvattthī who saw her was excited, saying among themselves: “Here she is! The famous Visākhā! How exquisitely beautiful! And look at that gorgeous bridal dress she wears! How becoming she looks in that wonderful dress!” Thus, Visākhā’s entry into her new residence at Migāra’s house was a great success.

Right from the moment of her presence in Sāvattihī, the citizens were fresh with the memories of their long stay in Sāketa as guests of honour to Dhanañjaya, who had so lavishly and caringly treated them. So they started sending gifts to Visākhā according to their means. Visākhā distributed the gifts to various other citizens of Sāvattihī, ensuring that all houses received them. In this way, the citizens of Sāvattihī were soaked in generosity from her first day there.

On the first night of her arrival at her father-in-law’s house, as soon as the first watch of the night had passed, and it was bedtime, a thoroughbred female ass in Migāra’s house gave birth to a foal. She had her maid servants hold up the lamps and she attended to the delivery of the foal. She had the mother ass bathed in hot water and then had oil applied onto her body. After seeing through these operations, she went back to her chamber.

Wedding Reception at Migāra’s House

Migāra held a reception for seven days in his house, on the occasion of his son’s wedding. Even though the Buddha was staying in the Jetavana monastery, Migāra, being a follower of different faiths, disregarded the Buddha for the occasion of his son’s wedding, but, instead, he invited a houseful of naked ascetics. He called Visākhā to make obeisance to the “Arahats.” When Visākhā heard the word “Arahats,” she, being a noble one (ariya) herself, a Stream-enterer, eagerly went to see the so-called “Arahats.” She was greatly disappointed to see the naked ascetic. “How could these shameless fellows be Arahats?” She made her judgment and wondered why her father-in-law asked her to pay respects to them. “Fie! Fie!” she uttered in disgust and turned away.

The naked ascetics, on their part, were angry at Visākhā’s behaviour. “Householder,” they said to Migāra, “can’t you get a better daughter-in-law? Why have you made this detestable woman, a follower of the ascetic Gotama, a member of your household? Cast away this demon of a woman!” But Migāra thought that he could not expel his daughter-in-law on the advice of the naked ascetics, for she came from a high class family. So, he had to palliate his teachers by saying: “Teachers, young people are reckless and say things intentionally or otherwise. Would you kindly keep your patience?”

Being a good daughter-in-law, Visākhā attended on her father-in-law respectfully. She made him sit on a high seat, and served him with milk rice in which undiluted milk was used. She ladled it out with a gold spoon into a vessel and gave it to Migāra who relished the meal. At that time, a monastic, on his alms round, stood at Migāra’s door. Visākhā saw the monastic but, knowing her father-in-law was a follower of the naked ascetics, she thought it wise not to tell him about the presence of the monastic but merely moved herself aside so that the monastic would stand in direct view of Migāra. Foolish as he was, Migāra did see the monastic, but pretended not to notice him with his face turned down to his meal only. Visākhā knew that her father-in-law was purposely ignoring the monastic, so she went to the monastic and said: “Empty-handed, I pay homage to you, venerable sir. My father-in-law lives only on old food.”

Hearing this, Migāra was irritated. When Visākhā derided the naked ascetics, he [1455] could bear it. But now that his daughter-in-law said that he was eating excreta, which is how he interpreted Visākhā’s word for “old food,” he could not bear it. He held away his hand from the vessel he was eating from and said angrily to his attendants: “Keep this milk rice! Expel Visākhā from this house. Look, while I am eating this auspicious milk rice in my auspicious house, Visākhā says: ‘I am eating human excreta!’ ” However, the whole of the household staff were Visākhā’s servants, and who would take Visākhā by the hand or by the feet and expel her? Far from doing physical violence against her, nobody in the house dared even to offend her by word.

When Visākhā heard her father-in-law’s angry words, she spoke to him cordially and respectfully: “Father, I am not obliged to go away from this house by your command, which is not right and proper. You have not brought me to this house like a water carrier girl. A good daughter, whose parents are still living, does not obey this kind of unlawful command. To see to righteous behaviour on all sides, on the day of my departure my father had appointed a panel of eight wise householders, saying: ‘If there should arise any problem concerning my daughter, you would be pleased to hear the case and settle it.’ These eight people are my father’s trustees in whom my security lies. Would you refer my case to them now?”

Migāra thought Visākhā’s words were sensible. He sent for the panel of eight learned householders and laid his complaint, saying: “Gentlemen, this girl

The Life Stories of the Female Lay Disciples – 2226

Visākhā has not been in this house for a week and she insulted me, who lives in an auspicious house, as someone who eats excreta.”

Elders: Now, daughter, did you say as the householder has alleged?

Visākhā: Fathers, my father-in-law might like to eat excreta. I never referred to him as an eater of excreta. The fact is that as he was eating milk rice cooked with undiluted milk, a monastic stood at his door for alms food. My father-in-law ignored the monastic. So, I went up to the monastic and said: ‘Empty handed, I pay homage to you, venerable sir. My father-in-law lives only on old food.’ By this, I meant to say that my father-in-law does no deed of merit in his present existence but is living only on the fruit of his past merit.

Elders: Householder, in this case, our daughter is not at fault. She has spoken reasonably. Why should you be angry?

Migāra: So be it, gentlemen. But his young girl had from the very first night in this house ignored her husband and absented herself from the house.

Elders: Dear daughter, did you absent yourself as alleged?

Visākhā: Fathers, I did not go to any other place but the fact is that I was attending to the birth of a foal by a thoroughbred ass at the stable that night. I considered it my duty to do so. I had my maid servants hold the lamps and I supervised the proper delivery of the foal.

Elders: Householder, our daughter has been dutiful and done what even your maid servants could not do. She had done it for your good only. Why should you take it as an offence?

Migāra: So be it gentlemen. But I wish to complain about her father, Dhanañjaya’s admonition to her on the day of her departure from her house. She was told: “Not to take out the fire from the inside of the house.” How would it be possible for us not to give the fire when needed by our next door neighbours?

Elders: Dear daughter, were you told by your father as said by the householder?

Visākhā: Fathers, my father did not mean “fire” in the ordinary sense. What is meant is that the affairs of my parents-in-law and his family should not be divulged to the servants who are outsiders. If I were to do that, I would be causing [1456] unnecessary trouble at home. My father uses the expression “the fire from the inside of the house” in this sense only.

The Life Stories of the Female Lay Disciples – 2227

Migāra: So be it, gentlemen. But then her father also said that: “She should not take the fire from outside into the house.” How would it be possible for us not to take the fire from another house, in case all the fire had gone out in our home?

Elders: Dear daughter, is that true?

Visākhā: Fathers, my father did not mean “fire” in the ordinary sense. What is meant here is that what the servants say in criticising the family should not be reported to the members of the family. If I were to do so, I would be causing unnecessary trouble at home. My father used the expression “the fire from outside” in this sense only. Also when my father said:

3. “You should lend only to those who return what they borrow.” This is not to let those defaulters, who fail to return the things they borrow from me, get the better of me.

4. “You should not lend to those who do not return what they borrow.” This is not to let the defaulters exploit my goodness.

5. “You should give to those whether they repay you or not.” This means to be liberal to the poor relatives or friends who come to see me. I should make gifts to them regardless of whether they can repay me or not.

6. “You should sit peacefully.” This means I should show deference to my father-in-law and mother-in-law. When they approach, I should stand up.

7. “You should eat peacefully.” This means I should not eat before my parents-in-law and my husband have eaten. Only when they have had sufficient to eat, then I should eat.

8. “You should sleep peacefully.” This means I should not go to bed before my parents-in-law and my husband have gone to bed. Only after I have tended to their needs and they have retired, should I then go to bed.

9. “You should tend to the fire.” This means I should consider my parents-in-law and my husband as the fire that are to be always held in reverence. They should be attended on with respect.

Migāra: So be it, gentlemen. But what about her father’s admonition “to worship the deities of the house?”

Elders: Dear daughter, what is it that your father-in-law wants to know?

Visākhā: Father, it is true that my father told me “to worship the deities of the house.” By these words, my father admonished me that when I become a housewife, I should give alms food to monastics who stand at my door for alms. Only after offering alms food to them, should I eat.

Elders: Householder, you seem to please yourself by ignoring monastics who come to you for alms food. Migāra found no word to retort to this sarcastic remark and held down his face.

Then the eight learned householders said to Migāra the householder: “Householder, is there any other fault with our daughter?” Migāra admitted that there was none. They continued: “Householder, in spite of her innocence, why did you expel her from your home?” Then Visākhā stood up and said: “Fathers, I did not deem it wise to obey my father-in-law’s rash command in expelling me. For my father had entrusted me to your care and to settle any problems concerning myself. Now that I am cleared of my fault, I am happy to go.”

Visākhā then returned to her private chamber and ordered her male and female servants to prepare coaches and do other things for travel. Thereupon, Migāra called the eight-man [1457] panel of trustees and apologised to Visākhā for his fault in their presence: “Dear daughter, I had been reckless. Forgive me.”

Visākhā, seeing her opportunity, said to her father-in-law: “Dear father, I really forgive you for what is forgivable. Only that I wish to lay down a condition, which is that I, as an unshakeable devotee of the Buddha, cannot stay away from the Saṅgha, if only I be allowed to make offerings to the Saṅgha freely, I shall stay here. Otherwise, I will leave.” To which Migāra promptly replied: “Dear daughter, you are at liberty to do so.”

Migāra the Householder Attains Stream-Entry

Thereafter, Visākhā invited the Buddha to her house the next day for an offering of food. On the following day, the Buddha went to her house, accompanied by a large number of monastics, who filled the house and were given seats. Naked ascetics, on learning of the visit of the Buddha to Migāra’s house, took a keen interest and sat watching around it.

Visākhā made her food offerings and poured the libation water. After that she sent her assistant to inform her father-in-law that everything was ready to serve the meal to the Buddha and his Saṅgha, and invited him to attend to the Buddha personally. Migāra, who was under instructions by his teachers, the naked ascetics, replied to Visākhā: “Let my daughter herself attend on the Buddha.” Visākhā proceeded to do so, offering the Buddha various kinds of delicious food and beverages. After that, she informed her father-in-law that the offering of food to the Buddha had finished and she invited him to join in listening to a discourse by the Buddha.

Migāra’s past merit now began to tell on him, for he thought to himself: “If I were to refuse the invitation it would be very wrong.” He got an inner urge to listen to the Buddha’s discourse, and went to where he was sitting. However, his teachers, the naked ascetics, advised him to be screened off from the Buddha if he were to listen to his discourse. His servants therefore drew a curtain around the place where he was to sit.

The Buddha taught his discourse as if asserting his own power of letting any listeners hear him well, however hidden or far away from him, whether divided by a wall or as distant as the whole extent of a world-element. As if a big mango tree laden with its golden ripe fruit was shaken from its trunk, the Buddha directed his discourse beginning with alms giving, through morality and the celestial forms of existence, culminating in the paths and fruitions (maggaphala).

Note here that when the Buddha gave a discourse, everyone among the audience, whether in front of him or at his back, whether thousands of world-elements away, or even in the topmost Brahma realm of Akaniṭṭha, feels that the Buddha is addressing him alone, face to face. It is like one’s relationship with the moon, which rides on the sky in her own course, but which seems to you to be always above your head. This unrivalled power of the Buddha is the result of his fulfilling the perfections, more particularly, his supreme abandoning in giving away his head or limbs, his eyes or heart, or his freedom by serving others as a slave, or as in Vessantara’s existence when he gave his young son and daughter to an old Brahmin, or his own wife, Maddī Devī.<sup>323</sup>

At the end of the discourse, Migāra was established in the fruition of Stream-entry knowledge. He lifted the screen and prostrated at the Buddha’s feet with the hands, knees and forehead touching the ground, and extolled Visākhā before the Buddha's presence, with these words: "Dear daughter, from this day on, you are my mother!" Since then Visākhā came to be known as "Migāra's mother."

This is what is mentioned in the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya). In the commentary on the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada), which follows the reciters of the text, it is mentioned thus: "Migāra came out of the screen, came to his daughter-in-law, and putting her breast in his mouth, exclaimed: "From today on, you are my mother!" Since then Visākhā came to be known as "Migāra's mother." Later, when a son was born to her, he was called "son of Migāra, the householder."

In this connection, the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya) gives only a brief account of Visākhā, but for the benefit of the reader, the events connected with her will now be [1458] related based on the commentary to the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, Dh 53).

Migāra's Wife Also Attained Stream-Entry

After recognizing his daughter-in-law as his mother, Migāra went to the Buddha and prostrating himself at his feet, holding them adoringly and kissing them with his mouth, said: "Venerable sir, previously I did not understand how the making of gifts to the different types of person is of benefit. Now I have come to know it, thanks to my daughter-in-law. Now I am saved from the wretched destinations, the lower worlds. The arrival of my daughter-in-law, Visākhā, has brought me my welfare and happiness." Further, he uttered this verse in elation:

"Venerable sir, today I have come to understand as to making gifts to what type of person is of great benefit. My daughter-in-law, the possessor of noble characteristics, has indeed, due to past merit, come to my house for my benefit."

On the next day also, the good Visākhā invited the Buddha for another offering of food. Then, on the following day, her mother-in-law also became a Stream-enterer. From that day onwards, Migāra's house was an open door for all needs related to the teaching.

“The arrival of noble person at a house, opens up the door to the eightfold path for its many residents, facilitating their entry to Nibbāna.”<sup>324</sup>

Visākhā Honoured by Her Father-in-Law

Then Migāra thought to himself: “My daughter-in-law, Visākhā, is my great benefactor. I should repay my debt of gratitude to her. The great creeper (mahā-latā) bridal gown is too cumbersome for her to wear daily. I shall give her a suitable dress of distinction which may be worn by her by day or by night and in all her bodily postures.” So thinking, he had a solid but flexible and easy-to-wear garment worth 100,000 pieces of money of silver, called the compact head (ghana-maṭṭhaka), made for Visākhā. When the dress was ready, he invited the Buddha and the Saṅgha to an offering of food. He let his daughter-in-law bathe in sixteen pots of scented water, and put on the special dress in the presence of the Buddha, in which she was to pay homage to the Buddha. The Buddha spoke words in appreciation of the offering and returned to the monastery.

From that time onwards, Visākhā’s life was one of meritorious deeds such as giving generously in which she took great delight, and which she could afford to do as much as she liked. She won wide recognition as the great female lay supporter after she obtained eight special privileges as boon from the Buddha.

The eight privileges as boons: 1) Lifelong privilege of donating robes to the Saṅgha for use in the rainy season; 2) the privilege of offering food to visiting bhikkhus; 3) the privilege of offering food to travelling bhikkhus; 4) the privilege of offering food to sick bhikkhus; 5) the privilege of offering food to the bhikkhus who were nursing the sick bhikkhus; 6) the privilege of offering medicine to sick bhikkhus; 7) the lifelong privilege of offering gruel for breakfast; 8) the privilege of offering under robes to bhikkhunīs (see Vin Mv, PTS 1.92).

Her story was comparable to that of the moon in the sky. Her reputation as the head of a big family also was noteworthy, for she had ten sons and ten daughters who had, like herself, ten sons and ten daughters each. These 400 grandchildren had also ten sons and ten daughters each, thus making a total of 8,000 great grandchildren. The ancient venerables versified this fact thus: [1459]

Some Distinctive Qualities of Visākhā

Visākhā lived up to 120 years of age. Not having a single grey hair, she looked always as if she was the age of a sixteen year old. When she went to the Buddha’s monastery, accompanied by her children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren, she was undistinguishable from them.

When people saw Visākhā walking, they never felt satisfied with watching her walk. But when she stood, she looked as graceful; when she sat or when she was lying down, people thought her very graceful in that posture.

She had physical might equivalent to five great elephant bulls. On one occasion, the King of Kosala, wishing to test her reputed strength, let loose a great elephant bull in her direction. The beast ran towards her menacingly with its trunk uplifted. Visākhā’s 500 companion girls ran away in fear. Some of her 500 companions hugged her, as if to safeguard her.<sup>325</sup> “What’s up?” she asked them. They said: “Maiden, the king wants to test your strength and has sent an attacking elephant bull at you!”

Visākhā thought: “What is the use of running away from this beast? And if I were to handle it squarely, I will be crushed.” So thinking, she gently took the beast’s trunk in her two fingers and turned them, which sent him reeling. The onlookers cheered Visākhā and then proceeded home.

The Construction of the Pubbārāma Monastery

Visākhā was widely known as the auspicious lady, not only for her perennial beauty, but also for the health and robustness of her children and grandchildren for none of them died before the end of their lifespan. The citizens of Sāvattī would invite Visākhā as the guest-of-honour whenever they held ceremonial offerings. One day, after attending such a function she was proceeding to the Buddha’s monastery, and thought it lacking in modesty if she went before him, attired in her gorgeous great creeper (mahā-latā) dress. So, at the entrance to the monastery, she entrusted it to her maid servant who was reborn into the world due to Visākhā's past great deed, for she had to be, like Visākhā, as strong as the equivalent of five great elephants bulls.

Leaving the great creeper dress with her maid-servant and putting on the compact head (ghana-maṭṭhaka) dress instead, Visākhā went before the Buddha and listened to a discourse. After the discourse, she made obeisance to him and left the monastery. The maid-servant left the great creeper dress at the place where she was listening to the Buddha's discourse and forgotten to collect it when she left. It was Ven. Ānanda's routine duty to collect things left through the forgetfulness of visitors to the Buddha's monastery. On that day, when he found Visākhā's great creeper dress, he reported it to the Buddha who asked him to store it away in a suitable place. Ven. Ānanda picked it up and hung it at one end of the flight of stairs.

Visākhā then went around the various places in the Jetavana monastery together with Suppiyā, a well-known female lay-disciple, to find out the needs of the guest monastics, the [1460] sick monastics, and monastics who were going on a journey. It was usual for junior monastics and novices who needed ghee or honey or oil to bring containers to be filled by the two visiting ladies on such rounds.

Suppiyā the female lay disciple was the wife of Supiya the Householder of Bārāṇasī. This couple were highly devoted to the Three Treasures. They were regular supporters of the Saṅgha with regard to the four monastic requisites. The female disciple Suppiyā once sacrificed her own flesh from the thigh to cook a soup for a sick monk. Due to her intense devotion to the Buddha, the spot, where her flesh was cut, was miraculously restored without leaving a scar (see Vin Mv 6, PTS 1.216).

After she had visited the sick monastics, the junior monastics and novices and attended to their needs, she left the Jetavana monastery by another gate. Before leaving the monastery compound, Visākhā asked her maid-servant to bring the great creeper dress for her to wear. Then only the maid remembered it and said: "My lady, I have forgotten to pick it up."

"Then, go and fetch it," instructed Visākhā. "But," she continued, "in case Ven. Ānanda were to have moved it to another place himself, say to him that the dress is to be considered as donated to him." She said this because she knew that

Ven. Ānanda always kept in his custody all articles left by forgetful visitors of the four classes to the Jetavana monastery.

When Ven. Ānanda saw Visākhā's maid-servant, he asked her why she returned. And being told of the great creeper dress, Ven. Ānanda said to her: "I have hung it at one end of the stairway. Go and get it." Then she said: "Venerable sir, my lady has instructed me that if the dress had been held in the hand of your reverence, she would not take it back because she would deem it already donated to you." The maid went back to Visākhā and reported the matter to her.

Then, Visākhā said to her: "My girl, I consider it donated to Ven. Ānanda. I have no desire to wear it after Ven. Ānanda has handled it. However, keeping it in his custody would be troublesome to him. I will donate something that is proper for the Saṅgha to use. Go and get it." And the maid did as she was bidden. Visākhā sent for the goldsmith and let them appraise the value of the great creeper dress. The goldsmith said: "This dress is worth 90 million in material value plus 100,000 in workmanship." Visākhā let the great creeper dress displayed on an elephant and put it up for public sale.

But there was no one who could afford to buy a dress worth such a fortune. Moreover, there were no women who could withstand the sheer weight of that bejewelled great gown. As a matter of fact, there were only three women on earth who could afford and wear this kind of dress. They were:

1. Visākhā.
2. Mallikā, wife of Bandhula the commander-in-chief.
3. The daughter of the King of Bārāṇasī.

Since there was no buyer of the great dress, Visākhā herself bought it at the appraised price of 90 million and 100,000. She put the money in a cart and took it to the Jetavana monastery where, after paying respects to the Buddha, she said to him: "Venerable sir, Ven. Ānanda, in keeping my great creeper dress in his custody, has handled it. From that time onwards, it is not proper for me to wear it. Therefore, I have sold it out for the benefit of the Saṅgha and in such a way the Saṅgha might properly put it to use. Since there was no one who could buy it, I have now bought it at its sales value of 90 million and 100,000. In which way, out of the four requisites should this money be utilised?" The Buddha said: "It would be fitting if you built a monastery for the Saṅgha near the eastern gate of this Sāvattḥī.” Visākhā was very glad to hear this. She bought a piece of land for the site of the monastery for the price of 90 million. The building was to cost her another 90 million. Construction soon began.

Ven. Moggallāna Supervises the Construction

One morning, the Buddha reviewed the world for beings deserving of Awakening and he saw Bhaddiya, the son of the householder of Bhaddiya, who had had his former existence in the Deva realm. So, after his meal in the house of Anāthapiṇḍika, the Buddha went in the direction of the northern gate of Sāvattḥī.

It may be noted that the Buddha usually received an offering of alms food at Visākhā’s house. After which, he would go through the city’s southern gate to Jetavana monastery as his residence. If he received his alms food from [1461] Anāthapiṇḍika he would go through the city’s eastern gate to the Pubbārāma monastery as his residence. When he left the city by the northern gate, people understood that he was taking a journey.

When Visākhā heard the news of the Buddha taking the northern gate, she went to see him and said: “Venerable sir, are you making a journey?” the Buddha replied: “Yes, Visākhā, it is so.” Visākhā said: “Venerable sir, I have sacrificed such a big fortune of 90 million to build a monastery for your use. Would you wait till the building is complete?” – “Visākhā, my present trip cannot be postponed.” Then, Visākhā understood that the Buddha had in mind some prospective disciple whose past merit having ripened, was due for the paths and fruitions (magga-phala), and said: “Venerable sir, in that case, would you leave behind some monastics who would supervise the construction?” Thereupon, the Buddha said: “Visākhā, take the alms bowl of the monastic of your choice.”

Visākhā had a natural liking for Ven. Ānanda. However, she thought that Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, with his great powers, would be a real help in the expeditious completion of her monastery. So, she took the alms bowl of Ven. Moggallāna, who glanced towards the Buddha. The Buddha said to the venerable: “Moggallāna, you and your followers of 500 monastics will stay behind.” And so Ven. Moggallāna became the monastic to supervise Visākhā’s monastery construction.

By the great power of Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, big distances as much as 50 or 60 leagues were made every day by the people who collected building materials. In carrying them too, they could do it without great hardship. No mishaps such as broken axles on the carts ever occurred. Soon, the two-storey seven-tier monastery was completed on a clear and level site eight acres wide. The seven-tier monastery had 500 chambers on the ground floor and 500 chambers on the first floor. Around the main building, she added, for better perspective and practical usefulness, 500 meditation cells, 500 smaller tiered monastic dwellings and 500 stairways.

The Donation Ceremony Lasting Four Months

The Buddha returned from his tour after nine months. By that time, the construction of the Pubbārāma monastery had been completed, thanks to the supervision of Ven. Mahā Moggallāna. Visākhā had a broad gold plate, about the size that might contain 60 water pots, fashioned for the pinnacle of the monastery. When she heard that the Buddha was returning to the Jetavana monastery, she invited him to stay in her new monastery, known as the Pubbārāma, the Eastern Monastery, together with his Saṅgha, because she wanted to hold ceremonies marking the donation of the monastery. She said: “Venerable sir, I would request the Fortunate One to stay in this monastery for the four rainy months.”

The Buddha having acceded to her request, she made great offerings of food to the Buddha and his Saṅgha. Then, a female friend of Visākhā went to her and requested a favour: “Friend Visākhā, I would like to donate a piece of floor cover worth 100,000 pieces of money to your monastery. Kindly show me where I should put it.” Visākhā replied: “Very well, friend, look for the place yourself, for if I were to say: ‘There is no place for your floor cover, you might misunderstand me.’” – “Her friend went about the Great Monastery, inspecting every part of it, on both storeys, but could not find a spot which was not already covered with flooring material of the same quality or better than the one she had brought. She was greatly disappointed and wept in a corner.

Ven. Ānanda saw her weeping and asked her the reason. She told him her story. Ven. Ānanda then consoled her: “Do not worry, I will show you the spot where you may spread your flooring material,” and he pointed to her an uncovered spot at the end of the stairway which was the place for the Saṅgha to wash their feet. She was told that all the monastics would step over that flooring before the monastery, after washing their feet and that would be a really meritorious thing for her as the supporter. That was the only spot which Visākhā's attention had missed. [1462]

Offering Four Requisites to the Saṅgha

For four rainy months, Visākhā made offerings of the four monastic requisites to the Buddha and his Saṅgha. On the full moon of November (Kattikā) she donated the robe material of superior quality. The lowest quality received by a newly admitted monastic was worth 1,000. All the monastics also received the four sweet foods (catu-madhu), to fill their alms bowl full. The four months long offerings that marked her donation of the Pubbārāma monastery cost her 90 million.

Thus, the site costing 90 million, the building, 90 million, and the ceremonial offering, 90 million, made a total of 27 billion which Visākhā incurred in her donation towards the Pubbārāma monastery, a sum of money which very few women did on such a scale, and more remarkable for her since she lived in the house of a non-believer.

On the evening at the end of the four month long ceremony Visākhā, amidst her big company of offerings, was very happy in her thought that her lifelong ambition had been fulfilled. In sheer exultation, she sang the following five verses in a wonderfully melodious voice while going round the big monastery (commentary to Dhp 53, PTS 1.416):

1. “My cherished ambition with the thought: ‘When would I, having made my earnest wish and acquiring merit over 100,000 aeons, be able to build a monastery of fine concrete structure that would delight every visitor, monastic and layman alike?’ This thought that had occupied my mind, setting Nibbāna as my goal, since the time of Buddha Padumuttara is fulfilled now!
2. My cherished ambition with the thought: ‘When would I be able to donate a monastic living place to the Saṅgha, complete with couch, reclining chair, cushion, pillow, etc.?’ This thought that had occupied my mind, setting Nibbāna as my goal, since the time of Buddha Padumuttara is fulfilled now!
3. My cherished ambition with the thought: ‘When would I be able to make offerings of food to the Saṅgha, the merit whereof accomplishes long life, personal charm, happiness, strength and intelligence, comprised of the seven types of food offering, such as food offering by casting lots, and rice cooked in meat, etc.?’ This thought that had occupied my mind, setting Nibbāna as my goal, since the time of Buddha Padumuttara is fulfilled now!

4. My cherished ambition with the thought: ‘When would I be able to donate robes to the Saṅgha, that is, robes made of costly Kāsi cloth, cloth made from cotton fibre, etc.?’ This thought that had occupied my mind, setting Nibbāna as my goal, since the time of Buddha Padumuttara is fulfilled now!

5. My cherished ambition with the thought: ‘When would I be able to donate to the Saṅgha the physician’s formula as medicine, that is, the four sweets comprising ghee, honey, sesame oil and molasses?’ This thought that had occupied my mind, setting Nibbāna as my goal, since the time of Buddha Padumuttara is fulfilled now!’

Foremost Title Achieved

In the morning, Visākhā’s house was aflame with the colour of the saffron robes of monastics coming and going freely, and the atmosphere was vibrating with the movement of monastics whose robes filled the air with the odour of the dye-stuff. As in the house of Anāthapiṇḍika, Visākhā’s house had meals cooked for offering to monastics of varying needs: the travelling ones, the sick ones, the visiting ones.

In the morning, Visākhā offered food to these monastics. In the afternoon, she would go to the Buddha’s monastery with her maids, carrying medicinal properties, such as ghee, butter-milk, honey and molasses, and also the eight kinds of beverages made from rose-apple, mango, the Indian butter fruit, white turmeric, honey, two kinds of banana, and the nectar of the lotus, and offered them according to the needs of the monastics. [1463] Then she would listen to a discourse by the Buddha before returning home. This was a typical day for Visākhā, which was replete with meritorious deeds.

Therefore, on one occasion, when the Buddha was naming foremost female lay-disciples according to their merit, he declared:

Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvikanāṃ upāsikanāṃ dāyikanāṃ yad-idam Visākhā Migāramātā.

Monastics, among my female lay disciples who delight in generosity, Visākhā, Migāra’s mother, is the foremost.

3-4. Khujjuttarā and Sāmāvatī

Aspirations in the Past

The future Khujjuttarā and Sāmāvatī were reborn into the families of rich men in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. As they went to the Buddha’s monastery to listen to a discourse given by the Buddha, the future Khujjuttarā saw a female lay disciple being named by him as the foremost among female lay disciples in learning. She had a strong desire to become the same herself. After making an extraordinary offering to the Buddha, she expressed her aspiration to him, and he predicted the fulfilment of her aspiration.

The future Sāmāvatī saw a female lay disciple being named by the Buddha as the foremost in abiding in loving-kindness. She had a strong desire to be so designated by a Buddha in future time. After making an extraordinary offering to the Buddha, she expressed her aspiration to that designation to him, and he predicted that her aspiration would be fulfilled.

These two ladies spent their whole lives in deeds of merit. At the end of their respective lifespan, they were reborn in the Deva realm. After being reborn in either the Deva realm or human world for 100,000 aeons, the present world-element with five Buddhas arrived.

During the time of Buddha Gotama, in the city of Kosambī, Ghosaka the householder and his wife made a routine alms giving of 1,000 pieces of money everyday.<sup>326</sup>

Discipleship in Their Last Existences

It was during the time in which the Ghosaka couple were practising their routine generosity that the future Khujjuttarā passed away from her Deva existence and was conceived in the womb of the governess in the house of Ghosaka. She was humpbacked at birth and was called Khujjuttarā.

The Life Stories of the Female Lay Disciples – 2240

About the same time, the future Sāmāvātī passed away from her Deva existence and was reborn as the daughter of Bhaddavatiya the householder in Bhaddiya, in the province of Bhaddiya. She was named as Sāmā by her parents.

At one time, the town of Bhaddiya suffered from famine and the people left the town for other towns for their own survival. Bhaddiya the householder said to his wife: “Dear wife, we cannot know when this famine will end. We too must leave this place. Our friend Ghosaka the householder of Kosambī will recognise us if he sees us. Let us go to him.” He told his wife about going to Ghosaka but the two householders had known each other by their reputations only and had never met. They decided to go, leaving behind their servants. The father, mother and daughter, went in the direction of Kosambī, travelling by stages. After going through much hardship on the way, they at last reached Kosambī and stayed in a public rest house which was outside the city.

Ghosaka the householder was making his daily alms giving to all the needy who called at [1464] his door. Destitute travellers and mendicants thronged to his house every day. Bhaddavatiya the householder and his family were looking haggard after a hard journey. They decided they should not present themselves before Ghosaka in the present unsightly state but should rest and recoup themselves first. So, they remained at the rest house while their daughter Sāmā was sent to the alms giving station of Ghosaka to beg for food.

Sāmāvātī, as a daughter of a householder, was reluctant to jostle through her way in the unruly crowds of alms seekers. As she stood apart in a hesitant manner, her dignified demeanour was noticed by the superintendent of alms distribution. He thought to himself: “While everyone else is making loud noise and trying to reach out ahead of others like in a fisherman’s fish distribution, this young maiden is keeping back. She must be of some worthy family. And she has a fine personality.” And so he addressed Sāmāvātī: “Dear girl, why don’t you step up and beg?” She replied: “Dear father, how could a decent girl like me elbow through in such a jammed packed crowd?”

“There are three, father.”

The Life Stories of the Female Lay Disciples – 2241

The man doled out three food packages to her.

Sāmāvātī gave the food to her parents. Her father who had not eaten for some time, ate it greedily and died of overeating on that very day. On the next day, Sāmāvātī went to the food distribution point and asked for only two food packages. Her mother who was not used to poor food as this and she was also bereaved for the loss of her husband, and was taken ill that evening and died after midnight. Then, on the next day, Sāmāvātī went and asked for only one food package.

The superintendent asked her: “Dear girl, on the first day, you asked the food package for three persons; on the second day, you asked only for two and now on the third day, you are asking for only one. Why is this?” Sāmāvātī told him about the death of her father on the first day, her mother after midnight on the second day, and that she alone survived.

“Where do you come from?” the man inquired. Sāmāvātī told him how her family had fled famine in Bhaddiya and the subsequent happenings. “In that case,” the superintendent said, “you should be deemed as a daughter of Ghosaka the householder. But I have no daughter of my own, so you will henceforth be my daughter.”

Sāmāvātī, the adopted daughter of the superintendent of the alms distribution place, asked her adopted father: “Father why is there such a din at the place?”

“When there is such a huge crowd, there has to be a big noise,” he replied.

“But, father, I have an idea!”

“Then, say it.”

“Father, let there be fencing around the place, keep only one entrance; let the people go in, receive their alms, and go out on the other end, through the only exit.”

The father took her advice and after following her instruction, the distribution centre then became as quiet and dignified as a lotus pond. Soon after that Ghosaka noted the silence that prevailed in the alms distribution place which was usually full of noise and asked his superintendent: “Are you not giving alms today?”

“Yes, I am giving, master.”

“But why is it so quiet at the centre which used to be so much of a din?”

“Ah! That is true, indeed, master. I have a wise daughter, I have been able to maintain quiet at the place on the advice of my daughter.”

“But, I never knew you had a daughter. Where have you got one?”

The superintendent had to confess the truth. He related to his master the circumstances under which Sāmāvati became his adopted daughter. Thereupon, Ghosaka said to him: [1465] “Man, why did you do that? You are doing a very improper thing indeed. You have kept me in the dark about this girl who is my daughter in this circumstance. Bring her to my house immediately.” The superintendent had to obey his master’s order. From then onwards, Sāmāvati became the adopted daughter of Ghosaka who cherished her as his own daughter and found for her 500 companions, who were of her own age and from worthy families.

Sāmāvati Became Queen of King Udena

One day when King Udena of Kosambī went round the city, he happened to see Sāmāvati and her 500 maid companions, romping in the garden and fell in love with her. On inquiring her parentage, he was told that she was the daughter of Ghosaka the householder. The king enquired whether she was married or not, and learning that she was not married, he sent his royal messengers to Ghosaka to ask for the hand of Sāmāvati in marriage to him. Ghosaka thought to himself: “Sāmāvati is our only daughter. We cannot put her life at risk in the king’s court which is full of intriguing women.” So he bluntly refused the king’s request. The king was furious and ordered that Ghosaka and his wife be evicted from their house which was to be sealed off.

When Sāmāvati and her playmates returned and met her parents sitting miserably outside the house, she asked them what had happened. On hearing the story, she said to them: “Dear parents, why did you not tell the king’s men that your daughter would go and live at the palace on the condition that her 500 maid-companions were allowed to go with her there? Now, dear parents, give your reply to the king as I suggest.” Her parents said to her: “Very well, daughter, we did not know how you would accept the king’s proposal.”

King Udena was greatly pleased to hear the message from Ghosaka. He said: “Let all the maid-companions come and stay with Sāmāvati, even if they number 1,000!” Afterwards, on an auspicious day, at the auspicious hour when the planets were favourable, Sāmāvatī, together with her 500 companions, were conveyed to the palace of King Udena. The king appointed all 500 maids as ladies-in-waiting to his wife Sāmāvatī when he made her queen with ceremonial anointing, and put her in a golden terraced mansion of her own, with the full state of a queen.

About this time, Ghosaka and his two householder friends, Kukkuṭa and Pāvārika of Kosambī, learning the news of the appearance of the Buddha and his residence at Sāvattthī, went to him. After listening to a discourse by the Buddha, they were established in Stream-entry knowledge. Later, they returned to Kosambī after making great offerings to the Buddha and his Saṅgha for fifteen days. They obtained the assurance from the Buddha that he would visit Kosambī when they would invite him later. They built a monastery each and on completion of which, they sent messages to the Buddha, inviting him to visit Kosambī. Hence, the Buddha began his journey to Kosambī but seeing the ripeness of the past merit in a Brahmin couple by the name of Māgaṇḍiya, he made a detour to Kammāsadamma, a market town in the province of Kuru, where he caused the Māgaṇḍiyas to comprehend the noble truths and then proceeded to Kosambī.

Travelling by stages, he reached Kosambī and accepted the gift of three monasteries which were donated by three noble (ariya) householders. When he entered the town on an alms collecting round, he and his procession of monastics were reviled by a gang of drunken men who were instigated by Queen Māgaṇḍiya, who held a grudge against the Buddha. Ven. Ānanda suggested to the Buddha that they leave the town which appeared so inhospitable. Instead, the Buddha gave a discourse to Ven. Ānanda on the importance of taming oneself, which was recorded in the commentary on the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, Dhṃ 320-322). The Buddha stayed on for some time in Kosambī in the three monasteries in towns.<sup>327</sup> [1466]

Khujjuttarā Attains Stream-Entry

The three householders of Kosambī attended on the Buddha and his Saṅgha in turns, making big offerings for a month. Then they extended the privileges of honouring the Buddha and his Saṅgha, in making great offerings, to other people of Kosambī by organizing them into localities or associations.

One day, the Buddha and his company of a large number of monastics were at the house of a florist, to receive his offerings. At that time, Khujjuttarā, the personal attendant to Queen Sāmāvatī, went to buy flowers, which was her routine duty. The florist said to her: “Ah, dear Uttarā, I have no time to serve you this morning. I am busy attending on the Buddha and his Saṅgha. Will you lend a hand in our food offering? This good deed of yours will lead to your emancipation from bondage.” Khujjuttarā ate her portion of food given by the florist and joined him and his people in serving food to the Buddha. She learnt by heart the Buddha’s discourse, which was taught to those who came near him. At the end of the discourse, she was established in the fruition of Stream-entry.

Sāmāvatī and 500 Ladies-in-Waiting Attain Stream-Entry

Khujjuttarā, in her daily purchase of flowers for Queen Sāmāvatī, usually bought only four coins worth of flowers and pocketed four coins out of the queen’s daily allowance of eight coins for flowers. But on the day she became a noble Stream-enterer, Khujjuttarā had no mind to steal the money entrusted to her, and bought eight coins worth of flowers, which now filled her basket. Queen Sāmāvatī, seeing an unusually large quantity of flowers in Khujjuttarā’s basket, asked her: “Why dear Uttarā, do you have such a big basket of flowers today, unlike the previous days! Did the king increase my allowance for flowers?”

Khujjuttarā, as a Stream-enterer, was now incapable of telling lies, and so confessed her previous misconduct. The queen asked her: “Why, then, have you brought such a big quantity of flowers today?” And Khujjuttarā replied: “Because I did not steal the money today. I cannot do so because I have realized Nibbāna. I have comprehended deathlessness, after hearing the Buddha’s discourse.” Thereupon, Queen Sāmāvatī and her 500 ladies-in-waiting spread out their hands and asked Khujjuttarā: “Dear Uttarā, give us a share of that deathless Nibbāna!”

“Dear friends, Nibbāna is not something that can be apportioned to others. I will tell you the words of the Buddha. If you are endowed with past merit you may gain Nibbāna, the deathless, on hearing them.”

“Dear Uttarā, do go ahead!”

“But, I have to sit on a higher level than your seats before I start making the discourse.”

Queen Sāmāvatī arranged a higher seat for Khujjuttarā and listened to her discourse, sitting at a lower level. Khujjuttarā, exercising the analytical knowledge pertaining to a Stream-enterer, while teaching still as a trainee (sekkha), gave a discourse to Sāmāvatī and her 500 ladies-in-waiting. At the end of which all of them were established in the fruition of Stream-entry. From that time onwards, Khujjuttarā was relieved of her all-round service duties and was given the task of going to the Buddha’s monastery to listen to his discourses and, in turn, to teach Queen Sāmāvatī and her ladies-in-waiting what she had learnt from the Buddha. In this way, Queen Sāmāvatī and her company of ladies-in-waiting were given regular discourses in the palace by Khujjuttarā.

Khujjuttarā’s Past Merit and Demerit

Why was Khujjuttarā reborn into a slave family? It was due to her past evil deed. She had, during the time of Buddha Kassapa, made a female novice assist her in odd jobs, running errands for her. On account of that misdeed, she was reborn into a slave family for 500 existences in succession.

Why was she born with a humpback? When she was a lady at the court of the King of Bārāṇasī before the advent of Buddha Gotama, she saw a Paccekabuddha with a humpback who went to the palace to collect alms food. Then she mimicked the Paccekabuddha in the presence of the other court ladies. For that evil deed, she was born humpbacked in the present existence which was her last existence. [1467]

What merit did she earn in the past to be endowed with inmate wisdom in her last existence? When she was a lady at the court of the King of Bārāṇasī before the advent of the Buddha, she saw eight Paccekabuddhas carrying alms bowls which were filled with milk rice and were piping hot. To relieve the heat on the hands of these revered ones, she removed eight gold bangles which she was wearing and offered them to use as buffers underneath the alms bowls. That thoughtful deed was the merit she earned.

Queen Māgaṇḍiyā's Intrigue against Queen Sāmāvati

Although Queen Sāmāvati and her 500 ladies-in-waiting had become Stream-enterers, they never had the opportunity of meeting the Buddha because King Udena was a non-believer. Since they were Stream-enterers, they had a great longing to see the Buddha in person. All they could hope for was to get a glimpse of the Buddha whenever he was passing through the city. As there were no sufficient trellis windows to peep through, the ladies bore holes in the walls of their sleeping quarters, through which they peeped to gain precious glimpses of the Buddha.

One day, as Queen Māgaṇḍiyā was strolling outside she noticed the small holes on the walls of the ladies-in-waiting of Queen Sāmāvati and asked the maidens what the holes were for. They did not know that Queen Māgaṇḍiyā was holding a grudge against the Buddha and honestly divulged their secret arrangement that had enabled them to watch the Buddha passing by and to honour him by standing in their own rooms and peeping through the small holes in the wall. Queen Māgaṇḍiyā thought to herself, grinning, thus: “Now my time has come to avenge ascetic Gotama. These girl followers of Gotama will also have their deserts!”

Then, when Queen Māgaṇḍiyā was alone with King Udena, she said to him: “Great King, Queen Sāmāvati and her ladies-in-waiting have given their hearts to someone else besides you. They are plotting against your life in a few days. They have no affection for you. They have such great interest in ascetic Gotama that they peep at him whenever he goes into the city. They have made holes in the wall of their rooms to get a view of the ascetic Gotama. The king did not believe her at first but Māgaṇḍiyā repeated her story another time, yet the king still did not believe her. For the third time, she repeated it, and when the king refused to believe her, she suggested that the king go to the private quarters of the ladies-in-waiting and inquire. The king did as she had suggested and saw the small holes. He asked the ladies-in-waiting about the holes and they honestly and truthfully told him the purpose of the holes. The king was not angry with them but merely ordered that the holes be closed. He let a trellis windows be fixed on the upstairs of the ladies' quarters. This was then the first malicious report on the part of Queen Māgaṇḍiyā.

Queen Māgaṇḍiyā then hatched another plot. She said to the king: “Great King, let us put to the test the loyalty of Sāmāvātī and her company towards you. Send them eight living hens and ask them to cook a meal with them for your majesty.” The king did as Māgaṇḍiyā advised. Queen Sāmāvātī, being a noble disciple of the Buddha, was above killing and so replied to the king that it would not be proper to kill the hens.

But Māgaṇḍiyā was crafty enough. She said to the king: “Great King, say to Sāmāvātī to cook a meal with the hens for ascetic Gotama.” The king did as he was told. This time, Māgaṇḍiyā had the hens killed on the way, before they reached Queen Sāmāvātī, who, on receiving the lifeless hens, had no suspicions about them in her simple mind. She had them cooked and sent the cooked dish to the Buddha. Queen Māgaṇḍiyā then pointed out the fact of Sāmāvātī's behaviour to the king, saying: “Now, do you see where Sāmāvātī's interest lies?” However, the king still did not take offence against his beloved Sāmāvātī. This was the second malicious plot on the part of Queen Māgaṇḍiyā.

King Udena had three queens: 1) Queen Sāmāvātī, 2) Queen Vāsuladattā, daughter of King Caṇḍapajjota of Ujjenī and 3) Queen Māgaṇḍiyā. Each Queen had 500 ladies-in-waiting. The king spent seven days with each of his three queens in turn, in their respective palatial mansions. Queen Māgaṇḍiyā kept a small cobra by her side in a bamboo [1468] container which she stealthily transferred into the king's harp and sealed the small hole in it, when the king visited her. The king always carried his harp wherever he went. He was so fond of it because its music could cast a spell on elephants which would become attracted to its player, the king.

When the king was about to go to Queen Sāmāvātī, Queen Māgaṇḍiyā said to him as if she had real concern for the king's safety: “Great King, Sāmāvātī is a follower of ascetic Gotama. She does not value your life as much as a blade of grass. She is always intent on doing harm to you. So, please beware.”

After the king had spent seven days with Queen Sāmāvātī, he went to stay with Queen Māgaṇḍiyā for another seven days. She said to him: “How was it, Great King, did Sāmāvātī find no opportunity to harm you?” Then, taking the harp from the king's hand, and shaking it, she exclaimed: “Why? There's some living thing moving about inside the harp!” And after stealthily opened the small hole in the harp, she exclaimed: “O! Death unto me! There is a snake in the harp!” She dropped the harp and ran away from it. The snake’s coming out from the harp was enough to arouse the king’s anger. Like a bamboo forest on fire, the king hissed with fury. “Go and bring Sāmāvatī and all her ladies-in-waiting!” he shouted. The king’s men obeyed promptly.

Queen Sāmāvatī knew that the king was angry with them. She advised her ladies-in-waiting to diffuse loving-kindness towards the king for the whole day. When they were brought before the king, Sāmāvatī and her ladies-in-waiting were made to line up facing the king who stood with bow and poisoned arrow. They remained diffusing loving-kindness towards the king, who found himself unable to shoot and at the same time unable to put down the bow and arrow. Perspiration flowed from his body which was trembling. His mouth discharged saliva. He resembled a man who had suddenly lost his faculties.

Queen Sāmāvatī said to him: “Great King, are you feeling exhausted?”

The King replied: “My dear Queen, I do feel exhausted. Be my support.”

“Very well, O king,” she said, “direct your arrow towards the ground.”

The king did as he was told. Then Sāmāvatī wished: “May the arrow be released.” And the poisoned arrow went into the ground.

At that moment, King Udena went and dipped himself in water and in his wet cloths and hair, he fell at Sāmāvatī’s feet, saying: “Forgive me, my dear queen. I acted foolishly under the instigation of Māgaṇḍiyā.”

“I forgive you, king,” said Sāmāvatī.

“Very well, queen, you are full of forgiveness towards me. From now on, you are free to make offerings to the Buddha. Do make offerings and do go to the Buddha’s monastery in the afternoons and attend his sermons. From now on you shall be well protected.”

Sāmāvatī, seizing the opportunity, made this request: “If so, Great King, would you ask the Buddha to arrange for a monastic to come to the palace and teach us the good doctrine every day?” King Udena went to the Buddha and made the request, whereupon the Buddha assigned Ven. Ānanda the task. From that time on, Sāmāvatī and her ladies-in-waiting invited Ven. Ānanda to the palace and made daily food offerings, after which, they learnt the doctrine from him.

Ven. Ānanda had in one of his past existences offered a needle and a small piece of robe material of a palm's width to a Paccekabuddha. For that good deed, in his present existence, he was endowed with innate wisdom, and also received gifts of robe material on 500 occasions. [1469]

Sāmāvatī and Her Ladies-in-Waiting Burnt to Death

Queen Māgaṇḍiyā was at her wit's end in her attempts to estrange King Udena from Queen Sāmāvatī. She became desperate and made a desperate attempt. She persuaded the king to go on a picnic in the park. She detailed her uncle to commit arson at the palace during the absence of the king. Queen Sāmāvatī and her ladies-in-waiting were to be ordered to remain indoors, using the king's authority. Then their mansion was to be burnt. Queen Māgaṇḍiyā's uncle, the foolish Brahmin, executed the plot successfully.

As their past evil deed had now fructified, Sāmāvatī and her 500 ladies-in-waiting could not dwell in the attainment of the fruition of Stream-entry on that fateful day and lost their lives in the flames, like lumps of bran in a storehouse. The guards, at Queen Sāmāvatī's mansion reported the calamity to the king.

The king made discreet inquiries into the prime mover in this horrible case of arson, and knew that it was none other than Queen Māgaṇḍiyā. However, he did not reveal his true intention. Instead, he sent for Queen Māgaṇḍiyā and said to her: "Dear Māgaṇḍiyā, you have done for me what I ought to have done by myself. You have done away with Sāmāvatī who had made various attempts on my life. I adore you for this act. I am going to reward you amply. Now, call your kinsmen."

Queen Māgaṇḍiyā was delighted to hear the king's words. She gathered all her relatives and also her friends, who were as close as her relatives. When all of Māgaṇḍiyā's associates were gathered, the king had deep pits dug in the palace ground, where all the culprits were put in with only their heads showing above the ground. Their heads were then severed and then iron plough shares were driven across their broken skulls. As for Queen Māgaṇḍiyā, her body was cut into pieces and cooked in oil.

The Past Evil Deeds of Sāmāvātī and Her Ladies-in-Waiting

The death of Sāmāvātī and her ladies-in-waiting by being burnt alive had its root in their past evil deeds. In one of their existences before the advent of Buddha Gotama, the 500 maidens were standing on the river bank at the Ganges after having a long frolicking bath. As they were shivering with cold, they saw a small thatched hut nearby, which was the dwelling of a Paccekabuddha. They rashly burnt it for warming themselves without first seeing whether there was any occupant inside or not.

At that time, the Paccekabuddha was dwelling in the attainment of cessation. Only when the little hut was reduced to ashes they found, to their horror, the sitting Paccekabuddha in a motionless state. Although in setting fire to the hut, they had no intention to kill the Paccekabuddha, the thought of killing him now entered their frightened minds because they recognized him as the Paccekabuddha who went to the king's palace for daily alms food. To avoid the king's wrath, they must burn the revered one and leave no trace of him. So, by way of cremation, they gathered more fuel and set fire to the sitting Paccekabuddha. This act being done with an intention to kill, it constituted a grave misdeed, carrying grave consequences.

When the fuel which the maidens put to the fire was exhausted, the Paccekabuddha rose from dwelling in the attainment of cessation, cleaned his robes of ashes and rising into the air, went away, even as the maidens were watching in great wonder. They suffered in the lower worlds of Niraya for that evil deed, and as a remaining resultant thereof, they were burnt alive.

Foremost Titles Achieved

After the utter destruction of Queen Sāmāvātī and her 500 ladies-in-waiting, there arose words of praise among the four types of assembly: the assembly of monks, that of nuns, that of male lay disciples and that of female lay disciples, such that: “Khujjutarā was learned and although a woman, she could expound the doctrine that resulted in 500 ladies of the court attaining Stream-entry. [1470] Sāmāvātī was accomplished in the practice of dwelling in loving-kindness such that she was able to avert the arrow of King Udena through the diffusion of goodwill towards the king.”

Later on, when the Buddha was staying at the Jetavana monastery and was naming female lay disciples, he declared, in respect of Khujjutarā:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvikanam upāsikanam
bahussutanam yad-idam Khujjuttarā.*

Monastics, among my female lay-disciples who are learned, Khujjutarā is the foremost.

Khujjutarā earned the distinction because she was given by Queen Sāmāvatī and her ladies-in-waiting, after their attaining Stream-entry, the task of learning further about the Buddha’s doctrine by listening from him, and repeating his sermons daily. This privilege of hers made her so immersed in the doctrine that she learnt the Dhamma by heart. This was why the Buddha named her the “foremost in learning.”

As a trainee (sekkha), a noble one still learning by herself for Awakening, Khujjutarā was endowed with the four analytical knowledges pertaining to a trainee which enabled her to bring Awakening to Sāmāvatī and her ladies-in-waiting.

While the Buddha was staying in Kosambī, Khujjutarā went to the Buddha daily and listened to the sermons. On returning to the palace, she repeated what she had learnt to Sāmāvatī and her ladies-in-waiting. She would begin her discourses to them with these words: “Indeed the Fortunate One has said this; I have heard the Arahāt say this ...” The 112 discourses she made to the ladies have been put on record by the elders at the Council as the Buddha’s words, under the title of Thus-saids (Iti-vuttaka).<sup>328</sup>

On that occasion, the Buddha said in respect of Sāmāvatī:

Mettā-vihārīnam yad-idam Sāmāvatī.*

Monastics, among my female lay-disciples who dwell in the absorption of loving-kindness (mettā-jhāna), Sāmāvatī is the foremost.

5. Uttarā Nandamātā

Aspiration in the Past

The future Uttarā Nandamātā was reborn into a rich family in the city of Hāmsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. As she was listening to a discourse by the Buddha, she saw a female lay disciple being named as the foremost among those who dwelt in absorption (jhāna). She had a strong desire for that distinction in some future existences. After making a great offering, she expressed her aspiration to the Buddha who predicted that her aspiration would be fulfilled.

Discipleship in Her Last Existence

The future Uttarā, after passing away from that existence, was reborn either in the Deva realm or the human realm for 100,000 aeons. During the time of Buddha Gotama, she was reborn as the daughter of Puṇṇasīha and his wife Uttarā, who were household servants to Sumana the householder in Rājagaha.

It was a festive occasion in Rājagaha on account of the auspicious day, according to the planets. Sumana the householder of Rājagaha called to Puṇṇasīha and said: “Puṇṇa, attending the festivities on this auspicious day and keeping the Observance Day precepts are actually matters that should not concern poor folks like you. Yet, I am going to give you an allowance for this festive day, and you may either go and enjoy yourself at the festival or do your ploughing as usual. Just let me know whichever you choose.” Puṇṇasīha replied: “Master, let me first consult this matter with my wife.”

At home, Puṇṇasīha told his wife Uttarā what his master had said to him. She said [1471] to him: “Dear husband, the householder is our master. Whatever the master says to you is to be taken as justified. But I think you ought not to miss a day’s work for him.” And Puṇṇasīha, agreeing with his wife’s suggestion, yoked his oxen and went to the field to do the ploughing.

It so happened that on that great day for Puṇṇasīha, Ven. Sāriputta, after rising from his absorption in the attainment of cessation, reviewed the world as to who deserved his blessing. He saw the ripening of Puṇṇasīha’s past merit as a sufficing condition for Awakening.

The Life Stories of the Female Lay Disciples – 2253

“Sufficing condition for Awakening.” For gaining the paths and fruitions (maggā-phala), one must be endowed with past merit, for present favourable conditions by themselves cannot lead to one’s Awakening. Likewise, an action that brings its result in the present existence also needs the support of sufficing past merit to fructify. Therefore, being a virtuous person with the right reasoning, the fortunate present conditions need sufficing past merit for one to gain Awakening (sub-commentary).

Ven. Sāriputta took his alms bowl and double robe at the time for alms round, and went to the place where Puṇṇasīha was ploughing. He stood at a short distance where he could be seen by Puṇṇasīha, who, on seeing him, stopped ploughing and went up to him and made his obeisance with the hands, knees and forehead touching the ground. Ven. Sāriputta, wishing to do good to the poor man, looked at him and asked him where some good water might be available. Puṇṇasīha thought that the venerable wanted to wash his face, and so he made a tooth-brush out of a creeper nearby and gave it to him. While Ven. Sāriputta was brushing his teeth, Puṇṇasīha took the alms bowl and water-strainer and fetched a bowl full of fresh clear water, which was properly strained.

After washing his face, Ven. Sāriputta went on his way to collect alms food. Then, it occurred to Puṇṇasīha thus: “Ven. Sāriputta had never come this way before. He came today probably to bring benefit to me. Oh, if my wife had brought my meal, how good it would be to offer it to Ven. Sāriputta!”

Puṇṇasīha’s wife remembered that it was an auspicious day according to the planets. She had cooked a meal early in the morning with the ration which she received and carried it to her husband. On the way, she saw Ven. Sāriputta and thought to herself: “On previous days, although I saw him, I did not have anything to offer to Ven. Sāriputta, or when I had something to offer I did not meet him. Today, I have both the gift and the monastic at hand. I will cook another meal for my husband and offer this meal to Ven. Sāriputta now.” Thinking thus, she put her cooked rice into Ven. Sāriputta’s alms bowl and made her wish, saying: “May we be free from this life of poverty.” Ven. Sāriputta responded: “May your wish be fulfilled,” showed appreciation and returned to the monastery.

Herein, it may be noted that in performing a deed of merit there arise many impulsion thought processes of great merit, each consisting of seven meritorious impulsions or sub-moments of the thought process. If conditions are favourable, the first of these seven impulses brings immediate result even in the very present existence.

Four present conditions must be there for such an immediate resultant: The receiving monastic is an Arahāt or at least a Non-returned; the gift is something righteously obtained; the supporter has a strong will or volition in making the gift, his intention is intense before the act, during the act, and he feels glad for it after the act; and the receiving monastic has just arisen from dwelling in the attainment of cessation. And above all, there must be sufficient past merit in the supporter.

In the case of Puṇṇasīha and his wife, all the required present and past conditions co-existed. His past merit to make him a rich man was ripe, so on that very day he reaped a harvest of solid lumps of gold from the field he was ploughing. This elevated him to the status of a rich man as conferred by the king.

Puṇṇasīha's wife returned to her home without proceeding to her husband and cooked [1472] another meal for her husband, and brought it to him. Fearing that her husband might be angry, and more so because his anger would nullify the good consequence of her good act, she began with some palliative words, saying: "Dear husband, I would request that you restrain yourself from anger for today." "Why?" asked her husband, wondering.

"Dear husband, I met Ven. Sāriputta on my way and offered him your meal; I had to go home and cook another meal for you. That is why I am rather late today."

Puṇṇasīha said to her: "Dear wife, you have done the most pleasing thing. I myself have offered a tooth-brush and fresh water to him for washing his face early this morning. So, for this day, every need of Ven. Sāriputta has been supplied by us!" The couple were elated about their good deeds.

Puṇṇasīha then had his meal. After that he took a nap with his head on his wife's lap. On waking up, he saw all around him, where he had ploughed, a sea of yellow objects somewhat like the yellow flowers of the sponge gourd profusely scattered about. Surprised, he asked his wife: "Dear wife, what are those things?" Directing his finger at those yellow objects which were clods of earth: "Everywhere I turn, the earth look like gold!" his wife said: "Dear husband, perhaps you are having a hallucination after your hard work." But Puṇṇasīha insisted: “Look there yourself!” And she looked and exclaimed: “Dear husband, what you say is true. Those things do look like gold!”

Puṇṇasīha stood up and picking up a clod of the yellow earth, struck it against the shaft of his plough. It was a soft lump of gold and stuck to the shaft like a lump of molasses. He called and said to his wife, showing a sample of gold: “Dear wife, other people have to wait three or four months to reap what they sow. For us, our meritorious deed, sown on the fertile soil that is Ven. Sāriputta have now brought us this harvest. Throughout this field of about two acres there is not a piece of earth the size of a myrobalan fruit which has not turned into gold.”

“What should we do about this?” his wife asked.

“Dear wife,” Puṇṇasīha replied, “we cannot hide this amount of gold.” So saying, he picked up clods of earth, filled the vessel, which was used to carry his meal, with lumps of gold, and went to the palace and showed it to the king.

King: Where did you get this gold?

Puṇṇasīha: Great King, the field I ploughed today has been turned into clods of gold. May the king send his men take it.

King: What is your name?

Puṇṇasīha: Great King, my name is Puṇṇa.

Then the king ordered his men to yoke carts and go and collect the gold from Puṇṇasīha’s field.

The Family of Puṇṇasīha Attain Stream-Entry

The king’s men collected the clods of gold, saying: “This is what the great past merit of the king has brought into being.” The gold clods instantly changed back into clods of earth! Not a piece of gold was collected by them. They reported the matter to the king. King Bimbisāra told them: “In that case, men, say: ‘This is what Puñña’s great past merit has brought into being,’ when you pick up those clods.” The men went back, said the words as instructed by the king when collecting the gold and were successful in obtaining the gold.

The clods of gold, taken in many cartloads, were piled on the main square of the palace. When heaped up it was the height of that of a palmyra tree. The king summoned merchants and asked: “Whose house in the city holds a pile of gold as big as this?” The merchants answered: “Great King, there is no house that holds this much gold.” The king further asked: “What should we do with Puṇṇa, who is the owner of this gold?” The merchants [1473] unanimously replied: “Great King, Puṇṇa should be given the title of Royal Treasurer.” The king agreed. And so Puṇṇasīha became the Royal Treasurer. All the gold gathered was handed over to him. On that same day, Puṇṇasīha’s inauguration as Royal Treasurer was held in high ceremonial state.

Puṇṇasīha, now the Royal Treasurer, held a grand celebration on that auspicious acquisition of the royal title for seven days, when the Buddha and his Saṅgha were honoured with magnificent offerings. On the seventh day, after hearing the Buddha’s discourse, in appreciation of his great generosity, all the members of his family: Puṇṇasīha, his wife Uttarā and their daughter Uttarā, were established in the fruition of Stream-entry.

This is the story of Puṇṇasīha, one of the five great rich men within the dominion of King Bimbisāra who had inexhaustible resources. The stories of the other four will be given in chapter 45c.

Puṇṇasīha’s Family and the Sumana Family

Sumana the householder of Rājagaha, on learning that Puṇṇasīha had a grown-up daughter, sent messengers to ask for the hand of his daughter in marriage to his son. Puṇṇasīha gave a flat refusal, and Sumana became furious. “That fellow, who had been dependent on me, now disdains me because he has become a great man,” he thought, conceited as he was of his own wealth. He sent this view of his to Puṇṇasīha through messengers. Puṇṇasīha was not to be outdone. He explained to Sumana’s messengers: “Your master is being arrogant. Even though what he says is a fact, he should remember that a man should not be expected to always remain poor because he was born poor. Now, I am wealthy enough to buy householders like Sumana as slaves. But, I do not say this in derogation of his lineage. I still honour him as a worthy householder. My point is my daughter is a Stream-enterer, a noble one (ariya) in the Buddha’s teaching. She spends one gold coin every day on flowers in her offerings to the Three Treasures. I cannot send my daughter to the house of a non-believer like Sumana.”

When Sumana learnt the adamant stand taken by Puṇṇasīha, he changed his tone. He sent words to Puṇṇasīha, saying: “I do not wish to break our old ties of friendship. I will see to it that my daughter-in-law gets two gold coins worth of flowers everyday.” Puṇṇasīha, being a man who knew the value of gratitude, agreed to Sumana’s proposition and sent his daughter in marriage to Sumana’s son.

Uttarā’s Great Faith in Religious Practice

One day, Uttarā said to her husband: “Dear husband, in my parents’ house I keep the Observance Day (Uposatha) precepts eight days every month. If you may agree, I would do that here too.” Although she made her proposition in gentle words, her husband bluntly refused it. She had to put up with the refusal meekly. At the beginning of the Rains Retreat (Vassa) period, she sought his permission again to keep the Observance Day during the three-month period. Again she received a blunt refusal.

When two and a half months had gone by and only fifteen days were left of the Rains Retreat period, Uttarā asked her parents to send her 15,000 pieces of money, letting them know that in the confines of wedlock, she had not had a day to keep the Observance Day. She did not say how and why the money was needed. Her parents did not bother to ask why she needed the money but sent her the sum she asked for.

Uttarā then sent for Sirimā, a courtesan in Rājagaha, who was the sister of Jīvaka the physician, and said to her: “Dear Sirimā, as I intend to keep the Observance Day for fifteen days, I would request you to attend on my husband during these days for a fee of fifteen thousand coins.” Sirimā accepted her offer. Uttarā’s husband was only too happy about this arrangement and allowed her to keep the Observance Day for fifteen days.

Having obtained her husband’s permission, Uttarā went about her meritorious deeds freely. She prepared food offerings for the Buddha early in the morning, assisted by her servants. After making offerings to the Buddha, and when the Buddha returned to the monastery, she kept the Observance Day precepts and would stay upstairs alone, reflecting on morality. Fifteen days passed peacefully. On the morning of the first waning of the last [1474] month of the three-month period, the day on which her observance was to end, she was preparing gruel and other items of food for offering to the Buddha. She was busy with the job since early morning.

The Life Stories of the Female Lay Disciples – 2258

Such is the nature of sensual objects that through their continued enjoyment one tends to forget that they belong to another, and is tempted into thinking that they are one's own.

At that time, the householder's son, having fun with Sirimā on the upper storey of the mansion, drew aside the lace curtain of the window and looked down into the inside of the house. At the same time, Uttarā happened to look up into the window and her eyes met those of her husband. The husband smiled with the thought: "This Uttarā is looking like a being from the lower worlds of Niraya. How strange of her to deny herself the luxury of her status and to toil herself unnecessarily in the kitchen, mingling with the servants." Uttarā also smiled with the thought: "This son of the householder, being forgetful, thinks that this life of ease and comfort is lasting."

Sirimā, who saw the couple smile at each other, became furious with jealousy. "This slave, Uttarā, is flirting with my husband even in my presence," she thought to herself, for she had now an illusion that she and the householder's son were actually husband and wife. She ran down the stairs, fuming. Uttarā understood that Sirimā, after half a month of dominion of the house, considered it her own. So, she entered into the absorption of loving-kindness (mettā-jhāna) and stood sedately. Sirimā, rushing through the servants, took hold of a ladle, filled it with boiling oil from a pot which was cooking over the fire, and suddenly poured it over Uttarā's head. But, since Uttarā was dwelling in the absorption of loving-kindness, and her whole body was diffused with loving-kindness, she did not feel the heat of the oil which flowed over her body like water onto a lotus leaf.

At that moment, Uttarā's servant accosted Sirimā with abusive words, saying: "You slave woman, you are a mere hireling of our mistress. Yet after staying in this house for just fifteen days you try to rival our mistress." These words awakened Sirimā to her true position. She realized she had gone too far. She went to Uttarā, fell on her feet, and apologised to her, saying: "Dear madam, I had been reckless in my behaviour. Do forgive me!" Uttarā replied: "Dear Sirimā, I cannot accept your apology now. You must first obtain forgiveness from my father, the Buddha, before I can forgive you."

Just then, the Buddha and his company of monastics arrived and sat on the seats prepared for them. Sirimā approached the Buddha and prostrating herself at his feet, said: “Venerable sir, I have done some wrong against Uttarā. I apologised to her for it and she says that I must first obtain forgiveness from the Fortunate One before she will forgive me. May the Fortunate One forgive me.” The Buddha said: “Sirimā, I forgive you.” Then she went to Uttarā and made obeisance to her as a token of her apology.

The Buddha, in his discourse in appreciation of the food offering, uttered the following verse (Dhp 223):

Conquer the angry one by loving-kindness; conquer the wicked one by goodness; conquer the stingy one by generosity; conquer the liar by speaking the truth.

At the end of the discourse, Sirimā was established in the fruition of Stream-entry. After the attainment, she invited the Buddha to her residence the next morning and she made great offerings to the Buddha and his Saṅgha.

Thus goes the story of Uttarā the householder’s daughter, who also was known as Nanda’s mother after she gave birth to a son by the name of Nanda.

Foremost Title Achieved

On one occasion, when the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana monastery naming distinguished female lay-disciples, he declared: [1475]

jhāyīnam yad-idam Uttarā Nandamātā.*

Monastics, among my female lay-disciples who dwell in absorption (jhāna), Uttarā, the mother of Nanda, is the foremost.

6. Princess Suppavāsā the Koliyan

Aspiration in the Past

The future Suppavāsā was reborn into a worthy family in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. While she was listening to a discourse by the Buddha, she saw a certain female lay disciple being named by him as the foremost in offering superior articles. She thus had a strong desire to become such a disciple in the future. After making extraordinary offerings, she aspired to that distinction in front of the Buddha, who predicted that her aspiration would be fulfilled in her future existence.

Discipleship in Her Last Existence

The future Suppavāsā, after being reborn in either the Deva realm or human realm for 100,000 aeons, was reborn as a princess of the Sakyan clan, in the city of Koliya. She was named Suppavāsā. When she was of marriageable age, she was given in marriage to a Sakyan prince. As the housewife in the household of the prince, she had the occasion to listen to a discourse by the Buddha which resulted in her attaining Stream-entry. Later, she gave birth to a son, named Sīvali.<sup>329</sup>

Foremost Title Achieved

At one time, Princess Suppavāsā, the mother of Sīvali, offered choicest food to the Buddha and his Saṅgha. After finishing the meal the Buddha taught a discourse in appreciation of the special offering, saying: “My female lay disciple Suppavāsā, in making this food offering, has in effect made five kinds of offering: life, good appearance, happiness, strength and intelligence.

Offering of life leads to longevity, either in the Deva realm or in the human realm. Offering of good appearance, happiness, strength and intelligence leads to the blessing of good appearance, happiness, strength and intelligence respectively either in the Deva realm or in the human realm.” This was the occasion that became the ground for the Buddha’s naming of Suppavāsā as a foremost female lay disciple.

On another occasion, when the Buddha was residing in the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattthī, and was naming distinguished female lay disciples, he declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvikānam upāsikānam
paṇīta-dāyikānam yad-idam Suppavāsā Koliya-dhītā.*

Monastics, among my female lay disciples who make gifts of the choicest quality, Suppavāsā, the Koliyan Princess, is the foremost.

7. Suppiyā, who Attended the Sick

Aspiration in the Past

The future Suppiyā was reborn into a worthy family in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. On one occasion, while listening to a discourse by the Buddha, she saw a certain female lay disciple being named as the foremost in looking after a sick monastic in an exceptional way. She had a strong desire to become such a disciple in her future existence. After making a great offering, she made her wish in front of the Buddha who predicted that her wish would be fulfilled in her future existence.

Discipleship in Her Last Existence

After faring for 100,000 aeons in the Deva realm or the human realm, she was reborn into the family of a rich householder in the city of Bārāṇasī, during the time of Buddha Gotama, and was named Suppiyā. When she was of marriageable age she [1476] became the wife of a son of a householder.

It was then that the Buddha visited Bārāṇasī in the company of many monastics and was staying in the monastery at the Isipatana Deer Park. Suppiyā, the householder's wife, visited the Buddha and after listening to his discourse on her first visit, she was established in the fruition of Stream-entry.

Suppiyā's Astounding Zeal in Giving

One day, after listening to the Buddha's discourse, Suppiyā made a round of the monastic dwellings in the Deer Park to see to the needs of their residents. She came across a wan, enfeebled monastic who had taken some purgative. She asked him what sort of food or medicine would do him good. He replied: "Lay supporter, meat soup would do me good." Suppiyā said: "So be it, venerable sir, I will send some meat soup to you," and she left after paying respects to the monastic. The next day, she sent her servant to buy some meat in the bazaar, hoping to get some meat for sale to unspecified buyers. The servant could not find such meat and reported to her.

Suppiyā thought to herself: "I have promised to the sick monk to send meat soup. If I do not make good my word, he would feel ill at ease because he is not likely to get meat soup from anywhere else. So, I must see that he gets the meat soup somehow." She went into her bedroom and cut a piece of flesh from her thigh, which she gave to her housemaid to cook some soup using the usual ingredients, such as chilli, onion and other condiments, and said: “Take this soup to the sick monk and offer it to him. If he asks about me, tell him that I am taken ill.” The housemaid did as she was told.

The Buddha heard about the matter. The next morning, at the time of making the daily alms round, after being invited by her husband, he went to Suppiyā’s house in the company of many monastics. After having sat at the special seat prepared for him, the Buddha asked the householder: “Where is Suppiyā?”

“She is unwell, venerable sir,” answered the householder.

“Let her come to me, even though she is unwell.”

“She is unable to walk, venerable sir.”

“Then carry her.”

The householder went and carried his wife, Suppiyā, when, to her surprise, at the instant she looked at the Buddha, the big wound on her thigh suddenly disappeared and was restored to its normal flesh with body hair. Thereupon, the householder and his wife, Suppiyā, exclaimed: “Marvellous it is! Astounding it is! Friend, great is the power of the Fortunate One. At the very instant of seeing the Fortunate One, such a deep wound is restored to natural flesh!” Feeling elated, they served the Buddha and his Saṅgha with the choicest food, specially prepared for offering.

After finishing the meal and teaching a discourse to the supporter, the Buddha returned to the monastery. Then, at the congregation of monastics, the Buddha asked: “Monastics, who asked for meat from Suppiyā the householder’s wife?”

“I did, venerable sir,” answered the sick monastic.

“Did she send the meat soup? Did you enjoy it?”

“Yes, venerable sir, I did.”

“Did you ask what meat it is?”

“No, venerable sir, I did not.”

The Buddha reprimanded the monastic showing many reasons and laid this rule of conduct for monastics: “Monastics, lay supporters, who have conviction in the Three Treasures, even give up their own flesh to the Saṅgha. Monastics, human flesh should not be consumed. Any monastic who consumes human flesh is liable to a breach of a heavy offence (thullaccaya). Monastics, it is improper for a monastic to [1477] consume meat without inquiring about it. He who does so without inquiring about it incurs a breach of a wrong doing (dukkata) rule.”<sup>330</sup> Thus took place the event leading to Suppiyā earning the title of foremost female lay-disciple.

Monastics, among my female lay disciples who look after the sick monastics, Suppiyā is the foremost.

8. Kātiyānī of Unshakable Conviction

Aspiration in the Past

During the time of Buddha Padumuttara the future Kātiyānī was born into a rich man’s family in the city of Hāmsavatī. She saw a certain female lay disciple being named as the foremost in unshakable conviction in the teaching. She admired that female lay disciple. After making extraordinary offerings, she aspired to the same recognition in front of another Buddha, and he predicted that her aspiration would be fulfilled in a future existence.

Discipleship in Her Last Existence

The future Kātiyānī, for 100,000 aeons was reborn either in the Deva realm or human realm, before she was reborn into the family of a householder in the town of Kuraraghara, during the time of Buddha Gotama. She was named Kātiyānī by her parents. When she came of age, she became a close friend of Kālī the householder’s wife who was the mother of Ven. Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa (see chapter 43:17).

---

The Unshakable Conviction of Kāṭiyānī

On one occasion, Ven. Soṇa Kuṭṭikaṇṇa, on his return from the Buddha's monastery, was requested by his mother to reproduce the Buddha's words for her benefit. In compliance, he delivered a discourse in the community hall for Dhamma lectures at the town square. As he was starting his discourse from the raised platform, with his mother as the chief listener, Kāṭiyānī the householder in the company of her friend Kālī, arrived and reverentially listened to the discourse in the audience.

At that time a group of five hundred robbers who had dug a tunnel from the outskirts of the town to the house of Kāṭiyānī according to their secret markings made in the day, had reached the house. Their leader did not join them but was making personal inquiries into the activities of the townsfolk. He stood behind Kāṭiyānī in the assembly where Ven. Soṇa Kuṭṭikaṇṇa was teaching a discourse on the Dhamma.

Kāṭiyānī said to her female assistance: "Go, girl, get some oil from my house for the lamps. Let us light up the lamps at this meeting hall, and we shall share the merit with our friend Kālī in this way. The servant went to the house but on noticing the robbers who were lurking in the tunnel, she was scared and returned to the Assembly Hall without bringing the oil. She reported the matter to her mistress, saying: "Madam, there is a tunnel dug in our compound by robbers!" The robber chief heard the girl's urgent report to Kāṭiyānī and thought to himself: "If Kāṭiyānī were to go home in response to her maid's report, I will cut off her head immediately. If, on the other hand, she were to keep on listening to the discourse with attention, I will return her all the property which my men loot from her house."

Kāṭiyānī said to her maid in whispers: "Hush! The robbers will take only what they find in the house. I am listening to the Dhamma which is hard to be heard. Don't disturb and [1478] spoil it!"

When the robber chief heard Kāṭiyānī's words he pondered: "What a devout lady she is! If I were to take the property looted from the house of such a meritorious lady, we would be devoured alive by the great earth." He hurried to Kāṭiyānī's residence, ordered his followers to return everything they had looted and went back with them to the Assembly Hall to listen to the discourse, taking their seats at the end of the audience.

Kāṭiyānī was established in the fruition of Stream-entry at the end of the discourse by Ven. Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa. When dawn came, the robber chief went to Kāṭiyānī and prostrating at her feet, said: “Dear madam, kindly forgive us for our fault.” Kāṭiyānī asked: “What wrong have you done to me?” The robber chief admitted their plot to her. “I forgive you all,” she said.

“Madam, your forgiveness does not exonerate us yet. As a matter of fact, we would request that your son, Ven. Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa, admit all 500 of us into the Saṅgha as novices.” Kāṭiyānī took the gang to Ven. Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa, and she herself bore all the responsibilities regarding the four requisites for them. They were admitted into the order as novices by Ven. Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa. They strove to gain path-knowledge and ultimately became Arahats. This is the story of Kāṭiyānī the householder whose conviction in the Three Treasures was unshakable.

Foremost Title Achieved

On a later occasion, during the Buddha’s residence at the Jetavana monastery, when he was naming distinguished female lay disciples according to their respective merits, he declared:

Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvikanāṃ upāsikānaṃ aveccappasannānaṃ yad-idaṃ Kāṭiyānī.

Monastics, among my female lay disciples who have unshakable conviction in the teaching, Kāṭiyānī is the foremost.

9. Nakulamātu

The story of Nakulamātu has already been told, when dealing with the story of Nakulapitu (see chapter 45a:10). Here we only need pay attention to Nakulamātu. Nakulapitu and Nakulamātu were of the same aspiration in the time of Buddha Padumuttara. When the future Nakulapitu was a lay disciple, he witnessed a lay disciple being designated as the foremost among lay disciples who were close to the Buddha. He made a great offering and aspired to that designation. Likewise, when the future Nakulamātu witnessed a female lay disciple being designated as the foremost among female lay-disciple who were close to the Buddha, she made great offerings and aspired to that title.<sup>331</sup>

Nakulamātu, like Nakulapitu, was declared by the Buddha:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvikanam upāsikanam
vissāsikanam yad-idam Nakulamātā gahapatānī.*

Monastics, among the female lay disciples who are close to me,
Nakulamātu is the foremost.

10. Kālī, the Disciple of Kuraraghara

Aspiration in the Past

The future Kālī was reborn into the family of a rich man in the city of Hamsavatī, during the time of Buddha Padumuttara. While listening to a discourse by the Buddha, she saw a female lay disciple being named by him as the foremost in devotion to the Buddhas, even before meeting the Buddha. She strongly aspired to be such a person in her future existence. After making great offerings to the Buddha, she made her aspiration in front of him. The Buddha predicted that her aspiration would be fulfilled in her future life. [1479]

Discipleship in Her Last Existence

The future Kālī, after being reborn in either the Deva realm or human realm for 100,000 aeons, was reborn as a daughter of a householder in Rājagaha, during the time of Buddha Gotama. She was named Kālī by her parents.

When she came of marriageable age, she was given in marriage to a son of a householder of Kuraraghara, which was a market town in Avanti province in the Deccan and had to go and live with her parents-in-law in that town. After a time, she became pregnant.

When her pregnancy advanced, Kālī considered it unwise to have the child born at a place away from her own parents' home, and thus she went back to Rājagaha. Then, on one night, the full moon of July (Āsāḷha) 528 BCE, the day the Discourse setting the Dhamma Wheel Turning (Dhamma-cakkappavattana-sutta, SN 56.11) was taught, at midnight, she happened to overhear the Devas,

Sātāgiri and Hemavata, discussing the salutary effects of the Three Treasures above her mansion, in mid-air. She was instilled with devotion for the Buddha so much so that even without having met him, she was established in the fruition of Stream-entry (see chapter 10).

Kāḷī was the first among the females who attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga) and became a noble disciple so that she was the eldest among the Buddha's female disciples. That very night, she gave birth to a child, the future Ven. Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa, and after staying at her parents' house for as long as she liked, she returned to Kuraraghara.

Foremost Title Achieved

On one occasion, when the Buddha sat in glory at the congregation of monastics, in the Jetavana monastery and was naming distinguished female lay disciples, he declared:

*Etad-aggam bhikkhave mama sāvikānam upāsikānam
anussavappasannānam yad-idaṃ Kāḷī upāsikā Kuraragharika.*

Monastics, among my female lay disciples who are devoted to me, even without having met me, Kāḷī of Kuraraghara is the foremost. [1480]

45c: Rich Men with Inexhaustible Resources

[Within the area of Rājagaha, King Bimbisāra's domain there were these five householders with inexhaustible resources: Jotika, Meṇḍaka, Jaṭila, Kākavaliya and Puṇṇa. Puṇṇa's story has been told above in chapter 45b:5. The other four are told here.]

1. Jotika, the Rich Householder

[This story is based on the commentary to Dhp 416.]

His Past Existence as a Sugar Cane Planter

In times past, prior to the time of Buddha Vipassī who appeared 91 aeons previous to the present aeon, there lived in the city of Bārāṇasī two rich brothers who were sugar cane planters and who had a number of workers in the plantation. One day, the younger brother went to the plantation and cut up two stems of cane, one for himself and the other for his brother. He carefully wrapped the ends with leaves so as to contain the juice.

In those times, sugar-cane did not need to be crushed for its juice but by merely cutting up the stem and hanging it up on one end, the juice flowed down freely.

On his way home, he met a Paccekabuddha who had just arisen from dwelling in the attainment of cessation and who, on reviewing the world, saw the younger of the two brothers as the person deserving his blessing since he was in a position to make a meritorious gift. Accordingly, he stood in front of the sugar-cane planter, after having left his Gandhamādana abode, travelling through the air carrying his alms bowl and double robe. The householder was delighted to see the Paccekabuddha and had great devotion to him. He asked the revered one to wait a moment on his shawl which he placed carefully on a high spot. Then he requested him to tilt the alms bowl to receive the sugar-cane juice which he released by unwrapping the stem of the cane. The juice from one stem filled the alms bowl.

The Paccekabuddha drank the sugar-cane juice. The householder, having enjoyed much satisfaction in his gift of the juice to the Paccekabuddha, now thought of making a second gift of the cane which he had carried for his elder brother. "I might pay its price to him, or if he refuses payment, perhaps I will share the merit with him," he thought to himself.

He said to the Paccekabuddha: “Venerable sir, kindly tilt the alms bowl to receive the juice from another cane.” He filled the alms bowl with the juice by unwrapping the second cane. Herein, the younger brother was carrying the cane for his elder brother who did not know about it. By using it as he liked, by giving it to the Paccekabuddha, it never occurred to him that his elder brother might cut another stem for himself. Such was his honest, simple nature.

The Paccekabuddha, having taken the juice from the first cane, reserved that from the second one for a fellow Paccekabuddha. As he remained still seated, the younger brother knew that the Paccekabuddha was not going to take another drink. He made obeisance to him and said: “Venerable sir, for this offering of sugar cane juice, may I enjoy sensual pleasure in the Deva realm and the human world and ultimately realize the Dhamma that you have realized.” The Paccekabuddha said: “May your wish be fulfilled.” After saying words of appreciation for the offering in two verses beginning with these words, he rose into the air in the presence of the householder and returned to the Mount Gandhamādana where he offered the sugar-cane juice to the 500 Paccekabuddhas. He willed that this good deed be seen by the supporter.

After witnessing the miraculous power of the Paccekabuddha, the younger brother went to his elder brother who asked him where he had been. He told him that he had been inspecting the plantation. The elder brother said: “What use is your going on inspection since you do not even bother to bring a sample.” The younger brother replied: “Yes, brother, I did bring a cane for you but I met a Paccekabuddha on my way home and offered the cane juice to the Paccekabuddha. After that I had an urge to make a further offering with the other cane, which was meant for you. I thought that I would pay you the cost of it, or else I would share the merit with you and made another [1481] offering of the juice out of the other cane to the Paccekabuddha. Now, brother, what do you say, would you take the cost of the cane meant for you, or would you share the merit?”

“He drank the first offering on the spot, and brought back the second one, which he offered to the 500 Paccekabuddhas at the Gandhamādana monastery where he returned by his psychic power.”

The elder brother was thrilled to hear the meritorious deed of his younger brother. He said: “May my good deed, through my brother, result in the realization of the Dhamma which the Paccekabuddha had realized.” Thus, while the younger brother aspired to glorious existence in the Deva realm and the human world, and then the realization of Nibbāna; the elder brother aspired to becoming an Arahat straight away. These were the past aspirations of the two brothers.

Another Round of Existence as Householder Brothers

The two brothers lived to the full lifespan of the times. After passing away from that existence they were reborn in the Deva realm during the interim period of innumerable years, an infinite period between the time of Buddha Phussa and that of Buddha Vipassī. While they were still living in the Deva realm, Buddha Vipassī appeared in the world. They passed away from that Deva existence and were reborn as two brothers in the family of a householder in Bandumatī. The elder brother was reborn as the elder one and the younger as the younger again. The elder brother was named Sena, the younger, Aparājita, by their parents.

When they came of age, they succeeded to their family estate. As they were managing the family affairs, there arose a clamour of noises throughout the city of Bandumatī, such as: “Virtuous persons, the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha have appeared in the world, like the sun and the moon! Give in generosity! Perform deeds of merit! Today is the eighth day of the month, an Observance Day (Uposatha). Today is the fourteenth day of the month, an Observance Day. Today is the fifteen day of the month, an Observance Day. Keep the Observance Day precepts. Listen to the expositions of the Dhamma.”

These exhortations were ringing through the city on the appropriate days. They were made by devout disciples of the Buddha. And the people would piously respond. In the morning, they would make alms giving and in the afternoon they would go to the Buddha’s monastery to listen to his sermons. Sena joined the devotees in going to the Buddha’s monastery to listen to his discourse. He sat at the end of the audience.

Buddha Vipassī knew the devout tendency of Sena the householder and taught a discourse in the usual graduated levels beginning from the merit in giving, the merit in morality, and so on. At the end of that discourse, Sena was so enthusiastic about taking up the religious life that he requested the Buddha to admit him into the Saṅgha, the Buddha said to him: “Lay supporter, are there relatives whose permission you need to obtain?”

“If so, first get their permission.”

Then, Sena went to his younger brother Aparājita and said: “Younger brother, you become the sole successor to our family estate from now.”

“But what are you going to do?” Aparājita queried.

“I am going to become a monastic under the Buddha.”

“Dear brother, since the death of our mother, I have regarded you as my mother; since the death of our father, I have regarded you as my father. Our family estate is a vast one. You can do meritorious deeds living in the house. Do not go away to be a monastic.”

“I have heard the Buddha’s discourse. It is not possible to practice the doctrine perfectly as a householder, I must be a monastic now. Stay back, dear brother,” Sena did not allow any further protestations and, leaving behind Aparājita, he went to Buddha Vipassī and was admitted into the Saṅgha, first as a novice, and later as a full-fledged monastic. With [1482] diligence in the monastic practice, he soon became an Arahat.

Donation of a Perfumed Chamber for Buddha Vipassī

Aparājita the householder celebrated his elder brother’s going forth into the monastic life with big offerings to the Buddha and his Saṅgha for seven days. Then paying respects to his elder brother, he said: “Venerable sir, you have renounced the world for the sake of liberation from repeated existence. As for me, I have not been able to break the bonds of sense pleasures. Advise me as to what sort of meritorious deeds should be performed in a big way.”

“Good, good, you wise man,” said Ven. Sena, “build a private chamber for the Buddha.”

“Very well, venerable sir,” responded Aparājita.

He procured various kinds of choicest timber, from which he made posts for the building and seven kinds of precious metals were used to embellish each post for the building. The roofing also was embellished with the seven kinds of precious metals.

Portico to the Buddha's Perfumed Chamber

During the construction of the private chamber for the Buddha, Aparājita Junior, nephew of Aparājita the householder, asked his uncle to allow him to participate in the construction so as to have a share of merit. Uncle Aparājita refused, saying that he could not share the merit with anyone.

Aparājita Junior, being repeatedly refused by his uncle to participate in the construction of the brick monastery, built a separate portico in front of the main building. That Aparājita Junior was reborn as Meṇḍaka the householder during the time of Buddha Gotama. His story will be told after this one.

The Grandeur of the Buddha's Perfumed Chamber

Special features of the brick monastery for use as the Buddha's private chamber included three big windows ornately finished with the seven precious stones. Directly against each of them, Aparājita the householder dug three square lotus ponds of concrete beds which were filled with scented waters, and planted with the five kinds of lotus. The idea being to let the fragrant pollen from the lotus flowers constantly waft through the air towards the Buddha.

The pinnacles were plated with gold sheets and its peak was finished in coral. Its roofing was of emerald glass tiles. The pinnacle had the appearance of a dancing peacock with its feathers in full display. The compound of the monastery was filled with the seven precious stones to a thickness knee-deep, some wrought as ornaments, some in their natural state.

Donating the Monastery to the Buddha

When the brick monastery was completed in all its grandeur, Aparājita the householder said to his elder brother, Ven. Sena: "Venerable sir, the brick monastery is finished. I would like to see it occupied by the Buddha as his private chamber. That would bring me much merit, I understand." Ven. Sena informed the Buddha about the wish of his younger brother.

Buddha Vipassī rose from his seat, went to the newly built monastery, and seeing the whole compound filled with precious stones up to knee-deep, stood at the entrance. Aparājita the householder invited the Buddha to enter the monastic compound but the Buddha did not move and remained standing at the entrance. Thrice, the householder requested the Buddha to go in, but to no avail. On the third time the Buddha glanced at Ven. Sena, who knew from that glance the Buddha's wish. So he said to his younger brother: "Go to the Buddha and say to the Buddha: 'Venerable sir, these precious stones will be solely my responsibility. May the Fortunate One reside here without bothering about them.'" Hence, Aparājita the householder went to the Buddha, made obeisance to him with the hands, knees and forehead touching the ground, and said: "Venerable sir, just as men would leave the shade of the tree unconcernedly, or ferry across a river without thinking about the ferryboat [1483] they have used, so also, may the Fortunate One enter and stay in the monastery unconcerned about these precious stones."

The Buddha refused to enter the monastic compound because of the precious stones. The Buddha's monastery was open door to all visitors, coming in the mornings as well as in the afternoon. The Buddha could not keep watch and ward over the precious stones. Hence the Buddha considered: "If visitors take them away and the householder Aparājita might put the blame on me for the loss he would be incurring grave consequences leading to the four lower worlds (apāya), these considerations made the Buddha refuse to enter.

When Aparājita made it clear that precious stones should not bother the Buddha for they were the sole responsibility of the supporter Aparājita only, the Buddha agreed and entered the monastery. The supporter placed some watchmen at the monastic compound with the words: "Men, if visitors were to collect these precious stones inside pockets or baskets, or sacks, you must prevent them from doing so but, if they were to grab them in their hands only, let them do so."

Aparājita let every household in the city know that he had strewn about precious jewels up to knee-deep inside the monastic compound of the Buddha's Perfumed Chamber, and invited all and sundry who had listened to the Buddha's discourse to take them. The poor were expected to take two fistfuls while the rich should take only one fistful. The householder's idea was to give incentive to those who had no natural inclination to go to the Buddha's monastery and attend the sermons and thus help them towards emancipation. He had also the good will to extend his gift to the naturally inclined devotees.

The people abided by the supporter's stipulation about the gifts at the Buddha's monastery: The poor enjoying two fistfuls of the treasures, the rich only one fistful. When the precious stones were exhausted, a second round up to knee-deep, were strewn about. And when the second was exhausted, the third round followed.

An important event then occurred. Aparājita had a strong idea: He wanted visitors to the Buddha to take delight in watching the golden radiance emitted by the Buddha, side by side with the glow emitted by a ruby of priceless quality, of the size of a bitter cucumber which he had placed at the Buddha's feet. The people enjoyed the wondrous sight of the two kinds of radiance as desired by the householder.

The Ruby is Stolen by a Brahmin

One day, a Brahmin, who was a non-believer in the Buddha, went before the Buddha with the intention of stealing the ruby. From the time he went close to the Buddha, past the audience, Aparājita had an inkling of the Brahmin's evil intent. "How good it would be if this Brahmin would not snatch away my ruby!" he thought to himself.

The Brahmin pretended to make obeisance to the Buddha, stretching out his hands towards the Buddha's feet and suddenly snatched the ruby, hid it in the fold of his lower garment, and left. Aparājita, the supporter of the Great Monastery, could not stand the brazenness of the Brahmin. When the Buddha had ended his discourse, he approached him and said: "Venerable sir, I had strewn the monastic compound with precious stones up to knee-deep three times, and had no grudge against those people who took them away. In fact, I was pleased with my own gift-making. But today I had forebodings about the Brahmin's visit to the Fortunate One and I had wished that he would not steal the ruby. My foreboding has been proved correct. I cannot keep my mind calm and clear."

Aparājita's Aspiration

Buddha Vipassī said to Aparājita: "Lay supporter, it is possible for one to prevent pilferage of one's property, is it not?" Catching the meaning of the Buddha's broad hint, the householder made obeisance to the Buddha and made his aspiration in these terms: "Venerable sir, from today onwards, let no one, be they 100 kings or robbers, be able to rob me, or in any way dispossess me of any of my property, be it as trifling as a strand of thread. Let no fire burn my property. Let no flood wash [1484] away my property," and the Buddha said: "May all your wishes be fulfilled."

Aparājita held great celebrations to mark the donation of the grand monastery. For nine whole months he offered food to 6,800,000 monastics at the monastery.

On the day of libation, he donated a set of three robes to each of the monastics. The junior-most monastic received, on that occasion, robe-material worth 100,000.

His Last Existence as Jotika the Householder

When Aparājita passed away after a lifetime of meritorious deeds, he was reborn as a Deva. And for 91 aeons he was never reborn in the four lower worlds. During the time of Buddha Gotama, he was reborn in the family of a rich householder. After nine and a half months of conception in his mother's womb, on the day he was born, all weaponry in Rājagaha blazed like flames, and all jewellery worn on the person of the citizens gleamed like the glow of the sun, so that the whole city was glowing.

The householder, who was the father of the boy, went to see the king. King Bimbisāra asked him: "Householder, today all weaponry are blazing and the whole city is glowing. Do you know what has caused this?"

"Yes, I do, Great King," replied the householder.

"What is it?"

"A new royal servant of your majesty was born in my house. It is due to the great past merit of my infant son that this strange phenomenon has happened."

"How is it, householder? Is your son going to become a robber?"

"No, Great King, he will not become a robber. He is endowed with vast past merit."

"In that case, bring him up with care. Let him have 1,000 pieces of money for his nursing."

From then onwards, the king gave 1,000 pieces of money every day towards the boy's upkeep. On the day of the boy's naming, he was given the name Jotika, "Luminous," signifying the glow that marked his birth.

Sakka's Creation of Jotika's House

When Jotika came of age, his parents cleared a site for building a house for him. At that moment, Sakka's crystal seat warmed up by way of signalling some event called for his attention. He reviewed the world and saw that people were marking out a site for building a house for Jotika. Sakka thought to himself:

"This man Jotika is no ordinary man who has to live in a house built by human hands. I must see to a proper residence for him,” and he descended to the human world in the guise of a carpenter. He asked the men at the site: “Men, what is this all about?”

“We are pegging out the house to be built for Jotika’s residence.”

“Then, make way men, Jotika is not the kind of man who has to live in a house built by human hands.”

So saying, he intently looked at a stretch of land that was fourteen acres wide.

1. The land became flat and smooth like a meditation device for meditating on the earth element.

2. Then, Sakka, looking intently at the chosen site, willing in his mind: “Let there arise, opening up the earth, a seven-tiered mansion finished with the seven kinds of precious stones,” and instantly a seven-tiered mansion complete with the seven kinds of precious stones arose opened up the earth.

3. Next, Sakka, looking intently at the mansion, willing in his mind: “Let there appear seven walls finished with the seven kinds of precious stones around the mansion,” and instantly the seven walls appeared around the mansion. [1485]

4. Next, Sakka, looking intently at the walls, willing in his mind: “Let there appear wishing trees inside each of the seven walls,” and instantly there appeared wishing trees inside each of the seven walls.

5. Next, Sakka looked intently at the mansion and willed in his mind: “Let there appear four gold jars full of precious stones at each of the four corners of the mansion,” and his wish materialized.

In this connection, Jotika’s four treasure jars are different from the treasure jars that usually appeared for Bodhisattas, in that in the latter case, the four jars were of various sizes at their mouths varying from one league in diameter:  $\frac{3}{4}$  league,  $\frac{1}{2}$  league, and  $\frac{1}{4}$  league; they had their bottoms reaching down to the base of the great earth. In the former case, the size of the mouths of the jars is not mentioned in the old commentaries, but they contained jewels about the size of palmyra fruits whose faces have been cut off.

6. At the four corners of the great mansion, four sugar cane plants of solid gold appeared, each with a stem the thickness of a palmyra tree. The leaves of the trees were emerald. These trees bore witness to Jotika’s immense past merit.

The seven entrances to the seven walls were guarded by seven Yakkha generals with their armies: at the first gate, Yamakoḷi was in charge with 1,000 Yakkhas under him; at the second gate, Uppala was in charge with 2,000 Yakkhas under him; at the third gate, Vajira was in charge with 3,000 Yakkhas under him; at the fourth gate, Vajirabāhu was in charge with 4,000 Yakkhas under him; at the fifth gate, Kasakanda was in charge with 5,000 Yakkhas under him; at the sixth gate, Kaṭattha was in charge with 6,000 Yakkhas under him and at the seventh gate, Disāpāmukha was in charge with 7,000 Yakkhas under him.

King Bimbisāra Makes Jotika Royal Treasurer

When King Bimbisāra heard the news of the Jotika phenomenon comprising the arising through the earth of the bejewelled seven-storied mansion, the seven walls and its great gates, and the appearance of the four great gold jars, and so on, he made him the Royal Treasurer, and had all the paraphernalia of the office such as, the white umbrella, etc., sent to him. From that time, Jotika was widely known as the Royal Treasurer.

The lady who had been Jotika's partner in doing meritorious deeds in the past now happened to be reborn in the northern island continent. The Devas took the lady, named Sakulakāyī, from her native island continent and installed her in Jotika's seven-storied mansion. She brought with her a small measure of rice and three crystals with heat potential in them. This quantity of rice and the three stones provided all the cooked food throughout their lives. The small vessel that contained the original rice could hold any quantity of fresh rice, even as much as 100 cart-loads of them could be poured into it!

When the rice was to be cooked, it was put into a cooking pot and placed on the three crystals, which served as a fireplace and which glowed with heat until the rice became properly cooked and then the glow faded out. When curries and other dishes were cooked, the three crystals worked for the same purpose. Thus the Jotika couple never had the use of fire for cooking. For lighting as well, they never used fire because they had emerald and rubies that glowed and gave sufficient light.

The great opulence of Jotika became well-known throughout the whole of Jambudīpa and people thronged to his mansion to admire it. Some came from afar using carts and other vehicles. Jotika entertained them to the special quality rice that grew only in the northern island continent which was cooked on the three crystals. He also asked his visitors to take away whatever they fancied at the wishing trees. Further, he would ask them to take away gold, silver and jewels from the gold jar whose mouth was one quarter of a league wide. All visitors from Jambudīpa enjoyed Jotika's munificence. It is especially remarkable that the gold jar never depleted even for an inch but always remained full to its brim. This wonderful phenomenon was the result of [1486] Jotika's munificence in his past life as Aparājita during the time of Buddha Vipassī when he let the visitors to the Buddha's monastery to take away the seven types of precious metals and precious stones strewn knee-deep about the precincts of the monastery repeatedly for three times.

King Bimbisāra Visits Jotika's Mansion

King Bimbisāra wanted to go and see Jotika's mansion but, during the earlier period, when there were many visitors making their visits and enjoying the munificence of Jotika, the king did not go there. Only when most people had been there and there were only a few visitors, the king gave word to Jotika's father that he would pay a visit to Jotika's mansion. The householder told his son about the king's intention, and Jotika said the king would be welcome. King Bimbisāra went to Jotika's mansion with a big retinue. When he met a maid-servant who was a sweeper and refuse-scavenger at the first entrance, she extended her hand to the king as a welcoming gesture, but the king mistook her to be the wife of the Treasurer Jotika and out of shyness did not hold her hand. At the later entrances too, although the maid-servants extended their hands to the king, the king did not hold their hands for the same reason. Thus it is to be seen that at Jotika's residence even maid-servants had the appearance of the wives of the Treasurer.

Jotika welcomed the king and, after saluting him, followed him. The king dared not step on the emerald flooring which seemed to him like a deep chasm. He had doubts about Jotika's loyalty, for he thought that his Treasurer was plotting against him by digging a great pit. Jotika had to prove his innocence by saying: "Great King, this is no pit. Let me go ahead, would your majesty come after me?" Then only the king found that everything was well. He inspected the mansion, from the emerald flooring upwards at the great mansion.

Prince Ajātasattu had nefarious thoughts at that time. Prince Ajātasattu was by his father's side, holding his hand. It occurred to young Ajātasattu thus: "How foolish my father is! For he lets his subjects enjoy a greater style of life than himself. The man of inferior caste is living in a bejewelled mansion while the king himself lives in a palace built of timber. If I were king, I would never, even for a day, allow this rich man to live in this mansion.”

Even while the king was inspecting the grandeur of the upper stories, meal time arrived. He said to Jotika: “Treasurer, we shall have our morning meal here.” Jotika replied: “I know, Great King. I have made all the arrangements for it.”

Then King Bimbisāra took a bath with sixteen potfuls of scented water. He sat on the seat usually used by Jotika. He was offered some water to wash his hands. Then a bowl of thick milk rice was placed before him in a golden bowl, which was worth 100,000 pieces of money. The king thought it to be a course of his meal and prepared to take it. Jotika said to him: “Great King, this is not for eating. It is placed here to warm the rice that is to come.” The attendants of Jotika brought the rice cooked from the special rice from the northern island continent in another golden bowl, which was worth 100,000 pieces of money. They put the rice bowl above the bowl of milk rice which provided constant steamy heat to the rice, thereby making it palatable throughout the meal.

The king relished the delicious rice brought from the northern island continent so much so that he did not know when to stop eating. Jotika said to him after saluting him: “Great King, that should be enough, if you eat more you will not be able to digest it.” The king said: “Are you making much of your rice?” Jotika replied: “Not at all, Great King, for I am feeding the same rice to all members of your retinue. I only fear disrepute.”

“If due to too much eating of this food, which is especially nutritious, your majesty would feel lethargic on the next day, then people might say that I had fed you with this food and that I might have drugged you with the food.”

“In that case, clear the table. Give me the drinking water.”

After the king had finished his meal, all the members of his retinue were fed with the same [1487] rice.

Then, a friendly exchange of pleasantries took place between the host and his king, whereupon the latter inquired after the wife of the host.

“Don’t you have a wife in your household?”

“Yes, your majesty, I have a wife.”

“Where is she now?”

“She is sitting in our private chamber. She does not come out because she does not know that your majesty has come.”

Jotika thought it only proper that his wife should come and meet the king and went to his wife, saying: “The king is paying us a visit. Ought you not see him?” Sakulakāyī in her reclining posture in their private chamber, replied: “My lord, what sort of person is a king?”

“The king is the person who rules over us.” Sakulakāyī was not pleased to learn that and did not want to hide her displeasure. So she said: “We had done meritorious deeds in the past in a wrong way. That is why we are being ruled over by someone. Our volition in the past in doing good deeds was not genuine so that, although we are wealthy, we are born as subjects to someone. Our gifts must have been made without conviction about the law of productive deeds and their results. Our present state of being subjects of some ruler is the result of our practice of generosity with sham conviction. But now, what is expected of me?” Jotika said: “Bring the palm-leaf fan, and fan the king.”

Sakulakāyī obediently did as she was told. As she sat fanning the king, the odour that wafted from the king’s headdress hurt her eyes and tears flowed from them. The king, seeing her tears, said to Jotika: “Treasurer, womenfolk are short of wisdom. She is weeping probably because she thinks the king is going to confiscate your property. Tell your wife that I have no design on your property. Let her mind be set at ease.”

Jotika said to the King: “Great King, my wife is not weeping.”

“But, why do those tears flow from her eyes?”

“Great King, the odour coming from your majesty’s headdress hurts her eyes, and so the tears fall. She has a most delicate constitution. She has never used fire in her everyday existence. She gets heat and light from crystals and gems. As for your majesty, you are used to the light of oil lamps, I presume.”

“That’s true, Treasurer.”

“In that case, Great King, from now on, may your majesty live by the light of a ruby.” And he presented the king with a priceless gem, the size of a bitter cucumber. King Bimbisāra studied Jotika’s mansion closely and, uttering his sincere comment: “Great indeed is Jotika’s wealth,” he departed.

Jotika’s Spiritual Urgency and Awakening

Later on, Prince Ajātasattu, under the evil influence of Devadatta, imprisoned his own father, King Bimbisāra, and made him unable to walk inside his cell by cutting open the soles of his feet and exposing the wounds to burning charcoals, and starving him to death. This he did to usurp the throne. No sooner had he ascended the throne, than he took his big army to confiscate Jotika’s mansion by force. But, as his army came in front of the jewelled wall, the reflection of his own forces on the wall looked as if the guards of Jotika were about to attack him, and he dared not go near the wall.

Jotika was keeping the Observance Day (Uposatha) at that time. He had finished his meal early in the morning and gone to the Buddha’s monastery where he listened to the Buddha’s discourse. Thus, while Ajātasattu was burning with greed, Jotika was enjoying the serenity of the [1488] Buddha’s company.

The moral of this is: “Just as foolish ones, ruffians blinded by inordinate greed, fret and fume and torment themselves, while the wise ones, cherishing the Dhamma, find mental happiness and physical ease.”

When King Ajātasattu’s army approached the first wall of Jotika’s mansion, Yamakoḷī, the guardian Deva of the gate raised a fierce alarm: “Now, where will you escape?” and routed the king’s army which fled in confusion in every direction. Ajātasattu ran towards the Buddha’s monastery in a haphazard manner.

When Jotika saw the king, he rose and went to him and asked: “Great King, what’s up?” The king said furiously: “You detailed your men to fight me while you come here and pretend to be attending to the Buddha’s discourse. How is that?”

“Great King, did you go to my place to confiscate it by force?” inquired Jotika.

“Yes, I did,” said the king angrily.

Jotika coolly said to him: “Great King, not to speak of yourself alone, 1,000 monarchs will find it impossible to take my mansion by force without my consent.”

“Are you going to be king?” he felt greatly insulted by Jotika’s remarks.

But Jotika replied coolly: “No, no, Great King. No one can take any of my property, not even a strand of thread, without my consent. And that includes kings.”

“I am the king. I can take whatever you possess whether you consent or not.”

“In that case, Great King, here are 20 rings around my fingers. I do not give them to you. Now, try and take them.”

King Ajātasattu was a man of great physical prowess. He could leap up, while sitting, to a height of eighteen cubits and while standing, up to a height of 80 cubits. He attempted to remove the rings from Jotika’s fingers but was unable even to take one. His kingly dignity was thus gravely impaired. Jotika now said to him: “Great King, if you would spread out your dress, I will show you.” And he straightened his fingers towards the king’s dress, which was spread in front of him, and all the 20 rings readily dropped onto it. He said: “Great King, you have seen for yourself that your majesty cannot confiscate my property against my wish.” He was greatly edified by the encounter with the king. A sense of spiritual urgency arose in him and he said to the king: “May your majesty allow me to become a monastic.”

The king thought that if he renounced his home life and became a monastic, his great mansion would easily fall into his hands, so he allowed the request promptly. Jotika was admitted into the Saṅgha at the feet of the Buddha. Not long afterwards, with due diligence, he became an Arahat and became known as Ven. Jotika. At the instant of his attaining Awakening, his great mansion and other items of wealth suddenly disappeared. His wife Sakulakāyī was sent back by the Deva to her native place, the northern island continent.

One day, some monastics asked Ven. Jotika: “Friend, do you have attachment to the great mansion and Sakulakāyī?” Ven. Jotika replied: “No, friend, I do not have any attachment.” The monastics went to the Buddha and said: “Venerable sir, Ven. Jotika falsely claims Awakening.”

Then, the Buddha said: “Monastics, it is true that there is no attachment to the great mansion and his wife in the mental state of Ven. Jotika, who is an Arahat.” Further the Buddha spoke this verse (Dhp 416):

He, who in this world has given up craving that arises at the six sense doors and has renounced the home-life to become a monastic, who has exhausted craving for existence, and made an end of all forms of existence, him I call a Brahmin.

By the end of this discourse a large multitude of people attained path-knowledge at the various levels. [1489]

2. Meṇḍaka, the Householder

Aspiration in the Past

The future Meṇḍaka was a nephew of Aparājita the householder, who lived in the days of Buddha Vipassī, 91 aeons previous to the present aeon. His name also was Aparājita. His uncle Aparājita started construction of a brick monastery as a private chamber for the Buddha. Then, Aparājita Junior went to his uncle Aparājita and asked that he be allowed to be co-builder of the monastery. The uncle would not accept the idea, for he did not want to share the merit with anyone. Aparājita Junior then thought of building a portico in front of his uncle's main building. He put up the portico with timber. The posts for the building were each finished in silver, in gold, in rubies, and in the seven kinds of precious stones. Likewise, the beams, rafters, roof-trusses, purlin, trellis-work, door-leaves and roofing tiles were finished in gold and silver and precious stones. He planned the portico to be used by the Buddha.

On the top of the portico were pinnacles made with gold sheet roofing and coral. 1) The centre portico was occupied by an Assembly Hall with a raised platform for the Buddha which had a floor frame and legs of solid gold; 2) the base of the legs were sculpted in the form of golden goats (meṇḍaka); 3) the leg-rest had, at its base, a pair of golden goats; 4) and there were also six golden goats placed around the Assembly Hall; 5) the flooring for the seating of the orator was woven with cotton thread at the base, golden thread in the middle, and finished with beads of pearl; 6) the back of the orator's seat was of solid sandalwood.

When the construction of the portico and all the appointments in it were finished to the satisfaction of the supporter Aparājita Junior, a four month long ceremony, marking the donation was held, where the Buddha and 6,800,000 monastics were offered alms food. On the last day, sets of three robes were donated to the Saṅgha, even the junior-most monastic received robes worth 100,000 pieces of money.

Rich Man of Bārāṇasī

Having performed those meritorious deeds during the time of Buddha Vipassī, the future Meṇḍaka was reborn in the present aeon as a rich man's son in Bārāṇasī. He succeeded to his father's estate as the "rich man of inexhaustible resources." One day, as he was going before the king at his audience, he discoursed on astronomical readings with the king's chief counsellor. He asked the Brahmin chaplain:

"How is it, teacher, have you been studying the planets recently?"

"Of course I have, what other pursuit do I have than a constant study of the planets?"

"If so, what do the planets presage about the general populace?"

"Some catastrophe is going to happen."

"What sort of catastrophe?"

"There will be famine."

"When is it going to happen?"

"Three years hence."

The rich man of inexhaustible resources then expanded his cultivation. He invested all his wealth in rice grains which he stored in 1,250 storehouses. The excess of his collection of rice was put into big jars, and then the excess was buried in the ground. The last portion of the excess was mixed with mud which was plastered onto the walls of his house.<sup>332</sup>

When the famine broke out as predicted by the councillor, the rich man's household subsisted for some time on the hoarded grains of rice. When the granaries and the storage in big jars were exhausted, the rich man was perforce to send away his servants to go into the forest at the end of the mountains and find things to eat for their survival until such [1490] time as things became normal, in which case, they might or might not choose to come back to him as they wished. They waited and after seven days depending on their master, were obliged to leave.

There was only one servant, named Puṇṇa, who personally attended on the members of the rich man's family, comprising the rich man and his wife, their son, and their daughter-in-law. The five members of the household next subsisted on the rice grains which were buried in the ground. When that store was used up, they scraped off the mud plastered in the walls of the house, salvaged the few grains from it and managed to survive. But, the famine raged on. At last, the only source of seed grain was extracted from the base of the walls where the mud plaster held a few precious grains. The mud yielded half a measure of rice grain, from which, when the husks were pounded off, a quarter measure of edible grains were obtained. Being afraid of robbers who might loot whatever edibles were available at their house, the family prudently hid the last meagre store of grains in the ground, carefully shut up in a small pot.

One day, the rich man, who had come home from attending on the king, said to his wife: "Dear wife, I feel hungry. Is there anything to eat?" The wife did not say: "No," but answered: "My lord, we have a quarter measure of rice grain, it is the last we have."

"Where it it?"

"I have hidden it in the ground for fear of thieves."

"If so, cook that little rice."

"My lord, if I were to cook it into rice it would provide us a meal. If I were to make gruel, it would provide us with two meals. What shall I do with it?"

"Dear wife, this is our only and last source of food. Let us eat to the full and face death. Cook it into rice."

The rich man's wife obediently cooked the rice, and making five portions of the cooked rice, placed one in front of her husband. At that moment, a Paccekabuddha, who had just risen from dwelling in the attainment of cessation at the Mount Gandhamādana, reviewed the world with his divine power of sight and saw that the southern island continent of Jambudīpa was reeling under a grave and prolonged famine.

An Arahāt, or a Paccekabuddha in this case, does not feel hunger during the seven-day dwelling in the attainment of cessation. On rising from that state, the pangs of hunger are felt inside the stomach. So the Paccekabuddha reviews the world, as is the natural thing, for a prospect of getting alms food. A supporter of some gift to a Paccekabuddha at that time is usually rewarded by his or her own merit on that day. If he were to wish for the post of commander-in-chief, he would get it.

The Paccekabuddha knew that a rich man of Bārāṇasī had a quarter measure of rice grain which had been cooked to provide a meal for five persons. He also knew that the five persons in the rich man's household had sufficient conviction in the law of productive deeds (kamma) to offer him the cooked rice. So he took his alms bowl and double robe and stood at the rich man's door.

The rich man was intensely pleased to see the Paccekabuddha who had come to his door for alms food. He thought to himself: "In the past I failed to make offering to alms seekers, as the result of which I am falling under this catastrophe. If I were to eat my portion of rice I would live for one day. If I were to offer it to this the venerable one, it would lead to my welfare for millions of aeons." Thinking thus, he had the rice-vessel in front of him withdrawn, and, approaching the Paccekabuddha, paid respects to him with the hands, knees and forehead touching the ground and invited him to the house. After showing him the seat, he washed the Paccekabuddha's feet, and wiped off the water. Then, letting the Paccekabuddha sit on a raised platform with golden legs; he put his rice into the Paccekabuddha's alms bowl.

The Paccekabuddha closed the lid of his alms bowl when the supporter's vessel was left with half of its contents. But the supporter said: "Venerable sir, this rice is just one-fifth of a quarter measure of rice grain and can serve as only one meal for one person. It cannot be [1491] divided into two for two persons. Do not consider my welfare for this present world but consider my welfare in the hereafter. I wish to offer the whole to your reverence." Then he aspired thus: "Venerable sir, may I never, in my faring in Saṃsāra, meet with famine like this again. From now on, may I be the provider of food and seed grains to all the population of Jambudīpa. May I be free from manual labour to earn my bread. May I have 1,250 storehouses for storing rice grain, in which superior red rice grains falling from the sky get filled up the moment I look up skyward as I sit there with my head washed. In all my future existences, may I have my present wife as my wife, my present son as my son, my present daughter-in-law as my daughter-in-law, and my present servant as my servant."

The Conviction of Others in the Householder

The wife of a rich man thought to herself: "I cannot eat while my husband starves," and offered her share of the rice to the Paccekabuddha. She made her wish thus: “Venerable sir, may I never, in my faring in Saṃsāra, meet with starvation. May I have a vessel of cooked rice which never gets depleted however much is taken from it by the populace of Jambudīpa, while I sit distributing the rice. In all my future existences, may I have my present husband as my husband, my present son as my son, and my present daughter-in-law as my daughter-in-law, and my present servant as my servant.”

The rich man’s son also offered his share of rice to the Paccekabuddha, and made his wish: “May I never, in my faring in Saṃsāra, meet with starvation. May I have a bag of silver coins containing 1,000 pieces out of which I may distribute silver to everyone in Jambudīpa, and may the bag remain as full as ever. In all my future existences, may my present parents be my parents, may my wife be my wife, and may our present servant be our servant.”

The rich man’s daughter-in-law also offered her share of the rice to the Paccekabuddha and made her wish thus: “May I never, in my faring in Saṃsāra, meet with starvation. May I have a basket of rice grain, out of which I may distribute rice to all the populace of Jambudīpa, and may that basket never get depleted. In all my future existences, may my present parents-in-law be my parents-in-law, may my present husband be my husband, and may our present servant be our servant.”

The servant Puṇṇa also offered his share of rice to the Paccekabuddha and made his wish thus: “May I never, in my faring in Saṃsāra, meet with starvation. In all my future existences, may all the present members of my master’s family be my master. When I plough a field, may there appear three extra furrows on the left and three extra furrows on the right of the main furrow in the middle, thereby accomplishing my work sevenfold, making a seed bed for sowing four baskets of seed grains.”

Puṇṇa could have wished for and become commander-in-chief if he so aspired to it. However, his personal ties with a rich man’s family were so strong that he wished that in all his future existences his present masters be his masters.

When the five supporters had made their respective wishes the Paccekabuddha said: “May your wishes be fulfilled quickly. May all your aspirations come to full realisation like the full moon. May your wishes be fulfilled in every respect. May all your aspirations come to full realisation as with the wish-fulfilling gem.”

Having expressed his appreciation of the offerings, he made a wish that his supporters, for enhancement of their convictions, see him and his further actions, then he rose into the air and went to the Mount Gandhamādana, and shared the alms food he had collected with the 500 Paccekabuddhas. The rice that was meant for the consumption of five persons was offered and satisfied the 500 Paccekabuddhas, thanks to the supernormal powers of the original donor. This was witnessed by the five supporters whose devotion [1492] increased by leaps and bounds.

The Result Experienced the Same Day

A remarkable thing now happened. At noon, the rich man's wife washed her cooking pot and put the lid on it. The rich man, who was suffering the pangs of hunger, dozed off. When he woke up in the evening, he said to his wife: "Dear wife, I am starving. See if you could scrape out some bits of cooked rice from the pot." The wife was certain that not a tiny bit of cooked rice clung to the pot which she had washed clean. But she did not say so; instead, she thought of opening the lid of the pot first before reporting to her husband.

As soon as she removed the lid of the rice pot, she found the rice pot was filled with finely cooked rice, like a cluster of jasmine buds that filled the pot to its brim and even causing the lid to rise. With joyous astonishment she breathlessly reported the strange phenomenon to her husband: "Look, my lord, I washed the rice pot clean and covered its lid. But now it is brimful with cooked rice, like a cluster of jasmine buds. Meritorious deeds are indeed worthwhile doing! Alms giving is indeed worthwhile doing! Now, my lord, get up and eat it in joy."

The rich man's wife first served the rice to her husband and her son. When they had finished eating, she and her daughter-in-law ate it. Then she gave it to their servant Puṇṇa. The rice in the pot did not decrease any further than the first spoonful taken out. On that very day, all the granaries and jars were filled with rice grain again. The rich man announced to all the citizens of Bārāṇasī that his house had sufficient rice grain and cooked rice for anyone to come and take it. And the people came and took it joyfully. The populace of Jambudīpa were saved from famine on account of the rich man.

His Last Existence as Meṇḍaka the Rich Man

After passing away from that existence, he was reborn in the Deva realm. From then onwards, he fared in the Deva realm or the human world until the time of Buddha Gotama when he was born into the family of a rich man in Bhaddiya. He married the daughter of another rich man.

As the result of his having donated statues of golden goats to Buddha Vipassī, the rich man's compound behind the house, about fourteen acres in area, was tightly occupied by solid gold statues of goats which rose up from the ground. The mouths of the statues of the goats were adorned with small cotton balls the size of marbles in five colours. By removing these ornamental stoppers at the mouth, one could take out from the goats any article one wished, such as clothes or gold or silver, etc. A single goat statue could yield all the needs of the whole population of Jambudīpa such as ghee, oil, honey, molasses, clothing, gold, silver, etc. As possessor of these miraculous goat statues, the rich man came to be called Meṇḍaka, signifying that he was the owner of the golden goat (meṇḍaka).”

Their son was the son in their previous existence. That son was Dhanañjaya who became the father of Visākhā. Their daughter-in-law was the daughter-in-law in their previous existence. The wife of Meṇḍaka was named Candapadumā, the daughter-in-law, wife of Dhanañjaya, was named Sumanadevī, their servant was named Puṇṇa.

Reference may be made to chapter 45c on the lives of the female lay disciples, on Visākhā, and concerning the details about Meṇḍaka's household up to the point where Meṇḍaka gained Stream-entry.

It is important to note here that Meṇḍaka the rich man, after attaining Stream-entry, consequent to his listening to a discourse by the Buddha, told the Buddha how he had been dissuaded by the ascetics of other faiths from visiting him, and how they denigrated him.

Thereupon the Buddha said: “Rich man, it is the nature of people not to see their own faults but to fabricate other peoples' faults and spread them about like a winnowing winnowing chaff.” Further, the Buddha spoke this verse (Dhp 252):
[1493]

Householder, it is easy to see the faults of others, but difficult to see one's own fault. Like the winnowing winnowing chaff in the wind, one spreads the faults of others but hides one's own faults like a crafty fowler covers himself.

By the end of this discourse a large multitude of people gained Awakening at various levels.

3. Jaṭila, the Treasurer

[This story is also told in the commentary to Dhp 416.]

Aspiration in the Past

The future Jaṭila was a goldsmith during the time of Buddha Kassapa. After the passing away of the Buddha, when a shrine to store the relics of the Buddha was being built, an Arahāt, who went to supervise the construction, asked the workers: “Men, why is the northern entrance not complete?” And the men replied: “Venerable sir, there is a lack of gold to complete it.”

“I will go to the town to find supporters to give gold. Meantime, you will do your work sincerely.” The Arahāt then went about the town and called for supporters of gold, making them realize that their contributions were needed to complete the northern entrance to the big shrine they were building.

When he visited the house of the goldsmith it so happened that the man was having a quarrel with his wife. The Arahāt said to the goldsmith: “Lay supporter, the big shrine that you have undertaken to build cannot be completed at its northern entrance due to a shortage of gold. So it would be well if you could contribute some.” The goldsmith who was angry with his wife said to the Arahāt: “Go and throw your Buddha image into the water!” Thereupon his wife scolded him: “You have done a great wrong. If you are angry, you should have abused me, or beaten me as you please. Why do you vilify the Buddhas of the past, the future and the present?”

The goldsmith saw his mistake and suddenly a spiritual urgency (saṃvega) having arisen in him, he apologised to the Arahāt: “Venerable sir, pardon me my fault.” The Arahāt said: “You have not wronged me in any way. You have wronged the Buddha. So you ought to make restitution in front of the Buddha.”

“How should I do that, venerable sir?”

“Make three flower vessels of gold, enshrine them in the relic chamber of the great shrine, wet your clothes and your hair, and atone for your mistake.”

“Very well, venerable sir,” the goldsmith said and he started to make the gold flowers. He called his eldest son and said to him: “Come, son, I have vilified the Buddha, for which I am going to make restitution by making three bunches of gold flowers which are to be enshrined in the relic chamber of the great shrine. I would ask you to be a partner in this good work.” The eldest son replied: “I did not ask you to vilify the Buddha. You did it on your own accord. So you go alone.” The goldsmith then called his middle son and asked for his co-operation, who gave the same reply as the eldest brother. The goldsmith called his youngest son and sought his help. The youngest son said: “Whatever business there is to be discharged by you, it is my duty to help.” And so he helped his father in making the gold flowers.

The goldsmith made three gold flower vessels, about half a cubit high, put gold flowers in them, and enshrined them in the relic chamber of the great shrine. Then, as advised by the Arahāt, he wetted his clothes and hair, and atoned for his grave blunder. This is how the future Jaṭila performed a meritorious deed.

His Last Existence as Jaṭila, the Treasurer

For his improper remarks concerning the Buddha, the goldsmith was sent adrift in the river for seven existences. In his last existence, during the time of Buddha Gotama, he was reborn to the daughter of a rich man in Bārāṇasī under strange circumstances. The rich [1494] man’s daughter was extremely beautiful when she was about fifteen or sixteen years old, so her parents put her on the seventh floor of their house with a governess. They lived there alone in the private chamber. One day, as the girl was looking out through the window, a Vijjādhara with supernormal power travelling through the air happened to see her. He was deeply enamoured of her and came in through the window. The two fell in love with each other.

She became pregnant by the man, and her governess asked her how she became pregnant. She confided in her about her secret affair but forbade her to tell it to anyone. The governess dared not disclose the secret to anyone. On the tenth month of pregnancy, the child, a boy, was born. The young mother had the baby put inside an earthen pot, had its lid covered, and placing garlands and bunches of flowers over it, she ordered the governess to carry it on her head and send it adrift on the river Ganges. If anybody were to inquire about her action, the governess was to say that she was making a sacrificial offering for her mistress. This scheme was carried out successfully.

At that time, two ladies, who were bathing downstream, noticed the earthen pot floating down. One of them said: “That pot belongs to me!” The other said: “The contents of that pot belong to me!” So, they took the pot from the water, placed it on dry ground and opened it. On finding a baby in it, the first lady, who said the pot belonged to her, claimed the child as hers. The second lady, who said the contents of the pot belonged to her, also claimed the child as hers. They brought the dispute to the court of justice which was at a loss to give a judgment. They referred it to the king who decided that the child belonged to the second lady.

The lady who won the claim over the child was a female lay supporter who was a close attendant of Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana. She brought up the child with the intention of sending him to Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana, to be admitted as a novice. Since the child at birth was not bathed, his hair was tangled with dried dirty matter from his mother's womb and on that account, he was given the name Jaṭila, meaning "knotted hair."

When Jaṭila was a toddler, Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana went to the lady's house for alms food. She offered alms food to Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana, who saw the boy and asked her: "Female lay supporter, does this boy belong to you?" And she replied: "Yes, venerable sir. I intend to send him to your reverence to be admitted into the order. May your reverence admit him as a novice."

Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana said: "Very well," and took the boy with him. He reviewed the fortunes of the boy and saw by his super knowledge that the boy had great past merit and was destined to enjoy a high status in life. And considering his tender age, he thought that the boy was too young for admission into the order and his faculties were not mature enough. So he took the boy to the house of a lay supporter in Takkasilā.

The lay supporter of Takkasilā, after paying respects to Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana, asked him: "Venerable sir, does this boy belong to you?" And Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana answered: "Yes, lay supporter. He will become a monastic. But he is still too young. Let him stay under your care." The lay supporter said: "Very well, venerable sir," and he adopted the boy as his son.

The lay supporter of Takkasilā was a merchant. It so happened that he had a considerable quantity of merchandise which for twelve years he found no buyers. One day, as he was going on a journey, he entrusted this unsold merchandise to the boy, to be sold at certain prices.

On the day when Jaṭila was in charge of the shop, the guardian spirits of the town exercised their power over the townsfolk, directing them to Jaṭila's shop for whatever needs they had, even as trifling as condiments. He was able to sell the unsellable merchandise in a single day. When the merchant returned home and saw none of his unsellable goods, he asked the boy: “Son, have you destroyed all those goods?” Jaṭila replied: “No, I did not destroy them. I have sold them at the prices you stated. Here are the [1495] accounts, and here is the money.” His adoptive father was highly pleased. “This boy has the making of a successful man. He is an invaluable asset of a man,” thus reflected the merchant. Accordingly, he married his grown up daughter to Jaṭila. Then, he had a big house built for the couple. When the construction of the house was completed, he presented it to the couple for their residence.

Jaṭila, Lord of the Golden Hill

When Jaṭila took occupancy of his house, as soon as he put his foot at the threshold of the house, a golden hill 80 cubits high suddenly appeared through the earth at the back of the house. On learning the news of Jaṭila’s immense fortune, the king conferred on him the position of Royal Treasurer, sending him the white umbrella and the paraphernalia of the Treasurer’s office. From then onwards, he was known as Jaṭila, the Treasurer.

Jaṭila had three sons. When they had grown to adulthood, he had a desire to become a monastic. But he also had the duty to the king as treasurer. If there were to exist in Jambudīpa another rich man who was equal in wealth to him, he might be released by the king so that he could join the Saṅgha. Otherwise, he had no chance to become a monastic. So, he had a gold brick, a gold goad and a pair of gold slippers made, which he entrusted to his men, saying: “My men, go around Jambudīpa taking these articles with you and enquire about the existence or otherwise of a rich man whose wealth is equal to mine.”

Jaṭila’s men went around the country and reached the town of Bhaddiya where they met Meṇḍaka the rich man, who asked them: “Men, what is your business in touring this place?”

“We are touring the country to find something,” said Jaṭila’s men. Meṇḍaka, seeing the gold brick, the gold goad and the pair of gold slippers which the visitors were carrying with them, rightly surmised that the men were making enquires about the wealth of the country. So he said to them: “Men, go and see at the back of my house.”

Jaṭila’s men saw at the back of Meṇḍaka’s house an area of about fourteen acres packed with golden goat statues of the sizes of a bull or a horse or an elephant.

Having inspected all those gold statues, they came out of Meṇḍaka's compound. "Have you found the things you were looking for?" asked Meṇḍaka, and they said to him: "Yes, rich man, we have." – "Then you may go," said Meṇḍaka.

Jaṭila's men returned to their home town and reported to their master about the immense wealth of Meṇḍaka of Bhaddiya. "Rich man, what is your wealth when compared to Meṇḍaka's?" they said to Jaṭila and they gave the details of what they had seen at the backyard of Meṇḍaka's house. Jaṭila was happy about the discovery. "We have found one type of rich man. Perhaps another type also exists," he thought to himself. This time he entrusted his men with a piece of velvet, which was worth 100,000 pieces of money, and sent them around in search for another type of rich man.

The men went to Rājagaha and stationed themselves at a place not far from Jotika's great mansion. They collected some firewood and were making a fire when they were asked by the people what they were going to do with the fire. They answered: "We have a valuable piece of velvet cloth for sale. We find no one who can afford the price. We are returning to our home town. This piece of velvet cloth would attract robbers on the way. So we are going to destroy it by burning it." This was, of course, said as a pretence, to probe the mettle of the people.

Jotika noticed the men and enquired what was afoot. On being told about the men's tall story, he called them up and asked: "How much is your cloth worth?" They answered: "Rich man, it is worth 100,000 pieces of money." Jotika ordered his men to pay the price of 100,000 to the sellers and, entrusting the cloth to them, said: "Men, give it to my maid-servant who is scavenging at my gate."

The scavenger came to Jotika murmuring in the presence of Jaṭila's men: "Rich man, [1496] how is it? If I am at fault, you could chastise me by beating. But sending such a coarse piece of cloth to me is too much. How could I use it on my person?" Jotika said to her: "My dear girl, I did not send it for wearing. I meant it to be used as your foot rug. You could fold it up under your bed and when you go to bed you could use it for wiping your feet after washing them in scented water, couldn't you?" – "That I could do," said the maid servant.

Jaṭila's men reported back their experiences in Rājagaha and told their master: "Rich man, what is your wealth when compared to that of Jotika?" They said this to Jaṭila, and they described the marvellous grandeur of Jotika's mansion, his vast wealth, and his maid-servant's remarks about the velvet piece.

Jaṭila Tests the Past Merits of His Three Sons

Jaṭila was overjoyed to learn about the presence, in the country, of two great rich men. “Now I shall get the king’s permission to enter the Saṅgha,” he thought and went to see the king about it.

Herein, the commentary does not specify the name of the king. However, in the commentary on the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada), in the story of Visākhā, it has been said: “It is important to remember that within the domain of King Bimbisāra, there were five rich men of inexhaustible resources: Jotika, Jaṭila, Meṇḍaka, Puṇṇaka and Kāḷavaliya.” Hence the king here should be understood to mean King Bimbisāra.

The king said to Jaṭila: “Very well, rich man, you may go forth into the monastic life.” Jaṭila went home, called his three sons, and handing over a pick-axe with a gold handle and diamond bit, said to them: “Sons, go and get me a lump of gold from the golden hill behind our house.” The eldest son took the pick-axe and struck at the golden hill. It felt like he was striking at granite. Jaṭila then took the pick-axe from him and gave it to the middle son to try it; and he met with the same experience.

When the third son was given the pick-axe to do the job, he found the golden hill was like mounds of soft clay. Gold came off it in layers and lumps at his easy strokes. Jaṭila said to his youngest son: “That will do, son.” Then he said to the two elder sons: “Sons, this golden hill does not appear on account of your past merit. It is the result of the past merit of myself and your youngest brother. Therefore, be united with your youngest brother and enjoy the wealth peacefully together.”

Herein, we should remember the past existence of Jaṭila as the goldsmith. In that existence, he had angrily said to an Arahat: “Go and throw your Buddha image into the water!” For that verbal misconduct, he was sent adrift in the river of Saṃsāra for seven successive existences. At his last existence also he met with the same fate.

When the goldsmith was making golden flowers to offer to the Buddha at the shrine, which was built in honour of the deceased Buddha Kassapa, to atone for his verbal misconduct, only his youngest son joined in the effort. As the result of their good deed, the father, Jaṭila and his youngest son alone had the benefit of the golden hill that appeared.

After admonishing his sons, Jaṭila the Treasurer went to the Buddha and entered the monastic life. With due diligence in monastic practice, he became an Arahat in two or three days.

Later on, the Buddha went on his alms round with 500 monastics and arrived at the house of Jaṭila's three sons. The sons made food offerings to the Buddha and his Saṅgha for fifteen days.

At the congregation of monastics in the Assembly Hall, monastics asked Ven. Jaṭila: "Friend Jaṭila, do you still have attachment today to the golden hill of 80 cubits in height, and to your three sons?"

Ven. Jaṭila, an Arahat, replied: "Friend, I have no attachment to the golden hill and my three sons." [1497] The monastics said: "This Ven. Jaṭila claims Awakening falsely." When the Buddha heard the accusations of these monastics, he said: "Monastics, there is no attachment whatsoever in the mental state of Ven. Jaṭila to that golden hill and his sons." Further, the Buddha spoke this verse (Dhp 416):

The one who has given up craving that arises at the six sense spheres and has renounced the home life to become a monastic, who has exhausted craving for existence, and made an end of all forms of existence, him I call a Brahmin.

By the end of discourse many persons attained path-knowledge such as Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).

4. Kāḷavaḷiya, a Rich Man

A brief account of Kāḷavaḷiya, a rich man, is found in the commentary to MN 101, which is reproduced here.

During the time of Buddha Gotama, there lived in Rājagaha a poor man by the name of Kāḷavaḷiya. One day, his wife cooked a meal of sour gruel mixed with some edible leaves, for rice was not within their means. On that day, Ven. Mahā Kassapa, rising from dwelling in the attainment of cessation, reviewed the world, contemplating to whom he should bring his blessing. He saw Kāḷavaḷiya in his supernatural vision and went to his door for alms food.

Kāḷavaḷiya's wife took the alms bowl of Ven. Mahā Kassapa and emptied her cooking pot into it. She offered her poor meal of sour gruel mixed with edible leaves to Ven. Mahā Kassapa, without keeping back anything for themselves, an offering that was, therefore, complete (nirāvasesa-dāna). Ven. Mahā Kassapa went back to the monastery and offered the gruel to the Buddha. The Buddha accepted just a portion of it, with which to satisfy himself, and gave the remainder to the 500 monastics who had enough to eat from that meal. Kāḷavaḷiya happened to be at the Buddha’s monastery to beg for gruel.

Ven. Mahā Kassapa asked the Buddha about the benefit that would result to Kāḷavaḷiya on account of the brave deed of sacrificing his food completely. And the Buddha said: “Seven days hence Kāḷavaḷiya will get the white umbrella of the treasurer’s office, he will be made a royal treasurer by the king.” Kāḷavaḷiya heard these words of the Buddha and hastened home to tell his wife about it.

At that time, King Bimbisāra was on his inspection round and he saw a criminal tied on a stake outside the city. The man impudently said to the king in a loud voice: “Great King, I would request that a meal, which was prepared for your majesty, be sent to me.” The king replied: “Ah, yes, I will.” When dinner was being brought to the king, he remembered his promise to the criminal on the stake and ordered the officials concerned to find someone who would send his dinner to the criminal outside the city.

The outside of the city of Rājagaha was infested with demons so that very few people dared to go out of the city by night. The officials went around the city announcing that 1,000 pieces of money would be awarded on the spot to anyone who would take the king’s meal to the criminal on the stake outside the city. No one came out at the first round of announcements with the beating of the gong; and the second round also was fruitless. But at the third round, Kāḷavaḷiya’s wife accepted the offer of 1,000 pieces of money.

She was brought before the king as the person undertaking the king’s mission. She disguised herself as a man and wielded five kinds of weapons. As she fearlessly went out of the city carrying the king’s meal, she was accosted by Dīghatāla, the guardian spirit of a palm tree who said: “Stop there, stop! You are now my food.” But Kāḷavaḷiya’s wife was not afraid and said: “I am not your food. I am the king’s messenger.”

“Where are you going?”

“I am going to the criminal on the stake.” [1498]

“Could you convey a message for me?”

“Yes, I could.”

“If so, cry aloud all along your way this message: ‘Kāḷī, daughter of Sumana, the chief of celestial Devas, wife of Dīghatāla, has given birth to a son!’ There are seven pots full of gold at the root of this palmyra tree. Take them as your fee.”

The brave woman went her way crying aloud the message: “Kāḷī, daughter of Sumana, the chief of celestial Devas, wife of Dīghatāla, has given birth to a son!” Sumana, the chief of celestial Devas heard her cry while presiding over a meeting of celestial Devas and said to his assistants: “There is a human being bringing happy tidings. Bring her here.” And so she was brought before Sumana who thanked her and said: “There are pots full of gold underneath the shade at noon of the big tree. I give them all to you.”

She went to the criminal on the stake, who had to be fed with her hand. After taking his meal, when his mouth was wiped clean by the woman, he felt the feminine touch and bit her knotted hair so as not to let her go. The woman being courageous, had presence of mind, she cut the hair-knot with her sword and freed herself.

She reported to the king that she had fulfilled her task. “What proof can you show that you have actually fed that man?” asked the king. “My hair-knot in the mouth of that villain should be sufficient proof. But I have further proof too,” replied Kāḷavaḷiya’s wife and related her meeting with Dīghatāla and Sumana. The king ordered the pots of gold described by her to be dug up. All were found. The Kāḷavaḷiya couple became very rich all at once. “Is there anyone as wealthy as Kāḷavaḷiya?” inquired the king. The ministers said: “There is none, Great King.” So the king appointed him as Treasurer of Sāvattḥī and gave him the paraphernalia, seal and title of office.

Epilogue

Nine Pāḷi verses and their translation:

1-2. On Saturday, the thirteenth waxing day of July (Āsāḷha), 1331 Myanmar Era (1969 CE), the 2,513th year of the Dispensation, the month when the Alexandrian laurel blooms forth in the forest and the traditional festival of admitting new entrants into the Saṅgha is being held throughout the land, at 11 a.m.

3. This work entitled “The Great Chronicles of the Buddhas,” the tome that came into being under the sponsorship of the State Dispensation Council as a sequel to the Sixth Buddhist Council, portraying the life story of the Buddhas and especially that of Buddha Gotama from the fulfilling of the perfections to the day-to-day events relating to him, was completed for the edification of the followers of the Buddha who uphold righteousness, a most auspicious achievement indeed.

4. The Buddha, the Conqueror of the five kinds of death (māra), endowed with great diligence, who occupied himself by day and by night with the five functions of the Buddha, lived for 45 Rains Retreats (Vassa) after Awakening, during which he ferried the multitudes of Devas and humans across to the yonder shores of Nibbāna by means of the ship of the eightfold noble path.

5. To the Buddha, the Conqueror of the five kinds of death, I, acclaimed as a great, distinguished venerable who has memorized the Three Piṭakas, who, thanks to past merit, has been fortunate enough to live a life devoted to Buddhist studies since his novicehood, pay homage humbling myself in body, speech and mind, with this tome entitled: “The Great Chronicles of the Buddhas,” arranged in 45 chapters in respectful memory of the 45 years of the Buddha’s noble mission, an exegetical work embodying erudite judgements on readings in the text and the commentaries.

6. As the result of this work of great merit made by me with diligence, knowledge and conviction, may all sentient beings benefit from it: May they clearly understand through learning, reflecting and cultivating the Dhamma, the good doctrine expounded by the supreme lord of righteousness for the welfare of the multitudes, for their happiness pertaining to the human world and the Deva realm, and the peace of Nibbāna.

7. May the multitudes, by following the middle way of eight constituents which is purified by shunning the two extremes of self-indulgence and self-mortification, which brings happiness by clearing away the hindrances to path-knowledge and its fruition, realize with facility through the ten stages of insight, the supreme peace of Nibbāna that liberates one from craving for all forms of existence, that is free from all sorrow caused by the five kinds of loss and grief that gnaws at the hearts of worldlings.

8. May the Buddha’s teaching that consists of learning, training and penetration, last for 5,000 years, shining forth like the sun, overriding the corroding influence of sophists or captious contenders. May all beings in the human world, the Deva realm and the Brahma world have firm conviction in, and deep respect for the Dhamma expounded by the Buddha. May the rain god, the benefactor of the human world, bless the earth with his bounteous showers at the proper time, at night, for fields of poor fertility once in five days, for fields of medium fertility once in ten days, and for fields of good fertility once in fifteen days.

9. May the rulers of the country give protection to the people like the good kings of yore. May they work for the welfare of the people just as they would for their own children, on the example of those benevolent rulers who extended their loving care to their subjects by upholding the ten principles of rulership. [1500]

Ven. Buddhaghosa, the famous commentator, in his Epilogue to the commentary of the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA), an exegesis on the Abhidhamma, and the commentary on the last five books of the Abhidhamma (Pañca-pakarāṇa) made his wish in four verses beginning with: Yam pattam kusalam tassa, “for he who has done wholesome deeds,” We have adopted them here, respectfully endorsing his sentiments therein, in verses 6-9 above.

In doing so, we are also endorsing the view of the sub-commentator, Ven. Saṅgharakkhita Mahāsāmi, author of the Charming Essence of Meaning (Sārattha-vilāsini),<sup>333</sup> wherein it has been said: “For one who does not work for the benefit of others, no real benefit accrues to him. This is a statement fit to be proclaimed with one’s right arm raised.”

Such being the words of the wise, may all right-minded persons make a point of directing their efforts towards the good of others and thereby do good to themselves as well.

This is the completion of “The Great Chronicles of the Buddhas.”

May I be endowed with the three knowledges (vijjā). [1501]

Further Explanations

Foreword

The explanation of the word Anudīpanī: anu means “further” and dīpanī means “explanation,” hence “further explanations” of what is not explicit in the original writing is called the Further Explanations. After Ven. Ledi Sayādaw had written an exegetical work, the Explanation of the Ultimate Truth (Paramattha-dīpanī) on the Collection of Meaning in the Abhidhamma (Abhidhammattha-saṅgaha), he composed another work, entitled the Further Explanations (Anudīpanī), to explain again what is vague in the Explanation of the Ultimate Truth.

Similarly, an expository work under the title of the Further Explanations on some words or passages of the Great Chronicle which deserve elaboration or explication is written here separately as a supplement. Had the expositions been included in the original work, readers might have found it confusing. This would have been a distraction for readers. Therefore, it is deemed necessary to compile comprehensive notes on important points and topics in the text as the Further Explanations (Anudīpanī) for the benefit of the serious students of the Great Chronicle.

It is hoped that, by going through the Further Explanations, difficult subjects in the Chronicle would become more easily understandable and profound meanings of some usages would become clearer. Therefore, it is suggested that after reading the Chronicle, readers should study the Further Explanations with great interest. May they understand easily the deep and important meanings, which might otherwise remain unrevealed or overlooked.

The Commentarial Classification of Teachers

[Because of its general importance in understanding the methods of the commentaries I have moved this section out of the First Treatise on the Perfections, where it was originally given as part of an obscure discussion of the foundations (adiṭṭhāna) and placed it at the head of the Further Explanations.]

Certain Teachers

In stating the different views of various teachers in the treatises, they are mentioned as certain theories (eke vāda) or other theories (aññe vāda) when these teachers have qualifications worthy to be the author's teacher; when they have qualifications equal to his, the author describes their views as secondary theories (apare vāda); when they are inferior to him, he refers to theirs as some theories (keci vāda).

This traditional way of recording is handed down generation after generation: "Certain" or "other" means those worthy to be the author's teachers; "secondary" means those with qualifications equal to those of the author, and "some" implies those inferior to him. [101]

As to how the fulfilment of the four foundations – the foundations of truthfulness (saccādhittāna), abandoning (cāgādhittāna), tranquillity (upasamādhittāna), wisdom (paññādhittāna) – take place in the Bodhisatta's last existence, certain (eke) teachers maintain that the four foundations are already fulfilled at the time when the Bodhisatta is conceived.

Just as the Bodhisatta's conception takes place in his last existence only when the perfections are completely fulfilled, so also does it take place only when the four foundations reach complete fulfilment.

The explanation given by certain (eke) teachers: Having completely fulfilled the foundation of wisdom at the time of descending into his mother's womb, while remaining there for ten months and when emerging from it, the Bodhisatta is bound to possess mindfulness and clear comprehension.

Ordinary worldlings are not aware of their descending into their mother's womb, nor are they aware of remaining there and emerging from it at birth. The 80 future disciples are aware of descending into their mothers' wombs, but they are not aware of remaining there or of emerging from them; the two future chief disciples and future Paccekabuddhas are aware of their descending into their mothers' wombs, and of remaining there, but not of emerging from them at birth. True, these future chief disciples and future Paccekabuddhas, when the time draws near for their births, are flung in a tumble by internal pressure of the womb towards the external genital orifice, as if plunged into a very deep chasm. Then they undergo extreme suffering in emerging from the genital orifice, just like the big elephant would if it were to push its way through a keyhole. Therefore, these future chief disciples and future Paccekabuddhas are unable to know that they are emerging from their mothers' wombs. In this way, one should have a deep sense of spiritual urgency by contemplating the extreme suffering of conception in the mother's womb with the thought: "Even such personages, who are accomplished in the perfections, are subjected to intense suffering on such an occasion!"

The Bodhisattas, however, are conscious of all the three events of descending into the mother's womb, of remaining there and of emerging from it at birth. The internal pressure is not capable of turning them topsy-turvy in the womb. On their birth they always emerge from the mother's womb with both hands stretched out, eyes open, and standing firmly and straight. Apart from the Bodhisattas, there is no single being who is mindful of these three events. Therefore, at the time of their taking conception in the mother's womb, and at the time of birth, the 10,000 world-element shook violently (see the commentary to the Discourse on Inspiring Confidence (Sampasādanīya-sutta, DN 28, PTS 3.886).

Having completely fulfilled the foundation of truthfulness, as soon as he is born, the Bodhisatta goes forward taking seven steps towards the north, and surveying boldly all the directions, makes a truthful utterance three times without fear, like a lion's roar: "I am the foremost in the world (aggoham asmi lokassa); I am the most eminent in the world (jeṭṭhoham asmi lokassa); I am the most praiseworthy in the world (seṭṭhoham asmi lokassa)."

Having completely fulfilled the foundation of tranquillity, when he sees the four signs of the old man, the sick man, the dead man and the ascetic, the arrogance due to youthfulness, healthiness, longevity and wealth ceases in the mental continuum of the Bodhisatta, who has deep understanding of the four epitomes of Dhamma (Dhammuddesa): how this body is oppressed by old age, ailments, death, and how escape from servitude to craving for pleasures and wealth is impossible unless there is complete detachment from it as given in the Discourse to Ratṭhapāla (Raṭṭhapāla-sutta, MN 82).

Having completely fulfilled the foundation of abandoning, the Bodhisatta leaves behind, without any concern, all the royal relatives and kinsmen; he also abandons the kingship he has been enjoying and the sovereignty of a Universal Monarch which [102] is about to come within his grasp.

This is the interpretation by certain (eke) teachers. The commentator, Ven. Mahā Dhammapāla, gives no comment on this theory (eke vāda).

Some Teachers

According to some (keci) teachers, the four foundations are completely fulfilled only on the occasion of becoming a Buddha. Their interpretation is: When he becomes a Buddha attaining the path-knowledge of an Arahat (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) and omniscience through the past accumulation of the foundation of truthfulness in accordance with his vow, he penetrates the four noble truths; hence the foundation of truthfulness is fully accomplished then. Through the past accumulation of the foundation of abandoning, he eradicates all the defilements; hence the foundation of abandoning is fully accomplished then. Through the past accumulation of the foundation of tranquillity, he achieves the most sublime peace of Nibbāna when he becomes a Buddha, hence the foundation of tranquillity is fully accomplished then. Through the past accumulation of the foundation of wisdom, he achieves the unobstructed knowledge of all there is to know (anāvaraṇa-ñāṇa); hence the foundation of wisdom is fully accomplished then.

This is the interpretation by some (keci) teachers, on which the commentator, Ven. Mahā Dhammapāla, remarks: “Their statement is imperfect because Full Awakening (Abhisambodhi), which is the path-knowledge of an Arahat or omniscience, is purely absolute reality; because the foundation of tranquillity means extinction through non-arising of the suffering of Saṃsāra or complete peace; and because this is attainable only on realization of Nibbāna or Parinibbāna.”

Other Teachers

Other (aññe) teachers, however, say that the four foundations are completely fulfilled on the occasion when the discourse on the Dhamma Wheel (Dhammacakka) is taught, when the Buddha develops the knowledge of teaching (desanā-ñāṇa).

This is how other (aññe) teachers explain their view: The mental continuum of the Buddha, who has in the past made an accumulation of the foundation of truthfulness, becomes accomplished in it by teaching the noble truths in three modes of the knowledge that it is the truth (sacca-ñāṇa); the knowledge that a certain function, with regard to that truth, has to be performed (kicca-ñāṇa); and the knowledge that the function, with regard to that truth, has been performed (kata-ñāṇa) with regard to each of the four noble truths.

The mental continuum of the Buddha, who has in the past made an accumulation of the foundation of abandoning, becomes accomplished in it by making the great offering of the true Dhamma. The mental continuum of the Buddha, who has in the past made an accumulation of the foundation of tranquillity, becomes accomplished in it by having attained himself the peace of freedom from defilements and causing others to attain the same as himself. The mental continuum of the Buddha, who has in the past made an accumulation of the foundation of wisdom, becomes accomplished in it with full comprehension of the propensities and latent tendencies of beings.

This is the interpretation by other (aññe) teachers, on which the commentator, Ven. Mahā Dhammapāla, remarks: “The statement of other (aññe) teachers is also imperfect because the four foundations become completely accomplished only when the duties of a Buddha (Buddha-kicca) are over; with the teaching of the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, the Buddha has just begun performing his duties, he has not yet finished them. Hence the statement of other (aññe) teachers remains incomplete.”

Secondary Teachers

Secondary (apare) teachers maintain that the four foundations are completely fulfilled on the occasion when Nibbāna is fully realized, when he passes away in Parinibbāna.

This is how the secondary (apare) teachers explain their view: Of the four aspects of the foundation of truthfulness, Nibbāna as the absolute (paramattha) foundation of truthfulness, is paramount; its function is not yet complete by mere attainment of the Arahatta path (Arahatta-magga) through the extinction of the defilements (kilesa-parinibbāna).

Its function is complete only when existence comes to an end with the extinction of [103] the aggregates (khandha-parinibbāna). It is only then that the foundation of truthfulness becomes perfect. At that time, because all the four aggregates: the substratum of sense desires (kāmūpadhi), the substratum of the body (khandhūpadhi), the substratum of the defilements (kilesūpadhi) and the substratum of volitions (abhisankhārūpadhi) have been rejected, the foundation of abandoning becomes perfect. Then, because all the volitions cease, the foundation of tranquillity becomes perfect. At that time too, because the purpose of wisdom is achieved, the foundation of wisdom becomes perfect. That is the view of the secondary (apare) teachers.

Without making any criticism of their view, the commentator, Ven. Mahā Dhammapāla, gives his own interpretation as a supplement to it: 1) The perfection of the foundation of truthfulness is particularly evident at the time of the Bodhisatta's birth; 2) the perfection of the foundation of wisdom is particularly evident at the time of his Awakening; 3) the perfection of the foundation of abandoning is particularly evident when he makes the great gift of Dhamma by delivering the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse; 4) the perfection of the foundation of tranquillity is particularly evident when he realizes Parinibbāna.

To summarise the various views of different teachers:

1. Certain (eke) teachers say that the four foundations become perfect on the first occasion, when conception takes place in the last existence.
2. Some (keci) teachers say that the four foundations become perfect on the second occasion, when Awakening is attained.
3. Other (aññe) teachers say that the four foundations become perfect on the third occasion, when the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse is delivered.
4. Secondary (apare) teachers say that the four foundations become perfect on the fourth occasion, when Parinibbāna is realized.

Following the tradition of authors, who express last in their works the view they endorse, Ven. Mahā Dhammapāla mentions last the secondary theories (apare vāda) because he approves of it and accepts it with a supplementary remark, which is: “The four foundations become perfect only on the fourth occasion, when Parinibbāna is realized, as stated by the secondary (apare) teachers. However, it is particularly evident that the foundation of truthfulness is perfect at the time of the first event; the foundation of wisdom at the time of the second event; the foundation of abandoning at the time of the third event; and the foundation of tranquillity at the time of the fourth event.”

Supplement to IX

Bodhisatta Gotama's Lives

[Previously this formed the end of chapter IX, but it seems placed better here, in the Further Explanations.]

Bodhisatta Gotama received the prediction from the 24 Buddhas from Dīpaṅkara to Kassapa. His lives, in which the prophecy was declared, may be classified as follows.

Five Lives as a Recluse

1. He received the first definite prophecy as the recluse Sumedha from Buddha Dīpaṅkara, he heard the same prophecy as:
2. Jaṭila the recluse, from Buddha Nārada.
3. Susīma the recluse, from Buddha Atthadassī.
4. Maṅgala the recluse, from Buddha Siddhattha.
5. Sujāta the recluse, from Buddha Tissa.

Nine Lives as a Monk

The event occurred when he was born:

1. As the Universal Monarch Vijitāvī, and later became a monk (bhikkhu) in Buddha Koṇḍañña's presence.
2. Brahmin Suruci, who became a monk in Buddha Maṅgala's presence.
3. Brahmin Uttara, who became a monk in Buddha Sumedha's presence.
4. A Universal Monarch, who became a monk in Buddha Sujāta's presence.
5. King Vijitāvī, who became a monk in Buddha Phussa's presence.
6. King Sudassana, who became a monk in Buddha Vessabhū's presence.
7. King Khema, who became a monk in Buddha Kakusandha's presence.
8. King Pabbata, who became a monk in Buddha Koṇāgamana's presence.
9. Jotipāla the Brahmin youth, who became a monk in Buddha Kassapa's presence.

Five Lives as a Layman

He received the prediction as:

1. The Brahmin Atideva, from Buddha Revata.
2. The Brahmin Sujāta, from Buddha Sobhita.
3. The wealthy Jaṭila, from Buddha Padumuttara.
4. Kassapa the Brahmin youth, from Buddha Piyadassī. [199]
5. King Arindama, from Buddha Sikhī.

Two Lives as a Nāga

He also received the prediction as:

1. Atula the Nāga King, from Buddha Sumana.
2. Another Nāga King, also named Atula, from Buddha Vipassī.

Three Different Lives

1. In one life as Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, he received the prediction from Buddha Dhammadassī.
2. In another life as a warrior King of the Yakkhas, he received the prediction from Buddha Anomadassī.
3. In another life as a lion king, from Buddha Paduma.

Reflections on the Rarities

In this way, throughout the duration of four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons in which our Bodhisatta Gotama was fulfilling the perfections, it was only in the 24 existences from Buddha Dīpaṅkara's Dispensation to Buddha Kassapa's that he encountered a Buddha's Dispensation. Bearing this in mind, we should realize the rarity of such an encounter and should strive to make the most of the opportunity we are blessed with.

Even a being so great as the Bodhisatta, who had received the definite prophecy from Buddha Dīpaṅkara, had witnessed only 24 Dispensations, which were very few if we take into consideration that long duration. Even in those 24 Dispensations, it was only in nine that he obtained monkhood. Judging from this, it is clear that becoming a monk is a rarity, as it is said in the texts, the state of becoming a monk is rare (pabbajita-bhāvo dullabho). Becoming a monk, which proves to be so difficult for a Bodhisatta to attain, who had even received the predictions, will be all the more so for ordinary persons.

Nowadays, in Buddhist society, some thoughtful people, who have some off-days while toiling to earn a living, put on robes temporarily lest their leisure should be futile. They would make use of it to their advantage. Such a monk is called a “rare (dullabha) monk.” As they could not live long as a monk, the state of which is very difficult to obtain, they try to take it up for a short period.

If one fails to understand its meaning, one is bound to have the wrong notion that only such a temporary monastic is a “rare monastic.” But he who, after becoming a novice in his younger days, attains monkhood in due course, a monk who has all along been in the robe since his childhood, is not a “rare monastic.” Because of this notion, people are inclined to show their generosity to a rare monastic more than to a lifelong monastic who has been ordained from their twentieth year. If a temporary monkhood is difficult to achieve, it goes without saying that a permanent monkhood is even more difficult to achieve.

Government Servants and Monastic Life

Since there is a rule: Monks, royal attendants should not be made monks (na bhikkhave rāja-bhaṭo pabbājetabbo), some would say that even though they would make a request to become monks during their spare time, it is not permissible for the Saṅgha to grant [200] their request as it is against the Vinaya, and they argue government servants nowadays should not be ordained.

It is not proper to say this either. In the commentary on the Story of the Soldier (Rāja-bhaṭa-vatthu) of the Great Chapter (Mahā-khandhaka, Vin Mv 1) of the Vinaya (PTS 1.73), it is explained: “Although, originally, a royal attendant, he who now has returned his salaries to the king; he who has handed over his post either to his son or to his brother; and has informed the king that he is no longer in royal service; he who has fully performed his duties for which he is paid; and he who got the permission to become a monk, willingly given by his rightful employer, the king: it is lawful to ordain them.” In view of this explanation, if pensioners nowadays want to become monks permanently for life, they should do so after returning their pensions to the government or after being given permission willingly from the government saying: “You may become a monk, if you wish.”

Miscellaneous Topics – 2310

The rule that “royal attendants should not be made monks,” has been promulgated only with reference to those who took the shelter of the Dispensation so that they might escape the king’s employ. This should be known from the text of the Story of the Soldier (Rāja-bhaṭṭa-vatthu, Vin Mv PTS 1.73). Government servants today have no intention of escaping service. In fact, they are even worried lest they should be dismissed by incurring the employer’s displeasure as he would ask: “Why should you become a monk?” Therefore, those who become temporary monastics are not against the rule of the Vinaya Great Division (Mahā-vagga), provided they do so after getting permission from the authorities concerned.

Even if the one ordained had the intention to escape government service, as is referred to by the rule, it is those monastics conferring ordination upon him that violate the rule, and not the one ordained who is still a valid monk. This is clearly stated in the Vinaya texts.

Another way of thinking is as follows: Even a great being like our Bodhisatta, who had received the definite prophecy, happened to be a monastic only nine times despite the fact that he had encountered 24 Buddhas. From this one is likely to think: “Rare is it to become a monk.” Be that as it may. But, if one takes into consideration the statements in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) that 400,000 Arahats accompanied Buddha Dīpaṅkara when entering into Rammavatī city for alms food, and that there were 100,000 Arahats on the first occasion of the three meetings, as the number of Arahats was so great, one can hold that it is not hard to become a monk.

The saying: “Rare is it to become a monk” means “it is seldom that circumstances are favourable for such an event.” Each time the Bodhisatta encountered a Buddha’s Dispensation, he hardly had access to becoming a monk because circumstances were not favourable. Those numerous Arahats in the lifetime of Buddha Dīpaṅkara were the ones who had favourable circumstances, not only to become monastics but to become Arahats. In any endeavours, it is difficult to get a result when circumstances are not favourable. On the other hand, achievement of a result is easy under favourable circumstances.

It was because they had been endowed with the perfections, which were fulfilled in their past existences and with all other factors leading to Awakening that they became not only monks but also Arahats.

In the Discourse about the Fools and the Wise (Bāla-paṇḍita-sutta, MN 129), there is a simile of a blind tortoise in connection with the saying: Rare is life as a human being (manussatta-bhāvo dullabho). Suppose a man throws a yoke, which has only one hole, into the sea. That yoke would float adrift to the west if blown by the east wind, to the east if blown by the west wind, to the south if blown by the north wind and to the north if blown by the south wind. In the sea there is a tortoise blind in both eyes which comes up to the surface of the sea every hundred years. The chance of getting its head into the hole of the drifting yoke is rare indeed. For a being, who has been suffering in the suffering abodes in one of his existences, it is more than 100 times more difficult to be reborn as a human being. Other Pāli texts also contain explanations that a human life is difficult to achieve. [201]

While, on the one hand, the rarity of birth as a human being is thus taught, there is teaching, on the other hand, in such books as the Traditions (Apadāna), the Stories about Heavenly Mansions (Vimāna-vatthu), etc., that human and divine bliss can be attained for several existences with the gift of a single flower. This may lead to the impression that: “Human life is not difficult to gain, but easy.” The Traditions (Apadāna) and the like are delivered concerning those who are unable to be reborn as humans for lack of agreeable resources, whereas the Discourse about the Fools and the Wise (Bāla-paṇḍita-sutta, MN 129) and such discourses are given concerning the possibility of rebirth in several human existences through the gift of a flower. The rarity of monkhood is to be viewed in the same manner.

With regard to human existence, it may be taken that even though one does not contemplate deeply it is not hard to become a human because of the fact that the world’s population is growing day after day; but on the other hand, it may be realized that the number of beings in the four suffering states is far greater than that of human beings. Even in the animal world alone, there are countless species. If we take just the population of ants alone and compare them with that of humans, it exceeds the latter beyond all comparison. Judging from the countless number of beings in the four suffering states as well as from the limited number of humans, it is obvious that rebirth in the human world is indeed very rare.

Similarly, it is difficult to join the Saṅgha each time there arises a Buddha’s Dispensation in the world. Those who have the potential qualities to become monastics in the Dispensation of a Buddha become not only monastics but Arahats as well. Therefore, the number of such persons is considerable. But this should not lead one to believe that it is easy to become a monk just because they happen to be congregated in the presence of each Buddha under favourable circumstances.

In other words, he who is endowed with two factors is likely to become a monk: 1), Birth in a Buddha's Dispensation, which is hard to come by (Buddhuppāda-dullabha) and 2), the life of a human being which is hard to come by (manussatta-dullabha). There is absolutely no possibility of becoming a monk in the absence of a Buddha's Dispensation though one may be a human. There is absolutely no such possibility if one is a Deva, Sakka, Brahma or a being in a suffering abode, even though there is Dispensation of a Buddha.

Of these two events, birth in a Buddha's Dispensation, which is called Buddhuppāda-navama, is harder to come by. Only when there appears a Buddha can there be his Dispensation. And to appear as a Buddha, it takes one at least four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, even after receipt of the prophecy predicting one will become a Buddha, and for so long a period, one is to fulfil the perfections assiduously with the aforesaid four modes of development. When there appears a Buddha at long last, and his Dispensation shines forth, but if one is not born a human being or even when thus born, if one encounters other hindrances, one cannot become a monastic. Taking this seriously into consideration, it may be said that becoming a monk is even rarer than witnessing a Buddha's Dispensation in the world.

Those who, as a result of their meritorious deeds, have the two factors of witnessing the Dispensation and of being a human, which are both difficult to obtain, should not find formidable hardships in their way to becoming a monk which is brought about by the two factors. Though it seems that the possibility of becoming a monk is simple because a billion Arahats in the lifetime of Buddha Dīpaṅkara possessed the two necessary factors: a Buddha's Dispensation and a human existence, it is really difficult to have these immediate causes for becoming a monk, hence the saying: "Rare indeed is becoming a monk."

Fulfilling the Perfections in Different Lives

The Bodhisatta, the recluse Sumedha, before meeting Buddha Dīpaṅkara and while in his youth, had engaged in generosity by giving away all his possessions; in renunciation, by going forth from household life to the homeless state; in morality, by observing the precepts as an ascetic and in tranquillity (samatha) meditation, by putting in efforts to attain the absorptions (jhāna) and super knowledges (abhiññā). Having done so, he received the definite prophecy from Buddha Dīpaṅkara and that was followed by his contemplating the ten perfections and his exertion and fulfilment of the perfections, beginning with generosity (dāna) through the aforesaid four modes of development that lasted four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons up to his existence as Prince [202] Vessantara.

In fulfilling the ten perfections, as mentioned in the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA), and the Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentary with regard to the perfection of generosity (dāna-pāramī), the existences in which he performed generosity were countless, as he had done so when he was the Brahmin Akitti, Brahmin Saṅkha, King Dhanañjaya, King Mahā Sudassana, Brahmin chaplain Mahā Govinda, King Nimi, Prince Candakumāra, the wealthy Visayha, King Sivi and Prince Vessantara, etc. What are particularly mentioned in these commentaries is that the generosity shown by the Bodhisatta, as the wise hare (Ja 316), at the sacrifice of his life, was the highest perfection of generosity (paramattha-dāna-pāramī).

With regard to the perfection of morality (sīla-pāramī), the existences in which he observed morality are countless, as he had done so when he was the Nāga King Campeyya, Nāga King Bhūridatta, elephant King Chaddanta, Prince Jayaddisa, Prince Alīnasattu, etc. In particular, his observance of morality at the sacrifice of his life while he was the Nāga King Saṅkhapāla (Ja 524) was the highest perfection of morality (paramattha-sīla-pāramī).

With regard to the perfection of renunciation (nekkhamma-pāramī), the existences in which he renounced the world are countless, as he had done so leaving behind his kingdom when he was Prince Hatthipāla, the wise Ayoghara, etc. In particular, his renunciation of the kingly wealth that had come to him when he was Cūḷa Sutasoma (Ja 525) and which he found loathsome as spittle, absolutely without attachment, was the highest perfection of renunciation (paramattha-nekkhamma-pāramī).

With regard to the perfection of wisdom (paññā-pāramī), the existences in which he fulfilled the perfection of wisdom were countless, as he had done so when he was the wise Vidhura, Mahā Govinda, Kudāla, Araka, Mahosadha, etc.

In particular, his ability to assert by means of his wisdom that there was a snake in the leather bag without seeing it with his own eyes when he was the wise Senaka in the Birth Story about the Sack of Flour (Sattu-bhastā-jātaka, Ja 402), was the highest perfection of wisdom (paramattha-paññā-pāramī).

With regard to the perfection of energy (virīya-pāramī), the existences in which he fulfilled the perfection of energy were countless. In particular, his effort putting forth energy swimming in the great ocean as Prince Mahā Janaka of the Birth Story about King Mahā Janaka (Mahā-janaka-jātaka, Ja 539) was the highest perfection of energy (paramattha-virīya-pāramī).

In the Birth Story about Khantivādī (Khantivādī-jātaka, Ja 313), as Khantivādī the ascetic, his forbearance without anger at the chopping off of his limbs, big and small, by King Kalābu was the highest perfection of forbearance (paramattha-khanti-pāramī).

In the Birth Story about Mahā Sutasoma (Mahā-sutasoma-jātaka, Ja 537), as King Sutasoma, his keeping of his promise and being true to his word given to the cannibal Porisāda, by returning to him, and potentially sacrificing his life, was the highest perfection of truthfulness (paramattha-sacca-pāramī).

In the Birth Story about the Wise Mūgapakkha (Mūga-pakkha-jātaka, Ja 538), as Prince Temiya, his maintenance of resolve to keep silent at the sacrifice of his life, when he was subjected to tests of endurance, sometimes mildly, and at other times severely, for sixteen long years was the highest perfection of resolution (paramattha-adhiṭṭhāna-pāramī).

In the Birth Story about the King Ekarājā (Eka-rāja-jātaka, Ja 303), or in the Birth Story about the Wise Suvanṇasāma (Suvanṇasāma-jātaka, Ja 540), his goodwill directed towards the malicious king as well as towards lions, tigers and other beasts was the highest perfection of loving-kindness (paramattha-mettā-pāramī).

In the the Birth Story about the Bristling Hair (Loma-haṃsa-jātaka, Ja 94), his being equally indifferent to all treatment such as being spat on by village children with mucus, phlegm and saliva, or the honour done to him with flowers, scents, etc. by village elders was the highest perfection of equanimity (paramattha-upekkhā-pāramī).

When the Birth Stories Occurred

The narration by the commentators of these existences, in which the ten perfections were fulfilled, are reproduced from their respective stories of the Birth Stories (Jātaka). A study of these stories shows that all the stories, except five, occurred in the present aeon. The five exceptional ones are:

1. The Birth Story about the Merchant from Seri (Seriva-vāṇija-jātaka, Ja 3).

This story originated five aeons ago as is evidenced by the following sentence read in the commentary: In the fifth aeon, reckoned from the present one, in the country of Seriva, the Bodhisatta was a hawker named Seriva who roamed about with bags on his shoulder selling beads (atīte [203] ito pañcame kappe bodhisatto seriva-raṭṭhe seriva-nāmako kaccha-puta-vāṇijo ahoṣi).

2. The Birth Story about the Bristling Hair (Loma-haṃsa-jātaka, Ja 94).

This story originated 91 aeons ago as is evidenced by the following commentarial statement: In the 91st aeon, reckoned from the present one, the Bodhisatta was an Ājīvaka, having taken up the life of a naked ascetic in order to investigate heretical asceticism (atīte eka-navuti-kappa-matthake bodhisatto bāhiraka-tapaṃ vīmaṃsissāmi ti ājīvaka-pabbajaṃ pabbajitvā acelako ahoṣi).

3. The Birth Story about the Teacher Araka (Araka-jātaka, Ja 169).

This story originated seven aeons ago as is evidenced by the following commentarial statement in the concluding portion of the Birth Stories (Jātaka): In this way, the Bodhisatta did not fall from the absorptions, but was reborn in the Brahma abode and did not come to the human world for the period in which the aeon dissolved seven times and evolved seven times (evaṃ bodhisatto ... aparihīṇajjhāno brahma-loke nibbattitvā satta saṃvaṭṭa-vivaṭṭa-kappe na imaṃ lokam puna āgamāsi).

4. The Birth Story about the Ascetic Kesava (Kesava-jātaka, Ja 346).

This story originated 570 aeons ago.

5. The Birth Story about Brahma Baka (Brahma-baka-jātaka, Ja 405).

This story originated also 570 aeons ago.

The two Birth Stories (Jātaka) of Kesava and Baka are the stories between which there was no intervening period of existence. The stories given in detail in the commentary may be retold as follows: in the Birth Story about the Ascetic Kesava (Kesava-jātaka, Ja 346), Kesava was first an ascetic and on his death became Baka Brahma. That Baka Brahma was reborn in Vehapphala abode first, living for 500 great aeons (mahā-kappa). When his life there came to an end, he was reborn in the Subhakiṇhā abode, living for 64 great aeons. Again, when his life there came to an end, he was reborn in Ābhassara abode, where he lived for eight great aeons. This shows that he attained Ābhassara abode only after passing through 500 aeons in Vehapphala and 64 aeons in Subhakiṇhā, thus totalling 564 aeons. It is said that he held wrong view when he reached Ābhassara abode.

As a Brahma he held wrong view, according to the commentary. Although there is no mention as to which of the eight aeons in that abode that he did so, by taking the two Birth Stories (Jātaka) together, it may be estimated that about 570 aeons had passed before he started harbouring the view that happened to be wrong.

Generations of teachers are of the belief that the text of any Birth Story (Jātaka) in which the commentator does not refer to the time of its origin in aeons, saying: “In such and such an aeon reckoned from the present one,” but which simply says: In the past (atīte), belongs to the present aeon. On the authority of this belief, the stories in the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA) and Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentary originated in the present aeon, for they only have the simpler words, In the past (atīte) with regard to the time of the Bodhisatta’s rebirth. But all the stories belonging to this aeon cannot be told because they are too numerous. The stories told are only those that have relationship with the present episodes. The number of the stories left untold is far greater.

If only a few pertinent stories are delivered out of those innumerable ones that happened in this aeon, it follows that the stories of his fulfilment of the perfections which had not been dealt with in previous aeons must also be countless. Besides, considering that the existences in which the Bodhisattas fulfilled the perfections during the period of four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons cannot be calculated in terms of aeons, not to speak of in terms of existences before the present one, their task of fulfilling the perfections is immensely formidable for ordinary persons.

On the other hand, if one thinks of the Bodhisattas, these great beings, who undertook the fulfilment of the perfections, they are worthy of our most profound adoration [204] and endless admiration.

The series of these numerous existences in which our Bodhisatta had fulfilled the perfections ended with that of Prince Vessantara. Bodhisatta Sumedha, first and foremost, fulfilled the perfection of generosity (dāna-pāramī) by giving away all his possessions while as a layman before his renunciation. Similarly, when he had become an ascetic and received the prediction about his Buddhahood, he contemplated the factors leading to Buddhahood and found that the perfection of generosity is the first of the perfections, he resolved to act accordingly. All of this points to the fact that it was the perfection of generosity with which the Bodhisattas commence the fulfilment of the perfections, and it was the same perfection with which they ended their fulfilment, as in the existence of Prince Vessantara.

The perfection of generosity (dāna-pāramī) results in an attainment of a better life (bhava-sampatti) and attainment of wealth (bhoga-sampatti), which follow one like a shadow, and which cannot be prevented from doing so until one realizes Nibbāna. It is essential for all who go from one birth to another in Saṃsāra, as has been explained in the section on the perfection of generosity (dāna-pāramī) in the Further Explanations (Anudīpani). Since the Bodhisattas are leaders of those beings in Saṃsāra, they specially fulfilled this perfection in their final existence, as that of Prince Vessantara. After doing so in their final existence they withdraw from their task of fulfilling the perfections. Since their fulfilment is complete, they move on to Tusita for their last existence, and await the right time for becoming a Buddha.

The Eight Differences

Though these eight differences (vematta) are given at the end of the Chronicle of Buddha Gotama in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) commentary, here, in this work, they are given in the Further Explanations.

Vematta is a Pāḷi word derived from vimatta, vi meaning “varied” and matta “length” or “size.” The Buddhas: Dīpaṅkara, Koṇḍañña, etc., possessed the same and equal attributes but they were different from one another in eight particulars.

These eight are:

1. Difference in lifespan (āyu-vematta).
2. Difference in height (pamāṇa-vematta).
3. Difference in clan (kula-vematta).
4. Difference in striving (padhāna-vematta).
5. Difference in bodily radiance (rasmi-vematta).
6. Difference in vehicles used in renunciation (yāna-vematta).
7. Difference in the Bodhi tree (Bodhi-vematta).
8. Difference in seat (pallaṅka-vematta).

1. Difference in Lifespan

Difference in lifespan (āyu-vematta).

Buddhas Koṇḍañña, Anomadassī, Paduma, Padumuttara, Atthadassī, Dhammadassī, Siddhattha and Tissa; these nine Buddhas appeared when the lifespan was 100,000 years.

Buddhas Maṅgala, Sumana, Sobhita, Nārada, Sumedha, Sujāta, Piyadassī and Phussa; these eight Buddhas appeared when the lifespan was 90,000 years.

Buddhas Revata and Vessabhū; these two Buddhas appeared when the lifespan was 6,000 years.

Buddha Vipassī appeared when the lifespan was 80,000; Buddha Sikhī, when it was 70,000; Buddha Kakusandha, when it was 40,000; Buddha Koṇāgamana, when it was 30,000; Buddha Kassapa, when it was 20,000 and our Buddha Gotama when it was just 100 years.

It may be argued that these Buddhas should be of equal lifespan as they were great [205] beings who had fulfilled the perfections to a great degree. In this connection, an elaborate explanation given in the commentary on the Long Discourse on the Traditions (Mahāpadāna-sutta, DN 14) should be noted in brief. The span of life of beings in the world depends on the observance of righteousness by the ruler. When he observes righteousness, all his people will do so and likewise, so do the Devas who cause rainfall and do other helpful things. This leads to regularity in climate and production of nutritious fruits and vegetables, etc., for people, who live long because of good health. When the ruler does not observe righteousness, many of his people do not also; nor do the Devas who cause sufficient rainfall and other favourable conditions. Consequently, fruits and vegetables become deficient in nourishment and the climate becomes irregular. As a result, people are exposed to ill-health and become short-lived (see AN 4.70). In this way, those Buddhas who appeared in a period of long lifespan enjoy longevity and those who appeared in a period of short lifespan do not.

Though all Buddhas have the power to prolong their lives as a result of their past deeds that have effected their conception, their lifespans are different in length. According to the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) commentary which says:

Though they are endowed with the merits of their past deeds that can bring about longevity as a result of their acquisition of wholesome prerequisites, Buddhas are of unequal length of life in accordance with their lifespans (āyu-kappa).

To give a worldly example: If the seed of a teak tree that has the ability to last for 1,000 years is sown in a dry zone where the soil is hard and barren, it cannot live that long. Similarly, the meritorious deeds of the Bodhisattas in their final existence caused their conception and the power to prolong their lives. However, if they attain Buddhahood in the short period of a lifespan (āyu-kappa), that is like the dry, hard, barren land their lives have to be short according to their lifespan.

Length of Lifespan When a Buddha Appears

Buddhas usually do not appear in an aeon when the lifespan of beings is on the increase. Because if a Buddha were to appear in such an aeon and teach the doctrine of impermanence and the like, beings would fail to understand the characteristics of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and the non-self (anatta) of conditioned things as their lives become longer and longer, one aeon after another. For this reason, Buddhas do not appear in any of the aeons on the increase but they do so in the decreasing aeons.

Even with regard to the decreasing aeons, Buddhas appear only in the aeons that have a lifespan of at most 100,000 years. They do not appear in the aeons that have a lifespan longer than 100,000 years because their teaching of the three characteristics of conditioned things would fall on deaf ears. When the lifespan decreases, 100 years is the minimum of the aeons in which they would appear. When the lifespan goes down from 100 years, Buddhas do not appear in those aeons of shorter lifespan because, even though the characteristics of conditioned things manifest themselves glaringly, as their impurities of greed, hate and delusion grow more at the time, beings are unable to accept, follow and practise the Dhamma despite the Buddhas' teaching. Hence aeons of less than 100 years of lifespan are devoid of Buddhas.

In this way, Buddhas appeared during the aeons ranging from that of the maximum lifespan which was 100,000 years to that of the minimum lifespan which was just 100 years. Though it is true that they appeared in the decreasing aeons between the two aeons, that is, that of the maximum lifespan and that of the minimum, Buddhas appeared only in the aeon in which the lifespan agrees with the degree of maturity of the prerequisites for the perfections while they were Bodhisattas. Those Bodhisattas, whose prerequisites reached maturity, which coincided with the period of 100,000 years of lifespan, which was appropriate to their Awakening, appeared as a Buddha in that aeon of 100,000 years of lifespan.

Those Bodhisattas, whose prerequisites were not yet mature as they are still at the stage of fulfilling the perfections, [206] could not appear as Buddhas in the aeon of 100,000 years of lifespan, but could appear in the aeons in which they would reach the maturity of their prerequisites, which might be of 90,000 years of lifespan, or 80,000 years, 70,000 years, 60,000 years, and so on, of lifespan.

In this Fortunate Aeon (Bhadda-kappa), Buddha Kakusandha appeared in the aeon of 40,000 years lifespan; after him, passed one inclusive period (antara-kappa), and Buddha Koṇāgamana appeared in the aeon of 30,000 years lifespan; after him, passed one inclusive period; and Buddha Kassapa appeared in the aeon of 20,000 years lifespan. From this, it might be anticipated that our Buddha Gotama should appear in like manner, that is, in the lifespan of 10,000 years when one inclusive period had elapsed after Buddha Kassapa. But he was unable to appear then, because the prerequisites for the perfections had not yet reached maturity. He was unable to do so even in the aeon of 5,000 years of lifespan, or of 1,000 years or of 500 years. The reason was that his complete fulfilment of the perfections took place only in his life as Prince Vessantara. His life as Prince Vessantara occurred in the aeon of 100 years of lifespan. Since his undertaking of the fulfilment of the perfections came to an end in the aeon of 100 years, Buddha Gotama appeared only in the aeon of the same length of lifespan.<sup>334</sup>

2. Difference in Height

Difference in height (pamāṇa-vematta) is the difference in the height of the Buddhas.

The height of Buddha Sumana was 90 cubits.<sup>335</sup>

The height of four Buddhas: Koṇḍañña, Maṅgala, Nārada and Sumedha, was 88 cubits.

The height of six Buddhas: Dīpaṅkara, Revata, Piyadassī, Atthadassī, Dhammadassī and Vipassī, was 80 cubits.

The height of Buddha Sikhī was 70 cubits.

The height of three Buddhas: Siddhattha, Tissa and Vessabhū, was 60 cubits.

The height of five Buddhas: Sobhita, Anomadassī, Paduma, Padumuttara and Phussa, was 58 cubits.

The height of Buddha Sujāta was 50 cubits.

The heights of three Buddhas: Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana and Kassapa, were 40 cubits, 30 cubits and 20 cubits respectively.

Buddha Gotama's height was 16 or 18 cubits.<sup>336</sup>

It should be noted that the differences in height of the Buddhas are caused mainly by climate and food. Since the Buddhas were a part of mankind and are thus human beings, their lifespan is naturally the same as that of the people of their times. The Buddhas who appeared in the period of 90,000 years lifespan generally lived up to 90,000 years. Those who appeared in the period of 100,000

---

years lifespan generally lived up to 100,000 years. In this way, the length of their lifespan agreed with that of the people.

Their heights, however, cannot be determined by their lifespans because, though they appeared in the same period of 100,000 years of lifespan, Buddhas Dīpaṅkara, Atthadassī, and Dhammadassī were only 80 cubits tall while Koṇḍañña was 88 cubits; Buddhas Anomadassī, Paduma and Padumuttara were 58 cubits, Buddhas Siddhattha and Tissa were 60 cubits. This suggests that the heights of the Buddhas had nothing to do with their lifespans. If those of the same periods differed in height, so could those of different periods. [207]

From the statement made in the Vinaya (Pāc 92, PTS 4.173), that the Buddha's younger brother, Ven. Ānanda, was only four fingers shorter than his elder brother, it may be taken that other people of the time were as tall as the Buddha, if not of equal height. It therefore follows that the height of the Buddha was equal to that of the people who were his contemporaries. This, however, does not mean that the two heights were exactly the same.

That the Buddha's height was equal to contemporary people's height was due to the two factors: climate and food. When the unrighteousness of rulers is followed by that of the whole world, with the exception of the noble ones, there happen irregularities of climate and deficiencies of nutriment in food. Being associated with such climate and food the people's physical qualities cannot develop as much as they should. On the other hand, these qualities would develop well when righteousness prevails.

3. Difference in Family

Difference in family (kula-vematta) is the difference in clan in which the Buddhas belonged. Buddhas Kakusandha, Koṅāgamana and Kassapa were born in Brahmin clans, while the remaining 22 Buddhas were born in noble (Khattiya) clans. When people in the world recognized the supremacy of the aristocrats, Buddhas were born in the aristocratic clans; when they recognized the supremacy of the Brahmins, Buddhas belonged to the Brahmin clans.

4. Difference in Striving

Difference in striving (padhāna-vematta) is the difference in the duration of the austerities.

Miscellaneous Topics – 2323

Seven Buddhas: Dīpaṅkara, Koṇḍañña, Sumana, Anomadassī, Sujāta, Siddhattha, and Kakusandha, practised the austerities for ten months.

Four Buddhas: Maṅgala, Sumedha, Tissa and Sikhī, practised for eight months.

Buddha Revata practised for seven months.

Four Buddhas: Piyadassī, Phussa, Vessabhū and Koṇāgamana practised for six months.

Buddha Sobhita practised for four months.

Three Buddhas: Paduma, Atthadassī, Vipassī, practised for half a month.

Four Buddhas: Nārada, Padumuttara, Dhammadassī and Kassapa, practised for seven days.

Our Buddha Gotama, Lord of the Three Worlds, endowed with inconceivable attributes, practised the austerities for six years.

As there were reasons for inequality of lifespan, height, etc., so here there is a reason for the difference in duration of the austerities, especially in the case of Buddha Gotama. On investigation, it would be found that it was due to his own deeds.

To explain further, in the Traditions about the Buddha's Previous Deeds (Pubba-kamma-pilotika-Buddhāpadāna, Th-ap 39.10, PTS 1.300) the Buddha himself says with regard to his demeritorious deed that resulted in his practice of the austerities for six long years:

Avacāham Jotipālo, Bhagavaṃ Kassapaṃ tadā: “Kuto nu bodhi muṇḍassa bodhi parama-dullabhā?” Tena kamma-vipākena, acarim dukkaram bahuṃ, chabbassānuruveḷāyam, tato bodhim-apāpuṇim.

In the lifetime of Buddha Kassapa, I was Jotipāla, a Brahmin youth. Then I foolishly offended him saying: “How can this shaven headed man attain knowledge of Awakening and omniscience which are indeed very difficult to attain.” Because of that verbal misdeed, I had to practise the austerities for six long years in my final existence.

In view of the fact that it is directly mentioned in the text that the Buddha had to spend six years for the practice of the austerities on account of his offence, it is understandable that those Buddhas who had to practise it only for seven days did so in accordance with their sufficiently great deeds of merit. Therefore, it should be stated that the difference in duration of practice of the austerities was affected by their actions.

Though there were differences in the duration of their ascetic practices (padhāna-viriya) just before their attainments of Buddhahood, once they attained the goal, the degrees of the effort they put forth (payatta-viriya) being one of the six glories of a Buddha, are one and [208] the same.

5. Difference in Radiance

Difference in radiance (rasmi-vematta) is the difference in bodily radiance.

Buddha Maṅgala's radiance spread across the 10,000 world-element; Buddha Padumuttara's radiance did so up to twelve leagues; Buddha Vipassī's radiance up to seven leagues; Buddha Sikhī's up to three leagues; Buddha Kakusandha's up to ten leagues and Buddha Gotama's up to four cubits which form a fathom. The radiance of the rest of the Buddhas were not constant, they shone forth as far as these Buddhas desired.

Tatra rasmi-vemattaṃ ajjhāsaya-paṭibaddhaṃ hoti. Yo yattakaṃ icchasi, tassa tattakaṃ sarīrappabhā pharati. Maṅgalassa pana: "Dasa-sahassi-loka-dhātuṃ pharatū," ti ajjhāsayo ahoṣi.<sup>337</sup>

Of the differences, the difference in radiance is related to a Buddha's own wish expressed at the time of fulfilling the perfections. At the time of fulfilling the perfections, if a Buddha wishes that his physical radiance should spread to a certain extent, to that extent his radiance spreads. Buddha Maṅgala's wish was: "Let my radiance spread throughout the 10,000 world-element."

In the sub-commentary, aspiration (ajjhāsaya) is explained to be the aspiration that was said while the Bodhisatta concerned was fulfilling the perfections.

When one looks for the cause of the difference between the physical radiance of the Buddhas, one may say that it is the perfections which they had fulfilled. That it should be so is explained by the commentators in the story of Buddha Maṅgala whose radiance spread all over the 10,000 world-element.

In his final existence, while fulfilling the perfections – similar to the existence of Bodhisatta Gotama as Prince Vessantara – Bodhisatta Maṅgala was once living with his family on a hill that resembled Vaṅkapabbata, when a Yakkha, Kharadāthika, in the guise of a Brahmin, asked the Bodhisatta to give him his children as alms. Thinking: “With pleasure, I shall give them away,” he actually did so.

Leaning against the wooden railing at the end of the walk, the Yakkha devoured them as though he was chewing a bundle of lotus stalks in the Bodhisatta’s presence. When the Bodhisatta looked at the Yakkha, he saw the red blood flowing like flames of fire from its mouth, which was open at that moment. But he did not experience even the slightest displeasure, simply thinking: “I have performed well the act of giving,” he was indeed glad to have done so. “As a result of this meritorious act, may my physical radiance likewise emit from my body in future,” so the Bodhisatta wished. Because of this aspiration, when he became a Buddha, his natural physical radiance reached every nook and corner in the 10,000 world-element.

From this story, it should be understood that the difference in radiance depended on whether the Buddhas had made an aspiration or not in the past. When one speaks of the difference of physical radiance, one generally means their natural radiance. If created by means of their power, in accordance with their wishes, any Buddha could make his radiance go as far as he desired. In the matter of power, there was no difference at all, one can never say: “This Buddha was of lesser power” or “that Buddha was of greater power.”

Three Kinds of Physical Radiances

1. The kind of radiance that constantly emits from the natural body of the Buddha (byāmapabhā). Having a fathom in length, these radiances, surrounding his body, were so dense and massive that they could not be distinguished from the Buddha’s body. When one looks at the light of an electric bulb from a distance one would think that the glow of light is a ball of fire. A closer and more careful look will reveal, however, the dazzling filament in the bulb. In the same way, the Buddha’s body was accompanied by the encircling radiance, each beam measuring a fathom. Such radiances are called [209] byāmapabhā. They were thick and massive.

2. The kind of radiance that was the continuation of that which emits from the natural body and spread to a distance of 80 cubits (asīti-niccalobhāsa).

3. The kind of radiance that spread to countless world-elements because his blood, etc., became clearer when a Buddha contemplated the doctrine of the conditions or when he displayed the twin miracle, or on other occasions (disā-pharaṇa).

Two Kinds of Rays

The special quality of the Buddha's complexion, visible to humans, Devas and Brahmas, is called a radiance in this connection. According to the Abhidhamma, the radiance that constantly emits from the natural body of the Buddha (byāmapabhā) and the radiance that spreads to a distance of 80 cubits (asīti-niccalobhāsa) are to be called the radiance born of one's deeds of merit (kammaja), or the radiance born of temperature supported by one's deeds (utuja-kamma-paccaya), because these two kinds have past action as their cause.

The radiance that spread to countless world-elements (disā-pharaṇa) should be called the radiance born of one's mind (cittaja), or the radiance born of temperature and supported by one's mind (citta-paccaya-utuja) because it has the clarity of the mind as its cause. Thus, their classification should be known.

6. Difference in Vehicles

Difference in vehicles (yāna-vevatta) is the difference in vehicles used by the Bodhisattas in renunciation.

Buddhas Dīpaṅkara, Sumana, Sumedha, Phussa, Sikhī and Koṇāgamana renounced the world riding elephants.

Buddhas Koṇḍañña, Revata, Paduma, Piyadassī, Vipassī and Kakusandha renounced the world riding chariots drawn by thoroughbred horses.

Buddhas Maṅgala, Sujāta, Atthadassī, Tissa and Gotama renounced the world riding horses.

Buddhas Anomadassī, Siddhattha and Vessabhū renounced the world riding golden palanquins.

Buddha Nārada renounced the world on foot.

Buddhas Sobhita, Padumuttara, Dhammadassī and Kassapa renounced the world in flying palaces.

7. Difference in the Bodhi Tree

Difference in Bodhi tree (Bodhi-vematta) is the difference in Mahā Bodhi trees under which the Bodhisattas become a Buddha.

Buddha Dīpaṅkara became a Buddha under a Pepper (Pippalī) tree.<sup>338</sup>

Buddha Koṇḍañña became a Buddha under a Beautiful Sāla (Sāla-kalyaṇī) tree.

Buddhas Maṅgala, Sumana, Revata and Sobhita became Buddhas under an Ironwood (Nāga) tree.

Buddha Anomadassī became a Buddha under an Arjuna (Ajjuna) tree.

Buddhas Paduma and Nārada became Buddhas under a Great Soṇa (Mahā-soṇa) tree.

Buddha Padumuttara became a Buddha under a Salala tree.

Buddha Sumedha became a Buddha under an Asoka (Mahā-nīpa) tree.

Buddha Sujāta became a Buddha under a Great Bamboo (Mahā-veḷu) tree.

Buddha Piyadassī became a Buddha under a Kakudha tree.

Buddha Atthadassī became a Buddha under a Campak tree.

Buddha Dhammadassī became a Buddha under a Bimbijāla tree.

Buddha Siddhattha became a Buddha under a Kaṇikāra tree. [210]

Buddha Tissa became a Buddha under an Indian Laurel (Asana) tree.

Buddha Phussa became a Buddha under an Emblic Myrobalan (Āmalaka) tree.

Buddha Vipassī became a Buddha under a Trumpet Flower (Pāṭalī) tree.

Buddha Sikhī became a Buddha under a Fragrant Mango (Puṇḍarīka) tree.

Buddha Vessabhū became a Buddha under a Great Sāla tree.

Buddha Kakusandha became a Buddha under a Sirīsa tree.

Buddha Koṇāgamana became a Buddha under a Cluster Fig (Udumbara) tree.

Buddha Kassapa became a Buddha under a Banyan (Nigrodha) tree.

Buddha Gotama became a Buddha under an Asvattha (Assattha) tree.

The fourfold path is called Bodhi because it leads to the knowledge of the four truths. Omniscience is called Bodhi because it leads to the knowledge of what should be known. Its definition should be: Bujjhatī ti Bodhi, “that which knows the four truths and that which knows what is to be known is Bodhi.” The tree under which the Bodhisatta knows the four truths and others to be known thoroughly is also called Bodhi. The definition here is: Bujjhati etthā ti Bodhi, “the tree under which the Bodhisatta knows the four truths and all that is to be known is Bodhi.”

8. Difference in Seats

Difference in seats (pallaṅka-vematta) is the difference in the size of the seat the Buddhas sat on when Awakening.

The seat on which Buddha Sumana become a Buddha measured 60 cubits.

The seats on which the Buddhas Koṇḍañña, Maṅgala, Nārada and Sumedha become a Buddha measured 57 cubits each.

The seats on which the Buddhas Dīpaṅkara, Revata, Piyadassī, Atthadassī, Dhammadassī and Vipassī become a Buddha measured 53 cubits each.

The seats on which the Buddhas Siddhattha, Tissa and Vessabhū become a Buddha measured 40 cubits.

The seats on which the Buddhas Sobhita, Anomadassī, Paduma, Padumuttara and Phussa become a Buddha measured 38 cubits.

The seats on which the Buddhas Sujāta and Sikhī became a Buddha measured 32 cubits.

The seat on which Buddha Kakusandha become a Buddha measured 26 cubits.

The seat on which Buddha Koṇāgamana become a Buddha measured 20 cubits.

The seat on which Buddha Kassapa become a Buddha measured 15 cubits.

The seat on which Buddha Gotama become a Buddha measured 14 cubits.

Two Kinds of Seat

In this connection, it may be noted that there are two kinds of seats (pallaṅka): sitting cross-legged (ābhujana-pallaṅka) and a kind of seat (āsana-pallaṅka). Of these two, by sitting cross-legged (ābhujana-pallaṅka) is meant sitting cross-legged as in: He sits down, after folding his legs crosswise (nisīdati pallaṅkam ābhujitvā), of the Long Discourse about Steadfast Mindfulness (Mahā-sati-paṭṭhāna-sutta, DN 22), etc.

By a kind of seat (āsana-pallaṅka) is meant a type of seat. A kind of seat is of different sub-divisions, such as a rich man's seat (seṭṭhi-pallaṅka), a king's seat (rāja-pallaṅka), a Nāga's seat (Nāga-pallaṅka), a Deva's seat (Deva-pallaṅka), a Dhamma seat (Dhamma-pallaṅka), an Awakening seat (Bodhi-pallaṅka), etc.

In the commentary on The Birth Story about the Mayhaka Bird (Mayhaka-jātaka, Ja 390) it is said:

Gaccha, imaṃ amhākaṃ gharaṃ ānetvā, mama pallaṅke nisīdāpetvā, amhākaṃ paṭiyatta-bhattassa pattam pūretvā dāpehi.

Go and take this Paccekabuddha to my house; let him sit down on my seat and fill his bowl with the food prepared for me.

Such a seat of the wealthy man of Bārānasi represents a seat used by well-to-do persons (seṭṭhi-pallaṅka). [211]

Such royal thrones as:

1. A lion seat (sīhāsana-pallaṅka) is a throne made of beechwood with lion figures at the base and is placed in the main hall of the palace where the king grants an audience.
2. A goose seat (haṃsāsana-pallaṅka) is a throne made of Thingan wood with goose (haṃsa) figures at the base and placed in the Jetavana Hall where the king paid homage to the Three Treasures.
3. A conch seat (saṅkhāsana-pallaṅka) is a throne made of mango wood with conch-shell figures at the base, and placed in the chamber where the king puts on his headdress.
4. A bee seat (bhamarāsana-pallaṅka) is a throne made of caraway wood with bee figures at the base and placed in the glass chamber where the king retires.
5. An elephant seat (gajāśana-pallaṅka) is a throne made of Saga wood with elephant figures at the base and placed in the Hall of Justice where the king gives rewards and punishments.

Miscellaneous Topics – 2330

6. A peacock seat (mayurāsana-pallaṅka) is a throne made of rosewood with peacock figures at the base and placed in the northern chamber where the king accepts elephants and horses as tributes.
7. A deer seat (migāsana-pallaṅka) is a throne made of fig wood with figures of wild beasts at the base and placed in the southern chamber where the king holds meetings.
8. A lotus seat (padumāsana-pallaṅka) is a throne made of jack wood with lotus figures at the base and placed in the western theatrical chamber where the king is honoured.

These eight thrones used by a monarch as well as the 84,000 thrones used by the Universal Monarch, Mahā Sudassana, represent a king's seat (rāja-pallaṅka).

The throne used by Nāga kings, such as Dhataratṭha, is a Nāga's seat (Nāga-pallaṅka). The kind of throne mentioned in the Discourse concerning Janavasabha (Janavasabha-sutta, DN 18), the Discourse concerning Mahā Govinda (Mahā-govinda-sutta, DN 19), etc., where it is said: “Brahma Sanaṅkumāra may take his seat on a Deva's throne whichever one he likes,” and also the kind of ruby throne measuring a league prepared for Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, as mentioned in the Short Discourse on the Destruction of Craving (Cūḷa-taṇhā-saṅkhāya-sutta, MN 37), represent a Deva's seat (Deva-pallaṅka).

The kinds of throne on which the respondents (vissajjana), Ven. Upāli and Ven. Ānanda, sat when the First Council was held, as mentioned in the introduction to the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya) commentary, etc., and the throne on which noble Dhamma preachers, such as Buddhas, etc., are seated, represent Dhamma seats (Dhamma-pallaṅka).

The kind of seat where all Bodhisattas sat cross-legged with a firm determination, resolving: “Never shall I get up from this place until I achieve the knowledge of the path towards Awakening and omniscience,” is an Awakening seat (Bodhi-pallaṅka). Since it was on this seat that they overcame the five deaths (māra), the throne is also called the unconquered seat (aparājita-pallaṅka).

That Awakening seat (Bodhi-pallaṅka) was the throne lying four cubits east of the Bodhi tree which stands on the sacred site of the Awakening circle (Bodhi-maṇḍala). It was 100 cubits high and very beautiful. The throne arose instantly from the surface of the earth when the Bodhisatta spread the eight handfuls of grass at the very place. It was a result of his accumulated merits of deeds in fulfilling the perfections. The throne, being ornamented with various jewels, was full of splendour. Since it was the place on which the Bodhisatta arrived at the knowledge of the path to Awakening and omniscience, or where he became a Buddha, it is called the Awakening seat (Bodhi-pallaṅka).

The remaining pages of this section contain the author's note on the controversy over the height of the Buddha Gotama's Awakening seat (Bodhi-pallaṅka) and other matters related to it, quoting some extracts from such works as the sub-commentary on the Jewel Light (Maṇi-dīpa-ṭīkā), the sub-commentary on the Protection Discourses (Paritta-ṭīkā), the Light on the All-Seeing One (Samanta-cakkhu-dīpanī) and the decision given by the Taung Gwin Thathanabaing Sayādaw. As the author's note is mainly meant for the edification of Myanmar scholars we have left it out from our translation. [212]

The 18 Impossible Births

[Previously this was a stand-alone chapter VIII, entitled Eighteen Abhabbaṭṭhānas, but this 4-page section is better placed here, in the Further Explanations.]

There are 18 existences in which Bodhisattas, who have received the definite prophecy, are not reborn. Those Bodhisattas who, like the recluse Sumedha, are endowed with eight qualities<sup>339</sup> required for receiving the definite prophecy and who have actually received it, are not reborn in eighteen different existences throughout Samsāra; this statement and the enumeration of the eighteen existences are given in the commentary on the Discourse about the Rhinocerus (Khagga-visāṇa-sutta, Snp 3, PTS 1.49. ff).

The eighteen existences are the following:

1. Blind since birth.
2. Deaf since birth.
3. A lunatic.
4. Someone dumb.
5. A cripple.

---

Miscellaneous Topics – 2332

6. A barbarian.
7. Someone born in the womb of a female slave.
8. Someone with perpetual wrong belief.
9. Someone whose sex changes from male to female.
10. Someone who commits the five severest crimes of matricide, patricide, killing of an Arahāt, shedding the blood of a Buddha, and causing schism of the Saṅgha.
11. A leper.
12. An animal smaller than a quail or a warbler.
13. An Asura called an ever-hungry Peta (khuppiṭāsika-peta), a Peta burning with craving (nijjhāma-taṇhika-peta) and Kālakañcika.

An ever-hungry Peta (khuppiṭāsika-peta) is an ever-hungry ghost, for he hardly has a chance to eat; a Peta burning with craving (nijjhāma-taṇhika-peta) is another one who is always feeling hot, for he is always on fire. These are the Petas who in their previous lives were monks, the kind that Ven. Moggallāna encountered on Mount Gijjhakūṭa.

Kālakañcika was the name of an Asura whose body was three miles in size; but as he is of scanty flesh and blood, his complexion is like the colour of a withered leaf. His eyes, lying on his head, protrude like those of a lobster. Since the mouth is the size of the eye of a needle, also lying on the head, he has to bend forward to pick up the food, if he finds any at all.

14. In Avīci and Lokantarika.

Lokantarika is the space at the meeting of the three world-elements; it is the space where evil doers suffer for their misdeeds; such a place of intense suffering is called Lokantarika hell.
15. A Māra in a celestial abode of sensual pleasures.
16. A Non-percipient Brahma (Asañña-satta-brahma) and a Brahma of the Pure Abodes (Suddhāvāsa-brahma).
17. In the Formless (Arūpa-brahma) abodes.
18. In another world-element.

Here the author gives a detailed explanation of “a quail or a warbler” mentioned in the twelfth item of the above list. The author’s elucidations, quoting various authorities including two Birth Stories (Jātaka), are mainly meant for the benefit of Myanmar scholars and are [113] left out from the translation.

In listing the impossible births, the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA) commentary and the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) commentary on the one hand and the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta) commentary on the other, agree on some points and disagree on others. Of the eighteen existences given in the Anthology of Discourses commentary, the following eight are missing in the Abundance of Meaning commentary:

1. A lunatic.
2. A cripple.
3. A barbarian.
4. Someone whose sex changes from male to female.
5. Someone born in the womb of a female slave.
6. A leper.
7. A Māra.
8. In another world-element.

The Abundance of Meaning commentary does not give the exact number of these existences, and those listed in it omitted in the Anthology of Discourses commentary are:

1. A woman.
2. A hermaphrodite.
3. A eunuch.<sup>340</sup>

Of these three existences, that of a woman is easily understood.

The original Pāḷi word meaning a “hermaphrodite” is ubhato-vyañjanaka. Ubhato means, there have been two past productive deeds (kamma), one causing the female sex and the other, male; vyañjanaka means genital organs. A hermaphrodite is of two kinds: a female hermaphrodite, and a male one. In a female hermaphrodite, the female sex characteristics appear dominant while the male ones are subordinate at normal times; in a male hermaphrodite, the male sex characteristics appear conspicuous while the female ones are subordinate at normal times.

<sup>340</sup> The list in the commentary to the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) is the same as that in the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA) commentary.

When a woman with both sexes desires to have intercourse taking the role of a man with another woman, her female organ disappears and the male organ appears. When a man with both sexes desires to copulate with another man, his male organ disappears and his female organ manifests itself.

The female hermaphrodite can conceive a child; she can also make another woman conceive. The male hermaphrodite cannot conceive, but he can impregnate a woman. This is the difference between the two, see the Vinaya Great Division (Mahā-vagga) commentary.

The Pāḷi term for a deviant is paṇḍaka, meaning a person with deviant sexuality. Despite his being male, he is different from other men in the sense that he doesn't engage in coital acts. There are five kinds of deviant:

1. One whose sexual urge is gratified by sucking another man's penis or taking that man's semen in his mouth (āsitta-paṇḍaka).
2. A voyeur, one whose sexual urge is gratified by stealthily watching the act of others' lovemaking and by feeling envious of them (ussuyya-paṇḍaka).
3. One who is castrated like a eunuch in-charge of women in a harem (opakkamika-paṇḍaka).
4. One who has sexual urge during the dark fortnight of the lunar month and who is sexually calm during the bright fortnight (pakkha-paṇḍaka).
5. One who has been born without sexual characteristics (napuṃsaka-paṇḍaka).

The last is without the sex decad in his make up since birth and remains without the sex [114] characteristics of a male or female. That one is therefore neither a man nor a woman. [115] The sex decad consists of the four elements of earth, water, temperature and wind, plus colour, smell, taste, nutrition, life principle and male or female formations constituting a cell (kalāpa) at the time of conception.

The 18 Attributes of the Buddha

The Four Kinds of Analytical Knowledge

It has been said above that as soon as the Buddha attained Perfect Awakening, he became possessed of the four kinds of analytical knowledge. These four knowledges are:

1. The analytic knowledge of meaning (attha-paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa).
2. The analytic knowledge of phenomena (dhamma-paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa).
3. The analytic knowledge of language (nirutti-paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa).
4. The analytic knowledge of intuition (paṭibhāna-paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa).

Paṭisambhidā means multifarious, diverse, various. Analytic knowledge (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa) means knowledge which is discriminating and comprehensive.

1. The analytic knowledge of meaning (attha-paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa). Herein meaning (attha) means: 1) Meanings that are dependent on conditions, understanding the results of causes; 2) Nibbāna; 3) the meaning of words; 4) the meaning associated with resultant thoughts (vipāka) with their mind and mental concomitants, 5) the meaning associated with non-causative thoughts (kiriya) with their mind and mental concomitants.

The Buddha became endowed with the above five kinds of meaning (attha) as soon as he became a Buddha. Being endowed with the analytical knowledge of meaning, the Buddha knew discriminately and comprehensively about everything, and was able to expound these to others. The great non-causative consciousness (mahā-kiriya-ñāṇa) associated with the four kinds of knowledge that arise in the Buddha when his mind attends to the above five meanings, as well as path and fruit that he knows when his mind attends to Nibbāna, are called the analytic knowledge of meaning (attha-paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa) of the Buddha.

Thus, the analytic knowledge of meaning (attha-paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa) of the noble ones (ariya), who are still training themselves to become Arahats, such as that of Ven. Ānanda, consists of the great meritorious consciousness (mahā-kusala-citta), associated with the four kinds of knowledge that arises in [1163] them when their mind attends to those five meanings (attha), as well as the three lower paths and fruitions when their mind attends to Nibbāna.

2. The analytic knowledge of phenomena (dhamma-paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa). Discriminating and comprehensive knowledge about phenomena. Herein phenomena (dhamma) means: 1) Causes that produce results; 2) the four noble paths; 3) the spoken word of the Buddha; 4) meritorious thoughts with their mind and mental concomitants; 5) demeritorious thoughts with their mind and mental concomitants.

The Buddha became endowed with the above four kinds of phenomena (dhamma) as soon as he became a Buddha. Being endowed with analytical knowledge of phenomena, the Buddha knew discriminately and comprehensively about every phenomena and was able to expound on them to others. The great non-causative consciousness associated with knowledge that arises in the Buddha when his mind attends to the above five phenomena is the analytic knowledge of phenomena (dhamma-paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa) of the Buddha. In the case of noble ones (ariya), who are still training themselves to become Arahats, such as Ven. Ānanda, analytical knowledge of phenomena means the great meritorious consciousness associated with knowledge. The same applies with regard to the next two analytical knowledges.

3. The analytic knowledge of language (nirutti-paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa). This is analytical knowledge of the natural language of the noble ones (ariya), that is, Māgadhī or Pāli, concerning the five kinds of meaning (attha) and the five kinds of phenomena (dhamma). The Buddha became endowed with the analytical knowledge of the natural language of noble ones (ariya). Being endowed with analytical knowledge of words and grammar of the natural language of the noble ones, the Buddha is able to teach it to others.

The five kinds of meaning (attha) and the five kinds of phenomena (dhamma) need a wealth of words. For each item, a wide range of vocabulary and grammatical forms and nuances of the natural language of the noble ones is at the facile command of the Buddha. For example, a single factor (dhamma): contact (phassa) is expressed in its various forms, such as the phasso (contact), phusanā (contacting), samphusanā (full contacting), to bring out its various intrinsic meanings. Likewise greed (lobha) is explained in more than 100 terms.<sup>341</sup>

4. The analytic knowledge of intuition (paṭibhāna-paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa). This is the analytical knowledge that the analytic knowledge of meaning (attha-paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa) has discriminative and comprehensive knowledge about results; that the analytic knowledge of phenomena (dhamma-paṭisambhā-ñāṇa) has discriminative and comprehensive knowledge about five phenomena (dhamma); that the analytic knowledge of language (nirutti-paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa) has analytical knowledge about words and grammar. Briefly put, it is knowledge about the three kinds of analytical knowledge, that knowledge which has all knowledge as object and considers them discriminately. The Buddha became endowed with this knowledge about the kinds of knowledge as soon as he became a Buddha.

The analytic knowledge of language (nirutti-paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa) and the analytic knowledge of intuition (paṭibhāna-paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa), like the previous analytic knowledges (paṭisambhidhā-ñāṇa), are the great non-causative consciousness associated with knowledge (mahā-kiriya-mahā-kusala-ñāṇa).

The fourth of the four analytic knowledges (paṭisambhidhā-ñāṇa) discriminately knows the functions of the three other knowledges but is not able to discharge those functions itself. It is just like a preacher without a good voice, who is well versed in scriptural knowledge, and who is unable to preach as well as another good preacher who is gifted with a good voice but has scanty knowledge of the scriptures.

Two monastics learnt the art of teaching. One is poor in voice but intelligent; the other had a good voice but is not intelligent. The latter made a great name everywhere he teaches, the audience had a very good impression of him and say: “From the way this monastic preaches, he must be one who has committed to memory the Three Baskets.” When the learned monastic with a poor voice hears these remarks, he becomes jealous and says: “Well, you will find whether he is master of the Three Baskets when you hear him preach next time.” He implies that: “You are going to hear much the same stuff.” Yet whatever he might say about that popular preacher, he is just unable to preach as well as the one with a [1164] good voice who could captivate the audience.

Similarly, the analytic knowledge of intuition (paṭibhāna-samhhidā-ñāṇa) discriminately knows the functions of the three other analytical knowledges, but it cannot discharge these functions itself. This has been explained in the commentary on the Analysis of Analytical Knowledge (Paṭisambhidā-vibhaṅga, Vibh 15).

The Six Knowledges Unshared by Others

Six knowledges unshared by others (asādhāraṇa-ñāṇa), which are unique to the Buddha:

1. Knowledge of the disposition of others' faculties (indriya-paro-pariyatta-ñāṇa).
2. Knowledge of the underlying tendencies (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa).
3. Knowledge of the twin miracle (yamaka-pāṭihāriya-ñāṇa).
4. Knowledge of the attainment of Great Compassion (Mahā-karuṇā samāpattiya-ñāṇa).
5. Knowledge of omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa).
6. Unobstructed knowledge (anāvaraṇa-ñāṇa).

There are six kinds of knowledge which are possessed only by the Buddha and are not found in Paccekabuddhas or disciples, namely:

1. Knowledge of the disposition of others' faculties, (indriya-paro-pariyatta-ñāṇa), is the knowledge that discusses the readiness or otherwise of an individual to understand the truth. By this special knowledge, the Buddha decides such and such a being has his faculties ripe enough to gain Awakening and is due for liberation. Here, faculties (indriya) means, faith, effort, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom, five factors in all.
2. Knowledge of the underlying tendencies (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa), is the knowledge that discusses the natural bent and latent proclivities of individuals.<sup>342</sup> The term underlying tendencies (āsayānusaya) is a compound and may be rendered as “the seed-germ of an individual’s mental makeup.” By this special knowledge, the Buddha knows discriminately that such and such a being has such a natural bent of mind, such a latent potential for defilements that are dominant in his mental makeup.

It was due to the possession of the above two special knowledges that the Buddha could deliver the right message to the each person. Even Ven. Sāriputta, being not endowed with these special knowledges, could not know the state of readiness of his hearers to receive the message, i.e., about the ripeness or otherwise of the mental makeup of his hearers, with the result that his discourses, on a few occasions, fell flat on those listening.

3. Knowledge of the twin miracle (yamaka-pāṭihāriya-ñāṇa), is the knowledge that can bring about the twin miracle. On four occasions the Buddha employed this special knowledge, namely:

1. At the tree of Awakening, to clear away the doubt and conceit in the minds of Devas and Brahmas.
2. On his first visit to Kapilavatthu, to humble his kinsmen, the Sakyas.
3. At Sāvattihī, near the miraculous mango tree that grew and bore fruit on the same day it was planted by Kaṇḍa, the gardener, to humble the followers of other faiths.
4. On the occasion of the congregation concerning Pāthikaputta.

4. Knowledge of the attainment of Great Compassion (Mahā-karuṇā samāpattiya-ñāṇa), knowledge consisting of the Buddha-compassion on seeing the multitude struggling in the stormy ocean of Saṃsāra. He has great compassion for all beings that are living in the world which is like a burning prison. The knowledge that enables the Buddha to attend his compassionate mind to those beings is associated with dwelling in the absorption state of the attainment of Great Compassion (Mahā-karuṇā-samāpatti). At every night and every dawn, the Buddha enters into this absorption that consists of 24,000 billion thoughts.

5. Knowledge of omniscience (sabbaññuta-ñāṇa), this is the knowledge that comprehends all knowable things. The Buddha is called the All-knowing Buddha on account of this special knowledge, which is also called all-round vision

6. Unobstructed knowledge (anāvaraṇa-ñāṇa), this is the knowledge that there is nothing that can stand in the way of the arising of the Buddha knowledge (natthi āvaraṇam etassā ti anāvaṇam). This unhampered special knowledge of the Buddha is an essential feature of omniscience (sabbaññuta-ñāṇa). It is called unobstructed knowledge (anāvaraṇa-ñāṇa) in the same sense as conviction (saddhā), effort (virīya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā) are called faculties (indriya) because they are the controlling factors, each in its own way. They are also called powers (bala) because they overpower their respective opponents: lack of conviction, sloth, negligence, distraction and delusion.

These are the six knowledges unshared by others (asādhāraṇa-ñāṇa).

The Ten Powers

The Buddha has ten powers (dasabala-ñāṇa). [1165]

1. Skill in knowledge that understands what is appropriate as appropriate, and what is impossible as impossible (thānāṭṭhāna-kosalla-ñāṇa).
2. Knowledge of the operation of productive deeds (kamma) in the three periods: past, present and future, as to the immediate results and contributory or subsidiary result (vipāka-ñāṇa).
3. Knowledge that understands the ways or the modes of practice that leads to the various forms of existence, and the practice that leads to Nibbāna (sabbattha-gāminī-paṭipadā-ñāṇa).
4. Knowledge that understands the various elements pertaining to living beings, the aggregates, the sense spheres, etc. as well as those pertaining to non-living things as to their species, genes, etc. (Aneka-dhātu-ñāṇa).

The Paccekabuddhas and the two chief disciples have some limited knowledge about the elements constituting living beings. They do not have knowledge of the various natures of non-living things. As for the Buddha, he understands what elements are responsible for the species of tree with a white stem, or for the species of tree with a dark stem; or for the species of tree with a dark smooth stem, or for the species of tree with thick bark; or for the species of tree with thin bark. He knows what particular elements make a certain species of tree have such and such leaves with such shape and colour, etc., what particular elements make a certain species of tree have flowers of a particular colour or of a particular smell, such as having a good smell or a bad smell, etc. He knows what particular elements make a certain species of tree have fruit of such and such shape, size, smell, and taste such as sweet, sour, hot or astringent. He knows what particular elements make a certain species of tree have thorns of such and such nature, such as sharp, blunt, straight, curved, red, black, white, brown, etc. He has knowledge of non-living things and their intrinsic nature such as these which are the province of the Buddha only, and are beyond the capabilities of Paccekabuddhas and disciples.

5. Knowledge of the different inclinations of beings (nānādhimuttika-ñāṇa).
6. Knowledge of the maturity and immaturity of the faculties in beings (indriya-paropariyattha-ñāṇa).
7. Knowledge concerning the defiling factors, and the purifying factors with regard to the absorptions (jhāna), deliverances, concentrations, attainments and knowledge of rising from absorption (jhāna-vimokkha-samādhī-samāpatti-ñāṇa).
8. Knowledge in remembering former existences (pubbe-nivāsānussati-ñāṇa).
9. Knowledge in perceiving with the divine eye how beings pass away and are reborn according to their actions (cutūpapāta-ñāṇa or dibba-cakkhu-ñāṇa).
10. Knowledge of the Arahat path (Arahatta-magga) through extinction of moral taints (āsavakkhaya-ñāṇa).

1. First, the Buddha surveys the world with the first of the ten knowledges to see the beings who could possibly gain Awakening by examining whether there are the gross types of wrong view in them that render it impossible to gain the Arahat path (Arahatta-magga).

2. Next, he examines, by means of the second knowledge, the type of rebirth to see if they were born only with two good root causes (dvi-hetu) or with no root causes (ahetu), in which cases, the subject cannot gain Awakening in the present existence, being born with deficient merit.

3. Then he examines by the means of the third knowledge, the presence or otherwise of the five kinds of grave evil actions in the subject:

1. Killing one's own mother.
2. Killing one's own father.
3. Killing an Arahant.
4. Rupturing a Buddha's blood vessels.
5. Causing schism in the Saṅgha.

After examining beings by means of the first three knowledges, to see the state of their past actions, their defilements and their resultants, whether they were handicapped for Awakening or not in these three areas, the Buddha attends to those not so handicapped.

4. He engages the fourth knowledge to ascertain the right type of discourse to be given to the person, considering the latter's mental make up, the elements that [1166] constitute his mentality.

5. Then by means of the fifth knowledge, the Buddha examines the inherent inclination of the subject, regardless of sufficiency of effort on his part.

6. Having known the inclination of the subject, the Buddha examines, through the sixth knowledge, the quality of the faculties, such as conviction of the subject.

7. If the faculties are mature enough to gain absorption (jhāna) or the paths and fruitions, the Buddha would lose no time to go and deliver a discourse on the subject. He is able to do this because he is endowed with the seventh knowledge.

8. Having gone over the subject, the Buddha reviews, through the eighth knowledge, the past existences of the subject.

9. Through the ninth knowledge he reads the mind of the subject, reading other's minds being part of the knowledge called the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu-ñāṇa).

10. Ascertaining the present state of mind of the subject, the Buddha preaches the doctrine to suit the subject, with a view to his attaining the Arahant path (Arahatta-magga). This is the final step the Buddha takes with the tenth knowledge (āsavakkhaya-ñāṇa).

The Buddha discourses on the ten powers in the same order as he actually puts them to use for the benefit of the world at large.<sup>343</sup>

The fourteen Buddha knowledges therefore are: Knowledge of the four truths (catu-sacca); the four analytic knowledges (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa); and the six unshared knowledges (asādharaṇa-ñāṇa). Out of those fourteen, knowledge of the four truths and the four analytic knowledges are attained by the disciples also, but the six unshared knowledges are purely within the province of the Buddha. In as much as the six unshared knowledges belong only to the Buddha, there are also eighteen Buddha attributes (āveṇika) that belong only to the Buddha.

Ledi Sayādaw's Verses on the 18 Attributes

The late Ledi Sayādaw has composed a fine piece of devotional verse on the eighteen Buddha-attributes. The gist of which is given here:

May I be free from all dangers and depredations both internally and externally! There is no one, such as Māra or Āḷavaka who can endanger the life of the Buddha within the usual life period, adopted by all Buddhas, being four-fifths of the lifespan period of the epoch pertaining to each Buddha. There is no one, such as Mahissara, Brahma Baka, or an Asura, who can sully or dampen the all-knowing wisdom of the Buddha.

1. The Perfectly Self-Awakened One, endowed with the six exalted qualities, also counted in eight ways, has the all-knowing wisdom that can visualize all knowable things of the past, extending over myriads of aeons, and not the slightest obstruction can mar this vision.

2. The Perfectly Self-Awakened One, endowed with the six exalted qualities, also counted in eight ways, has the all-knowing wisdom that can visualize all knowable things of the future, extending over myriads of aeons, and not the slightest obstruction can mar this vision.

3. The Perfectly Self-Awakened One, endowed with the six exalted qualities, also counted in eight ways, has the all-knowing wisdom that can visualize all knowable things that are taking place at present in the 31 planes of existence in all the infinite world-elements, and not the slightest destruction can mar this vision.

4. The Perfectly Self-Awakened One, endowed with the six exalted qualities, also counted in eight ways, well-possessed of these three special attributes, has all bodily actions, in all postures and movements, preceded by four kinds of full comprehension, and all the bodily actions closely follow the guidance of the fourfold comprehension.

5. All his verbal actions, all his utterances, are preceded by the four kinds of full comprehension, and all the verbal actions closely follow the guidance of the fourfold comprehension. [1167]

6. All his mental actions, all his thoughts, are preceded by the four kinds of full comprehension, and all the mental actions follow the guidance of the fourfold comprehension.

7. The Perfectly Self-Awakened One, endowed with the six exalted qualities, also counted in eight ways, well-possessed of these six exclusive attributes, is never lacking, not having the slightest decline in the earnest desire that had arisen in him since his time as Bodhisatta Sumedha, to ferry across the floundering multitudes to the safe shore of Nibbāna, and in the will to achieve noble things beneficial to himself and to others, which is the exalted quality of accomplishment (kāma) itself.

8. His teaching, which has the sole object of liberating all deserving beings from the suffering round of existences, never falls short of the avowed objective.

9. His effort, which is rightly directed in three ways: the dauntless determination as Bodhisatta in being prepared to traverse an ocean of burning coals or of sharp stakes, laid over the entire surface of the universe which is 3,610,350 leagues wide, for the sake of attaining Buddhahood, which is the exalted quality of making effort (payatta) itself; the exclusive Buddha-knowledge consisting in the fourfold right efforts and the will to accomplish the five routine tasks set for himself every day, never shows the slightest decline.

10. His concentration in two aspects: the inherent firmness of mind that withstands the eight kinds of worldly conditions or vicissitudes that may befall him from any quarter, like Mount Meru withstands stormy winds that blow from the eight directions; the absorption power (appanā- samādhi) which is the very basis of all psychic powers (abhiññā), such as psychic power (iddhi-vidha), divine eye (dibba-cakkhu), knowing the minds of others (ceto-pariyāya), recollection of past lives (pubbe-nivāsānussati), knowing the deeds which cause rebirth (yathā-kammūpaga), knowing the future (anāgataṃsa), never show the slightest decline.

11. His wisdom that encompasses all happenings, like the rise and fall of conditional phenomena, taking place in the three worlds extending over the 10,000 world-element, which he surveys through the great diamond knowledge (mahā-vajira-ñāṇa), consisting of 24,000 billion times each day, never shows the slightest decline.

12. His release from the trammels of the world consists of five kinds: the four noble abidings in loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy and equanimity with regard to the 10,000 world-element extending over the worlds of human beings, Devas, Brahmas and the four lower worlds; and the dwelling in the Arahata fruition absorption (Arahatta-phala-jhāna) which the Buddha is wont to resort to even in odd moments such as during recesses in delivering discourses, which consists of 24,000 billion times each day, never shows the slightest decline.

13. The Perfectly Self-Awakened One, endowed with the six exalted qualities, also counted in eight ways, well possessed of these twelve exclusive attributes, never indulges in light-hearted deeds, speech or thoughts.

14. He never indulges in any hasty action that is liable to be censured by the wise as thoughtless or ill-considered conduct.

15. He never commits any action that is liable to be called inadequate or uncomprehensive.

16. He never commits any action that is liable to be called impulsive by the wise.

17. He never indulges in the slightest remiss concerning his self-assigned task of bringing benefit to himself and to the world at large.

18. He never lets any moment pass without being mindful of the six sense objects that come within cognisance of the six sense spheres.

The Perfectly Self-Awakened One, endowed with the six exalted qualities, also counted in eight ways, well-possessed of these eighteen exclusive attributes, is not liable to be assailed by anyone, either against his life or against the all-knowing wisdom.

The above remarks about the eighteen Buddha-attributes are true indeed. I pay homage to the Buddha who is possessed of these attributes. May this meritorious verbal action bring [1168] fulfilment of all my aspirations both for the present and for the hereafter.

In conclusion, the analytic knowledges (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa), the unshared knowledges (asādhāraṇa-ñāṇa) and the ten powers (dasa-bala-ñāṇa), etc., are merely samples of the greatness of the Buddha's knowledge. Just as a drop of the sea water verifies the salty taste of the sea, so also the above special attributes are merely indicative of the profundity of the Buddha's knowledge and noble attributes which we have not yet mentioned in this work.

On 1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta

Five Uproars

An uproar (kolāhala) means a verbal agitation started by some people who say: "Thus will it happen," before the predicted event actually takes place. It arises among people who are [1670] brought together and speak of the impending matter in the same language and in the same voice.

That is to say, an uproar is created with excitement by people at large as an omen before the actual occurrence of something. It does not mean a nonsensical commotion that prevails in towns and villages, falsely predicting an impossible thing, such as: "Prince Setkya is about to come back!"

The name is spelt 'Tsakyamen' by Burney, British Resident at Ava (In-wa) during the reign of King Bagyidaw (1819-37). Tsakyamen or Prince Setkya, as the only son of the king, was heir-apparent. He was executed, according to the British, by Bagyidaw's brother, King Tharrawaddy, who usurped the throne in 1837, and the execution took place in April 1838. But tradition has it that Queen Mai Nu, Bagyidaw's wife and the prince's step mother, was instrumental in the execution. No matter who did it, it was true that the people's feelings were 'those of regret and indignation.'<sup>344</sup> The latter version is dramatized and popularized by theatrical troupes, which thereby enhanced the people's sympathy towards the unfortunate prince. Those who did not believe that the prince actually was killed entertained the hope that he would reappear some day. But there has been no sign of the return of the prince.

There are five uproars (kolāhala) in this world:

1. The uproar before the dissolution of the aeon (kappa-kolāhala).

The uproar that warns people of the dissolution of the world (kappa-kolāhala).

When the time for the destruction of the world is drawing near, the deities named Lokavyūha of the Deva realm of sensual pleasures (kāmāvacara-deva), wearing red garments, letting their hair down, wiping the tears off their faces, roam in a distressed manner about roads and highways used by people and cry aloud to human beings at all places, a hundred years ahead of the event:

“Friends, a hundred years from today, the world will dissolve! The great oceans will dry up! The great earth, Mount Meru and all will burn and disintegrate if the world is to be destroyed by fire; will be flooded and disintegrate if it is to be destroyed by water; will expose itself to violent storms and disintegrate if it is to be destroyed by the winds. There will be a destruction of the world extending from this great earth with Mount Meru and the oceans up to the abode of the Brahmas! Friends, develop loving-kindness (mettā), develop compassion (karuṇā), develop altruistic joy (muditā), develop equanimity (upekkhā) which are the conduct of Brahmas! Attend and serve your parents respectfully! Do good deeds! Do not be careless!” The uproar of the multitude caused by such loud cries is known as the uproar before the dissolution of the aeon (kappa-kolāhala).

2. The uproar caused by the appearance of a Universal Monarch (Cakka-vatti-kolāhala).

The uproar that arises in the world of human beings proclaiming that a Universal Monarch will appear who rules over the human realm, including the four great island-continent and their satellite smaller islands, 2,000 in all, is called an uproar announcing a Universal Monarch (Cakka-vatti-kolāhala). The guardian deities of the world (loka-pāla), those sense-realm (kāmāvacara) Devas, knowing in advance of the appearance of a Universal Monarch, roam about public roads and highways and cry aloud to human beings at all places, a hundred years ahead of the event: “Friends, a hundred years from today, a Universal Monarch will emerge in this world!” The uproar of the multitude caused by such loud cries is known as the uproar announcing a Universal Monarch (Cakka-vatti-kolāhala).

3. The uproar caused by the appearance of a Buddha (Buddha-kolāhala).

The uproar predicting in the world of human beings when a Buddha will arise is called an uproar announcing a Buddha (Buddha-kolāhala). The Brahmas of the Suddhāvāsa abode, knowing in advance of the advent of an omniscient Buddha and wearing Brahma clothing, ornaments and crowns, happily [1671] roam about public roads and highways and cry aloud to human beings at all places, 1,000 years ahead of the event: “Friends, 1,000 years from today, an omniscient Buddha will come into being in this world!” The uproar of the multitude caused by such loud cries is known as an uproar announcing a Buddha (Buddha-kolāhala).

Herein, the statement meaning that the uproar announcing a Buddha (Buddha-kolāhala) occurs 1,000 years ahead of the arrival of a Buddha should be noted in accordance with the lifespan of the appearing Buddhas. It should not be noted as a statement made regardless of their lifespans. The reason is that the Bodhisattas, such as Prince Dīpaṅkara, Prince Koṇḍañña, Prince Maṅgala, etc., who had appeared in a period of long lifespans, after descending to the human world and enjoying kingly pleasures as human beings for 10,000 years or so, renounced the world, practised austerities (dukkara-cariyā) and became Buddhas.

The uproar announcing a Buddha (Buddha-kolāhala) originates in the celestial world, and on account of that uproar, Devas and Brahmas in the 10,000 world-element approach the Bodhisatta to make the request. Only after getting his consent, do Suddhāvāsa Brahmas roam the human abode and make the announcement.

Thus, more than 1,000 years, or even more than 5,000 years, maybe 9,000 or 10,000 years, after the proclamation of an uproar announcing a Buddha (Buddha-kolāhala), the long-lived Buddhas appeared. Therefore, the aforesaid statement: “An uproar announcing a Buddha (Buddha-kolāhala) lasts for 1,000 years,” should not be understood to apply to all Buddhas; the statement should be taken to have been made only with regard to a short-lived Buddha such as Buddha Gotama.

4. The uproar when the blessings are to be explained (maṅgala-kolāhala).

Undecided as to the exact meaning of the blessings (maṅgala), people gather and define the word each in his own way, saying: “These are the blessings,” “Those are the blessings,” which gives rise to a tumult crying out: “They say they are the blessings!” Such a tumultuous utterance is called an uproar over the blessings (maṅgala-kolāhala). Suddhāvāsa Brahmas, knowing in advance that the Buddha will give a discourse on the blessings and being aware of the thought of people who yearn for the truth about the blessings, roam about public roads and highways and cry aloud to human beings at all places, twelve years before the Buddha’s delivery of the Discourse of the Blessings (Maṅgala-sutta, Khp 5, Snp 2.4): “Friends, twelve years from today, the Buddha will teach what are the blessings!” The uproar of the multitude caused by such loud cries is known as the uproar over the blessings (maṅgala-kolāhala).

5. The uproar caused by someone wanting to know about moral perfection (moneyya-kolāhala).

The uproar concerning the ascetic practice of moral perfection is called an uproar over moral perfection (moneyya-kolāhala).<sup>345</sup> Suddhāvāsa Brahmas, knowing in advance that a monastic in the human world will approach the Buddha to ask about moral perfection, similarly roam about public roads and highways and cry aloud to human beings in all places, seven years before the Buddha’s teaching: “Friends, seven years from today, a monastic will approach the Buddha and ask about moral perfection (moneyya)!” The uproar of the multitude caused by such loud cries is known as the uproar over moral perfection (moneyya-kolāhala).

These are the five uproars (kolāhala). Explanations of these five are given in the commentaries on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa), Birth Stories (Jātaka), the Thematic Discourses about King Kosala (Kosala-saṃyutta, SN 3), the Supplementary Readings (Khuddaka-pāṭha), the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta) and also in the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra).

The Five Auguries

Five auguries (pubba-nimitta) signal the approaching death of the Devas. [1672]

The five auguries are:

1. The withering of celestial flowers.

---

Miscellaneous Topics – 2350

2. The dirtiness of celestial costumes and ornaments.
3. Sweating from the armpits.
4. Deterioration of physical beauty.
5. Displeasure in living in celestial residences.

1. Withering of celestial flowers; that is to say, the drying of divine blossoms that have appeared as decorations since the day these beings are reborn as deities. These flowers, that appear on their bodies simultaneously with their birth as Devas, never wither during their lifespan but remain fresh throughout. The flowers begin to wither only when there are seven days left for them to live, according to human reckoning.

The flowers belonging to the Bodhisatta Setaketu did not go dry even once throughout the length of his life as a Deva living in Tusita abode, over the whole period of 576 million years by terrestrial calculations. They started withering seven human days before his passing away.

2. Dirtiness of celestial costumes and ornaments: As in the previous case, celestial costumes and ornaments normally never become dirty; only when it is seven days before the Devas' death do they show such dirtiness.
3. Sweating from the armpits: In the celestial realm, unlike in the human abode, there is absolutely no such change of weather conditions as intense heat or intense cold. Only seven days prior to death, beads of sweat flow from various parts of their bodies, especially from the armpits.
4. Deterioration of physical beauty: Such signs of old age as missing teeth, greying hair, wrinkled skin and the like that also betray decaying states of physical beauty never happen to them. Female deities always look like sixteen-year olds, and male deities like twenty-year olds. Though they are perpetually tender and youthful with fresh, brilliant, beautiful colours, deterioration of the bodies sets in, and they become weary and wretched as the time for their passing away comes near.
5. Displeasure in living in celestial residences: They never know unhappiness while living in celestial mansions throughout their divine lives. It is only when they are about to fall from their divine state that they lose delight and become displeased with life in the divine residences.

Though the five auguries (pubba-nimitta) occur to dying Devas as has been said above, it should not be understood that they do so to each and every divine being. Just as in the human world such omens as the falling of a meteor, the quake of the earth, the eclipse of the moon or of the sun and the like manifest with regard to great and powerful kings, ministers, etc., even so in the celestial world these predictions happen only with reference to the highly-placed male and female deities. They never occur to those deities of insignificant power.

As good or bad things predicted by the omens that occur in the human abode are understood only by learned interpreters, so the events, whether good or bad, forecast by those omens occurring in the celestial realm, are comprehended by wise Devas, not by unwise ones.

When the omens occur to Devas of inconsiderable merit, they become greatly frightened, wondering: “Who knows where I will be reborn?” Those of considerable merit do not feel so at all, knowing: “We shall enjoy further bliss in higher divine existences because of the merit that accrues from our deeds of generosity, our observance of morality and our practice of meditation.”<sup>346</sup> [1673]

The Conception of the Bodhisatta

It may be questioned as to why Queen Māyā conceived the Bodhisatta only in the third period of the second stage of life. The answer is: The sensual desire in the first stage is usually strong, therefore, women who become pregnant at that stage are unable to look after their pregnancy well, and indeed many are those who cannot take care of it. Such an inability causes several forms of injury to the pregnancy.

The middle stage, which is the second of the equally divided three periods, may be sub-divided into three equal portions. When a woman reaches the third portion, her womb is clean and pure. A baby conceived in such a clean and pure womb is healthy, free from diseases.

The mother of a Bodhisatta in his last existence enjoys pleasure at her first stage, and it is customary that she dies after giving birth to him during the third portion of the middle stage.

It is also a natural law (dhammatā) that she dies seven days after the birth of the Bodhisatta. She does not die because she is in labour; as a matter of fact, the Bodhisatta descends only when he has seen that his would-be mother has ten months and seven days more to live, after she begins to conceive, as has been mentioned in the account of the Bodhisatta's five great investigations. Taking this into consideration, it is clear that her death is not caused by childbirth; it should undoubtedly be held that the mother dies only because her time is up.<sup>347</sup>

Mahā Māyā's Journey from Kapilavatthu to Devadaha

In the story of Queen Mahā Māyā's visit from Kapilavatthu to Devadaha, it is written in the Illustration of the Meaning of the Victor (Jinatha-pakāsanī) as follows: "Having cleaned and levelled the road of five leagues between Devadaha and Kapilavatthu, like a hardened plain ground ..."

In the Light on the Realised One's Exalted Utterances (Tathāgata-udāna-dīpanī), however, the following is mentioned: "Having taken the journey of 30 leagues from Kapilavatthu to Devadaha, which had been repaired by digging, enlarging and filling the potholes so as to make it agreeable ..."

The two statements therefore disagree.

In this Chronicles of the Buddhas, however, we follow the commentaries on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) and the Birth Stories (Jātaka), where the distance between the two kingdoms, Kapilavatthu and Devadaha, is not given; these commentaries simply describe the mending and levelling of the road. The vehicle taken by Queen Mahā Māyā is said in this work to be a golden palanquin, in accordance with the same commentaries.

It should not be wondered how the palanquin was carried by 1,000 men because, as in the case of the statement that says: "The Bodhisatta was suckled by 240 wet-nurses," it is possible that they carried it in turn, or, it is probable that the palanquin was pulled by them simultaneously with long ropes of cloth.

In the first volume of the Light on the Realised One's Exalted Utterances (Tathāgata-udāna-dīpanī), it is unusually and elaborately written as follows: "The whole journey of 30 leagues was mended, improved and extensively and magnificently decorated. The queen rode the stately chariot drawn by eight horses of white lotus colour and of the Valāhaka Sindhi breed. King Suddhodana was together with her, for he was accompanying her up to the distance of half a league; there, he saw her off and turned back after she had paid her respects to him and he had said words of encouragement. The white horses merrily drew the chariot, thinking: ‘This service of ours by taking Queen Mahā Māyā with the Bodhisatta in her womb will bring us merit leading to Nibbāna.’ ”

The commentaries on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) and Birth Stories (Jātaka) as well as the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra) do not give such an account. All they tell us is that the journey was made in a golden palanquin. [1674] This treatise is in accordance with these commentaries and sub-commentaries.

The Sāla Grove of Lumbinī

With reference to the Sāla Grove of Lumbinī, there are two versions: One from the commentaries on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) and the other from the Birth Stories (Jātaka) that have been used in this work. The clause reading in the second passage: “Hovering around and enjoying the nectar themselves and carrying it for others as well,” is in agreement with the Ngakhon Sayādaw’s writing. It seems that the commentary in the Sayādaw’s possession contained the Pāli word anubhutta-sañcārāhi. In the commentaries, whether older or the Chaṭṭha-Saṅgāyanā edition, there is anubhutta-pañjarāhi. Dictionaries give “cage” as the meaning of pañjara in the commentaries, but here the meaning “cage” is not agreeable.

Again, parabhata-madhu-kara-vadhūhi is translated as: “With female bees carrying the nectar for others as well.” Though parabhata has “cuckoo” as its meaning in the Abhidhāna (vs 633), that meaning does not fit in here; it finds no place in this case. Therefore, the Ngakhon Sayādaw has appropriately said “carrying for others” in his translation.

When a rational interpretation is thought of, one recalls the distribution of work among bees: 1) There are female bees bringing all available kinds of nectar from the four directions and 2) female bees that are waiting at the hive and are able to turn the nectar of different tastes into honey of sweet taste.

In the commentry to the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa), it seems that the female worker bees are meant. Therefore, parabhata-madhu-kara-vadhūhi should be translated as: “Liquefying female bees able to make honey out of different kinds of nectar brought by other nectar-carrying bees.” And it will be acceptable only if its paraphrase is given as follows: “Liquefying female bees that can make honey of sweet taste from various types of nectar brought by nectar-bearing bees after flying around and around over trees big and small.”

The Birth of the Bodhisatta

With reference to the birth of the Bodhisatta, the Light on the Realised One’s Exalted Utterances (Tathāgata-udāna-dīpanī) and other Myanmar treatises on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) effectively say this: “When the time for Queen Mahā Māyā’s delivery of her son was drawing very close, why did her younger sister, Pajāpatī Gotamī, extend help to her by supporting her on the left side? She gave birth by being aided by her attendants all around.” In the commentaries on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa), Birth Stories (Jātaka) and Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra), however, it is said that when the time for child-birth was near, as she felt the force in the womb at the impetus for her delivery, those who were with her set up screens and stayed away from her. While they were thus staying aloof, the Queen gave birth to the Bodhisatta. This work follows the account given in these commentaries.

According to the exposition in the Long Discourse on the Traditions (Mahāpadāna-sutta, DN 14), the commentaries on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) and Birth Stories (Jātaka) the two streams of water, warm and cold, enabled the mother and child to adjust their body temperature immediately after the birth.

What is particularly said in the commentaries on the Long Discourse on the Traditions (Mahāpadāna-sutta, DN 14) is this: “Of the two water streams, the cold one falls into the gold jar and the warm one into the silver. These two streams that had fallen from the sky are mentioned to say that they were meant for the son and the mother to drink and to play with exclusively, not because they were dirtied by any impurity on earth. Apart from the warm and cold water from the sky, there was the water fetched in gold and silver pots, the water from the geese (haṃsa) lakes, etc. Water for them was indeed unlimited; it was plentiful.

The Story of Kāḷadevila, the Recluse

The account of Devila<sup>348</sup> will be reproduced from the commentary to the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta). [1675] This recluse Devila was the Brahminical adviser to King Sīhahanu, who was King of Kapilavatthu and father of the later King Suddhodana. Because of his dark complexion, the Brahmin recluse was also called Asita.<sup>349</sup> He was the king's instructor and counsellor who served King Sīhahanu by giving him advice so as to enable him to carry through all undertakings, be they political, administrative or otherwise.

During the reign of King Sīhahanu, he was tutor and guardian to Prince Suddhodana, who was then simply a Crown Prince and unconsecrated as of yet. Devila taught him various royal manners and palace customs and educated him in statecraft and trained him in all skills. When Prince Suddhodana ascended the throne and was consecrated after King Sīhahanu, it was also the former royal teacher who again became advisor to King Suddhodana.

After his ascension to the throne and his consecration, King Suddhodana did not show profound respect to his teacher as he had done when he was a young prince. During the court meetings, he merely raised his joined hands in adoration, according to the tradition of the consecrated Sakyan kings.

As he no longer received the king's special reverence as before, his birth as a Brahmin and his pride as a teacher generated displeasure and dissatisfaction. Unhappy and disgusted with his obligations in the palace, he sought the king's permission to become an ascetic.

Knowing his teacher's firm decision, Suddhodana requested: "You may become an ascetic. But after becoming an ascetic, please do not go far away. Kindly always stay in my garden so that I will have the convenience of seeing you." After giving his consent, saying: "Very well, let it be so," and having made himself an ascetic and receiving the king's favourable treatment, he stayed in the royal garden.

Repeatedly engaging himself in meditation on a meditation device (kaṣiṇa) for mental concentration, he gained the five mundane psychic powers. After his acquisition of these powers, he usually had his meal each day at King Suddhodana's palace and visited the Himālayas and the Catumahārājā abode, the Tāvātimsa abode and other places, where he spent his daytime.

The [230] formless abode of the Brahmas<sup>350</sup> is a plane of existence which is totally devoid of material phenomena, there being only mental consciousness (citta) and its concomitants (cetasika). In such an abode worldlings with three roots (ti-hetuka-puthujjana) of non-greed, non-hate and non-delusion are reborn, and such noble ones as Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna), Once-returners (Sakadāgāmi) and Non-returners (Anāgāmi) who have attained the formless absorptions (arūpa-jhāna).

The Stream-enterers, Once-returners and Non-returners who have reached that formless abode will no longer return to the lower planes of existence. As they are experienced in practising meditation up to the stage of the paths and fruitions while in the sensuous, wholesome abodes (kāma-sugati), and in the material (rūpa) abodes, they are able to pursue the same insight (vipassanā) meditation which they had practised previously. They attain higher stages up to the paths and fruitions and Nibbāna in the same formless abodes, thereby terminating all suffering in Saṃsāra even though they do not hear the Dhamma from anyone.

Worldlings of the three roots, who have attained the formless absorptions in the human world, such as the recluses Kāḷadevila, Āḷāra and Udaka, were reborn in a formless abode upon their death. As this abode, by nature, is devoid of any kind of matter, those who are reborn there have absolutely no eyes (cakkhu-pasāda) for seeing the Buddha and no ears (sota-pasāda) for hearing his Dhamma. Thus they can neither behold a Buddha nor listen to his discourses even if one comes and teaches it. On their part, Buddhas do not visit or give discourses in the formless abodes. And if worldlings have no chance to listen to the Dhamma from others they will never attain the paths and fruitions.

Kāḷadevila and Udaka, who reached the formless sphere of Neither-Perception-nor-Non-Perception (Nevasaññā-nāsaññāyatana-arūpa) as worldlings, would remain in Saṃsāra for 84,000 aeons. Ājāra who reached the formless abode of the Sphere of Nothingness (Ākiñcaññāyatana) would remain in Saṃsāra for 60,000 great aeons (mahā-kappa). Therefore, even if a Buddha were to appear in the human world in the present aeon, they have no chance to realize liberation.

In this connection, it may be asked as to whether Kāḷadevila could not have been reborn in a form abode provided he directed his mind towards that existence. Since he had fully attained the eight mundane absorptions, his rebirth could have taken place in any of the ten form worlds up to the High Divinities of Great Fruit if he were so inclined.

If there was such an opportunity, it may be asked: “Why had Kāḷadevila no inclination to be reborn in one of the ten form abodes of his choice?” The reply should be that he had no such inclination because he was not skilful enough to do so.

An achiever of the eight mundane attainments is likely to be reborn in one of the form or formless abodes which attracts him. Kāḷadevila could have been in a form abode only if he desired to be there. If he were there, he would have been in a position to pay homage as a form Brahma to the Buddha. But his failure to be there was due to his lack of skill in directing his mind towards that particular abode which is lower than the formless abodes.

There arises another argument: “Kāḷadevila, who had kept away grief (domanassa) through his attainment of the absorptions, should not have succumbed to that feeling and shed tears.” He did so because he was merely skilled in keeping grief away. To make it a little more explicit: Only those mental defilements, which have been completely eliminated by means of the paths, cannot reappear in one’s mental continuum. But those defilements, which are just kept away from oneself [231] through the mundane absorptions, are apt to reappear when confronted with a feeling that is strong enough. Kāḷadevila had not eliminated such defilements; he had only kept them away from himself by means of the absorptions, hence he wept.

Still another question may be asked as to how it was possible for Kāḷadevila to be reborn in a formless abode since he slipped from the absorptions through grief when he wept. The answer should be that he could be so reborn because the same absorptions were regained with ease.

The defilements that have been just removed from worldlings through mundane absorptions come back because of a powerful factor and make them slip from their absorptions; but if the defilements do not reach the extreme, the worldlings can readily regain their absorptions as soon as the force of the emotion subsides; and it cannot be easily known by others that “these are the ones who have fallen from their attainments.”

In brief, like Kāḷadevila and others, those who have gained the eight mundane absorptions can be reborn in one of the ten form abodes, which are lower, or in one of the four formless abodes, which are higher, if they have prepared their minds to do so. If they have not, they will be reborn only in the abode that is determined by the highest of their mundane absorptions since that particular absorption alone can cause such a result.

The knowledge that one can reach any abode that one sets the mind on is acquired only through a Buddha’s teaching within his Dispensation. Outside the Dispensation, however, there can be no such penetration. Kāḷadevila was not a disciple of a Buddha, thus he did not belong to a Buddha’s Dispensation. Therefore, he was ignorant of the means to train his mind. If he had known, he would have done so to be reborn in one of the ten form worlds, of which the Divinities of Great Fruit (Vehapphala) is the highest. If he had done so, he could have been reborn there and might get the opportunity of seeing the Buddha.

But now his ignorance had led to the failure of doing what would be proper for him. He would therefore be reborn in the Sphere of Neither-Perception-nor-Non-Perception (Neva-saññānāsaññāyatana) which is the topmost formless abode, and reflecting on his forthcoming rebirth, he became so distressed that he could not help weeping; when he thus wept, he lost the absorptions. But, since he had committed no serious evil deeds whatsoever, he regained the eight mundane attainments by resuming the preliminary exercises on a meditation device (kaṣiṇa) with ease, as soon as his grievous defilements ceased, with nobody knowing his slip from the absorptions. Therefore, it should be understood that the recluse Devila was reborn in the formless abode of the Sphere of Neither-Perception-nor-Non-Perception on his death through absorption on this level which is the highest of the eight mundane attainments.

The Royal Lineage of the Bodhisatta

In [1675] connection with the Bodhisatta's investigation into his family (kula-olokana), a history of Sakyan kings should be noted in brief as follows. Such a note means recognition of the attribute of the Bodhisatta's high birth (jāti-mahatta-guṇa).

In the first inclusive period (antara) of an incalculably long aeon of evolution (vivaṭṭaṭṭhāyī-asankhyeyya-kappa), the first king of the people, in the beginning of the world, was our Bodhisatta. He was originally named Manu.

The Bodhisatta Manu was more handsome, more pleasant to look at, more respectable, glorious and virtuous than other inhabitants of the world of the earliest age.

In that primeval age, people were of very pure morality at first. Later on, there appeared people who committed crimes, such as theft, murder, etc. In order to be able to live free from these dangers and in peace, other early men of the world discussed the matter among themselves and decided unanimously to elect someone who would govern them justly.

They also agreed that the Bodhisatta Manu was the best to govern, for he was endowed with all the required qualifications. Then they approached him and made a request that he be their righteous ruler.

As Manu fulfilled his administrative duties, the people who were under his administration honoured him by paying their taxes, a kind of fee for his ruling, which amounted to one tenth of their crops.

The Acquisition of Three Epithets

The people unanimously recognized the Bodhisatta, showing no objection at all, as one who would govern them with righteousness, for which honour taxes were due. Therefore, he acquired the epithet Mahā Sammata, the Great Elected One.

[1676]

He saw to it that there were no disputes, quarrels, etc., over ownership of farmlands. And, if there were any, the noble Manu had the power to decide and pass judgement. This earned him the epithet of being a noble (khattiya). As he endeared himself to the people by observing upright kingly duties towards them, he won the third title of king (rājā).

In this Fortunate Aeon (Bhadda-kappa), it was the Bodhisatta Manu who was the first among monarchs to gain these three titles: the Great Elected One (Mahā-sammata), noble (khattiya) and king (rājā).

As the sun possesses 1,000 radiances and gives beings light, sight and forms, so Bodhisatta Manu, like the eye of these primeval people and endowed with many noble attributes, came out shiningly, as if he were their second sun, and therefore he was also designated as having the Lineage of the Sun (Ādicca-vamsa).

Herein, with reference to the Mahā Sammata of the primeval time, and also with reference to the present and fourth intermediate aeon (antara-kappa) of the 64 divisions of the evolutionary (vivaṭṭaṭṭhāyī) state of incalculable (asaṅkhyeyya) aeons, forming one-fourth of this Fortunate Aeon (Bhadda-kappa), learned authors write differently. Thus, in “The Glass Palace Chronicle,” compiled by well-versed monks and ministers who met and discussed for three years in the Glass Palace during the reign of King Bagyidaw,<sup>351</sup> the fourth founder of the city of Ratanapura, and in the Assistance with the Readings giving an Analysis of the Aeons (Kappa-vinicchaya-pāṭha-nissaya), written in settlement of controversies, by the Mohtā Thathanabaing Sayādaw, who held the title “Sujātābhisiri-dhajādhipati-pavarā Mahā-dhamma-Rajādhirāja-guru,” at the request of King Mindon,<sup>352</sup> the convenor of the Fifth Council, it has been decided, giving ample and strong evidence from the texts, commentaries and sub-commentaries, that there was only one Bodhisatta Mahā Sammata and that the present inclusive period (antara-kappa) is the fourth one.

Particularly in the Analysis of the Aeons (Kappa-vinicchaya), there are special sections (visesa-kaṇḍa) which systematically contain questions (codanā) and answers (sodanā) giving decisions on such topics of controversies as the eleven inclusive periods (antara-kappa), eleven Mahā Sammatas, the twelfth inclusive period, the nineteenth inclusive period and the rest, with discussions so elaborate and with evidence so strong that doubtful persons, both monks and laymen, are likely to become free of doubts.

Miscellaneous Topics – 2361

In enumerating the kings in succession (rājakkama) such as Mahā Sammata, Roca, etc., some commentaries and treatises are slightly different: These are the commentary on the Discourse to Ambaṭṭha (Ambaṭṭha-sutta, DN 3), and its new sub-commentary, the commentary on the Birth Story about the King of Cetiya (Cetiya-jātaka, Ja 422), the Great Chronicle (Mahā-vaṃsa), the Chronicle of the Island (Dīpa-vaṃsa) and the Chronicle of the Kings (Rāja-vaṃsa). What is shown below is based chiefly on the Great Chronicle and the Great Cause of Learning (Mahā-suta-kāri).

1. Manu, the Mahā Sammata, or, the Great Elected One.
2. His son, King Roca.
3. His son, King Vararoca.
4. His son, King Kaḷyāna.
5. His son, King Vara Kaḷyāna.
6. His son, King Uposatha.
7. His son, King Mandhātu, who was also the Bodhisatta.
8. His son, King Vara.
9. His son, King Upavara.
10. His son, King Cetiya.
11. His son, King Mucala. [1677]
12. His son, King Mahā Mucala.
13. His son, King Mucalinda.
14. His son, King Sāgara.
15. His son, King Sāgaradeva.
16. His son, King Bhārata.
17. His son, King Aṅgira.
18. His son, King Ruci.
19. His son, King Suruci, also called Mahā Ruci.
20. His son, King Patāpa.
21. His son, King Mahā Patāpa.

22. His son, King Panāda.
23. His son, King Mahā Panāda.
24. His son, King Sudassana.
25. His son, King Mahā Sudassana.
26. His son, King Neru.
27. His son, King Mahā Neru.
28. His son, King Accima.

1. These 28 kings were of long lives of incalculable (asankhyeyya) years. The 27 kings after Mahā Sammata were his descendants. Some of these 28 kings reigned in Kusavatī city, others in Rājagaha and still others in Mithilā.

2. King Accima, son of the last of the 28 kings, founded Kusavatī city and reigned there; his descendants were exactly 100.<sup>353</sup>

Then the author gives an extract from the Great Cause of Learning (Mahā-suta-kārī), enumerating the kings listed in 1 and 2 which makes 128 kings.

3. Of the hundred kings descended from King Accima, the last was named King Arindama. His son founded the city of Ayuḷḷhapura (Ayodhya) and reigned there. He and his descendants in that city numbered 56.

4. The last of these 56 kings was named Duppasaha. His son founded Bārāṇasī and reigned there. He and his descendants in that city were 60.

5. The last of these 60 kings was named Ajita. His son founded Kambala. He and his descendants in that city were 84,000.

6. The last of these 84,000 kings was named Brahmadata. His son founded Hatthipura and reigned there. He and his descendants in that city were 36.

Here there is another extract from the same the Great Cause of Learning (Mahā-suta-kārī) that enumerates the kings in 3, 4, 5, and 6, amounting to 84,152.

7. The last of these 36 kings was named Kambalavaṃsa. He founded Ekacakkhu and reigned there. He and his descendants in that city were 32.

---

Miscellaneous Topics – 2363

8. The last of these 32 kings was named Purindeva (Surindeva, or Munindeva in other versions). His son founded Vajiramutti and reigned there. He and his descendants in that city were 28.

9. The last of these 28 kings was named Sādhina. His son founded Mathura and reigned there. He and his descendants in that city were 22.

10. The last of these 22 kings was named Dhammagutta. His son founded Ariṭṭhapura and reigned there. He and his descendants in that city were eighteen.

11. The last of these eighteen kings was named Sippi. His son founded the city Indapattha [1678] and reigned there. He and his descendants in that city were 22.

Another extract comes here from the same Great Cause of Learning (Mahā-suta-kārī), combining the paragraphs 7 to 11 and making 117 kings in all.

12. The last of these 117 kings was named Brahmadeva. His son also reigned in Ekacakkhu. He and his descendants in that city were fifteen.

13. The last of these fifteen kings was named Baladatta. His son founded Kosambī and reigned there. He and his descendants in that city were fourteen.

14. The last of these fourteen kings was named Hatthideva. His son founded Kannagoccha and reigned there. He and his descendants in that city were nine.

15. The last of these nine kings was named Naradeva. His son founded Rocana and reigned there. He and his descendants in that city were seven.

16. The last of these seven kings was named Mahinda. His son founded Campā and reigned there. He and his descendants in that city were twelve.

Another extract is taken from the Great Cause of Learning (Mahā-suta-kārī) combining the above five paragraphs and giving the total number of kings which is 57.

17. The last of these 57 kings mentioned in the above five paragraphs was named Nāgadeva. His son founded Mithilā and reigned there. He and his descendants in that city were 25.

18. The last of these 25 kings was named Samuddadatta. His son reigned back in Rājagaha. He and his descendants in that city were 25.

19. The last of these 25 kings was named Tidhaṅkara. His son founded Takkasilā and reigned there; he and his descendants in that city were twelve.

Miscellaneous Topics – 2364

20. The last of these twelve kings was named Tālissara. His son founded Kusinārā and reigned there. He and his descendants in that city were also twelve.

21. The last of these twelve kings was named Purinda. His son founded Tāmalitthiya and reigned there. He and his descendants in that city were twelve.

The author gives another extract from the same Great Cause of Learning (Mahā-suta-kārī) counting up the kings in the above five paragraphs and giving 83 as the total number of kings thereof.

22. Of these 83 kings in the above five paragraphs, the last was named Sāgaradeva. His son was Māghadeva (or Magghadeva). He and his descendants reigned in Mithilā until their number became 84,000.

23. The last of these 84,000 kings was named Nimi and he was the Bodhisatta. His son was named Kaḷārajanaka, his son was named Samañkara and his son was named Asoca or Asoka. Their descendants, totalling 84,003, again founded Bārāṇasī and reigned there.

24. The last of these 84,003 kings was named Sīhappati.

1. King Sīhappati's son was King Vijitasena.
2. Vijitasena's son was King Dhammasena.
3. Dhammasena's son was King Nāgasena.
4. Nāgasena's son was King Samiddha.
5. Samiddha's son was King Disampati.
6. Disampati's son was King Reṇu.
7. Reṇu's son was King Kusa.
8. Kusa's son was King Mahā Kusa.
9. Mahā Kusa's son was King Navaraṭṭha.
10. Navaraṭṭha's son was King Dasarāṭṭha.
11. Dasarāṭṭha's son was King Rāma. [1679]
12. Rāma's son was King Vilāraṭṭha.
13. Vilāraṭṭha's son was King Cittaraṃsi.
14. Cittaraṃsī's son was King Ambaraṃsī.

15. Ambarāṃsī's son was King Sujāta.
16. Sujātā's son was King Okkāka.

These sixteen kings reigned in Bārāṇasī.

There were thus 252,556 descendants from Mahā Sammata, the Bodhisatta of the earliest aeon, down to King Okkāka.

The author here gives the final extract from the Great Cause of Learning (Mahā-suta-kārī), which sums up the 84,003 kings contained in 23, the sixteen kings contained in 24 and those counted elsewhere, and arrives at the total number of 252,556, beginning with the Mahā Sammata and ending with King Okkāka.

Herein, since the exposition of the commentary on the Discourse to Ambaṭṭha (Ambaṭṭha-sutta, DN 3) and that of the Discourse about the Perfected One (Muni-sutta, Snp 1.12) state that: “After the 84,000 kings belonging to the lineage of Māghadeva, there occurred three successive rulers, all bearing the name Okkāka,” and that “the third Okkāka had five queens, each with 500 lady attendants,” it should be taken that the Sakyan princes were the descendants of Okkāka III and that the last of the 252,556 kings was this very person, Okkāka III.

The Story of King Okkāka

The wives of King Okkāka, the last of the 252,556 kings, were five: Hatthā, Cittā, Jantū, Jālinī and Visākhā. Each of them had 500 ladies-in-waiting.

The exposition of the Discourse to Ambaṭṭha (Ambaṭṭha-sutta, DN 3) explains that the king was called Okkāka because when he spoke there emanated from his mouth a light as if from a shooting star. Okkā = torch, firebrand in Pāḷi.

It is noteworthy that in Myanmar history such remarkable men as King Kyansittha and King Manūhā of Thaton emitted from their mouths the brilliant light of insignia, or a shooting star, or some other particular radiance of light.

It should not be taken for certain that King Okkāka's city was Bārāṇasī, as the commentary on the Discourse to Ambaṭṭha says that his daughter, the Princess Piya, and King Rāma of Bārāṇasī joined in marriage. The third Okkāka's city could be any city but Bārāṇasī.

Of the five queens, the eldest one, Hatthā, gave birth to four sons: Ukkāmukha, Karakaṇḍu, Hatthinika, Sinisūra, and five daughters: Piyā, Suppiyā, Ānandā, Vijitā, Vijitasenā.

When Queen Hatthā died after giving birth to her children, King Okkāka III made a young, pleasant princess of great beauty his Chief Queen; a son named Jantu was born of her. On the fifth day after his birth, he was dressed in pretty ornaments and was shown to the king. The king was so delighted that he granted a boon to the queen, saying: “Take anything you like!”

After discussing with her relatives, the queen asked that the little son Jantu be made king. The king refused to comply and scolded her: “You wicked one, down with you! You just want harm to my sons!” On every favourable occasion the queen tried to please the king and said: “Your majesty, a monarch should not turn a promise into a lie. You should keep your word.” So saying she repeatedly demanded that kingship be bestowed upon her son.

The king was then compelled to summon his older sons, Ukkāmukha and others, and said with great sorrow: “Dear sons, I have given Jantu’s mother a boon on seeing your little brother. Now, Jantu’s mother has a burning desire to have her son made heir to the throne. Leaving aside my state elephant, state horse and state chariot, take as many elephants, horses and chariots as you want and go and stay away from this city until I die. Come back after my death and take back the kingdom.” [1680] After saying this, the king sent his sons away together with eight ministers.

Ukkāmukha and his elder brothers felt pained and wept bitterly, but they did obeisance to their royal father and said: “Dear father, please forgive our faults if there are any.” They also asked the court ladies for forgiveness. The five sisters requested the king, saying: “Dear father, let us go along with our brothers,” he gave permission and together they went out of the city. They were taken along the journey by their brothers, who, being accompanied by the eight ministers and troops of the fourfold army,<sup>354</sup> departed from the city. A large number of men followed the princes, thinking: “These royal sons will definitely come back and reign on the death of their father. We shall start attending upon them even now.”

The size of the following grew from one league on the first day to two leagues on the second day and three leagues on the third. This caused them to discuss among themselves: “The strength of our troops is so great. If we only wish to fight and occupy the countries around here with such power, no kings or states would dare to put up resistance. But what is the use of taking other kingdoms by force and through violence. There is indeed no profit at all! This Jambudīpa is huge and immense. We shall found a new city in an uninhabited forest region.” After agreeing like this, they headed for the Himālayas and searched for a site to build a city.

The Founding of Kapilavatthu

At that time, our Bodhisatta was a wealthy Brahmin, born of a family which possessed substantial riches and was named Kapila. Renouncing his wealth, he went forth as an ascetic and stayed in a leaf-hut that he built near a lake of clear waters, in a teak forest by the side of the Himālayas.

Learned in the science of earth, the study of signs of the earth and waters (bhūmi-jala), the Bodhisatta Kapila the recluse knew the advantages and disadvantages that were in store throughout the region of 80 cubits underground and 80 cubits above ground. Around the site on which Kapila’s leaf-hut was built, the grass, trees and bushes grew, turning in the right direction, with their trunk-like sprouts stemmed from them facing to the east. When beasts of prey, such as lions and tigers, gave chase to deer and pigs, which were their food, or when snakes and cats gave chase to frogs and rats respectively and reached that spot, they could not pursue and catch them; instead, they all turned back and ran away, for they were threatened and shown hostility by their own respective preys. Seeing all this, Kapila came to note that: “This is the best of all sites, where enemies are subdued.”

When the princes led by Ukkāmukha were searching for a suitable site for their proposed city, they came to the recluse’s leaf-hut. Asked by the recluse about their purpose, they told him of their plan. Knowing of the matter, Bodhisatta Kapila the recluse took pity on them and said: “Princes, the city founded on the site of my hermitage would be the best of all cities throughout Jambudīpa. Among men born in this city, one will emerge able to overwhelm all others, numbering even hundreds or thousands. Therefore, construct a new city on this land of my hermitage. Build a palace on this spot of my residence. If I were to tell you of its pre-eminence, I would say even a low-born son deriving support from this land will become somebody praised for his power, like a Universal Monarch.”

When the princes asked: “Venerable recluse, is not this place still used and occupied by you?” Kapila replied: “Do not bother yourselves thinking that this place is still in use by me. Build a hermitage for me somewhere on an outlying spot and set up a city with your residences here as I have pointed out to you, and name the city Kapilavatthu.”

As has been directed by Kapila the recluse, the four princes headed by Ukkāmukha, and their ministers and troops established a city together with royal palaces and mansions; they also named the city Kapilavatthu and settled there. [1681]

The Beginning of the Sakyas

While they were thus settling at Kapilavatthu, the princes grew old enough to get married. Then the ministers deliberated among themselves, saying: “Sirs, these princes have come of age. If they were near their father King Okkāka III, he would have made these princes and princesses marry. Now the responsibility has come upon us.” After their deliberations, they consulted the princes.

The princes said: “Ministers, there are no princesses here who are equal to us by birth, nor are there princes of matching class for our sisters. If those of unequal birth marry one another, their offspring will become impure either from their paternal side or from their maternal side. This will bring about a destructive mixture of castes (jāti-sambheda). Accordingly, let us put the eldest sister of us nine children in the place of our mother, and let the remaining ones, four brothers and four sisters, join in marriage so as to avoid such a corruption of lineage.” Thus agreeing among themselves, they selected their eldest sister, Princess Piṅgā, to be their mother and married their sisters, making four pairs of husband and wife lest their birth should get impure.

In the course of time, each of the four couples of Okkāka’s sons and daughters thrived with issue. When the king heard of the founding of Kapilavatthu by his children led by Prince Ukkāmukha, of their marriages, not with members of a different family, but among themselves, and of the prosperity of these brother-and-sister couples born of the same parents, the king was so delighted that he spoke out in praise of his children in the midst of his ministers and others:

Able, indeed, are my sons and daughters, men! Lofty and able, indeed, are my sons and daughters!”

As the King used the expression sakyā vata, “able indeed,” in praising them, it was after this very expression sakyā, meaning “able,” that the name Sakyā or Sākiya was given to the descendants of the brothers and sisters led by Ukkāmukha, and it has come to be well known.

The Founding of Koliya

At one time thereafter, the eldest sister, who was most senior to the brother and sister householders, was afflicted with leprosy. There appeared some ulcers on her body.

Thereupon, the princely brothers considered and discussed among themselves thus: “If we were to stay and eat with our sister, who has been stricken with such a horrible skin disease, we will be infected too.” One day, they pretended to go to the garden for amusement, taking their eldest sister Piyā in a chariot. When they came to a forest glade, they had a square ditch dug huge enough to move therein in the different postures of lying, sitting, standing and walking. In the underground chamber of the ditch, they stored all kinds of food and drink and placed their sister in it. They also covered the square ditch with wooden planks to protect her from danger and made grooves along the edges of the planks which served as a roof covered with earth, before they went home to Kapilavatthu.

At about the same time, the King of Bārāṇasī, named Rāma, was suffering from leprosy, too, and his female attendants and other courtiers and retinue became disgusted and horrified. He was, therefore, alarmed and entered a forest after handing over his kingdom to his eldest son. He made a shelter of leaves for himself. Because of his eating fruit and roots, his skin disease soon vanished, and he assumed a golden complexion. While roaming from place to place, he came across a tree with a gigantic trunk with a hollow in it. He created a large room, sixteen cubits in size, in that tree. He had the main door for entrance, windows and a ladder fixed. It was like a small palace chamber such as where he had lived before. [1682]

At night, Rāma made a fire in a huge pan and noted the cries of deer, boar and the like by their direction before he slept. In the morning, he went in that direction to find pieces of the flesh of deer, boars, etc. They were leftovers from the food of lions, leopards, tigers and so on. He simply collected and cooked them for his food and lived in this manner.

One day, a tiger, getting the odour of the princess's body that came from her underground dwelling, which was not far from Rāma's place, scratched the wooden roof and tried to burst it open. The princess was so frightened that she screamed aloud. It was nearing daybreak and Rāma was then sitting on the ground, after making a fire. On hearing the scream and knowing it was indeed a woman's scream, he rushed to the ditch as the day broke and asked: "Who is it that is living in this underground dwelling?" and when he heard the reply: "I am a woman," he asked further: "What is your lineage?" – "Sir, I am a daughter of King Okkāka." – "Come out," said the king. "Sir, I am not able to come out." – "Why?" – "Sir, I have leprosy." The king then asked all about the matter and knowing that the princess did not come out because she was proud of her aristocratic birth, the king let her know of his being a potentate himself by saying: "I too belong to the ruling class." He took the princess out from the underground chamber by means of a ladder and brought her to his place. He gave her the same medicinal drugs that he had taken himself. The princess took them and her affliction abated. She became golden in complexion. By mutual consent, the two lived together as husband and wife.

In due course, the king's consort, Piyā, sixteen times bore twin sons and thus had 32 boys in all. When they grew up, their father, King Rāma, sent them away for a princely education.

One day, a hunter from the king's native Bārāṇasī, while coming to that forest near the Himālaya in search of treasures, encountered Rāma. Recognizing him, the hunter said: "Lord, I know you very well." The king, therefore, enquired all about his kingdom, and while he was doing so, the 32 sons returned. Seeing the boys, the hunter asked: "Great King, who are these boys?" – "They are my sons," said the king. After asking a further question, he came to know of their maternal relatives and thought: "I have now got some information to give the ruler of Bārāṇasī as my gift." So thinking, he returned to the city and told the whole story.

The present King of Bārāṇasī, who was Rāma's own son, was delighted, and in order to bring back his father, visited him accompanied by his fourfold army. He saluted his father very respectfully and made a request: "Dear father, kindly accept the kingship of Bārāṇasī." – "Dear son," replied Rāma, "I have no more desire to become King of Bārāṇasī. I will not return to the city. Instead, remove this tree and build residences and a new city for me here, at this very place of the great jujube (kola) tree." At his command, his son, the King of Bārāṇasī, founded the new city.

As the new city was founded after removing the kola tree on his father's site, it was named Koliya. Since it was founded on the route frequented by tigers, it was also called Tigers' Way (Vyaggha-pajja). Having thus given the city both names, the son, the King of Bārāṇasī, paid respect to his father, King Rāma, and returned home.

As King Rāma and his consort Piyā were residing in the new city of Koliya, Piyā one day told his sons, who had now attained manhood: "Dear sons, your uncles, the Sakyan princes, are reigning in the city of Kapilavattu. The daughters of your uncles dressed themselves and have their hair made up in this manner; their gait and deportment is like this. When they approach bathing places to bathe, catch hold of the princess you like and bring them back here."

In accordance with the mother's instructions, the princes went to the bathing places of the daughters of their uncles, the Sakyan princes, at Kapilavattu and after observing them and choosing from among them, each brought a princess of his liking, after identifying himself and taking her at the moment she let her hair to dry.

On hearing the matter, the Sakyan princes said among themselves: "Dear folks, let it be so. These Koliya princes are scions of our elder sister, thus they are our nephews, our [1683] close relatives." So saying, they did not blame them; as they were pleased, they just kept silent.

From the marriages between the Sakyans and the Koliyans, the lineage came down without any break to the lifetime of the Buddha.

In this way, the growth of the Sakyan descendants took place in purity and worthiness, as they mixed with their own relatives. Since there was no interruption from the time of King Okkāka, the founding head of the Sakyans, down to the time of Prince Siddhattha, the Bodhisatta, they went down in history having a good reputation as an unbroken aristocratic lineage (asambhinna-khattiya).

The Founding of Devadaha

The Sakyan princes living in Kapilavatthu used to go to a big, pleasant and beautiful lake in order to amuse themselves in the water. Because it was the lake of royal sports, it came to be known as Devadaha, Deva implying Sakyan princes as recognized lords, and daha meaning a lake for watery games.

Later on, those Sakyan princes who came to the lake for amusements did not return to Kapilavatthu but built royal lodges near the lake. In due course, the area prospered and became a city itself, earning the name Devadaha after the lake. The Sakyans residing in that city were also named Devadaha-Sakyans after the city.<sup>355</sup>

The Descendants of Ukkāmukha the Sakyan King

The rulers belonging to Kapilavatthu are as follows:

1. Its founder, King Ukkāmukha.<sup>356</sup>
2. His son, King Nipuṇa.
3. His son, King Candimā.
4. His son, King Candamukha.
5. His son, King Sivi.
6. His son, King Sañjaya.
7. His son, King Vessantara, the Bodhisatta.
8. His son, King Jāli.
9. His son, King Sīhavāhana.
10. His son, King Sīhassara.

---

<sup>356</sup> He was called thus because when the king spoke a brilliant light, a sign of authority came out from his mouth like his ancestor, King Okkāka.

These ten Sakyan kings and King Sīhassara's descendants down to Jeyyasena, 82,000 in all, ruled successively in Kapilavatthu in the Sakyan kingdom.

The last of these 82,010 kings, Jeyyasena, had a son and daughter, Sīhahanu and Yasodharā respectively.

At that time, King Ukkāsakka and Queen Yasavatī of Devadaha also had a son and a daughter, Añjana and Kañcanā respectively.

From the marriage of Prince Sīhahanu, son of King Jeyyasena of Kapilavatthu, and Princess Kañcana, daughter of Ukkāsakka of Devadaha, were five sons and two daughters, totalling seven children. The five sons were:

1. Suddhodana.
2. Amitodana.
3. Dhotodana.
4. Sakkodana.
5. Sukkodana.

According to the commentary to the Discourse on the Correct Way to Wander (Sammā-paribbājanīya-sutta, Snp 2.13) the two daughters were:

1. Princess Amittā.
2. Princess Pālitā.

From the marriage of Prince Añjana, son of King Ukkāsakka of Devadaha and Princess Yasodharā, daughter of King Jeyyasena of Kapilavatthu, two sons and two daughters were born, totalling four children. The name of King Añjana is also mentioned as Mahā Suppabuddha. The two sons were Prince Suppabuddha and Prince Daṇḍapāṇi. The [1684] daughters were: 1) Princess Siri Mahā Māyā and 2) Princess Pajāpatī Gotamī.

Prince Suddhodana, son of Sīhahanu, was married to the two daughters of King Añjana: Princess Siri Mahā Māyā and Princess Pajāpatī Gotamī. The elder sister, Siri Mahā Māyā, gave birth to Prince Siddhattha and the younger sister, Pajāpatī Gotamī, gave birth to Princess Rūpanandā and Prince Nanda.

On the authority of this brief statement, there were ten kings descended from King Ukkāmukha, founder of Kapilavatthu.

There were 82,000 kings descended from King Sīhassara, down to Jeyyasena.

Then came King Jeyyasena's son, King Sīhahanu, and

1. Sīhahanu's son, Suddhodana.
2. Suddhodana's son, Prince Siddhattha, the Bodhisatta.

Summing up all these three groups, there were 82,013 rulers, all part of an unbroken lineage of Sakyan kings and reigning in the city of Kapilavatthu.

If the number 82,013 of this line from King Ukkāmukha to Prince Siddhattha the Bodhisatta is added to the aforesaid number 252,556 of the rulers from the primeval Mahā Sammata to Okkāka, the result will be 334,569.

Here, the author gives an extract from Great Cause of Learning (Mahā-suta-kārī, vv. 32-33).

From the marriage of Prince Suppabuddha, son of King Añjana, and Princess Amittā, daughter of King Sīhahanu, were born Princess Bhaddā Kañcanā or Yasodharā and Prince Devadatta.

From the marriage of Prince Siddhattha, the Bodhisatta, and Princess Bhaddā Kañcanā or Yasodharā, daughter of King Suppabuddha of Devadaha and Queen Amittā, was born Prince Rāhula.

Prince Siddhattha, the Bodhisatta, had only one son, Prince Rāhula. In the minor Chronicles, there is some fabrication that Siddhattha's lesser wives gave birth to other sons. But there is no trace of such a statement in older works of Buddhist literature. Let us all, therefore, hold that there was only one son, and that one son was no one other than Rāhula.

The Abolishing of the Era by King Añjana

King Añjana of Devadaha, the Buddha's grandfather, and Siri Mahā Māyā's father, abolished the Goza Era, which was current in his time. On the new moon, of the month of March (Phagguṇa), a Saturday, he abrogated 8,649 years, as required by astrology, and did away with that era, and for its replacement he introduced another era, commencing on the first waxing moon of the month of April (Citta), a Sunday, and founded a new era to be used from that time onwards. That era is referred to as the Great or Mahā Era in later times, and started in 631 BCE.

[Many of the dates in this Chronicle, the author gave according to this era. They have been converted to BCE/CE format in this revised edition.]

Such an account of abrogation of an era is a worldly tradition preserved in historical works. There is neither an occurrence of repeal of an era nor use of such a term as the Sakkarāj era, but such an expression as Koza or Goza in the books is approved in the Buddhist Councils. All this is stated only in secular treatises of astrology and history. These ways of calculation and expression contained in those mundane astrological and historical works have been borrowed in Myanmar by successive learned scholars throughout the Bagan period, Pinya Period, and so on, for the benefit and convenience in recording the number of years and the date of an event.

Orthography of Sakkarāj, Sakarāj and Koza, Goza

Much has been written about the orthography of Sakkarāj, Sakarāj and Koza, Goza by Monywa Zetawun Sayādaw in his Light on the All-Seeing one (Samanta-cakkhu-dīpanī, vol. 2).

The Sayādaw's opinion in this connection is as follows: [1685] “Many ways of writing these terms have been met with. They are only useful for recording and calculating years. Any incorrect spelling in no way affects supermundane matters; any correct spelling would not help gain release from Saṃsāra, as it is in no sense an object in acquiring insight and right view. For these reasons, it is rational to hold that each form of orthography has its own merit.” Such a decisive statement is very satisfactory.

In short, Sakkarāj is so called because, as a system of chronological notation to be reckoned from a certain date, it is founded by kings who are able to protect the people; Sakarāj is so-called because such a founding was accomplished by a Saka King. Koza or Goza signifies a period of time marked by the movements of the sun and the moon.

Sakkarāj comes from sakka meaning “able” and rāja, “king;” hence Sakkarāj, an era founded by a king who is able to give protection to his subjects.

Alternatively, Sakarāj derives from Sakarājā, Saka being the name of a people and rāja, “king;” hence, Sakarājā means an era introduced by a Saka king.

As for Koza and Goza, ko is a term for the sun and go a word for both the sun and the moon; za is used in the sense of “going about.” The time spent in making a complete round of the Zodiac by the sun and the moon is called a year of Koza or Goza. It is also written as Gocar.

The Terms Kālīyuga and Sakkarāj

In the expression: “Such and such year Kālīyuga Sakkarāj,” by putting Kālīyuga as an adjective before Sakkarāj, Kālīyuga and Sakkarāj we can see that they are different in meaning. The expression means: “The year of a certain era, in the length of time beginning with the Kālīyuga.”

Of the pair of the evolution and devolution periods called inclusive periods (antara-kappa), an evolution period consists of four ages: Katayuga, Tretayuga, Dvāparayuga and Kālīyuga. There are waxing and waning periods of these four ages (yuga). When these periods complete 60 times, an evolution period comes to an end. Mundane treatises say the same is true of a devolving period. Of the four ages, the first one, Katayuga, has 1,728,000 years; then Tretayuga which has 1,296,000 years; it is followed by Dvāparayuga of 864,000 years. Finally follows Kālīyuga of 432,000 years. The total number of these four yugas is 4,320,000.

Note that if the years of the Kālīyuga are doubled, the result is the years of the Dvāparayuga; if tripled, the years of the Tretayuga; if quadrupled, the years of the Katayuga.

During the Katayuga years, all four quarters of beings, the whole people, observe righteousness as though living things stand on four legs. During the Tretayuga, three quarters of them observe righteousness as though they stand on three legs, one quarter does not. During the Dvāparayuga, one half do so, and the other half do not. During the Kālīyuga, only one quarter does and three quarters do not.

Our Teacher, Gotama the Buddha, rose in the 2,570th year of the Kālīyuga, states the Ancient History of Gotama (Gotama-purāṇa). In the first chapter (kaṇḍa), it says:

Kālerārabhato suññā, satta pañca-duke gate, samvacchare babhuva ve, Dhamma-vido Gotamābhidho.

2,570 years after the commencement of Kālīyuga, there appeared the one named Gotama, who comprehended the Dhamma.

If one desires to know the present Buddhist year and the present Kālīyuga, one can take the present year in the Myanmar era, which corresponds to the Sakarāj era and add 1,182 years; the answer is the year of the Buddhist era.

To get the Kālīyuga year, take the present Buddhist year and add 2,650;<sup>357</sup> the total is the present Kālīyuga year.

In short, when one writes “in the year so and so Kālīyuga Sakkarāj,” one’s idea is the year so and so of Sakkarāj in the age of Kālīyuga. The Kālīyuga lasts 432,000 years as has been said before. Sakkarāj is the calculation of years as determined by royal [1686] promulgation.

Again, an extract is given by the author from the Great Cause of Learning (Mahā-suta-kārī) concerning the four ages and the rise of the Buddha in the year 2,570 of the Kālīyuga.

The Voice Having Eight Qualities like a Brahma

King Dhammāsoka’s wife, Asandhimittā, asked the Saṅgha with reference to the sweetness of the Buddha’s voice: “Is there anyone in this world whose voice is similar to the Buddha’s?” The answer given by the Saṅgha was: “There is the voice of a cuckoo (karavika) bird which is like the Buddha’s.” Again, the queen asked: “Where do these birds live?” The Saṅgha replied: “They live in the Himavanta.”

The queen then said to King Asoka: “I would like to see a cuckoo, lord.” The king sent a golden cage with the command: “A cuckoo shall come into this cage!” The cage flew and stopped before a cuckoo. Considering: “This cage came with the command of the king; I am not in a position to remain here against the king’s command,” the bird entered the cage, which flew back and stood in the king’s presence.

Although they now had the bird, nobody was able to make it cry. The king asked: “Men, how could we make it cry?” The ministers replied: “These cuckoos cry, Great King, when they see their fellow birds.” Asoka accordingly had mirrors placed around the bird.

When the bird saw its own image in the mirrors, thinking that his relations had come, it uttered a sweet cry, slowly and pleasantly, like the musical note that comes out from a ruby flute. As if intoxicated by the cuckoo king's voice, Queen Asandhimittā and the citizens of Pāṭaliputta were wildly pleased. They revelled as though they were dancing.

<sup>357</sup> [The author(s) gave the date 2,570 here. But as was stated above, after 2,570 years, Gotama appeared, or was born. The Buddhist era begins not at his birth but 80 years later, at his passing. Therefore, the correct date for the Kālī-yuga is the Buddhist era plus 2,650 years.]

Then the queen reflected: “Even the voice of this cuckoo, which is just a bird, is so sweet. What would the voice of the Buddha be like, the highest in glory? There could have been no limit to its sweetness!”

Visualizing the Buddha, the queen became filled with joy (pīti). Without giving up that joy, she developed insight (vipassanā), stage by stage, and together with her 700 ladies-in-waiting, she attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti) fruition.

On 1: The Thirty-Two Major Marks

Explanations of the Marks

[This section on the explanation of the marks has been moved here from the body of the text.]

1. The mark of the level soles of the feet which, when put on the ground, touch it fully and squarely.

When other persons set foot on the ground, the tip of the foot or the heel or the outer part of the sole touches the ground first, but the middle portion of the sole does not. So also when the foot is lifted from the ground, the tip or the heel or the outer part of the sole comes up first.

But when a great man like the Bodhisatta puts down his foot on the ground, the entire sole touches it evenly the way the sole of a soft golden shoe does when placed on the ground. In the same manner, when his foot is raised, the different parts of the foot come up simultaneously.

In case the noble Bodhisatta wants to set his foot on uneven ground, with holes, trenches, deep crevices, ditches, pits, banks and the like, all the concave parts of the earth rise at that very moment, like an inflated leather bag and the ground becomes even, like the face of a drum. [235]

If he lifted his feet with intent to put it down at a distance, even the royal Mount Meru would appear underneath the sole of his feet in a moment.

2. The mark of the figures in the 108 circles on the sole of each foot together with the wheel having 1,000 spokes, the rim, the hub and all other characteristics.

The figures in the 108 circles are:

1. A large spear.
2. A house of splendour (srivatsa).
3. A buttercup flower.
4. Three horizontal lines on the throat.
5. A head ornament.
6. A laid out meal.
7. A royal couch.
8. A hook.
9. A palace.
10. An arched gateway.
11. A white umbrella.
12. A double-edged sword.
13. A round fan of toddy palm-leaf.
14. A fan of a peacock's tail.
15. A head-band like forehead.
16. A ruby stone.
17. A lustrous eating bowl.
18. A festoon of jasmine flowers.
- 19-23. The five kinds of lotus: blue, red, white, Paduma and Puṇḍarīka.
24. A jar full of mustard seeds, etc.
25. A bowl full of mustard seeds, etc.
26. An ocean.
27. A Cakkavāḷa mountain.
28. The Himālayas.
29. Mount Meru.
- 30-31. The disc of the sun and the disc of the moon.

Miscellaneous Topics – 2380

32. The planets.
- 33-36. The four island-continents with 2,000 minor surrounding islands.
37. A Universal Monarch with flowers and seven treasures.
38. A white conch with a clockwise spiral shell.
39. A couple of golden carps.
40. A missile weapon.
- 41-47. The seven great rivers.
- 48-54. The seven surrounding mountain ranges.
- 55-61. The seven rivers between the seven mountain ranges.
62. A Garuḷa king.
63. A crocodile.
64. A banner.
65. A streamer.
66. A golden palanquin.
67. A yak-tail fly-flap.
68. Kelāsa, the silver mountain.
69. A lion king.
70. A tiger king.
71. A Valāhaka horse king.
72. An Uposatha elephant king or a Chaddānta elephant king.
73. Bāsukī, the Nāga king.
74. A golden goose (haṃsa) king.
75. A bull king.
76. Erāvaṇa, the elephant king.
77. A golden sea-monster.
78. A golden boat.
79. A Brahma king.

80. A milch cow with her calf.
81. A Kinnara couple, male and female.
82. A Karavīka bird king.
83. A peacock king.
84. A crane king.
85. A ruddy-goose (cakka-vāka) king.
86. A pheasant or partridge (jīvaṃ-jīvaka) king.
- 87-92. The six planes of celestial sensual existence.
- 93-108. The sixteen planes of the form worlds.

These are the figures in the 108 circles on the Bodhisatta's soles.

Then the author quotes the enumeration of these figures composed in verse form by the Taunggin Sayādaw, head of the Saṅgha, as it appeared in his Light on the Hidden Meaning (Gulhattha-dīpa, Vol I). We do not translate it, for it will be a repetition.

3. The mark of the projecting heels.

By this is meant all-round developed heels. To elaborate: With ordinary people, the forepart of the foot is long; the calf stands right above the heel; and so the heel looks cut and hewn. This is not the case with the noble Bodhisatta. The sole of his foot may be divided into four equal parts, of which, the two front ones form the foremost sector of the sole. The calf stands on the third part. The heel lies on the fourth, looking like a round top placed on a red rug as though it has been treated on a lathe.

As for ordinary people, since the calf is situated on the top of the heel, the heel looks ugly, as though it were cut and hewn unsymmetrically. In the case of a Bodhisatta, however, the calf is on the third part of the sole. The rounded heel which occupies the fourth sector and which is conspicuous against the reddish skin is accordingly elongated and graceful.

4. The mark of the long and tapering fingers and toes.

With ordinary people, some fingers and toes are long and others short. Their girths also differ from one another. But this is not so in the case of the Bodhisatta. His fingers and toes are both long and even. They are stout at the base and taper towards the tip, resembling sticks of realgar made by kneading its powder with some thick oil and rolling it into shape.

5. The mark of the soft and tender palms and soles.

The palms and soles of a Bodhisatta are very soft and tender, like a layer of cotton wool ginned 100 times and dipped in clarified butter. Even at an old age they never change but remain soft, tender and youthful as when young. [236]

6. The mark of the regular fingers and toes like finely rounded golden rail posts of a palace window; there is a narrow space between one finger and another as well as between one toe and another.

The four fingers – excluding the thumb – and the five toes of a Bodhisatta are of equal length.<sup>358</sup> The Prince's eight fingers of both left and right hands are of equal length; so are his ten toes of both left and right feet. Accordingly, the somewhat curved lines on the joints taking the shape of barley seeds show no variation in length. In fact, they seem to form a row of curves, one touching another. The marks of these barley seeds are like uniformly and vertically fixed balusters. Therefore his fingers and toes resemble a palace window with a golden lattice created by master carpenters.

7. The mark of the slightly higher and dust-free ankles.

The ankles of ordinary people lie close to the back of the feet. Therefore their soles appear to be fastened with cramps, small nails and snags; they cannot be turned at will. This being the case, the surface of the soles of their feet is not visible when they walk. The ankles of a Bodhisatta are not like this, they are about two or three fingers' length above the soles like the neck of a watering jar. Therefore, the upper part of the body from the navel upwards maintains itself motionlessly, like a golden statue placed on a boat; only the lower part of the body moves, and the soles turn round easily. The onlookers from the four directions, front, back, left and right, can see well the surface of his soles.

When an elephant walks, the surface of the sole can be seen only from behind. But when the Bodhisatta walks his soles can be seen from all four quarters.

8. The mark of the legs like those of an antelope (eṇi).

---

Let the reader feel his calf and he will find the hardness of his shin bone at the front and see the muscles loosely dangling on the back. But the Bodhisatta's calves are different; like the husk that covers the barley or the paddy seed, the muscles evenly encase the shin bone making the leg round and beautiful; it is thus like that of an antelope.

9. The mark of the long arms which can touch the knees while standing and without stooping.

Ordinary persons may be hunch-backed or bandy-legged or both hunch-backed and bandy-legged. Those who have bent backs have no proper, proportionate frame because the upper part of the body is shorter than the lower part, nor do those with bandy legs, because the lower part of the body is shorter than the upper part. It means that the former are shorter in their upper part and the latter are shorter in the lower part of the body. Because of the improper, disproportionate development of the frames, they can never touch their knees with their palms unless they lean forward. It is not so in the case of a Bodhisatta. Neither the upper part of his body is bent, nor the lower part crooked; both the upper and the lower parts are properly and proportionately formed. And so, even while standing and without stooping, he can touch and feel the knees with both palms of his hands.

10. The mark of the male organ that is concealed in a sheath like that of a Chaddanta elephant.

The male organ of a Bodhisatta is hidden in a lotus-like sheath, bearing resemblance to that of the king of bulls or to that of the king of elephants, and so forth. It is the organ that has a cover as if it were placed in a felt, velvet or thick-cloth pouch that is made to measure.

11. The mark of the yellow and bright complexion which is like pure gold (siṅgī-nikkha).

Bodhisattas naturally have a complexion of smooth solid gold, like a golden statue which has been polished with the powder of red oxide of lead and rubbed with the canine tooth of a leopard and treated with red ochre.

With reference to this characteristic, even though the Pāli texts and their commentaries state: ... suvanṇa-vañṇo kañcana-sannibhattaco ... in which suvanṇa and kañcana mean ordinary gold, the translation by noble teachers into Myanmar [237] of these words is: "... like pure gold (siṅgī- nikkha) ...” This is due to the fact that the words: Siṅgī-nikkha-suvaṇṇo meaning: “Having the colour of pure gold,” is contained in the verses uttered by Sakka in the guise of a youth when the Bodhisatta entered the city of Rājagaha for alms food, and also due to the fact that siṅgī stands out as the best kind of gold. Among the different kinds of gold used by people, rasa-viddha gold is superior to yuttika gold, ākaruppaññā gold is superior to rasa-viddha gold, the gold used by Devas is superior to ākaruppaññā gold, among the variety of gold used by Devas, sāta-kumbha gold is superior to cāmī-kara gold; jambu-nada gold is superior to sāta-kumbha gold; and finally siṅgī gold is superior to that jambu-nada gold. So it is said in the commentary of the Stories about Heavenly Mansions (Vimāna-vatthu, PvA 1.1, PTS 8), and the sub-commentary of the chapter in the Great Chapter (Mahā-khandhaka, Vin Mv 1) of the Vinaya.

12. The mark of the smooth skin that is so smooth that no dust can cling to it.

The skin of the noble one is so soft and smooth in texture that both fine and gross dust cannot cling to it. Just as a drop of water, which falls on a lotus leaf, cannot remain on it but falls away, even so all the dust that touches a Bodhisatta slips off instantly.

If he is thus dust-free and clean, why does he wash his legs and hands or bathe? He does so for the purpose of adjusting himself to the temperature of the moment, for the purpose of enhancing the merit of the supporters, and for the purpose of setting an example by entering the monastery after cleansing himself as required by the disciplinary rules so that his disciples might follow his example.

13. The mark of the body-hairs, one in each pore of the skin.

Other people have two, three or more body-hairs growing in each pore. But this is different in the case of a Bodhisatta, only a single hair grows in each pore.

14. The mark of the body-hairs with their tips curling upwards, as if they were looking up at the Bodhisatta’s face in devotion.

The Bodhisatta’s body-hairs, one in each pore, are blue like the colour of a collyrium stone. These hairs curl upwards clockwise three times as if they were paying homage by looking up at the Bodhisatta’s face, fresh and graceful like a new lotus bloom.

15. The mark of the upright body like a Brahma's.

Just as a Brahma's body which never inclines forward or backward or sideways even slightly but assumes an upright attitude, so is the Bodhisatta's body which is perfectly straight upwards. He has a body which is tender and beautiful, as though it were cast in pure gold.

As for ordinary people, their bodies generally lean or bend in one way or the other at one of these three positions: the nape, the waist and the knees. If bent at the waist, the body leans backwards and if bent at the nape and the knees, the body stoops forwards. Some very tall people tend to lean sideways, either left or right. Those who lean backwards, have their faces turned upwards, as if they were observing and counting the constellations in the sky; those who bend down, have their faces turned downwards, as if they were studying the characteristics of the earth. Some people are lean and emaciated like spikes or sticks because they don't have sufficient flesh and blood.

Bodhisattas, however, are not like this, as they have upright bodies, they resemble a golden post of the arched gateway erected at the entrance to a celestial city.

In this matter, such features as an upright body like a Brahma's and some other characteristics of a Great Man are not yet fully manifest during infancy to an ordinary person of average intelligence. But, by examining the marks, features, and conditions as they existed at the time of his birth, the learned Brahmins, because of their expert knowledge in the Vedic mantras of the Suddhāvāsa Brahmas, have come to believe: "When the prince grows older and gains great intelligence, the characteristics of his body, such as being upright like a Brahma's and so forth, will [238] become manifest and seen by all." Therefore they pondered and reckoned and offered their readings as though the marks were then already fully visible to them.

16. The mark of the fullness of flesh in seven places of the body: the upper parts of the feet, the backs of the hands, the shoulders and the neck.

Ordinary persons have their insteps, backs of the palms, etc., where the arteries manifest, swollen and distinct in wavy patterns and like a network. The bone-joints are also visible at the edges of the shoulders and also in the neck. On seeing them, therefore other people would think that they are like Petas, who dwell in the cemetery and have ugly shoulders, protruding neck-bones and swollen arteries.

It is not so in the case of the noble Bodhisatta. There is fullness of the flesh in the aforesaid seven places. Fullness of flesh does not mean that the flesh has puffed up to the point of ugliness. It is the fullness which is just elegant, which just makes the arteries not conspicuous and the bones not protruding. Therefore, the Bodhisatta has no arteries puffed up in the insteps of the feet and on the backs of the palms, and also no bones thrusting out at the edges of the shoulders and in the neck. He has a neck that is like a small well-polished golden drum. Because of the fullness and elegance in the said seven places of the body, he appears in the eyes of the onlookers like a wonderfully carved stone image or like an exquisitely painted portrait.

17. The mark of the full and well-developed body like a lion's front portion.

The front portion of the lion is fully developed but its back part is not. Thus, the back part is not given as an example here, and the comparison is only with the forepart. Though this example is given, it is not that there are such unseemly features in the Bodhisatta's body as are found in the lion's: bending, rising, sinking, and protruding and so on in certain parts of the body. In fact, the limbs of the Bodhisatta are as they should be, long where they should be long, short where they should be short, stout where they should be stout, lean where they should be lean, broad where they should be broad, round where they should be round; and thus his limbs are the most becoming and the most beautiful. The likeness of the Bodhisatta's body cannot be created by any master craftsmen or even by renowned artists.

18. The mark of the full and well-developed back of the body, extending from the waist to the neck like a golden plank, without any trace of the spinal furrow in the middle.

This briefly means that the back of a Bodhisatta is particularly developed and magnificent. The flesh over the ribs, the flesh on both left and right sides of the back and the flesh in the middle of the back are well formed and graceful from the waist up to the neck.

The surface of the back of ordinary people appears split into two sections. The spine and its flesh in the middle remain sunk and depressed or curved; or it comes out and becomes bulging. The flesh on either side of the backbone appears convex and straight, like a split bamboo placed in a prone position. The flesh at the edges of the back is thin and slight.

As for the Bodhisatta, the flesh on either side and at the end of his spine, on his ribs, on the portion underneath his shoulders and along the middle of his spine, are all fully developed from his waist to the neck, without any traces of a long cut in the middle. And so, the surface of his back is full with layers of flesh, like an erected plank of gold.

19. The mark of the symmetrically proportioned body like the circular spread of a banyan tree, for his height and the compass of his arms are of equal measurement.

Just as a banyan tree with its trunk and branches measuring 50 or 100 cubits has its vertical length and its horizontal length equal, even so the Bodhisatta's height and the length of his arms when stretched out sideways are of equal measurement which is four [239] cubits. The height and the length of the two arms of other people are generally not equal.

20. The mark of the proportionate and rounded throat.

Some people have necks, which are long like that of a crane; others have necks which are curved like that of a paddy-bird; still others have necks which are pudgy, swollen and large like that of a pig. When they speak, veins around the necks puff up, looking like netting, and their voices come out feebly and faintly. The neck of a Bodhisatta is like a well-rounded small drum. When he speaks, the network of veins is not visible. His voice is loud and booming like the sound of thunder or a drum.

21. The mark of 7,000 capillaries with their tips touching one another at the throat and diffusing throughout the body the taste of food, even if it is as small as a sesame seed.

The Bodhisatta's 7,000 capillaries, whose upper ends interconnect forming a group, lie at his throat. They appear as though they are waiting to send down the taste of all the swallowed food throughout his body. When the food, even as small as the size of a sesame seed, is placed on the tip of his tongue and then eaten, its taste diffuses all over his body. That was why the Bodhisatta was able to sustain his body with a mere grain of rice or with just a palmful of bean soup, etc., during his six-year long practice of austerities (dukkara-cariyā). Since it is not so in the case of ordinary people, the nutritious essence of all the food eaten by them cannot spread all over their bodies. For this reason, they are much exposed to diseases.

22. The mark of the lion-like chin somewhat like that of one who is about to smile.

This mainly means to draw a comparison only with the lower chin of the lion. Only the lower jaws of a lion have fullness, his upper jaw is not so well formed. Both the upper and lower jaws of a Bodhisatta, however, are full like the lion's lower jaw. They are also comparable to the moon which rises on the twelfth of the bright fortnight.

23. The mark of the teeth numbering exactly 40.

What is meant is that the Bodhisatta has 20 upper teeth and 20 lower teeth, making a complete set of 40 teeth. As for ordinary people, those who are said to have a complete set of teeth possess only 32 in all. The Bodhisatta, however, excels others by having 40 teeth, 20 upper and 20 lower.

24. The mark of the teeth set proportionately in a row.

Ordinary people have some teeth protruding and some short and depressed, thus forming an irregular set. On the contrary, the Bodhisatta has even teeth, like pieces of mother-of-pearl uniformly cut by a saw.

25. The mark of the teeth touching one another with no space in between.

Ordinary people have teeth which are separated from one another, or which have gaps between one another, like those of a crocodile. Therefore, when they eat and chew fish, meat, etc., the gaps are filled with particles of food that get stuck in them. This is not so in the case of the Bodhisatta. His teeth stand like diamonds properly fixed in a series on a plank of gold or on coral.

26. The mark of the four canine teeth white and brilliant as the morning star.

Some canine teeth of ordinary people are in a decaying state, thus they are blackened or discoloured. But the Bodhisatta's four canine teeth are extremely white, and are endowed with the kind of brilliance which surpasses that of the morning star.

In this connection, it may be asked as to how the learned Brahmins knew the characteristics relating to these teeth, when in fact the teeth had not appeared yet in the new-born Bodhisatta. The answer is: The learned Brahmins, who read the body-marks on the authority of their brahmanical books, observed the likely place where the teeth would grow, and in anticipation of what would certainly take place [240] on the Bodhisatta's coming of age, they made their prediction as though the teeth had already grown.

Here something about the treatise on the marks of a great man will again be told as given in the commentary on the Discourse to Ambaṭṭha (Ambaṭṭha-sutta, DN 3) and others. On the eve of the appearance of a Buddha, the Brahmas of the Suddhāvāsa abode inserted the science of the prediction in the Vedic books, proclaiming that “these form the predictions about the Buddhas,” they gave instructions in the Vedas under the guise of Brahmins.

In the work on the marks of a Great Man that contain the predictions about the Buddhas, the physical marks of those who would become Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, chief disciples, the great disciples, the mother and father of a Buddha, his noble attendants and a Universal Monarch are mentioned completely. Therefore, the description of the marks of a great man directly occurs in these ancient Vedic texts.

But after the Buddha's attainment of Parinibbāna, the treatise on the marks of a Great Man that came into existence by virtue of the Buddha's glory gradually disappeared, starting with one or two verses, in the same way as the light generated by the sun gradually disappears after sunset.

27. The mark of the long, flat and tender tongue.

The tongues of other people may be thick; they may be small, short, rough or uneven. Contrasting with them, the Bodhisatta's tongue is very soft, long, broad and beautiful. The characteristics of the Buddha's tongue could not be seen easily by those wishing to study them after his becoming a Buddha. So, in order to dispel the doubts of the youths, Ambaṭṭha, Uttara and others, who had come to investigate them, the Buddha demonstrated the softness of his tongue by curling and rolling it round to look like a hard pin, or to look like a rolled food coupon, and then by stroking with it the two sides of the nose; he demonstrated its great length by stroking with it the passage of the two ears; he demonstrated its breath by covering with it the whole surface of the forehead right up to the edge of the hair. The tongues of ordinary people cannot come out from the mouth more than one inch.

28. The mark of the voice having eight qualities as a Brahma's.

Miscellaneous Topics – 2390

Other people have voices which are intermittent, cracked and unpleasant like the caw of a crow. In contrast with them, the Bodhisatta is endowed with a Brahma-like voice. The Brahma's voice is pure and clear because it is not affected by bile or phlegm. So also the Bodhisatta's organs of articulation, such as the throat, palate, etc., are purified and cleansed by virtue of his accumulated deeds of merit. Because of such purity and cleanliness, the sound that originates at the navel emerges with clarity, and possesses eight qualities, which are:

1. Distinctness.
2. Intelligibility.
3. Sweetness.
4. Pleasantness.
5. Roundedness.
6. Compactness, it does not go beyond the audience.
7. Deepness, it is not shallow but forceful.
8. Resonance.

What is in fact extraordinary, marvellous and astonishing about this voice is that it is 100 times, maybe, 1,000 times sweeter and more pleasant than the extremely melodious voice of a cuckoo (karavīka). To elaborate: The cry of the cuckoo is slow, drawling, long-protracted and pleasant; it is full, compact and sweet. While sitting on an upper branch of a tree, it warbles, and then it moves onto a lower branch; yet it is able to hear the sound it has made while on the upper branch: so slow and pleasant is its cry.

Having cut open a luscious ripe mango by biting with its beak and drinking the juice that [241] flows out, the cuckoo warbles; then the four legged animals get intoxicated with the cuckoo's sound, as though they were rendered unconscious by drunkenness, and begin to gambol with great delight. Other quadrupeds too, that have gone to the grazing ground and are eating and chewing the grass, forget the food in their mouth and stand still, listening to the sound from the cuckoo.

Small animals, such as deer, antelopes, etc., who are on the run in fear, fleeing for life as they are chased in great haste by beasts of prey, such as lions, leopards and tigers, having forgotten the danger to their lives, stop running only to listen to the cuckoo's voice without lifting up the foot that has been put down and without putting down the foot that has been lifted up. In the same way, the wild beasts who have been chasing to pounce on their prey become unaware of the food which they are about to eat, stop chasing and listen only to the cuckoo's cry. Birds flying in the sky spread their wings and stop flying to listen. Fish in the water also keep their hearing organs steady and stop to listen to the song of the cuckoo (see the commentary to Bv 78; PTS 60).<sup>359</sup>

29. The mark of the very clear blue eyes.

This does not mean to say that both eyes of a Bodhisatta are blue all over. The expression is made as a general statement. In fact, where they should be blue, they have the colour of a blue pea (aparājita) flower; where they should be yellow and golden, they are like the colour of the champa (kaṇikāra) flower; where they should be red, they are like the colour of the noon (bandhuka) flower; where they should be white, they are like the colour of the morning star; where they should be black, they are like the colour of black beads. The eyes of a Bodhisatta bear resemblance to an open window in a golden mansion – the window that has the motif of a lion made of rubies at its base. Or, according to the sub-commentary on the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra), the likeness is that of a palace window that has a lion's figure made of rubies and fixed at its bottom on the golden wall.

30. The mark of the very soft and tender eyelashes like a new-born calf's.

This particular mark is termed eyelashes like a cow (gopakhuma-lakkhaṇa) in the texts. The soft and tender eyelashes refer to the whole eye comprising the eye lashes and other parts of the eye. As with all kinds of calves, the eye of a black calf is thick and turbid. That of a red calf is particularly clear and bright. Here in the case of the soft and tender eyelashes, it signifies the eyes of the new born red calf. The eyes of ordinary people are not perfect. Like the eyes of elephants, rats or crows some have protruding eyes, and others have eyes with deep sunken eye-sockets. The Bodhisatta's eyes are different. They are like thoroughly washed and polished ruby stones and have soft and smooth tender, fresh, bluish eyelashes growing in a row. This mark of the entire eye is characterized by the eyelashes.

Miscellaneous Topics – 2392

This mark is in effect a description of the whole eye with reference to the eyelashes which form only a part of the eye. What is meant is that the Bodhisatta had the eyes which are not protruding, nor sunken but are clear like ruby stones kept well-washed and polished, with eyelashes which are soft, smooth, tender, fresh and bluish, growing in a row like those of a newly-born red-coloured calf.

31. The mark of the hair between the two eyebrows (uṇṇa-loma).

This hair grows gracefully in the middle of the two eyebrows, directly above the ridge of the nose and at the centre of the forehead. It is pure all over, like the morning star. It is as soft as the cotton wool ginned and refined 100 times and dipped in clarified butter. It is white as the colour of silk-cotton (simbalī). When it is stretched from the tip with one's hand, it is two cubits long. When it is released from the hand, it coils back clockwise with the tip curling upwards. It is of a beauty that attracts and commands veneration of every onlooker, like a silver star studded on a pure gold plate, or like pure milk flowing out of a golden vessel, or the morning star in the sky that reflects by the sunlight at dawn.

32. The mark of the thin layer of flesh that appears by nature like a gold headband on the forehead.

What is meant is that the Bodhisatta has a perfect forehead as well as a perfect head. [242] The thin layer of the flesh on the forehead of the Bodhisatta covers the whole of it, rising from end to end, from the top part of the right ear to the left. This particular layer of flesh being soft, golden in colour, lustrous and extensive on the entire forehead is graceful like a gold band fastened to a royal forehead. In fact, the gold band on a king's forehead, or the royal insignia, is an imitation of the forehead of a Bodhisatta which is used as a sign of royalty by kings who have no such natural feature.

The head of the Bodhisatta is perfect in all aspects. Unlike the Bodhisatta's, the heads of ordinary people are imperfect. Some look like a monkey's, as though they were broken in two parts. Others seem to have cracks. Still others have so little flesh that they appear as skulls just covered by the skin. There are also heads disproportionately like a gourd, and there are still others which are curved at the back or protruding with the back of the head bulging. In contrast with them, the Bodhisatta has a head of perfect fullness like a golden baluster, as if it had been carved out with a round chisel to make it round, smooth and beautiful.

This 32nd mark is mentioned in the text as uṇhīsa-sīsa. Its meaning can be taken in two ways: having a head which looks as though it were wrapped by a thin layer of flesh on the forehead; or having a round splendid head like a headband made by an expert. Because of its dual meaning, the explanations of both the perfect forehead and the perfect head are given here. The deeds (kamma) and other factors that bring about these 32 major marks are separately discussed next.

The Deeds That Caused the Thirty-Two Marks

Since it is said in the sub-commentary to the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra) that only the explanation that deals with the four points, namely: 1) The meritorious deed (kamma); 2) the power of the deed (kamma-sarikkhaka); 3) the mark (lakkhaṇa); and 4) the advantages of the mark (lakkhaṇānisamsa), of each of the 32 marks of a Great Man is a well-defined one, the meaning of each of these four points will be briefly given first. Of these four points:

1. The meritorious deed (kamma) means the meritorious deed done in the past with an intention to attain Buddhahood, bringing about the major mark concerned.
2. The power of the deed (kamma-sarikkhaka) means the power or ability of the mark that appears in accordance with the deed.
3. The mark (lakkhaṇa) means any of the 32 major marks, such as level soles, the 108 sole-figures, etc., acquired in the present life on account of the past meritorious deeds.
4. The advantages of the mark (lakkhaṇānisamsa) means the remote or subsequent effect of the past meritorious deeds which cause the appearance of the mark.

For example, the Bodhisatta accumulates merit during his former lives, so firmly and resolutely that nobody else can hold them back or destroy them. On account of that accumulation of merit, he also enjoys divine bliss which excels others in ten respects. When he is reborn as a human being, he wins the mark of his level feet, resembling golden footwear. As he has won that mark, he is able to stand up and walk steadfastly; nobody else, whether a human, a Deva or Brahma, can move him or make him unsteady. The merits also give him this subsequent effect: He is unshaken by such internal defiling enemies as greed, hate [1687] and delusion and also by two external kinds, those who oppose him openly and those who do so but not openly.

Just as carrying a vessel full of water means carrying the water in it, even so, speaking of a sign with power signifies speaking of that very power. Therefore, the exposition of the marks (lakkhaṇa) and the exposition of the subsequent power of the marks (kamma-sarikkhaka) are found similar to each other in the commentary on the Discourse about the 32 Characteristics (Lakkhaṇa-sutta, DN 30).

The undisturbed and determined effort, put into performing good works in past existences, brings the Bodhisatta not only the mark of the level soles but, as if it were not enough, also brings him the remote and subsequent effect, which is the ability to remain unharmed and undisturbed by his foes within and without; this subsequent and remote effect is the advantages of the mark (lakkhaṇānisamsa).

Now with reference to the Bodhisatta's major signs, those causal deeds of the past and other things will be described briefly as stated in the Discourse about the 32 Characteristics, in a language easy to read and understand.

The Level Soles

The Bodhisatta performed extraordinary deeds of merit in his numerous past existences, so firmly and resolutely that nobody else could hold them back or destroy them. On account of those meritorious deeds, he enjoyed divine bliss in the Deva realm, excelling other Devas in ten respects: longevity, beauty, happiness, authority, retinue and an abundance of divine sense objects: sight, sound, smell, taste and touch. Reborn again in the human world, he acquired the major mark of “the level soles like golden footwear.” Because he was endowed with that mark, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch (Cakka-vatti), possessing the seven treasures and ruling the four continents as he did in the life of the Universal Monarch Mahā Sudassana. As the subsequent effect, he would also have enjoyed immunity from harm done to him by any human foes. After renouncing the world in his last existence as Prince Siddhattha, he attained omniscience and became a Perfectly Self-Awakened One, Lord of the Three Worlds.

As the subsequent effect, his benefits could not be stopped, harmed or endangered by the hostilities brought about by the internal defiling enemies, such as greed, hate and delusion, or by external ones, be he an ascetic, Brahmin, Deva, Māra or Brahma, who opposed him openly or not openly.

Herein, the aggregate of his past meritorious deeds done so firmly and resolutely that nobody else can check and destroy them is 1) the meritorious deed (kamma). The state of the level soles of the feet marking his deeds of merit is 3) the mark (lakkhaṇa). His ability to stand up and walk steadfastly as the immediate effect of his meritorious deeds is 2) the power of the deed (kamma-sarikkhaka). The ability inherent in the mark, forming the effect, agrees thus with the power inherent in the meritorious act serving as the cause; such a corresponding nature is called the power of the deed (kamma-sarikkhaka), the nature of which is in agreement with the meritorious deed (kamma).

Here, the author reproduces, for the readers to learn by heart, the verses composed by one Sayādaw U Ghosita of Mandalay South. The theme is the 32 signs of a Great Man. Here, the verses describe the first sign, and each of the remaining verses similarly follows a paragraph in prose by the author.

The 108 Circles with Figures on the Soles

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta rendered service for the welfare of beings. He had driven away fear from those who were frightened. He had given alms (dāna) together with supplementary gifts.

For example, when he gave away robes and garments in particular, he also offered alms food as supplementary gifts to the recipients; he also gave them seats, honoured them with flowers and perfumes and provided them with drink. Thereafter, he took upon himself the precepts and expressed his wish to attain the boon of omniscience. Then only did he distribute the robes and garments most respectfully. In this way the Bodhisatta gave the main gift with extra ones.

As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss which surpassed other Devas in the ten respects, as has been mentioned above. Reborn a human being, he acquired the 2nd major mark of “the figures in circles on the soles of his feet.” Because he was endowed with that mark, [1688] had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch and would also have won a great suite of retinues consisting of Brahmins, men of wealth, etc. On renouncing the world in his last birth as Prince Siddhattha, he became an omniscient Buddha, and his great retinue was composed of monks, nuns, male and female lay devotees, Devas, humans, Asuras, Nāgas and Gandhabbas.

Herein, such meritorious deeds of alms giving completed with additional gifts in his numerous past existences was 1) the meritorious deed. The perfection in all respects of the sole-figures as if they were indicating: “Let Devas and humans know that the Bodhisatta had performed meritorious deeds of alms giving completed with additional gifts,” was 2) the power of the deed. The sole mark was 3) the mark. The great retinue was 4) the advantage of the mark.

The Projecting Heels, Long Fingers and Toes and the Upright Body

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta abstained from taking life. Never had he caught hold of a weapon with intent to kill. He had lived with loving-kindness and compassion, providing safeguard for the well-being of all others.

As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss, which surpassed that of other Devas in ten respects. Reborn a human being, he acquired these three major marks: The 3th mark of “the projecting heels,” the 4th mark of “the long and tapering fingers and toes” and the 15th mark of “the upright body” like that of a Brahma.

Because he was endowed with these three marks, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch, and he would have lived long till the end of his lifespan, as no one could do harm to his life or kill him. On renouncing the world in his last birth as Prince Siddhattha, he became an omniscient Buddha, and he lived long until he had covered four-fifths of his lifespan, as no one, be he an ascetic, Brahmin, Deva, Māra or Brahma could threaten his life or could kill him.

There are four assets of a Buddha that cannot be violated by others. They are, according to the commentary on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa):

1. The four requisites meant for and brought to him.
2. His life.
3. His marks.
4. His radiance.

Or, according to the commentary on the Vinaya Section about Expulsion (Pārājika-kaṇḍa):

1. The material gain of the four requisites brought to him.
2. His life.
3. His 80 minor marks and his radiance of his body.<sup>360</sup>
4. His omniscience.

With reference to the above three marks: 1) the meritorious deed was the abstention from the wrong doing of killing; 2) the power of the deed was the ability of the length and shape of the heels, fingers and toes and the uprightness of the body.

Those who are bent on killing approach their victim by tiptoeing lest the sound of their footsteps should be heard. Consequently, when they become human beings again, some of them have their feet curved inwardly like a bow; some of them have their feet curved outwardly; some of their feet have a curve in each sole; some have bandy toes; and others bandy heels; as if all those deformed shapes were to disclose their meaning, saying: “Let people know about our act of killing that involves tiptoeing.” But the Bodhisatta had the mark of long heels as if they were to say: “Let people know about my not killing [1689] in a way that involved tiptoeing.”

Similarly, those who desire to kill approach their victim by bending their bodies lest they should be seen by others. Consequently, when they become human beings again, some are hunchbacked; some are squat; some are crippled; as if all these deformed shapes were to disclose their meaning, saying: “Let people know about my commission of killing that involves body bending.” The Bodhisatta, however, had an upright body like that of a Brahma, a mark of a Great Man, as if it were saying: “Let people know about my not killing in a way that involved body-bending.”

Similarly, those who desire to kill catch hold of a weapon, say a club, and put their victim to death. Consequently, when they become human beings again, they have shorts hands, curved fingers or have no visible fingers, as they look conjoined with one another and level with the palms as if they were saying: “Let people know about my evil deeds.” In contrast with them, the Bodhisatta had long and beautiful fingers, a mark of a Great Man, as if it were saying: “Let Devas and humans know” that he had no experience of killing with a club in the grip of his hand. The ability of those marks to assure his long life was the power of the deed. These three major marks: the projection of the heels, the length of the fingers and toes and the straightness of the body are 3) the mark. His life lived to the full span was 4) the advantage of the mark.

The Fullness of the Flesh at Seven Places of the Body

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta gave delicious food, such as cakes, meals, butter-oil, milk rice, etc. As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn a human being, he acquired the 16th major mark of “the fullness of the flesh at the seven places of his body,” namely, the two insteps, the two backs of the palms, the two shoulders and the neck.

Because he was endowed with that mark, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch. On renouncing the world, he became an omniscient Buddha, and he received plenty of delicious food, both solid and liquid, to eat.

Herein, such a meritorious act of offering choice food over the period of 100,000 aeons was 1) the meritorious deed. The occurrence of the fullness of the flesh at the seven places of the body, as if it were saying: “Let Devas and humans know that the Bodhisatta had done the meritorious deeds of giving choice food, and so forth in his past lives,” and its being the cause of abundant gains in that very life was 2) the power of the deed. The fullness of the flesh at the seven places of the body was 3) the mark. The acquisition of much choice food was 4) the advantage of the mark.

The Soft Hands and Feet and their Likeness to a Net

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta helped many with the four objects of support (saṅgaha-vatthu).<sup>361</sup> Those who were pleased with a gift he helped by alms giving (dāna); those who were pleased with pleasant speech he helped with sweet words (piya-vācā), another object of support; those who desired a beneficial talk he helped with a beneficial talk or action (attha-cariyā), a third object of support, by advising them: “This should be done,” “This should not be done,” “A man of this nature should be associated with,” “A man of this nature should not be associated with,” and so on. Those who were happy to be treated on equal terms whether in weal or in woe, he had helped with a sense of equality (samānattatā), which is the fourth object of support.

As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn a human being, he acquired the 5th major mark of “the soft hands and feet” as well as the 6th major mark of “their having the likeness of a golden net.”

Because he was endowed with these two marks, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch. On renouncing the world, he became an omniscient Buddha, and he had a suite at his service, as if it were properly held and collectively placed [1690] in his hand.

Herein, such meritorious deeds of helping many through the fourfold objects of support (saṅgaha-vatthu) in his numerous past existences were 1) the meritorious deed. Those who used not to do so have rough hands and feet and uneven fingers and toes. The Bodhisatta, however, had soft and tender hands and feet; his fingers and toes were even like those of a golden net, in order to let Devas and humans know of his help given to many through the fourfold objects of support in his past lives. The quality of the softness of the hands and feet and also of the evenness of the fingers and toes was 2) the power of the deed. The quality of the soft hands and feet and of the even fingers and toes was 3) the mark. The gain of the suite properly held and collectively placed in his hand, so to speak, was 4) the advantage of the mark.

The High Ankles and the Curling Body Hair

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta abstained from frivolous talk. He gave religious talks which are beneficial for the here and now as well as the hereafter. He had spoken only on Dhamma concerning the ten deeds of merit leading to emancipation from Saṃsāra. By delivering to a large number of people sermons that would raise them up, by means of the ten deeds of merit, to higher stages of prosperity, he gave the gift of Dhamma.

As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn as a human being, he acquired the 7th major mark of “the slightly higher, dust-free ankles” and the 4th major mark of “the body-hair with its tips curling upwards.”

Because he was endowed with these two marks, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch and would be superior to others. On renouncing the world in his life as Prince Siddhattha he became an omniscient Buddha and reached the apex, excelling all other beings in pre-eminence.

Herein, such a meritorious deed of delivering Dhamma-sermons that lead to higher stages was 1) the meritorious deed. Those who used not to do so have low ankles and stooping downy hair, as if they were saying: “Let Devas and humans know about their failure to speak of the Dhamma.” The Bodhisatta, however, was endowed with these two marks: the high ankles and the curling body-hair, as if they were saying: “Let Devas and humans know” that he had given discourses that would raise them to higher spiritual positions. Therefore, the ability of these two marks to indicate this is 2) the power of the deed. The high ankles and the curling body-hair were 3) the marks. The Bodhisatta’s being above all others in rank was 4) the advantage of the mark.

The Antelope-Like Round Legs

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta seriously and promptly taught his close pupils who had come to him for education. He had taught them in such a way that they might learn and train quickly and without trouble; he had instructed them in different arts and crafts, in various modes of moral conduct (carāṇa), such as the five precepts, the ten precepts and the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) as well as the doctrines such as the truth that everybody has productive deeds as his or her own property (kammasakatā). In his teaching, he had never held back anything for his own sake.

As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn a human being, he acquired the 8th major mark of “the legs round and full, lengthy and comely, like those of a black antelope (enī) or like the husk of paddy.”

Because he was endowed with this mark, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch, and he would have obtained all royal paraphernalia both animate and inanimate. On renouncing the world, he quickly became an omniscient Buddha, and he possessed all the requisites of a monk.

Herein, such a meritorious act of a serious and prompt teaching of the arts and crafts, etc. in his numerous past existences were 1) the meritorious deeds. Those who did not teach their pupils seriously and promptly but used to waste their time by asking them to wait upon them respectfully, or by sending them on errands, and thus making them weary, have their calves which are bulging at the back of the leg as though the muscles were cut off on the other side. In contrast, the Bodhisatta's calves were high and round as if they were [1691] saying: "Let Devas and humans know about my serious and prompt teaching, which doesn't hold anything back for my own sake. The ability of that particular mark to disclose this was 2) the power of the deed. The calves of that beauty were 3) the mark. The quick possession of the appropriate requisites was 4) the advantage of the mark.

The Smooth Skin

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta approached wise ascetics and Brahmins and discussed matters with them, asking: "Venerable sirs, what is merit?" "What is demerit?" "What is faulty?" "What is not faulty?" "What should be followed?" "What should not be followed?" "What, when done, leads to lasting sorrow?" and "What, when done, leads to lasting happiness?"

As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn a human being, he acquired the 12th major mark of "the smooth skin."

Because he was endowed with this mark, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch and a great wise man. Among those who enjoy sensual pleasures, there would have been none equal to him or higher than him in wisdom. On renouncing the world in his last birth as Prince Siddhattha, he became an omniscient Buddha with great wisdom.

He possessed broad wisdom (puthu-paññā), wisdom about the aggregates, the sense-spheres, the elements, etc; wisdom born together with zest and joy (hāsa-paññā); wisdom of swift occurrence (javana-paññā); wisdom that quickly eradicates defilements (tikkha-paññā); and wisdom that penetrates the impenetrable mass of greed, hatred and delusion (nibbedhika-paññā); as a subsequent effect, he was endowed with intelligence higher than that of others.

His<sup>362</sup> approaching and questioning wise ascetics and Brahmins was 1) the meritorious deed; the ability of that particular mark to disclose this was 2) the power of the deed; the smooth skin was 3) the mark; his possession of broad wisdom was 4) the advantage of the mark.

The Bright Yellow Complexion Like Gold

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta showed very little anger. If there was any anger in him at all, he quickly quenched it. He also displayed little anxiety. Though someone should speak to him angrily, he was absolutely free of hatred, anger, aversion, disturbance or having a grudge. Besides, he donated fine clothing, robes and coverlets to people.

As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn as a human being, he acquired the 11th major mark of “the yellow, bright skin like that of pure gold ornaments (siṅgī-nikkha).”

Because he was endowed with that mark, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch. On renouncing the world, he became an omniscient Buddha, and he quickly obtained fine clothings, robes and coverlets.

Herein, such a state of his being free of anger and such deeds of distributing fine clothing, robes and coverlets in his numerous past existences were 1) the meritorious deeds. The complexion of a person in anger lacks serenity; his or her face is terribly ugly. There is no adornment like clothing in the world. Therefore, those who used to show anger and were not used to give clothing, robes and coverlets are not good looking, as if they were to disclose their former ills. The face of one who does not lose his temper is beautiful; his or her complexion is serene. There are four ways for beings to acquire beauty and splendour:

1. Giving alms food in past existences.
2. Giving clothing in the past existences.
3. Giving service by cleaning with a broom.

---

4. Showing no anger.

All four requirements the Bodhisatta fulfilled in his countless former lives. He, therefore, acquired the 11th major mark of the yellow skin. Therefore, the bright yellow complexion, comparable to the colour of golden ornaments, which, so to speak, informed Devas and humans of his fulfilment of the four requirements was 2) the power of the deed. The golden skin was 3) the mark. The gain of fine clothing, and so on was 4) the advantage of the mark. [1692]

The Male Organ Concealed in a Sheath

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta brought about reconciliation in amity to those relatives and friends who had been long separated; he created harmony between estranged mothers and sons, estranged fathers and sons, estranged brothers, estranged brothers and sisters, and amongst estranged sisters. He rejoiced in the harmony thus caused.

As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn a human being, he acquired the 10th major mark of “the male organ concealed in a sheath,” like that of a Chaddanta elephant king.

Because he was endowed with that mark, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch and would have begot thousands of brave scions who would have been able to crush enemy forces. On renouncing the world, he became an omniscient Buddha and gathered thousands of sons in his noble disciples, who were capable of crushing the enemy forces of the defilements.

Herein, his meritorious performance of bringing about unity among relatives in the numerous past existences was 1) the meritorious deed. When kinsmen are united, one overlooks another’s fault. Even when they are quarrelling, they do not like to let others know of the wrong done by a man of their own blood. If one were to say: “This is his fault,” they would rise up and protest it, saying: “Who has seen that? Who has heard of that? There is nobody among us who would have done such a misdeed!” In this way, they all would give cover to his fault. It may be said that the Bodhisatta had disregarded such a fault and thereby brought about unity to his kith and kin. Therefore, the male organ is in a sheath and that is indicative to others of his past deeds of bringing unity to his relatives by preventing their fault from being seen so that they may live in happiness, so that was 2) the power of the deed. The male organ thus concealed in a sheath was 3) the mark. The gaining of thousands of son-like noble disciples was 4) the advantage of the mark.

The Symmetrically Proportioned Body and the Long Arms

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta gave honour to members of his retinue after personally scrutinizing their virtues and qualities, and only when he had known their qualifications did he show his appreciation to them according to their merit, deciding: “This man deserves this much of reward.” “This man is worthy of this amount of reward.” The Bodhisatta honoured a man fairly and honestly according to what he deserved.

As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn as a human being, he acquired the 19th major mark of “the symmetrically proportioned body which was round and beautiful like the circular spread of a banyan tree,” and the 9th major mark of the “long arms which can touch the knees while standing without stooping.”

Because he was endowed with these two marks, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch; and he would have had abundance of bliss and wealth, such as gems, gold, silver, useful objects, treasure-houses and granaries. On renouncing the world, he became an omniscient Buddha, and he owned an abundance of the wealth of the pious: faith (saddhā), morality (sīla), knowledge (suta), charity (cāga), wisdom (paññā), conscience about doing wrong (hiri) and concern about doing wrong (ottappa).

Herein, his honour shown according to one’s value was 1) the meritorious deed. The equal length of his stretched out arms and height and the equal measurement of the upper part and the lower part of his body in accordance with his performance were 2) the power of the deed. His body being like a round banyan tree and its upper and lower parts being of equal measurement were 3) the marks. His abundance of the sevenfold wealth of the pious was 4) the advantage of the mark.

The Well-Developed Body, the Back without the Spinal Furrow

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta wished for the welfare of the multitude. He had wished for the safety of the people, and their four modes of happiness. He had done a lot of contemplation: “How could these beings prosper through faith (saddhā)?” “How could they prosper through morality (sīla), observing the five or the ten precepts?” “How could they [1693] prosper through learning (suta), following the advice of the wise and pious?” “How could they prosper through charity (cāga), giving up what they own?” “How could they prosper through wisdom (paññā), the truth and knowledge that all beings have their deeds (kamma) as their own property?” “How could they progress in terms of wealth and paddy, field and land, bipeds and quadrupeds, children and wives, servants and employees, relatives and friends?”

As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn a human being, he acquired the three major marks: The 17th mark of “the full and well-developed body like a lion’s front portion,” the 18th mark of “the well-developed back of the body extending from the waist to the neck like a golden plank without any trace of the spinal furrow” and the 20th mark of “the proportionate and round neck.”

Because he was endowed with these three major marks, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch, and he would have obtained royal paraphernalia and his blissful life would never have diminished. On renouncing the world, he became an omniscient Buddha, and his mundane and supermundane virtues, such as faith (saddhā), morality (sīla), learning (suta), relinquishing (cāga), wisdom (paññā), etc., never decreased.

Herein, his wish for the welfare of the multitude was 1) the meritorious deed. The fullness, roundness and development of the body, the back and the neck, as if they were indicative of his wish for the prosperity of others, was 2) the power of the deed; the fullness, roundness and development of the body, the back and the neck were 3) the mark. The non-decrease of his wealth, both mundane and supermundane, was 4) the advantage of the mark.<sup>363</sup>

The 7,000 Capillaries at the Throat

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta had never hurt other beings with his hands, with a stone, stick, sword or with any other weapon. As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn a human being, he acquired the 21st major mark of “the 7,000 capillaries occurring at the throat and diffusing throughout the body the taste of the food, be it as small as a grain of sesame.”

---

Because he was endowed with this major mark, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch. On renouncing the world, he became an omniscient Buddha, and his ailments were few and far between.

Herein, his meritorious performance of refraining from hurting beings was 1) the meritorious deed. He who has been hit by another with the hands, sticks, etc. will have bruises and blood clots on the spot his body has been hit, from which more suffering would occur. As for the Bodhisatta, as if they were clearly indicative of his past observance of non-violence towards others, an act of merit that would result in good health, he acquired the mark of the capillaries at the throat. Such an irregularity of the capillaries for taste was 2) the power of the deed. He upright capillaries at his throat were 3) the mark. His good health was 4) the advantage of the mark.

The capillaries distribute the taste all over his body, even if it is of the food as tiny as a grain of sesame. His digestive power was neither too high nor too low but just right to digest whatever is eaten: therefore, the Bodhisatta's health was better than that of others.

The Clear Blue Eyes and the Soft Eyelashes

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta had never angrily looked at others with his eyes protruding like those of a lobster. Never had he, in anger, looked sideways at another person. When that person angrily looked at him, he simply closed his eyes. Only when that person looked the other way round did he glance at him or her with a loving and sober heart but never with a hateful one.

As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn a human being, he acquired the 29th major mark of “the very clear blue eyes” and the 30th mark of “the soft and tender eyelashes, like a newly born calf.”

Because he was endowed with these marks, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch. On renouncing the world, he became an omniscient Buddha, and he was looked upon by beings, such as humans, Devas, and Brahmas, lovingly and trustingly.

Herein, his viewing of other beings with loving eyes in the countless past existences was [1694] 1) the meritorious deed. Those angry ones who look sideways or frown at somebody else have their eyes set in that manner. Those who look at others in an affectionate and respectful manner have eyes that are beautiful in five ways. The Bodhisatta was endowed with the eyes, blue and clear, and the eyelashes, soft and curling up, as if they were indicative of his affectionate, respectful glances in the past; all this was 2) the power of the deed. The extremely clear blue eyes and the extremely soft curling-up eyelashes were 3) the marks. The love and respect shown to him by other beings was 4) the advantage of the mark.

The Thin Layer of Flesh on the Forehead

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta led group performances of good physical, verbal and mental practises, alms giving, moral observances, fasting, service to parents, etc. As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn a human being, he acquired the 32nd major mark of “the thin layer of flesh that appeared by nature, like a gold headband, on the forehead.”

Because he was endowed with this mark, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch. On renouncing the world, he became an omniscient Buddha, and he gained a large number of beings as his followers or he became leader of them all.

Herein, his meritorious act of giving leadership to others in the group performances of good deeds was 1) the meritorious deed. He who gives leadership to a performance of good deeds, such as giving in generosity, maintaining morality, etc., never wears a sad face in gatherings; instead, he moves about among the people with his head upright without fear but with joy and satisfaction. He also has a large number of followers. The Bodhisatta, in his many previous births, had given guidance in doing all deeds of merit. In order to make Devas and humans know of this, the Bodhisatta was born with the thin layer of flesh on his forehead or a full round head; therefore, the ability of the thin layer of flesh or, the full round head, to let others know of those past meritorious act was 2) the power of the deed. The thin layer of flesh or of the full round head was 3) the mark. The large numbers of beings immediately following after him was 4) the advantage of the mark.

The Body-Hair and the Hair between the Eyebrows

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta abstained from telling lies (musā-vāda); he told what was true; with no insertion of falsehood, his first truthful words agreed with his last; he was of firm speech; he spoke reliable words which people trusted and referred to. As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn a human being, he acquired the 13th major mark of “the body hair, each in one pore of the skin” and the 31st major mark of “the hair between the two eyebrows.”

Because he was endowed with these two major marks, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch. On renouncing the world, he became an omniscient Buddha, and he had his wishes fulfilled by many.

Herein, his meritorious act of speaking only what was true in his numerous past existences was 1) the meritorious deed. The ability of his body-hair, each growing in one pore of the skin and of his hair that strangely grew between the eyebrows to disclose his acts of speaking the truth was 2) the power of the deed. The body hair and the hair between the eyebrows were 3) the mark. The fulfilment of his wishes by many was 4) the advantage of the mark.

The 40 Teeth Touching One Another

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta abstained from any mischievous speech that would end friendships among people; he had brought harmony to those who were separated; helped maintain unity of those who were united; he had taken delight in unity among friends; he had been very pleased to see or hear of those in unity; he had spoken only what would create unity of friends.

As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn a human being, he acquired the 23rd major mark of “the teeth numbering exactly 40” and the 25th major mark of “the teeth touching one another with no space in between.”

Because he was endowed with these two marks, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch. On [1695] renouncing the world, he became an omniscient Buddha, and he gained followers whose unity could not be destroyed by others.

Herein, his abstention, in his numerous past lives, from divisive talk (pisuṇa-vācā) and his speech that would create unity were 1) the meritorious deeds. Those who used to speak mischievous words have no complete set of 40 teeth, and they have teeth with gaps, for they destroy the unity of others and separate them. The Bodhisatta, however, had 40 teeth and they were touching one another as if to tell Devas and humans of his abstention from mischievous words in his countless former lives in Samsāra. Therefore, the ability of his teeth to be indicative of his said abstention was 2) the power of the deed. The complete set of 40 teeth and the absence of gaps in them possessing this very ability were 3) the mark. His gaining of followers whose unity could not be destroyed by others was 4) the advantage of the mark.

The Long Tongue and the Brahma-Like Voice

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta abstained from speaking harsh and abusive words; he spoke only what was polite, faultless, pleasing and appealing to the hearts of many. As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn a human being, he acquired the 27th major mark of “the long, flat and tender tongue” and the 28th major mark of “the voice having eight qualities like a Brahma’s.”

Because he was endowed with these two marks, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch. On renouncing the world, he became an omniscient Buddha, and his words were effective, influential and authoritative.

Herein, his abstention from harsh and abusive words (pharusa-vācā) and his speaking only sweet, pleasant and polite words in his numerous past existences in Saṃsāra were 1) his meritorious deeds. Those who used to indulge in harsh and abusive terms have their tongues faulty in terms of thickness, droopiness and a slit so that others may know of their indulgence in bad language by the twisting of their tongues. The Bodhisatta, however, had the primary benefit of having his tongue long, flat and tender so that Devas and humans might know that he had never uttered such bad language but had spoken what was sweet, pleasant and polite. Those who used to speak abusive language have their voice cracked, rough or faulty in other ways so that many might know of their swearing in a cracked, rough voice. The Bodhisatta had the benefits of having a voice of eight qualities, as if they were to let Devas and humans know of his abstention in his numerous past existences in Saṃsāra from cursing, a cause for a cracked, rough voice. Therefore, the length, flatness and tenderness of the tongue and the completeness of his tongue with the eight qualities were 2) the power of the deed. The long, flat and tender tongue and the voice complete with the eight qualities were 3) the marks. The obedience shown to his word by Devas and humans and his verbal effectiveness, influence and authority were 4) the advantages of the mark.

The Lion-Like Chin

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta abstained from frivolous speech that was like unsuccessful paddy, lacking substance. He had spoken what was right and suitable for the occasion; he had talked beneficially, truthfully and with reference to the Dhamma and advised in accordance with discipline. He had uttered solemnly what was meaningful and with evidence, as in judicial proceedings, worthy of keeping in the casket-like hearts of all hearers.

As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn a human being, he acquired the 22nd major mark of the “well developed chin suggestive of his imminent smile like that of a lion.”

Because he was endowed with this major mark, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch. On renouncing the world, he became an omniscient Buddha, and he was invulnerable to attacks by his enemies within and without.

Herein, his abstention from frivolous speech (samphappalāpa) was 1) the meritorious deed. Those who used to talk about foolish things have their chins concave, crooked or in any other unseemly shape so that many might know that they had spoken unsubstantial language with their jaws moving. The Bodhisatta, however, had well developed jaws so that Devas and [1696] humans might know of his abstention from frivolous talk and of his practice of speaking only what was fruitful. Therefore, the ability of the development of the jaws to disclose his practice of speaking, in the past, what was fruitful was 2) the power of the deed. The developed jaws with that ability was 3) the mark. His invulnerability against any of his enemies, within or without, was 4) the advantage of the mark.

The Proportionately Set and Four White Pointed Teeth

In his numerous past existences, the Bodhisatta abstained from wrong livelihood but had earned his living by a proper trade; he had avoided various dishonest methods, such as deceptive scales, baskets and coins; being unethical by taking bribes; being of immoral persuasion by cheating; convincing others with violence by cutting off of hands and legs, by taking life, binding, plundering or destroying towns and villages.

As a result, corresponding to such deeds of merit, he enjoyed divine bliss. Reborn a human being, he acquired these two major marks: the 24th mark of “the proportionate set of teeth” and the 26th mark of “the four pointed teeth as white and brilliant as the morning star.”

Because he was endowed with these two marks, had he remained a householder, he would have become a Universal Monarch. On renouncing the world, he became an omniscient Buddha, and he gained hosts of followers and attendants.

Herein, his pure livelihood in his numerous past existences was 1) the meritorious deed. Those, who used to have impure livelihood, possess no proportionately set teeth, upper or lower, inside or outside; and their four pointed teeth are dirty so that many might know of their misdeeds. The Bodhisatta, however, had even teeth and four pointed ones, which were very brilliantly white as if they were saying: “Let the Devas and humans know of his pure livelihood, maintained throughout his countless past existences in Saṃsāra.” Therefore, the evenness of his teeth and the brilliant whiteness of the four pointed teeth that disclosed his purity of livelihood in his countless past lives in Saṃsāra were 2) the power of the deed. The even teeth and the white, pointed teeth were 3) the marks. The hosts of followers and attendants were 4) the advantage of the mark. [1697]

Here was given the Sayādaw U Ghosita’s last verse-prayer with reference to the 40 teeth and the four pointed ones, followed by the concluding verse. Also for the benefit of the reader in Myanmar: A shorter poetical composition about the 32 major marks and the Buddha’s past deeds (kamma) as their causes, by the Mahā Visuddhārāma Sayādaw, was added. These we leave untranslated.

On I-III: Further Explanation of Words and Phrases

[A section that was placed here on the perfections has been moved to a more suitable position in The First Treatise on the Perfections, at the beginning of 11, and is entitled: What is the Classification of the Perfections?]

Three Types of Bodhisattas

[Again another important section which describes the three types of Bodhisattas is moved from a remote section to near the top of the Further Explanations.]

Even at the moment of receiving the prophecy, as in the case of the recluse Sumedha, the Bodhisattas are of three types:

Miscellaneous Topics – 2412

1. The Bodhisatta who attains paths and fruitions after hearing a small part of a discourse on the Dhamma (ugghaṭitaññū).
2. The Bodhisatta who realizes paths and fruitions after hearing most of a discourse of the Dhamma (vipañcitaññū).
3. The Bodhisatta who gradually comes to comprehend the truth after hearing all of a discourse of the Dhamma (neyya).

Of these three types, the Bodhisattas who understand after hearing a small part of a discourse (ugghaṭitaññū) are those who, if they wish to achieve the Awakening of a disciple (sāvaka-bodhi) in the very existence they receive the prophecy, have the special supportive merit to attain the Arahat fruition together with the six super powers (abhiññā) and the four kinds of analytical knowledge (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa), understand even before the end of the third line of a verse of four lines delivered by a Buddha. This type of Bodhisatta is also called the Bodhisatta with the factor of predominant wisdom (paññādhika). With this type of Bodhisatta, wisdom is the strongest.

The Bodhisattas who understand after hearing most of a discourse (vipañcitaññū) are those who, if they wish to achieve the Awakening of a disciple in the very existence they receive the prophecy, have the special supportive merit to become an Arahat together with the six super powers and four kinds of analytical knowledge, understand before the end of the fourth line of a verse of four lines delivered by a Buddha. This type of Bodhisatta is also called the Bodhisatta with the factor of predominant faith (saddhādhika). With this type of Bodhisatta, wisdom is medial.

The Bodhisattas who gradually comes to comprehend the truth (neyya) are those who, if they wish to achieve the Awakening of a disciple in the very existence they receive the prophecy, have the special supportive merit to become an Arahat together with six super powers and four kinds of analytical knowledge, at the end of the whole verse of four lines delivered by a Buddha. This type of Bodhisatta is also called the Bodhisatta with the factor of predominant energy (viriyādhika). With this type of Bodhisatta wisdom is weakest.

All the three types of Bodhisattas make the mental resolution to become a Buddha for immeasurable aeons before receiving the definite prophecy. However, after receiving the definite prophecy, they fulfil the perfections and attain Awakening according to the necessary time schedule.

The paddy species which flowers, bears seeds and ripens only after a certain period of time even when with utmost effort of watering, etc., will not yield a crop at a date earlier than the natural period of flowering, bearing seeds and ripening. In the same way, all the various types of Bodhisattas, by no means become Buddhas before they have completed the allotted time for fulfilment of the perfections even if they strive daily with more and more energy to fulfil the perfections (pāramī), charity (cāga) and good conduct (cariyā), because their wisdom has not yet reached maturity, and their accumulation of Buddha-making factors is not complete yet.

Therefore, it should be clearly understood that the perfections become fulfilled only after 4 immeasurables and 100,000 aeons for a Bodhisatta with predominant wisdom; 8 immeasurables and 100,000 aeons for a Bodhisatta with predominant faith; and 16 immeasurables and 100,000 aeons for a Bodhisatta with predominant energy.

AEONS

The Cosmic Aeon

It is said in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa, Bv 2.1): Kappe ca sata-sahassee, caturo ca asankhiye, “100,000 aeons, and four immeasurable periods.” The duration of an aeon (kappa) cannot be calculated by the number of years. It is known only by analogy. Suppose there is a big granary which is one league each in length, breadth and height and which is full of tiny mustard seeds. You throw out just one seed each century. When all the mustard seeds have been thrown out, the period called an aeon (kappa) has not come to an end yet. An immeasurable period (asankhyeyya) in this context means an immeasurable amount of great aeons. A great aeon (mahā-kappa) is the time it takes for the whole cycle of evolution and devolution.

An aeon/period (kappa) has six definitions:

1. A great aeon (mahā-kappa).
2. An immeasurable part of an aeon (asankhyeyya-kappa).
3. An inclusive period (antara-kappa).
4. A lifetime (āyu-kappa).
5. A decreasing period (hāyana-kappa).

6. An increasing period (vaddhana-kappa).

[Because it is confusing indeed to have kappa translated by one word when it refers to two different time-scales, I have used aeon (kappa) for the time taken by one complete evolution and devolution; and period (kappa) for sections within that time-scale.]

One great aeon (mahā-kappa) is made up of four immeasurable periods (asaṅkhyeyya-kappa): 1) The period in the [1503] process of dissolution (saṁvaṭṭa-kappa); 2) the period in the state of dissolution (saṁvaṭṭaṭṭhāyi-kappa); 3) the period in the process of evolution (vivaṭṭa-kappa); and 4) the period in the state of evolution (vivaṭṭaṭṭhāyi-kappa). That is to say, these four immeasurable periods in the process and state of dissolution, and in the process and state of evolution, make one great aeon (mahā-kappa).

Of these four immeasurable periods, the period in the process of dissolution (saṁvaṭṭa-kappa) is the period beginning from the falling of the great rain, which heralds the dissolution of the aeon till the extinction by flames, if the aeon is to be dissolved by fire; or till the receding of floods, if the aeon is to be dissolved by water; or till the cessation of storms, if the aeon is to be dissolved by the air element.

The period in the state of dissolution (saṁvaṭṭaṭṭhāyi-kappa) is the period beginning from the moment of the dissolution of the world by fire, water or the air element till the falling of the great rain which heralds the evolution of a new world.

The period in the process of evolution (vivaṭṭa-kappa) is the period beginning from the falling of the great rain which heralds the evolution of the new world till the appearance of the sun, the moon, and the stars and planets.

The period in the state of evolution (vivaṭṭaṭṭhāyi-kappa) is the period beginning from the appearance of the sun, moon, stars and planets to the falling of the great rain which heralds the dissolution of the world.

There are two kinds of period-dissolving rain. The first kind is the great rain which falls in any period when it is nearing its dissolution either by fire, water or the air element. First, there is a great downpour of rain all over the universe which is to be dissolved. Then, taking advantage of the rain, people start cultivation. When plants which are big enough for cattle to feed on appear the rain ceases completely. It is the rain which heralds the dissolution of an aeon.

Miscellaneous Topics – 2415

The second kind is also a great downpour, but it falls when a period is to be dissolved by water. It is not an ordinary rainfall, but a very unusual one, for it has the power to smash even a rocky mountain into smithereens.

An elaborate description of the dissolution of a period by fire, water or the air element is given in the chapter on the Deep Knowledge about Previous Lives (Pubbe-nivāsānussati-abhiññā) in the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga, Vis XIII, 4).

The above-mentioned four immeasurable periods are of the same duration, which cannot be reckoned in terms of years. That is why they are known as periods of incalculable length (asaṅkhyeyya-kappa). These four immeasurable periods constitute one great aeon (mahā-kappa).

At the beginning of the immeasurable period in the state of evolution (vivaṭṭaṭṭhāyi-asaṅkhyeyya-kappa), that is, at the beginning of the world, people live for an incalculable (asaṅkhyeyya) number of years. As time goes on, they are overcome by such mental defilements as greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), etc. and consequently their lifespan gradually decreases until it becomes only ten years. Such a period of decrease is called a decreasing period (hāyana-kappa).

On the contrary, owing to the occurrence and uplift of such wholesome principles as the sublime states of mind such as loving-kindness (mettā), compassion (karuṇā), etc., the lifespan of generations of their descendents doubles up gradually until it reaches an incalculable number of years. Such a period of increase in lifespan from ten years to incalculable years is called an increasing period (vaddhana-kappa).

For further details of these two periods of increase and decrease in the human lifespan, refer to the Discourse about the Wheel-Turning Monarch (Cakka-vatti-sutta, DN 26).

Thus, the lifespan of human beings goes up and down between ten years and an incalculable number of years [1504] as they develop meritoriousness or are overcome by demeritoriousness. A pair of lifespans, an increasing one and a decreasing one, is called an inclusive period (antara-kappa).

At the beginning of the world, when people's lifespan declines from incalculable years to ten years, a change of period takes place. If the decline is due to the particularly overpowering state of greed, then there occurs scarcity of food and all evil persons perish during the last seven days of the period. Such a round of time is called a period of famine (dubbhikkhantara-kappa).

If the decline is due to the particularly overpowering state of bewilderment, then there occurs an epidemic of diseases and all evil persons perish during the last seven days of the period. Such a round of time is called a period of diseases (rogantara-kappa).

If the decline of lifespan is due to the particularly overpowering state of hatred, then there occur killings of one another with arms, and all evil persons perish during the last seven days of the period. Such a round of time is called a period of weapons (satthantara-kappa).

According to the sub-commentary to the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga), however, a period of diseases (rogantara-kappa) is brought about by the particularly overpowering state of greed; a period of weapons (satthantara-kappa) by the particularly overpowering state of hatred; and a period of famine (dubbhikkhantara-kappa) by the particularly overpowering state of bewilderment; either way, evil persons perish.

The naming of each pair of lifespans – one increasing and the other decreasing – as an inclusive period (antara-kappa) may be explained thus: Before all is dissolved either by fire, water or the air element at the end of the devolving immeasurable period (vivaṭṭaṭṭhāyi-asañkhyeyya-kappa) and whenever the lifespan becomes ten years, all evil persons perish through famine, diseases or weapons. In accordance with this statement, here it refers to the inclusive period of decrease between one period of total destruction and another.

After the calamity that happens during the final seven days of each inclusive period (antara-kappa), the name: The period ending in disease (rogantara-kappa), the period ended by weapons (satthantara-kappa) or the period ending in famine (dubbhikkhantara-kappa), is given to this period of misfortune, which falls before the ten years lifespan, not in the whole world, but in a limited region, such as a town or a village.

If there appears an epidemic of diseases, we say there is a period ending in disease (rogantara-kappa) in that region; if there is an outbreak of war, we say there is a period ended by weapons (satthantara-kappa) in that region; if there occurs starvation, we say there is a period ending in famine (dubbhikkhantara-kappa) in that region. Such a saying is just figurative because the regional incident is similar to the cosmic. When in chanting one mentions “three periods” from which one wishes to be free, one is usually referring to these three great disasters.

At the completion of 64 inclusive periods (antara-kappa), each inclusive period consisting of a pair of increasing and decreasing periods, an evolving immeasurable period (vivaṭṭaṭṭhāyi-asañkhyeyya-kappa) comes to an end. Since there are no living beings in human and celestial realms during the immeasurable period in the process of dissolution, the immeasurable period in the state of dissolution and the immeasurable period in the state of evolution, these period are not reckoned in terms of inclusive periods (antara-kappa), which consists of a set of increasing and decreasing periods. But it should be noted that each of these immeasurable periods (asañkhyeyya-kappa), lasting as long as 64 inclusive periods (antara-kappa), are of the same duration as an evolving immeasurable period (vivaṭṭaṭṭhāyi-asañkhyeyya-kappa).

The Life Aeon

A life aeon (āyu-kappa) means a period which is reckoned in accordance with the span of life (āyu) of that period. If the lifespan is 100, a century is a life aeon; if it is 1,000, a millennium is a life aeon.

When the Buddha said (DN 16): “Ānanda, I have developed the four bases of psychic power (iddhi-pada), if I so desire, I can live either a whole period (kappa) or a little more than a period,” the period therein should be taken as a life period (āyu-kappa), which is the duration of the life of people living during that period. It is explained in the commentary to the section on the eights of the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Anguttara-nikāya, AN 8) that when the Buddha made such a declaration he meant to say that he could live 100 years or a little more if he so desired. [1505]

Ven. Mahāsiva, however, said: “The life period (āyu-kappa) here is to be taken as the great aeon (mahā-kappa) called auspicious (bhaddaka).” He said so because he held that the productive deeds (kamma) that cause rebirth in the final existence of a Buddha have the power of prolonging his lifespan for incalculable years and because it is mentioned in the Pāḷi texts that the fruition-attainment that conditions and controls the life-sustaining mental process (āyu-pālaka-phala-samāpatti), which is called the life process (āyu-saṅkhāra), can ward off all dangers. But Ven. Mahāsiva’s view is not accepted by the commentators.

The Section on a Schism in the Saṅgha (Saṅgha-bhedakakkhandhaka) of the Vinaya Short Division (Cūḷa-vagga, Vin Cv 7) states: “He who causes a schism of the Saṅgha is reborn in Niraya, the realms of continuous suffering, and suffers there for a whole aeon.” “That aeon is the lifespan of the Avīci, the lowest realm of continuous suffering,” explains the commentary. The lifespan of the Avīci inmates is equal to one eightieth of a great aeon (mahā-kappa), according to the sub-commentary in Thirteen Sections (Terasa-kaṇḍa-ṭīkā), a voluminous sub-commentary on the Vinaya. In the same work, it is particularly mentioned that one eightieth of that duration should be reckoned as an inclusive period (antara-kappa) of Avīci inmates. Therefore, it follows that one great aeon (mahā-kappa) is made up of 80 inclusive periods (antara-kappa) according to the reckoning of Avīci inmates.

It may be clarified that, as mentioned above, one great aeon (mahā-kappa) has four immeasurable periods (asaṅkhyeyya-kappa), and one immeasurable aeon (asaṅkhyeyya-kappa) has 64 inclusive periods (antara-kappa). Therefore, one great aeon is equivalent to 256 inclusive periods (antara-kappa) by human calculations.

If 256 is divided by 80, the result is 3.2 therefore, 3.2 inclusive periods (antara-kappa) of human beings make one inclusive period of Avīci inmates.

In Avīci there are no evolving and dissolving aeons as in the human world. Since it is the place that knows suffering at all times the end of each dissolving period is not marked with the three periods of misfortune. One eightieth of a great aeon (mahā-kappa), which is the lifespan of the Avīci inmates, is their inclusive period (antara-kappa). Therefore, by one inclusive period of Avīci is meant 3.2 inclusive periods of human beings.

In this way, it may be assumed that one immeasurable aeon (asaṅkhyeyya-kappa) is equal to 64 inclusive periods (antara-kappa) of human beings and 20 inclusive periods of Avīci inmates. Therefore, when some Pāḷi texts such as the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga), the sub-commentary, the Explanation of the Meaning of the Abhidhamma (Abhidhammattha-vibhāvanī), etc. say that one immeasurable aeon contains either 64 or 20 inclusive periods (antara-kappa), the figures do not contradict each other. The difference between the numbers lies only in the manner of calculation. It should be noted that the two are of the same length of time.

A particularly noteworthy thing is a statement in the commentary to the Analysis (Vibhaṅga). In the Analysis of Knowledge (Ñāṇa-vibhaṅga, Vibh 16), it is said: “Only the act of causing schism in the Saṅgha (Saṅgha-bhedaka-kamma), results in suffering for a whole period (kappa). Should a man, owing to such an act, be reborn in Avīci at the beginning or in the middle of the period (kappa), he would gain release only when the period (kappa) dissolves. If he were reborn in that realm of suffering today and if the period (kappa) dissolves tomorrow he should then suffer just one day and would be free tomorrow. But in fact there is no such possibility.”

On account of this statement, there are some who opine that: “The act of causing schism in the Saṅgha (Saṅgha-bhedaka-kamma) leads to Niraya for the whole period (kappa), in the sense of a great aeon (mahā-kappa); he who commits this productive deed (kamma) gains freedom only when the aeon dissolves. As a matter of fact, the expression lasting for the whole aeon (kappaṭṭhitiya) is explained in the Analyses (Vibhaṅga) commentary only in a general manner; it does not emphatically mention the words lasting for the whole great aeon (mahā-kappaṭṭhitiya). The expression lasting for the whole aeon is based on a verse in the Vinaya Short Division (Cūḷa-vagga, Vin Cv 7, PTS 2.205) which reads: “Having destroyed the unity of the Saṅgha, one suffers in Niraya for the whole period (kappa).” Therefore, the period (kappa) here should be taken only as a life period (āyu-kappa) but not as a great aeon (mahā-kappa). In the 13th chapter of the Points for Discussion (Kathā-vatthu) commentary, it is said, in dealing with the period (kappa) that the verse has been composed with reference to the life aeon (āyu-kappa) of the Avīci inmates which is only one eightieth of a great aeon (mahā-kappa).

Empty and Non-Empty Aeons

The great aeon is divided into two classes: 1) empty aeon (suñña-kappa) and 2) non-empty aeon (asuñña-kappa). [1506] Of these two, the aeon in which Buddhas do not appear is an empty aeon (suñña-kappa); it means an aeon which is void of a Buddha. The aeon in which Buddhas appear is a non-empty aeon (asuñña-kappa); it means the aeon which is not void of a Buddha.

Though Buddhas do not appear in an empty aeon, that there can be the appearance of Independent Buddhas and Universal Monarchs may be inferred from the Traditions about the Edler Upāli (Upālitthera-apaḍāna, Tha-ap 8). In the Traditions about the Edler Upāli and its commentary it is said that two aeons prior to this one, Prince Khattiya, the son of King Añjasa, on his departure from a park, committed an offence against the Paccekabuddha Devala. No text mentions the appearance of a Buddha in that aeon.

In the commentary on the Traditions about the Elder Bhaddaji (Bhaddajitthera-apādāna, Tha-ap 560), too, it is stated that the venerable had given alms food to 500 Paccekabuddhas in an empty aeon (suñña-kappa). It is clear from these texts that Paccekabuddhas appear in empty aeons.

Again, the Traditions about Kusumāsaniya (Kusumāsaniya-apādāna, Tha-ap 128) mentions that the “future Kusumāsaniya was reborn as the Universal Monarch Varadassī in the aeon that immediately followed.”

The Traditions about the Supporter Tiṇasanthara (Tiṇasanthara-dāyakaṭṭhera-apādāna, Tha-ap 78) of the same work, it also says that the “future Tiṇasanthara was reborn as the Universal Monarch Migasammata in the second aeon prior to the present one,” suggesting that there is the possibility of the appearance of Universal Monarchs in an empty aeon.

The non-empty aeon in which Buddhas appear is divided into five classes:

1. The essential aeon in which a single Buddha appears (sāra-kappa).
2. The fine aeon in which two Buddhas appear (maṇḍa-kappa).
3. The noble aeon in which three Buddhas appear (vara-kappa).
4. The essential and fine aeon in which four Buddhas appear (sāra-maṇḍa-kappa).
5. The Auspicious aeon in which five Buddhas appear (Bhadda-kappa).

The aeon that witnessed the existence of Sumedha, as mentioned in the chapter on the Brahmin Sumedha (see chapter III), is an essential and fine aeon in which four Buddhas appear.

Amaravatī

The city of Amaravatī came into existence after the appearance of three Buddhas: Taṇhaṅkara, Medhaṅkara, and Saraṇaṅkara, and before the appearance of Dīpaṅkara. Amarā means “god,” an immortal being, and vatī means “possessing,” hence, “the great city possessed by the gods.”

It is stated in the Chapter about Medicines (Bhesajjakkhandhaka, Vin Mv 6) and other places that, as soon as the Brahmins Sunidha and Vassakāra planned to found the city of Pāṭaliputta, gods arrived first and distributed among themselves plots of land. Those plots of land occupied by gods of great power became residences of princes, ministers and wealthy persons of high rank; those plots of land occupied by gods of medium power became residences of people of medium rank and those plots of land occupied by gods of little power became residences of people of low rank.

From this statement, it may be supposed that gods arrived in hosts to take up residence for themselves and occupied them where a great royal city was to be established. Amaravatī was so named to denote the presence of gods who marked out their own locations in the city and protect them for their habitation.

The Pāḷi ending -vatī signifies possession in abundance. In this world, those who have just little wealth are not called wealthy men but those who possess wealth much more than others are called so. Therefore, the name Amaravatī indicates that, as it was a great royal residential city, it was occupied and protected by a large number of highly powerful gods.

Voluntary Passing Away

Voluntary passing away by self-determination (adhimutti-maraṇa). It is the kind of death that takes place as soon as one resolves: “May death come upon me.” But such a death can happen only to Bodhisattas, and not to others.

Sometimes a Bodhisatta is reborn in a Deva or a Brahma world where the span of life is extremely long. He is aware of the fact that, living in a celestial world, he has no chance whatsoever to fulfil and cultivate the perfections, charity and practices, and, therefore, he feels such that a lengthy life in a celestial abode is boring. Then, after entering his mansion, he shuts his eyes and no sooner has he resolved: “May my life-faculty cease to be,” than he experiences the impact of death and passes away from that divine realm. His resolution materialises partly because he has little attachment to his body, as he has particularly conditioned the continuity of his body by attaining higher knowledge and partly because his resolution, based on an overwhelming compassion for beings, is intense and pure.

As he has control of his mind so has he control of his deeds. Accordingly, when he dies such a voluntary death, he is reborn in the human world as a prince, a Brahmin, etc., so that he can fulfil any of the perfections he wishes to. That is why, though our Bodhisatta Gotama lived in many existences in the Brahma abode without losing his attainment of absorption (jhāna), he existed only for a short time in that Brahma world, as he died voluntarily. He passed away from the Brahma existence into the human existence and build up the elements of the perfections.

The Five Defects of a Walkway

1. A walkway that is rough and rugged hurts the feet of one who walks on it and blisters appear; consequently, meditation cannot be practised with full mental concentration. On the other hand, comfort and ease provided by a soft and even-surfaced walkway is helpful to complete the practice of meditation. Therefore roughness and ruggedness is the first defect of a walkway.
2. If there is a tree inside, in the middle, or by the side of a walkway, one who walks without due care on that walkway can get hurt on the forehead or on the head by hitting the tree. The presence of a tree is therefore the second defect of a walkway.
3. If a walkway is covered by shrubs and bushes, one who walks on it in the dark can tread on reptiles, and other creatures, and kill them, even though unintentionally. The presence of shrubs and bushes, therefore, is the third defect of a walkway.
4. In making a walkway, it is important that it has three lanes. The middle and main one is straight and of 60 cubits in length and one and a half cubits in breadth. On either side of it are two smaller lanes, each a cubit wide. Should the middle lane be too narrow, say, only a cubit or half a cubit, there is the possibility of hurting one's legs or hands through an accident. Being too narrow, therefore, is the fourth defect of a walkway.
5. Walking on a walkway which is too wide, one may get distracted; one's mind is not composed then. Being too wide, therefore, is the fifth defect of a walkway.

The Eight Comforts of a Recluse

The eight comforts of a recluse (samaṇa-sukha) mentioned here are described as the eight blessings of a recluse (samaṇa-bhadra) in the Birth Story about Prince Soṇaka (Soṇaka-jātaka, Ja 529).

The Story about Soṇaka

The following is the Birth Story (Jātaka) in brief: Once upon a time, the Bodhisatta was reborn as Arindama, the son of King Magadha of Rājagaha. On the same day Soṇaka was born, a son of the king's chief adviser.

The two boys were brought up together and when they came of age, they went to Takkaṣilā to study. After finishing their education, they left Takkaṣilā together and went on a long tour to acquire a wider and practical knowledge of various arts and crafts and local customs. In due course, they arrived at the royal garden of the King of Bārāṇasī and entered the city the following day.

On that very day, the festival of Veda recitations (Brāhmaṇa-vācaka) was to be held, and milk rice was prepared, and seats were arranged for the occasion. On entering the city, Prince Arindama and his friend were invited into a house and given seats. Seeing that the seat for the prince was covered with a white cloth while that for him was covered with red cloth, Soṇaka knew from that omen that: "Today, my friend Arindama will become King of Bārāṇasī, and I will be appointed general."

After the meal, the two friends went back to the royal garden. It was the seventh day after the king's demise, and the ministers were looking for a person who was worthy of kingship by sending the state chariot in search of him. The chariot left the city, made its way to the garden and stopped at the entrance. At that moment, Prince Arindama was lying asleep on an auspicious stone couch with his head covered, and Soṇaka was sitting near him. As soon as Soṇaka heard the sound of music, he thought to himself: "The state chariot has come for Arindama. Today, he will become king and give me the post of his [1508] commander-in-chief. But I do not want to have such a position. When Arindama leaves the garden, I will renounce the world and become an ascetic," and he went into a corner and hid himself.

The chief adviser and ministers of Bārāṇasī anointed Prince Arindama as king, even on that very stone couch, and with great ceremonial pomp and grandeur took him into the city. Thus Prince Arindama became King of Bārāṇasī. Lost in the sudden turn of events and attended upon by a large number of courtiers and retinue, he totally forgot about his friend Soṇaka.

When King Arindama had left for the city, Soṇaka came out from his hiding place and sat on the stone couch. At that time, he saw a dry leaf of the Sāla (Shorea robusta) tree falling right in front of him, and he contemplated: “Like this Sāla leaf, my body will certainly decay and be oppressed by old age. I will definitely die and fall to the ground.” With his spiritual urgency (saṃvega) thus aroused, he at once engaged himself in insight (vipassanā) meditation, and, at the very sitting, there arose in him the Awakening of a Paccekabuddha, and he became a Paccekabuddha himself. His lay appearance vanished and he assumed a new appearance as an ascetic. Making an utterance of joy: “Now I have no more rebirth!” he went to the cave of Nandamūlaka, where other Paccekebuddhas lived.

Prince Arindama, on the other hand, remained intoxicated with kingly pleasures. Only after some 40 years, he remembered his childhood friend. Then he yearned to see him and wondered where he would be staying. But, receiving no news or clues about his friend’s whereabouts, he uttered repeatedly the following:

“To whom shall I give 100 coins for hearing and bringing me good news about Soṇaka? To whom shall I give 1,000 pieces of money for seeing Soṇaka in person and telling me how to meet him? I will give to he who, whether young or old, comes and informs me of my friend Soṇaka, my playmate with whom I had played in the dust.”

People heard the song and everybody sang the same, believing it to be his favourite.

After 50 years, a number of children had been born to the king, the eldest one being Dīghāvu. At that time, Paccekabuddha Soṇaka thought to himself thus: “King Arindama wants to see me. I will go to him and shower upon him the gift of thought-provoking sermons on the disadvantages of sensuality and the advantages of renunciation, so that he would incline to lead an ascetic life.” Accordingly, by his psychic power, he appeared in the royal gardens. Hearing a boy singing the aforementioned song of King Arindama while chopping wood the Paccekabuddha taught him a verse in response to the king’s.

The boy went to the king and recited the responding verse, which gave a clue to his friend's whereabouts. Then, the king marched in military procession to the garden and paid respect to the Paccekabuddha. But, being a man of worldly pleasures, the king looked down upon him and said: "What a destitute you are, living a wretched, lonely life such as this!" The Paccekabuddha rejected the king's censure by replying: "Never is he a destitute who enjoys the bliss of the Dhamma! Only he who dissociates himself from the Dhamma and practises what is not righteous is a destitute! Besides, he is wicked himself and forms a refuge for other wicked persons."

Then he informed the Paccekabuddha that his name was Arindama and that he was known by all as a King of Bārāṇasī, and asked if the holy man was living a happy life.

Then the Paccekabuddha uttered eight verses in praise of the eight blessings of a recluse (samaṇa-bhadra):

1. Great King, a recluse, who has gone forth from a household life to a homeless state and who is free of the worries of wealth feels happy at all places and at all times, not only in your gardens and at this moment. Great King, such a recluse does not have to keep grain in stores or in jars unlike lay people who hoard, and whose greed grows for a long time. A recluse lives on food prepared in supporter's homes and obtained by going on alms round; he partakes of such food with due contemplation. [1509]

By this is explained the comfort that comes from the non-hoarding of wealth and grain. There are two kinds of blameworthy food (sāvajja-piṇḍa). As mentioned in the Vinaya, the first kind is the food obtained by one of the improper means, such as by healing the sick and so on, or by one of the five wrong means of livelihood. The other blameworthy kind is food taken without due contemplation, although the food may have been properly obtained.

2. Great King, a noble recluse duly contemplates while eating the food that has been obtained blamelessly. He who has thus blamelessly eaten his blameless food is not oppressed by any form of sensuality. Freedom from oppression by sensuality is the second blessing of a recluse who has neither wants nor worries.

By this is explained the comfort that comes from the seeking and taking of blameless food. The food that has been sought properly and eaten with due contemplation by a worldling may be called “peaceful food” (nibbuta-piṇḍa), that is to say, the food that does not incite craving. In reality, however, only an Arahāt’s food is “peaceful,” because that truly does not incite craving.

3. Great King, a noble recluse takes peaceful food only. He is thus not oppressed by any form of sensuality. Freedom from oppression by sensuality is the third blessing of a recluse who has no wants or worries.

By this is explained the comfort that comes from taking peaceful food only.

4. Great King, a noble recluse who goes on alms round in towns or villages without attachment to supporters of requisites, does not adhere to greed and hatred. Freedom from such clinging is the fourth blessing of a recluse who has no wants or worries.

Clinging wrongly to sense objects in the manner of a thorn is called faulty adherence (dosa-saṅga). By this is explained the comfort that comes from non-attachment to male or female supporters and from non-association with them.

5. Great King, a recluse, who has extra requisites which are not used by him, entrusts them to a supporter for security. Later on, when he hears such and such a supporter’s house has been gutted by fire he is greatly distressed and has no peace of mind. On the other hand, another recluse has only those requisites that are on his body or that he carries along with him, just like the wings of a bird that go with it wherever it flies. He suffers no loss when a town or a village is destroyed by fire. Immunity from loss of requisites through fire is the fifth blessing of a recluse.

By this is explained the comfort that comes from not being victimised by fire.

6. Great King, when a town or a village is plundered by robbers, a recluse who, like me, wears or carries along his requisites, loses nothing while others who have extra requisites suffer loss through the plundering by robbers and know no peace of mind. Freedom from the trouble of looking after one’s possessions is the sixth blessing of a recluse.

By this is explained the comfort that comes from feeling secure against robbers.

7. Great King, a recluse, who has only the eight requisites as his possession, moves freely without being stopped, interrogated or arrested on the road where robbers waylay or security officers patrol. This is the seventh blessing of a recluse.

By this is explained the comfort that comes from harmless travelling on the road where robbers or security men are waiting.

8. Great King, a recluse who has only the eight requisites as his possession can go wherever he likes without taking a long look back at his old place. Such possibility of freely moving about is the eighth blessing of a recluse who has no possessions.

By this is explained the comfort that comes from freely going about without yearning for his old place.

King Arindama interrupted Paccekabuddha Soṇaka's discourse on the blessings of a recluse and asked: "Though you are speaking in praise of the blessings of a recluse, I cannot appreciate them as I am always in pursuit of pleasures. I cherish sensual pleasures, both human and divine. In what way can I gain human and divine existence?" Paccekabuddha Soṇaka replied that those who relish sensuality are destined to be reborn in unhappy [1510] abodes, and only those who abandon it are not destined to be reborn there. By way of an illustration, he told the story of a crow that joyously rode on a dead elephant, but floated into the ocean and lost its life. The Paccekabuddha then spoke of the blemishes of sensual pleasures and departed, travelling through the air.

Being immensely moved by spiritual urgency (saṃvega) as a result of the Paccekabuddha's exhortation, King Arindama handed over the kingship to his son Dīghāvu and left for the Himālayas. After becoming a recluse, he lived on fruits and cultivated and developed absorption (jhāna) through meditation on the four sublime modes of living (Brahma-vihāra): loving-kindness (mettā), compassion (karuṇā), sympathetic joy (muditā) and equanimity (upekkhā), and was reborn in the Brahma realm.

The Nine Disadvantages of a Layman's Clothes

The nine disadvantages of a layman's clothes are:

1. The costliness of the garment.
2. It is available only through connection with its maker.

3. It gets soiled easily when used.
4. It gets worn out and tattered easily owing to frequent washing and dyeing.
5. It is difficult to find a replacement for the old one.
6. It is unsuitable for a recluse.
7. It must be guarded against loss through theft.
8. It appears to be ostentatious when put on.
9. When taken along without being worn, it is burdensome and makes one appear to be avaricious.

The Twelve Advantages of the Fibre-Robe

They twelve advantages of the fibre-robe are:

1. It is inexpensive but of fine quality.
2. There is the possibility of making it by oneself.
3. It is not easily soiled when used and is easily cleaned.
4. It is easily discarded when worn out, without a need for stitching and mending.
5. There is no difficulty in seeking a replacement for the old one.
6. It is suitable for a recluse.
7. It need not be guarded against loss through theft.
8. It does not appear to be ostentatious when putting it on.
9. It is not burdensome when taken along or put on.
10. There is no attachment to the robe as a requisite for the user.
11. It is easily made just by beating the bark from a tree; thus it is righteously and faultlessly gained.
12. There is no regret over its loss or destruction.

The fibre-robe means the robe made of fibre, which is obtained from a kind of grass and fastened together. This is described in the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA).

According to the Poem about Aspiration (Hsutaṅgan Pyo), fastening the fibres together itself is not the complete making of such a garment. It must be beaten so as to make it soft and smooth. That is why it is called “beaten fibre” in Myanmar. The “fibre-robe” has the name vāka-cīra, vakkala, and tirīṭaka in Pāli. [1511]

Vāka-cīra literally means “a robe made of grass,” and, therefore, it should actually be translated as “grass-robe.” But traditional teachers translate the word as “fibre-robe.”

The remaining two names, vakkala and tirīṭaka, refer to a robe made of fibres that come from the bark of a tree. Though the word vakka of vakkala means the “bark of a tree,” it does not denote pure, thick, outer crust of the bark, but the inner layers made up of fibres covering the wood-core. It should be noted that, because such fibres are taken off, fastened and beaten for softness and smoothness, the robe is called a fibre-robe. Though vāka-cīra has the meaning of “grass-robe,” the process of making the robe out of fibres taken from trees is more common than that of making it out of grass, and the name “fibre-robe” is better known than “grass-robos.” That is why the word “fibre-robe” is adopted in the Poem about Aspiration (Hsutaṅgan Pyo).

The Wooden Tripod

The wooden tripod (tidaṇḍa) is a requisite of a recluse. It is a stand with three legs, on which is placed a water jug or pot.

The Water Jug and the Yoke

The water jug (kunḍikā) is another requisite of a recluse. A yoke (khāri-kāja) is taken by traditional teachers as a combination of khāri and kāja, both meaning the same: a pole which is curved. According to some, khāri means a recluse’s set of requisites, which consists of a flint, a needle, a fan, etc. Taking these interpretations together, khāri-kāja may be taken as the pole on which are hung the various requisites of a recluse.

The Hide of a Black Antelope

The hide of a black antelope, complete with hoofs, is called ajina-camma and is also one of the requisites of a recluse, which may be explained as follows: the Pāli ajina-camma has been unanimously translated “the hide of a black antelope” by ancient scholars. It is generally thought, therefore, that a beast which is black all over its body is called a “black antelope.” In Amara’s Dictionary (Amara-kosa-abhidhāna, 17.47) the word ajina is explained as “hide,” which is synonymous with camma. This explanation of the Dictionary is worthy of note.

In the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA) and other commentaries, there is an expression meaning: “The hide, complete with hoofs, of a black antelope, which was like a bed of Laurel (punnāga) flowers.” The phrase “complete with hoofs” (sakhuraṃ) indicates that it is the hide of a hoofed animal. When it is said to be “like a bed of Laurel flowers,” we have to decide whether the likeness to a bed of Laurel flowers refers to its colour or to its softness. That the Laurel flowers are not particularly softer than other flowers is known to many. Therefore, it should be decided that the likeness refers to its colour, which is yellow. This suggests then that the hide could not be that of a black antelope.

Though ajina is translated “black leopard” by scholars of old, that it actually means an animal’s coat and is synonymous with camma is evident from such a statement as ajinamhi haññate dīpi, “a leopard is killed for its coat,” in the Birth Story about King Mahā Janaka (Mahā-janaka-jātaka, Ja 539) and the Birth Story about the Wise Suvanṇasāma (Suvanṇasāma-jātaka, Ja 540). The commentary on the Mahā Janaka also explains ajina to be a synonym of camma by saying ajinamhī ti cammatthāya camma-karaṇā, “for its coat means: for obtaining its hide.” There are only two words, dīpi and saddūla, meaning leopard in Pāḷi, ajina is not found in that sense.

The the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) also says: Kese muñcivāhaṃ tattha vāka-cīraṇ-ca cammakam. When Sumedha lay prostrate before Buddha Dīpaṅkara, offering himself as a bridge “he loosened his hair-knot and spread his fibre-robe and the animal hide on the mud.” The Pāḷi word used here is camma which is the same as ajina-camma discussed above.

All these considerations point to the fact that ajina-camma is not the coat of a beast with claws like a tiger, a leopard or a cat, and the adjectival phrase “complete with hoofs” shows that it is the coat of an animal with hoofs like that of cattle or horses. The coat has the colour of a bed of Laurel flowers as mentioned in the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA). It is also very soft to the touch. [1512]

Such animals as the antelope (eṇī) are found in the neighbourhood of the Himālayas. Because its coat is smooth and very beautiful and not easily available, people treasure it as a symbol of auspiciousness.

When Bodhisatta Siddhattha was born, the Cātumahārājika Devas of the four quarters received him from the hands of the saintly Brahmas of the Suddhāvāsa abode with a coat of this particular animal, a coat having a soft fur and commonly regarded to be auspicious. This is mentioned in the introduction of the Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentary and in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) commentary as well.

The author acknowledges that all that has been discussed regarding the translation of ajina-camma as the hide of a black antelope is the view of the great scholar U Lin, the previous compiler of The Great Chronicles of the Buddhas.

Matted Hair and Round Head-Dress Made of Hair

The difference between the matted hair (jaṭā) and the round headdress made of hair (jaṭā-maṇḍala) should be understood. Matted hair is something that is a part of the recluse. In order to save the trouble of keeping it well groomed, the recluse knots his hair firmly and tightly. This is what is meant by “matted hair.”

One of the requisites created and left in the hut by Vissakamma as mentioned in the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA) is the round headdress made of hair called jaṭā-maṇḍala. This is a thing separate from the recluse’s person, and so it is not a part of him. From the sentence: “He put the headdress on his topknot and fastened it with an ivory hairpin,” it is clear that the headdress is a thing separate from Sumedha’s hair-knot. It evolved into a recluse’s headdress in later times and protects the hair from dust and litter.

The author here mentions the opinions of the Monywa Zetawun Sayādaw and Mahā Sīlavamsa who stated that the “matted hair” and “headdress” are the same thing. But the author concludes his discussion by quoting the Poem about the Brahmin’s Son Hatthipāla (Hatthipāla Pyo), the Magadha Light on the Dictionary (Abhidhānappadīpikā), and certain Birth Stories (Jātaka) which say that they are two different things. By quoting the Poem about the Brahmin’s Son Hatthipāla and the Great Cause of Learning

(Mahā-suta-kārī)<sup>364</sup> the author finally says that just as a snare is used to catch a bird, so also the matted hair in the form of a snare is worn by a recluse to catch the great bird of “the eightfold noble path” as soon as it alights in the forest that is “his mind.”

The Eight Kinds of Recluses

The word “recluse” refers to those who are outside the Buddha’s teaching. Nevertheless, they should be regarded as holy persons of the time.

The commentary on the Discourse to Ambaṭṭha (Ambaṭṭha-sutta, DN 3) enumerates eight kinds of recluses as follow:

1. A recluse who piles up wealth and lives a householder’s life (saputta-bhariya). Here the author mentions Keṇiya<sup>365</sup> of the Buddha’s lifetime as an example.
2. A recluse who does not pile up wealth, and who does not live a householder’s life, but who collects unhusked grain from lay people at threshing grounds and cooks his own food (uñchā-cariya).
3. A recluse who collects husked grain from laymen in villages and cooks his own food (anaggi-pakkika). He thinks husking grain by pounding is not worthy of one who lives a recluse’s life.
4. A recluse who enters a village and collects cooked rice (asāmapāka). He thinks cooking is not worthy of one who lives a recluse’s life.
5. A recluse who takes off the bark of a tree for food by means of a metal (aya-muṭṭhika) or stone implement (asma-muṭṭhika). He thinks to collect food each day is wearisome.
6. A recluse who takes off the bark of a tree with his teeth for food (danta-vakkalika). He thinks to carry metal or stone implements is wearisome. [1513]

---

Miscellaneous Topics – 2433

7. A recluse who lives on the fruits that fall by throwing stones or sticks at them (pavatta-phala-bhojana). He thinks to remove the bark is wearisome.
8. A recluse who lives only on leaves, flowers and fruits falling naturally from trees (paṇḍu-palāsika).

The last one is divided into three types:

1. He who remains seated without rising and who lives on leaves, flowers and fruits that fall within his reach (ukkaṭṭha-paṇḍu-palāsika).
2. He who moves from tree to tree and subsists only on leaves, flowers and fruits that fall from a single tree (majjha-paṇḍu-palāsika).
3. He who moves from tree to tree in search of leaves, flowers and fruits that fall naturally from trees, to maintain himself (mudu-paṇḍu-palāsika).

In addition, the author gives a somewhat different enumeration that is mentioned in the commentary on the Discourse about Conscience (Hiri-sutta) of the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta, Snp 15):

1. A recluse who leads a householder's life earning his living by farming, trading, etc., like Keṇiya and others (saputta-bhariya).
2. A recluse who, living near a city gate and teaching children of noble (khattiya) and Brahmin families, accepts only grain and crops but not gold and silver (uñchā-carika).
3. A recluse who lives only on food that is obtained at the meal time (sampatta-kālika).
4. A recluse who lives only on uncooked fruits and vegetables (anaggi-pakka).
5. A recluse who wanders from place to place with metal or stone implements in hand to remove the bark from trees for food whenever he feels hungry, and who observes precepts and cultivates meditation on the four sublime states (aya-muṭṭhika).
6. A recluse who wanders from place to place without metal or stone implements in hand and who removes the bark from trees with his teeth whenever he feels hungry and who observes precepts and cultivates meditation on the four sublime states (danta-luyyaka).

7. A recluse who lives depending upon a natural pond or a forest and who, going nowhere else, subsists on the lotus stems and stalks from the pond or on the fruits and flowers from the forest grove or even on the bark of trees when other kinds of sustenance are not available and who observes precepts and cultivates meditation on the four sublime states (pavatta-phalika).
8. A recluse who subsists on leaves that fall naturally and observes precepts and cultivates meditation on the four sublime states (vaṇṭa-muttika).

In these two lists of eight kinds of recluses, each type is nobler than the preceding type. Again, in these lists, excepting the first type: saputta-bhariya, all are holy persons, observing precepts and cultivating meditation on the four sublime states.

Sumedha came under the fourth category of the list given in the Chapter on Virtue (Sīlakkhandā) commentary for one day, a recluse who collects and lives only on food cooked by others (asāma-pāka); for the following days, he remained as a recluse of the eighth type: one who lives only on leaves, flowers and fruits that fall naturally from trees (paṇḍu-palāsika). According to the list given in the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta) commentary, he came under the eighth category: a recluse who subsists only on leaves that fall naturally from trees and who observes precepts and cultivates meditation on the four sublime states (vaṇṭa-muttika).

The Three Kinds of Going Forth

The Pāli word pabbajjā has been translated as “the going forth as a recluse” by teachers of old. [1514] That is to say it is the “giving up a worldly life.” It is of three kinds:

1. Giving up of worldly life and becoming a seer (isi-pabbajjā).
2. Giving up of worldly life and becoming an ascetic (samaṇa-pabbajjā).
3. Giving up of worldly life and becoming a novice (sāmaṇera-pabbajjā).

Accordingly, there are three kinds of persons worthy of veneration and addressed as “shin” in Myanmar. They are seers (isi), ascetics (samaṇa) and novices (sāmaṇera).

The Eight Disadvantages of a Leaf-Hut

1. A hut requires the dweller to make efforts to acquire timber and other materials for its construction.
2. It requires the dweller to take constant care and to provide maintenance or reconstruction when the grass roof and mud of the walls decay and fall into ruins.
3. It requires the dweller to make room at any time for a visiting senior elder, who is entitled to suitable accommodation, so that he fails to get concentration of mind.
4. Being sheltered from sun and rain under its cover, the dweller tends to become soft and feeble.
5. With a roof and surrounding wall to provide privacy, it serves as a hiding place for committing blameworthy, evil deeds.
6. It creates attachment for the dweller, who then thinks: “It is my dwelling place.”
7. Living in it makes the inhabitant appear to be living a householder’s life with family.
8. It requires the inhabitant to deal with nuisances created by domestic pests, such as fleas, bugs, lizards, etc.

These are the disadvantages of a leaf-hut which Sumedha discerned and which prompted him to abandon the hut.

The Ten Advantages of the Foot of a Tree

1. The foot of a tree does not require the dweller to acquire building materials because it is already a dwelling place provided by nature.
2. It does not require the inhabitant to take constant care and to provide maintenance.
3. It does not require the inhabitant to make room for visiting senior elders.

4. It does not provide privacy, nor serve the inhabitant as a hiding place for committing evil deeds.
5. One who lives there is free from stiffness of limbs, unlike those dwelling in the open space, who suffer from such a discomfort.
6. One who lives there does not have to take possession of it as his own property.
7. One who lives there is able to abandon it without any attachment that comes with thinking: “It is my dwelling place.”
8. One who lives there does not have to request others to vacate the place for the purpose of cleaning.
9. It makes a pleasant place for the one who lives there.
10. Since One who lives there can easily find similar dwelling places wherever he goes, he does not cling to it as “my dwelling place.”

On V: The Prophecy

As has been said, Sumedha reflected: “What is the use of selfishly escaping the cycle of births alone,” and this is mentioned in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa, Bv 2.56): Kim me ekena tinṇena, “why should I cross over by myself?”

Quoting this Pāli sentence, people are fond of saying with a tinge of contempt: “One [1515] should not be selfish in this world. A selfish person is one who seeks only his own good. One who seeks only his own welfare is a useless person.”

But, if one continues to read the same sentence one would come across: Purisena thāma-dassinā, “in spite of the fact that I am a superior person, fully aware of my prowess of wisdom, faith and energy,” which explicitly qualifies the foregoing sentence. All this indicates that only those who, despite their ability, are selfish, and not willing to work for others, should be blamed. And those who have no such ability, who say: “I will work for others,” and are not true to their words, should be despised, for they do not know the limits of their own capability. As a matter of fact, those who have no ability to work for others, should look after their own interest. That is why it is taught in the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, Dh 166):

Atta-d-attham paratthena bahunā pi na hāpaye.

Atta-d-attham-abhiññāya sadattha-pasuto siyā.

Let him not sacrifice his own interest by being willing to work too much for others. Knowing full well his own limited ability he should work for his own welfare.

This teaching of the Dhamma Verses means: “He who is incompetent to work for others but speaks as though he were competent cannot do good for others, nor can he do good for himself; thus he suffers a double loss. Therefore, he who is incompetent to work for others should seek his own good and work only for himself. He who knows the true extent of his own capability and works only for himself should not be blamed as a selfish person, but should be spoken of as a good person who works within the limits of his capability. On the contrary, he who is qualified like Sumedha to render service to others but runs only after his own interest, ignoring others’ interests should truly be censured as a selfish person. In short, let him work for others, if he is competent. If not, let him look after himself so that he may not miss his interest. He who seeks his own interest but pretends to be working for others’ welfare is surely a dishonest, cunning, evil person.”

Nerañjarā

Nerañjarā, as the name of a river, is derived from nela-jala, nela meaning “faultless” and jala, meaning water; hence “the river with pure, clean water.”

Another derivation is from nīla-jala, nīla meaning “blue” and jala meaning water; “blue water” signifies “clear water,” hence: “the river with clear blue water.”

Yet another derivation is from nari-jarā meaning a hydraulophone, a kind of musical instrument which produces a sound similar to that of the flowing waters in a stream.

Honouring Others

“Honouring him with eight handfuls of flowers,” in Pāli is aṭṭhahi puppha-muṭṭhīhi pūjetvā, which occurs in the Birth Stories commentary (Jātaka, PTS 1.16) and the Chronicles of the Buddhas commentary (Buddha-vamsa, PTS 94). Over this phrase, there has been a controversy whether a living Buddha should pay respect to a Bodhisatta who would become a Buddha only many aeons later. Even if one argues that Buddha Dīpaṅkara was paying homage not to the person of the recluse Sumedha but only to the omniscient wisdom (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) he would attain, this argument also is unacceptable as it is inappropriate that the present possessor of omniscience should pay respect to the omniscience yet to be attained by a Bodhisatta.

The whole controversy rests on the translation of the word pūjetvā, which is connected with pūjā. The Supplementary Readings (Khuddaka-pāṭha) commentary explains that pūjā means sakkāra, “treating well,” mānana, “holding in esteem,” and vandanā, “salutation, homage, or obeisance.” The author gives his view that in honouring the recluse Sumedha with eight handfuls of flowers, the Buddha was not saluting or paying homage or obeisance (vandanā), but he was merely giving good treatment (sakkāra) to Sumedha and showing the high esteem (mānana) in which he held him.

Prophetic Phenomena

“Prophetic phenomena,” is the rendering into English of the Pāli word nimitta, which means a phenomenon foretelling a good or evil event that is likely to take place.

The text mentions the prophetic phenomenon which took place on the day the planet Visākhā conjoined with the full moon. That day is reckoned as the full moon day of May (Vesākha). The day is regarded usually to be auspicious, as it is the full moon day of the first month of the year.

All the previous Buddhas received their prophecies of becoming a Buddha on the full moon day of May. So when Sumedha received the prediction on the same auspicious day, Devas and Brahmas were quite positive about the proclamation that Sumedha would definitely become a Buddha.

The author further mentions that the full moon day of May is not only the day on which the prophecy was received, but also the day on which Bodhisattas took their last birth in the human world; it is also the day on which they attained Perfect Self-Awakening and the day on which they passed away into Nibbāna.

The full moon of May (Vesākha) is so auspicious that in the traditional customs of Myanmar kings of the past have had themselves anointed and crowned on this particular day.

Thirty-two prophetic phenomena occurred on the day Sumedha received the prediction. These phenomena were different from those that took place on the days of Buddha's conception, birth, Awakening and the teaching of the first discourse.

The Two Kinds of Meditation

Contemplation of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha are various forms of meditation. Meditation is of two kinds: meditation for refreshing the mind and meditation for insight.

1. A yogi, who contemplates loathsomeness of the body through reflecting on the ten stages of the dead body, may feel repulsed by the unpleasant object and his mind may stray like an untamed bull. In such a case, he should shift his object of meditation from the original object of the dead body and contemplate on the Buddha, the Dhamma or the Saṅgha. Then the mind will become refreshed and reinvigorated. The hindrances then fall away. Then he can go back to his original contemplation on the loathsomeness of the body.

It is like the case of a strong man trying to cut down a big tree to build a pinnacle for a shrine. His sword or hatchet might get blunt after cutting off just the branches of the big [1145] tree and he might find it unusable for felling the tree. Then he would go to the blacksmith and get his blunt blade sharpened. After which, equipped with the sharpened blade, he could successfully chop down the whole tree.

The yogi, after refreshing his mind by contemplating on the Buddha, the Dhamma or the Saṅgha resumes his contemplation on the loathsomeness of the body. When he gains concentration and achieves the first absorption (jhāna) of the form realm, he meditates on the five factors of the absorption as being impermanent, suffering and insubstantial. And when the mind gains the ten stages of insight into conditioned phenomena, it matures into path-knowledge and fruition. This is the first kind of meditation.

2. A yogi contemplating the Buddha, the Dhamma or the Saṅgha first strives to achieve access concentration (upacāra-jhāna). Then he meditates on the very nature of his mental exercise. If he has been contemplating the Buddha, he applies his mind to the question: “Who is it that is meditating? Is it a man or a woman? Is he a human, a Deva, a Māra, or a Brahma?” He views the question objectively to get at the ultimate facts. Then he will come to perceive the fact that, in the ultimate sense, there is no such thing as a man, woman, Deva, Māra or Brahma; and that, in truth and reality, it is just the mind that is mindful of the object under meditation that is recollecting the attribute of the Buddha such as being Worthy (Araham).

Then he comes to understand that the mind that is being mindful of the mind-object is the aggregate of consciousness (viññāṇakkhandha); that the sensation that is associated with the consciousness is the aggregate of sensation (vedanākkhandha); that the perceiving of the sensation associated with the consciousness is the aggregate of perception (saññākkhandha); that the contact (phassa) with the sensation that arise together with the consciousness is the aggregate of volitions (saṅkhārakkhandha). Thus he understands the nature of mind and the four mental aggregates which are mental phenomena.

Further, he examines through the insight gained so far: On what do the mental aggregates depend? He perceives first, the physical base of mental phenomena (hadaya-vatthu). Next he perceives that the physical base is dependent on the four primary elements (mahā-bhūta-rūpa). Then he meditates on other corporeality that are dependent on the four primary elements. He exercises his mind diligently and in due course comprehends the nature of corporeality that such is the aggregate of corporeality, which is just physical phenomena devoid of any real person or being, and that, in truth and reality, there is no “I” or “he or she,” “man,” “woman,” etc. apart from the physical phenomena. He now gains insight into the two different kinds of phenomena, that is, mental and physical, in the last analysis, and understands that these two different phenomena are composed of the five aggregates in a detailed analysis.

Then he understands that these five aggregates are, in truth and reality, unsatisfactory and suffering and thus understands the truth of suffering (dukkha). Then he also knows that craving is the cause of suffering; and that cessation of both suffering and the cause of suffering is the truth of cessation; and that the noble path of eight constituents is the practice that is the condition for cessation. Thus having penetrating knowledge of the four truths, the yogi develops the insight, stage by stage, until it culminates in the fruition of the path-knowledge and he becomes a noble one (ariya). The meditation thus culminating in him becoming a noble one (ariya) is the kind of contemplation directed towards insight.

These remarks are extracted from the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) on dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda).

The Method of Contemplating Sensations

[This section was originally contained in chapter 39b on Sakka's Questions. As it is very elaborate and convoluted I have removed it to these Further Explanations.]

Now we shall deal with the Buddha's elaborate manner of teaching the subject of meditation on the three kinds of sensations. The explanation of them, as contained in the commentary and the sub-commentary, will be condensed as best as we can.

1. The mentally agreeable sensation that tends to increase demeritoriousness and to decrease meritoriousness, and which should not be resorted to. This kind of pleasant sensation is called home-dependent agreeable sensation (geha-sita-somanassa-vedanā). Visible objects, sounds, odours, tastes, tangible objects and thoughts, these six sensuous objects serve as a home for craving and are therefore termed as such. This mentally agreeable sensation arises together with craving because of these sensuous objects. If one allows the repeated arising of that kind of sensation, demeritoriousness grows and meritoriousness wanes every day. That is why the Buddha said this home-dependent agreeable sensation is not to be resorted to.

Home-dependent agreeable sensation should not be resorted to, the pleasure of the senses arise together with craving for the six kinds of agreeable sense objects that are cognized at the six sense spheres. As there are six sense objects which constitute the bases of these mentally agreeable sensations, there are six kinds of such sense-pleasure.

The mentally agreeable sensation that tends to decrease demeritoriousness and to increase meritoriousness, and which should be resorted to, means agreeable sensation that relies on renunciation (nekkhamma-sita-somanassa-vedanā). Herein, taking up the homeless life of a monastic, the attainment of absorption (jhāna), the realization of Nibbāna, insight knowledge, and all meritorious actions that break away from the hindrances are called renunciation or emancipation (nekkhamma) from worldliness.

Let's expand this: One sets one's goal of release from the rounds of rebirth and, leaving hearth and home, goes to the monastery, takes up the life of a monastic, establishes oneself in the purity of the four kinds of monastic precepts (catu-pārisuddhi-sīla), practises asceticism, meditates for concentration on meditation devices (kaṣiṇa), attains the first fine material meditation (rūpa-jhāna), and cultivates insight using that meditation as the foundation, all these practices are called acts of renunciation (nekkhamma). Pleasure derived from these activities is called pleasure dependent on renunciation. If one cultivates the repeated arising of this kind of agreeable sensation that relies on renunciation, demeritoriousness decreases and meritoriousness increases. That is why the Buddha said this agreeable sensation that relies on renunciation should be resorted to.

Regarding the naturally agreeable sensations dependent on renunciation (nekkhamma-sita-somanassa-vedanā), there are also six kinds based on the agreeable sense objects of six kinds that cause the arising of the agreeable sensation, beginning from the first step of renouncing the householder's life to the attaining of mundane and supermundane meditation up to the third absorption (jhāna). In the teaching, the two categories of pleasant sensation, the six home-dependent agreeable sensations and the six agreeable sensations dependent on renunciation occur frequently.

With regard to disagreeable sensations and neutral sensations which will be mentioned in due course, the terms of six home-dependent and six dependent on renunciation will also appear frequently. It should be noted that these terms are also used with reference to the six sense objects.

In the third paragraph, the type of agreeable sensations dependent on renunciation [963], there is, firstly, the one that arises together with initial application of the mind (vitakka) and sustained application of the mind (vicāra). This refers to the pleasurable sensation that arises from the time of taking up the monastic life till the attainment of the first absorption (jhāna).

Secondly, there is the one that arises without the initial application of the mind (vitakka) and sustained application of the mind (vicāra). This refers to the pleasurable sensation that arises at the attainment of the second and the third absorptions (jhāna). The second is superior to the first. In this third paragraph, the Buddha compares the two ways in which monastics may attain the Arahāt fruition (Arahatta-phala).

To expand this statement: The first monastic, in contemplating the pleasant sensation that arises together with an initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, that is, pleasant sensation pertaining to the sense sphere (kāmāvacara-somanassa-vedanā) and pleasant sensation pertaining to the first meditation of the fine material sphere (rūpāvacara-paṭhama-jhāna-somanassa-vedanā) contemplate: “On what does the pleasant sensation depend?” And he perceives that it depends on the physical body. Then he proceeds to contemplate the three characteristics of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and unsubstantiality (anatta) of mental phenomena, as has been described above. And in due course he attains the Arahāt fruition (Arahatta-phala).

The second monastic, in contemplating the pleasant sensation that arises without initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, that is, the second and the third meditations (jhāna) of the fine material sphere (dutiya-tatiya-jhāna-somanassa-vedanā) through developing insight as mentioned earlier on, attains the Arahāt fruition.

In the above two cases, the object of meditation of the second monastic which is the pleasant sensation not in association with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, is superior to the object of meditation of the first monastic which is the pleasant sensation associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind. The thoughts of the second monastic that contemplate on the mind-object or sensation in its three characteristics, being not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, are superior to the thought of the first monastic which are associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind. In the matter of attainment of the fruition consciousness also, that of the second monastic which is not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, is superior to that of the first monastic which is associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind.

2. The unpleasant sensation which tends to increase demeritoriousness and decrease meritoriousness, and is therefore not to be resorted to, refers to home-dependent disagreeable sensation (geha-sita-domanassa-vedanā). When one does not get some desirable visible object, sound, odour, taste, tangible object, or thought cognized through or by the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind, one feels miserable. When these six kinds of sense objects that one has enjoyed do not last, they are painfully missed by the one who cherishes them. Thus unpleasant sensation (domanassa-vedanā) arises in one on account of the six sense objects. If these unpleasant sensations are allowed to arise repeatedly, demeritoriousness increases, and meritoriousness decreases. That is why the Buddha said that unpleasant sensation arising out of the six sense objects should not be resorted to.

The unpleasant sensation which tend to decrease demeritoriousness and increase meritoriousness, and should therefore be resorted to means disagreeable sensations dependent on renunciation (nekkhamma-sita-domanassa-vedanā). To the monastic who has renounced the worldly life and taken the practice of insight-development through various methods of contemplation, then visible objects, sounds, odours, tastes, tangible objects, and thoughts are perceived as impermanent and subject to change. Further, there comes the realization that [964] in truth and reality, the six sense objects in the past as well as at present are impermanent, subject to change, and are suffering. This realization is insight knowledge. Once the true nature of the six sense objects is understood, the mind of that monastic yearns for release from the six sense objects which arise in the conditioned phenomena of mind and matter. Directing his mind to Nibbāna, he has a longing (pihā), a mild form of greed (lobha) in the ultimate sense, to attain the supermundane.

In this connection, the Pāḷi term longing (pihā) needs some explaining. The expression: “The longing to attain the supermundane,” does not mean that longing takes the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala) as its object, because longing is a mild form of greed which primarily is a demeritorious factor. Not to speak of a demeritorious factor, even meritorious factors divested of wisdom do not take Nibbāna as their object. Hence longing does not take Nibbāna as its object.

The fact is that the yogi has hearsay knowledge of Nibbāna. The sublime attributes of Nibbāna have not only been learnt about from other people, they have become imbued in the yogi’s mind through book learning, meditation and insight development, and a yearning towards Nibbāna has thus already been formed. This knowledge, of course, still remains in the province of concept (paññatti) only, but a fairly close idea of Nibbāna is obtained by intelligent reasoning. As a matter of fact, the absorption, paths, fruitions and Nibbāna, belong to the province of the supermundane; they are, therefore, as subtle as they are profound, and it is not easy for a yogi who has not become a noble one (ariya) to get a true idea of them. At best, he can only visualise the supermundane and wish to attain it with longing (pihā).

After the arising of the longing to attain the supermundane, the yogi drives towards his goal by cultivating insight. If, in spite of these earnest efforts, the goal is still not reached, the yogi gets frustrated: “Alas, how success evades me for all my efforts over such a long period,” he says to himself. The unpleasant sensation he now experiences is called disagreeable sensation dependent on renunciation. The repeated arising of this kind of unpleasant sensation is conducive to success.

The more disappointed he is, the greater his resolution to attain his objective, which turns into a sufficing condition (upanissa-paccaya) for success. Demeritoriousness decreases in him and meritoriousness increases. That is why the Buddha said that disagreeable sensations dependent on renunciation should be resorted to.

Although unpleasant sensation (domanassa-vedanā) is a mental factor definitely accompanied by initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind (savitakka-savicāra), the yogi is apt to take home-dependent disagreeable sensation (geha-sita-domanassa-vedanā) as the unpleasant sensation that arises together with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind (savitakka-savicāra) and disagreeable sensation dependent on renunciation (nekkhamma-sita-domanassa-vedanā) as the unpleasant sensation that arises without initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind (avitakka-avicāra). Therefore, unpleasant sensation is mentioned in these two ways.

To further explain: In this teaching, a monastic cultivates insight (vipassanā) meditation after getting established in absorption (jhāna), whether threshold meditation (upacāra-jhāna) or first absorption (paṭhama-jhāna), and if he cannot attain path and fruition he feels dejected and has disagreeable sensations (domanassa-vedanā). In such a case, the absorption (jhāna) which was used for development of the paths and fruitions are called unpleasant or disagreeable (domanassa), by way of a figure of speech because the meditation as preliminary steps in the course of his path of practice are to him something he does not want. If, in spite of the disappointment, he perseveres and ultimately attains the paths and fruitions, the supermundane Dhamma that he realizes is also called disagreeable in a figurative sense since it is the outcome of, or is caused by, the disagreeable sensation.

The yogi or meditator regarding his own thoughts associated with the initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind which cause unpleasant sensation, or regarding his own thoughts which are not associated with initial application of the mind or sustained application of the mind which causes his unpleasant sensation as unpleasant sensation itself, associated with or dissociated with, initial application of the mind, as the case may be, then reflects: “Oh, how long will it be before I can successfully gain insight into unpleasant sensation which arises together with initial application of the mind [965] and sustained application of the mind?” or “How long will it be before I can successfully gain insight into unpleasant sensation which arises without initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind?”

Furthermore, he considers the fruition-knowledge that is caused by unpleasant sensation associated with, or arising together with, initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, as attainment of fruition (phala-samāpatti), through unpleasant sensation associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind; and the fruition-knowledge, that is caused by unpleasant sensation not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, as attainment of fruition through unpleasant sensation which is not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind. Thinking thus, he reflects: “How long will it be before I can attain fruition which is caused by unpleasant sensation associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind? Or, fruition which is caused by unpleasant sensation not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind?” He then enters upon a series of rigorous practices extending from three months to six months, and then to nine months.

First of all, he commits himself to a three-month training schedule. During the first month, he allows himself to sleep two out of the three watches of a night, meditating during one watch of the night. In the middle period; the second month, he allows himself to sleep only one watch of the night, meditating during two watches of the night. In the third month, he allows himself no sleep but meditates during the three watches of the night, alternating between walking and sitting. It may well be this training ends up in the Arahat fruition (Arahatta-phala). Otherwise, he does not relent but takes upon himself an additional six months of rigorous training.

In these six months, three periods of two months each are marked out as waking portions and sleeping portions of the night, as in the three-month training. After the six-month training, if he still does not attain the Arahat fruition, the monastic does not relent, but takes an additional nine months of rigorous training.

This nine-month training is made up of three periods of three months each. During the first period, the yogi allows himself to sleep two out of the three watches of the night and meditates during one watch. In the middle period, he allows himself to sleep only one watch of the night, meditating during two watches. In the third period, he allows himself no sleep but spends the whole night meditating, in alternating postures of walking and sitting.

Dependent Origination

We shall now explain dependent origination in a manner neither too brief nor too detailed. This verse from the commentary on the Analysis of Dependent Origination is a summary (Vibh 6, PTS 130).

Saccam̐ satto paṭisandhi, paccayākāram-eva ca, duddassā caturo dhammā, desetuñ-ca sudukkarā.

The veracity of the four truths, the illusion of a “being” as regards [1146] the five aggregates, the process of rebirth that links up existences, the conditionality of all things such as ignorance, these four subjects are difficult for one to understand and, having understood, are difficult to explain to others.

Dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda), being one of the difficult subjects to understand, will now be explained using the brief exposition in the text, based on the late Ledi Sayādaw’s 13 expository verses on dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda). The synoptic text of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) is:

*Avijjā-paccayā saṅkhārā,
saṅkhāra-paccayā viññāṇaṃ,
viññāṇa-paccayā nāma-rūpaṃ, nāma-rūpa-paccayā saḷāyatanaṃ,
saḷāyatana-paccayā phasso, domanassupāyāsā sambhavanti, evam-etassa kevalassa dukkhakkhandhassa samudayo hoti.*

With ignorance of the truth as the condition, due to the inability to see things as they truly are, volitions that pertain to present and future existences come about (avijjā-paccayā saṅkhārā).

With volitions pertaining to the present and future existences as condition rebirth-linking consciousness comes about (saṅkhāra-paccayā viññāṇaṃ).

With rebirth-linking consciousness as condition mind and matter comes about (viññāṇa-paccayā nāma-rūpaṃ).

With mind and body as condition the six kinds of sensitive corporeality, called the six sense spheres, come about (nāma-rūpa-paccayā saḷāyatanaṃ).

With the six sense spheres as condition the six kinds of contact, with their respective sense objects, come about (saḷāyatana-paccayā phasso).

With the six kinds of contact as condition the six kinds of sensation, that cognize or experience the sense objects, come about (phassa-paccayā vedanā).

With the six kinds of sensation as condition the six kinds of craving for the six sense objects come about (vedanā-paccayā taṇhā).

With the six kinds of craving as condition, clinging or deep-rooted attachment comes about (taṇhā-paccayā upādānaṃ).

With clinging as condition, the causal process of ones' own actions, with their results in the present and in future existences, comes about (upādāna-paccayā bhavo).

With the causal process of one's own actions as condition, recurrence of fresh existences or rebirth comes about (bhava-paccayā jāti).

With rebirth as condition, ageing-and-death, grief, lamentation, bodily pain, distress of mind, and agony, come about (jāti-paccayā jarāmarañam soka-parideva-dukkha-domanassūpayāsā sambhavanti).

Homage to the peerless lord of all Devas, who has the penetrative knowledge of the four truths! I shall now explain the causal law that governs the ceaseless rounds of existences in the three spheres: the sensuous sphere, the form realm and the formless realm. Not knowing the four truths on account of the great darkness of ignorance, the worldling does not understand the fires of defilements in him and so, being deeply attached to the five aggregates that are merely fuel to the burning defilements, and he commits demeritorious deeds with heart and soul every day. Thinking of the glorious existences in the human world and the [1147] Deva realm as real happiness, he also performs meritorious deeds of the ten kinds which tend to rebirth in the sensuous sphere and the form realm on the one hand or to the formless realm on the other hand. Thus he does volitional actions that result in endless rebirth in the three spheres.

1. With ignorance as condition there are volitions (avijjā-paccayā saṅkhārā). Dependent on ignorance, volitions arise, i.e., thoughts, words and deeds are caused by a certain motive or volition that are conditioned by ignorance. There are an infinite number of beings that live in the infinite world-elements but all of them, in the ultimate sense, are representations of just the twelve factors of dependent origination: ignorance, volitions, rebirth-linking consciousness, mind and matter, the six sense spheres, contact, sensation, craving, clinging, rebirth and ageing-and-death. Paṭicca means being dependent on, or conditioned by; samuppāda means the arising of the following items, like volitions, rebirth-linking consciousness, etc.

Of these twelve factors, ignorance is the root condition of the earlier part of Saṃsāra. Hence it is mentioned first, as between ignorance (avijjā) and volitions (saṅkhāra), the former is the cause and the latter is the result. Volitions means volitional thoughts, words and deeds.

Ignorance (avijjā) is one of the 52 mental concomitants (cetasika). It is essentially delusion (moha), a demeritorious state of mind. Delusion (moha) is variously rendered as “not knowing,” “unskilled,” “unknowing,” “ignorance” and “delusion.”

Ignorance means: 1) Not knowing the truth of suffering (dukkha), not perceiving the truth that the five mundane aggregates pertaining to the three spheres are suffering; 2) not knowing the origin of suffering, not perceiving the truth that craving (taṇhā) is the cause of suffering; 3) not knowing the truth of cessation, not perceiving the truth that Nibbāna is the cessation of suffering; 4) not knowing the truth of the path, not perceiving the truth that the noble path of eight constituents is the way that leads to Nibbāna.

The fourfold ignorance of the four truths are the conditions whereby all worldlings, blinded by their own ignorance, commit evil deeds that send them down to the four lower worlds (apāya); or perform good deeds that send them to the seven fortunate existences and the sixteen fine-material realms of Brahmās, or to the four non-material realms of Brahmās. The evil deeds are motivated by demeritorious volitions (apuññābhisaṅkhārā). The good deeds that tend to the seven fortunate existences and the fine-material realms are motivated by meritorious volitions (puññābhisaṅkhārā). The volitions in the four types of meritorious deeds leading to the four Brahma realms of the formless realm are called unshakeable volitions (āneñjābhisaṅkhārā). Therefore the Buddha declares that with ignorance as condition, three types of volitions of the mundane meritoriousness and mundane demeritoriousness come to be.

In the eulogistic reference to the Buddha at the beginning of this verse: the penetrative knowledge is compared to the wish-fulfilling gem (joti-rasa), one of the seven boons of a Universal Monarch; the four truths is symbolised by the four island continents over which a Universal Monarch reigns; the analytical exposition of the four truths is symbolised by the roaming over the four island continents by the Universal Monarch. And the act of reverence is performed by the poet, Ledi Sayādaw, mentally, verbally and physically.

In Buddhist literature there are recognised three kinds of worthy persons or Devas: the Devas who are born instantly as mature individuals are Devas arisen in the heavens; the rulers who have sovereignty over a country are conventionally called Devas; and Arahats, the Worthy Ones, are Devas through purity; and amongst the Arahats the Buddha is peerless. [1148]

The poet calls his subject matter “the train of Saṃsāra that speeds along the three spheres,” because dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) is the ceaseless round of causal factors that gives rise to the aggregates, sense spheres and elements pertaining to the three spheres of existence.

Ignorance (avijjā) is called the great darkness of delusion (mahā-tama). The darkness of ignorance is usually described as having four contributory factors: the darkness that prevails on a first-moon night where no moon shines; at midnight; in the heart of a deep forest; and shrouded with rain clouds. The fourfold ignorance of the worldling is comparable to the four factored darkness.

The worldling shrouded by ignorance commits evil deeds for his immediate welfare through twelve demeritorious thoughts; these volitions are the demeritorious volitions (apuññābhisankhārā) that tend to the miserable existences.

Ignorance not only drives the blinded worldling to commit evil actions, it also drives him to perform good actions that send him to the high existences of the Deva and Brahma worlds. This is because whereas the first two truths of the four truths, the truth of suffering (dukkha) and the truth of the cause of suffering are mundane truths which are of a burning nature; the latter two truths, the truth of cessation and the truth of the path, are supermundane truths which have a cool and tranquil nature. The worldling, especially a worldling who cherishes rebirth, whose mental makeup is shrouded by ignorance, does not understand that the two mundane truths are of a burning nature and so he resorts to them and becomes a slave to his own craving.

When craving overpowers the worldling, particularly those with a natural inclination to the annihilist view, rejecting the afterlife, he sets his sights on the present life only. He is prepared to perpetrate any vicious act for his immediate welfare. He would kill or steal or commit any deed as his demeritorious volition (apuññābhisankhārā) urges him. The worldlings who believe in continued existence or the eternity view, on the other hand, would aspire to higher existences in the future. They would perform meritorious deeds to go to fortunate existences or to be reborn in the formless realm according to their hearts’ desire, all of which are not conducive to gaining paths, fruitions and Nibbāna. These deeds are, as the case may be, either meritorious volitions (puññābhisankhārā) that lead to the sensuous sphere and the form realm, or unshakable volitions (aneñjābhisankhārā) that lead to the formless realm.

As the result of such volitions, fresh existences occur and there is an endless recurrence of suffering.

2. With volitions as condition: rebirth-linking consciousness (sankhāra-paccayā viññāṇam). As the result of volitional actions of the three types, rebirth in the appropriate realms of existence, in the lower worlds (apāya), the human realm or the Deva or Brahma realms takes place. In the new existence, consciousness, which is the key mental factor, arises. Consciousness is of six kinds according to the six sense doors: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind. The six kinds of consciousness each of which arises together with mental concomitants take cognisance of their respective sense objects and enjoy sense pleasures. In so enjoying, a mistaken view of personal identity such as “I see it,” “I hear it,” “I smell it,” etc. arises, and so also the wrong concept of a man or Deva, he or she, etc., arises. All these misconceptions are due to the six kinds of consciousness. And so rebirth in all forms of existence, mostly in the lower worlds (apāya) is perpetuated.

Demeritorious volitions lead to the lower worlds of the downfall (apāya) with the appropriate rebirth-linking consciousness in the sensuous sphere and in the form realm, followed by appropriate resultant consciousness. Meritorious volitions lead to the seven fortunate planes of existence, the human plane and the six Deva realms. These nine types of rebirth-linking [1149] consciousness arise at the moment of rebirth, and at the manifested stage of rebirth, sixteen types of meritorious resultant consciousnesses arise in the sensuous sphere and in the form realm. The meritorious consciousnesses pertaining to the form realm leads to fifteen realms of the form realm where rebirth-linking consciousness followed by the resultant consciousness of the form realm arises. The meritorious volitions pertaining to the formless realm, the unshakable type of volitions, leads to the four realms of the formless realm where rebirth-linking consciousness followed by resultant consciousness of the formless realm arises.

In the matter of good or bad volitions giving rise to resultant consciousness which are appropriate to them, the four stages of endowment (samaṅgitā) should be briefly understood thus:

1. When an action, good or bad, is done, the appropriate volition arises to give effect to it, as good volition or bad volition. That is the endowment of volition at the moment of its arising. The act is being endowed with its appropriate volition (cetanā-samaṅgitā).

2. After a lapse of three phases of consciousness, or three thought-moments, the volition vanishes. However, it does not, like other resultant consciousnesses, disappear completely; it leaves behind the potential that will arise later when circumstances permit as a resultant consciousness. This potential is potent throughout the successive existences unless it becomes inoperative. This mental phenomenon of being endowed with potential is called the endowment of productive deeds (kamma-samaṅgitā).
3. When the time is ripe for the potential of a past deed to arise, whether good or bad, there appear before the appropriate sense sphere of the doer the very act he or she has done, or something connected with the act, such as buildings or tools, etc., or a sign of the oncoming existence. The presentation of any of these three signs at the moment of death is called the endowment of the upcoming existence (upaṭṭhāna-samaṅgītā). Except for Arahats this form of prescience always presents itself to the dying person in sufficient vividness that makes him or her take cognisance of it.
4. After that, one passes away and there arises the rebirth-linking consciousness, followed in the manifestation stage of the fresh existence the resultant consciousness befitting the past deed. This resultant consciousness functions as the life continuum (bhavaṅga) and is always present throughout that existence when no other thought-process occurs. This arising of rebirth consciousness and resultant consciousness is called the endowment of the resultant (vipāka-samaṅgitā).

The resultant (vipāka) is nothing but the maturity of the potential or the endowment of productive deeds (kamma-samaṅgitā) into a specific consciousness in the ultimate sense. It will be seen that resultant consciousness begins as volitional activity or endowment of volition. Therefore, the Buddha declares in brief that “dependent on volitions, the six kinds of consciousness arise.”

The three types of volitions are the cause of renewed existence. As the poet puts it, they are the capital, out of which renewed existence takes shape. Through the natural process of endowments, the four endowments (samaṅgitā), outlined above, a volitional act is possessed of its appropriate resultant. In the renewed existence where the resultant consciousness arises, this consciousness reigns supreme throughout that particular existence. The poet calls it his lordship, for it is the key factor of all mental phenomena, just as the element of heat is the key factor in all physical phenomena.<sup>366</sup>

Resultant consciousness, function-wise, is of six kinds: eye-consciousness, ear-consciousness, nose-consciousness, tongue-consciousness, body-consciousness and mind-consciousness. As there are six sense spheres: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind, eye-consciousness is the supreme consciousness at the eye-door; ear consciousness is the supreme consciousness at the ear-door; nose consciousness is the supreme consciousness at the nose-door; tongue-consciousness is the supreme consciousness at the tongue-door; [1150] body-consciousness is the supreme consciousness at the body-door; and mind-consciousness is the supreme consciousness at the mind-door.

The supremacy of the six kinds of consciousness may be understood thus if we take eye-consciousness, for example. Just as when a powerful prince arises, he has the retinue, the throne and the regal paraphernalia at his command, so also whenever a certain consciousness arises, seven mental concomitants arise together with it that enable it to function properly, serving it like the retinue of the prince. The eye-base or eye door is like the throne of the prince. The eye-sensitivity is like the paraphernalia of the prince. Just as the prince reigns supreme amidst these retinue and regal paraphernalia, so also eye-consciousness enjoys visible objects fully and completely, having dominance over the eye-decad and associated forms of corporeality. The same principle holds true in respect of the other five kinds of consciousness.

The daily activities of a person, when analyzed in the ultimate sense, consist of just these six kinds of sense-consciousness: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching and cognizing. That is why all the physical, verbal and mental activities that are carried out day in and day out fall within the six kinds of consciousness.

Since all human activity is dominated by the six kinds of consciousness for all the days, months and years of a person's life, there comes to be the misconception of a personal identity such as, "I," "he," "she," "man," "Deva;"

and personalised ideas of “I see it,” “I hear it,” “I smell it,” “I eat it,” “I touch it,” “I take cognizance of it,” or “he sees it,” “he hears it,” etc. When this misconception arises, then that person is heading for further existences such as the four lower worlds of the downfall (apāya). All this is due to the six kinds of consciousness.

3. With rebirth-linking consciousness as condition: mind and body (viññāṇa-paccayā nāma-rūpaṃ). Due to the workings of the six kinds of consciousness, a wonderfully intricate body of mental phenomena, such as contact, volition, perception, initial application of the mind, etc. appear, as smoke that accompanies fire; and also, arising together with the body of mental phenomena there is the body of physical phenomena with the four primary elements as the basis, on which 24 types of corporeality depend, thus making 28 types of corporeality. A combination of mental phenomena and physical phenomena, or mind and body arise, manifesting itself in an infinite variety of shapes, forms and sizes. Thus, in the various places of existence, various beings, such as Devas, humans and animals, that live in water, that live on land, etc., noble beings, lowly beings, having various characteristics, all of them a compound of mind and matter, appear in the world.

The six kinds of consciousness give rise to their respective mental concomitants like the retinue of a powerful prince and also an endless variety of corporeality like the regal paraphernalia of the prince.

As fire always arises with smoke, so also consciousness always arises with its mental concomitants like the multi-coloured strand inside the gem called a cat’s-eye. Mental states function wonderfully well to enable the consciousness to accomplish whatever end it is directed to. For instance, there is contact that joins up the sense-organ and its respective sense object; sensation that makes the experiencing of sense objects possible; volition that motivates all the co-arising mental concomitants to carry out their respective tasks, and so on. Together with the mental phenomena, there also arise simultaneously the four primary elements and the 24 types of corporeality that arise dependent on them.

The mind and matter, arising due to the six kinds of consciousness, takes an infinite variety of shapes and forms in various places of existence, ranging from noble beings to lowly beings.

No two individuals have the same appearance or the same type of mentality. This [1151] diversity is due to the diversity of wishes of individuals that are associated with craving. As one's craving fancies, so will a person wish for this or that kind of appearance and this or that type of mentality, and commit acts, good or bad, towards that end. Thus a diversity of craving determines a diversity of action. The diversity of one's past volitional acts produce a diversity of existences with a diversity of individual characters, even within the same plane of existence. Thus, diversity of action determines the diversity of destinations of beings.

4. With mind and matter as condition: the six sense spheres (nāma-rūpa-paccayā saḷāyatanam). The mind and matter complex arises due to consciousness, the body of physical phenomena (rūpa-kāya) gives rise to the five types of sensitive corporeality, such as eye-sensitivity, ear-sensitivity, nose-sensitivity, tongue-sensitivity, and body-sensitivity. And the body of mental phenomena (nāma-kāya) gives rise to mind, which is mind-sensitivity. Each of the sensitivities has its own separate function. Eye-sensitivity cognizes visible objects; ear-sensitivity cognizes sounds; nose-sensitivity cognizes smells; tongue-sensitivity cognizes tastes; body-sensitivity cognizes tangible objects; mind-sensitivity cognizes thoughts and ideas besides doing its own thinking. As the seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching and thinking occur ceaselessly, the worldling considers all these events as, "I see it," "I hear it," "I smell it," "I taste it," "I touch it," "I know it," "I think it," "I am stupid," "I am wise," etc. all from an egocentric view. Thus the six kinds of sensitivity give rise to the fire of false view regarding the five aggregates.

From this verse onwards the elucidations will be mostly based on the verses.

There are four types of beings:

1. There are beings that take birth in an egg.
2. There are beings that are conceived in the mother's womb.
3. There are beings that spring from moisture, such as moss or lotus flower, etc.
4. There are beings that appear as adults at birth.

Just as a fruit acquires its seed at the appropriate stage of its development, so also the egg-born beings and the womb-born beings acquire their eye-sensitivity, ear-sensitivity, nose-sensitivity and tongue-sensitivity at the appropriate stage of development, at the respective sense-organs, such as eye, ear, nose and tongue.

Body-sensitivity arises simultaneously with rebirth-linking consciousness. With the instant-adult type of birth and moisture-sprung type of birth, all the five kinds of sensitive corporeality arise simultaneously with rebirth-linking consciousness. But in the case of Brahmas, there are no nose-sensitivity, tongue-sensitivity and body-sensitivity.

Beings are endowed with past merit to acquire a pair of eyes. Due to that merit corporeality born of productive deeds arises in the present existence. The four primary elements that are produced by the productive deeds of corporeality born of productive deeds is the base on which eye-sensitivity, a kind of dependent corporeality, arises. Likewise, ear-sensitivity, nose-sensitivity, tongue-sensitivity and body-sensitivity are kinds of dependent corporeality that arise dependent on the four primary elements. All of them are corporeality born of productive deeds. This is how the body of physical phenomena (rūpa-kāya) gives rise to the five kinds of sensitive corporeality.

The body of mental phenomena (nāma-kāya) comprising contact, sensation and volition, gives rise to mind or mind-sensitivity that causes the arising of mind-consciousness. Mind-sensitivity is mind-consciousness itself. Here, it has been stated previously that “dependent on consciousness, mind and matter arises.” Now this mind-sensitivity becomes mind-consciousness. Does it amount to saying that “from the offspring, the mother comes to be?” Here, consider the analogy of a tree. A tree grows from the seed. The tree again produces the seed. The first seed is quite distinct from the seed produced by the tree. Similarly, out of 52 mental concomitants, consciousness may at times be dominated by initial [1152] application of the mind and sustained application of the mind; it may at times be dominated by energy (virīya); it may at times be dominated by delightful satisfaction; it may at times be dominated by desire, greed, or anger, etc.

When initial application of the mind is dominant, consciousness obeys the dictates of initial application of the mind. Similarly, consciousness arises under the dominant influence of a sustained application of the mind, or greed, or anger, as the case may be. Thus mental concomitants give rise to mind-sensitivity. Or, take another analogy: fire gives rise to wind, and wind helps fire to grow. Consciousness is like fire; mental concomitants are like wind. Mental concomitants arise due to consciousness, and consciousness is also conditioned by the mental concomitants.

Or take another analogy. The four primary elements are interdependent. Wherever one of them arises, the three others also arise. Similarly, whenever consciousness arises, the appropriate mental concomitants arise together. Whenever mental concomitants arise, there is also consciousness that arises together with them. This is how the body of mental phenomena gives rise to mind or mind-sensitivity.

A living being is able to function only due to the presence of the six sense-spheres; otherwise, he or she would be inert as a log. The sense-spheres are also called six sense doors. They are not doors in the sense that they are opening, but in that they are sensitive to sense-stimuli, like a glass pane window through which light can enter. Eye sensitivity arises at the eye; ear-sensitivity arises at the ear; nose sensitivity arises at the nose; tongue sensitivity arises at the tongue; body sensitivity arises at the whole body, both internally and externally. Mind-consciousness or mind-sensitivity arises at the heart-base. Thus the whole body is provided with the six kinds of sensitivity.

Just as when a bird alights on a branch, the shaking of the branch and the casting of the bird's shadow on the ground below happen simultaneously, so also when a visible object is taken cognizance of by the eye-sensitivity, it is simultaneously taken cognizance of by mind-sensitivity also. Thus with eye-consciousness taking the leading role, an appropriate thought-process arises, making complete the knowing about the event, and one knows: "Ah, this is the sun," "this is the moon," or "ah, this is a man, or a cow, or a buffalo," as it may be.

When a sound is taken cognizance of by ear-sensitivity, it is simultaneously taken cognizance of by mind-sensitivity also; and after due thought processes, a complete knowledge of the sound is made aware, such as: "This is the sound of thunder, or of wind, or of a drum, or of a lute, or a human voice, or the bellowing of a cow," etc., as the case may be.

When an odour is taken cognizance of by nose-sensitivity, or when a taste is taken cognizance of by tongue-sensitivity, or when a tangible object is taken cognizance of by body-sensitivity, it is simultaneously taken cognizance of by mind-sensitivity also.

Mind-sensitivity takes cognizance of the five kinds of sense-data cognized by their respective sense spheres besides other mind-objects covering all sorts of physical and mental phenomena. Then an appropriate thought process arises at the mind-door; and one is fully aware of whatever mind-objects are taken cognizance of. This is the natural process of how sense data is received by the respective sense spheres and a full consciousness about them arises.

As these sense experiences occur ceaselessly to a worldling, and full consciousness about them arises in him, he considers these events as: “I see it,” “I hear it,” “I smell it,” “I taste it,” “I feel it,” “I know it,” “I think it,” “I am stupid,” or, “I am wise,” etc. This misconception about the five aggregates, which is a veritable cauldron of the realm of continuous intense suffering burns furiously with the flames of greed, hatred, delusion, conceit, jealousy, stinginess, etc. Thus all the six sense spheres are glowing with these fires of demeritoriousness. All this is due to the presence of the six sense spheres.

5. With the six sense spheres as condition: contact (saḷāyatana-paccayā phasso). Due to the six sense spheres in their respective places in the body, sense objects corresponding to each of them are clearly reflected as if on a mirror. Visible objects are reflected on the eye-sensitivity; sounds are reflected on the ear-sensitivity; smells are [1153] reflected on the nose-sensitivity; tastes are reflected on the tongue-sensitivity; tangible objects are reflected on the body-sensitivity; the six kinds of mind-objects are reflected on mind-sensitivity of the mind-consciousness, according to the occurrence of events at the five other sense spheres.

When these sense objects are reflected on the respective sense sphere, each with its special sensitivity of its own, there arises contact at each sense sphere as if a flint is struck against the striker in a matchbox.

Due to the coming together of sense sphere, sense object and sense-consciousness, e.g. at the eye-door, due to the conjunction of eye-sensitivity, visual object and eye-consciousness, eye-contact arises very vividly.

Likewise, at the ear-door, due to the conjunction of ear-sensitivity, sound and ear-consciousness, ear-contact arises very vividly. At the nose-door, due to the conjunction of nose-sensitivity, odour and nose-consciousness, nose-contact arises very vividly. At the tongue-door, due to the conjunction of tongue-sensitivity, taste and tongue-consciousness, tongue-contact arises very vividly. At the body-door, due to the conjunction of body-sensitivity, tangible object and body-consciousness, body-contact arises very vividly. At the mind-door, due to the conjunction of mind-sensitivity, the respective sense object reflected through the six sense spheres, and mind-consciousness, mind-contact arises very vividly.

The six kinds of contact are very powerful, like Sakka's Vajira weapon, in translating the sense-experience as agreeable or disagreeable. A visible object reflected on the eye-door that has become eye-contact is distinguished as agreeable or disagreeable, thanks to contact. The same principle holds in respect of the five other sense spheres, where the respective contact sorts out the respective sense objects as agreeable or disagreeable. In describing the function of contact, the poet uses the metaphor of pressing a juicy fruit to yield its flavour. Sweet fruit would yield sweet juice, sour fruit would yield sour juice. Similarly, an agreeable visible object will, through the working of contact, present itself as an agreeable thing to the individual, and a disagreeable object as a disagreeable thing, and so also with the remaining sense-contacts. Agreeable things are looked upon as good things, attractive or pleasant things. Disagreeable things are looked upon as bad things, unattractive or unpleasant things. This differentiation between agreeable or pleasant things and disagreeable or unpleasant things is brought out by contact.

6. With contact as condition: feeling (phassa-paccayā vedanā). The six sense objects are considered by a worldling as agreeable or disagreeable through the functioning of contact. If we review the process of sense cognition we find that the six kinds of consciousness merely know a sense object through the respective sense sphere. It merely sees something, hears something, smells something, tastes something, touches or feels something, and thinks a thought or forms an idea. Contact translates these sense experiences into agreeable things or disagreeable things. When agreeable things are experienced through their respective sense spheres, one feels pleased, or experiences a pleasant sensation. When disagreeable things are experienced one feels displeased, or experiences an unpleasant sensation. Thus the six kinds of contact bring about six kinds of sensation.

Pleasant sensation (sukha-vedanā) is of two aspects, physical and mental, the former is physical ease and comfort, the latter ease of mind. Unpleasant sensation (dukkha-vedanā) is also of two aspects, physical and mental. The former is physical pain, the latter distress of mind.

Sometimes pleasant sensation is used in a combined sense of physical and mental well-being; and unpleasant sensation is used in a combined sense of physical and mental suffering.

Sensation (vedanā) is of three kinds: pleasant sensation, unpleasant sensation, and neither-pleasant-nor-unpleasant sensation. However, in this verse, the neither-pleasant-nor-unpleasant sensation pertaining to demeritoriousness is included in the unpleasant [1154] sensation, while the neither-pleasant-nor-unpleasant sensation pertaining to meritoriousness is included in the pleasant sensation. This point should be noted.

The reader is strongly advised to consult Ledi Sayadaw's Light on Dependent Origination (Paṭicca-samuppāda-dīpanī) to have a fuller understanding of these verses. In the present work a bare paraphrase of the verses is given. The six kinds or elements of sensation:

1. Sensation born of eye-contact.
2. Sensation born of ear-contact.
3. Sensation born of nose-contact.
4. Sensation born of tongue-contact.
5. Sensation born of body-contact.
6. Sensation born of mind-contact (mano-samphassajā-vedanā).

They are called elements because sensations primarily arise only through them. When sensation is discriminated through each of the six kinds of contact, concepts about them – whether pleasant or unpleasant, agreeable or disagreeable, good or bad – are formed in the mind of the person experiencing these various sensations. When an agreeable sensation is experienced, one feels happy and is physically at ease. When a disagreeable sensation is experienced one feels unhappy, distressed, and physically agitated.

Everyone in the world has a single objective of enjoying the element of pleasant sensation. All human activity is earnestly directed towards achieving that objective. But this so-called element of pleasant sensation only brings suffering to worldlings; noble ones (ariya) alone are immune from its evil consequences. Worldlings strive hard in search of pleasant sensation. In extreme cases, this search after pleasant sensation takes the form of even committing suicide, for a person committing suicide decides that death alone is the way he can get peace.

7. With sensation as condition: craving (vedanā-paccayā taṇhā). When one sees an agreeable visible object, through the workings of eye-contact, that object gives a pleasant sensation to the viewer. One is very pleased with it, thinking:

“It’s nice! It’s lovely!” The pleasant sensation causes elation and happiness. Just as when dry rice is sprinkled with butter, it permeates it, so the viewer’s mental process is permeated with joy. Just as a withered lotus when sprinkled with cool water re-awakens, so does he feel refreshed, and his face brightens. This reaction, which arises due to pleasant sensation, is the enjoyment of that sensation. The reaction due to the remaining five sense-pleasures, such as on hearing an agreeable sound, on smelling an agreeable odour, etc., should be understood likewise.

The enjoyment of pleasurable sensations through the six sense spheres whets the appetite to enjoy more and more. Craving arises for pleasant sensation. So, six kinds of pleasant sensation give rise to six kinds of craving: the craving for visible objects, sounds, odours, tastes, tangible objects and for thoughts and ideas.

All beings are attached to their own bodies, in the sense that they want to remain alive. So they are naturally attached to food so as to remain alive. Thence their attachment stretches to paddy as the staple food, and thence to the means of production of paddy such as land, draught animals, and good rains, etc., all connected with paddy. This is a practical example of how craving multiplies itself starting with a certain object of one’s fancy. If one has a fancy for a certain visible object, then things possessing it, connected with it, whether animate or inanimate, are craved for, and it is the same with pleasant sounds, odours, tangible objects, and thoughts.

All the endless objects that are craved for have numerous names. But, from the viewpoint of ultimate reality, they come under six sense objects only, i.e., craving for visual objects, craving for sounds, etc. Here the poet compares the six sense objects to the treasurer of a Universal Monarch who is capable of providing whatever is asked of him.

As all beings are always hankering after the six sense objects, trying to satisfy their sense-desires, they become obsessed with craving which is essentially greed. Therefore, they cannot even dream of the profound truth about craving as the real source of all [1155] suffering. They are prisoners of their own greed and they live and die there.

8. With craving as condition: clinging (taṇhā-paccayā upādānaṃ). It is all well and good if craving for the six sense objects can be given up before they become an obsession. If the indulgence in craving is prolonged over a long period, craving outgrows itself into clinging which is rooted either in craving itself or in wrong view. One clings tenaciously to oneself internally and to external sense objects. Clinging is of four kinds:

1. Clinging to sense-pleasures (kāmupādāna).
2. Clinging to wrong views (diṭṭhupādāna).
3. Clinging to wrong practices as a means to purity (sīlabbatupādāna).
4. Clinging to an illusory self (atta-vādupādāna).

1. Clinging to sense pleasures (kāmupādāna). It is the obsession with sense objects of the six kinds which begins as craving and outgrows itself, like the Myanmar saying: “When an iguana grows too big it becomes an alligator; when a snake grows too big it becomes a serpent.” Clinging therefore is intensified craving.

2. Clinging to wrong view (diṭṭhupādāna). Wrong views are of 62 kinds as described by the Buddha in the Discourse on the Supreme Net (Brahmajāla-sutta, DN 1). Tenacious belief in any wrong view is a form of clinging. The three worst wrong views that send one down to the lower realms are included in the 62 kinds of wrong view mentioned in this verse.

3. Clinging to wrong practices as a means to purity (sīlabbatupādāna). Some ascetics, during the Buddha’s time, resorted to behaving like cows or dogs in the mistaken belief that such practices would purify their hearts and bring salvation. Puṇṇa and Seniya are two ascetics who followed such practices (Kukkura-vatika-sutta, MN 57).

The cow-practice (go-vatika) ascetics were those who believed that all past evil could be obliterated if one took up a stringent ascetic life by living like a cow. Their reasoning was this: Living a stringent life for the whole of the present life makes retribution for all past evil deeds; the present life of asceticism also does not involve any fresh evil deeds. Therefore, all past evil deeds and future evil deeds are eliminated, and this brings eternal happiness. A follower of this creed moves about on all fours like a cow, sleeps like a cow, eats like a cow, without using the hands and generally imitates all bovine behaviour. Interestingly enough one who takes up the bovine practice in a slack manner, will be reborn as a cow; one who takes up the practice too stringently will go to hell after death.

The dog-practice (kukkura-vatika) ascetics were believers in the dog-practice. They believed that, if one could adopt the life and habits of a dog, one would be liberated. A follower of this creed moves about, eats and sleeps like a dog, imitating all the habits of a dog. If one takes up this practice in a slack manner, one will be reborn as a dog. If one takes up the practice too stringently, one will go to hell.

4. Clinging to an illusory self (atta-vādupādāna). The mistaken belief in self (atta) is another tenacious form of clinging. It is based on the five aggregates which are considered erroneously, each in four ways, namely:

1. With regard to corporeality: 1) That corporeality is self, and not being able to perceive corporeality apart from oneself; 2) that mental phenomena are self, and erroneously holding that self has corporeality just like a tree has shade; 3) that mental phenomena are self and erroneously holding that corporeality exists in self just like the scent existing in a flower; 4) that mental phenomena is self and erroneously holding that self exists in corporeality just like a ruby kept in a casket.
2. With regard to sensation: 1) That sensation is self and not being able to perceive sensation apart from oneself; 2) that mental phenomena are self and erroneously holding that self has sensation just like a tree has shade; 3) that mental phenomena are self and erroneously holding that sensation exists in self just like the scent existing in a flower; 4) that mental phenomena is self and erroneously holding that self exists in sensation just like a ruby kept in a casket.
3. With regard to perception: 1) That perception is self and not being able to perceive [1156] perception apart from oneself; 2) that mental phenomena are self and erroneously holding that self has perception just like a tree has shade; 3) that mental phenomena are self and erroneously holding that perception exists in self just like the scent existing in flower; 4) that mental phenomena is self and erroneously holding that self exists in perception just like a ruby kept in a casket.
4. With regard to volitions: 1) That volitions are self and not being able to perceive volitions apart from oneself; 2) that mental phenomena are self and erroneously holding that self has volitions just like a tree has shade; 3) that mental phenomena are self and erroneously holding that volitions exist in self just like the scent existing in a flower; 4) that mental phenomena is self and erroneously holding that self exists in volitions just like a ruby kept in a casket.

- v. With regard to consciousness: 1) That consciousness is self and not being able to perceive consciousness apart from oneself; 2) that mental phenomena is self and erroneously holding that self has consciousness just like a tree has shade; 3) that mental phenomena is self and erroneously holding that consciousness exists in self just like the scent existing in a flower; 4) that mental phenomena is self and erroneously holding that self exists in consciousness just like a ruby kept in a casket.

Therefore, 20 wrong views about the five aggregates give rise to 20 different kinds of wrong view. This view which persists throughout Saṃsāra is called clinging to an illusory self (atta-vādupādāna). So long as the above four kinds of clinging arise in one, there is no escape from the suffering round of existences.

9. With clinging as condition: rebirth (upādāna-paccayā bhavo). Holding fast to the four kinds of clinging, a worldling believes that the body of five aggregates is his own self, his own person. Due to the wrong view of the existence of a self or a person, one seeks immediate gain or satisfaction through wrongful conduct, such as killing or stealing, etc., and thereby resorts to the ten courses of demeritoriousness. This means an accumulation of demeritorious actions that leads to rebirth.

Being desirous of future well-being that is in no way inferior to the present well-being, one performs meritorious deeds after the manner of virtuous ones, such as giving, observing moral precepts and cultivating the mind. All of these acts are mundane merit tending to renewed existence. They take the form of meritoriousness pertaining to the sensuous sphere, or meritoriousness pertaining to the form realm, or meritoriousness pertaining to the formless realm. In these ways one resorts to the ten courses of meritoriousness.

The ten courses of demeritoriousness and the ten courses of meritoriousness tending to renewed existence – these two categories of committed actions are called the process caused by productive deeds (kamma-bhava). This process or potential leads to the arising of resultant mental aggregates and corporeality born of productive deeds in the appropriate sphere of existence, either in the sensuous sphere, or in the form realm, or in formless realm. These resultant mental aggregates and corporeality born of productive deeds are called the arising of rebirth (upapatti-bhava). Mundane meritorious and demeritorious courses of conduct lead to the arising of rebirth and therefore the two together are called simply rebirth (bhava). Resultant mental aggregates and corporeality born of productive deeds are the results of the process caused by productive deeds (kamma-bhava).

In this matter, the arising of the process caused by productive deeds and the arising of rebirth dependent on the four kinds of clinging as discussed in detail in the commentary on the Vibhaṅga (Sammoha-vinodhanī) will be stated briefly.

“What type of rebirth (bhava) is conditioned by what particular kind of clinging?” The answer to this question is: “All the four kinds of clinging may be the condition for [1157] both types of rebirth (bhava).”

The explanation is this: A worldlyling is like a lunatic; that being so, he cannot discriminate what is proper and fitting, and what is not. Therefore, under the influence of all four kinds of clinging, he commits all sorts of actions, that are of mundane merit and demerit and that tend to renewed existence. How these various actions are committed will be considered here.

A worldlyling may know or hear that sense pleasures abound with the ruling class or higher classes of the human world and in the six realms. He may get bad advice from others that to gain what one wants, one should do anything, if needs be, one should kill or steal. So under the evil influence of clinging to sense pleasures, he commits evil deeds such as killing to gratify his strong desire for sense pleasures. These evil deeds lead to rebirth in the lower worlds (apāya).

Or a worldlyling may have an irresistible temptation to get some sense object that he sees before him; or he may wish to preserve and protect his property, and to achieve this, he would do anything whether it is morally right or wrong. This is a more common case of committing evil being driven by clinging to sense pleasures. Evil deeds cause rebirth in the lower worlds. In these cases, the evil deeds that send him to the lower worlds is called the process caused by productive deeds (kamma-bhava) and the result and mental aggregates and corporeality born of productive deeds pertaining to the lower worlds are called the arising of rebirth (upapatti-bhava). This is how clinging to sense pleasures leads to a demeritorious process caused by productive deeds and the result thereof.

Another worldlyling is fortunate in having wiser counsel. His friends are virtuous by example as well as by precept. He gains some knowledge of the truth. He knows truly that by doing meritorious deeds he can gain fortunate destinations. He performs meritorious deeds, and, as a result of which, he is reborn in the human world or in the world of the Devas. In this case the meritorious deeds that send him to the fortunate destinations is called the process caused by productive deeds (kamma-bhava) and the resultant mental aggregates and corporeality born of productive deeds pertaining to the fortunate existences are called the arising of rebirth (upapatti-bhava). This is how clinging to sense pleasures leads to a meritorious process caused by productive deeds and the result thereof.

Another worldling may have heard or have the idea that the Brahma world of the form realm or formless realm has higher sense pleasures than those of the sensuous sphere. And, being obsessed by the allurements of superior sense pleasures of the Brahma world, he practises absorption (jhāna) of the form realm or the formless realm, and achieves it, and, as the result, he is reborn in the form realm or the formless realm.

In this case the meritorious deeds of that worldling pertaining to the form realm or formless realm that send him to the form realm and the formless realm are called the process caused by productive deeds (kamma-bhava) and the resultant mental aggregates and the corporeality born of productive deeds of the form realm and the resultant mental aggregates of the formless realm are called the arising of rebirth (upapatti-bhava). This is how clinging to sense pleasures gives rise to a process caused by productive deeds and the result thereof.

Another worldling, clinging to the wrong view of annihilation or extinction, believes firmly that the self becomes fully extinct only in a fortunate existence of the sensuous sphere, or in the form realm, or in the formless realm, and accordingly acquires merit pertaining to the sensuous sphere that leads to a fortunate existence in the sensuous sphere, or the exalted type of merit (mahaggata) which is sublimated due to absence of the hindrances. The merit of this worldling pertaining to the sensuous sphere and the Brahma realms of the form realm and the formless realm are called the process caused by productive deeds (kamma-bhava), and the resultant mental aggregate and the corporeality born of productive deeds are called the arising of rebirth (upapatti-bhava). This is how clinging to wrong view gives rise to a process caused by productive deeds and the resultant thereof.

Another worldling, under the influence of clinging to an illusory self (atta), firmly believes that the self attains real happiness in a fortunate existence of the sensuous sphere, or in the form realm, or in the formless realm, and accordingly acquires merit pertaining to the sensuous sphere, that leads to a fortunate existence in the sensuous sphere, or the exalted type of merit which is sublimated due to an absence of the hindrances. The merit of that worldling pertaining to the sensuous sphere and the Brahma realms of the [1158] form realm and the formless realm are called the process caused by productive deeds (kamma-bhava) and the resultant mental aggregates and the corporeality born of productive deeds are called the arising of rebirth (upapatti-bhava). This is how clinging to an illusory self gives rise to a process caused by productive deeds and the result thereof.

Another worldling, under the influence of clinging to wrong practices as a means to purity, firmly believes that this good practice can be fulfilled with facility only in one who takes it up either in some fortunate existence of the sensuous sphere, or in the form realm or in the formless realm, accordingly acquires merit pertaining to the sensuous sphere, or to the form realm, or to the formless realm. The merit of this worldling pertaining to a fortunate existence in the sensuous sphere and the exalted type of merit pertaining to the Brahma realms are called the process caused by productive deeds (kamma-bhava), and the resultant mental aggregates and the corporeality born of productive deeds are called the arising of rebirth (upapatti-bhava). This is how clinging to wrong practices as a means to purity gives rise to a process caused by productive deeds and the result thereof.

10. With the process caused by productive deeds as condition: rebirth (bhava-paccayā jāti). With the process caused by productive deeds (kamma-bhava) as condition, rebirth occurs. Meritorious process caused by productive deeds and demeritorious process caused by productive deeds are the causes of rebirth.

Rebirth means the arising of resultant mental aggregates and corporeality born of productive deeds caused by meritorious deeds; and resultant mental aggregate and corporeality born of productive deeds caused by demeritorious deeds.

Earleir, in with volitions as condition: rebirth-linking consciousness, (saṅkhāra-paccayā viññāṇam), it has been shown that due to volitions, good and bad consciousnesses arises. This refers to past volitions giving rise to resultant consciousness at the moment of rebirth in the present existence, as well as the consciousness that follows rebirth consciousness (pavatti-viññāṇa).

In the present verse, with process caused by productive deeds as condition: rebirth (bhava-paccayā-jāti), refers to the process caused by productive deeds, acts committed in the present existence give rise to rebirth in a future existence, the resultant mental aggregates and corporeality born of productive deeds that arise in the future. This will become clearer later.

When we discussed: “With volitions as condition: rebirth-linking consciousness,” we have seen how volitions become endowed with the requisite potentialities at the four stages (samaṅgitā) giving rise to consciousness. That is the detailed explanation of how volitions, i.e., meritorious actions and demeritorious actions of the past, cause consciousness at the moment of conception and the developed consciousness that immediately follows it.

The same process is at work again in the present existence. The deeds committed in the present existence, both good and bad, acquire the endowment at the four stages, give rise to the resultant mental aggregates and corporeality born of productive deeds in a future existence. This process of present actions that condition future rebirth is taught by the Buddha in with the process caused by productive deeds as condition: rebirth (bhava-paccayā-jāti). This is stating the cause-effect relationship in strictly Abhidhamma terms. In the present verse, the poet describes this relationship in a mixture of Abhidhamma terms or ultimate usage with conventional usage for easier reading.

The gist of the verse is that dependent on the actions committed in the present existence, both good and bad, all beings, at their death, are reborn according to these actions. Hence some are reborn in the Asaññasatta realm where the existence is characterized by the presence of only the aggregate of corporeality with no mental aggregates; some are reborn in the realms of existence with five aggregates such as the human world and the fine-material world other than the Asaññasatta realm, and their rebirth is characterized by the moral order or the law of productive deeds (kamma-niyāma). There is an arising, at conception and at a latter stage, of the resultant mental aggregates and corporeality born of productive deeds that are appropriate to the process caused by the productive deeds of each individual. This fresh arising of mind and matter is termed rebirth (jāti).

From this point onwards, the term: the arising of rebirth (upapatti-bhava) will be used for brevity's sake, in describing “the resultant mental aggregates and corporeality born of productive deeds.”

When the arising of the resultant mental aggregate and corporeality born of productive deeds takes place, [1159] that is, when there occurs the arising of rebirth, there are, as a rule, three phases: the moment of their arising (uppāda-khaṇa), the moment of their persisting (ṭhiti-khaṇa), and the moment of their dissolution (bhaṅga-khaṇa). Of these phases, the first, the moment of their arising, is called rebirth (jāti); the second, the moment of their persisting, is called ageing (jarā); and the third, the moment of their dissolution, is called death (maraṇa).

So it will be seen that dependent on the arising of rebirth or the process caused by productive deeds, there is birth which is the initial phase of the arising of rebirth. In other words, the process caused by productive deeds conditions birth. This is described in this verse as “the usual rebirth-linking process (jāti).”

This birth, the initial arising of mind and matter, occurs not only once at the moment of rebirth but occurs repeatedly so that the compounded phenomena of mind and matter, usually regarded as this body, develops into various shapes, forms and sizes according to the causal order formed by productive deeds (kamma). Thus, there appear in the world castes, such as the ruling caste, the Brahmin caste, etc., and people who have power and influence, who are lowly, who are noble, who are wicked, who are virtuous, an infinite variety of personalities, an infinite variety of beings in the three spheres of existence.

All these varieties of beings are possible because there are four main categories of rebirth, namely:

1. Rebirth beginning as an egg or “egg-born birth.”
2. Rebirth beginning as an embryo in the mother’s womb or “womb-born birth.”
3. Rebirth from moisturous matter, such as moss or lotus flower etc., “moisture-born birth.”
4. Rebirth as already grown up, i.e., about an age of sixteen years for a female and 20 or 25 for a male “already grown-up birth.”

Note that no two individuals are exactly alike in personality, not even offspring of the same mother, some are superior and some are inferior. This is due to the workings of the process caused by productive deeds. The Buddha proclaims this in the Short Discourse giving an Analysis of Productive Deeds (Cūḷa-kamma-vibhaṅga-sutta, MN 135), wherein it is stated: deeds condition beings to be either inferior or superior (kammaṃ satte vibhajati yad-idam hīnappaṇītatāya).

11. With birth as condition: old age, death (jāti-paccayā jarāmarañam). The process caused by productive deeds conditions the arising of rebirth. The initial phase of the arising of rebirth is called birth (jāti). After the initial phase of the moment of their arising (uppāda-khaṇa) there follows the developing stage (ṭhiti-khaṇa), which is ageing (jarā), and then it goes into dissolution at the third stage, dissolution (bhaṅga-khaṇa), which is death (marañā). This is the inexorable process of all mind and matter conditioned by productive deeds (kamma).

The process caused by productive deeds conditions just the initial phase (uppāda-khaṇa) of the arising of rebirth, but not the latter two phases of the moment of their developing (ṭhiti-khaṇa) and the moment of their dissolution (bhaṅga-khaṇa). When rebirth (uppāda) arises, ageing (ṭhiti) and death (bhaṅga) follow suit just as a rising tide brings water along with it.

Since rebirth (jāti) is the condition that gives rise to ageing and death (jarāmarañā), without rebirth there can be no ageing and death, and so the Buddha declares: With birth as condition: old age, death (jāti-paccayā jarāmarañam).

Considering what has been said above, it should be carefully noted that rebirth refers to the moments of the arising of the stream of the five aggregates; ageing refers to the moments of the ageing of these aggregates; and death refers to the moment of dissolution of these aggregates that take place in all the existences. This is stated about the conditioned phenomena as they occur.

As rebirth takes place in a fresh existence, there arises the initial mind-matter complex which occurs in repeated succession, bringing about development of the five aggregates. Appearance of shapes and forms as Deva or human or other types of the various beings enable the worldling to consider them as real beings or persons or individual entities. [1160]

Assuming 100 years of lifespan for the present era, a person's lifetime may be viewed as having three phases: The first phase of youth; the second phase of middle age; and the third phase of old age, with each phase lasting for 33 years and four months. Just as these three phases are the natural process of a human's lifetime, the ceaseless occurrence of the aggregates in all the forms of existence are marked by the natural process of moments of arising, moments of ageing and moments of dissolution that rigorously follow each other. Ageing is of a self-consuming nature so that it is called “the fire of ageing.”

The fire of ageing is of two kinds: The moments of ageing of mind and matter (khāṇa-jarā) and the changing process such as the corporeality that has a cool character changing into the corporeality that has a hot character, and so on (santati-jarā). Both these two kinds burn relentlessly in all sentient beings.

It is an interesting question to ask: Whereas all living beings are subject to the two kinds of fire of ageing, why is this fact not evident in young people whose hair does not turn grey, whose teeth do not fall out, or whose skin does not have wrinkles as is the case with elderly persons?

The answer is that elderly persons show these signs of ageing, such as greying of hair, falling out of teeth, wrinkling skin, because they have sustained the relentless onslaught of ageing for so long.

This statement will be further substantiated thus: Beginning from the moment of conception as an invisible embryo, corporeality that has arisen ages and dissolves. By the moment the corporeality that has arisen, reaches the stage of ageing, fresh corporeality arises and in turn ages to go into dissolution. Thus, the corporeality that ages later than its preceding one, that has gone into ageing naturally, is of a more mature ageing. It is succeeded by corporeality that rises and goes into ageing itself, whose ageing is yet of a more mature ageing than its predecessor. In this way, successive arisings of corporeality go into ageing with greater and greater maturity. When days come to pass and months and years of the ceaseless process of ageing takes place at every moment, after the life periods lapse, the signs of the matured ageing inevitably become visible: greying of hair, falling out of teeth, wrinkling of skin, etc. are more and more apparent.

Whereas the physical signs of ageing, such as greying of hair, falling out of teeth and wrinkling of the skin are visible, cognizable by the eye, they are not ageing in its ultimate sense but are merely the scars of ageing. For ageing, in its ultimate sense is not a physical phenomenon but is a mental phenomenon which is cognizable by the mind only.

Let us take an analogy here: After a devastating flood, the roads, bridges, trees, grass, etc., are left in a visibly ravaged state. They are the signs of the flood that has taken place. One who has not seen the flood can know the intensity of the flood from the damage done by it. Likewise, the burnt up area of a fire accident testifies to the scale of the fire that has caused it. Similarly, the fire of ageing has left its scars on the elderly person in a more pronounced manner. The workings of ageing (jarā) should be perceived from the state of the physical deterioration on a person.

The two kinds of ageing, the moment of ageing and the changing process, are taking place relentlessly and due to their working life periods such as youth, middle age, old age; or a person as a ten-year old, a twenty-year old, or a thirty-year old, etc. come to be so-called. All these changes in the life periods are taking place under the driving force of ageing.

The moment of ageing is immediately followed by the moment of dissolution so that each individual has myriads of moments of dissolution, which is death, taking place from moment-to-moment (khaṇika-maraṇa). However, only conventional death is understood by the average person, and the moment-to-moment deaths pass by unnoticed. [1161]

Death or dissolution (maraṇa) is of three kinds: momentary death (khaṇika-maraṇa), death through cutting off (samuccheda-maraṇa) and conventional death (sammuti-maraṇa).

1. The moment of death (khaṇika-maraṇa) means the dissolution of the conditioned mental and physical phenomena when they reach the moment of dissolution, that is, the third phase in the coming into being of mind and matter. A unit of mind and mental concomitants has an ephemeral existence which is characterized by three phases: The moment of arising, the moment of ageing and the moment of dissolution. The life of each unit of mind and mental concomitants, called thought (citta) lasts just these three fleeting moments, and each such unit is called one thought-moment (cittakkhaṇa).

Over one million million thought moments arise and vanish in a wink of an eye or in a flash of lightning. Of the 28 types of corporeality, 22 of them, i.e., leaving aside the four corporeal types of salient features (lakkhāṇa) and two corporeal types of intimation (viññāti) have each a life of 17 thought-moments. The two corporeal types of intimation arise together with a thought, and cease together with the mind, they are followers of mind. Of the four corporeal types of salient features, corporeality that arises at conception comprising corporeality which arises at the moment of conception (upacaya-rūpa) and corporeality which is the continued development of the corporeality which arose at conception (santati-rūpa), occur only at the moment of arising and lasts only one thought instant, which is a subdivision of one thought moment. The corporeality which arises at the stage of ageing and decay (jaratā-rūpa) lasts 49 thought instants. The corporeality which arises at the stage of dissolution (aniccatā) lasts for just one thought instant. Thus, a living being is subject to a million million times of dissolutions which are called momentary death (khaṇika-maraṇa).

2. Death through cutting off (samuccheda-maraṇa) means complete cutting off of the process of rise and fall which is the end of all suffering (dukkha), that is the intrinsic nature of conditioned phenomena; it is attained only by an Arahāt. It is called cutting off because, after the death of an Arahāt which is the ultimate realisation of Nibbāna without leaving behind any substrate of existence, no fresh aggregates of mind and matter arise. Just like a flame that is exhausted, the suffering round of rebirth is totally destroyed. Hence the death of an Arahāt is called death through cutting off (samuccheda-maraṇa).

3. Conventional death (sammuti-maraṇa) means the conventional death of all living beings except the Buddha and the Arahats. It is the ceasing of one series of the life process that belongs to one existence, called the end of the life faculty.

Conventional death (sammuti-maraṇa) is of four kinds:

1. Death due to the end of the lifespan where the potential of productive deeds is still present (āyukkhaya-maraṇa).
2. Death due to the exhaustion or end of the potential of productive deeds even though the lifespan is not ended yet (kammakkhaya-maraṇa).
3. Death due to the end of both 1 and 2 above (ubhayakkhaya-maraṇa).
4. Death due to an abrupt intervention of some bad resultant (kamma), although the lifespan and the potential of productive deeds above are still present (upacchedaka-maraṇa).

The probability of death is ever present with all living beings regardless of realm or station in life. Any one of the four kinds of death may happen to a living being at any moment because there are all sorts of hazards that lurk around all of us. And, of course, when death claims anyone, there is no way of refusal or escape.

Note carefully that rebirth, ageing and death are like assassins that roam about the world, watching for an opportunity to strike any living being. Let us say someone is under the vigilance of three enemies who are out to kill him.

Between the three of them, the first murderer says to his accomplices: “Friends, I shall lure him into some jungle, after telling him about the attraction of the jungle. There is no problem for me to do that.” The second murderer says to [1162] the first accomplice: “Friend, after you have lured him into the jungle, I shall molest him and make him weak. There is no problem for me to do that.” And the third murderer says to the second accomplice: “Friend, after you have molested him and made him weak, let it be my duty to cut off his head with my sword.” Then the three accomplices carry out their plan successfully.

In the above simile, the moment when the first accomplice lures someone from amidst the circle of dear ones into any of the five new destinations is the work of birth (jāti). The molestation and weakening of the victim, rendering him quite helpless by the second accomplice is the work of ageing (jarā). The cutting off of his head with the sword by the third accomplice is the work of death (maraṇa).

Or in another simile: Birth (jāti) is like someone taking a hazardous journey; ageing (jarā) is like the weakening of that traveller from starvation on the journey; death (maraṇa) is like the enfeebled traveller, alone and helpless, falling victim to the beasts of prey that infest the forest.

12. Grief, lamentation, pain, sorrow, and despair all arise (soka-parideva-dukkha-domanassupāyāsā sambhavanti). Just as ageing and death must follow rebirth, so also when rebirth occurs in any of the four kinds of rebirth, the five kinds of loss occur as consequence: loss of relatives, wealth, health, morality and right view. When any of these losses happen, there is much grief, lamentation, pain, distress and anguish, which are the suffering in brief consequent to rebirth. There is of course untold misery that arises due to rebirth.

13. And so there is an origination of this whole mass of suffering (evam-etassa kevalassa dukkhakkhandassa samudayo hoti). In the long, long course of Saṃsāra, the truth that needs to be perceived is that, apart from mind and matter, there is, in reality, no person or being, no individual entity. It is a mere causal chain rooted in ignorance, dependent on which twelve causal factors arise, ending up in death; and yet the occurrence of these twelve factors is considered good by the worldling as a human or Deva or Brahma, thus binding them to the chain of rebirth endlessly, but the whole thing is just an unalloyed mass of recurrent suffering (dukkha). This is the stark truth about existence that is generally cherished as one's life. This verse being straightforward, it is not paraphrased by the author. This is the doctrine of dependent origination.

The 108 Classes of Noble Ones

[This was originally inserted into the translation of the Discourse about the Treasures (Ratana-sutta, Khp 6; Snp 2:1), now in chapter 22 above. I have removed it to the Further Explanations, as that is more suitable.]

The way the number 108 is obtained is explained here. Leaving aside the four noble ones (ariya) who have attained the four paths, there are the four noble ones (ariya) who have attained the four fruits. Of these four, there are three kinds of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) attainers: 1) The one who has just one rebirth to undergo; 2) the one who has to undergo from two, three to six rebirths; 3) the one who has no possibility of rebirth beyond the seventh existence. Now, the four Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) attainers are of four categories according to the way of practice by which they have attained it. Dividing the three kinds above into the four modes of practice makes twelve classes of Stream-enterers (Sotāpatti) at the fruition stage.

There are two distinct phases in meditation for insight: up to the dispelling of the hindrances (nīvaraṇa) is the period of practice (paṭipadā-khetta); from that stage upwards till the attainment of path-knowledge is the period of the super knowledges (abhiññā-khetta), after having gained insight.

In the period of practice, a yogi, who can dispel the hindrances without trouble, is called “one who has facile practice;” a yogi, who can dispel the hindrances with difficulty, is called “one who has difficult practice.” In “the period of the super knowledges,” a yogi with insight, who attains path-knowledge quickly, is called “a quick attainer;” a yogi with insight, who attains path-knowledge tardily, is called “a slow attainer.” Thus there are these four modes of practice for each of the three kinds of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) attainers, making 12 classes of Stream-enterers (Sotāpatti).

With the Once-returners (Sakadāgāmī-puggala), there are three kinds: Once-returning to the Sense Realms, Once-returning to the Form Realms, and Once-returning to the Formless Realms. These three kinds multiplied by the four modes of practice makes twelve classes of Once-returners.

With the Non-returners (Anāgāmī-puggala), there are five kinds: Non-returners extinguished in between (antarā parinibbāyī-anāgāmī); Non-returners who cut the time short (upahacca-parinibbāyī-anāgāmī); Non-returners who extinguish with an intention (sasaṅkhāra-parinibbāyī-anāgāmī); Non-returners who extinguish without an intention (asaṅkhāra-parinibbāyī-anāgāmī); Non-returners who flow upstream to to the highest Brahma realm (uddhamsota-akaniṭṭha-gāmi-anāgāmī).

The Non-returners dwell in the five Pure Abodes (Suddhāvāsa), out of which five classes of Non-returners (Anāgāmī) dwell in Aviha realm, five in Atappā realm, five in Sudassa realm, five in Sudassī realm, and four, those other than Non-returners who flow upstream to to the highest Brahma realm, thus making 24 classes of Non-returner (Anāgāmī-puggala).

The Arahats are of two kinds: the dry-insight (sukkha-vipassaka) Arahata and the coupled with tranquillity (samatha-yānika) Arahata. The former refers to those noble ones (ariya) who attain the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala) without achieving absorption (jhāna) but through insight development alone; the latter to those noble ones (ariya) who use absorption (jhāna) and consequent psychic powers as the vehicle of attaining the Arahata fruition. Adding up the four types of noble ones (ariya), we have: Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna), 12 kinds; Once-returners (Sakadāgāmī), 12 kinds; Non-returners (Anāgāmī), 24 kinds; Arahata, 2 kinds of attainers, 54 in total.

In gaining path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa), a noble one (ariya) may, at the moment of the arising of path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa), either have his consciousness led by faith (saddhā) or wisdom (paññā). Thus there are two basic categories of noble ones (ariya), either of whom make up the above 54 classes. That is why it is said that there are altogether 108 classes of noble ones (ariya).

The Frightful Nature of Sensual Desires

The following account of how detachment from sensual pleasures takes place (kāmādīnava-kathā) is based on the Discourse concerning Potaliya (Potaliya-sutta, MN 54):

1. The five objects of sensual pleasures are less of enjoyment, and more of suffering and grief (appassāda-kāmā).

The faults and defects of the five objects of sensual pleasures are, in fact, quite numerous.

2. The five objects of sensual pleasures are like a piece of fleshless bone (aṭṭhi-kaṅkalūpama-kāmā).

When a lean and hungry dog finds a piece of bone completely stripped bare of any flesh, with saliva trickling down from its mouth, it bites the bone but it cannot get satisfaction. Because of the rank smell of the bone, the dog cannot leave it and go elsewhere but continues biting the bone from the top to the bottom, from the bottom to the top and again in the middle, with the ardent expectation of relishing the meat and getting satisfied, but this dog may meet with its death without finding any meat on the bone.

In the same way, men and women, all sentient beings, cling to the bone-like material objects of sensual pleasures, both animate and inanimate, such as gold, silver, land and estates, wives and children, etc., just like the lean hungry dog. Although they enjoy having these objects for a long time with much longing and craving, they never become satisfied. They remain in great hope of finding relish and satisfaction. Being attracted and overwhelmed by the sense desires which were aroused in them by the objects of sensual pleasures, sentient beings cannot abandon these objects. Without any thought of renouncing the world to free themselves from the bonds of the pleasures of the senses, they fondly cling to them, eventually to meet their death at the feet of their wives and children while fulfilling their obligations of the household life.

Therefore, the five material objects of sensual pleasures are very much like a piece of fleshless bone as they are full of pain and suffering. Indeed, the desires for sensual pleasures are utterly undependable and full of faults and defects!

3. The five sensual pleasures are like a chunk of meat (maṃsa-pesūpama-kāmā).

Take, for example, an eagle that flies away after snatching a chunk of meat, it is chased by a number of other birds which gather round and attack it. As long as the eagle holds the meat, it is subject to relentless attack and has to endure much suffering. But, as soon as he discards the piece of meat, he is relieved of such woe. Another eagle, which, in turn, picks up this piece of meat and flies away, is also being chased, surrounded and attacked by other birds. Thus each eagle which becomes attached to the meat, which snatches it and flies away, faces the same predicament.

In a similar manner, he who clings to the objects of sensual pleasures as “mine,” “my own,” is subject to the constant dangers of robbery, looting, and cheating, by the five enemies: water, fire, kings, thieves and unloved heirs, who will wreak havoc and misery at every opportunity.

If, on encountering these enemies, he puts up a defence against them to the best of his ability, he is likely to lose his life under unfavourable circumstances. As long as he keeps on clinging to these [269] objects of sensual pleasures, he remains surrounded by all kinds of dangers, and lives a life of restriction. Only through discarding them all will he get the opportunity to live in peace. Therefore, the five material objects of sensual pleasures are very much like a chunk of meat; they are full of pain and suffering. Indeed, the desires for sensual pleasures are utterly undependable and full of faults and defects!

4. The five objects of sensual pleasures are like a firebrand of grass (tiṅukkūpama-kāmā).

When a large bundle of grass is lighted and carried against the wind, it will burn from the tip downwards, and unless it is thrown away, it will burn parts of the carrier’s limbs such as his hands and legs, etc. He would perhaps meet death or suffer intense pain bordering on death.

In the same manner, the material objects of sensual pleasure, when grasped and taken hold of with the hands of craving as “my own,” “mine,” “my property,” would burn all those, who rejoice in their possessions, with the fires of anxieties for their safekeeping. In spite of endearing care and attention, if these material objects of sensual pleasures, through the natural course of things, become despoiled and wasted, they would develop into a big fire of suffering through anxiety and worry. At times, these raging fires of the material objects of sensual pleasures will develop into the fires of death (maraṇa).

Therefore, to take possession of these material objects, both animate and inanimate, such as wives and children, land and estates, etc., is just like taking possession of the blazing flames and fires. The five material objects of sensual pleasures are very much like burning bundles of grass, they are full of pain and suffering. Indeed, the desires for sensual pleasures are utterly undependable and full of faults and defects!

5. The five objects of sensual pleasures are like a pit of embers (aṅgārakāsūpama-kāmā).

Being covered by ashes with no visible smoke or flame, the pit of acacia wood embers looks deceptive as if it were not on fire. Anyone who descends into the pit, which has no recognizable signs of fire, would get burnt more severely than being scorched by a blazing flame. He may even lose his life.

In a similar manner, the five material objects of sensual pleasures appear superficially to be pleasant, as manifested through sight, sound, smell, taste and touch, and do not seem to be burning hot. By craving for and taking into possession these objects, when one descends into the ember pit of sensual pleasures, one suffers great pain and misery. Burning with visible blazing flames is apparent to all, but the burning of various tubers, such as arum, yam, etc., which are kept buried in a heap of embers, is not apparent, though the intensity of heat there is much greater than that of a blazing fire.

In the same way, those who descend into and sink into the ember-pit of sensual pleasures, are burnt, not with flames visible to all, but with an intense internal heat. Even as the various tubers, such as arum, yam, etc., kept buried in the ember-pit get burnt, so they are burnt internally by latent heat generated by various thoughts of sensual pleasures, by various difficulties encountered in earning their livelihood, and by all kinds of worry involved in maintaining and feeding their families, they suffer a great anguish unknown to others. This sensual world, which is replete with material objects of sensual pleasure, is like a large pit of embers; the bigger the number of the material objects of sensual pleasures, the greater the mass of burning embers in the pit. Sentient beings of the sensual world are like the tubers, such as arum, yam, etc., which are kept buried inside the burning embers.

Therefore, the five objects of sensual pleasures are very much like a pit of embers; they are full of pain and suffering. Indeed, the desires for sensual pleasures are utterly undependable and full of faults and defects!

6. The five objects of sensual pleasures are indeed like a dream (supinakūpama-kāmā).

A person, while in slumber, may dream of himself being a wealthy man, a provincial governor (padesa-rājā) or an emperor (eka-rājā), enjoying to his heart's content whatever pleasure of the senses he wishes, thus leading a life of luxury. In his dream, everything seems so real. It appears as if there would be no end of this luxurious living, but when he suddenly wakes up before completely enjoying the luxurious pleasures in the dream, he finds them untraceable, intangible, and of no avail.

In the same way, men and Devas of the sensual world are indulging themselves in their respective [270] mundane and celestial pleasures, being led on by craving, and being deluded by craving (taṇhā), pride (māna) and wrong view (diṭṭhi) into thinking that their life of pleasure is real, permanent and enduring. They are just dreaming. During the infinitesimally short duration of the present life time, while in the course of enjoying the dream-like sensual pleasures, one has to pass into another existence, leaving behind all these sensual pleasures one is so attached to. Then, just as all those pleasurable things, which one encounters in one's dream, vanish without any trace the moment one wakes up, so also all the material objects of sensual pleasures which one has clung to as “my own,” “mine,” “my property,” during the short duration of the present life, all of them without exception, turn out to be things which have nothing to do with oneself.

Therefore, the five objects of sensual pleasures are very much like things in a dream, they are full of pain and suffering. Indeed, the desires for sensual pleasures are utterly undependable and full of faults and defects!

7. The five objects of sensual pleasures are like articles taken for use on a temporary loan (yācītakūpama-kāmā).

For example, there are those people, who, having no possessions of their own, have to hire jewellery, such as precious stones, gold and silver, to wear on festive occasions. While they enjoy wearing them as their own with all the happiness that brings, they are asked by the owners to return them, and then they feel sad and dejected because they have none of the borrowed treasures in their hands after returning them to the owners.

In a similar manner, when their past meritorious deeds produce beneficial results in the way of enjoyment of sensual pleasures, they are liable to be deluded into thinking that such pleasures would last forever. When these objects are lost or destroyed as a result of one's past evil deeds, or when one passes away, they turn out to be things of no use to oneself. Taking his course in life according to circumstances, he who had thought of himself as the real possessor of such sensual pleasures, is left with nothing in hand.

Therefore, the five objects of sensual pleasures are very much like articles taken on loan for temporary use, they are full of pain and suffering. Indeed, the desires for sensual pleasures are utterly undependable and full of faults and defects!

8. The five sensual pleasures are like a tree laden with fruit (rukkhaphalūpama-kāmā).

For example, there is a big tree bearing fruit in a big grove near a village. A certain man, roaming about in the grove in search of some fruit to eat, sees the tree and reasons: “This tree is full of tasty fruit but there is not a single fruit which has fallen on the ground. I’m skilful in climbing trees, so I will climb the tree and eat the fruit to my heart’s content. I will also pluck them until the fold of my waist-cloth is full.” With such thoughts, the man climbs the tree, and eats the fruit until he is full; he also plucks enough fruit to fill the fold of his waist-cloth. In the meantime, a second man with a knife in hand enters the grove also in search of fruit to eat. He sees the same tree laden with fruit and thinks: “This tree is full of sweet-tasting fruit. There is no fruit on the ground. I am not skilful in climbing trees. Therefore, I will cut and fell the tree from the base and eat the fruit till I am satisfied. I will also collect them until the fold of my waist cloth is full.” Then the man cuts down the tree. The first man already up in the tree is unable to descend before it is felled by the second man; he will either be maimed or may even lose his life.

Similarly, a wealthy man, enjoying fully the pleasures of the senses, could be approached by another person, who would beat him up and rob him of his material objects or sensual pleasures unless he disposed of them speedily. He would be severely beaten and injured or even meet with death on account of them. If he passed away with an obsession for, or a strong attachment to, sensual pleasures, he would meet with all kinds of suffering such as rebirth in the lower realm (apāya).

Therefore, the five objects of sensual pleasures are very much like the tree fully laden with fruit, they are full of pain and suffering. Indeed, the desires for sensual pleasures are utterly undependable and full of faults and defects!

Or, the five objects of sensual pleasures are like a ripe poison fruit. For example, there is a poison fruit called Kimpakka or Kimphala, which resembles the most [271] relishing ripe mango fruit, pleasing to the eye with alluring aroma and taste; but it causes those eating it to suffer untold pain even leading to death.

Those who happen to eat this fruit just because of its colour, smell and taste writhe with pain, with their intestines breaking up and ultimately die in agony like one who has taken arsenic mixed with lime juice.

In a similar manner, the five objects of sensual pleasures are deceptive in outward appearance, deluding those without the eye of wisdom into thinking that they are indeed various delightful, pleasurable materials. Allured by their attractive outward appearance, those who take delight and indulge in them become suffocated with the unwholesome (akusala) poisons of greed, hatred and delusion and after going through all kinds of writhing pains and suffering through worry, anxiety, etc., they helplessly meet with death. Even after death, on account of the poison of sensual pleasures, they do not attain a happy existence, instead they encounter further miseries and difficulties such as rebirth in the downfall (apāya).

Therefore, the five objects of sensual pleasures are very much like a ripe poison fruit, they are full of pain and suffering. Therefore, the desires for sensual pleasures are utterly undependable and full of faults and defects!

9. The five objects of sensual pleasures are like a chopping block on which chopping was done with knives and axes (asi-sūnūpama-kāmā).

For example, it is on the chopping block that criminals and hunted animals, such as deer, etc., are slaughtered; the meat of such game is also cut up and minced on the chopping block. The chopping block is where sentient beings are killed and minced.

In a similar manner, the five objects of sensual pleasures destroy all beings who take delight and indulge in them by cutting up and mincing them with the knife and axe of their own craving for sensual pleasures. All those, who happen to place their necks on the chopping block of sensual pleasures cannot develop the elements of renunciation (nekkhamma-dhātu) to escape to the open space and broad highway of concentration meditation and insight meditation, are destroyed and cut up into pieces with the knife and axe of craving on that very chopping block of sensual pleasures. They come to the end of their lives in a terrible manner.

Therefore, the five objects of sensual pleasures are very much like the chopping block on which the chopping or mincing of meat is carried out, they are full of pain and suffering. Indeed, the desires for sensual pleasures are utterly undependable and full of faults and defects!

10. The five objects of sensual pleasures are indeed like the sharp edge of a sword or a spear (satti-sūlūpama-kāmā).

For example, the exceedingly sharp edge of a sword or a spear cuts deep and pierces anything that comes into contact with it; they are only weapons for killing and destroying enemies, etc. So also, the five objects of sensual pleasures, possessing the quality of sharpness, cut deep and pierce anyone coming into contact or becoming entangled with them. For example, anyone pierced by the edge of the sword or the spear of a visible object (rūpārammaṇa) is like the fish caught by a baited hook in its intestines; he cannot extricate himself from it all at once, but follows its dictates with passive obedience. Being thus inflicted by the sharp edge of the sword or the spear of a visible object, he becomes forgetful and can no longer pay attention to the practice of morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā) which he has formerly cultivated. Thus he ends up in ruin. This example applies equally to the objects of hearing (saddārammaṇa), and the others.

Thus, the five objects of sensual pleasures, resembling the sharp edges of five swords or spears, are only weapons for killing and destroying beings. All beings, who have not yet discarded craving for sensual pleasures, have to remain like prisoners amidst the swords or spears of the five sensual objects aiming straight at them in whichever existence they might find themselves. The said five objects of sensual pleasures would automatically get themselves embedded in all beings coming into contact with them, without sparing anyone.

Therefore, the five objects of sensual pleasures are very much like the sharp edge of a sword or a spear, they are full of pain and suffering. Indeed, the desires for sensual pleasures are utterly undependable and full of faults and defects!

11. The five objects of sensual pleasures are indeed like the head of [272] a poisonous snake (sappa-sirūpama-kāmā).

The head of a poisonous snake, being filled with potent, deadly venom, is loathsome and frightful. Just as the head of a poisonous snake would cause untold harm to all who happen to come into contact with it, so also the five objects of sensual pleasures are loathsome and frightful since they are filled with a kind of potent poison which could generate the bad blood of the defilements (kilesa), in those who happen to come into contact with them or who are bitten by them.

Just as the head of a poisonous snake would bring only harm but no benefit to the world, so the five objects of sensual pleasures would bring all kinds of frightful danger to the people of the world. Just as one who happens to come into contact with or step on the head of a poisonous snake, so one who happens to come into contact with, or step on the head of, the poisonous snake of the five objects of sensual pleasures, would be exposed to a great danger.

Therefore, the five objects of sensual pleasures are very much like the head of a poisonous snake, they are full of pain and suffering. Indeed, the desires for sensual pleasures are utterly undependable and full of faults and defects!

Or, as is said in the Discourse about the Dangers (Bhaya-sutta, AN 6.23): Indeed, great, frightful danger is the real name for the five sensual pleasures! Suffering is the real name for the five sensual pleasures! Disease is the real name for the five sensual pleasures! Big abscess is the real name for the five sensual pleasures! Tight fastening is the real name for the five sensual pleasures! Inescapable bog is the real name for the five sensual pleasures.

Ten Important Rules of Enunciation

The noble practice is expounded in words and phrases that are perfect. In this matter there are ten important rules of enunciation of words. They are:

1. Unstressed syllables (sithila-akkhara), e.g. ka, ga, ca, ja, ṭa, ḍa, ta, da, pa, ba.
2. Stressed syllables (dhanita-akkhara), e.g. kha, gha, cha, jha, ṭha, ḍha, tha, dha, pha, bha.
3. Syllables associated with long vowels (dīgha-akkhara), e.g. kā, kī, kū, ke, ko, etc.
4. Syllables associated with short vowels (rassa-akkhara), e.g. ka, ki, ku, etc.
5. Weighty syllables (garu-akkhara), all the long syllables and short syllables with conjunct-consonants trailing behind belong to this class, e.g. in santa (sa-anta): the short-sounding syllable, sa, becomes san here, which is then a weighty syllable (garu-akkhara).

6. All other short-sounding syllables (lahu-akkhara or rassa-akkhara) with no conjunct-consonants following.
7. Nasal sounds uttered with a closed mouth (niggahīta-akkhara): the sound being produced by closing the mouth letting the sound escape through the nose is called niggahīta, and is represented by ṁ.
8. Sounds uttered with the mouth opened (vimutta-akkhara): e.g. kā, gā, etc.
9. Two successive sounds with a connected sound (sambandha-akkhara): e.g. in upasampadāpekkho, no pause is to intervene between dā- and -pek, but the whole word is to be uttered without a break in between.
10. Separated sounds (vavatthita-akkhara): e.g. in suṇātu me, there must be a pause between suṇātu and me.

The above ten rules are called the ten discernments of syllables (vyañjana-buddhi). They are summarized in a verse in a Vinaya commentary:<sup>367</sup>

*Sithila-dhanitañ-ca dīgha-rassam, lahuka-garukañ-ca niggahītam;
sambaddham vavatthitam vimuttam:
dasadhā vyañjana-buddhiyā pabhedo.*

Unstressed, stressed, long, short, light, heavy and nasal; connected, separated, open: this is the analysis of the tenfold discernment of syllables.

Syllables (vyañjana) means the words that are uttered as vocal expressions of the mind. Discernment of syllables (vyañjana-buddhi) means the mind and mental concomitants that cause the utterance of words. The words thus uttered also are called discernments of syllables (vyañjana-buddhi) in a metaphorical sense.

It is not all the languages that conform to the above ten rules of enunciation. For instance, in Tamil only one or two of the rules are met with. In Kirāta, the language of a mountain people, there are no labial sounds. In Yun (?) every word is pronounced heavily. In Persian (Pārasika) all words are pronounced as nasal (niggahīta). A discourse made by anyone in those tongues is therefore deficient in the linguistic aspect.

The Buddha expounds the doctrine (pariyatti) in accordance with the ten rules of enunciation. Hence in the doctrine the noble practice is perfect in words and phrases.

The perfection of the words and phrases is discussed along with the grammatical rules, such as conduit (netti), etc., in The Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) and its great sub-commentary (mahā-ṭīkā), other commentaries and sub-commentaries. Here we are not going into these details.

The Cosmos

A world-element<sup>368</sup> [1119] is called a cakka-vāḷa or loka-dhātu and is bounded on four sides with tall mountains like a stone fencing. Cakka means circular; vāḷa means ring of mountains. The term Cakka-vāḷa comes to be so-called because it is a world-element encircled by rocky mountains. A world-element is 1,203,450 leagues from east to west, and from south to north. The circumference of this world-element is 3,610,350 leagues.

In a world-element, the earth's thickness is 240,000 leagues, the upper half of it being earth and the lower half being rock in structure.

The earth is supported by a mass of water which is 480,000 leagues in thickness. Beneath the mass of water there is the mass of air which is 960,000 leagues supporting it. And beneath the mass of air is the infinite expanse of space. This is the foundational structure of a world-element.

At the centre of the earth's surface, there arises Mount Sineru. The lower part of which is submerged in the ocean that is 84,000 leagues deep and rises 84,000 leagues above the water.

1. Encircling Mount Sineru, there is the first ring of mountains called Yugandhara, half of which, 42,000 leagues is submerged in the ocean and half of which, 42,000 leagues rise up above the water.

2. Beyond the first ring of Yugandhara mountains there is the second ring of mountains called Īsadhara of which 21,000 leagues is submerged in the ocean and 21,000 leagues rise up above the water.
3. Beyond the second ring of Īsadhara mountains there is the third ring of mountains called Karavīka of which 10,500 leagues is submerged in the ocean and 10,500 leagues rise up above the water.
4. Beyond the third ring of Karavīka mountains there is the fourth ring of mountains called Sudassana of which 5,250 leagues is submerged in the water and 5,250 leagues rise up above the water.
5. Beyond the fourth ring of Sudassana mountains there is the fifth ring of mountains called Nemindhara of which 2,625 leagues is submerged in the ocean and 2,625 leagues rise up above the water.
6. Beyond the fifth ring of Nemindhara mountains there is the sixth ring of mountains called Vinataka of which 1,312 leagues is submerged in the ocean and 1,312 leagues rise up above the water. [1120]
7. Beyond the sixth ring of Vinataka mountains there is the seventh ring of mountains called Assakaṇṇa of which 656 leagues is submerged in the ocean and 656 leagues rise up above the water.

Between Mount Sineru and the encircling rings of mountains, there are seven rings of rivers called Sīdā.

In the ocean, lying to the southern side of Mount Sineru, there is the southern island continent called Jambudīpa, called after the Rose Apple tree growing at the forefront of the island, and this island is surrounded by 500 lesser islands.

Similarly, in the ocean, lying to the western side of Mount Sineru, there is the western island continent called Aparagoyāna; on the northern side, the northern island continent of Uttarakuru; add on the eastern side, the eastern island continent called Pubbavideha, each of them surrounded by 500 lesser islands.

In the southern island continent of Jambūdīpa, the Himavanta mountains are 500 leagues high and 3,000 leagues broad, lengthwise and breathwise. It is graced by 84,000 peaks.

The Rose Apple tree growing at the forefront of Jambūdīpa island continent is of these dimensions: Its crown is fifteen leagues across; from the ground up to the trunk where the big boughs branch out, the height of the trunk is 50 leagues, the big boughs are each 50 leagues long, each with a foliage 100 leagues across, and 100 leagues high.

Of the same dimensions, there are the following six great trees which last till the end of the world-element: The Trumpet flower tree in the realm of the Asuras at the old site of the Tāvatiṃsa Devas, at the foot of Mount Sineru; the Silk Cotton tree in the realm of Garuḍas; the Kadamba tree in the western island continent; the Wishing tree in the northern island continent; the Rain tree in the eastern island continent; and the Indian Coral tree in the Tāvatiṃsa Realm.

The circular ring of mountains that marks the limit of the universe has 82,000 leagues submerged under the ocean and 82,000 leagues rising up above the water.

The shape of the Jambūdīpa island continent is a trapezium, the shape of the front purl of a bullock-cart; the western island continent is of the shape of a circular brass mirror; the eastern island continent is a crescent; and the northern island continent is a square. The inhabitants of those island continents are said to have faces that have the same shape as that of the respective island continents.<sup>369</sup>

In each world-element there is a mansion of the moon which has a diameter of 49 leagues; and a mansion of the sun which has a diameter of 50 leagues.

The realm of the Tāvatiṃsa Devas, the realm of the Asuras, the Avīci Niraya, the Jambūdīpa island continent, each of these four places is 10,000 leagues wide. They are called the four areas of 10,000 leagues width.

The northern island continent is 7,000 leagues wide; the eastern island continent is of the same size; the western island continent is 8,000 leagues wide.

All the above features constitute one world-element. The void spaces where three of the world-elements touch one another are the desolate regions between the worlds (lokantarika).

In each world-element, the three lower worlds: the animal world, the Petas' realm and the realm of the Asuras, have their abodes on the earth, side by side with the human world. Underneath the layer of earth lie the eight Niraya realms, each below the other, and each surrounded by lesser realms of continuous suffering called auxiliary (ussada) Nirayas. The Niraya realms, the animal world, the Petas realm and the realm of the Asuras are called the four lower worlds (apāya).

The human world is located on the earth. The Deva realm of the Four Great Kings is located on the summit of Mount Yugandhara, at half the height of Mount Sineru. The [1121] Tāvatiṃsa Realm is located on the summit of Mount Sineru. These two Deva realms are, therefore, terrestrial. Above the Tāvatiṃsa Realm lies the Yāma Deva realm; above that realm, the Tusita Realm; above that realm lies the Nimmānarati Deva realm; above that realm lies the Paranimmitavasavatti Deva realm. These six Deva realms, together with the human world, are called the seven fortunate sensuous realms (kāma-sugati-bhūmi). These seven fortunate realms and the four lower worlds of Apāya together are called the eleven sensuous realms (kāma-bhūmi).

Above the six Deva realms pertaining to the sensuous sphere, there are three Brahma realms of Brahmas' retinue (Brahma-pārisajjā), Brahmas' ministers (Brahma-purohitā) and Great Brahmas (Mahā-brahma) which are the three Brahma realms pertaining to the first absorption (jhāna) of the form realm (rūpāvacara). They are on the same plane.

Above the three Brahma realms pertaining to the first absorption (jhāna) of the form realms, there are the three Brahma realms pertaining to the second absorption (jhāna) of the form realm on the same plane: Brahmas of limited radiance (Parittābhā), Brahmas of measureless radiance (Appamāṇābhā), and Brahmas of streaming radiance (Abhassarā).

Above the three Brahma realms pertaining to the second absorption (jhāna) of the form realm, there are the three Brahma realms pertaining to the third absorption (jhāna) of the form realm on the same plane: Brahmas of limited glory (Paritta-subhā), Brahmas of measureless glory (Appamāṇa-subha), and Brahmas of refulgent glory (Subha-kiṇṇa).

Above these realms there are two Brahma realms also pertaining to the form realm on the same level: Very Fruitful (Vehapphala) and Non-percipient beings (Asañña-satta). Above these are the Bathed in their own Prosperity (Avihā), the Untormenting (Atappā), the Fair-to-see (Sudassā), the Clear-sighted (Sudassī) and the Supreme (Akaniṭṭha); five pure Abodes, lying one above the other successively. The Very Fruitful, Non-percipient and the Five Pure Abodes pertain to the fourth absorption (jhāna) of the form realm. Thus there are altogether sixteen Brahma realms pertaining to the form realm.

Above the sixteen Brahma realms pertaining to the form realm, there are the four Brahma realms pertaining to the formless realm: Infinity of Space (Ākāśānañcāyatana), Infinity of Consciousness (Viññāṇañcāyatana), Nothingness (Ākiñcaññāyatana), and Neither-Consciousness-nor-Non-Consciousness (Nevasaññānāsaññāyatana), lying one above the other successively.

Thus, there are sixteen Brahma realms of the form realm and four Brahma realms of formless realm, altogether making 20 Brahma realms. When the eleven realms of the sensuous sphere are added to them, there are the 31 realms in a world-element. This is a brief description of their location.

The Eight Causes of Pregnancy

Possible [736] causes of pregnancy:<sup>370</sup>

1. By copulating.
2. By coming into physical contact.
3. By inserting a man's loin cloth into the vagina.
4. By swallowing the semen.
5. By stroking the navel.
6. By seeing the male's appearance.
7. By hearing the male's sound.
8. By getting the male's odour.

Of these,

1. Pregnancy through copulation is explicit.
2. Some women develop strong sexual feeling when the monthly period comes, pull men's hands and hair-knot, and stroke their limbs, big and small, and take pleasure thereby, which makes her pregnant. Thus, through physical contact pregnancy happens.

---

3. During the lifetime of the Buddha, the monk Udāyī gazed at the private parts of his ex-wife and had a discharge of semen; he asked her to wash the soiled robe. She swallowed part of the semen and put part of it together with the robe into her vagina. By so doing, she became pregnant. Thus, through the insertion of men's loin cloth into the vagina, pregnancy takes place.

4. A Birth Story (Jātaka) tells of a doe, the mother of Migasiṅga the recluse. When she was in heat she came to the place where the old recluse, Migasiṅga's father, urinated, and took the urine together with the semen. By so doing she became pregnant and gave birth to the baby Migasiṅga. Thus, through the swallowing of semen pregnancy occurs.

5. In the Birth Story about the Wise Suvāṇṇasāma (Suvāṇṇasāma-jātaka, Ja 540), Sakka, foreseeing that the Bodhisatta's parents would become blind, and wanting them to have a son, asked the wise recluse Dukūla whether sexual intercourse was permissible to recluses. When the reply was: "Whether it is permissible or not, we became ascetics because we do not want to do that," Sakka told him to stroke Pārikā's navel during menstruation. Dukūla did as he was told and Pārikā became pregnant and gave birth to Bodhisatta Suvāṇṇasāma. Thus, stroking a [737] women's navel is another cause for pregnancy. Similarly, while menstruation was occurring to a rich man's daughter, Diṭṭhamaṅgalika, the Bodhisatta recluse, Mātaṅga, stroked her navel which made her pregnant and her son, Maṇḍavya, was born. The mother of Prince Caṇḍa Pajjota, during the menses, felt a scorpion walking across her navel, and she also became pregnant and gave birth to the prince.

6. Being deprived of copulation with men, some women in this world who eye men lustfully while on their periods and even staying at home can become pregnant. In Ceylon there was a court lady, to whom the same thing happened. Thus, through the sight of the male's appearance pregnancy happens.

7. No male is known among the pond herons. When they hear thunder and are in heat, they become pregnant. Sometimes pregnancy occurs to hens on hearing the crowing of a cock. Similarly, pregnancy happens to cows as they hear the bellowing of a bull. Thus, through the hearing of the male's sound pregnancy takes place.

Miscellaneous Topics – 2493

8. Sometimes, cows conceive when they get the smell of a bull. Thus, through the male's odour, pregnancy takes place.

These eight causes for pregnancy should particularly be noted.

The First Treatise on the Perfections

[Previously this was chapter VII, entitled On Miscellany, but the whole chapter is only about one subject, the perfections (pāramī), hence I have retitled it. And as its content fits better with the Further Explanations I have included it here.]

Homage to the Fortunate One, the Worthy One,
the Perfectly Self-Awakened One

What follows are miscellaneous notes on the perfections for the benefit of those who aspire to Buddhahood. Here we furnish miscellaneous notes on the ten perfections (pāramī) as mentioned in the commentary on the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka) for the benefit of those who aspire to the supreme goal of Perfect Self-Awakening and omniscience, and to enable them to acquire skill in comprehending, practising and accumulating the requisites for Awakening.

This chapter will deal with the following pertinent features of the perfections in the form of 16 questions and answers.

1. What are the perfections?
2. Why are they called perfections?
3. How many perfections are there?
4. In what sequence are the perfections arranged?
5. What are the characteristics, functions, etc. of the perfections?
6. What are the basic conditions of the perfections?
7. What are the factors which defile the perfections?
8. What are the factors which purify the perfections?
9. What are the factors which oppose the perfections?
10. What is the method for practising the perfections?
11. What is the complete analysis of the perfections?
12. What is the synopsis of the perfections?
13. What factors accomplish the perfections?
14. How long does it take to accomplish the perfections?

15. What advantages accrue from the perfections?
16. What is the fruit of the perfections?

1. What are the Perfections?

The answer to the question is: The noble qualities, such as generosity, morality, etc., not spoiled by craving, pride or wrong view, but founded on great compassion and wisdom which is skill in seeking merit, are to be named perfections (pāramī).

When giving alms (dāna), if it is tainted with craving, thinking: “This is my alms giving;” if it is tainted with pride, thinking: “This alms giving is mine;” if it is tainted with wrong view, thinking: “This alms giving is myself,” such alms giving is said to be spoiled by craving, pride or wrong view. It is only the kind of alms giving not spoiled by craving, pride or wrong view which could be termed a perfection. The same applies to the observance of morality, renunciation, etc.

To be qualified as a perfection, deeds of merit, such as generosity, morality, etc., should not only be free from the taints of craving, pride or wrong view, but should be founded on great compassion (mahā-karuṇā) and wisdom which is skill in seeking merit (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa). [50]

A Bodhisatta should be able to develop immense sympathy for all beings, close or distant, as if they were all his own children, this is great compassion (mahā-karuṇā). Without discriminating between friend and foe, he should look upon all sentient beings as poor sufferers in Saṃsāra, where they are burning with the fires of craving, hatred and delusion, and also with the fires of birth, ageing, death, grief, lamentation, pain, distress and despair. Contemplating thus, he should develop vigorous compassion for them. His compassion should be so great as to enable him to go to the rescue of all beings from Saṃsāra, even sacrificing his life. Such compassion is called great compassion (mahā-karuṇā) which forms the basis of all the perfections.

The Bodhisatta, in his life as the recluse Sumedha, was so accomplished in spiritual attainments at the time he met Buddha Dīpaṅkara that he could achieve his own liberation right there and then had he so desired. But as a great being endowed with supreme compassion, he bore personal suffering in Saṃsāra for the long duration of four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons to fulfil the perfections in order to liberate suffering beings.

The wisdom which is skill in doing deeds of merit, such as generosity, morality, etc., so that they become basic means and support for the attainment of omniscience is called skill in seeking merit (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa). A man of good family, who aspires to Buddhahood, should engage in meritorious deeds such as generosity, morality, etc., with the sole aim of attaining omniscience.<sup>371</sup> The wisdom that enables him to aim at, and wish for, omniscience as the only fruit of his good deeds, is called skill in seeking merit.

The aforesaid great compassion and skill in seeking merit are the fundamentals for his becoming a Buddha and for the practice of the perfections. One who aspires to Buddhahood should, first of all, endeavour to become accomplished in these two fundamentals. Only the qualities, such as generosity, morality, etc., developed on the basis of these two principles can become true perfections.

2. Why Are They Called Perfections?

It may be asked why the ten virtues, such as generosity, morality, etc., are called perfections. The Pāli word “pāramī” is the combination of “parama” and “ī.” “Parama” means “supreme” and is used here as a designation of Bodhisattas, because they are the highest of beings endowed with the extraordinary virtues of generosity, morality, etc. they are supreme.

Or, because they fulfil and protect such special virtues as generosity, morality, etc.; because they behave as though they bind on and attract other beings to them by means of these virtues; because they purify others by removing their defilements in a most ardent manner; because they proceed to the supreme Nibbāna; because they know their next existence as they comprehend the present life; because they practise virtues, such as generosity, morality, etc., in an incomparable manner, as if these virtues were ingrained in their mental continuum; because they dispel and destroy all alien hordes of defilements which threaten them the Bodhisattas are called supreme (parama).

A Bodhisatta is incomparably endowed with special virtues, such as generosity, morality, etc. This accounts for the emergence of the utterance and the knowledge: “This person is a Bodhisatta; he is a parama, a supreme being.” Thus, the special virtues of generosity, morality, etc., come to be known as what belongs to a supreme being, the perfections (pāramī).

Again, only Bodhisattas are able to perform deeds of merit, such as generosity, morality, etc., in an unparalleled manner. Hence, these deeds of merit are called the perfections (pāramī), meaning the duties of Bodhisattas (paramānaṃ kammaṃ pāramī), or the properties of Bodhisattas (paramānaṃ ayaṃ pāramī).

The set of ten virtues<sup>372</sup> including alms giving (dāna), morality (sīla), etc. are called perfections (pāramī). A Bodhisatta, being endowed with these ten virtues, such as generosity, morality, etc. is known as a parama or extraordinary personality. On this basis, therefore, the etymology of the perfections (pāramī) is: paramānaṃ bhāvo, the state of extraordinary personalities, which is derived from two things: the knowledge of those who see and know them as such, and the sayings of those who see and know them as they really are. An alternative etymology is paramānaṃ kammaṃ, the work of extraordinary personalities; hence their course of conduct, which consists of generosity, morality, etc., is called the perfections (pāramī).

3. How Many Perfections Are There?

In accordance with the teaching (Bv 1.76):

Dānaṃ sīlañ-ca nekkhamāṃ, paññā viriyena pañcamāṃ, khantī saccam-adhiṭṭhānaṃ, mettupekkhā ti te dasa. [51]

There are ten perfections (pāramī): generosity, morality, renunciation, wisdom, energy, forbearance, truthfulness, resolution, loving-kindness and equanimity.

4. In What Sequence Are the Perfections Arranged?

There are five ways of arranging doctrinal points in sequential order:

1. The sequence of actual happening (pavattikkama).

---

<sup>372</sup> [This section originally stood alone, as a short piece in the Further Explanation of Words and Phrases above. I have moved it here, as it helps to explain the perfections, which is the subject of this Treatise.]

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2498

For example, with reference to conception, it is stated in the texts (SN 10.1), passim: For womb-born creatures, the first stage is the fluid stage of kalala for seven days, the second is the frothy stage of abbuda for seven days (Paṭhamam kalalam hoti, kalalā hoti abbudam), etc. the third stage of pesi takes the form of a lump of flesh, and so on. This form of teaching, in sequence of events as they actually take place, is known as the order of actual happening.

2. The sequence of abandoning (pahānakkama).

For example, with reference to defilements, it is stated in the text (Ds 1, 8. PTS 1): Here are phenomena which are to be abandoned through the first stage of the path; and there are phenomena which are to be abandoned through the three higher stages of the path (dassanena pahātabbā dhammā, bhāvanāya pahātabbā dhammā, etc.).” This form of teaching, in serial order according to the steps of abandoning, is known as the order of abandoning.

3. The order of practising (paṭipattikkama).

For example, the seven stages of purification of morality, mind, view, etc. The first practice is to purify morality; this is followed by the practice for purification of the mind. In this way, the stages of purification should proceed in their due order. Such teaching, in sequential order of practice, is known as the order of practising.

4. The order of planes of existence (bhūmikkama).

The first, in order of teaching Dhamma, is the sensuous plane (kāmāvacara) followed by the material plane (rūpāvacara) and then by the non-material plane (arūpāvacara). Such an arrangement in teaching is known as the order of planes of existences.

5. The order of the teaching by the Buddha (desanakkama).

In addition to the aforesaid four serial arrangements of teaching, there is the fifth kind in which phenomena, such as the aggregates of matter (rūpakkhanda), feelings (vedanākkhandha), perceptions (saññākkhandha), etc., are taught by the Buddha in a particular order, for some specific reasons. Such an arrangement of the teaching is known as the order of the teaching by the Buddha (desanākkama).

In the first four orders of arrangement, each has its own reason for following a particular sequence, because conceptional stages actually happen in that order; because defilements are abandoned in that order; because the acts of purification are experienced in that order, or because the planes of existences exist in that order. But in the fifth method of teaching, desanākkama, the Buddha has a special reason for adopting a particular sequence in teaching each set of such phenomena as the five aggregates (khandha), the twelve bases (āyatana), etc.

In the chapter on the perfections, the perfections are arranged not in their order of happening, of abandoning, of practice, or of the planes of existence, as in the first four methods, but in accordance with this fifth method, desanākkama, taught by the Buddha for a special reason.

It might be asked why the Buddha adopted this particular sequence, e.g. generosity, morality, renunciation etc., and not any other in teaching the ten perfections? The answer is that when the Bodhisatta, the recluse Sumedha, first investigated the perfections to be fulfilled just after receiving the prophecy, he discovered them in a particular sequence; he therefore fulfilled them in that order; and after his Awakening, he taught the perfections in the same sequence he had practised.

To give a more detailed explanation: Of the ten perfections, generosity helps develop morality in a special way; even an immoral person, for example, a supporter on the occasion of his son's ordination, is likely to observe precepts without difficulty; and generosity is easier to practise. Though it may be difficult for one to keep the precepts, one can find it easy to [52] give alms. Hence, the perfection of generosity is mentioned first.

Only generosity based on morality is most beneficial; so morality follows generosity. Only morality based on renunciation is most beneficial; so renunciation is taught immediately after morality.

Similarly, renunciation based on wisdom, wisdom on energy, energy on forbearance, forbearance on truthfulness, truthfulness on resolution, resolution on loving-kindness, loving-kindness based on equanimity is most beneficial; thus equanimity is taught after loving-kindness.

Equanimity can be beneficial only when it is based on compassion. Bodhisattas are great beings who had already been endowed with the basic quality of compassion.

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2500

How could Bodhisattas, the great compassionate ones, look upon sentient beings with equanimity or indifference? Some teachers say: It is not in all cases and at all times that Bodhisattas show indifference towards sentient beings; they do so only when it is necessary. Other teachers say: They do not show indifference towards beings, but only towards offensive deeds done by them. Thus, great compassion and the perfection of equanimity are not opposed to each other.

Another way of explaining the order:

1. Generosity (dāna) is taught initially 1) because generosity is likely to occur among many people and thus belongs to all beings; 2) because it is not so fruitful as morality, etc., and 3) because it is easy to practise.

2. Morality (sīla) is stated immediately after generosity 1) because morality purifies both the supporter and the recipient; 2) because after teaching the rendering of service to others such as alms giving, the Buddha wishes to teach abstention from causing affliction to others, such as killing; 3) because alms giving involves some positive action whereas morality involves some practice of restraint, and the Buddha wishes to teach restraint after teaching positive action, such as giving of alms; 4) because alms giving leads to attainment of wealth, and morality leads to the attainment of a human or Deva existence; and 5) because the Buddha wishes to teach the attainment of a human or Deva existence after teaching attainment of wealth.

3. Renunciation is mentioned immediately after morality 1) because through renunciation perfect morality may be observed; 2) because the Buddha wishes to teach good mental conduct through renunciation of both material things and the defilements immediately after teaching good physical and verbal conduct through morality; 3) because the attainment of the absorptions (jhāna) comes easily to one whose morality is pure; 4) because the fault arising from demeritorious deeds (kamma-paradha) is eradicated through observance of morality; by so doing, purity of physical or verbal exertion (payoga-suddhi) is achieved. Mental defilements (kilesa-paradha) are eradicated through renunciation; by so doing, the inherent elements of the wrong views of eternalism (sassata-diṭṭhi) and annihilationism (uccheda-diṭṭhi) are cleared away, and purity of disposition (āsaya-suddhi) with regard to insight knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa), and to knowledge that volitions are one's own property (kammasa-kata-ñāṇa) is achieved. The Buddha accordingly wishes to teach the purification of knowledge by renunciation which follows the purification of exertion (payoga-suddhi); and 5) because the Buddha wishes to teach that eradication of mental defilements at the emergence (pariyuṭṭhāna) stage through renunciation can take place only after eradication of the mental defilements at the transgression (vītikkama) stage through morality. [53]

There are three stages in the arising of defilements: 1) the dormant stage (anusaya) where defilements remain at the base of the mental continuum as a latent tendency, not manifesting themselves as a mental property; 2) the stage where defilements come into existence from the latent stage (pariyuṭṭhāna), manifesting themselves as a mental property at the mind's door; and 3) the stage where defilements become violent and uncontrollable (vītikkama), manifesting themselves in some unwholesome physical or verbal action.

The observance of precepts inhibits the active expression of defilements (vītikkama) through body or speech. This is a temporary putting away of defilement (tad-aṅga-pahāna). The practice of concentration meditation (samatha-bhāvanā), especially at the stage of attainment of the absorptions (jhāna), prevents the violent arising of mental defilements at the mind's door (pariyuṭṭhāna). This is the putting away of defilements to a distance for a considerable time (vikkhambhana-pahāna).

Defilements are entirely eradicated right down to the level of dormancy through wisdom (paññā) which is the knowledge of the path and fruition, leaving no trace of defilements in the mental continuum. This is a complete abandoning of defilements which are never to rise again (samuccheda-pahāna).

4. Wisdom is mentioned immediately after renunciation 1) because renunciation is perfected and purified by wisdom; 2) because the Buddha wishes to teach that there is no wisdom without the absorptions (jhāna), including renunciation; 3) because he wishes to teach wisdom which is the basic cause of equanimity, immediately after teaching renunciation which is the basic cause of concentration of the mind; and 4) because he wishes to teach that only by sustained thinking directed towards the welfare of others can there arise the knowledge of skilful means (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa) in working for their welfare.

5. Energy is stated immediately after wisdom 1) because the function of wisdom is fulfilled by an application of energy; 2) because the Buddha wishes to teach the marvels of endeavour for the welfare of beings after teaching wisdom, that comprehends with insight the nature of reality, which is void of personality or self; 3) because he wishes to teach the cause for exertion<sup>373</sup> immediately after the cause for equanimity; and 4) because he wishes to teach that special benefits accrue only from ardent striving after making careful consideration.

6. Forbearance is mentioned immediately after energy 1) because forbearance is fulfilled by energy as only an energetic man can withstand all the suffering that he encounters; 2) because the Buddha wishes to teach that energy is an adornment of forbearance, as forbearance, shown by an indolent man because he cannot win, is not dignified, whereas forbearance, shown by an energetic man in spite of his winning, is dignified; 3) because he wishes to teach the cause of concentration immediately after teaching the cause of energy as restlessness (uddhacca), due to excessive energy, is abandoned only by understanding the Dhamma through reflection on it (dhamma-nijjhānakkhanti); 4) because he wishes to teach that only an energetic man can constantly endeavour as only a man of great forbearance is free from restlessness and is always able to perform meritorious deeds; 5) because he wishes to teach that craving for rewards cannot arise when endowed with mindfulness as there can be no craving when one reflects on the Dhamma in undertaking welfare works; and 6) because he wishes to teach that a Bodhisatta bears with patience the suffering caused by others, also when he is not working diligently for their welfare, as evidenced from the Short Birth Story about Prince Dhammapāla (Cūḷa-dhammapāla-jātaka, Ja 358), etc.

7. Truthfulness is mentioned immediately after forbearance 1) because forbearance can be maintained for long through truthfulness as one's forbearance will last only when one is truthful; 2) because having mentioned first the forbearance of wrongs inflicted by others, the Buddha wishes to teach next how the Bodhisatta keeps his word to render assistance even to those who have done him wrong ungratefully, for at the time of receiving the prophecy, the Bodhisatta, aspiring to Buddhahood, makes the resolution to rescue all beings. True to this firm determination he renders help even to those who [54] had wronged him.

To illustrate this matter: In the Long Birth Story about the Monkey King (Mahākapi-jātaka, Ja 516), the story is told of the Bodhisatta, in his existence of a monkey, going to the rescue of a Brahmin who had fallen into a deep chasm. Exhausted by strenuous exertion to bring the man out of danger, the Bodhisatta trustingly fell asleep on the lap of the man whom he had saved. With an evil thought of eating the flesh of his rescuer the wicked man hit the monkey's head with a stone. Without showing any anger and patiently bearing the injury on his head, the Bodhisatta continued his effort to save the man from the danger of wild beasts. He showed him the way out of the forest by drops of blood that fell as he jumped from tree to tree; 3) because he wished to show that a Bodhisatta, with tolerance, never relinquishes the practice of speaking only the truth steadfastly though he is misrepresented by others; and 4) because having taught the meditative reflection by means of which emptiness may be understood, the Bodhisatta wishes to show the knowledge of truth, developed through the process of that reflection (dhamma-nijjhānakkhanti).

8. Resolution is mentioned immediately after truthfulness 1) because truthfulness is accomplished through resolution, since refraining from falsehood becomes perfect in one whose resolution to speak truth remains unshakeable even at the risk of his life; 2) because, after teaching truthfulness, he wishes to teach the resolute commitment of Bodhisattas to truth without wavering; and 3) because after teaching that only those who possess knowledge of the truth of things as they really are able to build up the perfections and bring them to completion, he wishes to teach that the requisites of the perfections can be effected as a result of the knowledge of truth.

9. Loving-kindness is mentioned immediately after resolution 1) because development of loving-kindness helps fulfilment of resolution to undertake the work for the welfare of others; 2) because, after teaching resolution, the Buddha wishes to teach what brings benefit to others in accordance with his resolve, for a Bodhisatta, in the course of fulfilling his perfections, generally abides in loving-kindness; and 3) because when one is established imperturbably in determination to work for others' welfare, can one carry out one's wish with loving-kindness.

10. Equanimity is mentioned immediately after loving-kindness 1) because equanimity purifies loving-kindness, and when one develops loving-kindness without equanimity, one is liable to be deceived by craving or greed that wears the mask of loving-kindness. Only when one develops equanimity, can one sometimes escape from the deceptive craving or greed; 2) because after teaching how the interest of others should be served out of loving-kindness, the Buddha wishes to teach that indifference is to be maintained towards all wrongs inflicted by them;<sup>374</sup> 3) because, after teaching the development of loving-kindness, the Buddha wishes to teach its advantages, for only after developing loving-kindness can equanimity be successfully developed; and 4) the Buddha wishes to teach the wonderful attribute of a Bodhisatta who can remain equanimous even towards those who show him good-will.

Thus our teacher, the lord of the world, teaches the perfections in a proper sequence, as described above, arranged on some principle of order and succession, not at random or haphazardly.

5. What Are the Characteristics, Functions etc.?

We shall begin this section with explanations of the words characteristic, function, manifestation, and proximate cause. We shall next deal with the definitions and purport of the perfections together with their characteristics, functions, manifestations, and proximate causes collectively, as well as individually.

Knowledge free from personality-belief (atta-diṭṭhi) is possible only through comprehension of the ultimate realities of mind and matter (nāma-rūpa) which is attained by reflecting upon each reality in terms of its characteristics, functions, manifestations and proximate [55] causes. Similarly, it is only when one knows the characteristics, functions, manifestations and proximate causes of the perfections collectively, as well as individually, that will one have a clear understanding of them. Therefore, the texts usually describe these four features concerning the perfections.

1. Characteristic (lakkaṇa).

The commentary<sup>375</sup> defines it thus: The characteristic has two aspects: 1) ordinary features common to all (sāmañña) and 2) special features peculiar to

<sup>375</sup> [These lines and the ones that follow are actually being quoted from the sub-commentary the Classification of Mind and Matter (Nāma-rūpa-pariccheda, vs. 633-634; PTS 64)].

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2505

one and not shared by others (sāmaññaṃ vā sabhāvo vā, dhammānaṃ lakkhaṇaṃ mataṃ).”

Ordinary and special features of ultimate realities, are known as characteristics (lakkhaṇa); 1) features common to all (sāmañña), and 2) features not shared by others but possessed by one only (sabhāva) and thus unique (visesa).

For example, the material qualities of the earth-element (paṭhavī) has two characteristics: 1) change, impermanence, suffering, not being subject to control, and 2) hardness. The characteristics under 1) are features common (sāmañña) to other elements, whereas the characteristic of 2) hardness is the unique feature of the earth-element only, not shared by the others (sabhāva).

2. Function (rasa).

The commentary defines it as: kiccaṃ vā tassa sampatti, raso ti paridīpito, “function is to be explained also as having two aspects: kicca and sampatti. 1) function which is to be performed (kicca-rasa), and 2) attainment as a result thereof (sampatti-rasa).”

3. Manifestation (paccupaṭṭhāna).

The commentary defines it as: Whenever a person ponders deeply on a certain mind-object, what usually appears in his mind relates to the nature of the mind-object under consideration, relates to its functions, relates to its cause and relates to its effect. Thus, anyone of those, which appears in his mind concerning the mind-object he is thinking about, is called manifestation (Phalaṃ vā paccupaṭṭhānaṃ upaṭṭhāna-nayo pi vā).

Manifestation should be known as result (phala) and manifestation (upaṭṭhānākāra); 1) the result of the ultimate realities (phala) and 2) the way something manifests to the yogi (upaṭṭhānākāra). Whenever the yogi ponders deeply over a certain ultimate reality, what relates to the nature, function, cause, or effect of that reality appears in his mind. Thus something relating to any of these four and appearing in the yogi’s mind is called its manifestation.

4. Proximate cause (padaṭṭhāna).

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2506

The commentary defines it as: The immediate contributory factor for the arising of an ultimate reality is known as the proximate cause (āsanna-kāraṇaṃ yaṃ tu, taṃ padaṭṭhāna-saññitam).

What then are the four features of the ten perfections? The answer is: dealing first with those common to all the ten perfections:

1. They have the characteristic of serving the interest of others.
2. Their function is to provide assistance to others (kicca-rasa), or not vacillating as to fulfilment (sampatti-rasa).
3. Their manifestation is the appearance in the yogi's mind of the knowledge that they have the nature of wishing for the welfare of beings or the effect of becoming a Buddha.
4. Their proximate cause is great compassion (mahā-karuṇā) and knowledge of skilful means (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa).

The features belonging to each of the perfections are: 1) The volition founded on great compassion (mahā-karuṇā) and 2) the knowledge of skilful means (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa) to relinquish, donate, give away one's possessions to others is called the perfection of alms giving (dāna).

1. It has the characteristic of relinquishing.
2. Its function is to destroy greed that clings to materials that could be given away.
3. Its manifestation is non-attachment that appears in the yogi's mind regarding its nature, or attainment of wealth and prosperity and happy existence regarding its effect.
4. Its proximate cause is the object to be given, for giving is possible only when there is that object.

1. The perfection of generosity is well comprehended only when it is studied thoroughly in eight ways with these four aspects. When studied thus, it would be clearly understood that generosity (dāna) is an act that has the characteristic of forsaking or abandoning. At the same time, it performs the task of destroying greed that tends to attach the supporter to the things to be given away. To the yogi's mind, who ponders [56] deeply and carefully, it would appear as non-attachment to the objects of offering, or it would appear as an act which could produce a favourable existence endowed with wealth and prosperity. Generosity is possible only when there exists something for one to offer. The same consideration applies to all the remaining perfections.

2. Founded on great compassion and knowledge of skilful means, wholesome physical and verbal conduct is called the perfection of morality. In terms of Abhidhamma, it means abstention from wrongdoings that should not be committed (viratī cetasika) and volition (cetanā) to perform different duties that should be performed.

1. It has the characteristic of not allowing one's physical and verbal actions to become wrong but of keeping them orientated towards the wholesome, and has the characteristic of serving as a foundation for all good deeds.
2. Its function is to prevent one from indulging in moral depravities, such as the three wrong physical actions and the four wrong verbal actions; or it helps one attain a virtuous state with spotless and blameless conduct.
3. It manifests as purity in word and deed when the yogi reflects on its nature.
4. Its proximate cause is conscience (hirī) and concern (ottapa) not to do evil.

3. Founded on great compassion and knowledge of skilful means, the group of consciousnesses and mental concomitants which aspire after emancipation from sensual existences, after perceiving the faults of the objects of sense-desire (vatthu-kāma), the mental defilements of greed and for various existences, is the perfection of renunciation.

1. It has the characteristic of emancipation from sense-desire and from sensual existence.
2. Its function is to bring out their faults.
3. Its manifestation is realization by the yogi that it is turning away, or withdrawing from these states of sensual existence.
4. It has the knowledge of spiritual urgency (saṃvega-ñāṇa) as its proximate cause.

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2508

Knowledge formed by concern (ottappa) about dangers, such as birth, ageing, disease, death, and woeful states is the knowledge of spiritual urgency (saṁvega-ñāṇa).

4. Founded on great compassion and knowledge of skilful means, the mental concomitant of wisdom, which penetrates the ordinary and special characteristics of phenomena, is the perfection of wisdom.

1. It has the characteristic of penetrating the real nature of phenomena; or of unerring discernment of the ordinary and special characteristics of objects under contemplation, like hitting the bull's eye with an arrow by a skilful archer.
2. Its function is to illuminate the object like a lamp and dispelling the darkness of delusion (moha) that hides the nature of objects.
3. Its manifestation as to its nature is non-confusion in the yogi's mind with regard to objects of contemplation, like a guide showing the way to travellers who have lost their sense of direction in a forest, or as an effect, having the beneficial result of freedom from bewilderment with regard to the objects of contemplation.
4. Its proximate cause is concentration (samādhi), or the four noble truths.

5. Founded on great compassion and knowledge of skilful means, the physical and mental endeavours for the welfare of others, is the perfection of energy.

1. It has the characteristic of striving or making effort.
2. Its function is to support and strengthen the factors which arise together with it, so that they will not become lax in performing meritorious deeds.
3. Its manifestation is steadfastness in the yogi's mind which is opposed to sloth and torpor which are detrimental to meritorious deeds.
4. Its proximate cause is the knowledge of spiritual urgency (saṁvega-ñāṇa) or the eight factors that promote exertion (viriyārambha-vatthu).

Eight Factors Which Promote Exertion

Ven. Mahā Visuddhārāma Sayādaw, in the section on meditation in his Break Down of Form into its Ultimate Parts (Paramattha-sarūpa-bhedāni), has described the eight factors which promote exertion (viriyārambha- vatthu), which are: two concerning repairs and maintenance; two concerning travelling; two concerning ill-health; and two concerning the taking of meals. [57]

Two Factors concerning Repairs and Maintenance

1. One says to oneself thus: “I have to do some mending of robes, etc. While I am engaged thus, it will not be easy for me to devote myself to the teaching of the Buddha. I shall endeavour to do so in advance before I start mending.”
2. On completion of such an undertaking, he also considers: “I have finished my mending job. While I was doing it, I could not pay attention to the teaching of the Buddha. Now I must work harder to make up for this remissness.”

Two Factors concerning Travelling

3. He reflects: “I have to go on a journey. While going on the journey, it will not be easy to devote my attention to the teaching of the Buddha. I shall endeavour to do so in advance before I travel.”
4. After the journey, he considers: “I have made the journey. While I was travelling, I could not devote my attention to the teaching of the Buddha. Now I must work harder to make up for this remissness.”

Two Factors concerning Ill-Health

5. When he begins to suffer slight illness he reflects: “I am feeling indisposed. The ailment may grow worse. I will work hard before it does.”
6. While recuperating, he reflects: “I have just recovered from illness, but it may recur at any time. I will make an effort before any sickness reappears.”

Two Factors concerning the Partaking of Meals

7. When sufficient alms food is not available, he reflects: “I have come back from the alms round with only a little food. A small meal keeps my body light and fit, free from sloth and torpor. I shall immediately start putting in effort.”

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2510

8. Having obtained sufficient alms food, he reflects: “I have come back from alms round with enough food which will give me strength to work hard. I shall immediately start working energetically.”

These are the eight factors that encourage exertion (viriyārambha-vatthu). As against these factors, there are eight others, the opposite of these, which encourage indolence (kusīta-vatthu). When one has to do some repair, one delays, saying: “It will make me tired. I shall have a good sleep before doing the repair.” When one has to go on a journey, too, one says in the same manner. When one starts feeling unwell, one complains of one’s feebleness and tries to sleep. When one has had enough food, one simply dozes, for one’s stomach is heavy. When one has done the repair, or come back from the journey, or recovered from illness, or had meagre food, one grumbles: “I am tired out; I shall take rest.” In this way, one foolishly excuses oneself for not making efforts to cultivate meritoriousness.

The eight things that encourage exertion (viriyārambha-vatthu) and the eight things that encourage indolence (kusīta-vatthu) are taught in the Chanting Together Discourse (Saṅgīti-sutta, DN 33).

6. Founded on great compassion and knowledge of skilful means, tolerance to the wrongdoings of others is the perfection of forbearance. In terms of Abhidhamma, the group of consciousnesses and mental concomitants that arise in such a mode of tolerance are headed by non-aversion (adosa).

1. It has the characteristic of bearing with patience.
2. Its function is to overcome both desirable and undesirable objects.

One who is not endowed with endurance, adheres to greed when encountering pleasant, desirable objects; and to aversion, when encountering unpleasant, undesirable objects. One is then said to be defeated by both desirable objects and undesirable objects. One who is endowed with endurance, stands firmly, keeping away from both greed and aversion. Forbearance is thus said to overcome all sense objects whether desirable or [58] undesirable.

3. Its manifestation in the yogi’s mind is patience, acceptance of both desirable objects and undesirable objects or non-opposition to them.
4. Its proximate cause is seeing things as they really are.

7. Founded on great compassion and knowledge of skilful means, speaking the truth and keeping one's word is the perfection of truthfulness. In terms of Abhidhamma, it is the mental concomitant of abstinence (virati-cetasika), or volition (cetanā-cetasika), or wisdom (paññā-cetasika), depending on the circumstance.

1. It has the characteristic of veracity.
2. Its function is to make clear the truth as it is.
3. Its manifestation in the yogi's mind is nobility, sweetness and pleasantness.
4. Its proximate cause is purity of deed, word and thought.

8. Founded on great compassion and knowledge of skilful means, an unshaken determination to pursue meritoriousness is the perfection of resolution. In terms of Abhidhamma, it is the group of consciousnesses and mental concomitants arising in such a mode of resolution.

1. It has the characteristic of unshaken determination in fulfilment of the perfections, charity and good conduct as requisites of Awakening.
2. Its function is to overcome all demerit which is opposed to the requisites of Awakening.
3. Its manifestation in the yogi's mind is steadfastness in fulfilment of the requisites of Awakening.
4. Its proximate cause is the requisites of Awakening.

9. Founded on great compassion and knowledge of skilful means, service to the welfare and happiness of the world is the perfection of loving-kindness. It is the mental concomitant of non-aversion (adosa-cetasika) in terms of Abhidhamma.

1. It has the characteristic of wishing prosperity to all beings.
2. Its function is to work for the welfare of beings in fulfilment of that wish; or its function is removing the nine causes of resentment.<sup>376</sup>
3. Its manifestation in the yogi's mind is serenity.

4. Its proximate cause is seeing beings as agreeable.<sup>377</sup>

10. Founded on great compassion and knowledge of skilful means, the attitude of impartiality towards desirable and undesirable conditioned beings, discarding love and hate, is the perfection of equanimity. In terms of Abhidhamma, it is the mental concomitant of specific neutrality (tatra-majjhataṭā), which arises in such modes.

1. It has the characteristic of taking up the mental position between love and hate.
2. Its function is to have an impartial view.
3. Its manifestation in the yogi's mind is allaying both love and hate.
4. Its proximate cause is reflection that all beings are owners of their own deeds (kamma).

Each of the above descriptions of the perfections begins with the qualifying words “founded on great compassion and knowledge of skilful means.” These two attributes form the basic virtues, which are always present in the mental continuum of Bodhisattas and only deeds of generosity and morality, etc., that are founded on them constitute the perfections.

6. What Are the Basic Conditions of the Perfections?

Briefly stated, they are:

1. Great aspiration (abhinīhāra).
2. Great compassion (mahā-karuṇā) and skill in ways and means (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa).
3. Four grounds for becoming a Buddha (Buddha-bhūmi).
4. Sixteen mental dispositions (ajjhāsaya).
5. Reflective knowledge (paccavekkhaṇa-ñāṇa) of disadvantages of non-giving, morality, etc., and advantages of giving, morality, etc. [59]

6. Fifteen kinds of practices (carāṇa) and five kinds of super knowledges (abhiññā), together with their contributory causes.

1. Great Aspiration

Great aspiration (abhinīhāra): In Pāḷi abhi means towards, here implying “towards omniscience;” nīhāra means “directing” or “applying the mind;” hence the “aspiration for omniscient Buddhahood.” Here, the eight factors required for receiving the prophecy of Buddhahood, described in chapter II on “The Rare Appearance of a Buddha,” may be recalled.

In an existence complete with the eight factors, like that of the wise Sumedha, the following thoughts occur in the mind of the Bodhisattas without being aroused by anyone, but only by being endowed with the same eight factors: 1) When I have crossed the ocean of Saṃsāra by myself, with my own effort, I shall also rescue other beings; 2) when I have freed myself from the bonds of Saṃsāra, I shall also liberate other beings; 3) when I have tamed my sense faculties, I shall teach other beings so that they can tame them themselves; 4) when I have extinguished the fires of the mental defilements myself, I shall calm the burning minds of other beings; 5) when I have gained the most excellent comfort of Nibbāna, I shall let other beings enjoy the same; 6) when I have extinguished the flames of the three rounds of rebirths,<sup>378</sup> I shall put out those flames raging in other beings; 7) when I have purified myself of the dust of the defilements through my own effort, I shall cause purification of other beings; 8) when I have gained knowledge of the four noble truths, I shall teach them to other beings.<sup>379</sup>

Thus the aspiration to Buddhahood arises fervently, continuously, as a great meritorious consciousness (mahā-kusala-citta) together with its mental concomitants. These meritorious consciousnesses and mental concomitants which aspire to Buddhahood are known as the great aspiration (abhinīhāra), which forms the basic condition for all the ten perfections.

Indeed, it is only through the arising of this great aspiration that Bodhisattas receive the definite prophecy of Buddhahood; after receiving the prophecy, there occur in succession: Reflection on the perfections, resolution to fulfil them and necessary practices that take him to the sublime height of accomplishment.

<sup>379</sup> In short, I shall strive to become a Buddha and go to the rescue of all beings.

This great aspiration has the characteristic of an inclination of the mind towards omniscience. Its function is to aspire to become a Buddha and having gained it, to wish for the ability to bring welfare and happiness to all beings until they attain Nibbāna. Its manifestation in the yogi's mind is its being the basic cause of the requisites for Awakening. Its proximate cause is great compassion.<sup>380</sup>

This great aspiration has, as its object, the inconceivable provenance of the Buddhas and the welfare of the whole immeasurable world of beings. It should thus be seen as the basis of actions, such as the perfections, charity and good conduct, and the most exalted meritoriousness which is endowed with incomparable power.

To deal briefly with this unique power, as soon as the great aspiration arises, the Bodhisatta is poised to enter the great field of the performance for the attainment of omniscience (mahā-bodhiyāna-paṭipatti). He is then destined to become a Buddha. This destiny is irreversible after the arising in him of this great aspiration and he thereby gains the designation of “Bodhisatta.”<sup>381</sup>

From that time onwards, the Bodhisatta becomes fully inclined to the attainment of [60] omniscience, and the power to fulfil and practise the perfections (pāramī), charity (cāga) and good conduct (cariyā). Thus, the requisites for Awakening become established in him.

Because he possesses this great meritorious aspiration, the recluse Sumedha correctly investigated all the perfections with perfection-investigating wisdom (pāramī-pavicaya-ñāṇa).<sup>382</sup> This wisdom was achieved by himself, without the help of a teacher, and was therefore known also as a self-created knowledge (sayambhū-ñāṇa) which was the forerunner of omniscience. Having thought about and investigated the perfections clearly and correctly, he fulfilled and practised them for the duration of four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons.

This great aspiration has:

<sup>381</sup> One is not entitled to be called a Bodhisatta until one has made the aspiration (abhinīhāra).

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2515

1. Four conditions (paccaya).
2. Four causes (hetu).
3. Four strengths (bala).

1. The Four Conditions, or Remote Factors

1. When the Great Being, who aspires to become a Buddha, sees a Buddha performing a miracle, he thinks: “Omniscience is of tremendous power; by acquiring it, the Buddha has come to be of such a wonderful and marvellous nature and to possess such inconceivable power.” Having witnessed the Buddha’s powers, he is inclined towards omniscience.
2. Although he does not himself see the Buddha’s great power, he hears from others: “The Fortunate One is endowed with such and such powers.” Having heard this, he is inclined towards omniscience.
3. Although he neither witnesses nor hears of the Buddha’s great powers, he learns a discourse on the powers of a Buddha. Having learned it, he is inclined towards omniscience.
4. Although he neither sees the powers of a Buddha, nor learns about it from others, nor hears a discourse concerning them, since he has a very noble disposition, he thinks thus: “I will protect the heritage, lineage, tradition and law of the Buddhas.” Because of this high reverence for Dhamma (Dhamma-garu) he is inclined towards omniscience.

2. The Four Causes, or Immediate Factors

1. The great being is endowed with the immediate support (upanissaya) of having performed special deeds of merit (adhikāra) under former Buddhas.
2. He is naturally endowed with a compassionate temperament and is willing to alleviate the suffering of beings even at the sacrifice of his life.
3. He is endowed with energy and strength to strive long until he achieves his goal of Buddhahood, without feeling discouraged by the suffering in Saṃsāra or by the hardships in working for the welfare of beings.
4. He enjoys the friendship of good people who restrain him from doing evil and encourage him to develop what is good.

Of these four causes, being endowed with immediate support (upanissaya-sampadā) means that, because the great being has resolved mentally or verbally in the presence of former Buddhas for becoming a Buddha, he is always inclined toward omniscience. He is always inclined also to work for the welfare of beings.

Because he is endowed with such immediate support, he becomes sharply distinguished from those who would become Paccekabuddhas (Pacceka-bodhisatta) or disciples of Buddhas (sāvaka-bodhisatta) in respect of the faculties (indriya); of practices for the welfare of others and of skill in serving the interests of others and in knowing right from wrong (ṭhānāṭhāna-kosalla-ñāṇa).<sup>383</sup> [61]

As for association with good friends, by good friends (kalyāṇa-mitta) are meant those who are possessed of eight attributes: faith, morality, learning, charity, energy, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom.

1. Being endowed with faith, a good friend has confidence in the omniscience of the Fortunate One, and of one's own deeds (kamma) and the fruits thereof. Because of such faith, he does not give up his wish for the welfare of beings; this wish is the basic cause for Supreme Awakening.
2. Being endowed with morality, he is dear to beings who hold him in esteem and reverence.
3. Being accomplished in learning, he usually gives profound discourses which lead to the welfare and happiness of beings.
4. Being accomplished in charity, he is of few wants, easily contented, detached from sense pleasures, remaining aloof from them.
5. Being endowed with energy, he always strives to promote the welfare of beings.
6. Being endowed with mindfulness, he never neglects to do deeds of merit.

---

<sup>383</sup> From these three qualities, it may be deduced that the Bodhisattas have done special deeds of merit under former Buddhas.

7. Being accomplished in concentration, he becomes a person of undistracted, concentrated mind.
8. Being endowed with wisdom, he understands things as they really are.

Through mindfulness, the good friend examines the results of meritorious and demeritorious deeds. He understands truly through wisdom what is beneficial or harmful to beings.

Through concentration, he keeps his mind steady, and through energy, he restrains beings from what will bring harm to them and directs them to strive hard with unremitting zeal for their well-being. Associating with and relying on a good friend, who is possessed of such qualities, the Bodhisatta endeavours to strengthen his own accomplishment in his immediate support (upanissaya-sampatti).

With clear purified wisdom and extreme purity of deeds and words which are achieved through persistent endeavours, he becomes accomplished in the four great powers. Before long, he comes to possess the eight factors required for receiving the prophecy. He shows the great aspiration (mahābhinhāra) boldly, and becomes established firmly as a true Bodhisatta. From then onwards, he has no aspiration other than Supreme Awakening. He becomes a noble person with a fixed, irreversible destination of full Awakening.

3. The Four Strengths

1. Internal strength (ajjhattika-bala):<sup>384</sup> Exercising this strength, having self-reliance and conscience towards doing evil, the Bodhisatta aspires after becoming a Buddha, fulfils the perfections and attains Supreme Awakening.
2. External strength (bāhira-bala):<sup>385</sup> Exercising this strength, relying upon the outside world, being supported by pride and self-confidence, thinking: “I am a person fully equipped with the powers to attain

Buddhahood,” the Bodhisatta aspires after Buddhahood, fulfils the perfections and attains Supreme Awakening.

3. Strength of supporting conditions (upanissaya-bala):<sup>386</sup> Exercising this strength, being endowed with sharp faculties and natural purity and being supported by mindfulness, the Bodhisatta aspires after Buddhahood, fulfils the perfections and attains Supreme Awakening.
4. Strength of exertion (payoga-bala):<sup>387</sup> Exercising this strength, being endowed with purity of deed and word, and constantly engaged in meritorious deeds, the Bodhisatta aspires after Buddhahood, fulfils the perfections and attains Supreme Awakening. [62]

Complete with these four conditions, four causes and four strengths, by the time the Bodhisatta reaches the stage of development, as in the existence of the wise Sumedha, he acquires the eight factors which entitle him to receive the prophecy of becoming a Buddha. Actuated by the acquisition of these eight factors, the great aspiration, which is meritorious consciousness and its concomitants, arises: “I will strive with unremitting zeal to become a Buddha and go to the rescue of all beings.” This great meritorious aspiration (abhinīhāra) forms a basic condition for all the perfections.

Because of the arising of the great meritorious aspiration in him, the following marvels come to be attributed to the noble Bodhisatta:

1. He treats all beings with love like his own children.
2. His mind is not defiled through demerit, he remains undisturbed and untainted by defilements.
3. All his intentions, actions and words are for promoting the welfare and happiness of beings.

4. Fulfilment of the perfections, and practice of the charity and good conduct, instead of diminishing, becomes more and more pronounced and mature in him.

Because of the arising in him of these marvels, the Bodhisatta is endowed with the stream of the most sublime meritoriousness and benevolence. As a result, he becomes worthy of receiving excellent gifts, and an incomparably fertile field where seeds of merit may be sown, establishing himself as an object of the highest homage and reverence for beings.

2. Great Compassion and Skilful Means

The great meritorious aspiration (abhinīhāra), great compassion (mahā-karuṇā) and knowledge of skilful means (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa) form the basic conditions for all the perfections. Through them, Bodhisattas are able to promote constantly the welfare and happiness of other beings, without concern for their own interests. Although performing the duties of Bodhisattas which are beyond the capability of ordinary men, they do not consider them too wearisome.

Because great compassion and knowledge of skilful means exist in them, welfare and happiness accrue to those who develop confidence in them, who show respect to them, who have occasion to see the Bodhisatta or recollect their virtues.

To explain further about compassion and wisdom, it is through wisdom that a Bodhisatta attains omniscience; it is through compassion that he performs the duties of a Buddha. Through wisdom he is able to cross the ocean of Samsāra; through compassion he goes to the rescue of beings. Through wisdom he understands thoroughly the suffering of others; through compassion he endeavours to alleviate their suffering. Through wisdom he becomes wearied of suffering; through compassion he accepts the same disgusting suffering as happiness in order to work for the liberation of beings. Through wisdom he aspires after Nibbāna; through compassion he continues to go round after round in Samsāra.

Thus, compassion and wisdom are beneficial in many ways. These two not only form the foundation of the perfections, they are the basic condition of the aspiration after Buddhahood as well.

3. Four Grounds for Becoming a Buddha

Like aspiration, compassion and wisdom, the following four factors also form the basic conditions of the perfections:

1. Endeavour (ussāha): It is the endeavour for the fulfilment of the perfections (pāramī), charity (cāga) and practices (cariyā).
2. Higher intelligence (ummaṅga): It is the skill in ways and means, (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa), or skill in means.
3. Firm standing (avaṭṭhāna): It is imperturbable determination in practices leading to [63] becoming a Buddha.
4. Beneficial practice (hita-cariyā): It is development of loving-kindness and compassion.

These four factors are known as the grounds for becoming a Buddha since they are conducive to the arising of omniscience.

4. Sixteen Mental Dispositions<sup>388</sup>

There are sixteen dispositions of a good type: inclinations to renunciation (nekkhammajjhāsaya); to solitude (pavivekajjhāsaya); to non-greed (alobhajjhāsaya); to non-hatred (adosajjhāsaya); to non-delusion (amohajjhāsaya); to liberation (nissaraṇajjhāsaya); and inclination towards each of the ten perfections (dānajjhāsaya, sīlajjhāsaya), etc.

Because of their intense inclination for renunciation, Bodhisattas see danger in sense-pleasures and household life; because of their intense inclination for solitude, they see danger in company and social life; because of their intense inclination for non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion, they see danger in greed, hatred and delusion; because of their intense inclination for liberation, they see danger in all forms of existence.

The perfections do not arise in him who does not see danger in greed, hatred, etc., and who has no intense inclination to non-greed, non-hatred, etc. Therefore, the six inclinations for non-greed, non-hatred, etc., are also the conditions of the perfections.

<sup>388</sup> Ajjhāsaya, mental disposition is an inclination or temperament which influences the formation of one's personality. It is basically of two types: good and bad.

Likewise, the ten inclinations to generosity, morality, etc. (dānajjhāsayā, sīlajjhāsayā), form the conditions of the perfections. The inclination to generosity means constant inclination for generosity through intensity of non-greed by seeing danger in its opposites.

Because of having an intense inclination for non-greed, Bodhisattas see danger in its opposite, selfishness, and therefore fulfil the perfection of generosity; because of having an intense inclination for morality, they see danger in moral depravity and therefore fulfil the perfection of morality. The same consideration applies to all the remaining perfections.

It should be particularly noted here that the opposites of inclination for renunciation are sense pleasures and household life; for wisdom are delusion (moha) and doubt (vicikicchā); for energy is indolence (kosajja); for forbearance is resentment (akkhanti); for truthfulness is speaking lies; for resolution is indeterminateness, not being firm in pursuit of merit; for loving-kindness it is ill-will; for equanimity it is submission to the vicissitudes of the world.

Because of their intense inclination for equanimity, Bodhisattas see dangers in its opposite: submission to the vicissitudes of the world and therefore fulfil the perfection of equanimity. In this way, the ten inclinations, such as those for generosity, morality, etc., also form conditions of the perfections.

5. Reflecting on the Perfections

Reflective knowledge of the disadvantages of not fulfilling the ten perfections, such as generosity, morality, etc., and of the advantages of fulfilling them also form basic conditions for the perfections.

1. Reflecting on the Perfection of Generosity

Personal possessions, such as land, gold, silver, cattle, buffaloes, female slaves, male slaves, children, wives, etc., bring great harm to their owners who become attached to them. Because they are the objects of sense desires, coveted by many people, they can be taken away or destroyed by the five enemies of water, fire, kings, thieves and unloved heirs; they cause quarrels and disputes; they are unsubstantial; their acquisition and protection necessitate harassment of others; their destruction leads to intense suffering such as sorrow, lamentation, etc. Through attachment to them, those who are filled with stinginess (macchhariya) are bound to be reborn in the realms of suffering. Thus, these possessions [64] bring much harm to the possessor in diverse manners. Giving them away, forsaking them, renouncing them, is the only means of escape to happiness.” A Bodhisatta should reflect in this manner and practise mindfulness so as not to be remiss in deeds of generosity.

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2522

A Bodhisatta should also reflect in the following manner whenever a supplicant presents himself for alms: “He is a very intimate friend, confiding all his personal secrets to me. He instructs me well on how to take along with me to the next existences, by this means of generosity (dāna), my possessions which I will have to leave behind otherwise. He is a great friend who assists me in removing, to a safe place, my possessions from this world, which like a blazing house, is raging with the fires of death. He is, to me, like an excellent storehouse where my possessions can be kept safe from burning,” and “He is my best friend, for by enabling me to perform the act of generosity, he helps me achieve the most eminent and difficult of all attainments, the attainment of the ground for becoming a Buddha (Buddha-bhūmi).”

Likewise, he should reflect thus: “This man has favoured me with an opportunity to do a most noble deed, I should therefore seize this opportunity without fail.” “My life will certainly come to an end, I should therefore give, even when not asked, indeed then, I should do all the more so when asked.” “Bodhisattas, who are intensely inclined towards generosity, go about searching for someone to receive their alms, in my case a supplicant has come on his own accord to receive my offering because of my merit.” “Although an act of generosity is shown to recipients, true to its nature, it benefits me only.” “I should benefit all these beings as I benefit myself.” “How could I fulfil the perfection of generosity if there were no one to receive my offering?” “I should acquire and accumulate properties only for those who may ask.” “When would they come and avail themselves of my belongings freely, on their own accord, without asking me?” “In what way could I endear myself to recipients and how could they become friendly with me.” “How will I rejoice while giving and after giving?” “How would recipients come to me and the inclination for giving to them develop in me?” “How would I know their mind and give them what they need without their asking?” “When I have things to offer and supplicants to receive, should I fail to give them, it would be a great deception on my part.” “How would I sacrifice my life and limbs to those who come for them?” He should thus constantly develop a propensity to perform deeds of generosity.

“Just as a hopping insect (kīṭaka)<sup>389</sup> springs back to one who throws it away without any concern, good results come back to one who has performed alms giving generously, without expecting any reward.” Reflecting thus, he should develop the mind which does not wish or expect any fruit out of his act.<sup>390</sup>

When the recipient of alms happens to be a dear person, he should be glad by reflecting: “One, who is dear to me, asks me for something.” If the recipient is a neutral person, he should be glad by reflecting: “By making this offering to him, I will surely gain his friendship.” If the recipient is a hostile person, he should specially rejoice by reflecting: “My enemy asks for something. By this offering to him, he will surely become a dear friend of mine.” Thus, he should make an offering to a neutral person or a foe in the same way as he does to a dear person, with compassion, preceded by loving-kindness.

If the aspirant to becoming a Buddha finds himself so attached to objects of offering that relinquishing is impossible because of greed, which he is imbued with over long stretches of time, he should reflect on himself: “You, good man, aspiring after becoming a Buddha, when you resolved to become a Buddha, in order to assist and support beings, did you not give up this body, as [65] well as the good deeds done by sacrificing it and the fruits thereof. As then you are now attached to external objects; it is like the bathing of an elephant. So you should not remain attached to any object.”

Other animals bathe to wash their bodies. Elephants bathe not to clean themselves, but to crush and destroy lotus shoots and stems. Just as an elephant’s bathing is futile, attachment to external objects will not be fruitful, and will not bring about the benefit of becoming a Buddha.

Suppose there is a medicine tree; those in need of its roots, take away its roots; those in need of its crust, bark, trunk, fork, heartwood, branches, leaves, flowers and fruits take whatever they need. Although thus stripped of its roots, crust, etc., the medicine tree is not disturbed with such a thought as: “They have deprived me of my possessions.”

Likewise, the Bodhisatta should reflect thus: “I, who have worked strenuously for the welfare of beings, should not entertain even one iota of wrong thought in

-serving others by making use of this body which is miserable, ungrateful and unclean. The four great elements, whether internal of the body, or external of the outside world, are all subject to decomposition and dissolution. There is no distinction between internal and external elements. In the absence of such a distinction, attachment to this body, thinking: ‘This is mine, this am I, this is myself,’ is a mere display of activity by delusion (sammoha-vijambhītā). So, without regard for my hands, feet, eyes, flesh and blood, as in the case of external objects, I should be prepared to give up my whole body, thinking: ‘Let those who need any of them take them away.’ ”

When he reflects in this way, with no regard for his life and limbs, relinquishing them for the sake of self-awakening, his deeds, words, and thoughts easily become more and more purified. The Bodhisatta, who is thus purified in physical, verbal and mental actions, comes to possess purity of livelihood, and becomes established in the practice of the true path leading to Nibbāna. He gains accomplishment also in the knowledge of what is detrimental and what is beneficial. As a result, he becomes indeed a person who is capable of rendering more and more services to all beings through gifts of material goods (vatthu-dāna), gifts of harmlessness (abhaya-dāna) and gifts of Dhamma (dhamma-dāna).

2. Reflection on the Perfection of Morality

Morality is the Dhamma water which can wash away mental defilements that cannot be removed by the waters of the Ganges, and other such things. Morality acts as a good medication to eradicate the heat of passion which cannot be assuaged by yellow sandalwood, and other such things. It is the ornament of the wise, having nothing in common with the adornments, such as necklaces, diadems and earrings, of ordinary people.

It is a kind of natural perfume whose fragrance pervades all directions and which is suitable for all occasions. It is an excellent mantra of spell-binding power (vasi-karaṇa-mantam) which commands homage and reverence from high-born humans, such as kings, Brahmins, etc., and of Devas and Brahmas. It is a stairway to the Deva and Brahma realms. It serves as a means of gaining the absorptions (jhāna) and super knowledges (abhiññā), a highway leading to the great city of Nibbāna, the foundation of the three forms of Awakening. As it fulfils all that one wishes, it is superior to the wish-fulfilling gem (cintā-maṇi) and the wish-fulfilling tree (kappa-rukkha).” Thus should one reflect on the attributes of morality.

The commentary recommends the Discourse giving the Simile of the Bonfire (Aggikkhandhopama-sutta, AN 7.72), for reflecting on the faults of not being endowed with morality. The following is a summary of the discourse.

At one time, the Buddha was touring in the country of Kosala accompanied by many [66] monastics. On seeing a blazing fire at one place, he left the highway and sat down on a fourfolded robe, prepared by Venerable Ānanda at the foot of a tree. Then the Buddha addressed the monastics: “Monastics, which would be better, to sit and lie down embracing a raging flame or to sit and lie down embracing a damsel of high birth with a lovely soft body, pleasant to the touch?” The monastics responded, unwisely, that it would be better to sit and lie down, embracing a damsel.

The Buddha explained that for an immoral monastic, it would be better to sit and lie down embracing a raging flame for it would cause suffering for just one existence only, whereas embracing a damsel would lead them to the lower realms of existence over and over again.

He continued to question the monastics: “Would it be better to be tormented by a strong man who roughs up one’s legs with a leather tether until the skin, flesh, muscles and bones are all torn and crushed, than to take delight in the homage paid by the faithful?

Would it be better to have one’s chest pierced by a strong man with a sharp spear than to be paid homage to by the faithful?

Would it be better to have your body enveloped in a red hot iron plate by a strong man than for an immoral monastic to make use of the robe offered by the faithful?

Would it be better to have your mouth opened and held up with a red hot iron prop and to have a burning hot lump of iron thrown into it so that it burns up all the internal organs<sup>391</sup> along its way to the lower orifice of the body than for an immoral monastic to partake of the alms food offered by the faithful?

Would it be better to be seized firmly by the head or shoulders by a strong man and forcibly pushed down to sit or lie down on an iron couch which is burning red hot than for an immoral monastic to make use of the couch or divan offered by the faithful?

Would it better to be held upside down by a strong man and flung into a big pan of boiling iron than for an immoral monastic to dwell in a monastery offered by the faithful?”

To all these six latter questions, the monastics answer unwisely as they did to the first question. The Buddha gives answers similar to that given to the first one: that for an immoral monastic, it would be better to have one’s legs torn and crushed ... to be pierced by a sharp spear, etc., for they would cause suffering for one existence only; whereas to take delight in the homage paid by the faithful, to be paid homage by the faithful, etc., would lead to the suffering realms of intense suffering where they would remain for a long time.

The Buddha ends his discourse with these words: “In order to bring the utmost benefit to the faithful supporters who offer requisites and to make one’s life advantageous in the Saṅgha, a monastic should undergo the three trainings (sikkhā). A monastic wishing for his own welfare as well as that of others must be ever mindful and diligent.”

The trainings (sikkha), which the Buddha’s disciples have to undergo, is of three kinds: training in higher morality (adhisīla-sikkha), higher mentality (adhicitta-sikkha) and higher wisdom (adhipaññā-sikkha). This threefold training forms the threefold division of the noble path of eight constituents: morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā).

By the end of the discourse, 60 immoral monastics vomited hot blood; 60 monastics who had infringed light disciplinary rules left the Saṅgha for the household life; 60 monastics who had led a pure life became Arahats.

One should continue reflecting on the attributes of morality in this manner also: A moral person takes delight in the thought: “I have done a faultless, good deed which protects one from harm.” He is free from danger of self-reproach or reproach by others who are wise. To him there is no possibility of punishment, or [67] of going to the suffering states. He is praised by the wise who say: “This man is moral and of good conduct. Unlike an immoral person, he is absolutely free from remorse.”

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2527

Since morality is the root cause of mindfulness, it brings manifold benefits such as prevention of loss of one's wealth (bhoga-vyāsana), and so on, and since it eradicates demeritoriousness, it is the best source of one's prosperity and well-being.

Even a person of low caste, when endowed with morality, receives homage and respect from persons of high birth such as kings, Brahmins, etc. Thus, accomplishment in morality excels high birth or caste.

The wealth of moral virtues surpasses that of external materials because it cannot be endangered by five enemies. It follows one to the next existence. Its benefit is great and it serves as a foundation for development of concentration and wisdom.

Even those so-called rulers in the world have no control over their own minds. Only those who are moral, have control over their minds (cittissariya).

Therefore morality is superior to the authority of kings, etc. Those who are moral, gain the attribute of supremacy (issariya) in their respective existences.

Morality is superior even to life itself, as the Buddha explains that a single day in the life of a person with morality is far better than 100 years in the life of an immoral person, and that mere living without any moral virtue amounts to death.

Because a moral person is esteemed even by his enemy and because he cannot be vanquished by ageing, sickness and misfortune, his morality transcends his physical beauty. As it is the foundation for the states of happiness of Devas or Nibbāna, it is far superior to the best mansions and palaces or to the highest status and positions of kings, princes or generals.

Morality is better than one's relatives and friends who are solicitous of one's well-being because it truly promotes one's welfare and interests and follows one closely to the next existence.

Morality serves as a special bodyguard protecting this body, which is difficult to be guarded from harm, even by the four divisions of an army or by such devices as drugs, spells and charms.

When one reflects that "morality is full of innumerable qualities," one's imperfect morality will become perfect or one's impure morality will become pure.

Should aversion in his life continuum, antithetical to morality, and having accumulative effect, occur to the aspirant for becoming a Buddha from time to time, he should reflect thus: “Have you not resolved to attain the path-knowledge of an Arahāt (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) and omniscience? If your morality is defective, you cannot progress even in mundane matters, let alone in supermundane ones. The omniscience you aspire to is the highest of all achievements. Since morality is the foundation of omniscience, your morality should be of very high quality. Therefore, you should be a person who regards morality with much affection.”

Or he should reflect thus: “You should teach Dhamma and save beings by three vehicles from such characteristics as impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and non-self (anatta); you should also help immature beings in the five faculties of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom, to reach maturity. Just as the treatment of a doctor, who gives a wrong prescription, is untrustworthy, even so the word of an immoral person is unreliable to many. Therefore, reflecting as a trustworthy person, how could I save them and help them reach maturity in those faculties, I should be pure in morality.”

Furthermore, thinking: “Only when I have special attributes, such as the attainments of the absorptions (jhāna), etc., will I be able to help others and fulfil the perfections, such as wisdom, etc. And such special attributes as attainment of the absorptions, etc., are not possible without pure morality. Therefore, I should be a person of naturally pure morality.” [68] Reflecting thus, the Bodhisatta should earnestly strive to purify his morality.

3. Reflecting on the Perfection of Renunciation

The Bodhisatta should reflect on the disadvantages of a household life which is restricted with duties towards one’s wife and children, and on the advantages of the life of a monastic, which, like space, is free and vast, being exempted from such obligations.

As explained in the Long Discourse on the Mass of Suffering (Mahā-dukkhakkhandha-sutta, MN 13) one should dwell upon the fact that sensual objects are more of worry and lamentation than of enjoyment and so on; upon suffering from contact with heat, cold, gadflies, mosquitoes, flies, wind, sun, reptiles, fleas, insects, etc., while in quest of sense objects, as motivated by sense-desires; upon pain and distress when one’s laborious quest for sense objects ends up fruitless; upon worry and anxiety for their security from the five enemies after they have been acquired; upon great suffering caused by terrible wars waged through desire for sense objects; upon the 32 kinds of severe punishment (kamma-kāraṇa) meted out in this life to those who have committed crimes caused by sense-desires; upon terrible suffering in the life beyond in the four realms of miserable existences.

4. Reflecting on the Perfection of Wisdom

One should reflect on the attributes of wisdom thus: “Without wisdom, such perfections as generosity, morality, etc., cannot become pure; and volition for giving, volition for observing morality, etc., cannot perform their respective functions.”

Without life, this bodily mechanism loses its significance and cannot function properly. Without consciousness, the sense faculties of eye, ear, etc., cannot perform their respective functions of seeing, hearing, etc. Similarly, the faculties of faith, energy, etc., cannot do their respective duties effectively in the absence of wisdom. Therefore, wisdom is the main and chief cause for the fulfilment of the perfections, such as generosity, morality, etc. How does wisdom help with the fulfilment of the other perfections?

1. Because they keep their eyes of wisdom always open, Bodhisattas, when giving away their limbs and organs, do so without extolling themselves or disparaging others. Like the great medicine-tree, they give without developing wrong thoughts, and are always filled with joy in the past, present and future. Only when endowed with wisdom does one become equipped with the knowledge of skill in ways and means (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa) and give for the benefit to others; and only such an act of generosity is a genuine perfection.

Without wisdom, one is likely to give with the motivation of self-interest; such an act of generosity for one's own benefit is like earning interest for oneself from an investment.

2. Morality without wisdom but overwhelmed by greed, ill-will, etc., cannot achieve purity, much less serve as a foundation of omniscience.
3. Only a person of wisdom discerns faults in the household state and benefits of an ascetic life, faults in sensuous pleasures and benefits of attaining the absorptions (jhāna), faults in Saṃsāra and benefits of Nibbāna. Discerning thus, he goes forth into homelessness, develops the absorptions (jhāna) and realizes Nibbāna for himself. He can then help others to go forth and get established in the absorptions and Nibbāna.

4. Energy without wisdom is wrong striving; it does not serve the purpose desired.<sup>392</sup> When accompanied by wisdom, it becomes right endeavour and achieves the required object.
5. Only a person of wisdom can bear with patience wrongs done by others; for one devoid of wisdom, offensive actions by others incite in him unwholesome states, such as ill-will, etc., which go against forbearance. For the wise, such wrongs help [69] him develop patience and strengthen it.
6. Only a person of wisdom comprehends the three truths as they really are, i.e., truth of abstinence (virati-sacca), truth of speech (vacī-sacca), truth of knowledge (ñāṇa-sacca); their causes and opposites. Having understood them perfectly by abandoning what should be abandoned and cultivating what should be cultivated, he could help others keep to the path of truth.
7. Having fortified himself with the power of wisdom, a wise person becomes accomplished in concentration. With concentrated mind, unshakable determination to fulfil all the perfections is possible.
8. Only a man of wisdom can direct his thoughts of loving-kindness towards the three types of person without discriminating them as dear ones, neutrals or enemies.
9. And only by means of wisdom can one remain indifferent to the vicissitudes of life whether good or bad without being affected by them.

In this way, one should reflect on the attributes of wisdom, realizing it to be the cause for the purification of the perfections. Or, the Bodhisatta should admonish himself thus: “Without wisdom, there can be no perfect and pure view; without perfect and pure view, there can be no perfect and pure morality; without perfect and pure morality, there can be no perfect and pure concentration. Without concentration one cannot work for one’s own benefit, much less others’.

<sup>392</sup> It is better not to strive at all than to make wrong application of energy.

Therefore, practising as you are for the welfare of others, should you not make an earnest effort to develop your wisdom?”

It is by the power of wisdom that the Bodhisatta becomes established in the four foundations (catu-adhiṭṭhāna): the foundation of wisdom (paññā); of truth (sacca); of generosity (dāna) and of tranquillity (upasama); and benefits all beings with four objects of support (catu-saṅgaha-vatthu): generosity (dāna), kindly speech (peyya-vajja), a life of usefulness (attha-cariyā), and impartiality (samānattatā), which helps them remain on the path of liberation and brings their five faculties of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom to maturity.

Likewise, by the power of wisdom, he engages in the investigation of absolute realities, such as the aggregates (khandha), sense spheres (āyatana) etc., and comes to understand correctly the processes of Saṃsāra and its cessation. He endeavours to bring his meritorious deeds, such as the perfection of generosity, morality, etc., to the most beneficial stage of development and to enjoy the profits of the paths and fruitions. Thus, he works to complete and perfect the training of Bodhisattas.

Comprehending the various virtues of wisdom in this manner, he should repeatedly develop the perfection of wisdom.

5. Reflecting on the Perfection of Energy

Even in worldly pursuits, the end of which is foreseeable, one cannot achieve the desired goal without the necessary energy. There is nothing which a man with indefatigable energy cannot achieve. One should reflect: “One lacking energy cannot begin the task of rescuing beings from the whirlpool of Saṃsāra. One with moderate energy will undertake the task, only to give it up half-way without pursuing it to the end. It is only the person with a superior kind of energy who will see it through to the completion of the task, without regard for one’s own personal well-being, and realise the goal of omniscience.”

Again, without sufficient energy, even aspirants for the Awakening of a disciple (sāvaka-bodhi) or the Awakening of an Independent Buddha (Pacceka-bodhi)<sup>393</sup> who are intent on liberating themselves from Saṃsāra, cannot [70] achieve their desired goal of Awakening. How can one aspiring after Perfect Self-Awakening rescue the entire world of beings with Devas and Brahmas without sufficient exertion?

A host of defilements, such as greed, hatred, etc., are as hard to restrain as elephants in must. One's productive deeds (kamma) that happen due to these defilements are like executioners holding high their swords and threatening to put one to death. The four suffering states caused by these deeds have their doors constantly open. Evil friends are always around to instigate one to commit these deeds and thus despatch one to these states of woe. The nature of a foolish worldling is such that he easily succumbs to the ill advice of evil friends. One should therefore keep oneself away from those evil friends who are sophists, who put forward their wrong, irrational arguments, saying: "If emancipation from Saṃsāra were a reality, it would be achieved automatically without any need to strive for it." Dissociation from such wrong views is possible only through the power of energy; or, "If becoming a Buddha is attainable through personal effort, what difficulty can there be for a superior person like me to put forth the required energy?" In this manner the attributes of energy should be reflected upon.

6. Reflecting on the Perfection of Forbearance

Forbearance should be cultivated repeatedly by reflecting thus: "Forbearance dispels anger which is opposed to all wholesome attributes and serves as the indestructible weapon of good people in the acquisition of such attributes. It is the adornment of Bodhisattas who can dominate others; the strength of ascetics (samaṇa) and Brahmins; a stream of water that extinguishes the fire of anger; a magic charm for neutralizing the poison of the rude, abusive words of evil persons; it is the natural disposition of those established in the faculties of restraint and of those supremely wise ones."

"Forbearance is a faculty, deep like an ocean; the shore where the waves of the ocean terminate; the door that closes the way to the realms of misery; the stairway that ascends to the realms of Devas and Brahmas, the sanctum where all wholesome attributes reign; the supreme purity of body, speech and mind." Thus one should reflect on the virtues of forbearance.

Again, forbearance should be cultivated repeatedly by reflecting thus: "Without holding on to forbearance, which gives calm and peace, these beings pursue demeritorious deeds which afflict them. In consequence, they are subjected to affliction in this life as well as in the life to come.”

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2533

“Although it is true that I suffer through the wrongs of others, this body of mine, which serves as a field, and the action, which serve as seeds of that suffering, have been done by none other than myself.”

“This forbearance of mine is the means of settling the debt of suffering.”

“If there were no wrong doer, how could I fulfil the perfection of forbearance?”

“Although this person has wronged me now, he had brought certain benefits to me in the past.”

“His wrong deed forms a cause for my practice of forbearance, and it therefore proves beneficial to me.”

“All these beings are like my own children, how could a wise man become angry about the misdeeds of his own children?”

“He has wronged me as he is seized by the demon of wrath; I should exorcise this demon that has seized him.”

“I am also the cause of the wrong deed which gives rise to this suffering, for if I were not in existence, there could be no wrong-doing.”

“The mental and physical phenomena (nāma-rūpa) which did the wrong deed, and the mental and physical phenomena to which the wrong deed was done, both sets of such phenomena, at this very moment, have ceased. Who should [71] then be angry with whom? There should be no arising of anger.”

“When all phenomena are non-self, in the absolute sense, there could be no wrong doer and no one to whom any wrong is done.” Reflecting in this manner, he should repeatedly develop forbearance.

Should the anger that arises from wrongs done by others continue to overpower one’s mind through the force of habit, which is gained through a long time, the aspirant for becoming a Buddha should reflect thus: “Forbearance is complementary to practices which oppose the wrongs of others.”

“Wongs of others, by causing my suffering, become a factor of arising in me of faith, since suffering is the cause of faith, and also a factor in the perception of unhappiness and dissatisfaction with the world (anabhirati-saññā).”

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2534

“It is the nature of sense faculties, such as eyes, ears, etc., to encounter various objects, good and bad; it is not possible to avoid coming across undesirable sense objects.”

“Following the dictates of anger, a person is distraught and mad with fury. What is the use of retaliating against the wrongs of such a person?”

“An omniscient Buddha looks after all these beings as if they were his own dear children. Therefore, aspiring after omniscience by becoming a Buddha, I should not despair because of them or be angry with them.”

“Should the wrong-doer be one endowed with noble attributes such as morality, one should reflect, ‘I should not show anger to such a virtuous one.’ ”

“Should the wrong-doer be one without any noble attributes such as morality, one should reflect: ‘He is a person I should regard with great compassion.’ ”

“By getting angry, my virtues and fame will diminish.”

“Becoming angry with him, I shall look ugly, sleep in discomfort, lose wealth, lose subordinates, lose friends and be reborn in a woeful state, to the delight of my enemies.”

“This anger is a powerful enemy which brings all harm and destroys all prosperity.”

“When one has forbearance, one can have no enemies.”

“Thinking that with forbearance, I will meet with no suffering which will befall the wrong-doer; or, by retaliating against him with anger, I shall only be following in the footsteps of my foes.”

“Should I overcome anger through forbearance, I would be completely vanquishing also the foe who is a slave of anger.”

“It is not proper for me to relinquish the noble quality of forbearance because of anger.”

“How could I be endowed with noble qualities, such as morality, etc., when anger, the opposite of all good qualities, is arising in me? And, in the absence of such noble qualities, how could I render help to beings and achieve the avowed goal of becoming an omniscient Buddha.”

“Only with forbearance, one can remain undistracted by external objects and have concentration of mind; and only with concentration of mind can one discern all conditioned formations (saṅkhāra) to be impermanent and unsatisfactory, and all phenomena to be non-self; and Nibbāna, to be unconditioned, deathless, etc., and the attributes of a Buddha to be of inconceivable, immeasurable powers.”

Because of such discernment, one becomes established in insight (vipassanā) through which it is realized that: “All these phenomena are natural phenomena, devoid of self or anything pertaining to self. They arise and pass away in accordance with their [72] individual conditions. They came from nowhere and they go nowhere. They are not permanently established as an entity anywhere. There is no operating agency in this group of natural phenomena as there is no such thing as individuality in the first place.” Realizing what they really are, one could comprehend that they are not the abode of the I-conceit. With such reflection, Bodhisattas stand firmly and irreversibly in their destiny, and are bound to attain omniscience.

7. Reflecting on the Perfection of Truthfulness

The perfection of truthfulness should be reflected on thus: “Without truthfulness, attributes, such as morality, etc., are impossible and there can be no performance of the vow of becoming a Buddha.”

“When truthfulness is transgressed, all kinds of evil come together.”

“One, who does not speak truth constantly, is regarded as untrustworthy in this very life. In every future existence too, his word will not be accepted by others.”

“Only with truthfulness, can one develop attributes such as morality, renunciation, etc.”

“Only with truthfulness as a foundation, can one purify and fulfil noble qualities such as the perfections, charity and good conduct. Therefore, by being truthful with regard to phenomena, one can perform the functions of the perfections, charity and good conduct and become accomplished in the practice of Bodhisattas.”

8. Reflecting on the Perfection of Resolution

He should reflect thus: “In the absence of a firm resolution in doing good deeds, such as the perfection of generosity, morality, etc., and on encountering of their opposites, such as miserliness (macchāriya), immorality (dussīlya), etc., one could not maintain steadfastness in performing such good deeds; and without steadfastness, one could not practise them with skill and valour. And without skill and valour, the perfection of generosity, morality, etc., which form the requisites for omniscience, could not be accomplished.”

“Only when resolution in doing good deeds, such as the perfection of generosity, morality, etc., is firm, can one maintain steadfastness in encountering their opposites such as miserliness, immorality, etc. Only when such steadfastness is maintained, can one gain skill and valour in performing such good deeds. Then only the perfections of generosity, morality, etc., which form the requisites of omniscience, could be accomplished.” In this manner, the attributes of resolution should be reflected upon.

9. Reflecting on the Perfection of Loving-Kindness

“Even one occupied entirely with one’s personal welfare, like a selfish person, could not gain prosperity in this or a future life without promoting loving-kindness for the well-being of others. How much more should a Bodhisatta, wishing to establish all beings in the bliss of Nibbāna, develop it? Only by fostering infinite loving-kindness for them, can a Bodhisatta establish all beings in Nibbāna.”

“Wishing to help all beings achieve the supermundane bliss of Nibbāna when I become a Buddha, I should begin right now, wishing them, in advance, mundane prosperity.”

“If I could not perform now the mere mental act of wishing for their welfare, when would I accomplish the verbal and physical deeds of helping them achieve their welfare?”

“These beings, whom I nurture now with loving-kindness, would, in future, become heirs and companions, in the future occasion, of sharing my Dhamma [73] inheritance.”

“Without these beings, there could be no requisites for my perfections. Therefore, they form complementary conditions for fulfilment and accomplishment of all the attributes of a Buddha. They serve as a highly fertile field for sowing the seeds of merit, the best location for the performing of meritorious deeds, the unique site to be revered.”

In this manner, one should especially cultivate goodwill towards all beings. The attributes of loving-kindness should also be reflected on this way: “Compassion is the first and foremost of all fundamental practices which lead to becoming a Buddha. For the Bodhisatta, who delights in providing welfare and happiness of all beings without discrimination, loving-kindness; and the desire to remove their suffering and misfortune, compassion, becomes firmly rooted and powerful.” Thus loving-kindness which forms the foundation of compassion should be developed towards all beings.

10. Reflecting on the Perfection of Equanimity

“In the absence of equanimity, abuses and wrongs done by others may cause disturbances in my mind. With a disturbed mind, there is no possibility even of doing good deeds such as generosity, morality, etc., which are the requisites for becoming a Buddha.”

“When loving-kindness is cultivated towards beings as mere affection, unaccompanied by equanimity, purification of the requisites of the perfections is not possible.”

“Having no equanimity, one cannot channel the requisites of meritorious deeds and their results towards the promotion of the welfare of all beings.”

“A Bodhisatta makes no discrimination of gifts and of their recipients. It is impossible to do so without equanimity.”

“When not endowed with equanimity, one cannot attend to purification of morality without taking consideration of the dangers that may befall one’s life and life-accessories (jīvita-parikkhāra).”

“Only one who has overcome, by virtue of equanimity, the dislike of good deeds and delight in sensual pleasures can acquire the power of renunciation.”

“All functions of the requisites for the perfections can be accomplished only by examining them rightly with intelligent equanimity (ñāṇupekkhā).”

“In the absence of equanimity, excess of energy makes engagement in meditation impossible.”

“Only with equanimity it is possible for one to concentrate on forbearance.”

“Only because of equanimity can beings possess truthfulness.”

“By remaining indifferent to the vicissitudes of life one’s resolution to fulfil the perfections becomes firm and unshakeable.”

“Only with equanimity can one disregard others’ wrong; only such disregard promotes abiding in loving-kindness.”

Building up the requisites of all the perfections in this manner, remaining unshakeable in determination, fulfilling and accomplishing them, all these become possible only by virtue of equanimity. Thus should the perfection of equanimity be reflected on.

Thus, reflections (paccavekkaṇa-ñāṇa) on the disadvantages of not doing meritorious deeds, such as alms giving, etc., and on the advantages accruing from such deeds of merit form the basis of the perfections. [74]

Good Conduct and the Super Knowledges

Like the reflections stated above, fifteen kinds of good conduct and the fivefold super knowledges, together with their components, also form the basis of the perfections. The fifteen kinds of good conduct are:

1. Observance of the precepts (sīla-saṃvara).
2. Closely guarding with mindfulness the six doors of the sense faculties: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind, so that no plunder by bandits in the form of evil deeds could take place (indriyesu gutta-dvaratā).
3. Being moderate in eating (bhojana-mattaññutā).
4. Out of the six divisions of a day: morning, midday, evening, first watch, second watch and last watch of the night, sleeping only in the second watch, and engaging in meditation only in the two postures of sitting and walking during the remaining five periods (jāgariyānuyoga).
- 5-11. The seven virtues of the good: faith, mindfulness, conscience about doing evil, concern about doing evil, learning, energy and wisdom.
- 12-15. The four absorptions (jhāna).

Of these fifteen kinds of conduct (caraṇa), the components of the first four are the thirteen ascetic practices (dhutaṅga), and such qualities as having few wants, being easily contented, and etc.

The thirteen ascetic practices (dhutaṅga) are enumerated in the Exposition of the Ascetic Practices (Dhutaṅga-niddesa, Vism 2), which forms chapter II of The Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga): 1) wearing patched-up robes (paṃsukūlikaṅga); 2) wearing only three robes (tecīvarikaṅga); 3) going for alms (piṇḍapātikaṅga); 4) not omitting any house whilst going for alms (sapadānikaṅga); 5) eating at one sitting (ekāsanikaṅga); 6) eating only from the alms bowl (pattapiṇḍikaṅga); 7) refusing all other food (khalupacchā-bhattikaṅga); 8) living in the forest (āraññikaṅga); 9) living under a tree (rukka-mūlikaṅga); 10) living in the open air (abbhokāsikaṅga); 11) living in a cemetery (susānikaṅga); 12) being satisfied with whatever dwelling (yathā-santhatikaṅga); 13) sleeping in sitting position and never lying down (nesajjikaṅga).

1. The Components of Faith

Of the seven virtues of the Good Dhamma:

1. Recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati).
2. Recollection of the Dhamma (Dhammānussati).
3. Recollection of the Saṅgha (Saṅghānussati).
4. Recollection of one's morality (sīlānussati).
5. Recollection of charity (cāgānussati).
6. Recollection of one's faith, morality, learning, charity and wisdom, with Devas as witnesses (devatānussati).
7. Recollection of the attributes of Nibbāna (upasamānussati).
8. Avoidance of people who have barren, dry faith (lūka-puggala-parivajjana).
9. Association with amiable people with faith (siniddha-puggala).
10. Reflection on phenomena which inspire devotional faith (pasādanīya-dhamma-paccavekkaṇa).
11. Inclination to generate faith in all postures (tad-adhimuttatā).

2. The Components of Mindfulness

1. Mindfulness and clear comprehension in the seven movements, such as moving forward, moving backward, etc. [75]
2. Avoidance of careless and negligent people.
3. Association with mindful people.
4. Inclination to generate mindfulness in all postures.

3. The Components of Conscience and Concern

1. Reflection on the dangers of demerit.
2. Reflection on the dangers of the realms of misery.
3. Reflection on the supporting character of merit.
4. Avoidance of people who are devoid of conscience and concern about doing evil.
5. Association with people who are endowed with conscience and concern about doing evil.
6. An inclination for developing conscience and concern about doing evil.

4. The Components of Learning

1. Previous efforts made for learning.
2. Being a constant enquirer.
3. Association with and practice of the Good Dhamma.
4. Pursuit of blameless knowledge.
5. Maturity of faculties, such as faith, energy, etc.
6. Keeping away from the defilements.
7. Avoidance of the ignorant.
8. Association with the learned.
9. Inclination for extending knowledge in all postures.

5. The Components of Energy

1. Reflection on the dangers of the realms of misery.
2. Reflection on the benefits of strenuous effort.
3. Reflection on the desirability of following the path trod by the virtuous, such as the Buddha, Paccekabuddhas, etc.
4. Honouring alms food by devoting oneself to the practice of Dhamma.
5. Reflection on the noble heritage of the Good Dhamma.
6. Reflection on the supremacy of the teacher who is a Buddha.

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2541

7. Reflection on one's eminent lineage as a descendent of a Buddha.
8. Reflection on the nobility of companions in the Dhamma.
9. Avoidance of the indolent.
10. Association with the industrious.
11. Inclination for developing energy in all postures.

6. The Components of Wisdom

1. Making repeated enquiries about the aggregates (khandha), the bases (āyatana), the elements (dhātu), etc.
2. Purity of objects both inside and outside the body.
3. Keeping in perfect balance the two pairs of faith and wisdom on the one hand, and energy and concentration on the other.

This is in accordance with the Ven. U Buddh's saying in his Assistance with Steadfast Mindfulness (Mahā-satipaṭṭhāna-nissaya): [76] "Excess of faith leads to over enthusiasm, excess of wisdom leads to craftiness, excess of energy leads to restlessness, excess of concentration leads to ennui or mental weariness, but there is never an excess of mindfulness."

4. Avoidance of the foolish.
5. Association with the wise.
6. Reflection on the diversity of profound knowledge related to subtle subjects, such as the aggregates, the bases, etc.
7. Inclination for developing wisdom in all postures.

7. The Components of the Four Absorptions

1. The first four components of conduct (caraṇa-dhamma) beginning with the observance of precepts.
2. The beginning portion of tranquillity (samatha) meditation.
3. The fivefold mastery<sup>394</sup> (vasi-bhava).

Through these kinds of good conduct and super knowledges, it is possible to achieve purity in application (payoga-suddhi) and purity of disposition (āsaya-suddhi). Through purity in application, one can make the gift of harmlessness (abhaya-dāna) to beings and through purity of disposition, one can make the gift of material objects (āmisa-dāna); and through the purity of both, the gift of Dhamma (Dhamma-dāna) becomes possible.

In this way it may be understood how the kinds of good conduct (carāṇa) and the super knowledges (abhiññā) form the requisites of the perfections.

7. What Are the Factors That Defile the Perfections?

To the question: “What are the factors that defile the perfections?” The answer in general is: Regarding the perfections as “I,” “mine,” “myself” through craving, conceit and wrong view is the cause of the defilement of the perfections.

The precise answer, however, in each particular case is as follows:

1. Thinking to discriminate between gifts and between their recipients causes a defilement of the perfection of generosity.

The Bodhisatta, who is fulfilling the perfection of generosity, should give without discrimination whatever gifts he has in hand to whoever has come to seek. He should not think about the quality of the gift: “This is too bad to offer, or this is too good to donate,” nor should he think about the recipient: “This man is an immoral person, I cannot give it to him.” Such discriminating thoughts make the perfection of generosity impure.

2. Thinking to discriminate between beings and between occasions causes defilement of the perfection of morality.

The perfection of morality should be fulfilled regardless of beings and occasion, thinking: “I shall refrain from killing only such and such creatures, but I shall not refrain from killing others. I shall observe precepts only on such and such an occasion but not on other occasions.” Thinking discriminately thus will make the perfection of morality impure.

3. Thinking that the two kinds of sensuality, and the three realms of existence to be pleasant, and thinking that the cessation of sensuality and existence to be unpleasant are the causes of the defilement of the perfection of renunciation.

4. The wrong thought of “I” and “mine” is the cause of the defilement of the perfection of wisdom.
5. Sluggish thoughts, which encourage sloth and torpor and restlessness, are the cause [77] of defilements of the perfection of energy.
6. Thoughts discriminating between oneself and others such as “my men” and “their men” are the cause of the defilement of the perfection of forbearance.
7. Avowing to have seen, heard, touched and known what was not seen, heard, touched and known; and avowing not to have seen, heard, touched and known what was seen, heard, touched and known are the causes of defilements of the perfection of truthfulness.
8. Thinking that the requisites of Awakening, the perfections (pāramī), charity (cāga), and good conduct (cariyā) are disadvantageous and that their opposites are advantageous are the causes of defilements of the perfection of resolution.
9. Thinking as to who is one’s benefactor and who is not, who is friendly or who is not, is the cause of the defilements of the perfection of loving-kindness.
10. Discriminating between desirable sense objects and undesirable ones that are encountered is the cause of the defilement of the perfections of equanimity.

8. What are the Factors that Purify the Perfections?

To the question: “What are the factors that purify the perfections?” the answer is: Not being destroyed or spoilt by craving, conceit and wrong view, and, as has been stated above, not having thoughts of discrimination between gifts and between recipients are the cause of the purification of the perfections.

True, the perfections are pure only when they are not tainted by defilements, such as craving, conceit, wrong view, etc., and are devoid of discriminating thoughts of the quality of gifts and recipients.

9. What are the Factors that Oppose the Perfections?

To the question: “What are the factors that oppose the perfections?” the answer is: When considered in general, all the defiling factors and all the demeritorious factors are the opposites of the perfections. When considered in detail:

1. Craving for the object to be offered and stinginess are the opposite of the perfection of wisdom (paññā-pāramī).
2. Wrong doings, physical, verbal and mental, are the opposite of the perfection of morality (sīla-pāramī).
3. Taking delight in sense objects, sense pleasures and existence is the opposite of the perfection of renunciation (nekkhamma-pāramī).
4. Extreme delusion is the opposite of the perfection of wisdom (paññā-pāramī).
5. The eight occasions of indolence (kusīta-vatthu), which were enumerated above, are the opposites of the perfection of energy (viriyā-pāramī).
6. Intolerance, through greed or dislike, of desirable and undesirable objects, is the opposite of the perfection of forbearance (khanti-pāramī).
7. Not bringing out the real nature as it truly exists is the opposite of the perfection of truth (sacca-pāramī).
8. The inability to overcome the phenomena which are opposed to the perfections, not practising them successfully, is the opposite of the perfection of resolution (adhiṭṭhāna-pāramī).
9. The nine forms of developing hatred are the opposite of the perfection of loving-kindness (mettā-pāramī).
10. Not viewing with feelings of neutrality when encountering desirable or undesirable objects is the opposite of equanimity (upekkhā-pāramī).

Further details:

1. Craving for the objects to be given away (lobha), aversion to the recipients (dosa) and being deluded over generosity and its beneficial results (moha) are opposed to the perfection of generosity because only in the absence of such craving, aversion and delusion is an act of generosity accomplished.

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2545

2. The ten wrongdoings are opposed to the perfection of morality because observance of precepts is accomplished only when one is free from the evils of wrong thought, word and deed.
3. Renunciation is the noble act of abstinence from sense pleasures, ill treatment of others and self-mortification; therefore indulgence in sense pleasures (lobha), ill-treatment of others (dosa) and self-mortification (moha) are opposed to the [78] perfection of renunciation.
4. Craving, aversion and delusion make beings blind, whereas wisdom restores the sight of beings blinded by them. Therefore, these three unwholesome factors, which cause blindness in beings, are opposed to the perfection of wisdom.
5. Through craving, one flinches from doing meritorious deeds; through aversion, one cannot be established in good deeds; and through delusion, one cannot strive in a right way. It is only by means of energy, one performs meritorious deeds without flinching, becomes established in them and proceeds in a right manner. Therefore, these three unwholesome factors are opposed to the perfection of energy.
6. Only with forbearance can one resist the inclination towards craving for desirable objects, or towards ill-will for undesirable objects, and can perceive the non-personality and voidness of natural phenomena. Thus, craving, aversion, and delusion, which cannot perceive the empty nature of phenomena, are opposed to the perfection of forbearance.
7. Without truthfulness, one is likely to be biased by craving because of services rendered by others, or by aversion, because of harm done by them. Hence truth cannot prevail under such circumstances. Only with truthfulness can one, in the face of favouritism or antagonism, be free from bias caused by craving, or by aversion, ill-will or delusion that deter the prevalence of truth. Thus, these three unwholesome factors are opposed to the perfection of truthfulness.
8. With resolution, one can overcome the pleasant and unpleasant vicissitudes of life and remain unshakeable in fulfilling the perfections.

Therefore, craving, aversion and delusion, which cannot vanquish the vicissitudes of life, are opposed to the perfection of resolution.

9. Development of loving-kindness can ward off the obstacles in the path of spiritual progress; therefore these three unwholesome factors, constituents of the obstacles, are opposed to the perfection of loving-kindness.
10. Without equanimity, craving for desirable objects and aversion to undesirable objects cannot be stopped and destroyed; nor can one view them with a balanced mind. Only when endowed with equanimity can one do so. Therefore, these three unwholesome factors are opposed to the perfection of equanimity.

Obstacles in the path of spiritual progress : 1) All forms of craving and desire (kāmacchanda); 2) ill-will (vyāpāda) 3) sloth and torpor (thīnamidda); 4) distraction and worry (uddhacca-kukkucca), and 5) doubt or wavering of mind (vicikiccha).

10. What is the Method for Practising the Perfections?

To the question: “How are the perfections fulfilled? How do the Bodhisattas practise the perfections?” the answer is:

1. How the Perfection of Generosity is Fulfilled

A Bodhisatta fulfils the perfection of generosity by serving the interest of beings in several ways, such as attending to their welfare, giving up his own life and limbs, warding off the danger that would befall them, instructing them in the Dhamma, etc.

The answer in detail is that generosity is of three kinds: the gift of material objects (āmisa-dāna); the gift of fearlessness (abhaya-dāna) and the gift of Dhamma (Dhamma-dāna).

The Gift of Material Objects

The gift of material objects (āmisa-dāna): Of these three kinds, the gift of material objects to be given by the Bodhisatta can be twofold, the gift of internal objects and the gift of external objects.

External objects for offering, according to the discourse method of enumeration, consists of ten kinds: food, drinks, garments, vehicles, flowers, unguents, bedding, dwelling places and lighting materials. These offerings become manifold when each of them is divided into various things, such as hard food, soft food, etc., in the case of food. [79]

Likewise, according to the Abhidhamma method of enumeration, offerings are of six kinds, when analysed by way of six sense objects, e.g. gifts of colour, gifts of sounds, etc. These sense objects become manifold, for example, the gift of colour alone may be the gift of blue, the gift of yellow, etc.

Likewise, there are inanimate things, such as rubies, gold, silver, pearls, coral, etc; or paddy fields, other arable plots of land, parks, gardens, etc; and there are also animate ones, such as female slaves, male slaves, cattle, etc. Thus things to be given are plentiful.

How a Gift of External Objects is Made

When a Bodhisatta makes a gift of external objects, he offers whatever is necessary to the needy. When he knows, by himself, that someone is in need of something, he gives it away when not asked, even more so when asked. When giving gifts, he does so freely, with no conditions.

When there are sufficient objects to offer, he gives them to each recipient sufficiently. But when there are not enough to give, he divides them into equal portions and gives them.

There is a special point to note. In making gifts, he does not give things which would cause harm to others, such as arms, poisons and intoxicants; nor does he make gifts of playthings, which are not beneficial but would cause negligence and playfulness.

To a sick recipient, he does not offer unsuitable food or drink. He offers him only what is suitable and in proper quantity and measure.

Likewise, when asked, he gives to householders what is good for householders and to monastics what is appropriate to them.<sup>395</sup> And he makes his offerings without causing trouble to those close to him such as his mother, father, kinsmen and relatives, friends and colleagues, children, wife, slaves, and workers.

<sup>395</sup> He does not give householders things that are acceptable to monastics or vice versa.

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2548

Having promised an excellent gift, he does not give something inferior. He does not give, expecting gain, honour, fame or reward, nor does he give anticipating benefits, such as a good existence, wealth or prosperity, other than omniscience. He makes his offerings with the one and only wish, which is for omniscience.

He does not make his offerings, detesting the recipients or the gift materials. Even to the recipients, who, without restraining themselves, abuse and revile him, he does not give in an irreverential manner as if he is discarding refuse and with annoyance. He always gives with reverence, a serene mind and full of compassion. His generosity is totally free of the belief that noisy acclamation is auspicious, but it is associated with the staunch faith in the law of deeds and their results.

He makes his offerings without subjecting the recipients to the trouble of showing respect and humbleness to him. Without any wish to deceive or to cause disunity, he gives only with a mind of great purity. He does not use harsh, abusive words, nor does he give with sullenness; he gives only with sweet words of endearment, a smile on his face and a serene, calm disposition.

Whenever attachment to or craving for a particular object appears excessively in him because of its superior quality, or because of long personal use, or because it is the nature of greed to crave, and to hanker after objects of value and excellence, the Bodhisatta is aware of this greed and he quickly dispels it by seeking a recipient for it.

Suppose he is about to partake of a meal, which is just enough for one, and someone presents himself and asks for it. Under such circumstances, a Bodhisatta does not think twice to forego his meal and offer it right away to the recipient respectfully, just as the Bodhisatta Akitti the wise had done. [80]

The Bodhisatta, in one of his births, was a Brahmin magnate of Bārāṇasī named Akitti (Ja 480), who gave away all his wealth and retired to a forest. There he continued to distribute his newly acquired possessions to others even when he had nothing to eat but rough leaves.

When asked for his own children, wife, slaves, etc., he first explained to them his proposed act of giving. Only when they become satisfied and happy does he give them away to those who are happy to assist him in his fulfilment of the perfections. But, he does not make such an offering if he knows that those who ask for them are non-humans, such as Yakkhas and Rakkhasas, etc.

Likewise, he will not give up his kingdom to those who will bring harm or suffering to the people and who will work against their interest, but only to those who would protect them in a righteous manner.

How a Gift of Internal Objects is Made

A Bodhisatta makes his offering of internal objects in two ways:

1. Just as a person, for the sake of food and clothing, gives himself to another in servitude and serves as a slave, even so the Bodhisatta gives away his whole body, placing himself at the service of others, not at all desiring the pleasures of the senses or a good existence, but wishing only for the supreme welfare and happiness of beings and to bring to the highest stage his fulfilment of the perfection of generosity by giving, e.g. the gift of his whole body.
2. He gives, without hesitation or wavering, his limbs and organs such as the hands, the feet, the eyes, etc., to anybody who is in need of them. As in the case of external objects, he has no attachment to, or craving for, these various limbs and organs of his, nor has he one iota of reluctance in giving the gift of his limbs and organs.

Two Objectives of Giving

In sacrificing his limbs and organs or the whole body, the Bodhisatta has two objectives: to fulfil the wish of the recipient and let him enjoy whatever he needs and to gain mastery over the performance of meritorious deeds of the perfections by giving generously without the slightest attachment to the objects offered. The Bodhisatta gives the internal objects of his whole body or any parts thereof, big or small, just as he dispenses offerings of external possessions in generosity, believing: “I will certainly attain omniscience through such generosity.”

In these acts of offering, he gives only what would be truly beneficial to the recipient. In particular, he does not knowingly give his own body or its parts to Māra, or his company of deities, who wish to cause injury to him, thinking: “Lest this should prove fruitless to them.” Likewise, he does not give his body or its parts to those possessed by Māra or his associates, or to the insane. But to all others who ask for them, he makes an immediate offer because of the rarity of such a request or opportunity to make such a gift.

The Gift of Fearlessness

The Bodhisatta makes the gift of fearlessness (abhaya-dāna) by giving protection to beings and saving them, even at the sacrifice of his own life, when they are subjected to harm and danger by kings, thieves, fire, water, enemies, wild beasts, such as lions and tigers, and Nāgas, Yakkhas, Rakkhasas, etc.

The Gift of Dhamma

The gift of the Dhamma (Dhamma-dāna) means unequivocal teaching of the truth with a pure mind completely free from the defilements of greed, hatred, etc. To future disciples of a Buddha who have a strong, wholesome desire to realize the Awakening of a disciple (sāvaka-bodhi), the Bodhisatta gives discourses on taking refuge in the Three Treasures, morality, guarding the doors of the sense faculties, moderation in eating, practice of wakefulness, the seven good things, practising concentration and insight meditation, the seven kinds of purification, the knowledge of the four paths (magga-ñāṇa), the three kinds of understanding (tevijja), the six super knowledges (abhiññā), the four analytical knowledges (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa) and the Awakening of a disciple (sāvaka-bodhi).

He gives the gift of Dhamma by elaborating on the attributes of the above mentioned topics, establishing in the Three Treasures, precepts, etc., those who have not yet been so [81] established, and helping those who have already been established purify their practices.

Likewise, to beings who aspire to become Paccekabuddhas and Sammāsambuddhas, the Bodhisatta gives the gift of Dhamma by explaining clearly the characteristics, functions, etc., of the ten perfections; by elaborating upon the glory of Bodhisattas throughout the three stages of their existence, viz., at the moment of the fulfilment of the perfections, of becoming a Buddha and of the fulfilment of the duties of a Buddha; by establishing them in the practices for attainment of Independent Awakening (Pacceka-bodhi) or Perfect Self-Awakening (Sammā-sambodhi); and by purifying the practices of those who are already established in them.

The Discourse Classification of Giving

When a Bodhisatta gives material gifts, he makes an offering of alms food with the wish: “Through this material gift, may I help beings achieve long life, beauty, happiness, strength, intelligence, and attain the supreme fruit of Awakening.”

Similarly, he makes an offering of a drink to assuage the thirst for sensual defilements of beings.

He makes an offering of garments to gain a golden complexion and the adornment of conscience and concern (hiri-ottappa); of vehicles to become accomplished in various psychic powers and to gain the bliss of Nibbāna; of perfumes to produce the sweet fragrance of incomparable morality; of flowers and unguents to be endowed with the splendour of the Buddha qualities; of seats to win the seat of Awakening under the Bodhi tree; of beds to acquire the “sleep of a Buddha” which is entering into the fourth absorption (jhāna) according to the saying: “Lying on the left is the sleep of the sensuous; lying on the right is the sleep of a lion; lying with upturned face is the sleep of a Peta; entering into the fourth absorption is the sleep of a Buddha.” He makes an offering of dwelling places, such as rest houses, etc., to become a refuge of beings; and of lamps to acquire the five-eyes.

The fivefold eyes of wisdom, which the sub-commentary explains as follows: 1) The Buddha-eye (Buddha-cakkhu), complete intuition of another’s inclinations, intentions, hopes, hankerings, will, dispositions, proclivities and moral state; 2) the eye of all-round knowledge (samanta-cakkhu), the eye of a being perfected in wisdom; 3) the eye of truth (Dhamma-cakkhu or ñāṇa-cakkhu), perception of the attainment of the first three paths which lead to the fourth and final path of an Arahat; 4) the eye of supernormal power (dibba-cakkhu), the Deva-eye of super sensuous perception, the clear sight of a seer, all pervading and seeing all that proceeds in hidden worlds; and 5) the physical eye (pasāda-cakkhu or maṃsa-cakkhu).

Various Kinds of Giving with Their Respective Objects

He made a gift of colour (rūpa-dāna) to acquire the aura which constantly illumines an area of 80 cubics around the Buddha’s body, even in the darkness of a thick forest, at midnight, on a new moon day, with rain clouds covering the sky. He made a gift of sound (sadda-dāna), to acquire a voice like that of a Brahma. He made a gift of tastes, to become a person endearing to all beings. He made a gift of tangibles, to acquire the fruit of the gentleness of a Buddha (Buddha-sukhu-mālatā).

He made a gift of medicines, to attain the fruit of the ageless and deathless Nibbāna. He made a gift of freedom to slaves, in order to gain emancipation from the slavery to the defilements. He made a gift of blameless amusement, so as to take delight in the true Dhamma.

He made a gift of his own children, in order to make all beings his children of noble birth by permitting them into the Saṅgha. He made a gift of his wives such as Queen Maddī,<sup>396</sup> in order to become lord of the whole world.

He made a gift of the ten kinds of treasures such as gold, gems, pearls, coral, etc., in order to achieve the major characteristics of physical beauty of a great being. He made a gift of various adornments, in order to achieve the 80 minor characteristic marks of physical beauty. He made a gift of his worldly wealth, in order to win the treasury of the true Dhamma.

He made a gift of his kingdom, in order to become the King of the Dhamma. He made a gift of pleasure or garden, ponds and groves, in order to achieve the superhuman transcendental absorptions, liberations, concentrations, paths and fruitions.

He made a gift of his feet to whoever wants them, to enable himself to approach the tree of Awakening with feet marked with auspicious [82] wheels. He made a gift of his hands, as he wishes to extend the helping hand of the True Dhamma to get beings across the four wild floods.<sup>397</sup> He made a gift of ears, nose, etc., to be endowed with the faculties of faith, etc. He made a gift of eyes, to be endowed with the all-seeing eye of a Buddha, that is, omniscience. He made a gift of flesh and blood with the wishful thought: “May my body bring welfare and happiness to all-beings, at all times, even when I am seeing, hearing, recollecting or helping myself. May it be the means for sustaining the whole world.” He made a gift of the head, the top-most part of the body, in order to become the supreme one in the whole world.

In making such gifts, the Bodhisatta does so, not by seeking wrong means, nor by ill-treating others, nor through fear or shame, nor by causing vexation to the recipient, nor does he give inferior objects when he has superior ones to offer, nor does he extol himself while disparaging others, nor does he wish for any fruit other than becoming a Buddha in making his gifts, nor does he give with loathing, disgust, detestation, contempt or despisement.

He gives after careful preparation of materials with his own hands, at the proper time, with due reverence to the recipient, without discrimination, filled with joy at all three moments, that is: before giving, during giving and after giving.

Therefore, there is no feeling of remorse after making the gift. He does not become haughty or disdainful towards recipients but speaks endearingly to them. Understanding the speech of the recipient, he is accessible to them.

When he makes an offering, he does so together with additional materials along with it. For example, when he wishes to offer alms food, he thinks: “I will make this offering of alms food along with suitable accompaniments,” and makes an offering of drinks, robes etc., as well. And when he wishes to offer robes, he thinks: “I will make this offering of robes along with suitable accompaniments,” and so he makes an offering of food, drinks, etc., as well. The same method is followed with regard to gifts of vehicles, flowers, etc.

Whenever he wishes to make a gift of visible forms (rūpa-dāna), he makes a gift of sound, scents, etc., as accessories to accompany it. The same method is followed with regard with a gift of sound, scents, etc. In making the ten kinds of offering of food, drink etc., following the discourses way of giving the materials offered are tangible and easily intelligible.

The Abhidhamma Classification of Giving

In the Abhidhamma way of making gifts, which are objects of senses, such as colour, sound, etc., it is sometimes not clear to people as to what constitutes a gift of colour (rūpa-dāna), or how one should be mentally disposed, to effect a gift of colour. Because of this, how such gifts should be made is explained below.

A Gift of Colour

According to the six kinds of offering following the Abhidhamma classifications, the gift of colour (rūpa-dāna) should be understood thus: Having acquired a material gift, such as flowers, garments or mineral elements of blue, yellow, red, white, etc., one regards them only as colour, and thinking: “I shall make a gift of colour, this is my gift of colour,” he offers the flower, the garment, etc., which has the colour intended as a gift. This kind of offering is known as a gift of colour (rūpa-dāna).

If it is not possible for a person, who wants to make a gift of a particular colour, by separating it out from the material of that colour, he can make an offering of a flower, garment or mineral element which has the colour of his choice, thinking: “I shall make a gift of colour, this is my gift of colour.” This is how an offer of colour (rūpa-dāna) is made.

A Gift of Sound

The gift of sound (sadda-dāna) should be understood by way of the sound of drums, etc. When making such a gift, it is not possible to give sound the way one gives lotus bulbs and [83] roots, after pulling them out; or a cluster of blue lotuses, by placing it in the hands of the recipient. One makes a gift of sound by giving sound-producing objects such as drums or bells.

Thinking: “I will make a gift of sound,” he pays homage to the Three Treasures by playing one of these musical instruments himself or causing others to do so; or thinking: “This is my gift of sound,” he erects on the relic shrine (stūpa) platforms, bells or bronze drums himself, or causes others to do so; or by giving voice enhancers, such as honey, molasses etc., to Dhamma preachers; by announcing and inviting people to listen to the Dhamma, or by giving a talk on the Dhamma, by discussing Dhamma with those who have approached him; or by expressing appreciation for the good deeds of feeding monks or building monasteries or causing others to do so. Such a gift is known as the gift of sound (sadda-dāna).

A Gift of Scent

Likewise, the gift of scent (gandha-dāna) is made when, after acquiring some delightfully fragrant objects in the form of roots, branches or powder, considering it only as scent – not as an object – and thinking: “I shall make a gift of scent, this is my gift of scent,” he offers it to the Three Treasures; or he relinquishes short pieces of fragrant wood, such as aloe, sandal, etc., with the intention of making a gift. Such a gift is known as the gift of scent (gandha-dāna).

A Gift of Taste

Likewise, the gift of taste (rasa-dāna) is made when, after getting a delightfully flavoured root, bulb, globule, fruit, etc., considering it, not as a material object, but only as taste, and thinking: “I shall make a gift of taste, this is my gift of taste,” he offers it to a recipient; or he makes an offering of tasty food, such as rice, corn, beans, milk, etc. Such a gift is known as the gift of taste (rasa-dāna).

A Gift of Tangibles

The gift of tangibles (phoṭṭhabba-dāna) should be understood by way of couches, cots, beds, chairs, etc., and by way of spreads, coverlets, blankets, etc. Having acquired some soft and delightful tangible objects, such as couches, cots, chairs, spreads, coverlets, blankets, etc., and considering them, not as material objects, but only as tangible qualities, thinking: “I shall make a gift of tangibles, this is my gift of tangibles,” he makes a gift of some such tangible objects. Such a gift is called the gift of tangibility (phoṭṭhabba-dāna).

A Gift of Mental Objects

The gift of mental objects (dhamma-dāna) here means the gift of a mental object (dhammārammaṇa), one of the six sense objects. In accordance with the dictum, nutriment (ojā), drinks (pāna), life (jīvita) are to be taken as a gift of a mental object, the gift of a mental object should be understood by way of nutriment, drinks and life.

According to A Manual of Abhidhamma by Nārada Thera: Dhamma embraces both mental and physical phenomena, mental objects (dhammārammaṇa) includes all objects of consciousness. pp 126, 128, 181.

U Shwe Zan Aung’s Compendium of Philosophy describes objects of consciousness as either “objects of sense or objects of thought.” It continues by saying that: “The object of thought also consists of five sub-classes of mind (citta); mental properties (cetasika); sensitive qualities of the body (pasāda-rūpa) and subtle qualities of body (sukhuma-rūpa); names, ideas, motions, concepts (paññātti); and Nibbāna” and concludes “these are collectively termed mental objects.” (pp 2-3).

Having acquired some such material as butter, ghee, etc., which is rich in nutrients (ojā), and considering it only as a nutrient, actually a mental object, and thinking: “I shall make a gift of this mental object; this is my gift of a mental object,” he makes a gift of butter, ghee, etc; or a gift of the eight kinds of drinks (pāna)<sup>398</sup> made from fruits [84] and roots; or, thinking: “This is a gift of life,” he makes gifts of materials which are conducive to life-prolongation such as an offering of food by tickets, and so on, or gets physicians to attend to the sick and afflicted; or causes fishing nets, bird-cages, traps to be destroyed; or liberates those who have been imprisoned; or causes a proclamation to be made by a beating of gongs: “Slaughter of animals is forbidden; no fish or meat is to be sold,” he undertakes the proclamation himself or causes others to do so for the protection of the lives of living beings. Such a gift is also known as a gift of mental objects (dhamma-dāna).

The Bodhisatta dedicates all the said accomplishments in generosity to the happiness and welfare of the whole world of beings till they attain Nibbāna. He dedicates them as supporting requisites to his attainment of Supreme Awakening, to his inexhaustible will (chanda), energy (virīya), concentration (samādhi), wisdom (paññā) and emancipation (vimutti) in becoming an Arahāt.

In fulfilling the perfection of generosity, the Bodhisatta develops the perception of impermanence with regard to his life and his possessions. He considers these possessions as belonging to others as well. He constantly and continuously develops great compassion towards beings. In developing such compassion, he is gathering the essence of merit, which is worth extracting from his wealth. Just like a person, whose house is blazing, removes himself and all his most valuable belongings to a safe place, so does the Bodhisatta save himself and his valuable assets from the great mansion of the three abodes, the realms of humans, Devas and Brahmas, which are raging with the eleven fires of passion, hate, delusion, birth, ageing, death, grief, lamentation, pain, distress and despair, by giving them away generously without leaving anything behind. He does so without concern, without discrimination as to what is to be given away or what is to be kept for personal use.

2. How the Perfection of Morality is Fulfilled

Wishing to support others with material aids, one should, in the first instance, strive to become possessed of wealth and property. Likewise, wishing to adorn beings with the ornaments of morality, the Bodhisatta, to begin with, has to purify his own morality. Herein, morality is purified in four modes:

1. Purifying one’s inclination (ajjhāsayā-visuddhi). A person, through purity of his own inclination, is naturally disgusted with evil. He may become very pure in morality by arousing his inward sense of conscience (hirī).

2. Undertaking the observance of precepts (samādāna). Likewise, a person, who has taken precepts, reflects: “I am undertaking the observance of precepts which are taken from such and such a teacher,” and, having respect for other beings, he may become very pure in morality by arousing his sense of concern about wrong doing (ottappa).
3. Non-transgression (avītikkaṃa). When endowed with both conscience and concern about doing wrong, there can be no transgression. Through non-transgression, one may become pure in morality and be well established in it.
4. Making amends in case of transgression (paṭipākatika-karaṇa). If due to forgetfulness, one sometimes breaks a precept or two, then, through one’s sense of conscience and concern, one quickly makes amends by the proper means of reinstating, such as confession or observance of probation (parivāsa) and carrying out penance (mānatta) to become pure again in morality.

After certain transgressions, a monastic has to observe probation and carry out penance; a layman or a novice has to renew the undertaking for the observance of the precepts to gain [85] reinstatement.

Abstention and Conduct

The morality which has been purified by means of the aforesaid four modes is of two kinds: abstention (vāritta-sīla) and good conduct (cāritta-sīla).

Not doing what is prohibited by the Buddha and other noble persons who say: “This is wrong; this should not be done; it should be abstained from.” Thus abstaining from ten deeds of evil, such as killing, stealing, etc., is called abstention (vāritta-sīla).

Showing respect to honourable persons, such as one’s teachers, parents or good friends, and performing blameless, useful services for them is called good conduct (cāritta-sīla).

How Bodhisattas Observe Abstention

1. The Bodhisatta has such great compassion for all beings that he harbours no resentment towards anyone, not even in a dream. Thus he abstains from killing.
2. As he is always dedicated to assisting others, he would handle the belongings of others with an inclination to misappropriate it no more than he would take hold of a poisonous snake.
3. In his existences as a monk or a recluse, he keeps away from sexual practice.

Not only does he avoid coital relations with a woman, he refrains from the seven minor acts of sensual craving (methuna-samyoga) mentioned in the Discourse about Intercourse (Methuna-sutta, AN 7.50) which are: 1) Taking delight in being caressed, massaged and rubbed by a woman; 2) taking delight in jokes and laughter with a woman; 3) taking delight in staring and gazing at a woman, eye to eye; 4) taking delight in hearing a woman laughing, singing, crying from the other side of a wall; 5) taking delight in recalling the past pleasures one enjoyed in the company of a woman; 6) taking delight in watching someone enjoying sense pleasures and longing for such pleasures; 7) leading a holy life with a longing for rebirth in a divine abode. Since he avoids even such minor sensual craving, to commit adultery is totally impossible for him. He has already abstained from such sexual misconduct from very early times. In those existences of his as a householder, the Bodhisatta does not entertain even a thought of passion for the wives of others.

- 4-7. When he speaks, he avoids the four wrong speeches and states only what is true, what is conducive to harmony between friends, what is endearing, and he makes only timely talks on the Dhamma in a measured manner.
- 8-9. His mind is always devoid of covetousness and ill-will. Always holding unperverted views, he is endowed with the knowledge that he is the owner of his deeds (kammasa-kata-ñāṇa).<sup>399</sup> He has faith and good will towards recluses, who are practising rightly.

<sup>399</sup> The owner of his deeds; he is solely responsible for all his deeds, good or bad.

Because he avoids the unwholesome courses of action (kamma) which leads to the four planes of misery, and because he is established in the wholesome courses of action which leads to the Deva realm and Nibbāna, through the purity of his inclinations, and through the [86] purity of his physical and verbal actions, all the Bodhisatta's wishes for the welfare and happiness of beings are rapidly fulfilled. He also achieves the fulfilment of his perfections.

1. By abstaining from the wrong deed of killing (pāṇātipāta), the Bodhisatta gives the gift of harmlessness to all beings. He becomes accomplished in the development of loving-kindness without difficulty, and enjoys the eleven advantages (AN 11.15) of developing loving-kindness. Together with the advantages of enjoying robust health, longevity and great happiness, he possesses the distinguished characteristics of a great being such as long, tapering fingers and toes; and he is able to eradicate the natural tendencies towards hatred (dosa-vāsanā).
2. By abstaining from the wrong deed of taking what is not given (adinnādāna), the Bodhisatta acquires wealth and possessions which are immune from molestation by the five enemies: water, fire, kings, thieves and unloved heirs. He is not susceptible to suspicion by others. He is dear, amiable and trustworthy. He is not attached to wealth and property. With an inclination to relinquishing, he is able to eradicate the natural tendencies towards greed (lobha-vāsanā).
3. By abstaining from unchaste practices (abrahmacariyā), the Bodhisatta remains modest, calm in mind and body, dear, agreeable to all beings and is not loathed by them. He enjoys a good reputation. He has neither attachment to women nor strong desire for them. With earnest inclination to renunciation, he is able to eradicate the natural tendencies towards greed (lobha-vāsanā).
4. By abstaining from false speech (musā-vāda), the Bodhisatta is highly esteemed, trusted and relied upon by beings. His words are well accepted and have much influence on many. He is dear and agreeable to Devas. He has a sweet fragrance. He is well guarded in his speech and action. He possesses the distinguished characteristics of a great being such as having only a single hair in each of the pores of his body, and so on. He is able to eradicate the natural tendencies towards defilements (kilesa-vāsanā).

5. By abstaining from slander (pisuṇā-vācā), the Bodhisatta possesses a physical body which is indestructible and a following that cannot be divided by the wiles of others. He has unbreakable faith in the true Dhamma. He is a firm friend, endearing to all beings, enjoying the benefits of having but few defilements (kilesa).
6. By abstaining from abusive language (pharusā-vāca), the Bodhisatta becomes dear to beings. With a pleasant, amiable disposition, sweet in speech, he is held in high esteem by all. He becomes endowed with a voice of eight qualities.

According to the Discourse concerning Mahā Govinda (Mahā-govinda-sutta, DN 19) the eight qualities of voice possessed by Saṅkumāra Brahma are: 1) Purity of enunciation; 2) clearness, being easily understood; 3) melodiousness; 4) pleasantness; 5) being full and rounded; 6) not being scattered and diffused; 7) being deep and resonant; and 8) not travelling beyond his audience; like the Brahma, Bodhisattas are also possessors of a voice with these eight qualities.

7. By abstaining from frivolous talk (samphappalāpā-vāca), the Bodhisatta is dear and agreeable to all beings, esteemed and revered by them. Speaking, as a rule, in a cautious manner, his words are well accepted and have much influence on them. He wields great power and has the skill to give instant answers to questions asked by others. When he becomes a Buddha, he becomes capable of answering all the questions put forward by beings in numerous languages. He answers by giving a single reply in Pāḷi, the language of noble persons (ariya-vācā), which is well understood by the audience of different races numbering 101, each speaking their own language.
8. By abstaining from covetousness (abhijjhā), the Bodhisatta gains whatever he wishes without difficulty. He obtains excellent riches to his liking. He is honoured and revered by [87] wealthy kings, Brahmins and householders. He is never vanquished by his adversaries. He has no defects in his faculties of eye, ear, nose, etc., and becomes a person without a peer.

9. By abstaining from ill-will (vyāpāda), the Bodhisatta becomes a pleasant person, lovely to behold and is admired by all. He inspires them easily with faith in himself. He is inoffensive by nature, abides only in loving-kindness and is endowed with great power.
10. By rejecting wrong views and developing only right views, the Bodhisatta gains good companions. He does not commit evil even if he is threatened with beheading. Holding the view that he is the owner of his deeds (kamma), he does not believe in superstitious omens. He has firm confidence in the True Dhamma, and steadfast faith in the omniscience of the Awakened Ones. Just as a royal swan takes no delight in a dung heap so does the Bodhisatta take no delight in various creeds other than right view (sammā-diṭṭhi). He is skilled in fully comprehending the three characteristics of impermanence, suffering, and unsubstantiality. In the final existence when he becomes a Buddha, he gains unobstructed knowledge (anāvaraṇa-ñāṇa), which knows all there is to know without any hindrance. Before becoming a Buddha, he becomes the chief and foremost of beings in every existence he happens to be born into and attains the highest fortunes.

Superstitious omens (diṭṭha-suta-muta-maṅgala). The Tiṭṭhaka Pāli-Myanmar Dictionary describes it as the meaning of freedom from superstitious views (akotuhala-maṅgala), mentioned in the commentary of the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka), which is explained as: “The belief held by the uninstructed in the auspiciousness of the five sense objects when they happened to be seen, heard or touched under such and such circumstances and conditions.”

He reflects like this: “Morality is the foundation of all achievements. It is the origin, source of all the attributes of a Buddha. It is the beginning of all the perfections.” Having morality, the Bodhisatta develops the power of mindfulness and comprehension in four matters: control of verbal and physical actions, restraint of faculties, purity of livelihood and use of the four requisites. He fulfils the observance of morality with due respect and care, considering gain and honour as a foe in the guise of a friend.

How Bodhisattas Observe Conduct

The Bodhisatta always welcomes good friends, greeting them with a gesture of respect and courtesy, by extending his clasped hands towards them and waiting upon them. He attends personally on the sick and renders needful services to them. He expresses appreciation after hearing a Dhamma discourse. He speaks in praise of the virtues of the virtuous. He bears with patience the wrongs of others and recollects repeatedly only their services rendered to him. He rejoices in the meritorious deeds of others and dedicates his own good deeds to Supreme Awakening. He always abides without neglecting the practice of wholesome Dhamma. If he happens to commit a wrong doing, he sees it as such, without attempting to hide it, and confesses it to his Dhamma companions. He develops more and more the practice of Dhamma, going up higher and higher in the stages of attainment.

Likewise, he is skilful and diligent in rendering services to beings in such matters that are agreeable to him and would benefit them. When they are afflicted with disease, etc., he tries to give relief to them as much as possible. When misfortune (vyāsana) befalls them, concerning relatives, wealth, health, morality and belief, he gives them solace by dispelling their sorrow. He reproves righteously those who need to be reprovved, only to take them out of evil and establish them in good. To those who deserve his support, he righteously gives them a helping hand.

On hearing the supreme practices of the past Bodhisattas, by means of which they gain maturity of the perfections (pāramī), charity (cāga), and good conduct (cariyā), and which are most difficult to perform, inconceivably powerful, and which definitely contribute to the happiness and welfare of beings, the Bodhisatta is not frightened or discouraged at all.

He reflects: “All the past Bodhisattas, just like me, were only human beings; and yet [88] by dint of constant training in morality, concentration and wisdom they reached Supreme Awakening. Like those great Bodhisattas of the past, I too will undergo the complete training in morality, concentration and wisdom. In this way, after completing the same three trainings, I will ultimately attain the same goal of omniscience.” Thus, with unrelenting diligence preceded by faith, he undertakes to complete the training in morality, etc.

Similarly, the Bodhisatta does not publicize his own good deeds, instead he confesses his faults without concealing them. He has few wishes, is easily contented, enjoys seclusion, and is not given to socializing. He endures hardships, and does not crave for this or that object nor does he get agitated. He is not haughty, not immodest, not scurrilous, and not given to loose talk. He is quiet, calm and free from such wrong means of livelihood as fraud.

He is endowed with proper physical and verbal conduct and with his own subjects for meditation. He sees danger even in the slightest fault and undertakes to observe well the rules of training. With no attachment to body or life, he has his mind directed only to attainment of omniscience and Nibbāna, and incessantly devotes himself to wholesome practices. He has not formed even the slightest attachment to body and life, instead he discards them. He dispels also defiling factors, such as ill-will, malice, etc., which will cause a corruption of morality.

He does not remain complacent with minor achievements but strives successively for higher attainments. By such endeavours, his achievements in the absorptions, etc., do not get diminished or stagnant at all but grow and develop more and more into higher and higher stages.

Likewise, the Bodhisatta helps the blind to reach the desired destination or directs them the right way. He communicates with the deaf and the dumb by signalling gestures with his hands. He provides a chair or a vehicle to the cripple; or he carries them personally on his back to wherever they want to go.

He works hard so that those with poor faith may develop faith, the lazy may develop energy, the heedless, unmindful ones may develop mindfulness, the restless, worried ones may develop concentration and the ignorant, uninstructed one may develop wisdom. He strives to enable those troubled by hindrances to dispel such troubling factors and those oppressed by wrong thoughts of sensuality, ill-will and cruelty to remove such oppressing factors.

To those who have helped him before, he shows his gratitude, greeting them with endearing words, honouring them in return with benefits similar to, or even greater than, those bestowed on him. In time of their misfortune, he serves them as a boon companion.

Understanding the natural disposition of various beings, he assists them to be free from what is unwholesome and to become established in what is wholesome. He associates with them, meeting their needs and wishes.

What is meant here is that he seeks their company and friendship to free them from evil, and establish them in virtues by alms giving (dāna) to those who like gifts; by speaking endearing words (piya-vācā) to those who like kind speech; by beneficial conduct (attha-cariyā) to those who approve of such a life; and by treating with a sense of impartiality (samānattatā) those who wish to be treated with such themselves.

Likewise, even with a desire to serve their interest, the Bodhisatta does not hurt others nor quarrel with them. He does not humiliate them or make them feel remorse. He does not look down on others nor find fault with them. He is humble when dealing with those who treat him without arrogance but with humility.

He does not keep himself completely aloof from others, but also avoids excessive familiarity or association at the wrong time. He keeps company with only those worthy to associate with, at proper times and places. He does not speak ill of others in the presence of their friends nor praise those who are not on good terms with them. He does not cultivate intimate friendship with those not appropriate to mix with. [89]

He does not refuse a proper invitation, nor does he indulge in making excessive demands either; nor does he accept more than what he needs. He gives delight and encouragement to the faithful by giving a discourse on the merits of faith. Likewise, he gives delight and encouragement to those endowed with morality, learning, generosity and wisdom by giving discourses on the merits of these qualities.

If, in a certain existence, the Bodhisatta happens to be accomplished in the attainments of the absorptions and super knowledges (abhiññā), by exercising these powers, he arouses fright in those beings who are negligent in doing good deeds. By showing them, to a certain extent, the horrors in the realms of misery, he gets those devoid of faith and other virtues established in them, and gives them access to the Buddha's Dispensation. To those already endowed with faith, etc., he helps them gain maturity in those virtues.

In this manner, the Bodhisatta's conduct (cāritta-sīla) is like the flood of immeasurable meritorious deeds, which grows bigger and bigger, one existence after another.

3. How the Perfection of Renunciation is Fulfilled

As already stated above, the perfection of renunciation is the group of consciousnesses and mental concomitants which desire emancipation from sense pleasures and existences, which is founded on great compassion (mahā-karuṇā) and knowledge of skilful means (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa) and which is preceded by the knowledge of the dangers in them. Therefore, the Bodhisatta undertakes first to discern the faults as they truly are in sense pleasures and existences by means of the knowledge of danger (ādīnava-ñāṇa).

This is how he discerns these faults: “Because household life is the dwelling place of all kinds of defilements, because there are impediments, such as wife and children, etc., restricting one’s meritorious performances, because one gets involved and entangled in multifarious activities such as trading and cultivation, it is not a proper place where the happiness of renunciation can be achieved.”

The sensual pleasures of men, like a drop of honey on the sharp edge of a sword, prove to be more harmful than enjoyable. Their enjoyment is short-lived, like a theatrical show seen only by intermittent flashes of lightning. They are enjoyed only through perverted perception, which is disorderly like the ornaments of a mad man. They are as deceptive as a camouflaging object, which conceals a heap of excreta, as unsatisfying as licking the moisture on one’s fingers. They are afflictive, damaging, like the gorging of food by a famished person, causing hordes of misfortune like the bait on a hook, causing suffering (dukkha) in the past, present and future like the heat of burning fires. They are sticky like the gum of a plant (makkāṭa-lepa). They form a means to conceal destructive objects like the mantle of a murderer. Thus, discerning first the disadvantages in sense pleasures and existences, and then the advantages of being free from them, which is renunciation (nekkhamma), the Bodhisatta fulfils the perfection of renunciation.

Since going forth from household life is the foundation of the perfection of renunciation, at a time when there is no teaching of a Buddha, in order to fulfil this perfection, the Bodhisatta takes up an ascetic life under recluses or wanderers who uphold the doctrine of action (kamma-vādī) and the doctrine of the efficacy of action (kiriya-vādī). However, when an Awakened One appears in the world, he joins the Saṅgha in the Dispensation of the Buddha.

Having thus gone forth, he establishes himself in the abstentions (vāriṭṭa-sīla) and good conduct (cāriṭṭa-sīla), as described above, and, in order to purify these things, he undertakes the ascetic practices (dhutaṅga).

The Bodhisatta, who has thus washed away the mental defilements with the clean water of morality, fortified by ascetic practices becomes endowed with blameless, pure physical and verbal conduct. He shows contentment with any available robe, alms food and [90] dwelling. Having followed the first three of the four traditions of the noble ones (ariya): contentment with any kinds of robes, alms food and dwelling (ariya-varisattāya), he strives to achieve the fourth one, delight in meditation (bhāvanārāma), by practising an appropriate meditation out of the prescribed 40 meditation subjects until he attains the stages of meditation access (upacāra) and absorption (appanā). Attainment of absorption is the Bodhisatta's complete fulfilment of the perfection of renunciation.<sup>400</sup>

4. How the Perfection of Wisdom is Fulfilled

As the light of wisdom cannot co-exist with the darkness of delusion (moha), the Bodhisatta, who is fulfilling the perfection of wisdom, avoids the causes of delusion, such as aversion (arati) to wholesomeness, laziness, stretching out one's limbs in drowsiness, etc., but applies himself with ardour to acquisition of wide knowledge, various kinds of absorptions (jhāna), etc.

Wisdom is of three kinds:

1. The wisdom arising from hearing (suta-maya-paññā).
2. The wisdom arising from reflecting (cintā-maya-paññā).
3. The wisdom arising from meditation (bhāvanā-maya-paññā).

The Wisdom Arising from Hearing

In order to bring the wisdom arising from hearing, otherwise known as great learning (bāhu-sacca), to maturity, the Bodhisatta develops it through careful study, listening, learning, memorizing, interrogating and investigating with mindfulness, energy and wisdom preceded by the knowledge of skilful means (upāya-kosalla-nāṇa). The whole of the wisdom arising from hearing is made up of the five aggregates, the twelve sense spheres, the eighteen elements, the four truths, the 22 faculties, the law of dependent origination, the methods of steadfast mindfulness, etc., which constitute the factors of Awakening, as well as various categories of Dhamma, such as knowing what is wholesome and unwholesome, etc.; and blameless, mundane forms of knowledge which promote the welfare and happiness of beings. In this way the Bodhisatta develops the wisdom arising from hearing and becomes a man of wisdom who has delved into the entire subject of it himself and established others in it too.

Likewise, in order to serve the interest of beings, the Bodhisatta develops the wisdom that arises instantaneously to find the suitable means, right on the spot (ṭhānuppattika-paṭibhāna-ñāṇa), which is also known as the wisdom arising from hearing. By means of this wisdom, the Bodhisatta is able to distinguish the factors which will promote growth and prosperity from those which will contribute to ruin and destruction in the various undertakings of beings.

The Wisdom Arising from Reflecting

Likewise, the Bodhisatta develops the wisdom arising from reflecting (cintā-maya-paññā) by reflecting penetratingly on natural phenomena, and the absolute realities such as aggregates, the bases, etc. Careful study, listening, learning and memorizing of natural phenomena such as the aggregates is the wisdom arising from hearing (suta-maya-paññā). Thinking first and then reflecting on these natural phenomena which one has studied, learnt and memorized is the wisdom arising from reflecting (cintā-maya-paññā).

The Wisdom Arising from Meditation

Likewise, the Bodhisatta, who has developed the mundane kinds of thorough understanding of natural phenomena, such as the aggregates, the bases, etc., by discerning their specific as well as general characteristics, proceeds to perfect and fulfil the preliminary portion of the wisdom gained by meditation (bhāvanā-maya-paññā): the nine insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) such as knowledge of conditioned things (sammasana-ñāṇa), their impermanence, suffering, not-self, etc.

By thus perfecting and fulfilling insight knowledge, the Bodhisatta comprehends fully the external and internal objects only as mental and physical phenomena, thinking: “This group of natural phenomena, which is merely mind and matter (nāma-rūpa), arises and ceases according to [91] conditions. In reality there is no one who creates or causes others to create. Mind and matter, as a reality, arise only to disappear and therefore they are impermanent. It is unsatisfactory because of its constant arising and ceasing. It is uncontrollable, ungovernable, and it is therefore not-self.” Thus comprehending the real nature of both internal and external objects without distinction, he abandons attachment to them and helps others to do so as well.

During the period preceding his becoming a Buddha, the Bodhisatta, through great compassion, helps beings step into the three vehicles of practice (paṭipatti), by which, beings may gain maturity in the three kinds of Awakening or reach maturity in their practice if they have already stepped into them.

As for himself, the Bodhisatta strives to achieve the five kinds of mastery over the mundane absorptions (jhāna) and various super knowledges (abhiññā) and with the great help rendered by the concentration associated with these, the absorptions and super knowledges, he reaches the pinnacle of wisdom.

As to the methods of developing the mundane absorptions (jhāna) and super knowledges (abhiññā) and the ten kinds of knowledge of insight, reference may be made to the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga). It is especially to be noted, however, that in the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga), the development of wisdom for a future disciple is explained up to the stage of attainment of the path. Here in this work, however, as it is intended for the Bodhisattas who aspire to Supreme Awakening, all the endeavours for development of meditation are preceded by great compassion (mahā-karuṇā) and knowledge of skilful means (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa) and stop short at the sixth stage of purity of knowledge following the right path (paṭipadā-ñāṇa-dassana-visuddhi) before the attainment of the path, also called the stage of purity of knowledge of the paths and fruitions (ñāṇa-dassana-visuddhi). As regards the ten stages of the knowledge of insight, the development of wisdom is carried out as far as the first part of the knowledge of equanimity about formations (saṅkhāra-upekkhā-ñāṇa), giving attention only to the nine lower stages of insight (vipassanā).

5. How the Other Perfections are Fulfilled

Just as a general, intent on vanquishing his foes, strives ceaselessly, even so the Bodhisatta, who seeks to overcome the enemies of defilement unaided and who wants other beings to make similar conquests also, works arduously all the time in fulfilment of the perfections.

Therefore the Bodhisatta continuously reflects with mindfulness: “What have I accumulated in the way of the requisites of merit and wisdom today? What have “I done for the welfare of others today?” Reflecting thus every day, he works energetically to be of service to other beings.

In order to help beings, he gives away generously his possessions, including his life and limbs. Whatever he does bodily or verbally, he does so with his mind inclined towards omniscience; whatever merit he accrues from such actions, he dedicates to the attainment of full Awakening.

With a mind for looking for emancipation he turns away from objects of sense pleasures, even if they are of superior kind or in small amount, not to speak of inferior objects of sense pleasures or in abundant quantity.

In every undertaking, he develops and applies the knowledge of skilful means (upāya-kosalla-nāṇa). He always works assiduously for the welfare of beings. He bears all sense objects with patience, whether desirable or undesirable. He stands firm on truth, not deviating from it even for the sake of his life.

He suffuses all beings, not making any discrimination, with loving-kindness and compassion. Just as a father wishes to take upon himself the suffering of his children, even so, he wishes to take upon himself all the suffering that would fall on beings.

He rejoices in the meritorious deeds of all beings. He keeps reflecting on the greatness of the Buddhas and the greatness of their powers. Whatever action he does, bodily or verbally, he does so only with his mind inclined towards Perfect Awakening. [92]

In this manner, the Bodhisatta, being constantly devoted to meritorious deeds, such as giving, etc., makes an incomparable accumulation of the requisites of merit and wisdom day by day.

Furthermore, having relinquished his own life and limb for the use and protection of beings, he seeks ways and means and applies them for the alleviation of various kinds of suffering borne by other beings: hunger, thirst, cold, heat, wind, sun, etc.

The happiness he derives from the removal of the said afflictions, the various physical and mental comforts that result from staying in delightful parks, gardens, mansions, pools, and forest abodes, the bliss of the absorptions enjoyed by Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, noble disciples and Bodhisattas after renunciation, he wishes to make available to all beings without distinction.

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2570

When he has become accomplished in the absorptions, he endeavours to bestow on beings the fruits of the absorptions he himself has enjoyed such as rapture, calm, happiness, concentration, knowledge of things as they really are, so that they may also relish them even as he has done so himself.

Furthermore, he sees beings engulfed and helpless in the great suffering of the round of rebirths (Saṃsāra-vaṭṭa-dukkha), in the suffering caused by the defilements (kilesa-dukkha), and in the suffering caused by volitions (abhisankhāra-dukkha) which keep beings in Saṃsāra.

He distinctly sees beings such as the inmates in the realms of misery like Niraya, experiencing continuous, intense agony for a long time, being cut up, severed, amputated, pulverized and subjected to fierce burning.

He distinctly sees beings such as animals, undergoing great suffering through mutual animosity, oppression, causing injury, killing one another, or having to toil in the service of others.

He distinctly sees beings such as ghosts, being enveloped in raging flames, consumed and withered by hunger, thirst, wind, sun, etc., feasting on what has been vomited up, or on spittle and phlegm, etc., and throwing up their arms in lamentation.

He distinctly sees some beings such as human beings, ruined in their search for a means of livelihood; suffering punishment, such as the cutting off their hands and feet, etc., for crimes committed by them; horrible to look at, ugly, deformed; deeply immersed in the mire of suffering, not distinguishable from the suffering of the inmates of Niraya.

Some humans, afflicted by hunger and thirst, due to shortage of food, are suffering just like famished ghosts. Some of them, being numerically and materially weak, are vanquished by the more powerful, forced into their service and made dependent on their masters for their livelihood. He sees their suffering as not being different from those of animals.

The Bodhisatta distinctly sees the Devas of the six realms of sensual pleasures, who are seen only as happy ones by humans, suffering from restlessness as they have swallowed the poison of sense pleasures and are burning with the fires of greed, hatred and delusion, like a blazing pile of dry firewood stoked up with blasts of wind, with not a moment of peace and always struggling desperately, dependent upon others for mere existence.

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2571

He distinctly sees the Brahmas of the fine material and immaterial realms, after existing there for the long lifespan of 84,000 great aeons (mahā-kappa), succumb to the natural law of impermanence and finally plunge back into the unsurmountable rounds of suffering due to birth, ageing, and death, as do birds, propelled with tremendous energy, fly far into space or like arrows shot into the sky by a strong man.

Seeing their suffering vividly in this manner, the Bodhisatta feels a sense of spiritual urgency (samvega), and suffuses all beings with loving-kindness and compassion without discrimination in the 31 planes of existence.

The Bodhisatta, who in this way accumulates, without interruption, the requisites of Awakening by way of good physical, verbal and mental actions, strives thoroughly and [93] with constant perseverance in order that all the perfections may reach the height of fulfilment.

Again, energy, which is responsible for conveying him to becoming a Buddha, i.e., the repository of inconceivable, incomparable, extensive, undefiled, pure attributes, is of unthinkable might. Ordinary people dare not even hear about this energy of the Bodhisatta, much less exercise it.

It is only through the power of this energy that the Bodhisatta develops, accumulates and fulfils the requisites of Awakening, which are the three aspirations towards becoming an omniscient Buddha with the thoughts of becoming a Buddha (Buddho bodheyyam), of achieving liberation (mutto moceyyam) and of crossing the ocean of Saṃsāra (tiṇṇo tāreyyam); the four grounds of becoming a Buddha; the four ways of gaining friendship (saṅgaha-vatthu): generosity (dāna), kindly speech (peyya-vajja), beneficial conduct (attha-cariyā) and impartiality (samānattatā); the single function of compassion; reflection on the unique condition for becoming a Buddha by realization of the Buddha qualities; being untainted with craving, conceit and wrong view concerning all things; perceiving all beings as his own dear children; not being wearied by the suffering of Saṃsāra while striving for becoming a Buddha; relinquishing everything that could be given away; and in so relinquishing, not being conceited with the thought: “There is none in the universe to match me in generosity;” applying oneself to development of higher morality, higher concentration and higher wisdom; being unshakeable in the practice of these virtues; being joyful, happy and delighted with meritorious deeds; being inclined to the three forms of seclusion: keeping aloof from companions (kaya-viveka), being void of sensuous thoughts (citta-viveka), and detached from the defilements (upadhi-viveka); applying himself to the development of the absorptions; being insatiable with blameless phenomena; teaching the Dhamma one has heard to others, out of goodwill; making great efforts to initiate meritorious deeds in fulfilment of the perfections; having unremitting perseverance intensified by courage; remaining unperturbed by accusations, and by the wrongs of others; being firmly established in truth; gaining mastery over the absorptions; achieving power in the super knowledges; comprehending the three characteristics of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and non-self (anatta); accumulating the requisites for the four supermundane paths through the practice of steadfast mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna), etc.; and becoming accomplished in the nine supermundane phenomena of the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna.

All these endeavours to develop, accumulate and fulfil the requisites of Awakening can be made only with the power of energy. Therefore, the Bodhisatta has, from the time of forming the aspiration until his becoming a Buddha, worked to perfect his energy thoroughly, incessantly, assiduously, without any relaxation, so that it will enable him to advance to higher and higher stages of Dhamma.

When this forward-driving (parakkama) perfection of energy has been fulfilled, the perfections of forbearance, truthfulness etc., which follow it, as well as those of generosity, morality, etc., which precede it, become fulfilled since all of them are dependent on energy for their perfection. Therefore, fulfilment of the perfection of forbearance and the others should be understood in the same manner.

Thus, benefitting others in various ways by relinquishing objects to be offered, which contribute to the happiness of beings, is fulfilment through generosity. Non-destruction and protection of life, property and family of beings, not causing dissension, speaking endearing, beneficial words, etc., constitute fulfilment through morality.

Likewise, performance of many beneficial deeds, such as accepting the four requisites given by beings and giving the gift of Dhamma to them, is fulfilment through renunciation; having skill in ways and means of promoting the welfare of beings is fulfilment through [94] wisdom; striving with zeal, undergoing difficulties without slacking in the use of that skill is fulfilment through energy; bearing with patience all the wrongs of beings is fulfilment through forbearance; not deceiving, not breaking the pledge of help to beings is fulfilment through truthfulness; remaining unshaken, even when his interests suffer as a result of rendering service to beings, is fulfilment through resolution; contemplating repeatedly the welfare and happiness of beings is fulfilment through loving-kindness; being unmoved, when helped or troubled by others, is fulfilment through equanimity.

Thus, the Bodhisatta endeavours for an accumulation of incomparable merit and wisdom, not shared by common people, made for the sake of helping an infinite numbers of beings and his thorough, careful fulfilment of the basic conditions of the perfections, as mentioned above. All these undertakings may be taken in brief as practising the attainment of the perfections (pāramī-sampatti).

11. What Is the Classification of the Perfections?

Each perfection is of three categories: ordinary perfection (pāramī), higher perfection (upapāramī) and supreme perfection (paramattha-pāramī). For instance, generosity (dāna) is of three categories: 1) The ordinary perfection of giving (dāna-pāramī); 2) the higher perfection of giving (dāna-upapāramī); and the supreme perfection of giving (dāna-paramattha-pāramī). [1502] Likewise for morality (sīla) and each of the remaining virtues. Thus there are 30 kinds of perfection in its detailed enumeration.

With regard to these three categories: 1) Properties, such as one's own gold, silver, etc. and family members, such as one's own children and wife; 2) limbs, big and small, such as one's own hands, legs, etc.; and 3) one's own life, should be noted first. Then referring to giving (dāna): 1) Gifts of property is the ordinary perfection of giving (dāna-pāramī); 2) gifts of limbs, big and small, is the higher perfection of giving (dāna-upapāramī); and 3) a gift of life is the supreme perfection of giving (dāna-paramattha-pāramī).

Similarly: 1) Observance of morality at the abandoning of properties is the ordinary perfection of morality (sīla-pāramī); 2) observance of morality at the abandoning of limbs, big and small, is the higher perfection of morality (sīla-upapāramī); and 3) observance of morality at the abandoning of life is the supreme perfection of morality (sīla-paramattha-pāramī). Likewise, for the remaining eight perfections, the same way of classification should be applied.

Different views held by different commentators may be looked up in the exposition of the words: Ko vibhāgo in the commentary to the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka, CpA, PTS 277). [93]

To the question: “How many perfections (pāramī) are there?” the answer in brief is: There are 30 perfections: ten ordinary perfections (pāramī), ten higher perfections (upapāramī) and the ten supreme perfections (paramattha-pāramī).

To the [94] questions: “What are ordinary, higher and supreme perfections?” the answer is provided in the commentary to the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka, CpA). Therein, the commentator answers this question elaborately, giving different interpretations, views and comments by diverse teachers. To reproduce them all in this work would cause only confusion to readers, so we shall give here only the view preferred by the commentator Ven. Mahā Dhammapāla himself.

1. Giving away one’s external objects, such as wife, children, wealth and property, is the ordinary perfection of giving (dāna-pāramī); giving up one’s limbs, such as hands, feet, etc., is the higher perfection of giving (dāna-upapāramī); giving up one’s life is the supreme perfection of giving (dāna-paramattha-pāramī).
2. Likewise, observing a precept and not breaking them on account of one’s external objects, such as wife, children, wealth and property, is the ordinary perfection of morality (sīla-pāramī); observing a precept and not breaking them on account of one’s limbs, such as hands, feet, etc., is the higher perfection of morality; observing a precept and not breaking them on account of one’s life is the supreme perfection of morality.
3. Cutting off attachment to one’s external objects and going forth from household life is the ordinary perfection of renunciation (nekkhamma-pāramī); cutting off attachment to one’s limbs, such as hands, feet, etc., and going forth from household life, is the higher perfection of renunciation; cutting off attachment to one’s life and going forth from household life is the supreme perfection of renunciation.
4. Rooting out attachment to one’s external objects and deciding deliberately what is beneficial to beings and what is not is the ordinary perfection of wisdom (paññā-pāramī); rooting out attachment to one’s limbs, such as hands, feet, etc., and deciding deliberately what is beneficial to beings and what is not is the higher perfection of wisdom; rooting out attachment to one's life and deciding deliberately what is beneficial to beings and what is not is the supreme perfection of wisdom.

5. Striving to fulfil and become accomplished in the aforesaid perfections and those to be mentioned later is the ordinary perfection of energy (virīya-pāramī); striving to fulfil and become accomplished in the aforesaid higher perfections and those to be mentioned later is the higher perfection of energy; striving to fulfil and become accomplished in the aforesaid supreme perfections and those to be mentioned later is the supreme perfection of energy.
6. Bearing with patience the vicissitudes which endanger one's external objects is the ordinary perfection of forbearance (khanti-pāramī); bearing with patience the vicissitudes which endanger one's limbs, such as hands, feet, etc., is the higher perfection of forbearance; bearing with patience the vicissitudes which endanger one's life, is the supreme perfection of forbearance. [95]
7. Not abandoning truth on account of one's external objects is the ordinary perfection of truth (sacca-pāramī); not abandoning truth on account of one's limbs, such as hands, feet, etc., is the higher perfection of truth; not abandoning truth on account of one's life is the supreme perfection of truth.
8. Unshakeable determination in spite of destruction of one's external objects while holding firmly that the perfections such as giving, morality etc., can be fulfilled only with indestructible determination is the ordinary perfection of resolution (adhiṭṭhāna-pāramī); unshakeable determination in spite of destruction of one's limbs, such as hands, feet, etc., is the higher perfection of resolution; unshakeable determination in spite of destruction of one's life is the supreme perfection of resolution.
9. Not abandoning loving-kindness towards beings, or continuous suffusion of beings with loving-kindness, even if they have caused destruction to one's external objects is the ordinary perfection of loving-kindness (mettā-pāramī); not abandoning loving-kindness towards beings even if they have caused destruction to one's limbs, such as hands, feet, etc., is the higher perfection of loving-kindness; not abandoning loving-kindness towards beings even if they have caused destruction to one's life is the supreme perfection of loving-kindness.

10. Maintaining an equanimous attitude towards beings and their volitions, irrespective of whether they have been helpful or harmful to one's external objects is the ordinary perfection of equanimity (upekkhā-pāramī); maintaining a neutral attitude towards beings and their volitions, irrespective of whether they have been helpful or harmful to one's limbs, such as hands, feet, etc., is the higher perfection of equanimity; maintaining a neutral attitude towards beings and their volitions, irrespective of whether they have been helpful or harmful to one's life is the supreme perfection of equanimity.

In this way, the classification of the perfections should be understood.

12. What Is the Synopsis of the Perfections?

To the question: “What is the synopsis of the perfections?” the answer is: The 30 perfections can be reduced to ten by grouping together those of the same nature, e.g. three kinds of the perfection of giving (dāna-pāramī) into one; three kinds of the perfection of morality into one, and so on. Similarly these ten perfections may further be reduced to six by grouping together those of a related nature, into:

1. The perfection of giving (dāna-pāramī).
2. The perfection of morality (sīla-pāramī).
3. The perfection of forbearance (khanti-pāramī).
4. The perfection of energy (virīya-pāramī).
5. The perfection of meditation (jhāna-pāramī).
6. The perfection of wisdom (paññā-pāramī).

This is how the abridgement is made: Renunciation (nekkhamma) means taking up an ascetic life, meditation and general meritoriousness. Here renunciation as taking up an ascetic life should be counted as the perfection of morality because they are of similar nature; in the same way renunciation as meditation, free from hindrances (nīvaraṇa) should be counted as the perfection of meditation (jhāna-pāramī); and renunciation as general meritoriousness belong to all the six perfections.

Truthfulness is of three kinds: truthful speech (vacī-sacca); abstaining from falsehood (virati-sacca) which is a mental concomitant of right speech (sammā-vācā); and truthful knowledge (ñāṇa-sacca) which is a mental concomitant of wisdom (paññā). Of these, truthful speech and abstaining from falsehood being related to morality should be counted as the perfection of morality; truthful knowledge being the concomitant of wisdom should be counted as the perfection of wisdom.

The perfection of loving-kindness (mettā-pāramī) which is similar in nature to the perfection of meditation is thus included in the latter.

The perfection of equanimity (upekkhā-pāramī) consists of concomitants of specific neutrality (tatra-majjhataṭṭā) and wisdom (paññā); specific neutrality should be counted as the perfection of meditation (jhāna-pāramī) to which it is related; and as a concomitant of wisdom (paññā), which is the same as equanimity-knowledge (ñāṇupekkhā), should be counted as the perfection of wisdom.

The perfection of resolution (adhiṭṭhāna-pāramī) should be included in all the six perfections of giving, morality, forbearance, energy, meditation and wisdom.

An unshakeable determination in performance of giving should be counted as the perfection of giving; likewise, an unshakeable determination in matters related to morality, forbearance, energy, meditation and wisdom should be included in their respective perfections.

Advantages of Pairing the Six Perfections

First of all, the six abridged perfections: giving, morality, forbearance, energy, meditation and wisdom, could be formed into fifteen pairs as follows:

1. Giving and morality.
2. Giving and forbearance.
3. Giving and energy.
4. Giving and meditation.
5. Giving and wisdom.

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2578

6. Morality and forbearance.
7. Morality and energy.
8. Morality and meditation.
9. Morality and wisdom.
10. Forbearance and energy.
11. Forbearance and meditation.
12. Forbearance and wisdom.
13. Energy and meditation.
14. Energy and wisdom.
15. Meditation and wisdom.

The Bodhisatta accomplishes through the pair of:

1. Giving and morality, the double merit of doing what is beneficial to others and of abstaining from what is harmful to them.
2. Giving and forbearance, the double benefit of non-greed and non-hatred.
3. Giving and energy, the double merit of generosity and learning.
4. Giving and meditation, the double merit of abandoning sensual desires and ill-will.
5. Giving and wisdom, the double merit of concentration and insight meditation; and also the double merit of learning the text (pariyatti) and meditation.
6. Morality and forbearance, the double merit of purity of bodily and verbal conduct and purity of mental disposition.
7. Morality and energy, the double merit of concentration and insight meditation.
8. Morality and meditation, the double merit of abandoning defilements through transgression, physically and verbally (vītikkama-kilesa) and defilements in the mind (pariyuṭṭhāna-kilesa).

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2579

9. Morality and wisdom, the double gift of harmlessness (abhaya-dāna) and the gift of Dhamma (Dhamma-dāna); the gift of harmlessness is possible only when endowed with morality; and the gift of Dhamma, when endowed with wisdom.
10. Forbearance and energy, the double quality of patience and perseverance; the vicissitudes of life can be withstood only with forbearance; and it is only when there is energy that meritorious deeds are performed with zeal and enthusiasm.
11. Forbearance and meditation, the double benefit of abandoning hostility that arises out of ill-will and of favouritism that arises out of greed; without forbearance one is opposed to the undesirable aspect of the world out of ill-will; without meditation one is overwhelmed by the desirable aspect of the world out of greed.
12. Forbearance and wisdom, the double benefit of comprehending the voidness of the self in mind and matter (nāma-rūpa) and of penetrative insight into Nibbāna.
13. Energy and meditation, the double benefit of effort (paggaha) and a balanced state of mind (avikkhepa).
14. Energy and wisdom, the double benefit of being a refuge to beings and to himself; the refuge to beings by means of energy and the refuge of self by means of wisdom.
15. Meditation and wisdom, the double benefit of concentration and insight meditation.

Advantages Accruing from the Triads

Similarly, there are advantages of grouping the perfections into triads. The Bodhisatta accomplishes the triple benefit of:

1. Abandoning greed, hatred and delusion, the three roots of demerit, through the triad of giving, morality and forbearance. [97]
2. Extracting of the essence from one's wealth, from one's physical body and from one's life.

Being associated with five enemies, wealth and property are void of intrinsic values; their real worth is in giving them away (dāna); being subjected to various ills and ailments, the body is devoid of substance; its real essence is in observance of precepts (sīla); ultimately ending up in destruction, life is devoid of substance; its real essence is development of insight meditation. The commentary on The Birth Story about (the Wise Ascetic) Kaṇha (Kaṇha-jātaka, Ja 440) gives an account on these subjects.

3. The meritorious deeds of giving, morality and cultivation (bhāvanā) through the triad of giving, morality and meditation.
4. Three kinds of gift: the gift of material objects, the gift of harmlessness and the gift of Dhamma, through giving, morality and wisdom.

Through giving, the gift of material objects is accomplished; through morality, the gift of harmlessness and through wisdom, the gift of Dhamma.

In this way, gaining of triple, quadruple benefits through the remaining triads and tetrads may be understood as is appropriate in each case.

Including the Six Perfections in the Four Foundations

Previously we have translated adhiṭṭhāna as “resolution” or “determination,” but these words are not applicable here and “foundation” seems more appropriate in this context. PED gives adhiṭṭhāna “in the sense of fixed, permanent abode” besides “decision, resolution, self-determination, will.”

Having shown how the ten perfections could be condensed into six by combining similar ones, it could be shown again how the six can be included in the four foundations (adhiṭṭhāna):

1. The foundation of truthfulness (saccādhīṭṭhāna) means Nibbāna, which is absolute truth (paramattha-sacca), together with the initial practices which lead to Nibbāna (pubba-bhāga-paṭipada): truthful speech (vacī-sacca), abstention from falsehood (virati-sacca), which is a mental concomitant of right speech (sammā-vācā) and truthful knowledge (ñāṇa-sacca) which is a mental concomitant of wisdom (paññā).

Truthful speech, abstention from falsehood and truthful knowledge form a supporting foundation for the Bodhisatta to stand on, in the course of existences during which the perfections are fulfilled and in the existence when he becomes a Buddha. Nibbāna as absolute truth forms a supporting foundation on which he stands when he becomes a Buddha. Hence they constitute the foundation of truthfulness.

2. The foundation of abandoning (cāgādhiṭṭhāna) means abandoning and uprooting all mental defilements without any remnant, by means of the Arahata path (Arahatta-magga) and forsaking, in the initial stages, while still a Bodhisatta, of sense objects and sense desires through fulfilment of the perfections, such as giving, etc.

While fulfilling the perfections as a Bodhisatta, he is not able to abandon and uproot mental defilements without any remnant. He can only forsake sense objects as far as possible through the perfection of giving, etc., and put away sense desires temporarily (tad-aṅga-pahāna) and to a distance (vikkhambhana-pahāna). Only in this way can the Bodhisatta build a supporting foundation to stand on. Only when he becomes an Arahata (Arahatta) and omniscience and becomes a Buddha is he firmly established on the foundation of complete abandoning and the uprooting of the defilements without any remnant. Therefore, complete abandoning and the uprooting of defilements by means of the Arahata path (Arahatta-magga) and putting away sense objects and sense desires temporarily or to a distance constitute the foundation of abandoning.

3. The foundation of tranquillity (upasamādhiṭṭhāna) means complete calming of the “fever of defilements” by means of the Arahata path (Arahatta-magga), allaying the suffering in the cycle of rebirths when Nibbāna is realized, and putting away the fever of defilements temporarily or to a distance through fulfilment of the perfections, such as giving, etc., while still a Bodhisatta.

While fulfilling the perfections as a Bodhisatta, the fever of defilements and suffering in the cycle of rebirth have not completely [98] subsided yet. Therefore, through the perfections, such as giving, etc., which form the means of allaying them, the Bodhisatta puts away the fever of defilements temporarily or to a distance. By such practices only, the Bodhisatta builds for himself a temporary supporting foundation to stand on. It is only when he becomes a Buddha that he is firmly established on the foundation through a complete removal of the fever of defilements and of the suffering in the cycle of rebirths. Hence, calming of the fever of defilements, and of the suffering in the cycle of rebirths constitute the foundation of tranquillity (upasamādhiṭṭhāna).

4. The foundation of wisdom (paññādhiṭṭhāna) means: the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala) insight, omniscience and all kinds of wisdom, such as the knowledge of skilful means (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa), and so on, which have arisen earlier in the mental continuum of the Bodhisatta.

In his existences as a Bodhisatta, he remains with the earlier forms of wisdom such as knowledge of skilful means, and so on. It is only when he becomes a Buddha that he is firmly established on the supporting foundation of the Arahant fruition insight and omniscience. Hence all the various kinds of aforesaid wisdom constitute the foundation of wisdom (paññādhīṭhāna).

For the ignorant common worldlings, who have only sense objects and sense desires to rely on, these sense objects and sense desires constitute their foundation. As for the Bodhisatta who clearly sees the danger in them, he establishes himself on the four supporting foundations of truth, charity, tranquillity and wisdom, which lead from these sense objects and sense desires to freedom, which is Nibbāna. Therefore, these four factors constitute the supporting foundations for the Bodhisatta.

How Fulfilment of the Four Foundations Occurs

After receiving the definite prophecy of becoming a Buddha, the Bodhisatta investigates the perfections by means of perfection-investigating knowledge (pāramī-pavicaya-ñāṇa). Having done so, he makes a vow to fulfil all the perfections, then he proceeds to fulfil them all in keeping with this vow. Thus the foundation of truthfulness (saccādhīṭhāna) becomes manifest in the mental continuum of the Bodhisatta.

While perfections are being fulfilled, there occurs an abandoning of defilements, which oppose them, and there also occurs an abandoning of sense objects and sense desires. Thus, the foundation of abandoning (cāgādhīṭhāna) also becomes manifest.

As there is an extinction of defilements by virtue of the perfections, the foundation of wisdom (paññādhīṭhāna) also becomes manifest.

Through these same perfections, the Bodhisatta becomes endowed with knowledge of skilful means (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa) and the foundation of wisdom (paññādhīṭhāna) also becomes manifest.

Whenever he fulfils the ten perfections or the six perfections, or whenever he performs a meritorious deed related to the perfections, there become manifest in the mental continuum of the Bodhisatta: 1) The foundation of truthfulness (saccādhīṭṭhāna), which is the endeavour without fail, to implement the vow he has made; 2) the foundation of abandoning (cāgādhīṭṭhāna), which is the abandoning of defilements, which oppose the perfections; 3) the foundation of tranquillity (upasamādhīṭṭhāna), which is the extinction of the defilements; and 4) the foundation of wisdom (paññādhīṭṭhāna), which is skill in ways and means for promotion of the welfare of beings. Therefore the six perfections can again be condensed into the four foundations (adhīṭṭhāna) of truth, abandoning, tranquillity and wisdom.

When a person, engaged in a blameless business venture, finds it profitable as intended, he keeps pursuing that venture with increasing industry and vigour. Here the profit accruing from the initial business venture is the cause; increasing industry and vigour in the pursuance of it is the effect of that cause.

In a similar manner, when the Bodhisatta undertakes to perform blameless meritorious deeds of the perfections, he comes to enjoy the benefit of these meritorious deeds in the form of the four foundations: the sweet taste of truthful speech (vacī-sacca);<sup>401</sup> the abandoning of the defilements (cāga); the extinction of the fever of defilements (upasama); and the knowledge of skilful means (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa). He keeps on performing these [99] meritorious deeds of the perfections with increasing industry and vigour, existence after existence. Here, the benefit of these meritorious deeds, in the form of the four foundations, is the cause and the meritorious deeds of the perfections repeated with increasing industry and vigour are the effect of that cause.

It should be understood that the occurrence of the meritorious deeds of the perfections and the occurrence of the four foundations are one and the same thing expressed in different words. To describe them in detail:

1. While in the course of performing the good deeds for the perfection of giving, the Bodhisatta comes to enjoy the benefits accruing from: 1) The foundation of truthfulness (saccādhīṭṭhāna), which is performance of an act of giving without fail in accordance with his vow: “I will make an offering when I see someone seeking gifts;” 2) the foundation of abandoning (cāgādhīṭṭhāna), which is abandoning of demeritorious stinginess, etc., which opposes generosity; 3) the foundation of tranquillity (upasamādhittāna), which is extinction of greed for material gifts, of hatred which occurs to those who are reluctant to make gifts towards those who come for gifts; of delusion as to giving – delusion tends to occur when one is not used to making gifts; of fear of waste which arises in unwilling givers when they see a loss or destruction of material gifts brought about somehow or other; 4) the foundation of wisdom (paññādhittāna), which is offering gifts befittingly at the proper time as planned, and preceded by wisdom. Having enjoyed the benefit of these four foundations, the Bodhisatta keeps on developing the perfection of giving more earnestly.

<sup>401</sup> Truth, for sure, is the sweetest of tastes (saccam have sādu-taram rasānam) as it says in the Discourse to Āḷavaka (Āḷavaka-sutta, SN 10.12, Snp 1.10).

2. Likewise, while in the course of fulfilling the perfection of morality, the Bodhisatta comes to enjoy the benefit accruing from: 1) The foundation of truthfulness, which is non-transgression of precepts in accordance with his vow; 2) the foundation of abandoning, which is abandoning of immoral unwholesome volition, and demerit; 3) the foundation of tranquillity, which is extinction of harm caused by wrong deeds; 4) the foundation of wisdom, which is wisdom playing a dominant role. Having enjoyed the benefit of these four foundations, the Bodhisatta keeps on developing the perfection of morality more earnestly.
3. While in the course of fulfilling the perfection of forbearance, the Bodhisatta comes to enjoy the benefit accruing from: 1) The foundation of truthfulness, which is practice of forbearance without fail in accordance with his vow; 2) the foundation of abandoning, which is abandoning of wrong thoughts caused by wrong deeds and words of others; 3) the foundation of tranquillity, which is extinction of violent anger; 4) the foundation of wisdom, which is wisdom playing a dominant role. Having enjoyed the benefit of these four foundations; the Bodhisatta keeps on developing the perfection of forbearance more earnestly.
4. While in the course of fulfilling the perfection of energy, the Bodhisatta comes to enjoy the benefit accruing from: 1) The foundation of truthfulness, which is working for the welfare of others in accordance with his vow; 2) the foundation of abandoning, which is abandoning of slackness and inefficiency; 3) the foundation of tranquillity, which is extinction of harm caused by demerit; 4) the foundation of wisdom, which is wisdom playing a dominant role. Having enjoyed the benefit of these four foundations; the Bodhisatta keeps on developing the perfection of energy more earnestly.

5. While in the course of fulfilling the perfection of meditation, the Bodhisatta comes to enjoy the benefit accruing from: 1) The foundation of truthfulness, which is thinking deeply about and seeking the welfare of the world in accordance with his vow; 2) the foundation of abandoning, which is abandoning of demeritorious hindrances (nīvaraṇa); 3) the foundation of tranquillity which is peace of mind; 4) the foundation of wisdom which is wisdom playing a dominant role. Having enjoyed the benefit of these four foundations, the Bodhisatta keeps on developing the perfection of meditation more earnestly.
6. While in the course of fulfilling the perfection of wisdom, the Bodhisatta comes to enjoy the benefit accruing from: 1) The foundation of truthfulness, which is skill in means and ways of [100] promoting the welfare of others in accordance with his vow; 2) the foundation of abandoning, which is abandoning of wrong paths and actions; 3) the foundation of tranquillity, which is extinction of all forms of worries and anxieties caused through one's ignorance; 4) the foundation of wisdom, which is wisdom playing a dominant role. Having enjoyed the benefit of these four foundations, the Bodhisatta keeps on developing the perfection of wisdom more earnestly.

In this manner, with every act of merit in fulfilment of the perfections, there occur the four foundations; hence it is said that the six perfections may be included in the four foundations.

The Four Foundations as One Foundation

Just as the six perfections (pāramī) are included in the four foundations (adhiṭṭhāna), so also each of the four foundations may be counted as embracing the remaining three.

Just like the foundation of truthfulness (saccādhīṭṭhāna); the foundation of abandoning (cāgādhīṭṭhāna), the foundation of tranquillity (upasamādhīṭṭhāna) and the foundation of wisdom (paññādhīṭṭhāna), being of the nature of faithful performance in keeping with the vow, may be included in the foundation of truthfulness.

Just like the foundations of abandoning; truthfulness, tranquillity and wisdom being of the nature of abandoning of opposing factors, and being the result of total relinquishing, may be included in the foundation of abandoning.

Just like the foundations of abandoning; truthfulness, tranquillity and wisdom, being of the nature of the extinction of all the heat caused by one's deeds and defilements, may be included in the foundation of tranquillity.

So too the foundations of truthfulness; abandoning and tranquillity, following wisdom as their leader, may be included in the foundation of wisdom.

How the Foundations Bring Benefits

Thus all the perfections have their commencement with the foundation of truthfulness; they become manifest through the foundation of abandoning; they grow and prosper through the foundation of tranquillity, and by means of the foundation of wisdom, they distance themselves from defilements and become purified of all of them.

Furthermore, in the first phase of the perfections, the foundation of truthfulness plays a leading role; only with the foundation of truthfulness, fulfilment of the perfections can be commenced. In the middle phase, the foundation of abandoning takes the leading role; having commenced the fulfilment of the perfections with the foundation of truthfulness, it is continued in the middle phase by sacrificing totally one's body and life for the welfare of others through the foundation of abandoning. In the final phase, the foundation of tranquillity takes over the leadership; only with the extinction of all the suffering of Saṃsāra, the task of fulfilling the perfections comes to an end.

The foundation of wisdom is supreme throughout all the three phases of the beginning, the middle and the end. Only with wisdom can fulfilment of the perfections be commenced, total abandoning of one's body and life can be made and final cessation of suffering of Saṃsāra can take place.

All four foundations constantly promote the welfare of oneself and of others and cause one to be highly revered and loved by everyone. Of these four, through the foundation of truthfulness and the foundation of abandoning, the Bodhisatta, as a layman, benefits others with material gifts; and through the foundation of tranquillity and the foundation of wisdom, the Bodhisatta, as an ascetic, benefits others with the gift of Dhamma.

Through the foundation of truthfulness, purification of morality is effected; through the foundation of abandoning, purification of livelihood; through the foundation of tranquillity, purification of mind; and through the foundation of wisdom, purification of knowledge.

In addition, through the foundation of truthfulness, because he does not deviate from truth, he does not follow the wrong course of hatred; through the foundation of abandoning, because he is not attached to sense objects, he does not follow the wrong course of greed; through the foundation of tranquillity, because he is faultless and since there is nothing to be afraid of, he does not follow the wrong course of fear; and through the foundation of wisdom, because he sees things as they really are, he does not follow the wrong course of delusion.

Furthermore, through the foundation of truthfulness, he can tolerate, without anger, inconveniences caused by cold, heat, hunger; by contact with gadflies, mosquitoes, flies, wind, sun, reptiles; annoying insults and abuses of others and distressing ailments. Through the foundation of abandoning, he makes use of the four requisites of robes, alms food, dwelling and medicine, without attachment arising from greed. Through the foundation of tranquillity, he avoids the dangers of wild elephants, wild horses, wild cattle, wild dogs, etc., remaining absolutely calm. Through the foundation of wisdom, he dispels, without delusion, wrong thoughts of sense pleasure, ill-will and cruelty as well as demeritorious factors.

Through the foundation of truthfulness, he achieves the happiness of renunciation; through the foundation of abandoning, of solitude; through the foundation of tranquillity, of peace; and through the foundation of wisdom, happiness associated with the fourfold knowledges of the path.

Through the foundation of truthfulness, he achieves the happiness of the first absorption (jhāna); through [104] the foundation of abandoning, of the second absorption; through the foundation of tranquillity, of the third absorption; through the foundation of wisdom, of the fourth absorption.

Thus it should be understood how all the perfections are included in the four foundations accompanied by various attributes.

How All the Perfections Are Counted As Two

Just as all the perfections are included in the four foundations they are also counted as two factors: compassion (karuṇā) and wisdom (paññā). True, it is only the virtues, such as giving, morality, etc., founded on compassion and wisdom which are the requisites for Perfect Self-Awakening resulting in attainment of omniscience.

This has explained how the 30 perfections are reduced to ten; how the ten perfections are reduced to six: giving, morality, forbearance, energy, meditation and wisdom; then how these six perfections are reduced to the four foundations; and finally, how all the perfections are reduced to two factors: compassion and wisdom.

13. What Factors Accomplish the Perfections?

To the question: “What are the factors for accomplishing the perfections?” the answer is:

1. Developing the four kinds of cultivation (bhāvanā).
2. Reflecting upon what oppose the perfections and dispelling them.
3. Surrendering oneself to the Buddha.

In short, the means for accomplishing the perfections are an extinction of self-love and development of love for other beings. To elaborate:

1. The four good means for accomplishing the perfections are development and accumulation of all the requisites, such as the perfections (pāramī), charity (cāga) and good conduct (cariyā), not omitting any of them with the sole aim of achieving omniscience (sabba-sambhāra-bhāvanā); with high esteem and reverence (sakkacca-bhāvanā); without interruption throughout all existence (nirantara-bhāvanā); throughout the long duration without slacking before he becomes a Buddha (cira-kāla-bhāvanā).
2. The Bodhisatta has to abandon beforehand all his personal possessions, even before alms seekers appear at his door, with the determination: “Offer I will, without wavering, my life, as well as the wealth and property that I possess, if people come to ask for them. I will make use of only what remains, after I have given!”

In this manner, he has made up his mind, in advance, to abandon whatever property he possesses. But there are four factors which hinder his giving them away (dāna-vinibandha):

1. Not being accustomed, in the past, to the practice of giving.
2. Not having sufficient quantity of things in his possession.
3. Things in his possession being too good to give away.
4. Worrying over the depletion of things in his possession.

1. Of these four hindrances, when the Bodhisatta possesses things to give away and alms seekers have arrived and yet the Bodhisatta's mind is not inclined to give, he realizes: "Surely, I was not accustomed to giving in the past; therefore the desire to give does not arise in me now in spite of such favourable circumstances."

Then he reflects: "Although the desire to give does not arise in me, I will make a gift so that I will get accustomed to giving and take delight in it. From now on, I will make generous offerings. Have I not already decided to give all my belongings to those who seek alms?" [105]

Having reflected thus, he gives them away freely and gladly. On making such gifts, the Bodhisatta removes the first hindrance of "not being accustomed in the past to the practice of giving."

2. When not having a sufficient quantity of things in his possession, the Bodhisatta reflects: "Because I have not practised giving in the past, I suffer from a shortage of things. I should therefore make an offering of whatever I have, whether they are few or inferior, even if it makes my life more difficult. With such gifts I will in future reach the height of the perfection of generosity."

Having reflected thus, he gives away freely and gladly whatever material gift he comes by. On making such gifts, the Bodhisatta removes the second hindrance of "not having sufficient quantity of things in his possession."

3. When not inclined to give because of the excellent quality of things in his possession, the Bodhisatta reflects: "Good man, have you not aspired to the noblest, the most admirable, Supreme Awakening? To achieve this it is only proper that you should make the noblest, the most admirable gift."

Having reflected thus, he makes an offering of the most excellent, delightful object, freely and gladly. On making such gifts, the Bodhisatta removes the third hindrance of “things in his possession being too good to give away.”

4. When the Bodhisatta sees the depletion of material gifts on giving them away, he reflects: “To be subjected to destruction and loss is the nature of wealth and possessions. It is because in the past I did not perform good deeds of giving, which never became depleted, that I now experience a deficiency of material gifts. I will make an offering of whatever objects I come to possess whether few or abundant. With such gifts, I will, in future, reach the height of the perfection of generosity.”

Having reflected thus, the Bodhisatta gives away whatever material gifts he comes by, freely and gladly. On making such gifts, the Bodhisatta removes the fourth hindrance of “worrying over the depletion of things in his possession.”

Removing hindrances to giving in this manner, by reflecting upon them in whatever way is appropriate, constitutes a good means of fulfilling the perfection of generosity.

This same method applies to the other perfections such as morality, forbearance, etc.

3. In addition, the Bodhisatta surrenders himself, in the first instance, to the Buddha saying: “I dedicate this individuality to the Buddhas, (imāhaṃ atta-bhāvaṃ Buddhānaṃ niyyādemi).” This self-surrender, made in advance to the Buddhas, is a good means of fulfilling all the perfections.

The Bodhisatta, who has already surrendered himself to the Buddhas, reflects: “I have given up this individuality to the Buddhas come what may.” When he encounters troubles, which may endanger his body and life and which are difficult to endure, or when he meets with painful injury, which is caused by beings and which may deprive him of his life, while striving to fulfil the perfections in various existences. Having reflected thus, he remains absolutely unshaken, unmoved, in the face of troubles that may harm even his life and he is fully determined to accumulate the merit of good deeds forming the perfections. In this way, self-surrender made in advance to the Buddha is a good means of fulfilling all the perfections.

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2591

Again to state briefly, the means for accomplishing the perfections are extinction of self-love and development of love and compassion for other beings.

By fully understanding the true nature of all phenomena the Bodhisatta who aspires [106] after omniscience remains untainted with craving, conceit and wrong view regarding them. By viewing his individuality as a mere aggregate of natural phenomena, self-adoration and self-esteem get diminished and exhausted day by day.

By repeated development of great compassion he looks upon all beings as his own children; his loving-kindness or affection, and his compassion or sympathy for them grow and prosper more and more.

Therefore, the Bodhisatta, who has put away stinginess, and other defilements, which are opposed to the perfections, after being momentarily freed from greed, hatred, and delusion in regard to himself and others, helps beings with the four objects of support (saṅgaha-vatthu): generosity (dāna), kindly speech (piya-vācā), beneficial conduct (attha-cariyā) and impartiality (samānattatā), which always accompany the four foundations. He then assists them with the three “conveyances” of practice: morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) which lead to the three kinds of Awakening, causing those who have not entered the conveyances to enter them, or those who have done so to reach maturity therein.

True, the Bodhisatta’s compassion and wisdom are adorned by the act of generosity, which is one of the four objects of support. Compassion and wisdom never manifest by themselves without giving. They both manifest simultaneously, as acts of generosity are performed. Generosity is adorned by kindly speech, for the Bodhisatta never scolds or yells while performing generosity to those who come for alms and to the attendants, but speaks only loveable, kind words. Kindly speech is adorned by the object of beneficial conduct, for the Bodhisatta speaks kind words not for mere superficial pleasantness but only with sincere, good intentions to serve the interest of others. Fulfilling the requisites of Awakening: the perfections (pāramī), charity (cāga), and good conduct (cariya), means practising for the welfare of beings; it is therefore beneficial conduct as one of the four objects of support. Beneficial conduct is adorned by a sense of impartiality, for in fulfilling the requisites of Awakening, the Bodhisatta treats all beings as his equal under all circumstances, happy or painful.

The First Treatise on the Perfections – 2592

When he becomes a Buddha, his function of taming and teaching is accomplished by benefitting all beings with these same four objects of support which have been developed to the utmost through fulfilment of the four foundations.

For the Buddha, the act of generosity is brought to completion by the foundation of abandoning; kindly speech by the foundation of truthfulness; beneficial conduct by the foundation of wisdom; and a sense of equality by the foundation of tranquillity.

Concerning these four foundations and four objects of support, the commentary on the Cariyā-piṭaka gives four verses eulogizing the attributes of the Buddha (CpA, PTS 329):

Sacco cāgī upasanto paññavā anukampako, sambhata-sabba-sambhāro kaṃ nāmatthaṃ na sādhaye.

The Buddha, who has reached the height of accomplishment in the fourfold foundation of truthfulness, who is fully accomplished in the foundation of abandoning, who has extinguished the fires of the defilements, who is possessed of omniscience and who looks after beings with great compassion, being equipped with all the requisites of the foundations, what is there that he cannot achieve?

Maha-kāruṇiko Satthā hitesī ca upekkhako, nirapekkho ca sabbattha, aho acchariyo Jino.

The Buddha, as the teacher of Devas and humans, being a person of great [107] compassion, seeks the welfare of beings till their realization of Nibbāna. He remains equanimous when faced with the vicissitudes of life. Free from craving for, and attachment to, everything within his body or without, how wonderful is the Buddha who conquers the five deaths (māra).

The five deaths (māra): 1) The Deva who challenged the Buddha for position on the seat of wisdom by surrounding him with a huge army of his followers (Deva-putta-māra); 2) the mental defilements (kilesa-māra); 3) the volitions which lead to rebirth (abhisankhāra-māra); 4) the aggregates of mind and matter (nāma-rūpa) which materialize in all the existences before the attainment of Nibbāna (khandha-māra); and 5) death (maccu-māra).

Viratto sabba-dhammesu sattesu ca upekkhako, sadā sattahite yutto, aho acchariyo Jino.

Though detached from all things, and though keeping a balanced mind towards all beings, still he applies himself, day and night, to the welfare of beings. How wonderful is the Buddha who conquers the five deaths (māra)!

Sabbadā sabba-sattānaṃ hitāya ca sukhāya ca, uyyutto akilāsū ca, aho acchariyo Jino.

Always working for the welfare and happiness of all beings, viz. humans, Devas and Brahmas, and attending to the five duties of a Buddha, day and night without ceasing, still he does not show any sign of fatigue or weariness. How wonderful is the Buddha who conquers the five deaths (māra)!

14. How Long Does It Take to Accomplish the Perfections?

To the question: “How long does it take to accomplish the perfections?” the answer is: The minimum period required for fulfilling the perfections is four immeasurable periods (asaṅkhyeyya) and 100,000 aeons (kappa); the medium period, eight immeasurables and 100,000 aeons; and the maximum period, sixteen immeasurables and 100,000 aeons, after receiving the definite prophecy of becoming a Buddha. Only after fulfilling the perfections for such durations can one become a Buddha.

The three different durations relate to three different Bodhisattas,<sup>402</sup> namely, the Bodhisatta with the factor of predominant wisdom (paññādhika); the Bodhisatta with the factor of predominant faith (saddhādhika); and the Bodhisatta with the factor of predominant energy (viriyādhika).

The Bodhisatta with the factor of predominant wisdom takes four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons; the Bodhisatta with the factor of predominant faith takes eight immeasurables and 100,000 aeons; and the Bodhisatta with the factor of predominant energy takes sixteen immeasurables and 100,000 aeons to fulfil the perfections completely.

To the question: “All of them being Bodhisattas, why are there three different durations for fulfilment of the perfections?” the answer is: A Bodhisatta with the factor of predominant wisdom is weak in faith but strong in wisdom; a Bodhisatta with the factor of predominant faith is strong in faith but medial in wisdom; a Bodhisatta with the factor of predominant energy is weak in wisdom. It is only through the power of wisdom that one attains omniscience. When wisdom is strong, attainment of omniscience is fast; when it is weak, the attainment is slow. This difference in the degree of strength of wisdom accounts for the difference in the duration required for the fulfilment of the perfections.

Secondary (apare) teachers say the difference between the three durations lies in the three degrees of energy: strong, medial and weak. Again, other (aññe) teachers say it is due to the difference in degrees i.e., strong, medial and weak, of maturity of the perfections leading to emancipation (vimutti-paripācanīya-dhamma). Of these three views, that of the commentator appears most appropriate when we consider the divisions of Bodhisattas into three types.

15. What Advantages Accrue from the Perfections?

To the question: “What are the advantages that accrue from the perfections?” the answer in brief is: The advantages accruing from the perfections are not being reborn in Avīci, and so on.

The advantages accruing from the perfections are not being reborn in the eighteen [109] existences (abhabbaṭṭhāna), such as Avīci, and so on, which was dealt with in The Eighteen Impossible Births in the Miscellaneous Topics of the Further Explanations above; the ability to practise for the welfare of the sentient world; the 20 marvels as described in the Discourse on the Marvellous and the Wonderful (Acchariya-abbhutā-sutta, MN 123); fulfilment of all the Bodhisattas’ wishes; and all other benefits, such as proficiency in arts and crafts, etc., as shown in various Birth Stories (Jātaka) and the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) and the like.

The benefits concerning the fifteen pairs of perfections mentioned in Section 12 above. “What is the Synopsis of the Perfections?” are also to be taken as advantages that accrue from the perfections.

Furthermore, the following are also the advantages that derive from the perfections: from the time of aspiring to becoming a Buddha, the Bodhisatta, wishing for the welfare of all beings, becomes like a father to them. Possessing distinguished qualities, he is worthy of offerings, worthy of homage. He is like an excellent field for sowing seeds of merit. He is dearly loved by Devas and humans. Because his heart is filled with loving-kindness and compassion he is not harmed by wild beasts, such as lions, leopards, tigers, etc. Being a person possessed of extraordinary merit wherever he is reborn, he surpasses others in beauty, fame, happiness, strength and sovereignty. He is free from ailments. He has very pure faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom. He has few defilements and therefore he is easy to admonish. He is patient. He takes delight in good deeds. He shows neither anger nor malice, nor does he denigrate others. He is not given to rivalry, envy, jealousy, craftiness, hypocrisy. He is not haughty, nor arrogant. He is calm. He is mindful of merit. Bearing with patience the torments of others, he does not cause suffering to them. Wherever he resides, whether in a town, a village, or a district, the place is free from dangers and calamities. Whenever he is born through unfortunate circumstances in the planes of misery such as in the Ussada Niraya – as he was in one existence before he was born as Prince Temiya – unlike other inhabitants there, he is not distressed by intense suffering but develops even more and more a sense of spiritual urgency.

Furthermore, the accomplishment of the lifespan (āyu-sampadā), the accomplishment of physical form (rūpa-sampadā), the accomplishment of family (kula-sampadā), the accomplishment of supremacy (issariya-sampadā), the acceptability of speech (adeyya-vacanatā) and the greatness of power (mahānubhāvātā) are also the advantages of the perfections.

The accomplishment of lifespan (āyu-sampadā) is longevity in whatever existence he is reborn. With this accomplishment, the Bodhisatta finishes whatever wholesome deed he has begun and develops greater meritoriousness.

The accomplishment of physical form (rūpa-sampadā) is beauty of physical form. With this accomplishment, the Bodhisatta inspires beings, who appreciate and value beauty of physical form, with confidence and esteem in him.

The accomplishment of family (kula-sampadā) is rebirth in a high class family. With this accomplishment he is approached even by those intoxicated with the vanity of their birth, etc.; he can therefore instruct them in order to cleanse them of their pride.

The accomplishment of supremacy (issariya-sampadā) is greatness of wealth, greatness of power and greatness of retinue. By means of this accomplishment, the Bodhisatta is able to confer benefits, together with the four objects of support, on those who deserve them or restrain righteously those who need to be restrained.

The acceptability of speech (adeyya-vacanaṭā) is being a person whose words are trustworthy. With this accomplishment, the Bodhisatta is relied upon like a great pair of scales, a standard of impartiality whose authority cannot be disregarded.

The greatness of power (mahānubhāvataṭā) is the magnitude of power. With this accomplishment he remains unvanquished by others, while he overcomes them righteously.

In this manner, all the accomplishments, such as longevity, etc., are the advantages which accrue from the perfections. These in themselves are the cause for the growth of immeasurable requisites of merit and the means by which beings enter the three vehicles [110] and by which those who have done so reach maturity.

16. What is the Fruit of the Perfections?

To the question: “What is the fruit of the perfections?” the answer briefly is: The fruit of the perfections is the Buddha’s innumerable attributes headed by the path-knowledge of an Arahata (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) and omniscience which is Supreme Awakening; that is to say, his becoming a Buddha is the fruit of the perfections.

To elaborate, it is the acquisition of the physical body (rūpa-kāya) adorned with many attributes, such as the 32 characteristics of a Great Man, the 80 minor marks which was given in detail in the Chronicle of Buddha Gotama, the aura emanating from his body extending up to 80 cubits even in the total darkness of the four conditions,<sup>403</sup> the acquisition of the Dhamma body (Dhamma-kāya) which is founded on the physical body and which is glorious with innumerable attributes, such as the ten powers<sup>404</sup> (dasa-bala-ñāṇa), the fourfold valorous wisdom<sup>405</sup> (catu-vesārajja-ñāṇa); the sixfold unique wisdom<sup>406</sup> (cha-asādhāraṇa-ñāṇa); and eighteen unique qualities of a Buddha (āveṇika-dhamma). What are the eighteen?

1. Having no hindrance with regard to knowledge of the past.
2. Having no hindrance with regard to knowledge of the present.
3. Having no hindrance with regard to knowledge of the future.
4. Being preceded by wisdom in all physical actions.
5. Being preceded by wisdom in all verbal actions.
6. Being preceded by wisdom in all mental actions.
7. Having no falling off in intention.
8. Having no falling off in energy.
9. Having no falling off in concentration.
10. Having no falling off in wisdom.
11. Having no falling off in teaching the Dhamma.
12. Having no falling off in emancipation.
13. Not indulging in joking and laughter.
14. Not making blunders.
15. Having nothing which cannot be gauged by wisdom.
16. Having nothing which needs to be attended to in a hurry.
17. Never being negligent.
18. Not undertaking anything without due reflection.

So numerous are the attributes of a Buddha that even another Buddha, devoting all his time to nothing else but dwelling on the virtues of that Buddha for the whole of his life, cannot finish describing them.

All such attributes of a Buddha are the fruit of his perfections. At this point, in order to arouse devotional faith and appreciation of the innumerable, inestimable attributes of the Buddha, and to let the reader of this treatise develop merit which is conducive to wisdom, I shall conclude this chapter by reproducing the three verses with their meanings, recited in honour of Buddha Anomadassī by Suruci the recluse, who later become Ven. Sāriputta (from Apadāna, Buddha-vaggo 220-222, PTS 1.20).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections

Miscellany

The Order of the Perfections

With [1516] regard to the perfection of generosity, it is clearly stated in the Pāli canon concerning the Chronicles of the Buddhas that the Bodhisatta Sumedha admonished himself to start forth with the practice of the perfection of generosity since the Bodhisattas of the past had done so. It is clearly seen, therefore, that amongst the ten perfections, perfection of giving or generous giving demands the highest priority for fulfilment.

But in the Discourse about the Tangle (Jaṭā-sutta, SN 1.23.2) we find the verse: Sīle patiṭṭhāya naro sapañño, in which the Buddha explains that: “When a person of mature wisdom [1517] has three root-conditions of greedlessness, hatelessness, undeludedness, and is well established in morality,” he ardently develops concentration and insight wisdom and can unravel the tangled network of craving. Here, the Buddha mentions only the three trainings: morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā); there is not even a hint about the practice of generosity.

Furthermore, as the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga), which is the expository treatise of the single verse quoted above, does not touch upon the subject of generosity, and as the noble path of eight constituents which leads to Nibbāna includes the paths concerning morality, concentration and wisdom only, and there is no path including generosity, some people misconstrue it, thinking that generosity is not regarded by the Buddhas as essential, that it is not conducive to the attainment of Nibbāna, that it generates more rebirths in the cycle of existence and, as such, generosity should not be cultivated.

The well-known minister of King Mindon, U Hlaing of Yaw, went so far as to write in his book the Taste of Liberation (Vimutti-rasa), that the Buddha taught generosity only for the sake of very ordinary people such as a rich man’s son, Siṅgāla.

There are many Buddhists who are offended by such observations as “generosity should not be cultivated” and who are indignant at Yaw minister’s writing that “the Buddha taught generosity only for the sake of very ordinary people.” But mere dislike of such views and indignation with them serves no purpose. What is more important and helpful is to understand correctly what the Buddha means by his teaching.

Concerning the aforesaid verse of the Discourse about the Tangle (Jaṭā-sutta, SN 1.23), what one should understand the true meaning of the Buddha's discourse is as follows: This discourse was taught by the Buddha for the benefit of those superior persons who are capable of striving hard for the complete eradication of defilements, for the attainment of Awakening in the present life, with no more rebirth. If such a superior person actually strives hard for the attainment of Awakening in this very life and if, as a consequence of his strenuous efforts, he becomes an Arahāt, there is no need for him to be reborn in a new life.

Generosity is an act which generates new life, new pleasures; for the person who will break the circle of the existence in this very life, there will be no more rebirths. Since there will be no new life for him to reap the benefits of generosity, acts of giving by him are unnecessary. That is why the Buddha, for the benefit of superior persons, dwells in this discourse of the Collection of the Thematic Discourses (Saṃyutta-nikāya) mainly on morality, concentration and wisdom which are more important than generosity for the purpose of the eradication of the defilements. But the Buddha does not at all say that generosity should not be cultivated.

Generosity has the quality of making the mind and heart pliable. When someone makes a generous offer of some gift, the very act of giving serves as a decisive support (upanissaya-paccaya) to make the mind more pliable and ready for the observance of precepts, for the cultivation of concentration, and for the development of wisdom through the practice of insight (vipassanā) meditation.

It is within the experience of every Buddhist that a feeling of awkwardness and embarrassment arises in him whenever he visits, without an offering, monasteries or temples for the purpose of keeping precepts, of listening to Dhamma talks, or for the practice of meditation. Therefore, it was customary for the noble disciples like Visākhā to bring an offering, such as rice, sweets or fruits in the morning and beverages and medicinal preparations in the evening, whenever she visited the Buddha.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2601

Everyone who does not become an Arahāt in this life will go through more rounds in the cycle of existence. In doing so, it will be difficult for them to attain favourable states of existence without practising generosity in the present life. Even if they happen to gain a good rebirth, they will find themselves lacking in material possessions, without which they cannot do meritorious deeds.

In such a case, it may be argued that they could devote themselves to the practice of morality, concentration and wisdom. But this is easier [1518] said than done. Indeed, it is only with the support of the beneficial results of past deeds of generosity that the three trainings of morality, concentration and wisdom can be cultivated successfully.

Therefore, it is most important for those who still have to go on this long journey in Saṃsāra, the cycle of existence, to cultivate generosity. Only when one is equipped with the “provisions for a long journey,” namely, generosity, then only can one reach a good destination, and while there, possessing material wealth as the fruits of the generosity of past lives, one can devote oneself to the pursuit of whatever meritorious deeds one wishes to.

Among the travellers in the round of this cycle of Saṃsāra, Bodhisattas are the greatest individuals. After receiving a definite prophecy from a Buddha of his becoming a Buddha, a Bodhisatta continues to fulfil the perfections for the attainment of omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) for four immeasurable aeons plus 100,000 aeons. A Paccekabuddha, i.e., a non-teaching Buddha, had to fulfil his perfections for two immeasurable aeons plus 100,000 aeons; a Chief Disciple (Agga-sāvaka) for one immeasurable aeon plus 100,000 aeons; and one of the leading disciples (mahā-sāvaka) for 100,000 aeons. Therefore, for Bodhisattas, who are great travellers on the long journey of Saṃsāra, perfection of generosity is of primary importance, and as such, a place of prominence is given to steadfast fulfilment of the perfection of generosity in the Pāḷi texts concerning the Chronicles of the Buddhas.

Thus, as the discourse in the Discourse about the Tangle (Jaṭā-sutta, SN 1.23), was addressed to individuals who are ripe for attainment of Awakening, those who have not yet fulfilled the perfections should not say that the perfection of generosity is not essential.

Those are some who ask if it is possible to attain Nibbāna by practising only generosity. It may be replied that, practising only one perfection by itself, neither generosity, nor morality, nor meditation, will result in the attainment of Nibbāna. For practising generosity alone implies that it is not accompanied by morality nor by meditation. Similarly, practising meditation alone means that it is practised without the support of morality and generosity. When not restrained by morality, one is liable to indulge in evil deeds. If such a person of evil habits attempts to practise meditation, his efforts will be futile like a good seed which, when put on red-hot iron, does not produce a sprout but turns to ashes. Thus, it should be noted that it is improper to speak of “practising generosity alone.”

The Recipient of Generosity

In the chapter on generosity in the Chronicles of the Buddhas, it is clearly stated that alms should be given irrespective of the recipient’s status, whether high, medium or low. In view of such a firm statement, it is neither desirable nor necessary to pick and choose the recipient when one makes an offering.

But in the Discourse giving an Analysis of Offerings (Dakkhiṇā-vibhaṅga-sutta, MN 142), the Buddha taught seven kinds of gifts to be made to the Saṅgha, the community of monastics, and fourteen kinds of gift to be made to individual recipients. It is pointed out with regard to the fourteen kinds of gifts made to individual recipients, the merit gained increases according to the recipient, going up from the lowliest animals to the highest beings; the most meritorious gift is, of course, that made to the community of monastics.

Again, in the Story about the Peta Aṅkura (Peta-vatthu, Pv 21), we find the story of two Devas. When the Buddha taught the Abhidhamma while being seated on Sakka’s throne in the abode of Tāvātimsa, two Devas, Indaka and Aṅkura, went to listen to the discourse. Whenever powerful Devas arrived, Aṅkura had to make way for them and move back until he was ten leagues away from the Buddha.

But Indaka remained in his seat; he did not have to move. The reason is as follows: At the time when the human lifespan was 10,000 years, Aṅkura was a human being and was very rich. Throughout that life he made offerings of meals to large numbers of ordinary people, cooking the meals on fireplaces which stretched for twelve leagues. Because of the merit gained, he had taken rebirth as a Deva. Indaka, however, became a Deva because he had offered a spoonful of rice to Arahat Anuruddha.

Although the offering Indaka had made was just a spoonful of rice, as the recipient was an [1519] Arahat, the merit he acquired was great and noble. Thus, as an equal of the powerful Devas, he did not have to make way for them. On the other hand, although Aṅkura had made large amounts of gifts over a very long period of time, the recipients were worldlings and consequently the beneficial result that accrued was not of a high order. And he had to move back every time a powerful Deva arrived. Therefore, we find in the Pāḷi text the exhortation (Pv 329): “When an offering is to be made, the one who can bring the greatest benefit should be chosen as the recipient (viceyya dānaṃ dātabbam yattha dinnam mahapphalam).” There seems to be a contradiction between the Pāḷi text of the Chronicles of the Buddhas and the discourses such as the Discourse giving an Analysis of Offerings (Dakkhiṇā-vibhaṅga-sutta, MN 142), etc. and other Pāḷi texts. The seeming contradiction is easily resolved when one remembers that discourses such as the Discourse giving an Analysis of Offerings are meant for ordinary people or Devas, whereas the discussions in the Chronicles of the Buddhas are directed exclusively to the Bodhisattas, whose goal is attainment of omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa), or the Buddha-wisdom. This wisdom is only one kind and is not to be classified into low, medium or great wisdom.

A Bodhisatta has only to give away whatever he has to offer to whoever comes along to receive them, irrespective of his status whether high, medium or low. He does not have to consider thus: “This recipient is of low status; by making an offering to him, I shall gain only a low order of omniscience. This recipient is only of medium status; by making offerings to him, I shall gain omniscience merely of medium order.” Therefore, giving of alms to whoever comes along to receive them without any discrimination is the habitual practice of Bodhisattas, who are bent on attainment of omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa). On the other hand, the aim of ordinary worldlings, Devas or humans, in practising generosity is to gain worldly comforts of their liking, and as such, it is natural that they would choose the best recipient for their alms.

It may be concluded, therefore, that there is no contradiction between the texts in the Chronicles of the Buddhas, which are intended for the great Bodhisattas, and a discourse such as the Discourse giving an Analysis of Offerings, which is meant for ordinary people and Devas.

The Word Perfection

The possible meanings of the word pāramī have been variously explained in the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka) commentary. Just to let the reader have an idea:

Pāramī is the combination of parama and ī. Parama means “most excellent,” which is used here in the sense of Bodhisattas, who are the most excellent ones.

Or pāramī derives from the root para with the suffix ma. The root para means “to fulfil” or “to protect.” Because they fulfil and protect such virtues as alms giving (dāna), etc., Bodhisattas are called parama.

Or para, a prefix, is attached to the root mava, meaning “to bind.” Because Bodhisattas behave as though they bind on and attract other beings to them by means of special virtues, they are called parama.

Or param̃, a prefix is attached to the root maja meaning “to be pure;” param̃ means “more.” Because Bodhisattas are free of mental impurities and far purer than others, they are called parama.

Or param̃, a prefix, is attached to the root maya meaning “to go;” param means “superior.” Because Bodhisattas go to the superior state of Nibbāna in a special manner, they are called parama.

Or param̃, a prefix, is attached to the root mu meaning “to determine.” Because Bodhisattas determine their next existence as they do in the case of the present, they are called parama.

What this means to say is that as Bodhisattas are able to ascertain precisely what should be done to make the present existence pleasant and faultless, so are they able to do with regard to their next existence. That is, they have the ability to improve their existences.

Or param̃, a prefix, is attached to the root mi meaning “to put in;” param̃ means [1520] “more.” Because Bodhisattas “put in” more and more such virtues as morality (sīla), etc. in their mental process, they are called parama.

Or param̃ means “different from” or “opposed to;” the root is mi, meaning “to crush.” Because Bodhisattas crush all their enemies, which in the form of impurities, are different from and opposed to all virtues, so they are called parama.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2605

Or pāra, a noun, is attached to the root maja meaning “to purify;” pāra means “the other shore.” Here Saṃsāra is to be taken as “this shore” and Nibbāna as “the other shore.” Because Bodhisattas purify themselves as well as others on the other shore of Nibbāna, they are called pāramī.

Or pāra, a noun, is attached to the root mava, meaning “to bind” or “to put together.” Because Bodhisattas bind or put beings together in Nibbāna, they are called pāramī.

Or the root is maya, meaning “to go.” Because Bodhisattas go to the other shore of Nibbāna, they are called pāramī.

Or the root is mu, meaning “to understand.” Because Bodhisattas fully understand the other shore of Nibbāna as it really is, they are called pāramī.

Or the root is mi, meaning “to put in.” Because Bodhisattas put in and convey beings to the other shore of Nibbāna, they are called pāramī.

Or the root is mi, meaning “to crush.” Because Bodhisattas crush and eradicate in Nibbāna the impurities which are the enemies of being, they are called pāramī.

These are the various meanings presented in accordance with natural etymology (sabhāva-nirutti). They are not random attempts.

Paramānaṃ ayaṃ pāramī; pāramī means property in the form of practices of Bodhisattas; or paramānaṃ kammaṃ pāramī; pāramī means the duties of the Bodhisattas; paramissa bhāvo pāramitā paramissa kammaṃ pāramitā means duties that bring about knowledge that such a person is a Bodhisatta.

All this means: A series of duties such as giving (dāna) and others to be fulfilled by Bodhisattas are called pāramī (or pāramitā).

In the sub-commentary on the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra) it is said: The volition of alms giving, etc, which forms the way to Nibbāna, the other side of Saṃsāra, should be called perfection (pāraṃ nibbānaṃ ayan-ti gacchanti etāhī ti pāramiyo, nibbāna-sādhakā hi dāna-cetanādayo dhammā paramī ti vuccanti).

In the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka) commentary it is said: “Perfection is constituted by virtues, such as generosity, morality, etc., that are to be grasped by means of compassion and skill. Compassion is shown towards beings who are not spoiled or overwhelmed by craving, pride and wrong view (taṇhā-māna- diṭṭhīhi anupahatā karuṇūpāya-kosalla-pariggahita dānādayo guṇā pāramiyo.”

Skill means wisdom in seeking ways and means. Giving, morality, etc., that is to be guided by compassion and wisdom are to be named perfections.<sup>408</sup>

The ten perfections are:

1. Generosity (dāna), sometimes gifts, liberality or alms giving.
2. Morality or virtue (sīla).
3. Renunciation (nekkhamma).
4. Wisdom (paññā).
5. Energy (virīya).
6. Forbearance or patience (khantī).
7. Truthfulness (sacca).
8. Resolution or determination (adhiṭṭhāna). [1521]
9. Loving-kindness (mettā).
10. Equanimity (upekkhā).

Concerning these perfections, it has been mentioned in chapter II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha, that there are four kinds of cultivation of mind. One of these cultivations deals with the fact that from the time Bodhisattas receive definite assurance from a Buddha about their becoming a Buddha till the last rebirth when they actually become a completely Self-Awakened Buddha, there is no period in this very long interval in which they do not practise for the fulfilment of the ten perfections (pāramī), at the very least, they do not fail to fulfil the perfection of generosity. It fills us with devotional inspiration to reflect on these noble practices pursued by the Bodhisattas.

Characteristics, Functions, etc.

A person practising insight (vipassanā) meditation must come to know the nature of mind (nāma) and matter (rūpa) by means of their characteristics, functions, manifestations and proximate causes. Then only will he come to possess a clear view of them. Similarly, it is only when one knows the characteristics, functions, manifestations and proximate causes of the perfections that one will have a clear understanding of them. Therefore, we find in the commentary to the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka) a separate chapter on the characteristics, functions, manifestations and proximate causes of the perfections.<sup>409</sup>

A feature common to all the ten perfections is that they have the characteristic of serving the interest of others. Their function is providing assistance to others (kicca-rasa) and being endowed with steadfastness or prosperity, success, fulfilment (samāpatti-rasa). Their manifestation is the recurring phenomenon of the quest for the welfare and benefit of beings, or the recurring phenomenon of appearing in the mind of the Bodhisatta that it is a useful means of becoming a Buddha. Their proximate cause is great compassion, or great compassion and skilfulness as to means and ways.

It is necessary to provide a few explanations on the above definitions.

Characteristic (lakkhāṇa) has two aspects: the ordinary feature of each thing, i.e., the feature applicable to others also (samañña-sabhāva) and the peculiar feature, which is not applicable to others (visesa-sabhāva). For example, amongst the material qualities, the earth-element of the four great elements has two characteristics: impermanence and hardness. Of these, the characteristic of impermanence is a feature applicable to other elements and is thus an ordinary feature only (samañña-sabhāva), whereas the characteristic of hardness is the unique feature of the earth-element only, it is not shared by others, and is thus its special feature (visesa-sabhāva).

Function (rasa) has also two aspects to it, the function of what is to be performed (kicca-rasa) and fulfilment, attainment (sampatti-rasa). For example, when meritoriousness arises, it does so after counteracting or obliterating demeritoriousness. Thus, it is said that the function of meritoriousness is the counteracting of demeritoriousness. The final fulfilment of a meritorious act is production of beneficial results; thus the function of meritoriousness is the attainment of beneficial results.

Whenever a person ponders deeply on certain mind-objects, what usually appears in his mind relates to the nature of the mind-object under consideration, it relates to its function; it relates to its cause; it relates to its effect. The manifestations which thus appear in his mind concerning the mind-object he is thinking about is called its manifestation. For example, when a person starts to investigate: “What is meritoriousness?” it would appear in his mind, “meritoriousness is of the nature of purity” regarding its nature; “meritoriousness is that which counteracts or obliterates demeritoriousness” regarding its function; “meritoriousness is possible only when one associates with the good and virtuous” regarding its cause; “meritoriousness is that which enables the production of desirable results” regarding its fruition.

The immediate and the most powerful contributory factor for its arising is called the proximate cause. For example, of many factors which cause the arising of meritoriousness, a proper attitude of mind is the immediate and the most powerful contributory factor for its arising and is therefore termed its proximate cause (padaṭṭhāna) in the texts. [1522]

1. The Perfection of Generosity<sup>410</sup>

Two Kinds of Giving

The essential thing to know concerning the perfection of generosity (dāna-pāramī) is that anything which is given away or any act of giving is generosity (dāna). There are two kinds of giving:

1. Giving as an act of merit (puñña-visaya-dāna).
2. Giving in conformity with worldly practices (loka-visaya-dāna).

Acts of giving out of pure faith are deeds of merit (puñña-visaya-dāna) and only such givings constitute the perfection of generosity.

But gifts given in pursuit of love or out of anger, fear, or foolishness, etc. and even giving punishment, giving a sentence of death, are worldly giving. They do not form part of perfection of generosity.

<sup>410</sup> [Dāna is a particularly difficult word to cover with one word. Here I have translated it as generosity, giving, gifts and offerings, as appropriate.]

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2609

In connection with giving which would amount to an act of merit it is helpful to understand the differences and similarities between what is termed dāna, translated as “generosity,” and what is termed as pariccāga, translated as charity, or, renunciation through generosity.

In the Long Birth Story about the Golden Goose (Mahā-hamsa-jātaka, JA 534), an enumeration is given of the ten duties of a king: Generosity, morality, charity, justice, gentleness, self-control, not being angry, not being violent, forbearance, not being confrontational. We see therein that generosity and charity are listed separately.

According to the Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentary, there are ten objects which may be offered as alms: food, drink, transportation – which also includes such things as umbrellas, slippers or shoes, which are used while travelling – flowers, perfumed powder, scented unguent or ointment, beds, dwelling places, and facilities for lighting. The volition that prompts the giving of these alms constitutes generosity (dāna). The volition that accompanies the giving away of any other objects of alms is to be regarded as charity (pariccāga). Thus the differentiation here rests on the different kinds of the objects of alms.

But the sub-commentary of the Birth Stories (Jātaka), quoting the views of many teachers, says that “the giving of offerings with the prospect of enjoying good results in future lives is dāna; giving rewards to servants and service personnel, etc. in order to reap the benefits in the present life is pariccāga.”

A story that gives another illustration of the difference between generosity and charity is described in the commentary to the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka) and in the commentary to the Birth Stories (Ja 490). Briefly, the Bodhisatta was once a learned Brahmin by the name of Akitti. When his parents passed away, he was left with a vast accumulation of wealth. Deeply stirred by urgency, he reflected thus: “My parents and ancestors who have accumulated this great wealth have abandoned them and left, as for me, I shall gather only the substance of this accumulation and depart.” Then having obtained permission from the king, he had a drum beaten all over the country to proclaim the great gift he was going to make. For seven days, he personally gave away his riches but there still remained more.

He saw no point in presiding himself over the ceremony of distribution of his wealth, so leaving the doors of his mansion, treasure houses and granaries wide open, so that whoever wished might go and help themselves to whatever they liked, he renounced the worldly life and went away.

It may be said that in the above story, distribution of wealth personally by the Bodhisatta during the first seven days is an act of generosity (dāna), whereas abandoning of the remaining wealth after seven day's personal distribution is an act of charity (pariccāga). The reason for such distinction is that for an offering to be an act of generosity (dāna), four conditions must be fulfilled: 1) A supporter; 2) objects to offer; 3) a recipient actually present to receive; and 4) the volition to give. The wise man Akitti's distribution of wealth during the first seven days fulfils all these conditions. Hence, it is an [1523] act of generosity (dāna). After seven days had passed, he went away leaving his wealth before any recipient went near or arrived to actually receive the gifts. Hence, it is said that such offering should be regarded as charity.

In everyday practices which are not deeds of merit, when we give something to someone, we just say we “give;” the Pāli word is deti. But when we part with our property with the thought: “Let whoever wants it, take it; if no one wants it, then let it be,” it is not giving away but discarding or charity; in Pāli, it is not called dāna but cāga or pariccāga.

In short, when we hand over the possession of our property to another person, it is said to be given away or an act of generosity. When we relinquish the wish to possess the property which is our own, it is termed abandoning or discarding as one would cast aside anything which is of no more use.

Another method of differentiation is: Giving to noble persons is generosity (dāna); giving to persons of lower status is charity (pariccāga). Thus, when a king, in performance of the ten duties of a king, makes an offering to noble monastics, Brahmins, etc., it would be giving (dāna); when he offers alms to lowly beggars, it would be charity (pariccāga).

In this way, it should be noted how generosity (dāna) is distinguished from charity (pariccāga).

Where Giving and Charity are Similar

Although giving (dāna) and charity (pariccāga) are treated separately as in the list of the ten duties of a king, shown above, in ultimate truth, the two terms cannot be different from each other. When there is giving, there must be charity; when there is charity, there must be giving. The reason is that when an offering is made to a recipient, whether he is near or far, it is an act of giving (dāna). When the sense of ownership is banished from the mind at the time of giving, this relinquishment is charity (pariccāga). Thus, whenever someone makes a gift, it is always preceded by the thought: “I will not make use of it any more,” which implies charity. Therefore, with deeds of merit, there is charity (pariccāga) always accompanying giving (dāna).

In the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) also, in dealing with the ten perfections, the Buddha mentions only the perfection of generosity not the “perfection of charity (cāga)” because, as explained above, charity is included in an act of generosity. As the text of the Chronicles of the Buddhas deals only with the ultimate truth without considering the conventional usages, it mentions that making an offering to any recipients, whether of high, medium or low status, is generosity (dāna). It is incorrect to say that it is giving when an offering is made to a noble person and charity when the recipient is of low status.

Similarly, in the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) and other Pāli texts, we find the enumeration of the seven riches of a noble person as follows: faith, morality, knowledge, charity (cāga), wisdom, conscience about doing evil, and concern about doing evil. There is only charity (cāga) in the list; there is no mention of giving (dāna) here because it is understood that generosity is included in charity (cāga).

These are even examples where dāna and cāga are mentioned without any distinction, with identical meaning.

Where Giving Is Termed Charity

Although any act of giving may generally be described as a perfection of generosity, great offerings of extraordinary nature are described in the texts as great charity (mahā-pariccāga). The great charity which consist of the five kinds of relinquishing of possessions are listed differently in different commentaries.

Commentaries on the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya), the Collection of the Middle Length Discourses (Majjhima-nikāya) and the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) in explaining the meaning of the word Realised One (Tathāgata), list the great charities as follows:

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2612

1. Relinquishing of limbs. [1524]
2. Relinquishing of the eyes.
3. Relinquishing of wealth.
4. Relinquishing of a kingdom.
5. Relinquishing of wife and children.

The commentary to the Collection of the Middle Length Discourses (Majjhima-nikāya) in the exposition on the Short Discourse about the Lion's Roar (Cūḷa-sīha-nāda-sutta, MN 11) gives a different list:

1. Relinquishing of limbs.
2. Relinquishing of wife and children.
3. Relinquishing of a kingdom.
4. Relinquishing of one's life.
5. Relinquishing of the eyes.

The sub-commentary to the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) gives this list:

1. Relinquishing of one's life.
2. Relinquishing of the eyes.
3. Relinquishing of wealth.
4. Relinquishing of a kingdom.
5. Relinquishing of wife and children.

The sub-commentary to the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya), in exposition on the Long Discourse on the Traditions (Mahāpadāna-sutta, DN 14), gives this list:

1. Relinquishing of limbs.
2. Relinquishing of the eyes.
3. Relinquishing of one's body or life.
4. Relinquishing of a kingdom.
5. Relinquishing of one's wife and children.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2613

The commentary to the This-Saids (Iti-vuttaka), in its exposition of the Discourse on the Complete Understanding of Delusion (Moha-pariññā-sutta, Iti 21), gives this list:

1. Relinquishing of limbs.
2. Relinquishing of one's life.
3. Relinquishing of wealth.
4. Relinquishing of wife and children.
5. Relinquishing of a kingdom.

The commentary to the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) gives this list:

1. Relinquishing of limbs.
2. Relinquishing of one's life.
3. Relinquishing of wealth.
4. Relinquishing of a kingdom.
5. Relinquishing of wife and children.

The commentary to the Birth Story about the Great King Vessantara (Vessantara-jātaka, Ja 547) gives this list:

1. Relinquishing of wealth.
2. Relinquishing of limbs. [1525]
3. Relinquishing of children.
4. Relinquishing of wife.
5. Relinquishing of one's life.

The same list is found in the sub-commentary to the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra) but arranged in a different order.

Although each of the above lists is made up of slightly different items, it should be noted that the essentials are the same in all of them: external objects and one's own body. Under external objects, we find material things apart from one's own body, such as the relinquishing of wealth; relinquishing of wife and children, very dear to oneself; relinquishing of a kingdom, a most important treasure of one's own. With regard to the relinquishing of one's own body, it falls under two modes: One that does not endanger life, that is relinquishing of the limbs (aṅga-pariccāga), and the other endangers life, that is relinquishing of the eyes (nayana-pariccāga), or relinquishing of life (jīvita-pariccāga) and relinquishing of one's own body (atta-pariccāga). Here, it is explained giving one's own eyes or giving one's own body involves the risk of losing one's life, so these are considered to be essentially the same as giving one's life.

The great ceremony of offering performed by King Vessantara when he gave away seven kinds of objects, 100 each in number, is described by the commentary as Great Generosity (Mahā-dāna) and not as Great Charity (Mahā-pariccāga). But one can argue that this great offering can be considered as one of the five great charities: a great relinquishing of wealth.

Miscellaneous Notes on Giving or Generosity

For the edification of those aspirants who ardently strive for attainment of perfect Self-Awakening of a Buddha, or for the Self-Awakening of a Paccekabuddha, or for the Awakening of a disciple of a Buddha, we provide herewith miscellaneous notes on different aspects of generosity, which forms a part of the conditions for obtaining Awakening. These notes are given in the form of answers to the following questions:

1. What things are called generosity?
2. Why are they called generosity?
3. What are the characteristics, functions, etc., of generosity?
4. How many types of generosity are there?
5. What elements strengthen the beneficial results of generosity?
6. What elements weaken the beneficial results of generosity?

This form of treatment will be adhered to when dealing with the other perfections too.

1. What Things Are Called Generosity?

In brief, it should be answered that “the volition to give a suitable thing” is called generosity. The meaning will become clearer in the following passages.

2. Why Are They Called Generosity?

The volition is called generosity because it is responsible for an act of giving to take place. There can be no generosity without the volition to give; an act of generosity is possible only when there is the volition to give.

In this connection, by volition is meant:

1. The volition that arises at the time of making a donation, a relinquishing volition (muñca-cetanā). Here, muñca means relinquishing. It is only this volition which accompanies the act of relinquishing that forms the true element of generosity.
2. The volition that arises in anticipation before one makes the donation [1526] (pubba-cetanā). This type of volition can also be considered as generosity, provided that the object to be given is at hand at the time that the intention to make an offering of the object occurs. Without the object to be given being actually in one's possession, cherishing the thought of generosity may be called preceding intention (pubba-cetanā) but cannot qualify as generosity; it can only be a benevolent thought of ordinary merit.

How volition comes to be taken as synonymous with giving is based on the grammatical definition of: That which prompts giving is generosity (dīyati anenā ti dānam).” Volition, here, is definitely the determining cause of generosity.

Things to be given are also called dāna from the grammatical definition: Objects which could be offered as alms (dīyatī ti dānam).

Following these grammatical definitions, the texts of the canon mention two kinds of generosity: volitional generosity and material generosity. In this connection, questions have been asked why objects to be offered are called generosity, since only volition is capable of producing results and material objects are not. It is true that only volition is productive of results because volition is a mental action but as explained above, volition can be called generosity only if it arises when there exist suitable things to be given. Therefore, a material object for giving is also an important contributory factor for an act of giving to qualify as generosity (dāna).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2616

For example, we say “rice is cooked because of the firewood.” Actually, it is the fire that cooks the rice. But there can be no fire without firewood. So fire burns because of firewood, and rice is cooked because of fire. Thus, taking into consideration these connected phenomena, it is not incorrect to say “rice is cooked because of firewood.” Similarly, we can rightly say “beneficial results are obtained because of objects of offering.”

Because things to be given away feature importantly in deeds of generosity, the canonical texts mention different types of generosity, depending on different objects to be offered. Thus, in expositions on the Vinaya, we find four kinds of generosity, since the Buddha allows four kinds of requisites to the Saṅgha, the offerings made to the Saṅgha are naturally listed under these four kinds, so there is this classification in the Vinaya expositions of four types of generosity, which is primarily based upon different kinds of objects of offering.

According to the classification in the exposition on the Abhidhamma, everything in the world comes under six categories, which correspond to the six sense objects, there are six kinds of generosity depending upon whether it is a gift of a visible object, sound, smell, taste, touch or mind-object. Here also, although there is no direct mention of the six kinds of generosity in the Abhidhamma teachings, if gifts were to be made of each of the sense objects, there would be six kinds of offering; hence this classification in the Abhidhamma expositions of six types of generosity.

In the Dhamma classification, there are ten kinds of generosity: offerings of various kinds of food, drink, transportation, flowers, perfumed powder, scented unguent or ointment, beds, dwelling places and facilities of lighting. Here again, the actual teaching in the discourses relates only to the ten classes of objects which may be offered as alms. But when these ten objects are offered as alms, there would be then ten kinds of offering; hence this classification in the discourses is of ten types of giving.

Maintaining that the Buddha teaches only these ten objects of offering, one should not consider that these are the only gifts to be given and that other gifts are not allowable. One should understand that the Buddha merely mentions the ten things most commonly offered as alms in practice; or as any material thing can be classified as belonging to one or the other of the ten types of gifts, one should take it that by these ten objects are covered also, as is any object which is in daily use by the noble recipient.

From what has been said above, it should be well noted how a material object is an important contributory factor for the arising of volitional generosity. It will be seen that the various types of generosity which will be described henceforth include many that relate to objects of offerings.

As a resume of this chapter, it should be remembered that volition is dāna because it [1527] prompts generosity; the material thing is dāna because it is a suitable thing to give.

3. Characteristics, Functions, etc., of Generosity

1. Generosity has the characteristic (lakkhana) of charity (cāga).
2. Its function (kicca-rasa) is the destruction of attachment to the objects offered; or it has the property of faultlessness (sampatti-rasa).
3. Its manifestation is absence of attachment, a sense of freedom from attachment that appears in the mind of the supporter, or knowing that generosity is conducive to good destinations and wealth; on thinking of the effects of generosity, the supporter senses that his act of generosity will result in an attainment of rebirth in the human or Deva realm and an attainment of great wealth.
4. The proximate cause of giving is having the objects offered in one's possession. Without having anything to give, there can be no act of generosity, only imagining that one gives. Thus objects to be offered are the proximate cause of dāna.

4. How Many Types of Generosity are There?

The subject to be dealt with under this topic is quite vast and it entails considerable exercise of mental alertness and intelligence to study them.

Gifts in Groups of Two

1. Material Gifts and Gifts of the Teaching

There are gifts of material things (āmisā-dāna) and gifts of the teaching (Dhamma-dāna).

Offering of material things, such as alms rice, is known as material offerings (āmisā-dāna). It is also called offerings of support (paccaya-dāna) when the things offered are the requisites of monastics.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2618

Teaching the Dhamma in the form of talks, lectures, etc. is giving the gift of Dhamma. The Buddha said that this is the noblest of all types of giving.

This classification of giving into two types is made according to the objects offered.

In relation to this division of types of giving, it is necessary to look into the question of what type of giving accrues to one who erects relic shrines (stūpa) and statues of Buddha.

There are some who maintain that although making shrines and statues of Buddha involves relinquishing a large amount of wealth, it cannot be an act of generosity (dāna) because they say for an act of giving to become dāna, three conditions must be fulfilled: 1) There must be a recipient; 2) there must be an object for offering; and 3) there must be a supporter. In making shrines and statues of Buddha, there is obviously the supporter, but who receives his gift, they ask? In the absence of anyone to receive the gift, how can it be an act of generosity (dāna)?

From their point of view, the shrines and Buddha statues are not objects to be given as an act of dāna, but rather they serve as aids to the recollection of the attributes of the Buddha. A builder of shrines and Buddha statues has no particular receiver in mind when giving them away. He builds them to help produce vivid visualization of the Buddha in the mind of the devotees so as to enable them to practise the recollection of the virtues of the Buddha. It should, therefore, be considered, they maintain, that erecting shrines and Buddha statues is related to the Recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati) meditation, and is not an act of generosity.

There are, again, some people who maintain that as the person who builds shrines and installs Buddha statues undertakes these works in order to honour, to make homage to, the most Arahāt Buddha, his act must be considered as an act of honouring the Buddha (apacāyana), one of the ten qualities contributing to merit (puñña-kiriya-vatthu). They further say that since this kind of merit: honouring those who are worthy of honour, is a practice of morality (cāritta-sīla), it should come under the observance of morality (sīla) and not under the cultivation of the Recollection of the Buddha meditation.

But neither the merit of the Recollection of the Buddha meditation nor the merit of honouring [1528] (apacāyana) involves relinquishing of objects of offering; whereas building a relic shrine (stūpa) and installing Buddha statues requires an expenditure of a large sum of money. Hence these works of merit must be considered to come under dāna.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2619

Here the question may be asked: “If it comes under dāna, will it still be an act of giving when there is no recipient for it?” According to the texts, whether an offering should be regarded as an act of giving may be decided by an analysis of its features, viz. characteristic, function, manifestation and proximate cause.

We have already provided above what these features are, for a true act of dāna. Now applying this test to the present problem, we find the characteristic of abandoning since the person who builds the shrines and installs the Buddha statues relinquishes a large sum of money; as for function, there is destruction of attachment to the objects of offering by the supporter; as its manifestation, the supporter senses that his act of generosity will result in the attainment of rebirth in the human or Deva realm and the attainment of great wealth; and finally, as the proximate cause, there is the object to be offered. Thus, all the four features necessary for an offering to be truly an act of generosity (dāna) are present here and we may, therefore, conclude that building shrines and installing Buddha statues is a true act of generosity (dāna).

As to the question of who receives the gift, it will not be wrong to say that all the Devas and human beings who worship at the shrines and Buddha statues in memory of the virtues of the Buddha are the recipients of the gift. At the same time, as they serve as objects of worship for the Devas and human beings in their recollection of the virtues of the Buddha, they also form the objects offered. All the various material things in the world are utilized in different ways depending on their nature; food materials are utilized for consumption; clothing materials are utilized for wearing; materials for religious devotion and adoration are utilized as objects of veneration.

If wells and tanks are dug near public highways, the general public could use them for drinking water, washing, etc. The supporter would have no particular recipient in mind when he dug the wells and tanks. When, as he intended, the wayfarers, passing by the road, make use of his gifts, no one could say that his gift is not an act of generosity (dāna); even if he did not finalize it with a libation ceremony.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2620

Now to wind up the discussion, it is quite proper to say that a builder of shrines with Buddha statues is a supporter, the shrines and Buddha statues are objects of generosity, and Devas and human beings who pay homage to them in adoration are the recipients of the generosity.

An additional question may be asked: “Is it really proper to refer to shrines and Buddha statues as objects of generosity; may it not be sacrilegious to classify them as such?” Just as bookcases and shelves are used in the monasteries for holding canonical texts which are looked up to as sacred (Dhamma-cetiya), so also do shrines and Buddha statues form storehouses for keeping sacred relics and objects of veneration. So it may be answered that it is quite appropriate to designate them as objects of generosity (dāna).

Whether a Libation Ceremony Is Necessary

The point to consider here is: Does it constitute an act of giving (dāna) when it is not finalised with a libation ceremony. Actually there is no mention of this requirement in the texts. The practice is, however, of long-standing tradition.

In the Vinaya commentary on the Chapter about Robes (Cīvarakkhandhaka, Vin Mv 8), we find the following reference to this tradition of a libation ceremony. There was a split among the monastics of a monastery prior to the time of the offering of robes after the Rains Retreat (Vassa). When the time arrived, lay devotees came and offered robes, piled up in a heap, to one group of monastics. The devotees then went to the other group of monastics and performed the ceremony of libation, saying: “We offer to the other group of monastics.”

As to how the robes should be distributed among the Saṅgha, the great commentary says that if it was a region where the ceremony of libation is of no importance, the robes belonged to the group of monastics which had been directly offered the robes. The group which received only the libation had no claim to the robes. But if it was in a region where the libation ceremony is of importance, the group which received only the libation had a claim to the [1529] robes because the ceremony of libation was performed with them; the other group to which the robes were offered directly had also a claim on them since they had the robes already in their possession. Therefore, the two groups must divide the robes equally among themselves. This method of distribution is a practice followed by tradition in regions on the other side of the ocean.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2621

“Regions on the other side of the ocean” from Śrī Laṅkā implies Jambudīpa or India. Therefore, it should be noted that the ceremony of libation is a practice traditionally followed by the people of India.

Considering that there are regions where they set a great store by the ceremony of libation and there are regions where they set no great store by the ceremony of libation, it cannot be said that an offering constitutes an act of generosity only when it is finalised by a ceremony of libation. The ceremony is important only for those who follow the tradition of libation; it is clear that no significance is attached to it by those who do not follow the tradition. It should be noted, therefore, that a libation ceremony is not a primary factor for the successful completion of an act of generosity.

With respect to the gift of the teaching (Dhamma-dāna), there are, nowadays, people who are unable to teach the Dhamma but who, bent on making a gift of the teaching, spend money on books, palm-leaf scripts, etc. of canonical texts and make a gift of them. Although such a donation of books is not truly a gift of the teaching, we must consider that since a reader will be benefitted by reading in the books, practices and instructions which will lead him to Nibbāna, the supporter may be regarded as one who makes a gift of the teaching.

It is like the case of one who has no medicine to give to a sick person, but only a prescription for a cure of the illness. When the medicine is prepared as prescribed and taken, the illness is removed. Although the person does not actually administer any medicine, because of his effective prescription, he is entitled to be regarded as one who has brought about the cure of the illness. Likewise, the supporter of books on Dhamma who personally cannot teach the Dhamma enables the readers of his books to attain knowledge of the Dhamma and thus is entitled to be called the supporter of the gift of Dhamma.

Now, to conclude this section, the pair of gifts mentioned above: gifts of material things (āmiṣa-dāna) and gifts of Dhamma (Dhamma-dāna) may also be called honouring with material things (āmiṣa-pūjā) and honouring with the Dhamma (Dhamma-pūjā); the terms mean the same thing.

The word pūjā means “honouring” and is generally used when a younger person makes an offering to an older person or a person of higher status. Depending on this general usage, some people have stated that gifts (dāna) should be divided into honouring (pūjā-dāna) and assisting (anuggaha-dāna).

Honouring with an offering when the gift is made by a younger person or by a person of lower status to an older person or person of higher status (pūjā-dāna); and an offering to render assistance out of kindness when a gift is given by an older person or a person of higher status to one who is younger or of lower status (anuggaha-dāna).

But as we have seen before in the chapter V on the Prophecy, the word honouring (pūjā) can be used for both the high or the low, and the word assisting (anuggaha) is likewise applicable to both cases. It is true that, generally, assisting is used when the giving is made by the high to the low or by the old to the young. But we must, however, remember the usages of amisānuggaha and Dhammānuggaha to describe the assistance rendered and support given for the progress and development of the Buddha's teaching. Here, the word assisting is employed even though the gift is being made to the highest and the noblest teaching of the Buddha. Thus, it should be noted that the division into honouring (pūjā-dāna) and assisting (anuggaha-dāna) is not an absolute division into two aspects of giving (dāna) but rather a classification following common usage.

2. Offering One's Self and External Property

There is an gift of one's own person (ajjhattika-dāna) and a gift of external property (bāhira-dāna). An gift of one's own person means the giving away of one's own life and limbs; gifts [1530] of external property include giving any of the external material possessions of the supporter.

Even in these modern times, we read sometimes in the newspapers of an offering of one's own limbs at the relic shrine (stūpa) or of "honouring with the gift" of burning oneself after wrapping the whole body with cloth and pouring oil on it. Some comments have been made on such kinds of giving (dāna) involving one's limbs. According to them, such offerings of one's life and limbs are deeds to be performed only by great Bodhisattas and are not the concern of ordinary persons. They doubt if such offerings made by ordinary persons produce any merit at all.

Now to consider whether such views are justified or not, it is not as if a Bodhisatta can suddenly make his appearance in this world. Only after gradually fulfilling the required perfections to the best of his ability, an individual grows in maturity and develops stage by stage to become a Bodhisatta. Ancient poets have written thus: "Only by gradual venture, one ensures continuous improvement in rebirths to come.” Therefore, we should not hastily condemn those who make offerings of parts of their body or the whole of their body. If a person, through unflinching volition and faith, very courageously makes an offering of his own body, even to the extent of abandoning his life, he is actually worthy of praise as a supporter of the gift of one’s own person (ajjhattika-dāna).

3. Offerings of Property and Granting of Safety

There is an offering of property (vatthu-dāna) and the granting of safety (abhaya-dāna). An offering of property (vatthu-dāna) is concerned with the offering of material things. The granting of safety (abhaya-dāna) means the granting of safety or security with respect to life or property. This is usually an exercise of mercy by kings.

4. Offerings Aimed at Wealth and at Nibbāna

There is an offering made in the hope of future worldly wealth and pleasures (vaṭṭa-nissita-dāna), which means suffering in the cycle of existence. There is an offering made in aspiration for Nibbāna (vivaṭṭa-nissita-dāna), which is free of the suffering of rebirth.

5. Faulty and Unfaulty Offerings

There are offerings tainted with fault (sāvajja-dāna) and offerings untainted with fault (anavajja-dāna).

An offering of meals with meat obtained from the killing of animals is an example of an offering tainted with fault. An offering of meals which do not involve killing of animals is an offering untainted with fault. The first type is an act of generosity accompanied by demeritoriousness and the second type is an act of generosity unaccompanied by demeritoriousness.

We see the case of some fishermen who, having accumulated wealth from fishing, decided to give up the business thinking: “We will abandon this demeritorious fishing work and adopt a pure mode of livelihood.” Engaging in other occupations, they find their prosperity declining and, therefore, have to revert to their old vocation, and their wealth grows again.

This is an example of giving tainted with fault (sāvajja-dāna) done in previous lives coming to fruition in the present life. Since that act of giving was associated with the act of killing, at the time of its fruition too, success is achieved only when associated with an act of killing, in this case, fishing. When not associated with an act of killing, the previous offering tainted with fault cannot come to fruition and his wealth declines.

6. Offerings Made by Hand and by Order

There are offerings made with one's own hand (sāhatthika-dāna) and offerings made by agents on one's behalf or made by others under one's instruction (āṇattika-dāna).

That offerings made with one's own hand brings more beneficial results than the offerings made by agents on one's behalf can be understood from the Discourse to Pāyāsi (Pāyāsi-sutta, DN 23). [1531]

7. Offerings Prepared Carefully and Carelessly

There are offerings made with proper and careful preparation (sakkacca-dāna) and offerings made without proper and careful preparation (asakkacca-dāna).

As an example, an offering of flowers may be cited as an example. Having gathered flowers from trees, a supporter creates garlands with them, arranges them to look as beautiful and as pleasant as possible, and makes his offering of flowers, then it is an offering made with proper and careful preparation (sakkacca-dāna). Without such careful preparations, when flowers are presented just as they have been gathered from trees, thinking that the mere gift of the flowers is sufficient in itself, then it is an offering made without proper and careful preparations (asakkacca-dāna).

Some ancient writers have translated these as meaning “offerings made with due respect” and “offerings made without due respect.” This rendering has, as often as not, misled the modern readers to think that it means paying due respect or without paying due respect to the receiver of the offering. Actually, “paying due respect” here means simply “making careful preparations” for the offering.

8. Offerings Made Wisely and Unwisely

An offering associated with wisdom (ñāṇa-sampayutta-dāna) and an offering unassociated with wisdom (ñāṇa-vipayutta-dāna).

An offering made with clear comprehension of volitional acts and the results they produce is said to be an offering associated with wisdom. When an offering is made without such comprehension and awareness, by just following the example of others making donations, it is an offering unassociated with wisdom (ñāṇa-vipayutta-dāna).

It must be mentioned that just awareness of cause and its ensuing effect (kamma-vipāka), while an offering is being made, is sufficient to make it an offering which is associated with wisdom. In this connection, an explanation is necessary with respect to some exhortations which run like this: “Whenever an offering is made, it should be accompanied by insight knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa); in this manner I, the supporter of the gift, am impermanent (anicca), and the recipient of the gift is also impermanent. I, being impermanent, am offering an impermanent gift to an impermanent recipient. Thus, you should contemplate whenever you make an offering of gifts.”

This exhortation is made only to encourage the practice of developing insight knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa); it should not be misunderstood that an act of generosity is not associated with wisdom if the supporter does not practise the contemplation as exhorted.

As a matter of fact, whoever wants to develop real insight knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa) should first of all discard the notion of “I,” “he,” “man,” “woman,” that is, the illusion of I, the illusion of self, to discern that they are merely material aggregates and mental aggregates. Then, one has to go on contemplating so as to realise that these aggregates of mind and matter are of the nature of impermanence, suffering and non-self. Without differentiation into aggregates of mind and matter, if one were to contemplate conventional concepts of “I am impermanent; the object of offering is impermanent; the recipient is impermanent,” no real insight knowledge would be possible.

9. Offerings Prompted and Unprompted

An offering made hesitatingly and only after being prompted (sasāṅkhārika-dāna) and an offering made spontaneously without being prompted (asāṅkhārika-dāna).

Here, prompting means urging or entreating someone earnestly to give when he is hesitating or reluctant to do so. Such offering is made only with prompting. But, a simple request should not be taken as being prompted. For example, a person who has not made any decision whether he will or he will not make a donation is requested to make some alms contribution and he gives willingly without any hesitation. This is a spontaneous gift in response to a simple request. Such is one made without prompting (asāṅkhārika-dāna), and should not be called one made without prompting (sasaṅkhārika-dāna) just because it is made after a request.

Another [1532] person is similarly approached and similarly requested to make a contribution, but he is reluctant at first and refuses to do so. But when the request is repeated with a prompting: “Do make a gift, don’t flinch,” and he makes a contribution, his gift made as a consequence of urging is of the one made with prompting (sasaṅkhārika-dāna) type. Even in the case where no one has made an approach to request for giving (dāna), if one first thinks of making an offering, then shrinks away from the idea, but after much self persuasion, self-inducement, finally makes the gift, his gift is one made with prompting (sasaṅkhārika) too.

10. Pleasurable and Equanimous Offerings

There is an offering made while one is in a joyful mood, with a happy frame of mind (somanassa-dāna); and an offering made with a balanced state of mind, neither joyous nor sorrowful but equipoised (upekkhā-dāna). When the act of giving is accompanied by pleasure, it is made while one is in a joyful mood (somanassa-dāna); when it is accompanied by equanimity, it is neither joyous nor sorrowful but equipoised (upekkhā-dāna).

11. Righteous and Unrighteous Offerings

There is an offering of property earned in accordance with Dhamma, by just means (Dhammiya-dāna); and an offering of property earned by immoral means, such as stealing or robbing (adhammiya-dāna).

Although earning of property by immoral means is not in accordance with Dhamma, offering as alms of such property is nevertheless an act of merit, but the good results accruing from this type of giving (dāna) cannot be as great as those obtained from the first type, an offering of property earned in accordance with Dhamma (Dhammiya-dāna). A comparison can be made of these two different results with types of plants that will grow from a good seed and from a bad seed.

12. Enslaving and Freeing Offerings

An offering made with hopes of gaining worldly pleasures is enslaving (dāsa-dāna), it is an offering that will enslave one. Being a slave to craving for sense-pleasures, one makes this kind of offering to serve one’s master, the craving to fulfil his wishes. An offering made with an aspiration for attainment of the paths and fruitions, and Nibbāna, is an offering for freedom (bhujissa-dāna), an offering made in revolt against the dictates of the master, craving.

Sentient beings in the endless round of existences desire to enjoy the delightful pleasures of the senses: visible objects, sounds, smells, tastes, touches. This desire to revel in the so-called pleasures of the senses is called craving. Every moment of their existence is devoted to satisfying that craving; fulfilling the needs of that craving, they have become its servants. Continuously striving for wealth, day and night, throughout their life is nothing but fulfilment of the wishes of the craving which demands the best of food, the best of clothing, and the most luxurious way of living.

Not content with being a slave to craving in the present life, working to fulfil its every need, we make offerings (dāna) to ensure luxurious living in the future. This type of offering accompanied by a strong wish for enjoyment of worldly pleasures continuously for lives to come is definitely enslaving (dāsa-dāna).

This type of offering, in fulfilment of the wishes of craving and which ensures servitude to craving throughout the endless round of existence, is performed thinking it to be the best, before one encounters the teachings of the Buddha. But once we are fortunate enough to hear the Dhamma, we come to understand how powerful this craving is, how insatiable it is, how much we have to suffer for fulfilling the wishes of this craving. Then resolving: “I will no longer be a servant of this terrible craving, I will no longer fulfil its wishes, I will rebel against it, I will go against it,” and in order to uproot and eradicate this evil craving, one makes offerings with an aspiration for attainment of the paths and fruitions, and Nibbāna. This offering is called dāna made for freedom (bhujissa-dāna), an offering made in revolt against the dictates of the master, craving.

13. Immovable and Moveable Offerings

There is an offering of things of a permanent, immovable nature (thāvara-dāna), such as relic shrines (stūpa), temples, [1533] monasteries, rest houses; and digging wells, tanks, etc.; and an offering of things of movable nature (athāvara-dāna) meant for temporary use, such as food and robes.

14. Offerings with and without Supplements

There is an offering made with an accompaniment of supplementary materials that usually go along with such an offering (saparivāra-dāna). For example, in offering robes as the main item of gifts, when it is accompanied by suitable and proper accessories and requisites, it is an offering made with an accompaniment of supplementary materials (saparivāra-dāna); when there are no other objects of offering besides the main item of robes, it is a gift without anything accompanying (aparivāra-dāna). The same differentiation applies to offerings made with other forms of gifts.

The special characteristic marks on the body of Bodhisattas, who have large retinues attending upon them, are the benefits that result from the offering made with an accompaniment of supplementary materials type of giving (dāna).

15. Regular and Occasional Offerings

There is an offering made constantly or regularly such as an offering of alms food to the Saṅgha everyday (nibaddha-dāna); and an offering made not constantly, not on a regular basis, but only occasionally when one is able to so, an occasional offering (anibaddha-dāna).

16. Tarnished and Untarnished Offerings

There is a tarnished offering (parāmaṭṭha-dāna) and an untarnished offering (aparāmaṭṭha-dāna). An offering which is tarnished by craving and wrong view is a tarnished offering (parāmaṭṭha-dāna). An offering which is not corrupted by craving and wrong view is an untarnished offering (aparāmaṭṭha-dāna).

According to the Abhidhamma, one is corrupted when led astray by wrong view alone; but wrong view always co-exists with craving. When wrong view corrupts and leads one astray, craving is also involved. Therefore, both craving and wrong view are mentioned above. And this is how craving and wrong view bring about corruption. Having made an offering, if one expresses an ardent, wholesome wish: “May I speedily attain the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna as a result of this act of merit,” the offering becomes one of the made in aspiration for Nibbāna (vivaṭṭa-nissita) type,<sup>411</sup> and it could serve as a strong sufficing condition for the attainment of the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna.

But instead of making such a wholesome wish for Nibbāna, when corrupted and led astray by craving and wrong view, one aspires to a result of this act of merit: “May I become a distinguished Deva such as Sakka, the Lord of the Tāvātimsa abode, or just a Deva of the durable divine realms, his giving (dāna) cannot serve as a sufficing condition for the attainment of Nibbāna and is classed as a mere tarnished offering (parāmaṭṭha-dāna), the giving of which is bereft of the sufficing condition for the attainment of Nibbāna, being tarnished by craving and wrong view. The giving which is not tarnished by craving and wrong view, but is made with the sole purpose of attaining Nibbāna, is classed as an untarnished offering (aparāmaṭṭha-dāna).

Much generosity can also be practised outside the teaching of the Buddha; but giving of the tarnished offering (parāmaṭṭha) type is only possible then. It is only within the teaching of the Buddha that giving of the untarnished offering (aparāmaṭṭha) type can be practised. So while we are blessed with the rare opportunity of meeting with the teachings of the Buddha, we should strive to our utmost to ensure that our offerings are of the untarnished offering type.

17. Inferior and Superior Offerings

There is an offering made with what is leftover, which is inferior and wretched (ucchiṭṭha-dāna); and an offering made with what is not leftover, which is not inferior and wretched (anucchiṭṭha-dāna).

Suppose, while preparations are being made for a meal, a recipient appears and one donates some of the food that has been prepared before one has eaten it; it is considered to be the highest gift (agga-dāna), and it is also an offering made with what is not leftover (anucchiṭṭha-dāna) since the offering is not the [1534] leftover of a meal. If the recipient arrives while one is eating the meal, but before eating is finished, and one makes an offering of the food taken from the meal one is eating, that is also considered to be an offering made with what is not leftover (anucchiṭṭha-dāna); it can even be said to be a noble gift.

When the offering is made of the food leftover after one has finished eating, it is a gift of the leftovers, an offering made with what is leftover (ucchiṭṭha-dāna), a wretched, inferior one. It should be noted, however, that the humble offering made by one who has nothing else to give but the leftover meal could well be called an offering made with what is not leftover (anucchiṭṭha-dāna). It is only when such an offering is made by one who can well afford to make a better gift that his gift is regarded as a wretched, inferior one (ucchiṭṭha-dāna).

18. Offerings Made While Alive and after Passing

There is an offering made while one is still alive (sājīva-dāna); and an offering which is meant to become effective after one's death, saying: "I give such of my property to such and such a person; let him take possession of it after my death and make use of it as he wishes" (accaya-dāna).

A monastic is not permitted to make an offering which is meant to become effective after one's death, i.e., he cannot leave his properties as gifts for others after his death. Even if he should do so, it does not constitute an act of giving (dāna); the would-be recipient also would have no right of possession to them. If a monastic gives from his properties to another monastic while he is still living, the receiver is entitled to what is given to him; or while the monastic is still alive, some monastic who is on intimate terms (vissāsa-gaha) with him can take it and come to possess it; or if he owns something jointly (dvi-santaka) with another monastic, when he dies, the surviving monastic becomes the sole owner. Unless these conditions are fulfilled: giving his property during his lifetime, taking possession of it by reason of intimacy while he is still alive, or possessing it through dual ownership, the monastic's property becomes the property of the Saṅgha when he dies.

Therefore, if a monastic makes an offering which is meant to become effective after one's death (accaya-dāna), saying: "I give such of my property to such and such a person when I die. Let him take possession of them," it amounts to giving a property which by then belongs to the Saṅgha. His giving does not form an act of giving (dāna), and the would-be recipient is also not entitled to its ownership. It is only amongst the laymen that such kinds of gifts (accaya-dāna) are possible and legal.

19. Offerings Made to Individuals and to the Saṅgha

There is an offering made to one or two separate individual persons (puggalika-dāna); and an offering made to the whole Saṅgha (Saṅghika-dāna). Saṅgha means a group, an assemblage or community; here, the whole community of the noble disciples of the Buddha is meant. In making an offering intended for the Saṅgha, the supporter must have in his mind not the individual from the noble disciples that constitute the Saṅgha, but the community of the noble disciples as a whole. Then only will his offering be an offering made to the whole Saṅgha (Saṅghika-dāna).

Fourteen Kinds of Gift to Individuals

The Discourse giving an Analysis of Offerings (Dakkhiṇā-vibhaṅga-sutta, MN 142) gives an enumeration of the 14 kinds of gifts to individuals (puggalika-dāna), and the 7 kinds of gifts to the Saṅgha (Saṅghika-dāna). It is useful to know them, and so I will list them here.

1. An offering made to a Buddha.
2. An offering made to a Paccekabuddha, a Buddha who does not teach ultimate reality.
3. An offering made to an Arahāt, one who has attained the fruition stage of an Arahāt (Arahatta-phala).
4. An offering made to one who is striving to realise the fruition stage of an Arahāt, one who has attained the path to being an Arahāt (Arahatta-magga).
5. An offering made to Non-returners (Anāgāmi), one who has attained the fruition stage of a Non-returner (Anāgāmi-phala).
6. An offering made to one who is striving to realise the fruition stage of a Non-returner (Anāgāmi), one who has attained the path stage of a Non-returner (Anāgāmi-magga).
7. An offering made to Once-returners (Sakadāgāmi), one who has attained the fruition stage of a Once-Returner (Sakadāgāmi-phala).
8. An offering made to one who is striving to realise the fruition stage of a Once-returner (Sakadāgāmi), one who has attained the path stage of a Once-returner (Sakadāgāmi-magga).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2632

9. An offering made to a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna), or to one who has attained the fruition stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).
10. An offering made to one who is striving to realise the fruition stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpanna), or one who has attained the path stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga).
11. An offering made to recluses outside the teaching of the Buddha, or when the teaching is not in existence, who are accomplished in absorption (jhāna) or the five supernormal power attainments (pañca-abhiññā).
12. An offering made to an ordinary lay person who possesses morality.
13. An offering made to an ordinary lay person who is devoid of morality.
14. An offering made to an animal.

Of these fourteen kinds of offering made to individuals, giving one full meal to an animal will bring wholesome results of long life, good looks, physical well-being, strength, and intelligence for 100 lives. Then in an ascending order, giving one full meal to a lay person of poor morality will bring these wholesome results for 1,000 lives; to a lay person of good morality at a time when the Buddha's teaching is not in existence who has no opportunity to take refuge in the Three Treasures, for 100,000 lives; to recluses and ascetics accomplished in absorption (jhāna), for one million lives; to laymen and novitiates during a period when the teachings of Buddhas are extant, who take refuge in the Three Treasures, and up to the noble person who has attained the path of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga), for an innumerable number (asaṅkhyeyya) of lives; and to persons of higher attainment up to the Buddha, for countless periods of lives.

According to the commentary, even one who only takes refuge in the Three Treasures may be considered as a person who is practising for the realisation of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).

There is no mention of monastics of loose morality in the above list of 14 kinds of recipient of offerings made to individuals. The Buddha's enumeration of offerings made to a person devoid of morality concerns only the period when the Buddha's teaching is not in existence. For these reasons, there is a tendency to consider that offerings made to monastics of impure morality while the Buddha's teaching are still not in existence are blameworthy. But one should remember that anyone who has become a Buddhist, at the very least, takes refuge in the Three Treasures; and the commentary says that whoever takes refuge in the Three Treasures is a person who is practising for the realisation of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). Furthermore, when an offering made to an ordinary lay person who is devoid of morality, while the teaching of Buddha is not in existence, could be of much benefit, there is no doubt that offerings made to an ordinary lay person devoid of morality while the teaching of the Buddha is still existing would be beneficial too.

Again, in the Questions of King Milinda (Milinda-pañha), Ven. Nāgasena explains that an immoral monastic is superior to an immoral lay person in ten respects, such as reverence shown to the Buddha, reverence shown to the Dhamma, reverence shown to the Saṅgha, etc. Thus, according to Milinda's Questions, an immoral monastic is superior to an immoral lay person; and since he is listed by the commentary as one who is practising for the realisation of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala), one should not say that it is blameworthy and fruitless to make an offering to a monastic who is devoid of morality.

There is yet another point of view in connection with this matter. At a time when there is no teaching of the Buddha, immoral monastics cannot cause any harm to the teaching; but when the teaching is in existence, they can bring harm to it. For that reason, no offering should be made to monastics who are devoid of morality during the period when there is the Buddha's teaching. But that view is shown by the Buddha to be untenable.

At the conclusion of the discourse on the seven kinds of offering to the Saṅgha (Saṅghika-dāna), the Buddha explains to Ānanda: [1536] “Ānanda, in times to come, there will appear vile monastics, devoid of morality, who are monastics only in name, who will wear their robes round their necks. With the intention of giving to the Saṅgha, offerings will be made to these immoral monastics. Even when offered in this manner, an offering meant for the whole Saṅgha (Saṅghika-dāna) I declare, will bring innumerable, inestimable benefits.”

There is still another point to take into consideration. Of the four purities of offerings (dakkhiṇā-visuddhi), the first purity is that even if the receiver is of impure morality, when the supporter is moral, the offering is pure by reason of purity of the supporter. For these reasons also, one should not say that an immoral monastic cannot be a receiver and that no benefit will accrue by making an offering to him.

It should be well noted, therefore, that it is blameworthy only when we make an offering with bad intentions of approving and encouraging an immoral monastic in his evil practices; without taking into considerations his habits, if one makes the offering with a pure mind, thinking only “one should give if someone who comes for a donation,” it is quite blameless.

Seven Kinds of Offerings to the Saṅgha

1. An offering made to the community of both monks and nuns led by the Buddha, while he is still living.
2. An offering made to the community of both monks and nuns after the Parinibbāna of the Buddha.
3. An offering made to the community of monastics only.
4. An offering made to the community of nuns only.
5. An offering made with the whole Saṅgha in mind to a group of monks and nuns as nominated by the Saṅgha.

Such an offering is made when the supporter could not afford to give offerings to all the monks and nuns and requests the Saṅgha to nominate a certain number of monks and nuns to receive the offerings. The Saṅgha nominates the required number of monks and nuns, and the supporter makes the offerings to that group of monks and nuns with the whole Saṅgha in mind.

6. An offering made to a group of monastics only, with the whole Saṅgha in mind, after requesting the Saṅgha to nominate the number he could afford to give to.
7. An offering made with the whole of the Saṅgha in mind to a group of nuns only after requesting the Saṅgha to nominate the number he could afford to give to.

During the Buddha’s lifetime, people were generally not disposed to form attachment to, or concern themselves with, individual personalities; they had their mind bent on the Saṅgha as a whole and thus were able to make many offerings of a noble kind to the Saṅgha (Saṅghika-dāna). Consequently, the needs of the members of the Saṅgha were mostly met by the distributions made to the Saṅgha; they had little need to rely on laymen and laywomen [1537] supporters and, therefore, had little attachment to them as “the supporters of my monastery, the supporters of my robes, etc.” Thus, the monastic could be free of the bonds of attachments.

Here you should read the story of Ugga the householder given in chapter 45b. Of the eight wonders described by the householder Ugga, the sixth is concerned with making impartial offerings to the noble, the moral and the immoral alike. It is necessary to know how one can be impartially-minded in such circumstances. The impartial attitude can be understood to be brought about in this manner: “As I have made the invitation with intention to give to the whole Saṅgha, when I make the offering to a noble one, I will not recognise him as such; I will not consider that I am making the offering to a noble one; I will keep in mind only that I am making my offering to the Saṅgha, the noble disciples of the Buddha as a whole. And when I make the offering to an immoral person, I will not recognise him as such; I will not consider that I am making the offering to an immoral person; I will keep in mind only that I am making an offering to the Saṅgha, the noble disciples of the Buddha, as a whole. In this manner, impartiality may be maintained.”

Emulating the example set by the householder Ugga when making an offering, one should ignore the status of the recipient, keep aside personal feelings towards him, and strive to keep firmly in mind only the Saṅgha as a whole, so that one’s gift may be of the noble type made with the whole community of monastics in mind. As taught explicitly by the Buddha in the Discourse giving an Analysis of Offerings (Dakkhiṇā-vibhaṅga-sutta, MN 142) mentioned above, when an offering is made with the whole community of monastics in mind (Saṅghika-dāna), it could bring innumerable, inestimable benefits to the supporter, even if the recipient is an immoral person devoid of virtues.

An offering made with the whole community of monastics in mind (Saṅghika-dāna) is made with full reverence to the Saṅgha; but it is not always easy to do so. Suppose a person decides to make an offering made with the whole community of monastics in mind; having made the necessary preparations, he goes to a monastery and addresses the monastics: “Reverend Sirs, I wish to make an offering made with the whole community of monastics in mind; may you designate someone from amongst the Saṅgha as its representative.” Should the monastics nominate a novice whose turn it is to represent the Saṅgha, the supporter is likely to be displeased; should they choose an elderly venerable of long standing to represent them, he is likely to be overwhelmed with intense delight, exulting: “I have an elderly venerable of long standing as my recipient.” Such generosity, affected by the personality of the recipient, cannot be a perfect offering made with the whole community of monastics in mind.

Only if one can accept the representative nominated in turn by the Saṅgha without any misgiving – without concerning oneself about whether the recipient is a novice or a monastic, a young monastic or an elderly monastic, an ignorant monastic or a learned monastic – and one makes one’s offering, thinking only: “I make my offering to the Saṅgha, with full [1539] reverence to the Saṅgha,” does one make a true offering made with the whole community of monastics in mind (Saṅghika-dāna).

There is something that happened on the other side of the ocean, in India. A rich householder, who had already donated a monastery, intended to make an offering to the Saṅgha. After making the necessary preparations, he went to the Saṅgha and addressed them: “Venerable sirs, may you designate someone to receive my offering for the Saṅgha?” It happened that it was the turn of an immoral monastic to represent the Saṅgha for alms. Although the man knew well that the designated monastic was immoral, he treated him with full respect: The seat for the monastic was prepared as for a ceremonious occasion, decorated with a canopy overhead, and scented with flowers and perfumes. He washed the feet of the monastic and anointed them with oil very reverentially as if he were attending upon the person of the Buddha himself. He then made his offering to the monastic paying full homage to the Saṅgha.

That afternoon, the immoral monastic went back to the house and standing at the doorway asked for a hoe, which he needed to make some repairs in the monastery. The supporter of the monastery did not even bother to get up from his seat; he simply pushed the hoe towards the monastic with his feet. The members of his family then asked him: “Respected sir, this morning you heaped upon this monastic so much veneration; now you have shown him not even a small part of that deference. What is the difference between the morning and the afternoon in your attitude towards the monastic?” The man replied: “My dear ones, the respect I was showing this morning was towards the Saṅgha, not to this immoral monastic.”

Offerings to Individuals and the Saṅgha

There are some people who maintain that if some person should approach one for alms and if one knew beforehand that the person was of bad morality, one should not make any offering to that person; if one should do so, it would be like watering a poisonous plant.

But it could not be said that every act of offering made knowingly to immoral persons is blameworthy. It is the volition of the giver that must be taken into account here. If the supporter should approve of the bad habits of the recipient and give with a view to give him support and encouragement for continuance of his immoral practices, then only would his gift be like watering a poisonous plant. If the supporter does not approve of the bad habits to the recipient and has no mind to encourage him to continue with his bad practices, but, emulating the example of the monastery supporter described above, if he makes his gift in such a way that it becomes a true gift made with the whole community of monastics in mind (Saṅghika-dāna), then no blame can be attached to such an offering.

Again, there are some who maintain that whether the recipient is of good moral character or bad moral character is of no concern of the supporters; it only concerns the recipient. Therefore, remaining indifferent to the character of the recipient, whether good or bad, the supporter should bear in mind: “This is a noble person, a noble one (ariya) or an Arahāt.” They maintain that this act of offering is blameless and as fruitful as making an offering to an Arahāt. This point of view is also untenable.

Disciples of other teachers, who are not in a position to know whether a person is a noble one (ariya) or an Arahāt, wrongly believe their teachers to be noble ones, Arahāts. This sort of belief, called wrong resolution (micchādhimokkha), making the wrong decision or conclusion, is demeritorious. Surely, it would be demeritorious and would be making a wrong decision if one were to bear in mind: “These are noble Arahāts,” when one knew full well that they were not. It is not proper, therefore, to hold such views.

When faced with such recipients in making one’s offering, the proper attitude to bear in mind should be: “Bodhisattas, in fulfilment of the perfection of generosity, make their offering without discriminating between persons of high, medium, or low status of development. I will also emulate the examples of the Bodhisattas and make my offerings to whoever comes for them, without discrimination.” In this way, one would not be giving support or any [1540] encouragement to the practice of bad habits and would not be making wrong decisions or conclusions about the recipient’s development; the act of offering would thus be free from blame or fault.

Controversies and difficulties arise only in the case of offerings made to individuals (puggalika-dāna), because there exist various kind of individuals, good or bad. In the case of offerings made to the Saṅgha (Saṅghika-dāna), there exists only one kind of Saṅgha, not two, good and bad.<sup>412</sup> There is no distinction amongst the noble Saṅgha (Ariya-saṅgha) as high, medium, or low status of development as they are all equally noble. Therefore, as explained above, whenever a recipient appears before one, without taking into consideration his character, one should make the offering with the thought: “I make my offering to the disciples of the Buddha, the noble Saṅgha.” Then this offering is of the type made to the Saṅgha (Saṅghika-dāna), and the recipient is the Saṅgha; the person who appears before him to receive the offering is merely the representative of the Saṅgha. However low that person may be in his morals, the true recipient of the offering is the noble Saṅgha, and therefore this is truly a noble gift.

Some people consider that it is very difficult to put into actual practice the advice to ignore the personal character of the immoral recipient who has appeared before one and to make one’s offering with the mind directed not to him, but to the noble Saṅgha, regarding him only as a representative of the Saṅgha. The difficulty arises only because of lack of habitual practice in such matters.

In making reverential vows to the images and statues of the Buddha, regarding them as the Buddha’s representatives, one is so accustomed to the practice of projecting one’s mind from the images or statues to the person of the living Buddha that no one says it is difficult. Just as the householder Ugga during the Buddha’s time and the monastery supporter of Jambudīpa had habituated themselves to make offerings to an immoral monastic as a representative of the Saṅgha, so also Buddhists of modern times should discipline their mind to become accustomed to such an attitude.

Four Kinds of Offerings to the Saṅgha

The Basket of Discipline (Vinaya-piṭaka) for members of the Saṅgha gives a description of the four categories of offerings made intentionally for the Saṅgha. But these four categories of offerings for the Saṅgha (Saṅghika-dāna) do not concern the lay supporter; only the seven types of offerings for the Saṅgha mentioned above concern them. The Vinaya distinctions are made for the Saṅgha only so that they would know how to distribute the offerings amongst themselves. The four categories are:

1. Offerings to be distributed amongst the Saṅgha which is actually present at the time and place (sammukhī-bhūta-saṅghika).

Suppose an offering of robes is made at a certain place in towns or villages where some monastics have gathered together, and the offering is made to the noble Saṅgha as a whole by the supporter saying: “I give to the Saṅgha.” It will be difficult to reach all the various noble monastics in the town or the village concerned. The distribution is, therefore, to be made amongst the Saṅgha present at the place and the time. Hence it is called offerings to be distributed amongst the Saṅgha which is actually present at the time and place (sammukhī-bhūta-saṅghika), here, sammukhī-bhūta means present at the time and place; Saṅghika means belonging to the Saṅgha.

2. Offerings to be distributed amongst the Saṅgha residing in the whole compound of the monastery (ārāmaṭṭha-saṅghika).

Suppose a supporter comes into the compound of a monastery and makes an offering of robes to a monastic or monastics whom he meets, saying: “I give it to the Saṅgha.” As the offering is made within the compound of the monastery, it belongs to all the Saṅgha residing in that whole compound of the monastery, not just to the monastics who are in the vicinity. Hence it is called an offering to be distributed amongst the Saṅgha residing in the whole compound of the monastery (ārāmaṭṭha-saṅghika), here, ārāmaṭṭha means residing in the compound; Saṅghika means belonging to the Saṅgha.

3. Offerings which belong to the Saṅgha of whichever place they have been taken to (gatāgata-saṅghika).

Suppose a supporter comes to a monastery where a solitary monastic resides and makes an offering of 100 robes, saying: “I give to the Saṅgha.” If the residing monastic is well-versed in the disciplinary rules, he can take possession of all the offerings for himself by simply remarking: “At the present moment, in this monastery, I am the sole monastic; all these 100 robes, therefore belong to [1541] me and I take possession of them.” He has the right according to the Discipline to do so; he cannot be faulted for monopolising the offering made to the Saṅgha.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2640

If the monastic is not proficient in Vinaya rules, he would not know what to do. Without resolving or determining: “I am the sole owner. I take possession of them,” suppose he left for another place taking the robes with him, the monastics he met there should ask him how he came by the robes. Suppose, on learning how he had come by them, these monastics claimed their share of the robes, saying: “We also have a claim on them,” and consequently all the robes were divided equally among them. Then this sharing of the robes is deemed to be a good one.

But suppose, without sharing the robes, he should continue on his way and encounter other monastics; these monastics would also be entitled to receive their share of the robes. In this way, wherever the monastic would go, taking the robes with him, the monastics of those places would be entitled to the robes. Hence it is called an offering which belongs to the Saṅgha of whichever place they have been taken to (gatāgata-saṅghika), here gatāgata means wherever one has gone; Saṅghika means belonging to the Saṅgha.

4. Offerings which belong to all monastics who come from the four directions (catuddisā-saṅghika).

Such offerings include gifts which are weighty and important, which are to be treated with deference, for example, monasteries. They are not to be apportioned in any other way, but are meant only for use by the Saṅgha coming from all directions. Hence it is called an offering which belongs to all monastics who come from the four directions (catuddisā-saṅghika), here catuddisā means from four directions; Saṅghika means belonging to the Saṅgha.

Not being mindful of the fact that these four categories are mentioned in the Discipline to provide measures for distinction of ownership and distribution of the offerings made to the Saṅgha, some monastics make use of these Discipline provisions when lay people make offerings. To give an illustration, suppose a supporter, actuated by pious devotion to a certain monastic, builds a monastery, though not intending for him, but for the whole Saṅgha. For the libation ceremony, he invited ten monastics including the monastic to whom he has so much devotion. After recitation of the protection discourses (paritta),<sup>413</sup> when the time comes for the actual announcement of the offering, the monastic wants to be offered the monastery as an offering made to a particular individual (puggalika-dāna), because he feels that living in a monastery meant for the whole Saṅgha entails so many liabilities and responsibilities. But the supporter prefers to make it a gift to the whole Saṅgha (Saṅghika-dāna) because, he believes, such a gift (dāna) is superior and of much merit. The congregation resolves the disagreement between the supporter and his preceptor by asking the supporter to make the offering, saying: “I give this monastery to the Saṅgha who is present here and now,” which is an offering to the Saṅgha which is actually present at the time and place (sammukhī-bhūta-saṅghika). Then nine monastics of the congregation, saying to the remaining one: “We relinquish our right of possession of the monastery to your reverence,” hand over the new monastery to him and leave.

In this manner, such procedures are liable to be followed, believing that by so doing, the supporter’s wish for a gift to the whole Saṅgha (Saṅghika-dāna) is fulfilled and the recipient who prefers individual ownership is also happy since the nine co-owners have relinquished their right of possession of the monastery making him the sole owner.

But, in reality, such a procedure is not proper and should not be followed. The gift of a monastery is a weighty, important one; the ten monastics to whom the monastery has been offered cannot make any kind of apportionment of the offering between them; and the supporter’s gift amounts only to a gift to the ten monastics present on the occasion and not to the Saṅgha as a whole.

20. Offerings Made at a Specific Time and at Any Time

There are offerings made on specific occasions (kāla-dāna) and offerings made at any time (akāla-dāna).

An offering of Cloth (Kaṭhina) at the end of the Rains Retreat (Vassa) for the duration of one month; an offering of robes at the beginning of the Rains Retreat (Vassa); an offering of dietary food to the sick; an offering of food to visiting monastics; an offering of food to monastics who are setting out on a journey are all gifts made at a specific time for a specific purpose and are called timely [1542] gifts (kāla-dāna); all other gifts made as one wishes without reference to any particular time are called offerings made at any time (akāla-dāna).

Offerings made on specific occasions (kāla-dāna) are of greater merit than the offerings made at any time (akāla-dāna) because the offering is made to meet the specific needs at a specific time. The specific occasion type of offering, at the time of its fruition, brings specific good results at the time they are needed. For example, if the supporter wishes for something special to eat, his wish is immediately fulfilled; likewise if he wishes to have some special clothes to wear, he will receive them. These are examples of special merits that accrue from offerings made at specific times to meet specific needs.

21. Offerings Witnessed and not Witnessed

Offerings made in the presence of the supporter (paccakkha-dāna) and offerings made in the absence of the supporter (apaccakkha-dāna).

The Pāli word paccakkha is made up of pati and akkha. Pati means towards; akkha means the five senses: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body. Although paccakkha is generally “before the eye,” its complete meaning should be “perceptible to the senses.” Thus paccakkha-dāna has a wider scope, not just the kind of offering which can be seen by the supporter but also those which can be perceived by his other senses, by sound, smell, taste and touch. In this connection, it should be noted that offerings made in the presence of the supporter (paccakkha-dāna) are not exactly the same as that made with one’s own hands (sāhatthika-dāna). Offerings made in one’s presence at one’s instance but not actually with one’s own hands are offerings made at one’s request or command (āṇattika-dāna).

22. Matched and Matchless Offerings

Offerings matched by someone else (sadisa-dāna) and offerings which cannot be matched by anyone (asadisa-dāna).

When offerings are made in a spirit of competition, supporters make efforts to excel their rivals in the scale and magnificence of generosity. In such competitions, the offerings that prove to be incomparable, inimitable, are called an unrivalled alms giving (asadisa-dāna).

According to the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada) commentary, as explained in the story about the unrivalled alms giving in the commentary to DhP 177 only one supporter appeared during the time of each Buddha to make an unrivalled offering.

The Unrivalled Alms Giving

The story runs as follows: At one time, the Buddha, after going on a long journey followed by 500 Arahats, arrived back at the Jetavana monastery. King Pasenadi of Kosala honoured the Buddha and his 500 disciples by inviting them to the palace and offering them alms on a magnificent scale. The king invited also the people of Sāvattthī to his offering so that they could watch and rejoice in his meritorious deed. The next day, the people of Sāvattthī, rivalling the king, organized the resources of the whole city and gave offerings which surpassed those of the king to the Buddha and his disciples. They invited the king to their ceremony to observe their deed and rejoice in it.

Catching onto the spirit of competition, the king accepted the challenge of the citizens by conducting a more magnificent offering ceremony the following day. The citizens in turn organized yet another grand ceremony of offering to outdo the efforts of the king. In this manner, the keen contest between the king and his citizens went on until both sides had made six offerings, but the contest still remained indecisive.

As the seventh round came along, the royal supporter was feeling despondent: “It will be very difficult to surpass the efforts of the citizens in this seventh round, and life would not be worth living if I, the sovereign ruler of the land, were to lose to the people over whom I rule, in this round.” To console him, Queen Mallikā thought out a plan by which the king could make a truly majestic offering which the people would find impossible to match. She had a grand pavilion built in which 500 great disciples of the Buddha, the Arahats, were to sit in the pavilion with 500 princesses fanning them and spraying perfumes and scented water in the pavilion. At the back of the 500 Arahats, there would be 500 elephants, kneeling down and holding a white [1543] umbrella over each of the great Arahats.

As the arrangements were being made according to the above plan, they found they had one tame elephant short of 500; so they had a wild, unruly elephant, which was notorious for its savagery, placed at the back of Ven. Āṅgulimāla and made it hold a white umbrella like other elephants. People were amazed to find this savage beast taking part in the ceremony and holding an umbrella over the head of Ven. Aṅgulimāla in a docile manner.

After the meal had been offered to the congregation, the king declared: “I made an offering of all the things in this pavilion, allowable things as well as unallowable things. On this declaration, the people had to admit defeat in the contest because they had no princesses, no white umbrellas and no elephants.

Thus the supporter of the unrivalled alms giving (dāna) at the time of the supreme being of the three worlds, the Buddha Gotama, was King Pasenadi of Kosala. It should be noted that each of the other Buddhas also had a supporter who presented him with an incomparable, unrivalled alms giving (dāna).

Gifts in Groups of Threes

1. Gifts (dāna) can also be divided into three categories: inferior (hīna), medium (majjhima), and superior (paṇīta). The degree of benevolence of an act is dependent upon the strength of intention (chanda), the conscious state (citta), energy (virīya) and investigative knowledge (vimāṃsā) involved in the act. When these four constituent elements are weak, the alms giving is said to be of inferior type; when they are of medial standard, the alms giving is regarded as of medium type; when all are strong, the alms giving is considered to be of the superior order.
2. When the act of giving (dāna) is motivated by desire for fame and acclaim, it is of the inferior type; when the goal of giving is for attainment of a happy life as a human being or a Deva, it is of medium type; if the gift is made in reverence to the noble ones (ariya) or Bodhisattas for their exemplary habits of offering, it is an excellent gift of superior order.

In the various discourses of the Pāli texts are mentioned parks and monasteries which were given the names of the individual supporters, for example, Jetavana, the garden of Prince Jeta; Anāthapiṇḍikārāma, the monastery donated by the rich man Anāthapiṇḍika; Ghositārāma, the monastery donated by the rich man Ghosita.

This system of nomenclature was adopted by the elders at the First Council with the intention of encouraging others to follow these examples and thus acquire merit. So, supporters today, when making such gifts, inscribe their names in marble or stone. In doing so, they should keep under control, by exercise of mindfulness, any desire for fame, bearing in mind that they make the gift in order to set an example to those who wish to acquire merit.

3. When the supporter aspires for a happy life as a human or celestial being, his gift is of an inferior type; when the aspiration is for the attainment of Awakening as a disciple (sāvaka-bodhi-ñāṇa), or as an Independent Buddha (Pacceka-buddha-ñāṇa), the gift is a medium one; when one aspires for Perfect Self-Awakening (Sammā-sambodhi-ñāṇa), one's gift is of a superior order.

By Awakening is meant knowledge of one of the four paths. The sages of the past advised that, in order for the gift to serve as a means of escape from the round of rebirths (vivaṭṭa-nissita), one should never make a gift in a haphazard or casual manner; one should seriously and positively aspire for one of the three forms of Awakening while making an offering.

4. Again, gifts may be of three types: Gifts fit for a servant (dāna-dāsa); gifts fit for a friend (dāna-sahāya); and gifts fit for a master (dāna-sāmi).

Just as in everyday life one uses materials of good quality while offering the servants inferior quality, so also if one makes a gift of materials which are poorer in quality than those enjoyed by oneself, the gift is of the inferior type (dāna-dāsa), fit for a servant. Just as [1544] in everyday life one offers one's friends things which one uses and enjoys, so also if one makes a gift of materials which are of the same quality as used by oneself, then the gift is said to be of the medium type (dāna-sahāya). Just as in everyday life if one makes a present of gifts to one's superior of things better in quality than those enjoyed by oneself, so also if one gives a gift of superior quality materials, then the gift is said to be of a superior order (dāna-sāmi).

1. There are three types of gifts of Dhamma (Dhamma-dāna), the division being based on the meaning of the word Dhamma for each type. In the first type of Dhamma gifts, Dhamma is the one associated with the material Dhamma gift (āmisa-dhamma-dāna), mentioned above under the gift (dāna) categories by twos. Therein, it was stated that the material Dhamma gift is the gift of palm-leaf scriptures or books of the Three Baskets (Tipiṭaka). In this classification, the Dhamma is the scriptures themselves, the Dhamma that was taught by the Buddha and recorded on palm leaves or in books. The gift of Dhamma (Dhamma-dāna), therefore, means here teaching the scriptures or giving the knowledge of the Buddha's teachings to others. The scripture is the gift-object, the material that is given; the listener is the recipient; and one who teaches or expounds the Dhamma is the supporter.

2. In the second type of gifts of dhamma (dhamma-dāna), mental objects (dhamma) refers to the phenomena included in the Abhidhamma classification of gifts into six classes: Gifts of forms (rūpa-dāna), sounds (sadda-dāna), smells (gandha-dāna), tastes (rasa-dāna), touches (phoṭṭhabba-dāna) and mental objects (dhamma-dāna). The mental objects, in this particular case, is explained as all that forms the object of the mind or mental objects. The mental objects are: 1) The five sense organs (pasāda-rūpa); 2) the sixteen subtle forms (sukhuma-rūpa); 3) the 89 states of consciousness (citta); 4) the 52 mental factors (cetasika); 5) Nibbāna; and 6) concepts (paññatti). Whereas in the noble scriptures (pariyatti-dhamma), the Dhamma means “noble” here it has the sense of “the truth concerning the real nature of things.”

Gifts of mental objects of this type are made through rendering assistance to those afflicted with physical disabilities, for example, weak eyesight, trouble in hearing, etc. Helping others to improve their eyesight (cakkhu-dhamma-dāna); helping them to improve their hearing (sota-dhamma-dāna), etc. The most distinctive giving of this type is the promotion of the longevity of others (jīvita-dāna). In a similar manner, the remaining gifts of the type: smells (gandha), tastes (rasa), touches (phoṭṭhabba) and mental objects (dhamma) may be understood.

3. In the third type of gifts of Dhamma (Dhamma-dāna), Dhamma refers to the Three Treasures: the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha. As in the first type of gift of Dhamma, the Dhamma here means the scriptures, or the teaching of the Buddha; whereas in the second type, the phenomena is a gift-object for offering, while the listener is the recipient. In this third type, the Dhamma, which is a part of the trinity of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha, itself forms the recipient to which offerings are to be made. When the Buddha and the Saṅgha become recipients, the associated Dhamma also becomes a recipient of offerings.

The Birth Story about the Succession of the Almsfood

This story is described in the introduction to the Birth Story about the Succession of the Almsfood (Bhikkhā-parampara-jātaka, Ja 496): The Buddha was residing in the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattihī, and at that time, a rich householder who had faith in the teaching thought to himself thus: “I have had opportunities to honour the Buddha and his Saṅgha constantly with offerings of food, robes, etc. But I have never honoured the Dhamma by making offerings to it. It is now time that I should do so.” With this thought, he approached the Buddha and asked him how to do it.

The Buddha replied: “If you wish to honour the Dhamma, you should give food, robes, etc. to the monastic who is well cultivated in the Dhamma, but with the clear intention of honouring the Dhamma which he has realized.”

When the householder asked him which monastic would be appropriate to receive such an offering, the Buddha told him to ask the Saṅgha. The Saṅgha directed him to give his offerings to Ven. Ānanda. So he invited Ven. Ānanda and made a generous offering of food, robes, etc. to him, keeping in mind that he was honouring the Dhamma which Ven. Ānanda had realized.

According to the story, the householder is the supporter; food, robes, etc. are material objects [1545] of offering, and the body of the Dhamma which lies embedded in the person of Ven. Ānanda is the recipient of the gift.

King Asoka

This householder was not the only one who made such offerings at the time of the Buddha, keeping in mind the Dhamma as the recipient of offering. The text clearly mentions that the great ruler, Siri Dhammāsoka or King Asoka, with much pious reverence for the Dhamma, built 84,000 monasteries in all, one in honour of each of the 84,000 groups of Dhamma (Dhammakkhanda) which form the complete teaching of the Buddha.

Many have heard of this great alms giving (dāna) of Asoka and have desired to imitate him in such a gift. But it is important to follow his example in a proper manner. The real motive of the Great King Asoka was not merely the giving of monasteries, but the paying of respect to the Dhamma. A building of monasteries serves only to provide him with materials for offering. Later generations of supporters, who wish to follow the example of King Asoka, should understand that they build monasteries not just as objects for offering, not with the intention of acquiring the fame of being a monastery supporter, but with the sole aim of paying homage to the Dhamma.

The significance of these gifts of Dhamma (Dhamma-dāna) may be appreciated when one remembers the importance of the Dhamma. The great commentator, Ven. Mahā Buddhaghosa concluded his work, the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA), the commentary to the Enumeration of Phenomena (Dhamma-saṅgaṇī), the first book of the Abhidhamma, with the wish: “May the true Dhamma endure long. May all beings show reverence to the Dhamma (ciraṃ tiṭṭhatu Saddhammo, Dhamme hontu sagāravā, sabbe pi sattā).” He made this wish because he was fully aware of the important role of the Dhamma. He realised that as long as the Dhamma endures, the teachings of the Buddha cannot decline, and everyone who honours the Dhamma will show reverence to the teachings and follow them. And the Buddha said: “Only those who see the Dhamma see me.” And nearing the end of his life, the Buddha had said that: “The Dhamma will be your teacher after I am gone (so vo mamaccayena satthā).” Therefore, one should strive to cultivate this third type of gift of Dhamma which plays such an important role.

A Gift Difficult to Give

6. Another three types of gift (dāna) are classified as a gift which is difficult to be given (dukkara-dāna); an awe-inspiring gift of great magnificence (mahā-dāna); and common forms of gifts (asāmañña-dāna) which are neither too difficult to make nor too magnificent.

An example of the first type, a gift difficult to be given (dukkara-dāna), may be found in the story of the gifts given by Dārubaṇḍaka to Ven. Tissa. This story is given in the commentary to the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (AA, PTS 2.60).

The Story of the Gifts Given by Dārubaṇḍaka

There was a poor man who lived in Mahāgāma of Śrī Laṅkā who earned his living by selling firewood. His name was Tissa, but because his livelihood was selling firewood, he was known as Dārubaṇḍaka Tissa, “Tissa who has only firewood as property.”

One day, he spoke with his wife: “Our life is so humble, wretched and lowly. Although the Buddha had taught the benefits of the observance of the duty of regular giving (nibaddha-dāna), we cannot afford to cultivate the practice. But we could do one thing; we could start giving alms food regularly, twice a month, and when we can afford more, we will try for the higher offering of food by tickets<sup>414</sup> (salāka-bhatta)." His wife was agreeable to his proposal, and they started giving whatever they could afford as alms food the next morning.

That was a very prosperous time for the monastics, who were receiving plenty of good food. Certain young monastics and novices accepted the poor alms food offered by the Dārubhaṇḍaka's family but threw it away in their presence. The housewife reported to her husband: "They threw away our alms food," but she didn't have an unpleasant thought over [1546] the incident.

Then Dārubhaṇḍaka had a discussion with his wife: "We are so poor; we cannot offer alms food that would please the noble ones. What should we do to satisfy them?" His wife said: "Those who have children are not poor," and in order to give him solace and encouragement she advised him to hire out the services of their daughter to a household and, with the money so acquired, to buy a milch cow. Dārubhaṇḍaka accepted his wife's advice. He obtained twelve pieces of money, with which he bought a cow. Because of the purity of their wholesome volition, the cow yielded large quantities of milk.

The milk they got in the evening was made into cheese and butter. The milk they got in the morning was used by the wife in the preparation of milk porridge, which together with the cheese and butter they offered to the Saṅgha. In this manner, they were able to make offerings of alms food which were well accepted by the Saṅgha. From that time onwards, the ticket food (salāka-bhatta) of Dārubhaṇḍaka was available only to the noble ones of high attainments.

One day, Dārubhaṇḍaka said to his wife: "Thanks to our daughter, we are saved from humiliation. We have reached a position in which the noble ones accept our alms food with great satisfaction. Now, do not miss out on the regular duty of offering alms food during my absence. I shall find some kind of employment and I shall come back after redeeming our daughter from her bondage." Then he went to work for six months in a sugar mill where he managed to save twelve pieces of money with which to redeem his daughter.

<sup>414</sup> According to I.B. Horner in the Book of the Discipline (2.313), food tickets were issued at times when food was scarce. But the story of Dārubhaṇḍaka suggests that the same was adopted also when food was abundant as a higher form of alms giving (dāna).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2650

Setting out for home early one morning, he saw ahead of him Ven. Tissa on his way to worship at the relic shrine (stūpa) at Mahāgāma. This monastic was one who cultivated the austere practice of partaking only of alms food which is offered to him when going on alms round. Dārubhaṇḍaka walked fast to catch up with the monastic and strolled along with him, listening to his Dhamma talk. Approaching a village, Dārubhaṇḍaka saw a man coming out with a packet of cooked rice in his hand. He offered the man one piece of money to sell him the meal-packet.

The man, realising that there must be some special reason for offering one piece of money for the food packet when it was not worth the sixteenth part of it, refused to sell it for one piece of money. Dārubhaṇḍaka increased his offer to two, then three pieces of money and so on until he had offered all the money he possessed. But the man still declined the offer thinking Dārubhaṇḍaka had still more money with him.

Finally, Dārubhaṇḍaka explained to the man: “I have no money with me other than these twelve pieces. I would have given you more if I had. I am buying this meal packet not for myself, but, wishing to offer alms food, I have requested a monastic to wait for me under the shade of a tree. The food is to be offered to that monastic. Do sell me the packet of food for these twelve pieces of money. You will also gain merit by doing so.”

The man finally agreed to sell his food-packet and Dārubhaṇḍaka took it with great happiness to the waiting monastic. Taking the bowl from the monastic, Dārubhaṇḍaka put the cooked rice from the packet into it. But Ven. Tissa accepted only half of the meal. Dārubhaṇḍaka made an earnest request to the monastic: “Venerable sir, this meal is sufficient for only one person. I will not eat any of it. I bought the food intending it only for you. Out of compassion for me, may the venerable one accept the food.” Upon this, Ven. Tissa permitted him to offer all the food in the packet.

After Ven. Tissa had finished the meal, they continued the journey together, and he asked Dārubhaṇḍaka about himself. Dārubhaṇḍaka told everything about himself to Ven. Tissa. The venerable was struck with awe by the intense piety of Dārubhaṇḍaka, and he thought to himself: “This man has made a gift which is difficult to be given (dukkara-dāna). Having partaken of the meal offered by him, under difficult circumstances, I am greatly indebted to him, and I should show my gratitude in return. If I can find a suitable place, I shall strive hard to become an Arahat in one sitting. Let all my skin, flesh and blood dry up, I will not stir from this position until I attain the goal.” As they reached Mahāgāma, they went on their separate ways.

On arriving at the Tissa Mahā Vihāra monastery, Ven. Tissa was allotted a room [1547] for himself, where he made his great effort, determined not to leave the place until he had eradicated all defilements and become an Arahat. Not even getting up to go on alms round, he steadfastly worked on until at the dawn of the seventh day, he became an Arahat fully accomplished in the four branches of analytical knowledge (paṭisambhidā). Then he thought to himself thus: “My body is greatly enfeebled. I wonder whether I could live longer.” He realised, through exercise of his psychic powers, that the mind and matter (nāma-rūpa) which constituted his living body would not continue much longer. Putting everything in order in his dwelling place and taking his bowl and double robe, he went to the Assembly Hall at the centre of the monastery and sounded the drum to assemble all the monastics.

When all the monastics had gathered together, the head monk enquired who had called for the assembly. Ven. Tissa, who had cultivated the austere practice of taking only alms food, replied: “I have sounded the drum, venerable sir.” – “And why have you done so?” – “I have no other purpose, but if any member of the Saṅgha has doubts about the attainments of the paths and fruitions, I wish them to ask me about them.”

The head venerable told him there were no questions. He then asked Ven. Tissa why he had persevered so arduously, sacrificing even his life for the attainment. He related all that had happened and informed him that he would pass away the same day. Then he said: “May the bier on which my corpse is supported remain immoveable until my alms food supporter, Dārubhaṇḍaka, comes and lifts it with his own hands.” And he passed away that very day.

Then King Kākavaṇṇa Tissa came and ordered his men to put the body on the bier and take it to the funeral pyre at the cremating grounds, but they were not able to move it. Finding out the reason for this, the king sent for Dārubhaṇḍaka, had him dressed in fine clothes and asked him to lift up the bier.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2652

The text gives an elaborate account of how Dārubhaṇḍaka lifted the bier with the body on it easily over his head and how, as he did so, the bier rose in the air and travelled by itself to the funeral pyre.

Dārubhaṇḍaka's gift involved the ungrudging sacrifice of twelve pieces of money which were needed for redeeming his own daughter from servitude and which had taken six whole months to earn, and it is indeed a very difficult one to give, and thus it is known as a gift difficult to give (dukkara-dāna).

Sukha the Novice

Another example of such gifts is found in the story of the novice Sukha, given in the commentary to the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, DhP 145). Before he became a novice, he was a poor villager who wanted to eat the sumptuous meal of a rich man. The rich man Gandha told him that he would have to work for three years to earn such a meal. Accordingly, he worked for three years and obtained the meal he so earnestly longed for. When he was about to enjoy it, a Paccekabuddha happened to come by. Without any hesitation, he offered the Paccekabuddha the meal, which he had so cherished and which had taken him three years to earn.

A Poor Girl

Another example is provided by the Birth Story about the Wealthy Man's Daughter Ummādanṭī (Ummādanṭī-jātaka, Ja 527), which gives the story of a poor girl who worked for three years to get printed clothes, which she wanted to adorn herself with. When she was about to dress herself in the clothes, which she had so yearned for, a disciple of Buddha Kassapa came by who was covered only with leaves because he had been robbed of his robes by thieves. The giving away of clothes, which she so cherished and for which she had to work for three years, is also a gift difficult to give (dukkara).

Great Offerings

Awe-inspiring offerings of great magnificence are called great offerings (mahā-dāna). The great Siri Dhammāsoka's offering of 84,000 monasteries in honour of the 84,000 passages of the canon are great offerings of this type. On this account, Ven. Mahā Moggaliputta Tissa said: "In the Dispensation of the Buddha, or even in the lifetime of the Buddha, there is no one equal to you as a supporter of the four requisites. Your offering is the greatest."

Although Ven. Mahā Moggaliputta Tissa said so, the gifts of Asoka were made on [1548] his own initiative, without anyone to compete with and, therefore, there is no need to classify them as a matched (sadisa) or matchless (asadisa) type of offering. King Pasenadi Kosala's gifts were made in competition with those of the citizens of Sāvattthī and are, therefore, properly termed matchless offerings (asadisa-dāna).

Common Offerings

All other gifts of an ordinary nature which are neither difficult to make nor of great magnitude are just common gifts (sāmañña-dāna).

In addition to these, there is another classification of three gifts of Dhamma (Dhamma-dāna) described in the Vinaya Summary (Parivāra) and its commentary:

1. Giving to the Saṅgha gifts which were verbally declared to be offered to the Saṅgha.
2. Giving to the relic shrine (stūpa) gifts which were verbally declared to be offered to the shrine.
3. Giving to an individual gifts which were verbally declared to be offered to an individual.

These are called righteous gifts (Dhammika-dāna), gifts offered in connection with the Dhamma. Further details of these types of gifts will be found below, in accordance with the nine kinds of unrighteous gifts (adhammika-dāna).

Gifts in Groups of Fours

The texts do not mention any type of gifts by fours. But the Vinaya lists four kinds of requisites which may be offered as gifts. They are:

1. Gifts of robe or robe-materials (cīvara-dāna).
2. Gifts of alms food (piṇḍapāta-dāna).
3. Gifts of dwelling places (senāsana-dāna).
4. Gifts of medicines (bhesajja-dāna).

Gifts may also be classified into four types depending on the purity of the supporter and the receiver:

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2654

1. Gifts where the supporter is moral but the recipient is not.
2. Gifts where the recipient is moral but the supporter is not.
3. Gifts where both the supporter and the recipient are immoral.
4. Gifts where both the recipient and the supporter are moral.

Gifts in Groups of Fives

The Discourse on the Timely Gift (Kāla-dāna-sutta, AN 5.36) mentions the following five types of gifts which are to be given at an appropriate time:

1. Gifts made to a visitor.
2. Gifts made to one starting on a journey.
3. Gifts made to one who is ill.
4. Gifts made at the time of scarcity.
5. Gifts of newly harvested grains and crops made to those endowed with virtue.

The fifth type has direct reference to farmers and cultivators, but it should be understood that it also includes the first fruits of labour of anyone who offers them as gifts (dāna) before using them for oneself.

Five Kinds of Gifts to Men of No Virtue

There are five kinds of gifts made by men of no virtue (asappurisa-dāna):

1. Gifts made without seeing carefully that the gift to be offered is properly prepared, fresh, wholesome and clean. [1549]
2. Gifts made without due reverence or consideration.
3. Gifts made without offering it with one's own hands; for example, the gift (dāna) of King Pāyāsi, who instead of presenting the gifts with his own hands, had his attendant Uttara do so for him.

Pāyāsi, a chieftain at Setavya in the kingdom of Kosala, was reborn in the Catumahārājika as a result of his alms giving in the human world. He related his past experiences to the visiting Ven. Gavampati. He said he had given alms without thorough preparation, not with his own hand, without due thought, as something discarded, and hence his rebirth in that lowest of the six celestial planes. But Uttara, the young man who supervised his alms giving at his request, was reborn in a higher abode, Tāvātimsa, because he gave with thorough preparation with his own hand, with due thought, not as something discarded. The story teaches the right way of alms giving.

4. Gifts made in the manner of discarding one's leftovers.
5. Gifts made without the knowledge that the good deed done now will surely bring good results in the future (kammasakata-ñāṇa).

Five Kinds of Gifts to Men of Virtue

There are five kinds of gifts made by men of virtue (sappurisa-dāna), these two groups of five kinds of gifts are described in the Discourse about Gifts given by Inferior People (Asappurisa-dāna-sutta, AN 5.147):

1. Gifts made after seeing carefully that the gift to be offered is properly prepared, fresh, wholesome and clean.
2. Gifts made with due reverence, with the mind firmly fixed on the material for offering.
3. Gifts made with one's own hands.

Throughout the beginningless cycle of existences, about the beginning of which we have no knowledge, there have been many existences in which one is not equipped with hands and feet. In this existence, when one has the rare fortune of being equipped with complete limbs, one should avail oneself of this rare opportunity of offering gifts with one's own hands, reflecting that one would work for liberation making use of the hands one is fortunate enough to be born with.

4. Gifts made with due care and not as if one is discarding one's leftovers.
5. Gifts made with the knowledge that the good deed done now will surely bring good results in the future.

Another Five Kinds of Gifts

This classification of five kinds of gifts (dāna) is found in the [1550] Discourse about Gifts given by Superior People (Sappurisa-dāna-sutta, AN 5.148).

1. Gifts made with faith in the law of cause and effect (saddhā-dāna).
2. Gifts made after seeing carefully that the gift to be offered is properly prepared, fresh, wholesome and clean (sakkacca-dāna).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2656

3. Gifts made at the right time, on the proper occasion (kāla-dāna).<sup>415</sup>
4. Gifts made with a view to rendering assistance to the recipient or to show kindness to him (anuggaha-dāna).
5. Gifts made without affecting, in any way, one's dignity and the dignity of others (anupaghāta-dāna).

All of these five kinds of gifts give rise to great wealth, riches and prosperity. In addition, gifts made with faith (saddhā-dāna) result in a fair, handsome appearance. As a result of gifts made after preparation (sakkacca-dāna), one's followers and attendants are attentive and obedient. Resulting from being given at the right time (kāla-dāna) are benefits that come at the right time and in abundance. As a result of gifts offering assistance (anuggaha-dāna), one is well disposed to enjoy the fruits of one's good deeds and is able to do so in full. As a result of gifts that do no harm (anupaghāta-dāna), one's property is fully protected against the five destructive elements of water, fire, kings, thieves and unloved heirs.

The opposites of these five kinds of gifts are not mentioned in the texts, but it may be assumed that the five corresponding gifts made by people with no virtues would be as follows:

1. Gifts made without believing in the law of cause and effect (asaddhiya-dāna), just to imitate others' gifts or to escape from being censured or reviled.

Such a gift will produce wealth and riches for the supporter, but he will not be bestowed with a fine appearance.

2. Gifts made without seeing carefully that the gift to be offered is properly prepared, fresh, wholesome and clean (asakkacca-dāna).

Wealth and riches will accrue from such gifts, but the supporter will not receive obedience and discipline from his subordinates.

3. Gifts made at an inappropriate time (akāla-dāna).

---

<sup>415</sup> When it is the meal-time, alms food is offered; when it is the Kaṭhina season, robes are offered, and so on.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2657

It will produce wealth, but its beneficial results will not be in great abundance and will not come at the time needed.

4. Gifts made perfunctorily (ananuggaha-dāna) without intention of assisting or doing honour to the recipient.

One may reap riches and wealth out of such deeds, but one will not be disposed to enjoy his wealth, or he may be denied the occasion to enjoy them.

5. Gifts made in such a way that it will affect, in some way, one's dignity or the dignity of others (upaghāta-dāna).

Wealth and riches may accrue from such gifts, but they will be subject to damage or destruction by the five enemies.

In view of the gifts at the appropriate time (kāla-dāna) and the gifts at the inappropriate time (akāla-dāna) mentioned above, it should be well noted that it is improper to make offerings, even with the best of intentions, of light to the Buddha during the day when there is light, or of food when it is afternoon.

Five Kinds of Immoral Gifts

The Summary (Parivāra) of the Basket of Discipline (Vinaya-piṭaka) mentions five kinds of giving which are commonly and conventionally called by people deeds of merit, but which are nothing but harmful, demeritorious forms of offering. They are:

1. A gift of intoxicants (majja-dāna).
2. A holding of festivals (samajja-dāna).
3. Provision of prostitutes for sexual enjoyment (itthi-dāna).
4. Dispatch of bulls into a herd of cows for mating (usabha-dāna).
5. Drawing and offering of pornographic pictures (citta-kamma-dāna).

The Buddha described these forms of offering as immoral, demeritorious gifts because they cannot be accompanied by good intentions or wholesome volitions. Some people think that by providing opium to an addicted person who is nearing death because of withdrawal from the drug, they are doing a meritorious deed of giving life (jīvita-dāna). As a matter of fact, this does not constitute an act of merit because it is an unwholesome consciousness that motivates one to offer opium which is not suitable for consumption. The same consideration holds good in the case of offering intoxicants.

The commentary to the Birth Stories (Jātaka) mentions the inclusion of intoxicating drinks in the display of materials to be given away by the Bodhisatta King Vessantara as a great offering (mahā-dāna).

Some people try to explain this inclusion of intoxicants as materials for offering by King Vessantara by saying that the king had no intention of providing liquor to the drunkards, that it is only the volition that determines the merits of an offering; as King Vessantara did not want anyone to drink the intoxicants, there is no wrong intention involved. He merely wanted to avoid being criticised by those who would say that the king's great gifts (dāna) has no offerings of intoxicants.

But such rationalizations are untenable. Great persons, like King Vessantara, do not worry about criticism levelled at them by others, especially when the criticism is unjustified. The fact of the matter is that it is only in drinking that the guilt lies; using it as a lotion or for [1551] medicinal preparations in a proper manner is not demeritorious. We should take it, therefore, that it is for such purposes that King Vessantara included intoxicants as materials for offering in his great gifts (mahā-dāna).

Five Kinds of Great Offerings

In the Discourse on the Streams of Merit (Abhisanda-sutta, AN 8.39), comprehensive expositions are given of the five precepts, beginning with the words: Pañcimāni bhikkhave dānāni, mahā-dānāni, describing “the five precepts as the five kinds of great gifts (mahā-dāna).” But it should not be thought that virtue (sīla) is generosity (dāna) just because the five precepts are described as the five great gifts in the text mentioned above. The Buddha does not mean to say that morality (sīla) is not different from giving (dāna) or that the two are exactly the same. Morality (sīla) is proper restraint of one's physical and verbal actions, and giving (dāna) is the offering of a gift, and the two should not be taken as identical.

When a virtuous person observes the precept of non-killing and abstains from taking the life of other beings, that virtuous person is actually giving them the gift of harmlessness (abhaya-dāna). The same consideration applies to the remaining precepts. Thus, when all the five precepts are well observed by a moral person, he is, by his restraint, offering all beings gifts of freedom from harm, danger, worries, anxiety, etc. It is in this sense that the Buddha teaches here that observance of the five precepts constitutes offering of the five great gifts (mahā-dāna).

Gifts in Groups of Sixes

Just as the texts do not mention any list of gifts in groups of fours as such, so there is no direct mention of types of gifts in groups of six either. But the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA), the commentary to the Enumeration of Phenomena (Dhamma-saṅgaṇī), gives an exposition of six types of gifts in which the six sense objects provide materials for offerings: the gift of colour, sound, odour, taste, objects of touch, and mind-objects.

Gifts in Groups of Sevens

Similarly, there is no mention of types of gifts in groups of sevens as such, but the seven kinds of gifts to the Saṅgha (Saṅghika-dāna) described above under the heading Gifts in Pairs and Gifts to the Saṅgha may be taken to represent this type of gift (dāna).

Gifts in Groups of Eights

The Buddha teaches a group of eight types of gifts (dāna) in the First Discourse on Gifts (Paṭhama-dāna-sutta, AN 8.31). The eight gifts are:

1. Gifts made without delay, without hesitation, as soon as the recipient arrives.
2. Gifts made through fear of censure or of being reborn in the realms of misery and suffering.
3. Gifts made because the recipient had in the past given him gifts.
4. Gifts made with the intention that the recipient of the offering will make a return offering in future.
5. Gifts made with the thought that making a gift is a good deed.
6. Gifts made with the thought: “I am a householder who prepares and cooks food to eat; it would not be proper if I partake of the food without making offerings to those who are not allowed by their disciplinary rules to prepare and cook their own food.”

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2660

7. Gifts made with the thought: “The gift I am offering will bring me a good reputation which will spread far and wide.”
8. Gifts made with the idea that it will serve as an instrument to help one attain concentration when one fails to achieve it while practising concentration and insight meditation.

Of the eight kinds of gifts, the last one is the best and the noblest. The reason is that this [1552] last type of gift is unique, one which promotes joy and delight in one who is practising concentration and insight meditation, and renders great assistance to his endeavours in meditation.

The first seven modes of giving do not arouse and encourage the mind in the work of concentration and insight meditation but of them, the first and the fifth are superior ones (pañīta). The seventh type is an inferior one (hīna), while numbers 2, 3, 4 and 6 are of medium status.

The eight categories of gifts may be divided into two groups: gifts which belong to the sphere of meritorious giving (puñña-visaya-dāna) and gifts which belong to the sphere of worldly gifts (loka-visaya-dāna). The first, the fifth and the eighth are gifts which belong to the sphere of meritorious giving and the remaining five belong to the gifts which belong to the sphere of worldly gifts.

Again, the Discourse on the Bases for Gifts (Dāna-vatthu-sutta, AN 8.33) provides another list of eight gifts.

1. Gifts made out of affection.
2. Gifts made under unavoidable circumstances, made reluctantly and showing resentment.
3. Gifts made through delusion and foolishness without understanding the law of cause and effect.
4. Gifts made through fear of censure, through fear of rebirth in the realms of misery and suffering, through fear of harm that may be caused by the recipient.
5. Gifts made with the thought: “It has been the tradition of generations of my ancestors, and I should carry on the tradition.”
6. Gifts made with the objective of gaining rebirth in the Deva realms.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2661

7. Gifts made with the hope of experiencing joy and delight with a pure mind.
8. Gifts made with the idea that it will serve as an instrument to help one attain concentration when one fails to achieve it while practising concentration and insight meditation.

Of these eight categories of gifts also, only the eighth kind is the noblest; the sixth and the seventh are gifts which belong to the sphere of meritorious giving. The remaining five are of inferior status belonging to the gifts which belong to the sphere of worldly gifts.

Again, in the Discourse on Rebirths following Gifts (Dānūpapatti-sutta, AN 8.35), the Buddha had taught comprehensively on the subject of gaining a good rebirth as a result of giving alms (dānūpapatti). According to the eight kinds of destination to be gained as future births, the gifts are divided into eight categories:

1. Seeing the happy circumstances of rich and prosperous people in this life, one makes gifts (dāna) wishing for such wealth and comfortable life in the future and, at the same time, taking care to lead a life of morality. After death, his wish is fulfilled; he gains rebirth in the human world in happy, comfortable and wealthy circumstances.
2. Hearing that the Catumahārājika Devas are powerful beings leading a life of comfort and pleasures, one makes gifts wishing for such a powerful, comfortable life full of pleasures in the Catumahārājika realm and at the same time taking care to lead a life of morality. After death, his wish is fulfilled; he is reborn in the Catumahārājika realm.
3. Hearing that the Tāvatiṃsa Devas are powerful beings leading a life of comfort and pleasures, one makes gifts wishing for such a powerful, comfortable life full of pleasures in the Tāvatiṃsa realm and at the same time taking care to lead a life of morality. After death, his wish is fulfilled; he is reborn in the Tāvatiṃsa realm.
4. Hearing that the Yāma Devas are powerful beings leading a life of comfort and pleasures, one makes gifts wishing for such a powerful, comfortable life full of pleasures in the Yāma realm and at the same time taking care to lead a life of morality. After death, his wish is fulfilled; he is reborn in the Yāma realm.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2662

5. Hearing that the Tusita Devas are powerful beings leading a life of comfort and pleasures, one makes gifts wishing for such a powerful, comfortable life full of pleasures in the Tusita realm and at the same time taking care to lead a life of morality. After death, his wish is fulfilled; he is reborn in the Tusita realm.
6. Hearing that the Nimmānarati Devas are powerful beings leading a life of comfort and pleasures, one makes gifts wishing for such a powerful, comfortable life full of pleasures in the Nimmānarati realm and at the same time taking care to lead a life of morality. After death, his wish is fulfilled; he is reborn in the Nimmānarati realm.
7. Hearing that the Paranimmitavasavattī Devas are powerful beings leading a life of comfort and pleasures, one makes gifts wishing for such a powerful, comfortable life full of pleasures in the Paranimmitavasavattī realm and at the same time taking care to lead a life of morality. After death, his wish is fulfilled; he is reborn in the Paranimmitavasavattī realm.
8. Hearing that the Brahmas are powerful beings leading a life of comfort and pleasures, one makes gifts wishing for such a powerful, comfortable life full of pleasures in the Brahma world and at the same time taking care to lead a life of morality. After death, his wish is fulfilled; he is reborn in the Brahma world.

It should not be concluded from the above statements that the giving of alms alone is a sure guarantee for a happy life in the Brahma world. As stated under the eighth type, in the above two categories, it is only by making the mind pliable and gentle through offering of alms and through development of concentration up to the absorption (jhāna) stage, by practising meditation on the four immeasurables: loving-kindness (mettā), compassion (karuṇā), sympathetic joy (muditā) and equanimity (upekkhā) that one can gain rebirth in the Brahma world.

Again, in the Discourse on the Gifts of a Good Person (Sappurisa-dāna-sutta, AN 8.37) there is the following list of eight gifts (dāna) given by a moral person (sappurisa-dāna):

1. Giving of gifts which have been made clean, pure and attractive.
2. Giving of gifts of choice materials and of excellent quality.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2663

3. Giving of gifts at proper and appropriate times.
4. Giving of gifts which are suitable for and acceptable to the recipient.
5. Giving of gifts, after making careful selection of the recipient and the objects to be offered.

Excluding persons of immoral conduct, the selected recipients should be moral persons who follow the teachings of the Buddha. As to the materials to be offered, when possessing things of both good and bad quality, better quality materials should be selected for making a gift.

6. Giving of gifts according to one's ability in a consistent manner.
7. Giving of gifts with a pure, calm mind.
8. Giving of gifts and feeling glad after having done so.

A separate list of eight types of gifts made by persons of immoral conduct (asappurisa-dāna) is not given as such in the texts, but one could surmise that they would be as follows:

1. Giving of gifts which are unclean, impure and unattractive.
2. Giving of gifts of inferior quality.
3. Giving of gifts at improper and inappropriate times.
4. Giving of gifts which are unsuitable for the recipient.
5. Giving of gifts without making careful selection of the recipient and the objects to be offered.
6. Giving of gifts only occasionally although one is capable of doing so in a consistent manner.
7. Giving of gifts without calming the mind.
8. Giving of gifts feeling remorse after having done so.

Gifts by Groups of Nines

The Vinaya Summary (Parivāra) mentions the nine types of giving which were taught by the Buddha as not valid as a deed of offering (adhammika-dāna). The commentary on the text explains these nine types of gifts as follows: [1554]

Causing the gift which was intended by the supporter for a certain group of the Saṅgha:

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2664

1. To be given to another group of the Saṅgha.
2. To be given to a shrine.
3. To be given to an individual.

Causing the gift which was intended by the supporter for a certain shrine:

4. To be given to another shrine.
5. To be given to the Saṅgha.
6. To be given to an individual.

Causing the gift which was intended by the supporter for a certain individual:

7. To be given to another individual.
8. To be given to the Saṅgha.
9. To be given to a shrine.

Here the gift which has been intended by the supporter means the four requisites of robes, food, dwelling places and medicines and other small items of necessities which the supporter has already committed verbally to give to the Saṅgha, or to a shrine, or an individual.

The story of why the Buddha taught these nine types of unrighteous gifts is given in the Expulsion (Pārājika) and Confession (Pācittiya) texts of the Basket of Discipline (Vinaya-piṭaka).

At one time the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattihī. Then a certain group of people decided to make offerings of food and robes to the Saṅgha. Accordingly, they made the necessary preparations and had the robes and food ready for the offering. A group of immoral monastics went to the would-be supporters and forcibly urged them to make the offering of robes to them instead. Being thus forced to give away the robes to the immoral monastics, the people had only food left to offer to the Saṅgha. Hearing of this, the modest monastics denounced the immoral monastics and reported what had happened to the Buddha. It was then that the Buddha laid down the rule: “Whatever monastic should knowingly appropriate for himself the gift which has been declared to be intended for the Saṅgha, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture (Vinaya Np 30).”

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2665

In the explanation that accompanies the rule, the Buddha explains: “If the gift that is already committed by word of mouth to be given to the Saṅgha is appropriated for oneself, there is the offence of expiation involving forfeiture (nissaggiya-pācittiya-āpatti); if it is caused to be given to the Saṅgha other than the intended one or to a shrine, there is an offence of wrong-doing (dukkata-āpatti). Knowing the gift is intended for a certain shrine, if it is made to be given to another shrine or to the Saṅgha or to an individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing. Knowing the gift is intended to be given to a certain individual, if it is caused to be given to another individual, or to the Saṅgha, or to a shrine, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

The above story is given to illustrate how one’s well-intentioned deeds of merit could become vitiated through intervention and interference of undesirable intermediaries and how, due to their intervention, it could be turned into an unrighteous gift (adhammika-dāna). The Buddha also explained the nine unrighteous acceptances (adhammika-paṭiggaha) of the nine unrighteous gifts and the nine righteous uses (dhammika-paribhoga) of righteously offered requisites.

It should be noted, however, that not every transfer of gifts from the recipient originally intended by the supporter to another results in an unrighteous gift. The supporter himself may change his original intention for some good reason or may be persuaded by a well-wisher to transfer the gift for acquiring more merit.

An illustration of such a transfer of gifts is found in the story of Mahā Pajāpatī who had made a new robe intending it to be offered to the Buddha. The Buddha advised her to offer the robe to the Saṅgha instead. If it were an offence, the Buddha would not have given the advice. As a matter of fact, the Buddha knew that Mahā Pajāpatī would gain much greater merit by offering the robe to the Saṅgha headed by himself. [1555]

In another instance, the Buddha persuaded King Pasenadi of Kosala to change his mind about permitting a monastery for ascetics of another faith to be built close by the Jetavana monastery. The king had been bribed by the ascetics into granting land to build their monastery. Foreseeing endless disputes that would later arise, the Buddha first sent Ven. Ānanda and other monastics and later the two chief disciples, Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, to dissuade the king from taking the bribe and granting the land to the ascetics. The king gave some excuse to avoid seeing the great disciples. Consequently, the Buddha himself had to go to the king and told him the story of King Bharu, mentioned in the Birth Story about the King of Bharu (Bharu-jātaka, Ja 213), who, in a similar situation, had caused much suffering through taking bribes. Fully convinced of his wrong doing, King Pasenadi made amends by withdrawing the grant of land and appropriating the building materials gathered in it by the ascetics. The king then had a monastery built with those materials on the very site and donated it to the Buddha.

As stated above, there is no offence when a supporter changes his first intention for a good reason and makes the offer to another person. This has direct reference to one of the attributes of the noble Saṅgha (Ariya-saṅgha). If a supporter prepares gifts for monastics who would be visiting him, but then in the meantime, monastics who are well-established in the higher phenomena and who are members of the noble Saṅgha arrive, he may change his mind and offer the gifts to the newcomers to his better advantage. And they may also accept such gifts. They may also make use of the gifts so received. Being worthy of accepting such gifts originally intended for visitors is an attribute of the noble Saṅgha (pāhuneyya).

Gifts in Groups of Tens and Fourteens

As in the case of gifts in groups of fours, sixes, or sevens there is no direct mention of types of gifts in groups of tens in the texts. But the commentaries provide a list of ten material things which may be offered as gifts.

Likewise, the Discourse on the Analysis of Offerings (Dakkhiṇā-vibhaṅga-sutta, MN 142) gives a list of gifts (dāna) which come under the category of the fourteen kinds of gifts by individuals.<sup>416</sup>

5-6. What Strengthens and Weakens the Beneficial Results

The Discourse on the Gifts with Six Factors (Chalāṅga-dāna-sutta, AN 6.37) explains the elements that strengthen the beneficial results of gifts and those that weaken them.

At one time, the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattihī. At that time, he saw, by his supernormal psychic power of divine sight, that a certain female follower of his teaching by the name of Nandamātā was making an offering to the two chief disciples and the Saṅgha, in the distant town of Velukantakī.

<sup>416</sup> See item 19 of the types of alms giving (dāna) in the groups of twos above.

He said to the monastics: “Monastics, Nandamātā of Velukantakī is right now making a great offering to the Saṅgha headed by Sāriputta and Moggallāna. Her offering has the distinguished feature of the supporter possessing three special qualities of volitional purity: feeling happy before the act of offering; having a clear, pure mind while making the offering; and rejoicing after having made the offering, and of the recipients possessing three special qualities of mental purity: being free of attachment (rāga) or practising to be liberated from it; being free of ill-will (dosa) or practising to be liberated from it; being free of delusion (moha) or practising to be liberated from it.

Monastics, just as the water in the ocean is immeasurable, the benefit that will accrue from an offering distinguished by those six features is also immeasurable. [1556] You speak of the water in the ocean as an immeasurably huge mass of water, likewise you speak of such an offering, which is unique with these six features, as one that will bring an immeasurably huge accumulation of merit.”

According to this text, it may be seen that the three qualities possessed by the supporter and the three qualities possessed by the recipients form the elements that strengthen the beneficial results of gifts. It follows from it that, to the extent that the supporter and the recipients are lacking in their respective qualities, to that extent will the act of giving (dāna) fall short of the full possible beneficial results.

Again, in the ninth birth story of the Long Birth Story about Dhammapāla (Mahā-Dhammapāla-jātaka, Ja 447), it is mentioned that King Suddhodana was a Brahmin in a past life. The great teacher of Takkasīlā, to whom he had entrusted his son for education, asked him why members of his clan did not die young but lived to a ripe old age. He replied in verse:

Pubbeva dānā sumanā bhavāma, dadam-pi ve attamanā bhavāma, datvā pi ve nānutappāma pacchā, tasmā hi amhaṃ daharā na mīyare.

We feel very happy before we make an offering, we are delighted and satisfied while making the offering, and we rejoice after having made the offering, never feeling remorseful. For these three reasons, people never die young in our clan.

From this story, one can surmise that when an offering is made with fulfilment of these three volitional conditions, the benefit that accrues from it is enjoyment of long life in the present existence.

Again, in the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA) and the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada) commentary are mentioned four conditions that bring beneficial results in the present life from an act of offering:

1. The materials to be offered as gifts have been acquired legitimately and equitably (paccayānaṃ dhammikā).
2. They are given with faith and confidence and with fulfilment of three volitional conditions (cetanā-mahattā).
3. The recipient is one of high attainment, an Arahāt or a Non-returner (vatthu-sampatti).
4. The recipient has just arisen from the attainment of cessation (guṇātirekatā).

Offerings of this kind, which bring beneficial results in the present life, were made by people such as Puṇṇa, Kākavaliya and the flower girl Sumanā, who reaped great benefits from their gifts which met these four conditions completely.

In the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA), these four conditions for a gift are termed “the four purities of gifts (dakkhiṇā-visuddhi);” in the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada) commentary, they are called “the four accomplishments (sampadā).”

Again, there is a list of four kinds of purity (dakkhiṇā-visuddhi) connected with an act of giving (dāna) in the Discourse on the Analysis of Offerings (Dakkhiṇā-vibhaṅga-sutta, MN 142). They are:

1. A gift made pure by the supporter but not by the recipient.

Even if the recipient is of no moral virtue (dussīla), if the supporter is virtuous and makes an offering of what has been acquired legitimately and equitably, with pure and good volition before, during and after giving the gift and does it with full faith in the law of cause and effect, then the gift is pure because of the supporter and will bring great benefit.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2669

2. A gift made pure by the recipient but not by the supporter.

Even if the supporter is of no moral virtue and makes an offering of what has been acquired illegitimately and inequitably, and does not have pure, good volition before, during and after giving the gift, and is without faith in the law of cause and effect, if the recipient is morally [1557] virtuous, then the gift is pure because of the recipient and will bring great benefits.

3. A gift not made pure either by the supporter or the recipient.

When the supporter of no moral virtue makes an offering of ill-gotten wealth to an immoral recipient with no pure, good volition before, during and after the act of offering and without faith in the law of cause and effect, the gift will bring no great beneficial result, just as a poor seed planted on poor soil will not grow properly to produce good crops.

4. A gift made pure both by the supporter and the recipient.

When the supporter of moral virtue makes an offering of what has been acquired legitimately and equitably, with pure and good volition before, during and after the act of offering to a morally virtuous recipient, the gift will bring great beneficial result, just as a good seed planted in good soil produces good crops.

The third type, of course, is not concerned with purity at all, but it is mentioned to include all the cases involved. To summarise all that we have considered, there are five elements that strengthen the beneficial results of gifts:

1. The supporter observes the precepts and is of good moral conduct.
2. The recipient is also morally virtuous.
3. The materials offered have been acquired justly and rightly.
4. The offering is made with happiness before, with pure satisfaction and delight during, and with rejoicing after having made the offer.
5. The supporter has complete faith in the law of cause and effect.

These five elements should accompany the gift so that it will be of greatest purity and benefit; to the extent they are lacking when offerings are made, to that extent will the gift be deficient in beneficial results.

Some Remarks on Faith

It is important to understand clearly the complete meaning of the fifth element: “faith in the law of cause and effect.” Here, faith is the rendering of the Pāli word saddhā. Grammatically, it would mean “that which holds and keeps well.”

Just as clear water in which all sediment and impurities have settled down to the bottom can hold the image of the moon and of the sun and keep it well, so also faith, which is devoid of mental defilements, can firmly hold the virtues and attributes of the Buddha to serve as an object for contemplation.

To give another illustration: If a man is not equipped with hands, he would not be able to help himself to jewels lying around him although he sees them. If he does not possess wealth, he would not be able to provide himself with a variety of goods and materials.

Without seeds, there would be neither crops nor grains. Similarly, without faith, we cannot acquire the jewels of generosity, morality and the development of concentration and insight, and there can be no enjoyment of the pleasures of the human or Deva realm or the bliss of Nibbāna. Hence, the Buddha in his teaching compared faith to possessing hands, wealth or seeds.

In the Questions of King Milinda (Milinda-pañha) and Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA) commentary, faith is compared to the crown jewel, the ruby, of a Universal Monarch, which has the property of instantly purifying and clearing the water into which it is put, no matter how dirty the water is. In a similar manner, faith dispels instantly all that is defiling the mind and makes it pure and clear at once. If the mind is filled with faith, there is no room in it for defilements, such as grief, worry, etc.

How difficult it is to keep the mind steadfastly contemplating the attributes of the Buddha is within the experience of all good Buddhists. In other words, it is not a simple matter to keep the mind only filled with faith, devoid of all defilements. But with practice, one can maintain a pure, clear mind through faith for short periods until, with steadfast effort, one can do so continuously for long periods. [1558]

As regards having faith in the law of cause and effect mentioned above, we should reflect thus: “I will have spent a certain amount of my wealth by offering this gift (dāna), but it will not be spent in vain. Through this act of giving (dāna) I will have developed volitions which are much more precious than the wealth I will have spent. My wealth is liable to be destroyed by the five kinds of enemies, but this mental volition is indestructible and will follow me through the rounds of existence till I attain Nibbāna. Ability to keep the mind clear and pure in this manner is having faith in the law of cause and effect, the mental volition.”

And considering the results that would accrue from the mental action, we will come to a very clear, definite conclusion: “Because of this mental volition, I will reap beneficial results throughout the rounds of existence, there is no doubt about it.” Reflecting thus and experiencing the exhilarating purity of the mind is having faith in the law of cause and effect.

Thus, it is important to develop faith, through reflecting on the law of cause and effect, which is conducive to purity of mind, for it is the fifth element that strengthens the beneficial results of giving (dāna).

2. The Perfection of Morality

The author gives here an elaborate description of the animal cāmarī, which we have translated as a “yak.” He quotes various authorities to dispel the notion of many people that the cāmarī is a kind of winged animal. Far from it, the author says based upon the authority of Abhayārāma Sayādaw of Mandalay and Taung Pa Auk Sayādaw of Mawlamyine that it is a yak, a Tibetan beast of burden, useful also for its milk and flesh. The fan made of its tail is one of the emblems of royalty.

Wishing to prevent damage, the yak will sacrifice its life rather than make any effort to release itself when even a single hair of its tail happens to be caught in the branches of a bush. Sumedha admonished himself to take the example set by a yak and preserve the purity of morality even at the risk of his life.

Miscellaneous Notes on Different Aspects of Morality

As with the perfection of giving (dāna), these notes are given in the form of answers to the following questions, quoting the authority of the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga):

1. What is morality?
2. Why is it called morality?
3. What are the characteristics, functions, manifestations, and proximate cause of morality?

4. What are the benefits of morality?
5. How many types of morality are there?
6. What are the defiling factors of morality?
7. What are the purifying factors of morality?

1. What is Morality?

Morality [1559] may be conveniently studied as follows:

1. Volition that accompanies one when abstaining from wrong physical or verbal actions or when performing duties towards one's elders or teachers, etc.
2. The three mental factors of abstention from wrong action, wrong speech and wrong livelihood.
3. The three right mental actions of non-covetousness (anabhijjhā), non-ill-will (abyāpāda) and right view (sammā-diṭṭhi).
4. The five restraints (samvara).
5. The mental factor which arises when avoiding transgressions: Morality of volition (cetanā-sīla), and morality of abstinence (virati-sīla).

The three wrong physical actions are taking the life of other beings, taking what is not given and sexual misconduct. The four wrong verbal actions are telling lies, gossiping or backbiting, using harsh, abusive words and indulgence in vain, frivolous talks. These two categories of wrong actions may be committed in association with earning a livelihood, like that of a fisherman or a hunter, or may not be associated with earning a livelihood, like game hunting for sport.

Likewise, abstaining from these two categories of wrong actions may or may not be associated with earning a livelihood. Abstaining from three wrong physical actions, when not associated with earning a livelihood, is known as abstention through right action (sammā-kammanta-virati); abstaining from the four wrong verbal actions, when not associated with earning a livelihood, is known as abstention through right speech (sammā-vāca-virati); abstaining from these two categories of wrong actions, when associated with earning a livelihood, and from various kinds of wrong livelihood, especially those kinds which monastics are enjoined against, is known as abstention through right livelihood (sammā-ājīva-virati).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2673

The three mental factors of abstention mentioned above are known as the morality of abstention (virati-sīla), and the mental factor of volition that accompanies them is known as the morality of volition (cetanā-sīla). The volition that arises when performing deeds of great merit of attending upon one's teacher is also known as the morality of volition (cetanā-sīla).

The greed that prompts one to covet others' property, harbouring the thought: "It would be good if these were mine," is known as the wrong mental action of covetousness (abhijjhā-mano-duccarita). When one dispels such thoughts, there arise in one the mental factors of dispelling the volition (cetanā) of greedlessness (alobha) or non-covetousness (anabhijjhā). These mental factors are called morality.

Wishing harm to someone, there arises in a person the mental factor of hatred, which is known as the wrong mental action of ill-will (byāpāda-mano-duccarita). When one dispels such thoughts of ill-will, there arise in him the mental factors of dispelling volition and hatelessness (adosa or abyāpāda). These mental factors are called morality.

When someone holds that there is no such thing as generosity (dāna) and that there are no beneficial results accruing from it, he holds a wrong view which is called the wrong mental action of wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi-mano-duccarita). When he dispels such beliefs, there arises in him the dispelling volition and non-delusion (amoha) or right view (sammā-diṭṭhi). These mental factors are called morality.

When three wrong mental actions: greed (abhijjhā), ill-will (byāpāda) and wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi) are present, a person is liable to commit demeritorious deeds such as killing, etc. which ruin one's morality. When volition and the three right mental actions arise in one, it is impossible to commit deeds, such as killing, which are ruinous to one's morality. Therefore, the three right mental actions of non-greed (anabhijjhā), non ill-will (abyāpāda) and right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) are called morality.

When consciousness arises, it is always accompanied by volition. That volition is [1560] responsible for prompting the mind to take notice of an object; it serves as a link between the mind and an object. Without its prompting, there would be no mind-object linkage; the mind will not rest on the object; it will not be aware of the object. It is only through the services of volition that a mind-object linkage is possible at all. Thus, every volition that accompanies consciousness and arises with each moral act is called morality.

There is the morality of restraint (saṃvara-sīla) and the morality of avoiding transgression (avitikkama-sīla). The kinds of morality, as described, apply to laymen and monastics equally. But there are other forms of morality which are concerned with monastics only, that is, the morality of restraint (saṃvara-sīla) and the morality of avoiding transgressions (avitikkama-sīla). The morality of restraints (saṃvara-sīla):

1. Restraint through following the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha-saṃvara), observance of which liberates one from the dangers of rebirths in the realms of misery and continuous suffering.
2. Restraint through mindfulness (sati-saṃvara), which means keeping close guard over the doors of the six senses: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind, so that the “thief of demeritoriousness” cannot gain entry.
3. Restraint through knowledge (ñāṇa-saṃvara), which means control of the mind with insight, so that the current of the mental defilements of craving, wrong view and ignorance, which normally flow incessantly, stops flowing. Under this type is also included exercise of proper care over the use of requisites (paccaya-nissita-sīla).
4. Restraint through forbearance (khanti-saṃvara), which means controlling the mind, so that no defiling thoughts disturb it when enduring extreme heat or cold.
5. Restraint through development of energy (virīya-saṃvara), which means strenuous mental exertion, to prevent the arising of demeritorious thoughts, such as sensuous thoughts (kāma-vitakka), thoughts of ill-will (byāpāda-vitakka), thoughts of cruelty (vihimsā-vitakka). Purification of livelihood (ājīva-pārisuddhi-sīla) is also included under this type.

The morality of avoiding transgression (avitikkama-sīla) is the morality cultivated through avoidance of physical and verbal transgression of precepts which one has undertaken to observe.

From the above descriptions of five kinds of morality of restraints (saṃvara-sīla) and avoiding transgression (avitikkama-sīla), it could be inferred that, in essence, restraint through following the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha-saṃvara-sīla) means a group of mental factors (cetasika) including volition and the three abstentions of non-greed (alobha), non-hate (adosa) and non-delusion (amoha). Restraint through mindfulness (sati-saṃvara) means the mental factor of mindfulness (sati), which is also accompanied by volition. Restraint through knowledge (ñāṇa-saṃvara) means the mental factor of wisdom, which is also accompanied by volition. Restraint through forbearance (khanti-saṃvara) means a group of moral consciousnesses and mental factors headed by non-hate, which has the characteristic of not losing one's temper, in other words, the mental factor of non-hate. Restraint through development of energy (viriyā-saṃvara) means the mental factor of energy, which is also accompanied by volition.

As for avoiding transgression (avitikkama-sīla), in the ultimate sense, it is a group of moral consciousnesses and mental factors which lead one to avoid transgression of precepts which one is observing. In the case of generosity (dāna), volition forms its basis. For morality too, volition serves as a main factor, but in addition to it, the group of moral consciousnesses and mental factors led by the three abstentions, the three mental factors of non-greed, non-hate, non-delusion and the three mental factors of mindfulness, wisdom, energy also play their respective roles.

2. Why is it called Morality?

The Pāḷi word sīla is translated as “morality” or “virtue.” Sīla has two meanings: first, it is employed to convey the sense of [1561] natural character, behaviour or habit. We find it used in this sense in such expression as pāpa-karaṇa-sīla, “one who is in the habit of doing evil;” dubbhāsa-sīla, “one who is in the habit of speaking evil;” abhivādana-sīla, “one who is in the habit of showing reverence to those worthy of homage;” Dhamma-kathana-sīla, “one who is in the habit of teaching the Dhamma.” It is also employed to describe natural phenomena: vassāna-samaye rukkha-rūhana-sīlā, “trees usually grow during the rainy season;” gimhāna-samaye patta-patana-sīlā, “leaves usually fall in summer.” In this first sense, sīla is employed to describe the habits of both moral and immoral persons, and also natural events which are outside the domain of morality, good or bad.

Secondly, it has the meaning of a good practice which implies only that practice which is noble, moral and ethical. This is the sense employed in this chapter on the Perfection of Morality. And in this sense also, there are two meanings: orientating and upholding.

1. Orientating means controlling one's physical and verbal actions and steering them towards the right direction so that they do not get out of hand. In a person who does not observe the precepts, physical and verbal actions take place in a haphazard manner, like loose yarn, not properly wound in a roll, which is uncontrolled and undirected. But a person who observes the precepts watches closely over his physical and verbal actions to see that they take place in an orderly manner under his proper control. Even a person of ill-humour, who is easily irritated and loses temper at the slightest provocation, can manage to keep his physical and verbal actions under control when he is observing the precepts.
2. Upholding because no act of merit can be accomplished without accompaniment of moral virtue. Meritorious acts can arise only in persons of morality; thus morality (sīla) serves as the basis or foundation of all deeds of meritoriousness; it facilitates the arising of meritoriousness through performance of meritorious deeds that would lead to rebirth in the four planes of existence (cātu-bhūmaka), that is, the sensuous world, the fine material world, the non-material world and the supermundane states.

In this chapter on the Perfection of Morality, it is mentioned that the recluse Sumedha, having received the definite prophecy that he would become a Perfectly Self-Awakened One, admonished himself to establish first the perfection of generosity. But this does not imply that he should practise generosity first without observance of precepts. In his investigation of the Buddha-making factors, by the exercise of perfection investigating wisdom (pāramī-pavicaya-ñāṇa), it was the perfection of generosity that appeared first in his mind's eye, followed, in succession, by perfection of morality, perfection of renunciation, etc. The order of the perfections given in the text is the order in which they appeared in the mind's eye of recluse Sumedha. It was not possible for him to discern all the ten perfections (pāramī) simultaneously; they were investigated one after another and were mentioned accordingly. The first perfection reviewed happened to be the perfection of generosity; hence it heads the list of the perfections (pāramī), but this does not mean that the order in the list is the order in which the perfections are to be fulfilled.

In actual practice, an act of giving is pure only when the supporter is established in morality; generosity is made more fruitful when it is preceded by an observance of precepts. That is the reason why, when they are invited by lay people to accept robes and other gifts, the monastics see to it that the lay people are first established in the precepts, even though taking of precepts is not mentioned when making the invitation.

Thus, to the question: “Why is it called morality (sīla)?” the plain, clear-cut answer is: It is called morality because it does not permit physical and verbal actions to take place in a violent, disorderly manner; it controls and directs them so they are quiet and gentle; and it serves as a foundation for the arising, by stages, of the four classes of moral consciousness: the moral consciousnesses pertaining to the sensuous world, the form world, the formless world and the supermundane [1562] consciousness. Out of these discussions may arise the following questions:

1. If both morality (sīla) and concentration (samādhi) are orientating, how do they differ in their functions? Morality promotes calm and peace by keeping physical and verbal actions under proper control, whereas concentration prevents the mind and mental factors that are associated with it from distraction by directing them to converge on a single object. In this manner, morality differs from concentration in its function of orientating.
2. If both morality and the element of solidity (pathavī) are upholding, what is the difference in their functions? Morality is the fundamental cause of the arising of the four classes of moral consciousness, hence it is said to serve as the foundation for the arising of the moral consciousnesses pertaining to the sensuous world, the material world, to the immaterial world and the supermundane consciousness.

Just as a royal wet-nurse holds the infant prince in her arms to keep him from crawling all over the royal chamber, so also does the element of solidity hold together other elements that arise along with it, preventing them from dispersing and scattering in all directions. In this manner, morality and the element of solidity differ in their respective functions of upholding and facilitating.<sup>417</sup>

The Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) mentions only two grammatical meanings as explained above. But there are different views expressed by other teachers. According to them, the Pāli word sīla meaning morality is derived from the words sira or sīsa both meaning “head.” When the head is cut off, the whole body of a being is destroyed; so also when morality is ruined, all forms of meritoriousness come to ruins. Thus morality is like the head of the body of meritoriousness and is termed sīla, a derivative of sira or sīsa by replacing the letter “r” or “s” with “l.”

But the author opines that this alternative view is far-fetched since it draws only upon the similarity of the sounds produced by uttering the words sira, sīsa and sīla and does not deal with the intrinsic meaning of the word sīla as defined in the Light on the Dictionary (Abhidhānappadīpikā, vs 1092).

He concludes that morality is called sīla because, according to the the Light on the Dictionary, it conveys two meanings: Natural characteristic and good practice.

Although natural characteristics refer to both good and bad ones, as explained above, since we are dealing with the habit and practices of ancient sages or of Bodhisattas, Arahats, etc., we should take it that morality (sīla) refers only to good aspects. For instance, although Dhamma may be meritorious or demeritorious when we say: “I take refuge in the Dhamma,” the Dhamma here can only be the meritorious Dhamma. So also, although Saṅgha means “a group,” “an assemblage” in such words as manussa-saṅgha, “a group of people,” sakuṇa-saṅgha, “a flock of birds,” when we say: “I take refuge in the Saṅgha,” it implies only the Saṅgha of monastics.

Considered in this manner, sīla should also be taken in the sense of the Light on the Dictionary (Abhidhānappadīpikā) definition of “natural characteristic.” Thus, it should be stated that it is called morality because it is the natural characteristic of ancient sages, Bodhisattas, Arahats, etc.

3. What are its Characteristic, Function, etc.?

Morality has the characteristic of controlling one's physical and verbal actions and orientating them towards the right direction; it also serves as a basis or foundation of all meritoriousness.

Its function is to prevent one from becoming immoral through uncontrolled physical and verbal actions. It helps one to remain spotless in conduct, free from blame by the wise.

Morality is manifested as purity in thought, word and deed. When the wise reflect on the nature of morality, they come to realise that it is purity of physical action, purity of [1563] verbal action and purity of mental action.

The proximate cause for the arising of morality is conscience about doing an immoral act (hiri) and concern about doing an immoral act (ottappa). Although listening to the Dhamma promotes the arising of morality, it serves only as a remote cause. It is only through conscience and concern that the precepts are observed.

4. What are the Benefits of Morality?

A man of virtuous conduct enjoys many benefits such as a gladdening of the heart, which leads to joy and happiness (pāmojja). This in turn results in delightful satisfaction (pīti). In one who enjoys delightful satisfaction, there arises calmness of mind and body (passaddhi), followed by bliss (sukha). The tranquil state of mind and body brings about the development of concentration (samādhi), which enables one to see things as they really are (yathā-bhūta-ñāṇa). When one gains this knowledge of things as they really are, one gets wearied of, and detached from, the ills and suffering of the cycle of rebirths. In him arises powerful insight into reality (balava-vipassanā-ñāṇa). With this insight, he becomes detached from craving and achieves the knowledge of the path, which leads to full liberation (vimutti) through the knowledge of fruition. After gaining the paths and fruitions knowledge, he develops reflective knowledge (paccavekkhaṇa-ñāṇa), which enables him to see that the cessation of phenomena of the aggregates of mind (nāma) and matter (rūpa) has taken place in him. In other words, he has realised perfect peace, Nibbāna. Thus morality has many benefits, including the realisation of Nibbāna.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2680

In several discourses (DN 16, AN 4.22), etc., the Buddha mentions the following five benefits gained by one who observes the precepts and who is established in morality:

1. Based on mindfulness through morality, he acquires great wealth.
2. He gains fame and good reputation.
3. He approaches and enters any assembly of nobles, Brahmins, householders or recluses with complete self-assurance born of his morality, without any indication of an inferiority complex.
4. He lives the full span of life and dies unconfused.

An immoral person repents on his death bed that he has not done meritorious deeds throughout his life; a man of moral habits never suffers from any remorse when death approaches him; instead, memories of good deeds previously performed by him flash past his mind's eye making him fearless, mentally lucid, unconfused to face death even as someone who is about to acquire a golden pot gladly abandons an earthen pot.

5. He is reborn after that in the happy realms of Devas and human beings.

In the Discourse about how One might Wish (Ākaṅkheyya-sutta, MN 6), the Buddha enumerates 13 benefits which come from practising morality; such benefits range from reverence and respect shown by fellow followers of the teaching to becoming an Arahant, that is, attainment of Awakening.

5. How Many Types of Morality are There?

Morality in Groups of Twos:

1. There are precepts involving a performance of certain actions (cāritta); and precepts of abstention (vāritta). Of these two kinds, the precept laid down by the Buddha saying: “This should be done,” is morality that should be done (cāritta-sīla). For example, performance of duties towards a preceptor (upajjhāya-vatta) or duties towards a teacher (ācariya-vatta) is fulfilment of morality that should be done through practice.

Not doing what is prohibited by the Buddha, saying: “This should not be done,” is fulfilment of morality that should not be done (vāritta-sīla). For example, observance of the Exclusion (Pārājika) Vinaya rules, which [1564] prohibit monastics from indulgence in sexual intercourse, stealing, killing and falsely claiming attainments to the paths (magga) and fruitions (phala), is observance of morality that should not be done through avoidance.

Some people casually misinterpret these disciplinary rules, saying that morality that should be done is the precept which would lead to no offence if it is not fulfilled, but its observance contributes to purifying one's morality. In interpreting thus, they make no distinction between monastics and laymen.

Actually, the Buddha has laid down definite disciplinary rules concerning duties to be performed by a pupil towards his preceptor or teacher. Any co-resident pupil who fails to abide by these rules not only fails to fulfil the morality that should be done but is also guilty of breaking the disciplinary rules concerning the performance of duties (vatta-bhedaka-dukkata-āpatti).

Thus, for monastics, it cannot be said that non-fulfilment of morality that should be done would lead to no offence; for them, morality that should be done is a mandatory observance of the precepts laid down by the Buddha.

As for the lay person, it may be said that avoidance of wrong deeds, which would definitely give rise to rebirths in lower planes of existence, falls under the category of morality that should be done. On the other hand, abstinence from wrong deeds, morality that should not be done (vāritta-sīla), showing reverence to the aged, which may or may not result in such rebirths, should be classified as morality that should be done (cāritta-sīla).

For example, there are five precepts to be observed by laymen: abstinence from killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying and taking intoxicants. Indulgence in these deeds, instead of avoiding them, leads definitely to lower planes of existence. Therefore, abstaining from these five wrong deeds which will certainly result in such rebirths constitutes morality that should not be done.

A lay person can also observe the eight precepts which are the avoidance of killing, stealing, lying and taking intoxicants – these four precepts, falling under the category of morality that should not be done – and the additional four precepts of total sexual abstinence, abstaining from eating in the afternoon, abstaining from dancing, singing, playing music and entertainments, and abstaining from using high and luxurious beds.

Actions included in these four additional precepts do not necessarily lead to the lower planes of existence. Noble lay persons, such as Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna) and Once-returners (Sakadāgāmi), enjoy lawful sexual relations with their own spouses, eat in the afternoon, dance, sing, etc. and sleep on high and luxurious beds. But, since they do so with mind unassociated with wrong view (diṭṭhi-vippayutta-citta), their actions will not result in rebirths in the lower planes of existence.

But an ordinary worldlyling may do these acts with minds either associated with wrong view (diṭṭhi-sampayutta) or unassociated with wrong view (diṭṭhi-vippayutta). These actions may or may not lead to rebirths in the lower plane of existence. Therefore, the four precepts: total sexual abstinence, abstaining from eating in the afternoon, abstaining from dancing, singing, playing music, etc., and abstaining from using high and luxurious beds should be called morality that should be done.

When a person who has taken refuge in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha, observes the five precepts with meticulous care, he would be a lay disciple (upāsaka) of the Buddha. If he makes further efforts to observe the eight precepts, it is for the purpose of practising the holy life at a higher level of endeavour. But the Buddha has not said that the observance of the eight precepts will save one from the lower destinations. Observance of the five precepts alone is not enough to secure safety from the danger of falling into the lower planes of existence.

In this sense, therefore, the four additional observances included in the eight precepts should be considered to belong to the category of morality that should be done. For monastics, however, the Buddha has strictly forbidden them from indulging in these four acts; hence for monastics, avoidance of these acts constitutes definitely morality that should not be done.

Morality to be Done and not Done

A cursory reading of the above distinction between morality that should be done (cāritta-sīla) and morality that should not be done (vāritta-sīla) or a superficial consideration of the fact of indulgence by noble disciples such as Visākhā in [1565] lawful sexual relations, eating in the afternoon, dancing, singing, playing music, etc., and, in using high and luxurious beds, could lead one to wrong conceptions. One could easily take the wrong view that all such deeds are faultless, blameless, and, therefore, one is then liable to indulge in them more and more with the accompaniment of wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi). It is most important that one should not fall into such errors of conception.

By killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying and taking intoxicants, doing demeritorious wrong deeds, one is invariably led to the lower planes of existence. There is no escape from their ill consequences. That is why noble persons (ariya) will never do such deeds, even if they are under the threat of death to do so. They will willingly give up their lives rather than acquiesce to do such deeds because they have uprooted, through path (magga) insight, all traces of a latent tendency (anusaya) to do demeritorious deeds. Just because nobles (ariya), such as Stream-enterers, Once-returners and Non-returners, indulge in taking food in the afternoon, etc. just as ordinary persons do, it is not correct to say that they do so with identical mental attitudes in their various deeds. The noble ones (ariya) do not look upon objects of sense pleasure in the same way an ordinary worldling does; their manner of indulgence in sense pleasure is also different from that of worldlings.

The commentary to the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) says that the noble ones' attitude towards pleasurable sense objects is like that of a clean Brahmin, who, pursued by an elephant in rut, seeks refuge with loathing and much reluctance in a dumping ground of excreta. When oppressed by craving for sensual pleasures, the defilement that has not been eradicated by the knowledge of the path, the Stream-enterer or the Once-returner deals with objects of sensual pleasures with a mind unassociated with wrong view, just to pacify and subdue the burning heat of the defilement.

This exposition deserves careful consideration. Citing the example of a noble (ariya) person such as Visākhā, the worldling is liable to say wrongly that the noble ones indulge in sense-pleasures exactly in the same way as he does. As pointed out in the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) commentary, the noble ones enjoy sense pleasures, with mind unassociated with wrong view, just to calm the burning desire, which is the defilement they have not yet destroyed with the knowledge of the path, whereas the worldling indulges in sense pleasures generally with mind associated with wrong view.

To summarise, one may have a sexual relationship with one's spouse, take meals in the afternoon, dance, sing, play music and use high and luxurious beds, etc. with mind associated with wrong view resulting in rebirths in the lower planes of existence or with mind unassociated with wrong view, not resulting in rebirth in the lower planes of existence. Therefore, abstinence from these four actions which may not lead to the lower planes of existence should be classed as morality that should be done and not as morality that should not be done.

The division of the eight precepts into four moralities that should be done (cāritta-sīla) and four moralities that should not be done (vāritta-sīla) is tenable only when the vow of abstinence is made, separately for each individual precept as is current now. Should the vow be taken for the whole group of the eight precepts, saying: “I observe the eight precepts,” it would simply be an observance of morality that should be done (cāritta-sīla) because the eight precepts constitute a code of morality which one may or may not observe.

As for the five precepts, whether the vow is taken for the five precepts as a whole or as separate individual precepts, its observance is definitely the practice of morality that should not be done (vāritta-sīla).

A more detailed treatment of what should not be done (vāritta-sīla) and what should be done (cāritta-sīla) is given below.

Of the two categories of morality (sīla), observance of morality that should be done (cāritta-sīla) can be accomplished only when one is endowed with faith and energy. Faith is believing that good results will follow the good deeds of practising morality, and energy means the relentless effort with which one observes the precepts in keeping with his faith.

No special effort is needed to become accomplished in the observance of morality that should not be done (vāritta-sīla). It requires only faith. Mere refraining through faith from doing deeds which the Buddha has taught are demeritorious is sufficient for the fulfilment of morality that should not be done.

2. The group of moral practices (abhisamācārika-sīla) which promotes good conduct and [1566] which includes all forms of virtuous deeds other than those classed as a set of eight precepts with right livelihood as the eighth (ājīvaṭṭhamaka-sīla). All forms of moral practices which are taught for the fulfilment of the paths and the fruitions come under this classification.

Eight Precepts Including the Practice of Right Livelihood

Since it forms the beginning of the life of purity consisting in the path, the set of eight precepts including the practice of right livelihood (ājīvaṭṭhamaka-sīla) is also termed morality which forms the beginning of the life of purity (ādi-brahma-cariyaka-sīla).

Precepts with right livelihood as the eighth (ājīvaṭṭhamaka-sīla) include three moral physical actions: abstaining from killing, stealing and indulging in wrongful sexual intercourse; four moral verbal actions: abstaining from lying, malicious speech, using harsh, abusive words and frivolous talk; and, finally, abstaining from wrong livelihood.

The Path to Purification (Visuddhi-magga) states that the set of eight precepts including right livelihood (ājīvaṭṭhamaka-sīla) may also be termed morality which forms the beginning of the life of purity (ādi-brahma-cariyaka-sīla) as it includes precepts which are to be fulfilled in the initial stage of developing the noble path.

This commentary statement is likely to be misinterpreted by some as to mean that only the eight precepts including right livelihood (ājīvaṭṭhamaka-sīla) are the precepts which should be observed first for the attainment of the path. There have even appeared some groups which maintained that the five precepts, the eight precepts and the ten precepts, which are generally observed at present, are not the initial precepts which should be observed for the attainment of the path.

On the other hand, there are some people who say that they have not even heard of this strange code of morality called the eight precepts including right livelihood (ājīvaṭṭhamaka-sīla); it could not have been taught by the Buddha; it may be a later accretion of no particular worth.

As a matter of fact, the eight precepts including right livelihood is certainly a precept taught by the Buddha himself. The Path to Purification (Visuddhi-magga) quotes the Great Discourse on the Six Sense Spheres (Mahā-saḷāyatanika-sutta, MN 149): Tenāha pubbeva kho panassa kāya-kammaṃ vacī-kammaṃ ājīvo suparisuddho hotī ti, “therefore it was said their actions of body, speech and livelihood have been properly purified earlier,” to show that the Buddha taught the set of precepts with right livelihood as the eighth.

The Buddha made his appearance in the world at a time when it was enveloped in the dark mass of evil forces. People were depraved, bereft of morality, steeped as they were in evil thoughts, words and deeds. When the Buddha wanted to inculcate in those wild, debased beings a sense of gentle civility through the practice of morality, he had to select a moral code from amongst various sets of precepts which would best suit their coarse minds. He thus taught them at the initial stages the set of precepts with right livelihood as the eighth.

When the grosser forms of evil had been removed from the habits of the untamed beings by teaching them the set of precepts with right livelihood as the eighth, the Buddha no longer made use of it; instead he taught the five precepts and the eight precepts in his further civilizing endeavours.

Having thus been set aside by the Buddha when a certain stage of moral purification has been reached by the people, successive teachers from the time of the Buddha till the present time have not given much attention to the eight precepts including right livelihood; lay people also have not made a special effort to observe it because the set of precepts with right livelihood as the eighth was originally meant for people of debased morality only.

A question arises here: Since the set of precepts with right livelihood as the eighth forms the initial practice for the path, and since it had been used at the time when the Buddha first appeared, would it not be even more suitable to observe it at the present time?

The term “initial practice for the path” is applicable only when the set of precepts with right livelihood as the eighth is observed by those who have no code of morality whatsoever at the start to serve as the precepts for the path. Those who have only recently given up wrong views and begun to embrace the Buddha’s teaching should no doubt start to purify themselves by observing this set of precepts with right livelihood as the eighth but when they have become well established in the Buddhist practice after being well trained in morality (sīla), it should no longer be [1567] termed “the initial practice for the path.”

Even children of Buddhist parents have been taught to understand the dire consequences of gross misdeeds such as taking the life of sentient beings, and they refrain from doing so. Accordingly, when they grow up and begin to observe precepts, there is no need for them to keep the set of precepts with right livelihood as the eighth. They should gradually advance in their training from the five precepts to the eight precepts and onto the ten precepts.

In other words, observance of the set of precepts with right livelihood as the eighth is the necessary step which those steeped in immorality should take to rid themselves of debased habits; but for those who have been well brought up under the guidance of Buddhist parents, it is clear that they already possess a modicum of moral conduct. Therefore, there is no special need for them to observe the set of precepts with right livelihood as the eighth. What has been said above applies to the present time when the Buddha's teaching is widely extant.

Although brought up in a Buddhist environment and taught to refrain from gross misdeeds, if one judges oneself to be deficient in moral conduct and to have committed all kinds of grave transgressions, one has no alternative but to start with the initial purification process of observing the set of precepts with right livelihood as the eighth (ājīvaṭṭhamaka-sīla) for the practice of the noble path.

Those inclined to follow the line of least resistance are likely to find this set of precepts with right livelihood as the eighth attractive if someone points out that in observing this morality (sīla), one does not have to refrain from indulging in intoxicating drinks and drugs, one does not have to refrain from dancing, singing, enjoying shows, that it is easily observed, being free from difficult restraints and that it serves as the basis for the attainment of the paths and the fruitions.

It is a weakness of human nature to look for easy means of acquiring wealth. People forget or ignore the fact that even with hard labour and diligent work it is not always possible to have one's dream of riches fulfilled. Many of them have become a prey to fraudulent villains who claim to possess magical secrets of multiplying one's wealth. By seeking an easy way of becoming rich, people have fallen a victim to their own avarice.

Just as there are deceivers in worldly affairs, there are also frauds in religious matters, especially concerning the attainment of the paths and fruitions which is, of course, not easy at all to come by. Many are those who, inclining to seek shortcuts, have followed to their great loss the spurious teachings of self-acclaimed masters who promise them the stage of a Stream-enterer within seven days of practising their technique, or that of a Once-returner if one has adequate intellectual development. After finishing their seven days' course of practice, the master announces the pseudo-attainments of his pupils as a Stream-enterer or a Once-returner, and they consequently are delighted with their illusory achievements.

Here, we would like to sound a note of caution. The metal copper, if it could be converted into the precious metal of gold, through practice of alchemy, would become possessed of the properties of gold which are vastly different from those of the original base metal of copper. Likewise, a noble person who has achieved the first path and fruition only as a Stream-enterer is easily distinguished from an ordinary worldling by means of his physical, verbal and mental demeanour. Instead of placidly accepting the announcement of the master as having attained the stage of a Stream-enterer or a Once-returner, one should, by self-introspection, examine one's true nature to see if one has changed for the better and has truly benefited by the seven days' course of practice. Only by self-evaluation in this manner could one save oneself from being misled by dubious teachers of religion.

Thus, in matters of observing the precepts or in other pursuits there is no shortcut or easy way to achieve one's cherished object. A person addicted to drink will not [1568] be able to observe even the five precepts, not to speak of the higher practices such as the eight precepts.

The group of moral precepts other than the said set of precepts with right livelihood as the eighth (ājīvaṭṭhamaka-sīla) is classified as precepts which promote good conduct (abhisamācārika-sīla). Even the five precepts are to be considered as superior to the set of precepts with right livelihood as the eighth.

It may be questioned: "How could the five precepts, which have only the one restraint, out of the four verbal restraints, not to speak lies, be superior to the eight precepts including right livelihood (ājīvaṭṭhamaka-sīla), which requires the observance of all the four verbal restraints involving lying, gossiping, using abusive language and engaging in frivolous talks?"

The answer lies in the fact that of the four verbal restraints, lying forms the basis of the breach of all the verbal restraints. The Buddha teaches that for one who commits falsehood, there is no misdeed which he is not liable to perpetuate; and one who can abstain from lying can easily observe the remaining precepts.

How could one who does not speak lies engage in slandering, abusing and frivolous talks? This explains why only the restraint of falsehood is included as the main verbal restraint in the five precepts. The question never arises, therefore, that the eight precepts including right livelihood is superior to the five precepts.

Again, it may be asked: "Since the precept to refrain from wrong livelihood, which does not feature in the five precepts, forms the eighth precept of the set of precepts with right livelihood as the eighth, surely it should be deemed superior to the five precepts."

The answer in brief to this question is: For one who observes the five precepts, no special effort is needed to refrain from wrong livelihood. After all, wrong livelihood means earning one's living through wrong means of killing, stealing and lying. By observing the five precepts meticulously, one is automatically avoiding the misdeeds of killing, stealing and lying. Thus, the precept to refrain from wrong livelihood as an additional observance in the set of precepts with right livelihood as the eighth (ājīvaṭṭhamaka-sīla) does not justify the claim of its superiority over the five precepts. What has been discussed above applies only to lay devotees.

Monastic Morality

For members of the Saṅgha, the rules of discipline laid down by the Buddha for them as expounded in the Basket of Discipline (Vinaya-piṭaka) are known as training rules (sikkhāpada). The offences, for which penalties are imposed, may be classified under seven categories depending on their nature:

1. Expulsion offenses (pārājika).
2. Offenses requiring a meeting of the Saṅgha (Saṅghādisesa).
3. Grave offenses (thullaccaya).
4. Confession offenses (pācittiya).
5. Acknowledgements (pāṭidesanīya).
6. Wrongdoings (dukkata).
7. Wrong speech (dubbhāsita).

Offences in the first category of offences (pārājika) and in the second category (saṅghādisesa) are classified as grave offences (garukāpatti). The remaining five categories consist of light offences (lahukāpatti).

The group of moral precepts observed by monastics so that there is no breach of lesser and minor offences classified under light offences is known as good conduct (abhisamācārika-sīla); those observed to avoid transgression of grave offences (garukāpatti) is known as morality which forms the beginning of the life of purity (ādi-brahma-cariyaka-sīla).

Of the five volumes of the Basket of Discipline (Vinaya-piṭaka), the Section about Expulsion (Pārājika-kaṇḍa) and the Section about Confession (Pācittiya-kaṇḍa), also known as the Twofold Analysis (Ubhato-vibhaṅga), deal with codes of morality which belong to the fundamental morality which forms the beginning of the life of purity (ādi-brahma-cariya) category of morality (sīla); the Great Division (Mahā-vagga) and the Short Division (Cūḷa-vagga), which are collectively termed the Division containing Chapters (Khandhaka-vagga), describe the group of morality which has been classified as good conduct (abhisamācārika-sīla).<sup>418</sup>

Monastics become accomplished in the fundamental morality which forms the beginning of the life of purity (ādi-brahma-cariyaka-sīla) only after completing observance of good conduct (abhisamācārika-sīla). When a monastic meticulously avoids transgression of even a minor fault, a light offence, it goes without saying that he will take the greatest care not to be guilty of grave offences. [1569]

Morality Based on the Abstinenes or Other Factors

1. The mental concomitants of three abstinenes (virati-sīla), that is, right speech, right action and right livelihood is explained under the subtitle “What is morality?”
2. Precepts associated with various mental concomitants (avirati-sīla), such as volition, and so on, other than the mental factors of the three abstinenes.

Morality That Is Dependent or Independent

1. Morality practised depending upon craving or upon wrong view (nissita-sīla). When one observes precepts with the aim of achieving a happy existence in the future, abounding in wealth and property, one’s morality is called morality of dependence upon craving. Observance of precepts or rituals such as imitating cows or dogs in the wrong belief that they are conducive to spiritual purification is called morality of dependence upon wrong view.

Those who have embraced Buddhism are not likely to practise the morality of dependence upon wrong view; but they should guard themselves against practising the morality of dependence upon craving, which they are still liable to do.

<sup>418</sup> The last volume of the Vinaya, the Summary (Parivāra), gives a summary and classification of the rules in the four previous volumes.

2. Morality practised without depending upon craving or upon wrong view (anissita-sīla), with the sole aim of cultivating the noble practice. This means practice of mundane morality which is a prerequisite for that supermundane morality.

Time-Bound Morality and Life-Bound Morality:

1. Morality observed for a limited period (kāla-pariyanta-sīla).
2. Morality observed for life (apāṇa-koṭika-sīla).

In describing morality observed for a limited period, the Path to Purification (Visuddhi-magga) mentions only in a general way the limit of the observing period, saying: Having made a limit to the time, he establishes his precepts (kāla-paricchedaṃ katvā, samādinnaṃ sīlaṃ). But its sub-commentary is more specific in prescribing the time limit: a whole day or a whole night, etc. (kāla-paricchedaṃ katvā ti imaṅ-ca rattiṃ, imaṅ-ca divan-ti ādinā viya kāla-vasena paricchedaṃ katvā).

Nowadays, many people take the precepts without mentioning any time limit; so it seems for life. But as the intention is to observe a certain precept for a day or a limited period only, it is certainly classed as a temporary morality. As the formula in the commentary and the sub-commentary for taking the vow or precept, mentioned above, requires the stating of the period of observance, one should mention the period during which one would observe the precept. However, neglecting to do so constitutes no fault; it would still be a temporary practice of morality.

The intention, though unspoken, is generally assumed to be for the whole period of a day, or a night or a whole day and night. But it is not necessarily so, according to the commentary on the Path of the Analytic Knowledges (Paṭisambhidā-magga), which states that one may observe the precepts for one sitting, like lay devotees who, having established themselves in the Three Treasures, observe a set of precepts while making a donation to an invited monastic in their home. They observe the precepts only for the duration of the ceremony of alms giving. Or they may undertake to observe a set of precepts during their sojourn at a monastery for a day or two or more. These are all observances of temporary morality.

Thus, according to this commentary, it is beneficial to observe precepts even for a very short period. Therefore, teachers explain that it is quite proper to encourage children, who are not used to go without an evening meal, to take the eight precepts on Observance (Uposatha) days and observe them all throughout the morning only. One always gains merit for doing the good deed of observing precepts, however short the duration of the observance may be.

Two stories in the Stories about Petas (Peta-vatthu) illustrate this point. During the time of the Buddha (see Pv 3.7), there was, in Rājagaha, a hunter who earned his living by killing deer day and night. A friend of his was a disciple of the Buddha, being established in the Three Treasures. The friend advised the hunter to refrain from the evil act of killing animals. But his [1570] advice fell on deaf ears. Undaunted, he suggested to the hunter to refrain from killing at least during the nighttime and instead to engage himself in the meritorious act of observing precepts. The hunter finally gave in to his friend's persistent persuasion and abandoning all acts of preparations for killing during the nighttime, he spent his time observing precepts.

After his death, the hunter gained rebirth near Rājagaha as a Vemānika Peta, who was subjected to great suffering during the day but lived a happy life at night, enjoying fully the pleasures of the senses.

Ven. Nārada, encountering this Peta in the course of his wanderings, enquired of him as to what kind of meritorious deeds he had performed in his previous lives. The Peta recounted his life as a hunter, how he earned his living by killing; how his friend, who was established in the Three Treasures, counselled him to give up his wrong mode of living; how he refused his friend's good advice at first but finally succumbed to his persuasion by giving up hunting at nighttime and devoting himself to the good deed of observing the precepts. For his cruel misdeeds in the day time, he was suffering intensely during the day while at night he lived the blissful, sensuous life of Devas.

The second Peta story is similar (see Pv 3.8), but it concerns a wealthy sportsman who hunted deer, day and night, as a pastime for sheer enjoyment, not for livelihood. He also paid no heed to a friend of his who proffered him good advice for his benefit. Ultimately, he was won over by an Arahāt, who came on an alms round to his friend's house, who instructed him to devote at least the nighttime to meritorious deeds instead of the full-time pursuit of sport. He suffered the same fate after death as the hunter of the previous story.

We learn from these two stories that we reap the benefit of meritorious deeds even if they were performed only for the limited period of during the nighttime.

Accordingly, we should make an endeavour to observe the precepts for whatever time we could afford, however short it may be.

Broken Observance and Unbroken Observance

Morality, the observance of which is brought to an end before a stipulated time for some reason (sapariyanta-sīla), such as being coaxed or tempted with an offer of wealth or servants and attendants to break the observance or being threatened with the destruction of one's life and limbs or of one's relatives to do so. In this type of morality, it should be noted that although its observance is brought to an end through outside interference, nevertheless, merit has been already gained, commensurate with one's precepts. Morality observed before is not rendered fruitless by its termination.

Morality, the observance of which is not cut short by any outside influence (apariyanta-sīla) but is maintained till completion of the intended period.

Worldly Morality and Supermundane Morality

Morality subject to, or accompanied by, the pollutants (āsava) such as sensual desire, desire for future existence, wrong view and ignorance (lokiya-sīla). Morality not subject to, or not accompanied by, the mental pollutants (lokuttara-sīla).

Morality subject to the pollutants is conducive to happy future rebirth as a human being or a Deva and is a prerequisite for escape from the cycle of rebirths. Morality not subject to the pollutants brings about escape from Saṃsāra; it is also an object for contemplation with reflective knowledge (paccavekkhaṇa-ñāṇa).

Morality in Groups of Threes

Low, Middle and Finest Morality

When the precepts are observed with the four elements – will (chanda), energy (virīya), consciousness (citta) and investigative knowledge (vimamsā) – of inferior quality it is low morality (hīna-sīla); when they are of medium quality it is middle morality (majjhima-sīla); when they are of superior quality it is finest morality (pañīta-sīla). [1571]

1. When morality is observed through desire for fame, it is low morality (hīna-sīla). Such an observance is an act of hypocrisy, a deceptive show of sham piety, without pure volition for doing a genuine meritorious deed. Hence it is low (hīna).

2. Observance of morality through desire for a good destination is no doubt associated with a certain amount of greed, but it is a wholesome wish for beneficial results of one's good deeds and is accompanied by volition and faith. Hence it is nobler than the one observed through desire for fame. On the other hand, since the motivating force here is still tainted with the expectation of beneficial results from one's meritoriousness, it is not ranked as a superior kind but only as a middle (majjhima) morality.
3. The morality observed not through desire for fame nor through desire for reaping beneficial results of one's good deeds but through understanding that the observance of precepts is a noble practice for a pure life, and through realization that one should indeed cultivate these practices solely for their nobleness, is known as the finest morality. Only such a morality of superior quality observed with pure wholesome volition, unassociated with any form of greed, is reckoned as the genuine perfection of morality (sīla-pāramī).

When the Bodhisatta took existence as a Nāga, during his two lives as Campeyya Nāga (Ja 506) and Bhūridatta Nāga (Ja 543), he could not exert himself for the superior kind of morality but observed precepts only in the hope of attaining rebirth as a human being. In that sense, the morality he observed was of medium quality. Nevertheless, since he did not break the precepts and persisted in their observance even at the risk of his life, his effort is to be regarded as fulfilment of the perfection of morality.

Again:

1. When morality is defiled by demeritorious thoughts of self-praise and disparagement of others, such as: "I am virtuous; others are not virtuous and inferior to me," it is a low morality.
2. The morality which is not tainted with such defilements but is a mundane morality is a middle morality.
3. When the morality is free from all taints and is associated with the supermundane paths and fruitions, it is classed as the finest morality.

Again:

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2695

1. Low morality (hīna-sīla) is the morality that is observed with a view to attain happy prosperous rebirths.
2. Middle morality (majjhima-sīla) is the morality practised for self-liberation from the cycle of suffering, such as that practised by future ordinary disciples of the Buddhas or by future Paccekabuddhas.
3. The finest morality (paṇīta-sīla) is observed by Bodhisattas for the purpose of liberating all beings from the cycle of rebirths and it qualifies as a perfection of morality (sīla-pāramī).

This commentarial statement is made with reference to the noblest type of morality. But this does not mean that morality observed by Bodhisattas alone qualifies as such; morality belonging to Paccekabuddhas and disciples of a Buddha, though it is not the noblest type, should also be recognized as a perfection of morality.

Self-regarding, World-regarding, and Respecting Dhamma

1. Morality that is self-regarding (attādhīpatēyya-sīla), is the morality observed out of self-respect and to satisfy one's conscience by abandoning what is unbecoming and unprofitable.
2. Morality that is world-regarding (lokādhīpatēyya-sīla), is the morality observed out of regard for the world and to ward off censure of others.
3. Morality that respects Dhamma (Dhammādhīpatēyya-sīla), is the morality observed in reverence to the glory of the Buddha's teaching. One who practises this morality is convinced that the discourses of [1572] the Buddha on the subjects of the paths, the fruitions and Nibbāna truly show the way to liberation from the cycle of rebirths and that the way to pay respect to the Dhamma and to honour the Dhamma is through observance of precepts.

Morality That Is Grasping, Non-grasping, and Calming

1. Grasping morality (parāmaṭṭha-sīla) is the same as dependent morality (nissita-sīla), which was mentioned in the groups of twos; it is observed with adherence to craving or wrong view. Because of craving, one is pleased with the thought that his morality would result in the happy destination he longs for, and thinks it is superior to that of others. Because of wrong view, he holds that his morality is the soul or substance. In either case, that morality falls under the category of grasping morality (parāmaṭṭha-sīla).

Even while practising it, this morality burns with the fires of craving and wrong view. The fires of craving and wrong view burn not only when enjoying sense pleasures but even while practising alms giving and morality. Only when the practice of good deeds reaches the state of meditation does it become immune from the ravages of these fires. By practising insight (vipassanā) meditation till one comes to realize that this body is not self, not a personality but mere phenomenon of matter and mind, one can become free from the fires of personality-belief (sakkāya-diṭṭhi).

2. Non-grasping morality (aparāmaṭṭha-sīla) is morality observed by a virtuous worldling (kalyāṇa-puthujjana), who is established in the Three Treasures and who has started cultivating the noble path of eight constituents with a view to attain the paths and fruitions. This is also the morality of a learner (sekkha) who, through cultivating the noble path of eight constituents, has attained one of the four paths or the first three fruitions but still has to work for the final goal of the fourth fruition.
3. Calming morality (paṭippassaddha-sīla) is morality that becomes calm on attaining the four fruition states of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti), Once-returning (Sakadāgāmī), Non-returning (Anāgāmī) and becoming an Arahant (Arahatta).

Morality That Is Pure, Not Pure and Doubtful

1. Morality that is pure (visuddha-sīla) is the morality of a monastic who has not committed a single offence against the Discipline or who has made amends after committing an offence.
2. Morality that is not pure (avisuddha-sīla) is the morality of a monastic who has committed an offence, and has not made amends after committing it.
3. Morality that is doubtful (vematika-sīla) is the morality of a monastic who has doubt or misgivings about the alms food he has accepted, whether it is bear meat, which is not allowable, or pork, which is allowable for him; who has doubt about the offence he has committed, for instance, whether it is a confession offense (pācittiya-āpatti) or a wrong-doing offense (dukkāṭa-āpatti) and who is uncertain whether the act he has done constitutes an offence or not.

A monastic engaged in meditation should endeavour to purify his morality if it is impure. Should he be guilty of a light offence, for instance one of the 92 confession (pācittiya) offences, he should remedy it by admission of the offence to a monastic and thus purify his morality. Should he be guilty of a grave offence, for instance one of the thirteen offences that require a meeting of the Saṅgha (Saṅghādisesa), he should approach the Saṅgha and confess his offence. Then, as ordered by the Saṅgha, he should first observe probation (parivāsa)<sup>419</sup> and then carry out the penance (mānatta).<sup>420</sup> Then only would his morality become pure, and he is fit for practice of meditation. Should he have doubts about the nature of the alms food he has accepted or of any of the actions he has done, he should carefully scrutinize them or consult a Vinaya specialist who is learned in the [1573] Vinaya rules and thus remove his scruples and purify his morality.

Morality of One Under Training, Beyond Training or Neither

1. Morality of one under training (sekha-sīla) is the morality observed by one who is still undergoing training. It is the morality associated with those who have attained the four paths and the first three fruition states.
2. Morality of one beyond training (asekkha-sīla) is the morality observed by one who no longer requires any training. It is the morality associated with those who have attained the fruition state of an Arahat.
3. The group of mundane precepts not falling under either of these two is morality that is neither while under or beyond training (nevasekkhānāsekkha-sīla). It is the morality observed by one who is neither a learner nor a non-learner; it is the morality of an ordinary worldling (puthujjana).

<sup>419</sup> Probation (parivāsa): a penalty for a Suspension (Saṅghādisesa) offence requiring him to live under suspension from association with the rest of the Saṅgha for as many days as he has knowingly concealed his offence. At the end of this probationary observance, he undergoes a further period of penance (mānatta).

<sup>420</sup> Penance (mānatta): a period of penance for at least six days to gain approbation of the Saṅgha, after which he requests the Saṅgha to reinstate him into full association with the rest of the Saṅgha.

Morality in Groups of Fours

Declining, Stagnating, Gaining Distinction and Penetrating

1. The morality that is bound to decrease is called declining morality (hāna-bhāgiya-sīla). A certain monastic associates with immoral persons only and does not associate with the virtuous; he does not know or see the fault of committing an offence, he often dwells with wrong thoughts and does not guard his faculties. The morality of such a monastic makes no progress, instead it decreases day by day.
2. The morality that remains stagnant is called stagnating morality (thiti-bhāgiya-sīla). A certain monastic remains satisfied with the morality he is already established in and does not wish to practise meditation for further advancement. He is quite content with mere morality and does not strive for any higher state; his morality neither makes progress nor decreases, it just stagnates.
3. The morality that will gain distinction is called gaining distinction morality (visesa-bhāgiya-sīla). A certain monastic, having established himself in morality, is not content with mere morality but strives for concentration of mind. The morality of that monastic is called gaining distinction morality or the morality that will gain the special benefit of concentration of mind.
4. The morality that penetrates and dispels the darkness of defilements is penetrating morality (nibbedha-bhāgiya-sīla). A certain monastic is not content with mere morality but strives hard to get through insight (vipassanā) meditation strong insight knowledge (balava-vipassanā-ñāṇa), which is the knowledge of disgust with the sufferings of the cycle of rebirths. The morality of that monastic is the one that penetrates and dispels the darkness of defilements through the paths and fruitions.

Precepts of Monks, Nuns, Novices and Householders

1. The rules of discipline promulgated by the Fortunate One for male monastics and those which should also be observed by them although promulgated for nuns are called the rules for monks (bhikkhu-sīla).
2. The rules of discipline promulgated for nuns and those which should also be observed by them although promulgated for monks are called the rules for nuns (bhikkhunī-sīla).
3. The ten precepts observed by male (sāmaṇera) and female (sāmaṇerī) novices or neophytes are called rules for those without higher ordination (anupasampanna-sīla).

Only novices are taken as monastics without higher ordination (anupasampanna) by the commentator. Yet there is another kind called in training (sikkhamāna). As those in training are elder female novices who undergo a special training as probationers to become nuns, they are not mentioned here separately but are reckoned as female novices. [1574]

4. The morality observed by the laity is called the householder rules (gahaṭṭha-sīla). With regard to the householder rules, the Path to Purification (Visuddhi-magga) says: The five precepts as a permanent undertaking, the ten precepts when possible, and the eight precepts as a special observance on an Observance Day (Uposatha), come under the householder rules which should be observed by male and female followers (upāsaka-upāsikānaṃ nicca-sīla-vasena pañca-sikkhāpadāni, sati vā ussāhe dasa, uposathaṅga-vasena aṭṭhā ti idaṃ gahaṭṭha-sīlaṃ).

There are different views on the meaning of the Pāḷi phrase: sati vā ussāhe, “when possible” of the Path to Purification. Some teachers take the view that not only the five precepts but also the ten precepts are to be observed as a permanent undertaking. They wrongly apply to the ten precepts the attribute of a permanent undertaking (nicca-sīla), which is only meant for the five precepts.

These teachers say: “To observe the five precepts, it is not necessary to consider whether a person has the ability; he should observe the five precepts forever. Regarding the ten precepts, even though it is urged that the ten precepts should be observed as a permanent undertaking, only persons with the ability should observe them. Ability here means the ability to abandon his treasure of gold and silver with no more attachment to it; giving up his possessions in this manner, he should observe the ten precepts for the whole of his life, not just for some days and months only. If his intention is to avoid handling gold and silver during the period of observance only and to use them again afterwards, then he should not observe them at all.”

Again, some people erroneously think and say: “It is difficult for people to abandon their own possessions of gold and silver; therefore, laymen are not fit to observe the ten precepts.”

Also, according to the sub-commentary on the Path to Purification (Visuddhi-magga), the term ten (dasa) should be taken as the ten precepts of novices. It is commented upon further that rules (sīla) here is meant to be like the rules observed by Ghaṭikāra the pot-maker and others. This commentarial statement makes for more confusion in the already mistaken view of these people. They take the extreme view that it is not enough for people to merely refrain from acquiring and accepting new wealth; they should be able to abandon all that they have already possessed, just as Ghaṭikāra in the Discourse about Ghaṭikāra (Ghaṭikāra-sutta, MN 81) refrained from using gold and silver for his whole life. And only when they are like Ghaṭikāra in this respect, they can be fully established in the ten precepts. Thus, they have made an overstatement.

Their view is that only when a person can “abandon his treasure of gold and silver with no more attachment to it” should he observe the ten precepts. It is mistaken as it arises with reference to the training rule about gold (jāta-rūpa-sikkhāpada) of the ten precepts. According to this interpretation, only when people can abandon all the wealth they possess, without clinging any more, they will be fully established in the precepts. Ghaṭikāra is a Non-returner (Anāgāmi) who has already abandoned all his wealth without clinging any more. Nowadays, although the laity do not acquire fresh wealth on the day of observance of the ten precepts, they have stored up at home and elsewhere all the wealth they have made previously, and so it is against the training rule about gold (jāta-rūpa-sikkhāpada). Hence, they should not observe the ten precepts unless they abandon all their wealth with no more attachment. Even if they take the ten precepts, they fail to keep them.

The interpretation of these teachers is not sustainable because there is for monastics the training rule concerning handling and possession of money (rūpiya-sikkhāpada), which is more subtle and noble than the training rule about gold and silver of the laity (jāta-rūpa-sikkhāpada). According to that training rule (sikkhāpada), a monastic should not accept money nor let others do so for him; if it is left near him in the absence of someone to receive it, he should not remain complacent but raise his objection saying: “Gold and silver is not allowable for monastics; we do not accept it.” If he does not [1575] raise any objection, then he commits an offence and the gold and silver should be abandoned by him too. This is the disciplinary rule laid down by the Buddha.

Suppose a supporter (dāyaka) comes to a monastic and offers money, even though the monastic, following the Discipline, forbade him and refuses to accept it, but he leaves it all the same and goes away; if another supporter comes along, and the monastic tells him about the money and the supporter says: “Then please show me a safe place for keeping the money,” the monastic may go up to the seventh terrace of the monastery, taking the supporter with him, and say: “Here is a safe place.” But he should not say: “Keep it here.” However, when the supporter has gone away after keeping the money safely in the place shown by the monastic, the monastic can close the door of the room carefully and keep watch on it. In doing so, the monastic is not guilty of infringement of any disciplinary rule. The commentary states this clearly when considering the training rule about money (rūpiya-sikkhāpada).

If possession of gold and silver is not allowable for the laity observing the training rule about gold (jāta-rūpa-sikkhāpada), it will, by no means, be allowable for the monastic who observes the subtler and nobler precepts to keep watch on his gold and silver. Thus, it should be noted that if such a monastic is free from offence, so is the laity who is not affected in the observance of the training rule about gold by his possession of wealth left in a place of security.

In the sub-commentary on the Path to Purification, the example of Ghaṭikāra the pot-maker is not cited to convey the meaning that “the laity should observe the ten precepts only when they can abandon all their wealth without clinging any more,” like Ghaṭikāra. Actually, the example of Ghaṭikāra, a superior observer of the ten precepts, is cited just to exhort the people not to be content with their ordinary observance of the ten precepts, that they should make efforts to become observers of a higher type following Ghaṭikāra’s example. Even though they cannot be equal to him, the citation is made in order to encourage them to emulate Ghaṭikāra as far as possible.

The authority for this remark is in the commentary to the Thus-Saids (Iti-vuttaka-aṭṭhakathā) by Acariya Dhammapāla, who is also the author of the sub-commentary on the Path to Purification: Sīlam-ayanti nicca-sīla-uposathaniyamādi-vasena pañca, aṭṭha, dasa vā sīlāni samādiyantassa. The commentary mentions three kinds of morality: 1) The five precepts observed permanently (nicca-sīla); 2) the eight precepts observed on Observance Days (Uposatha-sīla); and 3) the ten precepts observed occasionally (niyama-sīla). It is clear that, according to this commentary, the ten precepts are not observed permanently; they are observed occasionally.

Again, in the Discourse about Worshipping Householders (Gahaṭṭha-vandanā-sutta, SN 11.18), we find the following account. Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, came down from Vejayanta Palace to go to the royal garden. When he was about to get onto his chariot, he paid homage to the eight directions. Then the Deva Mātali said: “To whom do you pay homage, sir?” Sakka said:

Ye gahaṭṭhā puñña-karā, sīlavanto upāsakā, Dhammena dāraṃ posenti, te namassāmi Mātali.

Mātali, some people perform meritorious deeds; they are also endowed with morality; they take refuge in the Three Treasures of the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha, and they support their wives and children righteously. To them I pay homage.

The term endowed with morality (sīlavanto) in Sakka’s reply is explained by the commentator thus: Sīlavanto ti upāsakatte patiṭṭhāya pañca hi pi dasa hi pi sīlehi samannāgatā, “those who are endowed with morality means those who take refuge in the Three Treasures and become established in the five precepts and the ten precepts.”

According to this commentary, it is clear that the people to whom Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, pays homage are the people who, living with their families, observe the five and ten precepts.

Also, in the Collection of the Thematic Discourses (Samyutta-nikāya) sub-commentary, it is commented thus: Nicca-sīla-vasena pañcahi, [1576] niyama-sīla-vasena dasahi, “the five precepts should be taken as permanent rules (nicca-sīla), the ten precepts as delimited rules (niyama-sīla).”

In the Light on the Dictionary (Abhidhānappadīpikā, vs 444), the meaning of delimited rules is briefly shown thus:

Yam deha-sāghanāpekkham, niccam kamma-mayam yamo, āgantū-sāghanam kammam, aniccam niyamo bhavo.

The morality which must be observed forever is unlimited rules (yāma-sīla). The morality which is not observed forever but only occasionally is called delimited rules (niyāma-sīla).

The expressions unlimited rules and delimited rules have their origins in Brahmanism, see Amara's Dictionary (Amara-kosa-abhidhāna, vs 49):

Not harming, not speaking lies, not stealing, not indulging in ignoble sexual acts, not accepting alms food: these five are unlimited rules (yama-sīla), which must be observed forever; purifying, being easily content, practising austerity, reciting the Vedas, recollecting Brahma; these five are delimited rules (niyama-sīla), which should be observed occasionally.

According to the Collection of the Thematic Discourses (Samyutta-nikāya) and its commentary, it is clear that even the people who are supporting their families by right livelihood can observe the ten precepts. Hence the view: "People should observe the ten precepts only when they can abandon their gold and silver without clinging anymore, like Ghaṭikāra, the pot-maker," is not a right one; it is an overstatement.

Moreover, of the ten duties of a king, mentioned in the Long Birth Story about the Golden Goose (Mahā-haṃsa-jātaka, JA 534), the commentary says that by the term morality (sīla) is meant both for the five and the ten precepts. Therefore, it is evident that kings observe also the ten precepts as one of their duties. If it is maintained that "the ten precepts should be observed only when they can be observed forever," then kings who have chief queens, lesser queens, maids of honour and a treasury filled with gold and silver would not be able to observe the ten precepts because of the training rules about celibacy (abrahma-cariya-sikkhāpada) and gold (jāta-rūpa-sikkhāpada). Had it been impossible for kings to observe, then the commentator would not have included the ten precepts in his comment on morality (sīla) of the ten kingly duties. But the commentator has definitely mentioned them in his comment. Therefore, the ten precepts are not permanent morality (nicca-sīla); they are the morality limited to whenever one is able to do so.

Moreover, the Supplementary Readings (Khuddaka-pāṭha) commentary explains how the eight precepts are derived from the ten training rules (sikkhāpada). The ten precepts (dasa sikkhāpada) are refraining from:

1. Killing living creatures (pāṇātipāta).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2704

2. Taking what has not been given (adinnādāna).
3. Unchastity (abrahmacariya).
4. False speech (musā-vāda).
5. Liquor, wines or intoxicants which cause heedlessness (surā-meraya-majja-pamādaṭṭhāna).
6. Eating at the wrong time (vikāla-bhojana).
7. Dances, songs, music and watching shows (nacca-gīta-vāḍita-visūka-dassana).
8. Adorning or ornamenting oneself by wearing garlands, scents, or ointments (mālāgandha-vilepana-dhāraṇa-maṇḍana-vibhūsanatṭhāna).
9. Lofty or grand beds (uccā-sayana-mahā-sayana).
10. Accepting gold or money (jāta-rūpa-rajata-patiggahaṇā).

Of the ten precepts, the first two, the training rule about not taking life (pāṇātipāta-sikkhāpada) and about not taking what has not been given (adinnādāna-sikkhāpada), are to be observed by the laity or novices as permanent precepts (nicca-sīla). The third precept, about celibacy (abrahmacariya-sikkhāpada), is not mentioned as a permanent precept (nicca-sīla) for the laity. It is the precept to be observed only when one is able to do so. Again, out of the ten precepts, the seventh one: the training rule about dance and songs (nacca-gīta-sikkhāpada) and the eighth one about garlands and perfumes (mālā-gandha-sikkhāpada) merge into one factor; and the last training rule about gold is excluded.

In accordance with this commentary also, those out of the ten precepts which the laity should observe permanently are four: refraining from killing, stealing, lies and taking intoxicants. The laity cannot always observe the precept about celibacy (abrahmacariya-sikkhāpada). They are also unable to observe permanently the precepts about food at the wrong time (vikālabhojana), dance and songs (nacca-gīta), etc. Thus it is clear that all these ten precepts are a limited (niyama) type of morality (sīla) to be observed only when able.

Although it is mentioned in the Supplementary Readings (Khuddaka-pāṭha) commentary that the training rule about money (jāta-rūpa-sikkhāpada) is a special precept for novices, breaking it will not entail falling from novicehood.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2705

Because in the Great Chapter (Mahā-khandhaka, Vin Mv 1), although the Fortunate One laid down the ten factors (dasāṅga) which will make the novices fall from their novicehood, only the first five of the ten precepts are included in them. The last five are not included. Therefore, in spite of breaking one of these last five factors, the novices will not fall from their novicehood; they are only guilty of a breach of the rules which entail due punishment. If they take the punishment imposed by their teachers they will become again good novices, duly absolved from guilt. [1577]

Thus, even novices for whom the ten precepts are mandatory will not fall from their novicehood in spite of the training rule about money (jāta-rūpa-sikkhāpada). It is clear, therefore, that of the ten precepts, the last five are not so important as the first five for novices. Thus, it is not proper to say and write exhorting strict observance of the money precept for the laity when it is not regarded as so important even for novices.

It is accepted that both the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) and the Supplementary Readings (Khuddaka-pāṭha) commentaries are written by Ven. Mahā Buddhaghosa. As the two books are written by one and the same author, the exposition should not be different. The passage from the Path of Purification which says: Upāsaka-upāsikānaṃ nicca-sīla-vasena pañca-sikkhāpadāni, sati vā ussāhe dasa, “the ten precepts are not permanent morality (nicca-sīla) for the laity; they are delimited (niyama-sīla), and to be observed only when able” should thus be noted to be in line with the Supplementary Readings (Khuddaka-pāṭha) and Thus-Saids (Iti-vuttaka) commentaries.

With respect to a breach of precepts, the Short Readings commentary, after dealing with matters concerning novices, states: “Whereas, in the case of the laity, after taking the vow of the five precepts, if one of them is broken, only that one is broken, and if that one be observed by taking a new vow, the five precepts are complete again.” But some teachers (apare) maintain this: “If the five precepts are taken separately, one after another, a breach of one will not cause the breach of the rest.” However, if they say, at the beginning of taking the precepts: Pañcaṅga-samannāgataṃ sīlaṃ samādiyāmi, “I vow to observe the complete five precepts,” then, if one of them is broken, all are broken because the vow was initially taken to keep the precepts together. As to the result of a breach of precepts, each breach will have its own consequences, not affecting others.

But some teachers rationalize this view by saying that after vowing to observe the complete five precepts, if one of them is broken, all are not broken; others remain unaffected. If we thus accept this rationalization, there will be no difference at all in their views. In this connection, the Analysis of the Training Rules (Sikkhāpada-vibhaṅga) of the Dispeller of Delusion (Sammoha-vinodanī, VibhA) states:

Gahaṭṭhā yaṃ yaṃ vītikkamanti, taṃ tad-eva khaṇḍaṃ hoti bhijjati, avasesaṃ na bhijjati. Kasmā? Gahaṭṭhā hi anibaddha-sīlā honti, yaṃ yaṃ sakkonti taṃ tad-eva gopenti.

After taking the precepts, if the laymen break one of them, only that one is broken; the rest are not; because for the laity there is no mandatory permanent precepts to observe like novices.

Of the five precepts, they may observe whichever they can; one, two or three, but not necessarily all five. We should not say that because they observe only partially and do not observe the complete five precepts, it does not amount to observance of the precepts and that they will not get any merit for it.

It should be noted thus that even though the laity cannot observe all five precepts but only as many as possible, they will get merit and that their morality (sīla) is genuine. In this connection, the Path of the Analytic Knowledges (Paṭisambhidā-magga) commentary comments on pariyanta-pārisuddhi-sīla:<sup>421</sup> “There are two kinds of limit regarding morality (sīla): the limit to the number of precepts observed and the limit to the duration of observance. The laity may observe one precept, or two, three, four, five, eight or ten precepts. But the trainees (sikkhamāna, sāmaṇera and sāmaṇerī) have to observe the ten precepts in full. This is the limit to the number of precepts observed.”

The essential meaning here is: If the laity take precepts numbering one, two, three, four, five, eight or ten and observes them properly, their morality will become a pure morality with a limit in number (sikkhāpada-pariyanta-pārisuddhi-sīla).

Therefore, although in practice one does not vow to take one, two, three or four but all five precepts, it is not mandatory to observe all of them. If they can observe only one precept, they should observe that one. If they can observe two, they should observe those two, and so on.

<sup>421</sup> This morality is described fully under morality in the groups of fives.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2707

It may be questioned: When the laity have the right to observe any number of precepts they wish, why the five precepts alone are prescribed in the commentary to the Path to Purification (Visuddhi-magga) thus: For lay men and women regarding the permanent precepts, these are the five training rules (upāsaka-upāsikānaṃ nicca-sīla-vasena pañca-sikkhāpadāni)? [1578]

The answer is that the commentary is here concerned mainly with the principle of morality, which requires that all the five precepts must be observed permanently (nicca-sīla-vasena pañca-sikkhāpadāni). We have no right to leave out any precept we wish. It is wrong to break any one of the five precepts. It is not only in the Path to Purification but also in other texts that the five precepts are shown as permanent precepts (nicca-sīla) in the light of the principle of morality.

The Five Precepts with Celibacy as Fifth

In addition to the five, eight and ten precepts, there are also the precepts which have celibacy as the fifth (brahma-cariya-pañcama-sīla), which can be observed by the laity. However, the precepts which have celibacy as the fifth are, in reality, the five precepts. The third precept of the original five, undertaking to not behave wrongly in sexual matters (kāmesu micchācārā veramaṇī-sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi), is replaced by undertaking to observe celibacy (abrahmacariyā-veramaṇī-sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi) in order for it to be the precepts which have celibacy as the fifth.

The precepts which have celibacy as the fifth was observed at the time of Buddha Kassapa by the layman Gavesi, as recorded in the Discourse concerning Gavesi (Gavesi-sutta, AN 5.180). At the time of Buddha Gotama, this morality (sīla) was observed by Uggā, the rich man of Vesālī and Uggā, the rich man of Hatthigāma in the Vajjian country; see the First Discourse about Uggā (Paṭhama-ugga-sutta, AN 8.21) and the Second Discourse about Uggā (Dutiya-ugga-sutta, AN 8.22). The two Uggas took the precepts which has celibacy as the fifth from the Fortunate One and observed them; of the four wives they each possessed, the eldest ones were given away in marriage to the men they loved, and the remaining ones were abandoned likewise, and thereafter they remained single for life; they were lay Non-returners. It should not be misunderstood that married persons who want to observe the precepts which have celibacy as the fifth at the present time have to abandon their wives with no more attachment to them. In other words, it should not be taken that they may not observe this morality (sīla) unless they are prepared to renounce their wives altogether. Because in the words of the Supplementary Readings (Khuddaka-pāṭha) commentary, mentioned above: “Of the ten precepts, only four: those restraining from the taking of life, taking what is not given, lying and intoxicants are regarded as permanent precepts (nicca-sīla).”

Hence it is evident that the training rule about celibacy (abrahma-cariya-sikkhāpada) and the remaining precepts, such as not eating at the wrong time (vikāla-bhojana), etc., are not permanent; they are delimited morality (niyama-sīla), to be observed occasionally. Even though they cannot observe the precepts exactly like Ghaṭikāra the pot-maker, they can observe them occasionally as far as possible. So also, with regard to the precepts which have celibacy as the fifth, the two Uggas, being Non-returners, abandoned their wives without any attachment and observed the precepts for life. If other people can follow their example and observe this precept, it is all well and good, but if they cannot emulate them fully, they should observe the precept according to their ability.

The Five Precepts with Celibacy as Fifth and One Time Eating

Furthermore, there are also the precepts which have celibacy as the fifth and one time eating, or simply the one time eating morality (eka-bhattika-sīla). One time eating means taking only one meal a day, in the morning. So, if lay people want to observe this morality (sīla), they may, after making the vow of the precepts which has celibacy as the fifth, take one more precept by saying they undertake to refrain from eating at the wrong time: vikāla-bhojanā veramaṇī-sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi. Or, if they wish to take the vow as a whole, they may do so by saying they undertake the precepts which has celibacy as the fifth and will refrain from eating at the wrong time: brahma-cariya-pañcama-eka-bhattika-sīlaṃ samādiyāmi. This morality (sīla) was observed by the layman Dhammika and laywoman Nandamātā, at the time of the Fortunate One, according to the commentary on the Discourse concerning Dhammika (Dhammika-sutta, Snp 2.14). At the time of Buddha Kassapa, the layman Gavesi also observed this morality (sīla); so did 500 laymen; see the Discourse concerning Gavesi (Gavesi-sutta, AN 5.180).

The Eightfold Observance Day Precepts

It may be questioned why, regarding the five precepts, the term five (pañca) alone is used, and, regarding the ten precepts, the term ten (dasa) is used, whereas in describing the eight precepts, not only the term eight (aṭṭha) but the additional term Observance (Uposatha) is used?

The term Observance (Uposatha) has five meanings:

1. Recitation of the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha).
2. A proper name for persons or animals. [1579]
3. Observance.
4. The morality (sīla) which should be observed.
5. The day for observing morality (sīla).

Of these five, the first meaning 1) is concerned only with the monastic, and the second meaning, 2) being the name for a Prince (e.g. Prince Uposatha, or of an elephant, e.g. the Uposatha elephant, etc.), has no connection with this chapter on morality (sīla); only the remaining three meanings are to be considered here.

The three meanings are derived from the Pāḷi term upavāsa which means observing or fulfilling the precepts. The third meaning 3) is the act of observing the precepts. The fourth meaning 4) is the precepts which should be kept. The fifth meaning 5) is the day on which the precepts are kept.

No particular day was fixed by the virtuous people in the past for observance of the five precepts and the ten precepts; only the eight precepts were observed on a specially fixed day; hence the special epithet of Observance Day (Uposatha) for these eight precepts.

There is another point to consider. The five precepts are not as numerous as the eight precepts, and as it is to be kept everyday, no special day was named for their observance. But as the ten precepts are higher than the eight precepts, the virtuous people in the past should have fixed a special day for their observance. If so, why had they not done so? The probable reason is that the eight precepts are specially suitable for the laity, whereas the ten precepts are not. According to the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga), the ten precepts are for novices. The Supplementary Readings (Khuddaka-pāṭha) commentary also states that the last precept of the ten precepts, regarding not using money (jāta-rūpa- sikkhāpada) is a special one for novices. It is, therefore, evident that the ten precepts are specifically for novices, not for laymen.

Therefore, the learned and virtuous in the past selected, out of the two kinds of morality (sīla) which concerned them, the eight precepts, which is of a higher form, to be observed on a specially appointed day. Only the eight precepts are therefore called Uposatha as explained in the Path of Purification (Visuddhimagga).

The virtuous are not content with the observance of morality (sīla) only; they also wish to do meritorious deeds through giving alms, which entail acquiring, buying and shopping for things to offer. Consequently, they cannot properly observe the training rule about gold and silver (jāta-rūpa-sikkhāpada).

Therefore, the ancient people fixed a special day for observance of the eight precepts only.

The Ninefold Observance

In the Discourse on the Ninefold Observance Day Precepts (Navāṅguposathasutta, AN 9.18), there is an exposition on the ninefold Observance Day precepts (navāṅguposatha-sīla) given with this introduction: “The nine precepts are beneficial, advantageous and powerful.” In enumerating them, the Fortunate One expounds the usual eight precepts from the precept about killing (pāṇātipātā-sikkhāpada) up to the precept about high and luxurious beds (uccāsayana-mahā-sayana-sikkhāpada) but ends with the formula for the practice of loving-kindness thus: Mettā sahāgatena cetasā ekam disam pharitvā viharāmi, “I abide with thoughts of loving-kindness directed to beings in one direction.”

According to the discourse, to keep the ninefold Observance Day precepts (navāṅguposatha-sīla), after taking the usual eight precepts, one develops loving-kindness. A man who observes the eight precepts without any breach and keeps on developing loving-kindness is called an observer of the nine precepts. Loving-kindness is to be developed, whereas morality (sīla) is to be observed. Therefore, to practise the nine precepts, one need not recite the nine precepts when taking the vow. It is sufficient to take the usual eight precepts and to develop loving-kindness as much as possible, then one is said to be practising the nine precepts (navāṅguposatha).

With regard to loving-kindness, as the Fortunate One particularly mentioned one direction (ekam disam), diffusing loving-kindness with one direction in mind is more effective than doing so without minding the direction. One should direct one's thought to all beings in the ten directions, the four cardinal points, the four intermediate points, plus above and below, one after another, beginning from whichever direction one wishes. [1580]

Even though there are four sublime mental states,<sup>422</sup> the Fortunate One takes only loving-kindness and adds it to the eight, thus prescribing the nine precepts because loving-kindness has great power. That is why the Fortunate One has expounded the Discourse on Friendliness Meditation (Metta-sutta), recorded in both the Supplementary Readings (Khuddaka-pāṭha, Khp 9) and the Discourse Collection (Sutta-nipāta, Snp 8).

In the Discourse on the Advantages of Loving-Kindness (Mettānisaṃsa-sutta, AN 11:16) eleven advantages are expounded that accrue to him who repeatedly develops loving-kindness:

1. He sleeps in peace.
2. He wakes up in peace.
3. He has no bad dreams.
4. He is dearly loved by human beings.
5. He is dearly loved by non-human beings (Yakkhas and Petas).
6. He is protected by Devas.
7. He is not afflicted by fire, poison and weapons.
8. His mind is easily concentrated.
9. His face is calm and clear.
10. He dies unconfused.
11. If he cannot penetrate to any higher Dhamma, such as the path and fruition of Arahāt (Arahatta-magga-phala), in this life, he will take rebirth in the Brahma world.

Therefore, it is clear that loving-kindness is more powerful than the other three sublime mental states.

Three Kinds of Observance Day Morality

Observance Day morality (Uposatha-sīla) is of three kinds:

1. The cowherd's observance (gopāla-uposatha).
2. The naked ascetic's observance (nigaṇṭha-uposatha).
3. The noble one's observance (ariya-uposatha).

As expounded by the Fortunate One in the Discourse about the Observance Day (Uposatha-sutta, AN 3.70), the essential meanings are:

1. The Observance Day morality (uposatha-sīla), observed with thoughts of a cowherd, is called the cowherd's observance (gopāla-uposatha). After grazing the cattle all day long, the cowherd returns them to the owner in the evening. On reaching home, he thinks in this way: "Today, I have grazed the cattle in such-and-such a field and taken them to water at such-and-such a place. Tomorrow, I'll take them to such-and-such field for food and to such-and-such a place for water." Similarly, the observer of the Observance Day morality (Uposatha-sīla), having greedy thoughts of food, thinks: "Today, I have taken such-and-such a kind of food. Tomorrow, I'll take such-and-such a kind." If he spends the day in this way like the cowherd, his observance is called the cowherd's observance (gopāla-uposatha).
2. The Observance Day morality observed by a naked ascetic who holds wrong views is called the naked ascetic's observance (nigaṇṭha-uposatha). For example, according to their practice with regard to the precept of not killing (pāṇātipāta), killing living beings beyond a distance of 100 leagues east, west, north and south must not be done. Within such-and-such a distance killing is allowed, thus giving a chance of committing evil. Differentiating between forbidden and unforbidden places for doing wrong, they practise their Observance Day. The observance practised by the holders of such a view is called the naked ascetic's observance (nigaṇṭha-uposatha).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2713

3. If the Observance Day is observed after purifying the mind of defilements through recollection of the special attributes of the Buddha, etc. it is called the noble one's observance (ariya-uposatha).

Again, the noble observance (ariya-uposatha) is of six kinds: [1581]

1. The highest<sup>423</sup> observance (Brahmuposatha). The Observance Day that is observed by taking the eight precepts and repeatedly recollecting the special attributes of the Buddha, such as being Worthy (Arahant), etc., is called the highest observance (Brahmuposatha).
2. The Dhamma Observance Day (Dhammuposatha). The Observance Day that is observed by taking the eight precepts and repeatedly recollecting the special attributes of the Dhamma is called the Dhamma Observance Day (Dhammuposatha).
3. The Saṅgha Observance Day (Saṅghuposatha). The Observance Day that is observed by taking the eight precepts and repeatedly recollecting the special attributes of the Saṅgha is called the Saṅgha Observance Day (Saṅghuposatha).
4. The moral Observance Day (Sīluposatha). The Observance Day that is observed by taking the eight precepts, without breaking any of them and repeatedly recollecting the special attributes of morality (sīla), is called the moral Observance Day (Sīluposatha).
5. The Devatā Observance Day (Devatuposatha). Reflecting that “there are in the world Devas and Brahmas who have endowed themselves with noble qualities of pure faith, morality, learning, generosity and wisdom in their previous births and as a result are reborn in the realm of Devas and Brahmas; such noble qualities are present in me, too,” one observes the Observance Day, comparing oneself with Devatās. Such an observance is called the Devatā Observance Day (Devatuposatha).<sup>424</sup>
6. The Observance Day with eight precepts (aṭṭhaṅguposatha). After taking the eight precepts, one reflects thus: “Just as Arahats never kill or harm any living being and always have compassion for them, so also do I not kill or harm any living being and have compassion for them; by this practice, I am following the way of the Arahats.” The Observance Day observed in this manner reflecting on each of the eight precepts is called the Observance Day with eight precepts (aṭṭhaṅguposatha).

It should be noted that the division of the Observance Day into the three and the six kinds is in reference to the manner of keeping it. Primarily, however, the morality (sīla) which is observed is of two kinds only: The eightfold Observance Day precepts (aṭṭhaṅga-uposatha-sīla) and the ninefold Observance Day precepts (navāṅguposatha-sīla) as already stated above.

Three Kinds of Observance Day

The classification below is made in the light of the Discourse about the Four Great Kings (Catu-mahā-rāja-sutta, AN 3.37), which says: Observing and keeping vigil during the Observance day (Uposathaṃ upavasanti paṭijāgaronti) ... and:

Cātuddasiṃ pañca-dasiṃ, yā ca pakkhassa aṭṭhamī, pāṭihāriya-pakkhañ-ca, aṭṭhaṅga-susamāgataṃ.

Those which are the fourteenth, the fifteenth, and the eighth of the lunar phase, and the wonderful lunar phase is the eightfold gathering.

1. Ordinary Observance Day (pakati-uposatha).

In the verse above, the lines reading Cātuddasiṃ pañca-dasiṃ, yā ca pakkhassa aṭṭhamī “the fourteenth, the fifteenth, and the eighth of the lunar phase,” refer to ordinary Observance Days. In accordance with this, each fortnight of a month, waxing or waning, has three Observance Days: the eighth, the fourteenth and the fifteenth days. Therefore, a month has six Observance Days, which are called ordinary Observance Days. In the commentary, however, the waxing fortnight has four Observance Days, [1582] namely, the fifth, the eighth, the fourteenth and the fifteenth waxing days; the waning fortnight has four Observance Days, too: the fifth, the eighth, the fourteenth and the fifteenth waning days; altogether there are eight Observance Days in a month. These eight are ordinary Observance Days usually observed by the laity.

Whereas, nowadays, the lay people observe only four Observance Days in each month, these are the eighth waxing, the full moon, the eighth waning and the new-moon days.

2. The vigilant Observance Day (paṭijāgara-uposatha).

The vigilant Observance Day (paṭijāgara-uposatha) means the eight ordinary Observance Days observed with one additional day before and after each of them. Paṭi here means “repeatedly;” jāgara means “waking.” Therefore, paṭijāgara-sīla may be interpreted as morality which repeatedly wakes up from the slumber of the defilements. To calculate the number of days: The fifth waxing Observance Day is preceded by the fourth waxing and followed by the sixth waxing Observance Day; the eighth Observance Day is preceded by the seventh waxing and followed by the ninth waxing Observance Day; the fortnight waxing Observance Day is preceded by the thirteenth waxing Observance Day, but there is not an Observance Day to follow; the full moon day is not preceded by an Observance Day but is followed by the first waning Observance Day.

Hence, serially there are the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, thirteenth and fourteenth waxing; the full moon and the first waning days. Thus there are ten days in the waxing fortnight and ten days in the waning fortnight of the month, making altogether eight ordinary Observance Days (pakati-uposatha) and twelve vigilant Observance Days (paṭijāgara-uposatha) days in a month.

3. The wonderful Observance Day (pāṭihāriya-uposatha).

The Observance Day which is more powerful than the vigilant (paṭijāgara) is called wonderful (pāṭihāriya). The vigilant Observance Day has intervening days in the waxing and waning fortnight. The wonderful Observance Day has no such days, morality (sīla) being observed continuously.

If the laity wants to observe the wonderful Observance Day, they should observe for the whole three months of the Rains Retreat (Vassa) without a break; but if they cannot observe for the whole three months, they should do so for one month, from the full moon of October (Assayuja) to the full moon of November (Kattikā); but if they cannot observe for one month, they should do so for fifteen days from the full moon to the new moon of October (Assayuja). This is stated in the commentary to the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya).

However, according to the commentary to the Discourse concerning Dhammika (Dhammika-sutta, Snp 2.14), the Observance Day observed for five months of July (Āsāḷha), August (Sāvaṇa), September (Poṭṭhapāda), October (Assayuja) and November (Kattikā) without a break is a wonderful Observance Day (pāṭihāriya-uposatha), whereas other teachers say that the Observance Day observed for each of the three months of July (Āsālha), November (Kattikā) and March (Phagguṇa) without a break is called the wonderful Observance Day.

Still other teachers say that, according to the Pāḷi texts, there are three ordinary observance (pakati-uposatha) days: the eighth, the fourteenth and the fifteenth of each fortnight of a month. If, in addition to those three ordinary Observance Days (pakati-uposatha), four more days: the seventh before the eighth and the ninth, the thirteenth before the fourteenth and the first day after the fifteenth are observed, such Observance Days are called wonderful Observance Days (pāṭihāriya-uposatha). The commentator remarks that for the benefit of the good people, who wish to acquire good merit, all kinds of precepts are mentioned to enable them to observe whichever they like.

Of the three views shown in the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta) commentary, the commentator's own view was that: "The Observance Day observed for five months is the wonderful Observance Day (pāṭihāriya-uposatha)," and he agrees in essence with the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) commentary, where the period of continuous observance is shown as three months, whereas in the Anthology of Discourses commentary, it is five months. That is the only difference.

The third view from the Anthology of Discourses commentary is in agreement with that of the commentaries on the Birth Story about King Nimi (Nimi-jātaka, Ja 541), the Story about Uttara's Heavenly Mansion (Uttara-vimāna-vatthu, Vv 15), the Verses of the Elder Monks (Thera-gāthā, no further ref. given) and the Birth Story about Suruci, King of Mithilā (Suruci-jātaka, Ja 489).

However, according to the commentary on the Collection of the Thematic Discourses (Saṃyutta-nikāya, PTS 1.307), the wonderful Observance Day in each fortnight of the month are the seventh, the ninth, the thirteenth, and the first waning or waxing day after the fifteenth and the half month after the Rains Retreat (Vassa), i.e., from the first waning to the new-moon day of October (Assayuja). [1583]

Herein, there is one thing to consider: Even though the commentaries on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya), the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta), the Birth Stories (Jātaka), and the Collection of the Thematic Discourses (Samyutta-nikāya) are written by the same commentator, Ven. Mahā Buddhaghosa, they are different from one another regarding the Observance Days. Why is this?

That the Buddha actually described the three kinds of Observance Days are clear from the Discourse about the Uposatha Day (Uposatha-sutta, AN 3.71), but there is no discourse delivered by the Buddha to set aside specific days, three or six, as Observance Days. The fourteenth observance, the fifteenth observance, the eighth observance and the wonderful Observance Day (pāṭihāriya-uposatha) mentioned before are not prescribed by the Fortunate One as Observance Days. Indeed, it was Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, who said to the Tāvātimsa deities: “People observe the Observance Days on the fourteenth, the fifteenth, and the eighth. On the days called wonderful (pāṭihāriya), too, they observe Observance Days.” He was given this information by the Catumahārājika Devas, who went round in the human world preparing a list of the virtuous. The Buddha was only reproducing the words of Sakka. The classification of the fourteenth, the fifteenth and the eighth Observance Days is merely a statement of the Observance Days traditionally observed by people. There is no special discourse expounded by the Fortunate One to enjoin that the Observance Days must be observed on these days or must not be observed on other days.

Thus the fourteenth, the fifteenth and the eighth Observance Days were the Observance Days prescribed by the ancient people. So, traditionally, there were only three ordinary Observance Days (pakati-uposatha), but later on, people observed the fifth day also, and therefore there come to be four Observance Days in each fortnight of a month. Thus the fifth Observance Day is mentioned in the commentary. Nowadays, people observe only four Observance Days in a month.

The Buddha did not prescribe any specific Observance Days because people can observe the precepts on whichever day they like. In mentioning vigilant (paṭijāgara) and wonderful (pāṭihāriya) Observance Days as special days for observance, the commentators are merely recording the various customary practices of the people, hence these seeming differences in the commentaries.

Moreover, the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya), the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta), the Collection of the Thematic Discourses (Samyutta-nikāya) and the Birth Stories (Jātaka), which make expositions of morality (sīla), are known as the teachings in the discourses; they are also known as common-usage teachings (voḥāra-desanā) because, in these discourses, the Buddha, who is incomparable in the usage of the world, employs the terms and expressions of the people, which can never be uniform. Thus, with regard to different classifications of the Observance Days, as all are meant to develop merit, it is not necessary to decide which view is right and which view is wrong. In the Anthology of Discourses commentary, the three views are described advising readers to accept whichever they like.

Those who observe morality select suitable days which they prefer, and they observe the Observance Days accordingly in many ways. And all their observance develops merit, so the commentators write, recording the ways employed by the people. In the teaching in the discourses (suttanta-desanā), even the Buddha expounded the following usages of the people. Why did the Fortunate One expound in this manner? It was because he did not wish them to violate traditional customs which are not demeritorious.

The principal objective of the Fortunate One is to expound only such ultimate realities as mind and matter (nāma-rūpa-paramattha-dhamma) that would facilitate the attainment of the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna. Teaching in such abstruse terms could be beneficial to those with the right perception, but it could make those lacking right perception commit wrong deeds which would lead them to the four lower worlds. For example, those who have a wrong perception of mind and matter (nāma-rūpa) would think thus: “In this world, there is mind and matter only; there is neither ‘I’ nor ‘others;’ if there are no ‘others’ there will be no harm in killing them, and there will be neither ‘mine’ nor ‘others;’ therefore, there will be no harm in stealing things, in committing adultery, etc.” In this manner, they will freely break the rules of society and do such unwholesome deeds which will cause rebirths in the lower planes of existence.

In terms of ultimate truth (paramattha-sacca), there is neither “I” nor “others,” neither “man” nor “woman,” etc. There are only aggregates of mind and matter (nāma-rūpa) which are mental and physical phenomena. For those incapable of understanding the terms of ultimate truth, the Buddha employed terms of conventional truth (sammuti-sacca) when giving discourses (suttanta-desanā). [1584] Though all is a mass of mind and matter (nāma-rūpa), by conventional usage, it is determined for easy discrimination that such-and-such a mass is “I,” such and such a mass is “they,” such-and-such a mass is “mother,” “father,” etc. If people deviate from the norms set up by conventional usage, they will go astray doing wrong deeds. It is to prevent them from falling into the lower planes of existence as a consequence of their misdeeds that the Buddha teaches the discourses in conventional terms.

If, however, only discourses were delivered, people would take such terms as “I,” “they,” “my son,” “my daughter,” “my wife,” “my property,” etc., as ultimate realities and their belief in a permanent personality (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) would become so great that they would not attain the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna, hence the teaching of ultimate reality of mind and matter (nāma-rūpa-paramattha-dhamma) by the Buddha.

Some teachers write: “In the Basket of Discipline (Vinaya-piṭaka) there is an injunction for monastics not to observe the monastic Observance Days, or recitation of the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) on non-Observance Days. If they do so, they commit the offence of wrong-doing (dukkata-apatti). Likewise, laymen should not observe the eight precepts on non-Observance Days.”

Such writing shows that they are not accomplished in interpreting the teaching of the Buddha. The Teaching of the Discipline (Vinaya-desanā) is called a teaching of the rules (āṇā-desanā) in Buddhist literature; it means the authoritative injunction laid down by the Fortunate One. If a monastic commits, even with good intention, a forbidden act, he is guilty because he goes against the command of the Fortunate One and transgresses the Discipline. To assume that such a Vinaya rule is also applicable to laymen in their observance of Observance Days, to say that people must not observe precepts on non-Observance Days and that doing so will be an offence, is a clear misinterpretation of the teaching. In brief, a pure and noble observance can be fulfilled on any day. The more it is observed the greater will be the beneficial results.

Therefore, the sub-commentary on the Discourse about King Mahā Suddasana (Mahā-sudassana-sutta, DN 17) says: The Observance Day (Uposatha) is said to be the precepts (sīla) with eight factors that can be observed by laymen on all days (uposatham vuccati aṭṭhaṅga-samannāgataṃ sabba-divasesu gahaṭṭhehi rakkhitabba-sīlam).

This sub-commentary is written by Ven. Dhammapāla who has also written the sub-sub-commentary (Anuṭṭikā) of the root sub-commentary (Mūla-ṭṭikā) to the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga), the Thus-Saids (Iti-vuttaka) commentary and other sub-commentaries.

Natural, Traditional, Lawful and Because of the Past Precepts

1. Non-transgression of the five precepts by inhabitants of the northern continent is called natural morality (pakati-sīla).

By nature, these inhabitants refrain from wrong deeds, such as killing, without taking the vow of the five precepts. Non-breaking of the five precepts by them is not a matter of restraint through a vow (samādāna-virati) but of natural restraint even when transgression is demanded by circumstances (sampatta-virati).

2. Following the traditional practices of one's family, locality or sect is called traditional morality (ācāra-sīla).

Refraining from evil because it is done so by one's ancestry is called family tradition (kula-ācāra); refraining from evil because it is generally done so in one's locality is called district tradition (desa-ācāra); refraining from evil because it is done in one's sect is called sectarian tradition (pāsaṇḍika-sīla).

3. The kind of morality kept by the mother of a Bodhisatta since she conceived her son, by virtue of which she has no thought for a man, is called natural morality according to Dhamma (Dhammatā-sīla).

A Bodhisatta's mother regularly observes the five precepts and desires no man, not even her husband, from the moment of conception. This is because an extremely noble being, the Bodhisatta, is lying in her womb. As the morality is kept as a rule by the mother of a Bodhisatta, it is called natural morality according to Dhamma (Dhammatā-sīla).

4. The observance of morality by chaste persons, such as the youth Pippali, who later became Mahā Kassapa, and the Bodhisatta as King Mahā Sīlava, through natural inclination and without anyone's instruction, is called morality by reason of past habit (pubba-hetu-sīla).

As a result of habitual observance of morality in their former births, they are by nature inclined to observe morality in this life. [1585]

The Four Realms of Morality

These four are chiefly concerned with the monastic. When the Bodhisatta Sumedha the ascetic, reflected on the perfection of morality, he said to himself (Bv 2.124): Likewise, you should fulfil the four realms of morality (tatheva tvam catūsu bhūmisu sīlāni paripūraya).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2721

1. Morality according to restraint by the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha-saṃvara-sīla).

The morality that liberates its observer from suffering in the four lower worlds is called morality according to restraint by the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha-saṃvara-sīla); pāti, “observe,” mokkha, “to set free,” or, “set free by observing the rules.”

The observer of this morality 1) Should have proper conduct; 2) should have blameless, wholesome resorts; 3) should see great danger in the slightest fault; the offence may be small like a particle of dust but one should see in it a danger as big as Mount Meru, which has a height of 168,000 leagues above and under water; and 4) should observe and practise the precepts properly. To explain further:

1. In the world, there is what should be practised (ācāra-dhamma), and there is what should not be practised (anācāra-dhamma). The three wrong physical actions of killing, stealing and unlawful sexual intercourse, the four wrongs of telling lies, backbiting, abusing and babbling, altogether being seven wrong doings (duccarita) and other deeds that cause a breach of morality constitute what should not be practised (anācāra).

To give some examples of unwholesome actions that would cause a breach of morality: In the world, some monastics earn their living by making gifts of bamboo, leaves, flowers, fruits, soap powder and toothpicks to the laity; they degrade themselves by approving of the wrong speech of the laity, flattering them to gain favour, telling much falsehood mixed with a little truth just like a lot of uncooked peas mixed with a few cooked ones in a pot. They look after children of the laity as nurse-maids, embracing them, dressing them, etc. They serve as messengers running errands for their lay supporters; they give medical treatment to the laity, look after their properties, exchange food and beverage with them. Such wrong livelihood, as well as every other resort of wrong livelihood condemned by the Buddha, is called wrong conduct (anācāra-dhamma).

It is improper for a monastic to give bamboo, leaves, etc. even if the laity comes and asks for their use; more so, therefore, when they are not asked for. Such acts of giving are not the business of monastics. If they do so, they would be destroying the faith of the laity (kula-dūsana) in the Vinaya.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2722

In this connection, it might be asked whether the laity's faith would not be destroyed if the monastic does not give them what they want, or if the monastic gave them what they want, their faith would develop with the thought: "This is a monastic who satisfies our needs." The laity's faith in the monastic as a disciple of the Fortunate One has been genuine and pure even before receiving gifts from the monastic; after their reception, the laity will see him as the giver of bamboo, the giver of leaves, etc., and as a result attachment will arise in them. Therefore, their faith in the monastic becomes tainted with attachment. The genuine faith has been destroyed. Accordingly, the Fortunate One has condemned the giving of gifts by the monastic, naming such deeds as corruption of the laity (kula-dūsana). All practices which are the opposite of the aforesaid wrong conduct (anācāra) are right conduct (ācāra) practices, which should be cultivated.

2. Resort is of two kinds: wrong resort and right resort. Some monastics, in the teachings of the Buddha, have intimate dealings with prostitutes, widows, divorced women, spinsters, eunuchs and nuns; or they frequent ale-houses, which is unbecoming for a monastic. They mingle with kings, ministers, heretics and their followers like ordinary laymen. They associate with people who have no faith, who abuse and threaten the disciples of the Buddha, monks, nuns, male and [1586] female lay devotees and who wish them ill. All these intimate associates of monastics and places frequented by them are wrong resort for monastics.

"Wrong resorts" here refers to unwholesome friendship and association and improper places for monastics to visit. But if a prostitute invites monastics for an alms offering, they can go and receive it, maintaining steadfast mindfulness. Herein, prostitutes, widows, divorced women, spinsters, eunuchs and nuns are regarded as unwholesome resorts because they form the bases for the five sensual pleasures. Ale-houses, taverns, etc. are dangerous to the noble practice of Dhamma. Association with kings and ministers are also not beneficial; offerings made by them may prove destructive like a thunderbolt. And the houses where there is no faith, where people are abusive and threatening, are unwholesome resorts because they discourage faith and cause fear in the monastic.

People and places as opposed to those described above constitute the monastic's wholesome resort. Some lay people have faith and confidence in the Three Treasures; they believe also in productive deeds (kamma) and their results; they are like wells or lakes where the monastic may enjoy an inexhaustible supply of water. Their houses are brightened by the colour of the robes of monastics who visit them frequently. The atmosphere of such a place is filled with the breeze which is caused by the movements of monastics. Here, people wish them well, wish for the welfare of male and female monastics, and male and female lay devotees; such a house is a wholesome resort for monastics.

To explain improper conduct (anācāra), proper conduct (ācāra) and proper resort (gocara) further.

Improper conduct (anācāra): There are two kinds of improper conduct: improper bodily conduct (kāyika-anācāra) and improper verbal conduct (vācasika-anācāra).

Improper bodily conduct (kāyika-anācāra): After entering the Saṅgha, a monastic acts disrespectfully towards the Saṅgha. He stands jostling the elders, sits jostling them, stands or sits in front of them; takes a seat higher than those of the elders; sits with his head covered with the robe; speaks while standing; waves his hands while talking; walks with his footwear on while the elders are walking bare foot; takes a higher path while the elders are taking a lower path; walks on a path while the elders are walking on the ground; sits pushing the elders; stands pushing them and gives no place to the younger monastics.

At the bath house, he puts faggots into the stove without permission of the elders and closes the door; at the bathing place, he pushes the elders and gets into the water in front of them, pushes them and bathes before they do; comes out jostling them before they do and goes out before them, overtaking the elders ahead of him; on reaching the village and town, he hurries into the laity's private and secret chambers and ladies' rooms; he strokes children's heads showing signs of fondness. This is called improper bodily conduct (kāyika-anācāra).

Improper verbal conduct (vācasika-anācāra): After entering the Saṅgha, a monastic acts disrespectfully towards the Saṅgha. He talks about Dhamma without asking for permission from the elders; answers questions or recites the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) without permission; talks while standing; waves his hands while talking. On reaching the village and town, without restraining himself, he speaks to the women or young girls: "You so and so of such and such a family, what do you have? Is there rice gruel? Is there cooked rice? Is there hard food to eat? What shall we drink? What hard food shall we eat? What sort of food shall we eat? What will you offer me?” etc. This is called improper verbal conduct (vācasika-anācāra).

Proper conduct (ācāra): Proper conduct should be understood as the reverse of the said improper conduct (anācāra). Furthermore, a monastic is reverential, obedient, possessed of conscience and concern; wears his lower robe properly; wears his upper robe properly; his manners inspire reverential faith whether moving forwards or backwards, looking sideways, bending or stretching; his eyes are downcast, he guards the doors of his sense-faculties; he knows the right measure [1587] in eating; he strives to be always wakeful; possesses mindfulness with full comprehension; he wants little, is easily contented; is strenuous in the practice of wholesome Dhamma; observes with meticulous care the proper conduct (abhisamācārika-sīla) described above. This is called proper conduct (ācāra).

Proper resort (gocara) is of three kinds: the resort that serves as a powerful support for one’s moral development (upanissaya-gocara); the resort that serves as a guardian of the mind (ārakkha-gocara); and the resort that serves as an anchor of the mind (upanibandha-gocara).

A good friend who always uses the ten kinds of right speech conducive to liberation from Saṃsāra is called a support (upanissaya-gocara). By depending upon such a friend, he hears the Dhamma which is unheard of before, dispels doubts, rectifies his views, gains clearness of mind. In addition to these benefits, he grows in faith, morality, learning, generosity and wisdom. Hence that good friend is a powerful support (upanissaya-gocara) for developing wholesome qualities, such as morality, etc. The ten kinds of speech conducive to liberation:

1. Speech about wanting little (appiccha-kathā).
2. Speech about contentment with what one has in hand (santuṭṭhi-kathā).
3. Speech about living in solitude (paviveka-kathā).
4. Speech about living in seclusion (asaṃsagga-kathā).
5. Speech about making effort (viriyārambha-kathā).
6. Speech about morality (sīla-kathā).
7. Speech about concentration of the mind (samādhi-kathā).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2725

8. Speech about insight (vipassanā) and the knowledge of the paths (paññā-kathā).
9. Speech about the fruition states or liberation (vimutti-kathā).
10. Speech having reflective knowledge (paccavekhaṇā-ñāṇa) of the paths and fruitions (vimutti-ñāṇa-dassana-kathā).

In brief, the person who uses the ten kinds of speech relating to liberation from the suffering of Saṃsāra thus brings five advantages, such as hearing the Dhamma unheard of before, and so on; the good friend, who can make others progress in five attributes: faith, morality, learning, generosity and wisdom, is called a proper resort (upanissaya-gocara), the resort which provides the strong sufficing condition for the development of wholesome qualities, such as morality.

Mindfulness (sati) that guards the mind is called a resort that guards the mind (ārakkha-gocara). A monastic who takes resort in mindfulness goes for alms round into the village and town with downcast eyes, only looking the length of a plough yoke in front of him, and guarding his sense faculties. He goes without looking at the troops of elephants, or troops of horses, troops of chariots, infantry soldiers or at women or men. He does not look up or down or towards any of the eight directions and keeps going.

A monastic who does not take resort in mindfulness (ārakkha-gocara) when going round for alms food in the village and town looks this way and that way, everywhere, like a crow kept in a covered basket. Hence, mindfulness is the resort that protects the mind of the monastic from the danger of evil thoughts.

As the four foundations of steadfast mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna-kammaṭṭhāna) are the resort to which the mind is anchored, it is called the anchoring resort (upanibandha-gocara) from upanibanda, “where the mind is anchored;” gocara, “resort.”

The monastic who wants to make his restraint according to the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha-saṃvara-sīla) completely pure, should have proper conduct, wholesome resort and look upon the slightest fault as an enormous danger.

2. Restraint of the sense faculties (Indriya-saṃvara-sīla).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2726

Guarding of the faculty of the senses (indriya-saṁvara-sīla); the six sense bases: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind are here called faculties (indriya). The faculties means governing (indriya) the senses. In seeing a sight, the eye (cakkhu-pasāda) is the governing organ. If the eye is defective, it cannot see an object because eye-consciousness cannot arise; therefore, the Buddha says that the eye is the eye-faculty (cakkhundriya).

Similarly, in hearing a sound, the ear (sota-pasāda) is the governing organ. If the ear is defective, it cannot hear a sound because ear-consciousness cannot arise; therefore, the ear is the ear-faculty (sotindriya).

In smelling an odour, the nose (ghāna-pasāda) is the governing organ; if the nose is defective, it cannot smell an odour because nose-consciousness cannot arise; therefore, the nose is the nose-faculty (ghānindriya).

In tasting a flavour, the tongue (jivhā-pasāda) is the governing organ. If the tongue is defective, it cannot taste a flavour because tongue-consciousness cannot arise; therefore, the tongue is the tongue-faculty (jivhindriya).

In touching a tangible object, the body (kāya-pasāda) is the governing organ. If the body is defective, it cannot feel a tangible object because body-consciousness cannot arise; therefore, the body is the body-faculty (kāyindriya).

In cognizing a mental object, the mind (mana) is the governing organ. Without mind, there cannot arise mind-consciousness; therefore, mind is the mind-faculty (manindriya).

Thus it is called guarding these six faculties (indriya-saṁvara-sīla). This is how to guard the six sense faculties: When seeing a visible object with the eye, one should be aware of it only as a visible object; one should not cognize even the general aspect of what is seen, e.g., “this is a woman,” “this is a man,” “this is beautiful,” that will cause the arising of defilements. Nor should one give attention to details (anubyañjana) regarding the sign or image of that woman, man, etc., such as the shape of the hands and the legs. The manner of smiling, laughing, talking, etc. looking aside, etc., which will cause repeated arising of defilements.

Ven. Mahā Tissa

With regard to guarding the faculty of the eye, Ven. Mahā Tissa who lived on the top of Mount Cetiya should be shown as an example. One day, Ven. Mahā

Tissa went into Anurādhapura for alms food. That day, a woman, who had quarrelled with her husband, left her house to go back to her parents' place. She had dressed herself in fine clothes. Seeing Ven. Mahā Tissa, who was coming with his faculties restrained, she laughed loudly with the thought: "I will make him my husband after tempting him." Ven. Mahā Tissa looked up to see what it was. Seeing the bones of her teeth, he developed the perception of foulness (asubha-saññā) and contemplating on it, he became an Arahāt. Her husband, who was going after her, saw Ven. Mahā Tissa and asked: "Venerable sir, did you see a woman on the way?"

Nābhijānāmi itthi vā, puriso vā ito gato, api ca aṭṭhi-saṅghato gacchatesa mahā-pathe.

Friend, I didn't notice whether it was a man or a woman that went by, I was only aware that a skeleton had gone along the road.

Even though Ven. Mahā Tissa saw the sight of a woman, he just saw it but was not aware that it was a woman; instead, he simply developed his meditation and became an Arahāt. That incident should be taken as a good example.

Without control of the sense of sight, when a monastic sees a pleasant object, covetousness (abhijjhā) will arise in him; if he sees an unpleasant object, unhappiness, grief (domanassa), will arise in him. Therefore, one should exercise control over one's sense of sight through [1589] mindfulness to prevent the arising of such unwholesome states of mind.

With regard to the remaining sense doors, similar control is to be maintained so that no defilement arises from hearing a sound, smelling an odour, tasting a flavour, touching a tangible object or cognizing a mental object.

3. The morality of purity of livelihood (ājīva-parisuddhi-sīla).

The morality of purity of livelihood (ājīva-parisuddhi-sīla) means avoiding the six kinds of livelihood which the Vinaya prohibits and avoiding of all other kinds of wrong livelihood. The six training rules (sikkhāpada) promulgated by the Buddha with regard to livelihood are:

1. Having evil wishes and being oppressed by them, if a monastic boasts to a layperson of absorption (jhāna), path (maggā) and fruition (phala) attainments which are not present in him, and which have never been present before, he is guilty of expulsion from the Saṅgha (pārājika-āpatti).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2728

2. For the sake of livelihood, if he acts as a go-between, arranging marriages, he is guilty of an offence requiring a meeting of the Saṅgha (Saṅghādisesa-āpatti).
3. Without mentioning directly: “I am an Arahāt,” if he says, for the sake of livelihood: “A certain monastic lives at your monastery and that monastic is an Arahāt,” and if the supporter of the monastery understands that he means himself, he is guilty of a grave offence (thullaccaya-āpatti).
4. For the sake of livelihood, if he asks for and eats sumptuous food, such as food mixed with ghee, butter, oil, honey, molasses, fish, milk and curd, without being ill, he is guilty of an offence requiring confession (pācittiya-āpatti).
5. For the sake of livelihood, if a nun asks for and eats sumptuous food, without being ill, she is guilty of an offence requiring an acknowledgement (pāṭidesanīya-āpatti).
6. For the sake of livelihood, if a monastic asks for and eats curry or boiled rice, without being ill, he is guilty of an offence of wrong doing (dukkata-āpatti).

Other kinds of wrong livelihood, in addition to the above six, are:

1. Hypocrisy (kuhanā).
2. Flattery (lapana).
3. Hinting (nemittikatā).
4. Belittling (nippesikatā).
5. Seeking gain with gain (lābhena lābham nijigīsanatā).

1. Hypocrisy (kuhanā) is of three kinds: Hypocrisy in the use of requisites (paccaya-paṭisevana); hypocrisy in talk on subjects close to attainments of the path and the fruition states (samanta-jappā); hypocrisy in change of postures to deceive lay devotees (iriyāpatha-saṅṭhapana).

When lay devotees offer a monastic robes, bowls, etc., although he wants them, having evil desires to pretend and pose as if he has attributes which are non-existent, he says, in order to get even more: “What is the use of such expensive robes for a monastic? Only robes made of refuse rags (paṃsu-kūlika) is proper for him.”

He says: “What is the use of such expensive food for a monastic? Only food obtained on alms round is proper for a monastic;” or “What is the use of such a fine dwelling place for a monastic? Only dwelling at the foot of a tree or in the open air is proper for him;” or “What is the use of such expensive medicine for a monastic? Cow urine or a portion of gall nut or myrobalan is proper for him as medicine.”

Accordingly, to practise what he teaches, he uses only coarse robes, coarse dwelling places and coarse medicines. Lay devotees think so highly of him thus: “This venerable one has few wishes; he is easily contented; he is free from desires for material goods and sense pleasures; he does not mix with lay people; he is also very diligent in the practice of Dhamma.” Then they invite him to accept more and more requisites.

Then the monastic with evil desires boastfully says: “Supporter, when these three things: Faith, material goods to offer and the person to receive them are present, then the good person who has [1590] faith can develop much merit. Here, you devotees surely have faith; you have things to give away in generosity, and indeed, I am a worthy recipient. If I do not accept your alms, your merit will decline. So out of compassion for you, I should accept your alms, although I am not in need of them.” So saying, he accepts cartloads of robes and food, numerous dwelling places and large quantities of medicine. Thus, though he is avaricious, he pretends to be of little wants and uses coarse requisites to make others think highly of him. This is called hypocrisy in use of requisites (paccaya-paṭisevana-kuhanā).

Without saying directly: “I have already attained the absorptions, paths and fruitions,” he makes other people think that he is already in possession of them by insinuating: “The monastic who wears such kinds of robes is powerful; the monastic who carries such a bowl, water filter, water strainer, waist-band, sandals, etc., is powerful.” This is called hypocrisy in talk on subjects close to the attainments of the absorptions, paths and fruitions (samanta-jappā).

Determined on gaining the praise and high esteem of lay devotees, the monastic thinks: “If I were to walk like this, people will praise me and think highly of me,” and effects the deportment of noble ones in going, standing, sitting and lying down. This is called hypocrisy in change of posture to deceive lay devotees (iriyā-patha-saññhapanā).

2. Talking with an evil motive (lapanā). When the monastic sees people coming to the monastery, he speaks to them first: “Supporter, for what purpose do you come here? Do you come here to invite monastics? If so, you go ahead, I will follow you carrying the bowl,” or he says: “I am Ven. Tissa, even the king reveres me. The ministers revere me,” etc. While talking with the people, he takes care not to go against them or to bore them, thus avoiding their displeasure. He flatters them, calling them “a great banker,” “a great miller,” etc. Talking thus in many ways to wheedle alms from lay devotees is called talking with an evil motive (lapanā).

3. Hinting by making signs or giving indications with an evil motive to induce generosity (nemitti-katā). For example, seeing a man carrying some food, he gives an indication that he also wants some food by saying: “Have you already got food? Where have you got it from? How do you manage to get it?” etc. Seeing cowherds, he points to the calves and says: “Do these calves grow up on milk or water?” The cowherds reply: “Venerable sir, the calves grow up on milk.” “I don’t think so. Should the calves get milk, the monastics would have got it, too,” etc. thus sending the message through to their parents to offer them milk, hinting thus to induce generosity (nemitti-katā).

The form of talk which gives more direct and glaring indications of what one wants is called roundabout talk (sāmanta-jappā). Both hinting (nemitti-katā) and roundabout talk (sāmanta-jappā) are different kinds of talking with an evil motive (lapanā).

In describing the roundabout talk (sāmanta-jappā), which indicates unmistakably the object of desire, the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) gives the story of a monastic who habitually visited lay people (kulupaka).

A Monastic Who Visits Lay People

Wanting a meal, a monastic, who was in the habit of visiting lay people, entered a house and took a seat uninvited. Seeing the monastic and unwilling to give food to him, the woman of the house grumbled: “I haven’t got any rice,” went out as though to look for some and stayed at a nearby house. The monastic then stealthily went into an inner room and looking everywhere saw sugarcane in the corner behind the door, lumps of jaggery in a bowl, a flattened piece of dried fish in a basket, rice in a pot and butter in a jar. Thereafter, he returned to his seat and sat there as before.

The woman came back murmuring: “I didn’t get any rice.” The monastic then said: “Supporter, this morning I saw some signs suggesting that I would get nothing to eat.” – “What signs, venerable sir?” the woman asked. “As I came to this house for alms food, I saw on the way a snake as big as sugarcane in the corner behind the door. To drive it away, I looked for something and found a stone which was as big as the lump of jaggery in your bowl. When I hurled the stone at the snake, its hood spread out to the size of the piece of flattened dried fish in your basket. When the snake opened its mouth to bite the stone, it [1591] showed its teeth and fangs which were like the rice-grains in your pot. The foamy saliva mixed with poison of the angry snake was like the butter in your jar.” Caught inextricably in the web of words which glaringly indicates his wish, the woman thought to herself: “There is no way to deceive the shaven headed one!” And she reluctantly gave him the sugarcane, cooked the rice and offered it to him together with the butter, jaggery and dried fish.

4. Another form of wickedness means pursuit of gain by wiping off or grinding or pulverising the virtuous qualities of a lay devotee (nippesi-katā), as in the pursuit of perfume by grinding or pulverising scented materials. Such pursuit is made in many ways: the use of abusive language to compel one to give; reproaching, by saying: “You are a fellow with no faith at all” “You are not like other devotees.” Sarcasm, by saying to one who does not give: “Oh, what a supporter! Oh, what a great supporter;” ridiculing remarks made to a non-giver in the midst of people by saying: “Why do you say so when this man does not offer anything? He always says: ‘I have nothing,’ to everyone who comes for alms.” Such pursuit of gain by belittling the virtuous qualities of lay devotees is called belittling (nippesi-katā).

5. Pursuit of gain with gain motivated by covetousness (lābhena lābham nijigīsanatā). For example, after receiving some food offered at a supporter’s house, a monastic gives it away to the children in the neighbourhood. He does so just to make the families of children give him more in return to express their thanks and delight for his seeming interest in their children. In brief, seeking for more alms from another house by giving away the few offerings he has already received is called pursuit of gain with gain (lābhena lābham nijigīsanatā).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2732

The five kinds of wrong livelihood, such as hypocrisy, described above, are different from one another only in the manner of the pursuance in their nature; they are all the same, in the sense that they beguile lay devotees into giving offerings, even though they are reluctant.

Thus living on things obtained by infringing the six training rules (sikkhāpada) laid down by the Buddha with regard to livelihood and things obtained by evil practices of hypocrisy, talking, hinting, belittling and pursuing gain with gain, is called wrong livelihood (micchājīva). Refraining from all forms of wrong livelihood and becoming pure in means of living is called purification of livelihood (ājīva-pārisuddhi-sīla).

4. Morality from dependence on the requisites (paccaya-sannissita-sīla).

Morality fulfilled by depending on the four requisites (paccaya-sannissita-sīla), where the four requisites are robes, food, dwelling places and medicines; they are indispensable; living is impossible without them. But when using them, one should reflect on the nature of the requisite concerned so that such evils as greed, hatred, etc. do not arise.

The way in which one should reflect while using robes, without considering it as an embellishment, which will cause the arising of demeritorious thoughts, one thinks on it wisely: “For the purpose of protection from the cold, from the heat of the sun, from contact with mosquitoes, gad-flies, wind, snakes, scorpions, fleas, etc., for concealing the private parts of the body that would disturb conscience, I wear this robe.”

While using alms food, one reflects wisely: “I take this alms food not for amusement as children do; I take this alms food not for intoxication with manliness; I take this alms food not for development of bodily beauty; I take this alms food not for a clear skin and complexion; I take this alms food only for long endurance and maintenance of the body; I take this alms food for warding off the oppression of hunger; I take this alms food for facilitating the noble practice. By thus taking alms food, the old suffering of hunger and thirst will diminish; I will also ward off the new suffering of indigestion due to overeating, etc. By moderate eating, the old suffering of hunger and thirst and the new suffering of indigestion due to over-eating cannot arise, and my body will be maintained. This alms food is sought properly and eaten in a blameless manner and by taking it moderately, I shall live in comfort.” [1592]

With regard to living in comfort by eating moderately, Ven Sāriputta<sup>425</sup> said (Thag 982-983):

Cattāro pañca ālope, abhuvā udakaṃ pive, alam phāsu-vihārāya, pahitattassa bhikkhuno.

With four or five morsels still to eat, a monastic should finish off his meal by drinking water. This is sufficient to abide in comfort for the monastic who has resolute will for meditation.

Even though this discourse was expounded primarily to meditating yogis, it is also beneficial to non-meditators. By following this instruction, they can abide in ease, free from the discomfort of immoderate eating.

While using a dwelling place, one reflects: “I use this dwelling place for the purpose of protection from the cold, from the heat of the sun, from mosquitoes, gadflies, wind, snakes, scorpions, fleas, etc., to ward off the perils of extreme climates and for enjoying a secluded living.”

While using medicine, one reflects: “I take this medicine for the purpose of countering illness, for the protection of life and for immunity from afflictions that have arisen or are arising.” This elaborate manner of reflection is called the great reflection (mahā-paccavekkhaṇā).

How to Fulfil These Four Kinds of Morality?

Of these four kinds, the restraint according to the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha-saṃvara-sīla) should be fulfilled with faith and confidence (saddhā) in the Buddha, thinking thus: “The Fortunate One, who has promulgated the training rules (sikkhāpada), is truly a Buddha who realizes all the laws of nature without exception; that is, by having a clear vision of the Buddha.” Faith and confidence in the Dhamma can be fulfilled, thinking thus: “The training rules (sikkhāpada) to be practised by the Saṅgha are indeed those promulgated by the Buddha, that is, by having a clear vision of the Dhamma.” Faith and confidence in the Saṅgha can be fulfilled, thinking thus: “Members of the Saṅgha are the disciples of the Buddha, all of whom are practising these training rules (sikkhāpada) well, that is, by having a clear vision of the Saṅgha.”

<sup>425</sup> [The learned author attributed this verse to the Buddha, but it seems the only canonical reference is to Ven Sāriputta’s verse.]

Thus, if one has faith and confidence in the Buddha, Dhamma and Saṅgha, one would be able to fulfil the restraint according to the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha-saṁvara-sīla).

Therefore, the training rules as promulgated by the Buddha should be observed without exception, with faith and confidence, and should be fulfilled even at the cost of one's life. This,<sup>426</sup> indeed, has been expounded thus (Vism 1, Catu-pārisuddhi-sampādana-vidhi):

*Kikīva aṇḍaṁ, camarīva vāladhiṁ, piyaṁ va puttaṁ, nayanāṁ va ekakaṁ.
Tatheva sīlaṁ, anurakkhamānā, supesalā hotha, sadā sagāravā.*

Just as the female pheasant guards her eggs, even sacrificing her life, just as the yak (camari) guards its tail, even sacrificing its life, just as the householder guards his only son with loving-kindness, just as the one-eyed man protects his only eye with meticulous care, even so the observers of moral precepts in all three ages should have a high regard for morality and guard it with affection.

Elders Who Were Restrained According to the Rules

Once, in the Mahā Vattani forest grove of Śrī Laṅkā, robbers caught a venerable and bound him with creepers and made him lie down. Even though he could free himself with his effort, if he so desired, he feared that should he make a struggle, the black creepers would break and he would be guilty of the confession offence against the destruction of plants (Pāc 11). So he developed insight by meditation for seven days in his lying posture and attained the fruition state of a Non-returner (Anāgāmi-phala), and passed away on that very spot. He was reborn in the Brahma world.

Also in Śrī Laṅkā, a venerable was similarly mistreated by robbers. At that time a forest fire broke out. Even though he could manage to free himself, he feared that he might be guilty of the destroying of plants confession rule (Pāc 11). By developing insight without cutting the creepers, he became an Arahat, whose defilements and lifespan ended at the same [1593] time (sama-sīsī), and attained Parinibbāna. Then Ven. Abhaya, the Collection of the Long Discourses reciter (Dīgha-nikāya-bhāṇaka), together with 500 monastics, arrived on the scene. Seeing the body, he had it cremated properly and a shrine built. Therefore, it is thus stated in the commentary (Vism 1, Catu-pārisuddhi-sampādana-vidhi):

Pātimokkham visodhento, appeva jīvitam jahe, paññattaṃ loka-nāthena, na bhinde sīla-saṃvaram.

The good man who maintains the purity of the restraint according to the Monastic Rules would sacrifice his own life rather than break the precepts laid down by the Buddha.

Just as the restraint according to the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha-saṃvara-sīla) is fulfilled with faith and confidence, so should the restraint of the senses (indriya-saṃvara-sīla) be fulfilled with mindfulness. Only when the restraint of the senses is well-guarded by mindfulness, the restraint according to the Monastic Rules will endure long. When the restraint of the senses is broken, the restraint according to the Monastic Rules will be broken too.

At the time of the Buddha, a newly ordained monastic, Ven. Vaṅgīsa, while going on alms round, broke the restraint of the senses and was filled with lust on seeing a woman. He said to Ven. Ānanda: “Ven. Ānanda, I am burning with sensual lust, my mind is consumed by the flames of lust. Out of compassion, please teach me the Dhamma to extinguish the burning flames.”

Then Ven. Ānanda replied: “As you perceive wrongly, the burning flames consume your mind. Dispel your perception of pleasantness in what you see for it leads to lust; see foulness there to purify your mind.” Ven. Vaṅgīsa followed Ven. Ānanda’s advice, and the burning fires of lust died down.

There are two other examples which should be followed by one who wishes to fulfil the restraint of the senses.

The Story of Ven. Cittagutta

In the great cave Kurandaka, in Śrī Laṅkā, there was a lovely painting depicting the renunciation of the Seven Buddhas, such as Vipassī, Sikhī and so on. A number of guest monastics while wandering amidst the dwellings saw the painting and said: “Venerable sir, what a lovely painting it is in your cave!” Ven. Cittagutta replied: “For more than 60 years, friends, I have lived in the cave, and I did not know whether there was a painting here or not. Today, I come to know about it through you who have keen eyesight.”

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2736

Though Ven. Cittagutta had lived there for more than 60 years, he had never raised his eyes and looked up at the cave even once. And, at the entrance of his cave, there was a great ironwood tree. Ven. Cittagutta had never looked up at the tree either. But seeing the flower petals on the ground each year, he knew it was in bloom.

Hearing Ven. Cittagutta’s strict observance of the restraint of the senses, the King of Mahāgāma sent for him three times, desiring to pay homage to him. When Ven. Cittagutta did not go, the king had the breasts of all the women with infants in the village bound and sealed off, saying: “As long as Ven. Cittagutta does not come, let the children go without milk.” Out of compassion for the children, Ven. Cittagutta went to Mahāgāma.

Being informed that Ven. Cittagutta had arrived, the king said: “Go and bring the venerable into the palace. I want to take the precepts.” In the inner chamber, the king paid homage to Ven. Cittagutta and provided him with a meal, after which he said: “Venerable sir, it is not opportune for me today to take the precepts. I shall do so tomorrow.” Carrying Ven. Cittagutta’s bowl, he followed him for a short distance and paid homage with the queen. Whether it was the king or the queen who paid homage to him, Ven. Cittagutta gave the blessing: “May the king be happy!” Seven days went by in this manner.

The fellow monastics asked him: “Venerable sir, why it is that, whether it is the king or the queen who pays homage, you say: ‘May the king be happy?’ ” Ven. Cittagutta replied: “Friends, I have no particular awareness whether it is the king or the queen.” At the end [1594] of seven days, when the king found that Ven. Cittagutta was not happy living there, he allowed him to leave. He went back to the great cave at Kurandaka. When night came, he went out onto his walk.

A Deva, who dwelt in the Ironwood tree, stood by with a torch, and Ven. Cittagutta’s meditation was so pure and bright it gladdened him. Immediately after the middle watch, he became an Arahat, making the whole mountain resound with a thunderous roar. This story gives a good example of how the restraint of the senses (indriya-samvara-sīla) should be observed.

The Story of Ven. Mahā Mitta

Ven. Mahā Mitta’s mother was sick with a breast tumour. She told her daughter, who also had gone forth as a nun: “Go to your brother. Tell him my trouble and bring back some medicine.” She went and told him, but he said: “I do not know how to gather herbs and concoct a medicine from them. But I will rather tell you a kind of medicine: ‘Since I became a recluse, I have not broken my morality regarding the restraint of the senses (indriya-samvara-sīla) by looking at the bodily form of the opposite sex with lustful thoughts. By this declaration of truth, may my mother recover,’ go back and repeat the words of truth I have just uttered and rub her body.” She went back and reported to her mother what her brother had told her and did as she had been instructed. At that very moment, the mother’s tumour vanished like a lump of froth breaking into pieces. She got up and uttered with joy: “If the Fully Awakened One were still alive, why should he not stroke with his net-adorned hand the head of a monastic like my son!”

A net-adorned hand is one of the 32 distinctive marks of a Great Man (Mahā-purisa-lakkhaṇa). For details, refer to the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya, DN 30) and the section on these marks given in the Miscellaneous Topics above.

Ven. Mahā Mitta’s way of restraint of the faculties is somewhat different from that of the former Ven. Cittagutta. Ven. Cittagutta restrained his faculties with downcast eyes so as not to look at any of the objects even by chance, whereas Ven. Mahā Mitta did not restrain with downcast eyes, and he looked at things as they presented themselves. Even when he caught the sight of the opposite sex, he restrained his faculty of eye to prevent lust from arising.

Ven. Cittagutta’s way of restraint of the faculties is like the closing of the door of the house completely, not letting any robbers come in. Ven. Mahā Mitta’s way of restraint is not closing the door, but keeping the robbers from entering the house even once. Both types of restraint are marvellous and worthy of emulation.

While restraint of the faculties is to be undertaken with mindfulness (sati), purification of livelihood is to be practised with energy (virīya). This is because one is able to abandon wrong livelihood only by applying right energy. Therefore, avoiding unbecoming, improper means, purification of livelihood should be undertaken with the right kind of search, like going on alms round with energy.

No hint, roundabout talk, indication or intimation is allowable to acquire such requisites as robes and alms food. But, as regards acquiring a dwelling place, only intimation is not allowable.

When a monastic who is preparing the ground, etc. as if to build a dwelling place, is asked: “What is being done, venerable sir? Who is having it done?” and he replies: “No one,” such a reply of his is a “hint” implying that there is no supporter yet for the dwelling place. All other actions which communicate his need for a residence also constitute “hinting.”

A monastic asks a lay devotee: “What kind of a house do you live in?” – “In a mansion, venerable sir.” – “But, supporter, is a mansion not allowed for monastics?” This and any such expressions constitute “roundabout talk.”

Saying: “The dwelling place is too small for the community of monastics,” or any other such suggestive talk constitutes an “indication.”

All four forms of talk, such as hinting, roundabout talk, etc., are allowed in the case of medicine. But when [1595] the disease is cured, is it or is it not allowed to use the medicine obtained in this way? Herein, the Discipline specialists say that since the Buddha has opened the way for its use, it is allowable. But the Discourse specialists maintain that though there is no offence, nevertheless the purity of livelihood is sullied; therefore, it is not allowable. But one who wishes to live a completely pure noble life should not use hinting, roundabout talk, indication or intimation, even though these are permitted by the Fortunate One. Endowed as he is with special qualities such as having few wants, he should make use only of requisites obtained by means other than hinting, etc., even when he is to risk his life. Such a one is called a person of extremely noble, austere practice like Ven. Sāriputta.

The Story of Ven. Sāriputta

Once, Ven. Sāriputta, wishing to cultivate the noble life, lived in a solitary place in a certain forest with Ven. Mahā Moggallāna. One day, an affliction of colic arose in him, causing him great pain. In the evening, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna went to confer with him and found him lying down. He asked: “What is the matter?” When Ven. Sāriputta explained, he asked again: “What had helped you in the past?” Ven. Sāriputta said: “When I was a layman, friend, my mother gave me rice gruel prepared with a mixture of ghee, honey, sugar and so on. That used to help me recover.” Then Ven. Mahā Moggallāna said: “So be it, friend, if either you or I have accumulated enough merit, perhaps tomorrow we shall get some.”

Now a Deva, who lived in a tree at the end of the walkway, overheard their conversation. Thinking: “I will find rice gruel for Ven. Sāriputta tomorrow,” he went immediately to the family who was supporting Ven. Mahā Moggallāna and entered the eldest son’s body to cause him discomfort. Then he told the boy’s family, who had gathered, that if they would prepare rice gruel of such and such a kind on the next day for Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, he would set the boy free. They replied: “Even without being told by you, we regularly offer alms food to Ven. Mahā Moggallāna.” The next day they prepared rice gruel.

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna went to Ven. Sāriputta in the morning and told him: “Stay here, friend, till I come back from the alms round.” Then he went into the village. The people met him, took his bowl, filled it with rice gruel, prepared as required, and gave it back to him. When Ven. Mahā Moggallāna wanted to leave, they said: “Eat, venerable sir, we shall give you more.” When Ven. Mahā Moggallāna had eaten, they gave him another bowlful. Ven. Mahā Moggallāna left taking the alms food to Ven. Sāriputta and told him to eat.

When Ven. Sāriputta saw it, he thought: “The rice gruel is very nice. How was it got?” He then reflected and, seeing how it had been obtained, said: “Friend, the alms food is not fit to be used.” Instead of feeling offended and thinking: “He does not eat the alms food brought by someone like me,” Ven. Mahā Moggallāna at once took the bowl by the rim and turned it over.

As the rice gruel fell on the ground, Ven. Sāriputta’s affliction vanished, and it did not reappear during the remaining 45 years of his life. Then he said to Ven. Mahā Moggallāna: “Friend, even if one’s bowels come out and fall to the ground through hunger, it is not fitting to eat gruel got by verbal intimation.”

Herein, it should be noted: The Fortunate One prohibited only verbal intimation about the food. Ven. Sāriputta did not use verbal intimation to get the food.

When Ven. Mahā Moggallāna wanted to know what had cured his affliction before, he only related the relief given by rice gruel in the past.

However, he was not pleased that a verbal intimation had been made at all and did not accept the rice gruel.

Ven. Ambakhādaka Mahā Tissa

Let alone a venerable of Ven. Sāriputta's stature during the lifetime of the Buddha, even little-known Ven. Mahā Tissa of Ciragumba in Śrī Lāṅkā, long after the demise of the Buddha, had strictly observed the disciplinary rules. Once, Ven. Mahā Tissa, while travelling during a famine, became weary and weak owing to lack of food and a tedious journey. So he [1596] lay down at the foot of a mango tree, which was full of fruit. Several mangoes fell everywhere on the ground near him. But he would not think of picking up some to eat in spite of his hunger.

At that time, an old man came near him and, seeing him in the state of exhaustion, prepared some mango juice and offered it to him. Then, carrying him on his back, the man took him where he wanted to go. While being carried thus, Ven. Mahā Tissa thought to himself: "This man is not my father, nor my mother, nor any relative of mine. Yet, he carries me on his back; this is only because of the morality I possess." Reflecting thus he admonished himself to keep his morality and concentration of mind intact without blemish. He then developed insight and while still being carried on the back of the man, he became an Arahat through successive stages of the path. This venerable is a noble person whose abstemiousness in food serves as an example for emulation.

While purification of livelihood (ājīva-pārisuddhi-sīla) is to be practised with energy (virīya), morality which depends upon the four requisites (paccaya-sannissita-sīla) should be fulfilled with wisdom (paññā). Since only men of wisdom can discern the advantages and dangers of the four requisites, morality which depends upon the four requisites is the morality which is fulfilled through wisdom. Therefore, one should make use of the four requisites which have been obtained lawfully without craving for them and after reflecting with wisdom in the aforesaid manner.

Two Kinds of Reflection

There are two kinds of reflection (paccavekkhaṇa) on the four requisites; reflection at the time of receiving them and reflection at the time of using them. Not only at the time of using the requisites but also at the time of receiving them, one reflects on them either as mere elements (dhātu-paccavekkhaṇa) or as repulsive objects (paṭikūla-paccavekkhaṇa) and put them away for later use.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2741

1. Reflection as elements: This robe is a mere aggregate of eight elements which arises when conditions are present. So is the person who uses them.
2. Reflection as repulsive objects: Reflection on food as in meditation on perception of foulness in nutriment (āhāre paṭikūla-saññā), and reflection on robes, etc. in this way: “All these robes, which are not in themselves disgusting, become utterly repulsive when associated with this filthy body.”

To recapitulate, reflection is of three kinds in all: A great reflection (mahā-paccavekkhaṇa), as described in detail regarding the use in general of the four requisites; reflecting on the four requisites as mere elements (dhātu-paccavekkhaṇa); and reflection on them as repulsive objects whether in their own nature or when put in use (paṭikūla-manasikāra-paccavekkhaṇa).

If a monastic reflects on the robes, etc. at the time of receiving them and if he does again at the time of use, his use of the requisites is blameless from beginning to end.

Four Kinds of Use

To dispel doubts about the use of requisites, one should take note of four kinds of their use:

1. Usage that is like a thief (theyya-paribhoga).

The use of requisites by an immoral person in the midst of the Saṅgha is called usage that is like a thief (theyya-paribhoga).

The Fortunate One has permitted the use of the four requisites for men of morality. Lay devotees also make their offerings to virtuous persons only, expecting great benefit for their good deeds. Therefore, immoral persons have no right whatsoever to enjoy the requisites. Hence, using them without such right by immoral persons resembles an act of theft.<sup>427</sup> [1597]

2. Usage that is like owing a debt (iṇa-paribhoga).

The use of requisites by a moral person without due reflection is like owing a debt. One should reflect every time a robe is used; every time a morsel of food is eaten. If one fails to do so at the time of using these requisites, one should reflect on them in the morning, at dusk, during the first watch, middle watch and last watch of the night. If dawn breaks without his making such a reflection, he finds himself in the position of one who owes a debt.

Every time he passes under the roof to enter the dwelling place and after entering it, every time he sits, every time he lies down, he should make due reflection. In receiving a requisite of medicine and in using it, he should make reflection. But if he reflects while receiving and fails to do so when using it, he is guilty of an offence. On the other hand, even if he fails to make reflection when receiving but does so when using it, he is free from guilt.

Four Kinds of Purification of Morality

If a monastic happens to have committed an offence, he should take a recourse to one of the four kinds of purification of his morality as mentioned below:

1. Purification by admission of fault (desanā-suddhi): Restraint according to the Monastic Rules (Patimokkha-saṃvara-sīla) is purified by an open declaration of its breach.
2. Purification by restraint (saṃvara-suddhi): Restraint of the senses (indriya-saṃvara-sīla) is purified by making the resolution: “Never will I do it again.”
3. Purification by search (pariyēṭṭhi-suddhi): Purification of livelihood (ājīva-pārisuddhi-sīla) is purified by abandoning wrong search and seeking requisites in a lawful manner.
4. Purification by reflection (paccavekkaṇa-suddhi): morality which depends upon the four requisites (paccaya-sannissita-sīla) is purified by reflection according to the manner mentioned above.

3. Usage that is like receiving an inheritance (dāyajja-paribhoga).

Use of the requisites by the seven kinds of learners, meaning noble ones who have realized the three lower paths and three lower fruition states and the path, but not the fruition, of an Arahāt. These seven kinds of learners are sons of the Buddha. Just as a son is an heir to his father, these noble persons, as heirs, make use of the requisites allowed by the Buddha.

Although the requisites are, in practice, given by the laity, they are allowed by the Buddha, and thus they are to be considered as the Buddha’s requisites.

4. Usage like a master (sāmi-paribhoga).

Usage that is like a master is usage by an Arahāt (sāmi-paribhoga). Worldlings (puthujjana) and learners (sekkha) are not free from craving, accordingly, they remain subject to craving, and their use of requisites is not as masters but as slaves of craving. On the other hand, Arahāts have been liberated from servitude to craving, and their use of requisites is as masters with full control over craving. Therefore, they can use disgusting things, reflecting on their non-disgusting nature, or use non-disgusting things, reflecting on their disgusting nature, or use them reflecting that they are neither disgusting nor non-disgusting things.

Of these four kinds of use, use like a master by an Arahāt, and use like getting an inheritance are allowable to all. Herein, as said before, use of requisites like a master is applicable only to Arahāts, but if trainees (sekkha) and worldlings (puthujjana) use the requisites by abandoning craving through perception of their foulness, it is like being liberated from the servitude to craving; therefore, this kind of use may also be classed as use like a master (sāmi-paribhoga). In the same way, Arahāts and worldlings may also be considered as inheriting sons of the Buddha.

Use that is like owing a debt is not allowable, more so is the usage like an act of thieving which is certainly not allowable. Use of requisites after reflection by one endowed with morality is opposite to use that is like owing a debt (ina-paribhoga), and is thus called use without owing a debt (ānaṇya-paribhoga). At the same time, worldlings [1598] endowed with morality who use the requisites after due reflection may be reckoned as trainees (sekkha) or noble persons. Therefore, use of requisites after due reflection by such worldlings endowed with morality is also reckoned as use like getting an inheritance.

Of these four kinds of use, use that is like a master by an Arahāt is the noblest; a monastic who wishes to use the requisites like a master should fulfil the morality which depends upon the four requisites (paccaya-sannissita-sīla) by using the four requisites only after due reflection.

Morality in Groups of Fives

1. Morality is of five kinds:

1. Morality that is limited in purity (pariyanta-pārisuddhi-sīla).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2744

2. Morality that is unlimited in purity (apariyanta-pārisuddhi-sīla).
3. Morality that is fulfilled in purity (paripuṇṇa-pārisuddhi-sīla).
4. Morality that is irreproachable in purity (aparāmañña-pārisuddhi-sīla).
5. Morality that is calmed in purity (paṭippassaddhi-pārisuddhi-sīla).

1. Morality that is limited in purity (pariyanta-pārisuddhi-sīla). Morality observed by lay devotees and novices is called morality consisting in limited purification, because it is limited by the number of precepts to be kept.

The Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) does not explain the limit by the number of the precepts in the morality that is limited in purity. But the Path of the Analytic Knowledges (Paṭisambhidā-magga) commentary explains, as has been mentioned before, two kinds of limit: The limit regarding the number of precepts observed (sikkhāpada-pariyanta) and the limit regarding the period of observance of the precepts (kāla-pariyanta).

The limit regarding the number of precepts observed refers to the number of precepts traditionally observed by lay devotees: one, two, three or four precepts; five, eight or ten precepts or whatever number of precepts they can observe. Probationers and novices keep the ten precepts. This is the limit regarding the number of precept observed.

The limit regarding the period of observance of precepts refers to when lay devotees make a ceremonial offering of alms, and also observe precepts within the limited period of the ceremony; whenever they go to monastery too, they observe precepts before returning home or for a few days or more during the daytime or nighttime. This is the limit regarding the period of observance of precepts.

2. Morality that is unlimited in purity (apariyanta-pārisuddhi-sīla). The Two Summaries (Dve Mātikā), which are the summary of the Twofold Analysis (Ubhato-vibhaṅga), enumerate 227 training rules (sikkhāpada) for members of the male Saṅgha. When expanded, these training rules total up to 9,185,036,000 rules. These disciplinary rules for monastics are promulgated by the Buddha and were recorded in brief by the convenors of the First Council. The whole group of these disciplinary rules is called morality that is unlimited in purity (apariyanta-pārisuddhi-sīla).

Though the disciplinary rules are laid down by the Buddha in a definite number, the Saṅgha has to observe all of them without exception; furthermore, it is impossible to foresee the termination of the observance of morality (sīla) through the five kinds of destruction: that due to gain, fame, relatives, impairment of body and loss of life. For these reasons, these disciplinary rules are collectively called morality that is unlimited in purity. This is the kind of morality observed by Ven. Mahā Tissa of Ciragumba described above.

3. Morality which is completely purified by a worldling who is striving for the spiritual good is called morality that is fulfilled in purity (paripuṇṇa-pārisuddhi-sīla). His morality, since the time of admission to the Saṅgha, has been very pure, like a bright ruby properly cut or like well-refined gold. Therefore, it is devoid of even the stain of impure thoughts and becomes the approximate cause for Awakening. Hence it is called morality that is fulfilled in purity. Ven. Mahā [1599] Saṅgharakkhita and his nephew, Ven. Saṅgharakkhita, are examples of how such morality is to be observed.

The Story of Ven. Mahā Saṅgharakkhita

While Ven. Mahā Saṅgharakkhita of over 60 years standing in the Saṅgha at the age of 80 was lying on his death bed, monastics enquired of him: “Venerable sir, have you attained the supermundane states?” Ven. Mahā Saṅgharakkhita replied: “I have not made any such attainment yet.” At that time a young monastic attendant of Ven. Mahā Saṅgharakkhita addressed him: “Venerable sir, people living within twelve leagues have assembled here thinking that the venerable one has passed into Parinibbāna. If they come to know that you have passed away as an ordinary worldling, they will be much disappointed.”

Then Ven. Mahā Saṅgharakkhita said, “Friend, thinking I will see the coming of Buddha Metteyya, I have not striven for insight meditation. If it will be a disappointment for many, help me to sit up and give me a chance to contemplate with mindfulness.” The young monastic helped Ven. Mahā Saṅgharakkhita to sit up and went out. As soon as the young monastic left the room Ven. Mahā Saṅgharakkhita became an Arahāt and gave a sign by a snap of his fingers. The young monastic then returned and made him lie down as before.

He reported the matter to the Saṅgha who assembled and addressed Ven. Mahā Saṅgharakkhita: “Venerable sir, you have performed such a difficult task of attaining the supermundane state even when so close to death.” Ven. Mahā Saṅgharakkhita replied: “Friends, it is not difficult for me to become an Arahat when the hour of death is drawing near. Rather, I will tell you what is really difficult to perform. Friends, I see no action which I have done without mindfulness and full comprehension since the time of my admission into the Saṅgha. Such actions, which are always accompanied by mindfulness and full comprehension, are far more difficult to do.” Ven. Mahā Saṅgharakkhita’s nephew also became an Arahat like him when he completed his 56th year as a monastic.

4. Morality unaffected by wrong view and observed by trainees, noble persons and morality untarnished by lust and observed by worldlings is called morality that is irreproachable in purity (aparāmañña-pārisuddhi-sīla), the kind of morality observed by Ven. Tissa, the householder’s son.

The Story of Ven. Tissa, the Son of a Householder

A householder in Śrī Laṅkā had two sons. After the death of their father, the elder son, Tissa, gave all inheritance to his younger brother and became a monastic, practising meditation in a jungle monastery. Then the younger brother’s wife thought to herself: “Now we get all the wealth because my brother-in-law became a monastic. If he decides to return to the layman’s life, we will have to give him back half the wealth. There is no knowing whether he will do so or not. We will have peace of mind only when he dies.” With this thought she engaged some men to kill her brother-in-law.

The men went to the jungle monastery and seized Ven. Tissa in the evening. He told them that he possessed nothing which they might want. The men explained: “We do not come here to get your wealth. We come here to kill you at the instance of your sister-in-law.” Ven. Tissa said: “I possess pure morality, but I haven’t yet become an Arahat (Arahatta-phala). As I want to achieve Awakening depending on this pure morality, allow me to practise insight meditation before dawn.” – “We cannot grant your request. If you run away during the night, we will have to take the trouble of catching you again.” Saying: “I will let you see clearly how I cannot run away,” Ven. Tissa broke his two knees himself with a big stone.

When both knees were completely broken thus, Ven. Tissa said: “Now you have seen my condition. By no means can I run away from you. I abhor to die as a worldling, tainted with sensual lust. I feel ashamed of it.” Only then did the men give him permission to practise meditation. Then Ven. Tissa, depending upon his morality, which was not tarnished by lust, made efforts throughout the night until dawn when he became an Arahāt. [1600]

The Story of a Senior Monk

Once there was a senior monk who was very ill and unable to eat with his hands. He lay rolling around, smeared with his own urine and excrement. Seeing him, a young monastic exclaimed: “Oh, how painful is the life process!” The senior monk said: “Friend, if I die now, I will surely achieve divine bliss. I have no doubt of that. The bliss obtained by breaking<sup>428</sup> this morality is like forsaking becoming a monk and becoming a layman. But I am determined to die with my morality intact.”<sup>429</sup> So saying, he lay in the same place, contemplating the same illness inherent in the five aggregates of mind and matter and became an Arahāt. The morality of both these noble venerables is irreproachable (aparāmaññha-sīla).

5. Morality of Arahats, etc.<sup>430</sup> which is purified through subsidence of the fires of defilements is called morality that is calmed in purity (paṭippassaddhi-pārisuddhi-sīla).

Morality is of five kinds:

1. Morality through abandoning (pahāna-sīla).
2. Morality through abstaining (veramaṇi-sīla).
3. Morality through intention (cetanā-sīla).
4. Morality through restraint (saṃvara-sīla).
5. Morality through non-transgression (avitikkama-sīla).

1. Morality observed by abandoning killing, stealing, etc. is called morality through abandoning (pahāna-sīla).

Here, “etc.” covers not only the wrong deeds of sexual misconduct and so on but also abandoning of everything that ought to be abandoned through

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2748

successive stages of meritorious deeds. In terms of the Abhidhamma, abandoning (pahāna) means a group of wholesome consciousnesses together with their mental concomitants which are characterised by their function of abandoning everything that is to be abandoned wherever necessary.

2. Morality observed by abstaining from killing, stealing, etc. is called morality of abstention (veramaṇi-sīla). In terms of the Abhidhamma, it is a group of wholesome consciousnesses together with their mental concomitants headed by abstinence (virati-cetasika).

3. Morality observed by volition which associates avoidance of killing with consciousness is called morality of volition (cetanā-sīla).

4. Morality observed by preventing thoughts of wrong deeds, such as killing, from defiling the mind is called morality of restraint (samvara-sīla). In terms of Abhidhamma, it is a group of wholesome consciousnesses together with their mental concomitants headed by mindfulness (sati-cetasika).

5. Morality observed by not committing wrong deeds, such as killing, is called morality of non-transgression (avitikkama-sīla). In terms of Abhidhamma, it is the wholesome consciousnesses together with their mental concomitants.

These five kinds of morality beginning with morality through abandoning are not separate ones like other sets of morality; observance of one, e.g. by abandoning killing (pahāna-sīla), etc., means observance of all the remaining ones as well. [1601]

What is the Defilement and Purification of Morality?

In answering these questions, defilement and purification of morality should be explained together. Defilement of morality means impairment of morality; and in reverse, non-impairment of morality is purification of morality. Impairment of morality may arise through destruction due to gain, fame, etc. or through seven minor acts of sexuality.

To explain further, there are seven groups of transgressions:

1. Exclusion (pārajika).
2. Requiring a meeting of the Saṅgha (Saṅghādisesa).
3. Grave offenses (thullaccaya).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2749

4. Confession (pācittiya).
5. Requiring an acknowledgement (pāṭidesanīya).
6. Wrong doing (dukkata).
7. Wrong speech (dubbhāsita).

Of these seven groups of transgression (āpatti), if a training rule (sikkhāpada) of the first or the last group is impaired due to craving for gain, fame, etc. a monastic's morality is said to be torn like the cloth which is cut at the edge.

If a training rule in the middle group is impaired, his morality is said to be rent like the cloth having a hole in the middle. If two or three training rules are impaired serially, his morality is said to be blotched like a cow having irregular marks of brown, red and other colours on her back or belly. If the training rules are impaired at intervals, his morality is said to be mottled like a cow having variegated spots of different colours on her body. Thus impairment of morality through tearing, rending, blotching or mottling due to gain, fame, etc. are defilements of morality.

Even in the absence of an impairment of morality through tearing, rending, blotching or mottling, there can be a defilement of morality through the seven minor acts of sexuality.

The seven minor acts of sexuality are expounded elaborately by the Buddha in the Discourse about Sexual Intercourse (Methuna-sutta, AN 7.50<sup>431</sup>). They may be mentioned briefly as follows:

1. An ascetic or a Brahmin claiming to be leading the noble life does not have actual sexual intercourse with a woman but enjoys being caressed, massaged, bathed and rubbed down by her. He loves to be attended upon in person by a woman.
2. He does not have sexual intercourse with a woman, he does not enjoy being attended upon in person by her, but he enjoys joking and laughing with her.

<sup>431</sup> [The author mentions this discourse under the name the Discourse concerning Jāṇussoṇi (Jāṇussoṇi-sutta). It does indeed feature the brahmin Jāṇussoṇi, but it is called the Discourse about Intercourse (Methuna-sutta) in Cst4.]

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2750

3. Or else he enjoys staring and gazing at a woman eye to eye.
4. Or else, he enjoys listening to a woman on the other side of a wall or a fence as she laughs, talks, sings or cries.
5. Or else, he enjoys recollecting frequently how he has formerly talked, laughed and played with a woman.
6. Or else, he enjoys seeing a householder or his son who possesses five kinds of worldly pleasures and who is being served by a host of servants and attendants.
7. Or else, he enjoys longing for a divine abode and leads the noble life with the wish: “With this morality, with this practice, with this effort and with this noble life, may I be reborn as a great Deva or as some Deva.”

Thus, impairment of morality through tearing, rending, blotching or mottling due to gain, fame, etc. and also through seven minor acts of sexuality is a defilement of morality. Purification of morality is characterized by non-tearing, non-rending, non-blotching or non-mottling of morality and is brought about in the following manner:

1. Not transgressing any of the training rules (sikkhāpada).
2. Taking proper remedial measures whenever there is a transgression.
[1602]
3. Avoiding the seven minor acts of sexuality.
4. Protecting oneself against the arising of anger, grudges, disparagement, rivalry, jealousy, meanness or stinginess, deceit, hypocrisy and such evils.
5. The development of such attributes as fewness of wishes, being easily satisfied and through the practice of austerity.

These types of morality (sīla) which are not torn, rent, blotched or mottled, also assume other names such as liberating morality (bhujissa-sīla) because they set one free from the servitude of craving. They are extolled by the wise (viññupasaṭṭha-sīla) because they are praised by the wise. They are irreproachable (aparāmaṭṭha-sīla) because they are not driven by craving: “My morality is very pure, it will produce great beneficial results in the future” or by wrong personality belief: “This morality is mine; my morality is very pure; no one possesses morality like mine.” It leads to concentration (samādhi-saṁvattanika-sīla) because it is conducive to advancement towards access concentration (upacāra-samādhi) and absorption concentration (appanā-samādhi).

As stated above, these seven factors: not torn, not rent, not blotched, not mottled, liberating, praised by the wise and not tarnished by craving and wrong view, are the factors conducive to purification of morality. Only when morality is complete with these seven factors can it develop the aforesaid two kinds of concentration. Therefore, a noble person wishing to develop these two kinds of concentration should earnestly endeavour to make his morality (sīla) complete with all these seven factors.

3. The Perfection of Renunciation

Renunciation (nekkhamma) is here synonymous with emancipation. Emancipation is of two kinds: emancipation from Saṁsāra, or the cycle of existences, and emancipation from sense-desires (kāma); the former being the result of the latter. Only when emancipation from sense-desires has been achieved through practice, can one gain emancipation from Saṁsāra. Of these two kinds of emancipation, it is for the purpose of the resultant emancipation from existences that the Buddha in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddhavaṁsa) likens the three states of existence to prisons.

The three states of existence are: 1) The state of sensual existence (kāma-bhava); 2) the state of fine material existence (rūpa-bhava); and 3) the states of formless, non-material existence (arūpa-bhava).

According to the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka) commentary, the perfection of renunciation, in terms of Abhidhamma, is wholesome consciousness together with mental concomitants that arise by virtue of emancipation from sense-desires and from the three states of existence.

The Great Exposition (Mahā-niddesa) describes two kinds of sense-desire: pleasant objects of sense-desire (vatthu-kāma), and the mental defilement of greed, which is desire for pleasant objects (kilesa-kāma). With reference to the perfection of renunciation, emancipation from sense-desires means emancipation from both kinds.

How to Be Mindful to Achieve Emancipation

How to achieve emancipation from the defilement of sense-desires (kilesa-kāma) is explained in the Great Exposition (Mahā-niddesa):

Addasaṃ kāma te mūlaṃ, saṅkappā kāma jāyasi, na taṃ saṅkappayissāmi, evaṃ kāma na hohisi.

Sensuality, I have seen your source; you arise from thoughts of pleasant objects of sense (kāma-vitakka). No more will I think of any pleasant object of sense. Then, Sensuality, you will arise no more.

In this connection, three kinds of wrong thought and three kinds of right thought should be understood. The three kinds of wrong thought are: [1603]

1. Sensuous thoughts (kāma-vitakka), i.e., thinking of pleasant objects as desirable things.
2. Hateful thoughts (byāpāda-vitakka), i.e., thinking of harming others.
3. Cruel thoughts (vihimsā-vitakka), i.e., thinking of torturing others.

The three kinds of right thought are:

1. Thoughts of renunciation (nekkhamma-vitakka), i.e., thinking of emancipating oneself from sensuous objects.
2. Thoughts of hatelessness (avyāpāda-vitakka), i.e., thinking of others with loving-kindness.
3. Thoughts of non-violence (avihimsā-vitakka), i.e., thinking of others with compassion.

The source of greed (kilesa-kāma), on close examination, is found to lie in sensuous thoughts (kāma-vitakka), which is one of the three wrong thoughts. As long as one keeps on thinking sensuous thoughts, greed continues to multiply and there is no emancipation from that mental defilement of greed. Only when one ceases to think of the pleasant objects of sense-desire, will greed not arise and one achieves emancipation. Therefore, as stated above, one should be mindful to be free from the mental defilements of greed. Just as freedom from sense-desire leads to freedom from the cycle of Saṃsāra even so making efforts to free oneself from greed results in freedom from the pleasant objects of sense-desire.

The characteristics, functions, manifestations and proximate causes of this perfection of renunciation and of the remaining ones are dealt with later.

Relation between Renunciation and Monastics

The Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka) commentary defines renunciation (nekkhamma) in this way: nekkhammaṃ pabbajja-mūlakam. This definition can be interpreted in two ways: “Renunciation has a monastic’s life as its cause” and “renunciation is the cause of a monastic’s life.” The first interpretation: A monastic’s life as a cause of renunciation is in consonance with the narration in the Birth Story about King Mahā Janaka (Mahā-janaka-jātaka, Ja 539). King Mahā Janaka first acquired the requisites of robes, a bowl etc. without the knowledge of his queen, lesser queens and royal attendants and then went up to the upper terrace of his palace and became a monastic; thereafter, he renounced the world. In this instance, the Bodhisatta Mahā Janaka became a monastic before he made the renunciation. Therefore, it may be said that the monastic’s life is the cause and renunciation is the effect.

The second interpretation: Renunciation as a cause of a monastic’s life, is in consonance with the stories of the wise Sumedha, the Hatthipāla brothers, etc. the wise Sumedha first went forth and reaching Dhammika Mountain, found a dwelling place readily prepared by Sakka, the Lord of the Devas. Then only he became a monastic. Similarly, the Hatthipāla brothers went forth first and when pursued by the whole country led by royal parents, they became monastics. Therefore, it may be said the renunciation of the wise Sumedha, the Hatthipāla brothers, etc. is the cause, and the monastic’s life is the effect.

The Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka) commentary gives the exposition in accordance with the first interpretation. This is mentioned in detail below. Though the wise Sumedha, the Hatthipāla brothers, etc. renounced the world first and became monastics afterwards, they did so only because they wanted a monastic’s life. Therefore, even though renunciation took place first, it may be said that a monastic’s life which follows later is the real cause.

For example, to construct a building, the wood is cut first. Although the cutting of wood precedes construction, the wood is cut with the intention of constructing the building, therefore, it should be said that the desire to build the building is the cause and the cutting of the wood is the effect.

Five Kinds of Forest Dwelling

As expounded in the Vinaya Summary (Parivāra, 7.5.56, PTS 5.131), forest dwelling is of five kinds:

1. Dwelling in the forest because of stupidity, dullness of mind, not knowing the [1604] advantages and their causes.
2. Dwelling in the forest with an evil desire: “If I go and dwell in the forest, people will support me generously as a forest dweller.”
3. Dwelling in the forest because of insanity.
4. Dwelling in the forest because the practice is praised by the Buddhas and the virtuous.
5. Dwelling in the forest because one has few wishes, contentment and such virtues.

Only the last two of these kinds of forest dwelling are praiseworthy.

Perfection of renunciation is not a matter of where one lives. The defilement of sense-desires (kilesa-kāma), craving for pleasant sensuous objects, is liable to arise anywhere. This defilement of sense-desires should be eradicated wherever it appears and not be permitted to thrive. Emancipation from the defilement of sense-desires by eradication in this way is the true characteristic of renunciation.

As for emancipation from pleasant objects of sense-desire, there are examples of the wise Sumedha, the Hatthipāla brothers etc., who went forth as far as the Himālayas. Therefore, it may be asked whether it is necessary for those who wish to fulfil the perfection of renunciation, and gain the emancipation from pleasant objects of sense-desire, to go forth as far as the Himālayas. One should do so if possible, if one wishes to, or if circumstances favour it. In the Birth Stories (Jātaka) concerning renunciation, the majority went forth to the Himālayas. They did so as circumstances were favourable to them.

According to the Birth Story about King Maghadēva (Maghadēva-jātaka, Ja 9) and the Birth Story about King Nimi (Nimi-jātaka, Ja 541), the continuous line of rulers, numbering 84,000, beginning with King Maghadēva and up to King Nimi, went forth from household life to a homeless life as soon as a single hair on the head turned grey. However, none of them went to the Himālayas. They repaired only to the royal Mango Grove near their capital city of Mithilā. It is said that by the strenuous practice of meditation they attained the absorptions (jhāna) and were reborn in the Brahma realms. It is evident from these stories that, although not travelling as far as the Himālayas, just leaving the palace, where the mental defilement of greed thrives, is sufficient for the successful fulfilment of the perfection of renunciation. The 84,000 kings, such as Maghadeva, completely abandoned their luxurious palaces, and by living in the Mango Grove, their perfection of renunciation was fulfilled.

Therefore, the perfection of renunciation can be fulfilled by anyone who abandons completely the place where his mental defilement of greed flourishes and without establishing such new resorts, as long as he dwells in a suitable place free from such defilements.

Two Kinds of Renunciation

Renunciation of Bodhisattas is of two kinds: Renunciation when they are young and single; renunciation when they are old and married. The wise Sumedha, the Hatthipāla brothers, etc. renounced the worldly life to escape from the bonds of pleasant objects of sense-desire: luxuries of palaces or homes. Although the Birth Stories (Jātaka) referred to them as examples of those who fulfilled the perfection of renunciation, they were then mere youths, still unmarried. They were possessors of pleasant objects of sense-desire, but it may be said that their ties to them were not so strong.

Only older people living a household life with wife and children are tightly bound with these fetters of the objects of sense-desire (vatthu-kāma). In this connection, it may be said that renunciation by old married people is more difficult than that by younger persons. But some could point out that the renunciation by the Bodhisatta Prince Temiya, made at a time when he was only sixteen and unmarried, was really an arduous one. But his difficulty arose not from the bonds of pleasant objects of sense-desire but from the great troubles of having to pretend to be crippled, deaf and dumb to make his renunciation possible. Therefore, although he faced much difficulty when contriving to make his renunciation, when he actually did so, he encountered little difficulty because he had only a few fetters of pleasant [1605] objects of sense desire.

The Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA) gives, in the chapter on the perfection of renunciation, full accounts of the perfections (pāramī) that had been fulfilled by the Bodhisatta when he was Prince Somanassa, Prince Hatthipāla, Prince Ayoghara, etc. in innumerable existences. The commentary gives the special name of supreme perfection (paramattha-pāramī) to the perfection of renunciation fulfilled by King Cūḷa Sutasoma.

Prince Somanassa, Prince Ayoghara, Prince Hatthipāla and Prince Temiya were youthful persons at the time of their renunciation. The renunciation by King Mahā Janaka was more difficult than theirs because he was an older and married man. He became a monastic without the knowledge of his queen, lesser queens and royal attendants, and at the time of renunciation, he faced difficulty, as he was pursued by his queens and retinue to persuade him to return to them. They had not taken any measures to ensure that he would not go forth as a monastic or renounce the worldly life.

As for the 84,000 kings, such as Maghadeva, they openly and publicly declared their intention to renounce. In spite of the entreaties of their families, they refused to yield and made their renunciation. But they did not go very far. They dwelt in their own Mango Groves near their palaces.

In contrast to them, King Cūḷa Sutasoma announced his intention of leaving the world as he was deeply stirred by a spiritual sense of urgency (saṃvega) on seeing a grey hair on his head. Although his queens, royal parents and the assembled citizens prayed in tears for him to give up his plan, he remained firm and indifferent to their earnest pleas and went away till he reached the Himālayas. Therefore, the renunciation of King Cūḷa Sutasoma was far more powerful than those of King Maghadeva, etc. On this account, the commentator has described the perfection of renunciation fulfilled by King Cūḷa Sutasoma as of the highest type (paramattha-pāramī).

4. The Perfection of Wisdom

Three Kinds of Wisdom<sup>432</sup>

The Analyses (Vibhaṅga) of the Abhidhamma, in the section on the Analysis of Knowledge (Ñāṇa-vibhaṅga), mentions three kinds of wisdom (paññā):

1. Wisdom arising from thought (cintā-maya-paññā).
2. Wisdom arising from hearing (suta-maya-paññā).

---

<sup>432</sup> [This section seems to have been misplaced in the original translation and was included in the section on renunciation. I have moved it to its proper place.]

3. Wisdom arising from meditation (bhāvanā-maya-paññā).

1. Knowledge of various kinds, whether low or noble, including various crafts and professions, etc., which are acquired through one's own reasoning and not through asking others or hearing about it from them (cintā-maya-paññā). From cinta "thinking," māyā "formed of," hence, literally, wisdom formed of thinking.

This kind of wisdom includes not only thoughts on mundane affairs but also on things concerning Dhamma matters. Therefore, it comprises the knowledge of ordinary worldly things, such as carpentry, agriculture, etc., as well as the knowledge of things of a Dhamma nature, such as generosity, morality, concentration and insight meditation. The omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) of the Buddhas may even be called wisdom arising from thought (cintā-maya-paññā), if one wishes to do so, because the Bodhisatta, as Prince Siddhattha had thought out by himself the practice leading to omniscience without hearing of it from anyone, and he became omniscient.

However, wisdom as the fourth perfection to be fulfilled by the Bodhisatta should be considered as only the group of fundamental knowledges necessary for the attainment of knowledge of the paths and fruitions state and omniscience. We are not concerned here with the group of wisdom which is acquired in the final existence of a Bodhisatta, entitling him to becoming a Buddha. Bodhisattas, fulfilling the perfection of wisdom before their last life, practised only up to the first part of the [1606] ninth stage, the knowledge of equanimity about formations (saṅkhārupekkhā-ñāṇa), out of the ten stages of insight (vipassanā). The final part of this knowledge of equanimity about formations leads on directly to the knowledge of the path. So, Bodhisattas do not attempt to go beyond the first part until their last life, for should they do so, they would have accordingly attained paths and fruitions and become noble ones (ariya) and passed into Nibbāna in those existences; they would not become a Buddha though. Therefore, it should be noted that as a Bodhisatta, the perfection of wisdom is fulfilled only up to the first part of the knowledge of equanimity about formations.

2. Knowledge gained by listening to the wise who talk either on their own or at one's request when one is unable to think out or reason by oneself (suta-maya-paññā). From suta "hearing," māyā "formed of," hence, wisdom formed of hearing. Like wisdom arising from thinking (cintā-maya-paññā), this kind of wisdom is of a very extensive nature. The only difference between the two is that in the first wisdom is gained through one's own thought or reasoning and in the second by hearing it from others.

3. The kind of wisdom gained at the time when one is actually experiencing the absorption (jhāna) or fruition (phala) states (bhāvanā-maya-paññā).

The Analyses (Vibhaṅga) in the Abhidhamma, in the chapter on the Analysis of Knowledge (Ñāṇa-vibhaṅga), gives types of wisdom in groups of one kind, two kinds, etc., up to ten kinds.

All these groups of wisdom, however, may be taken as coming under the three types of wisdom given above. For example, in the Analyses, after the group of the three kinds of wisdom: wisdom arising from thought (cintā-maya), and so on, are enumerated wisdom arising from giving (dāna-maya-paññā), wisdom arising from morality (sīla-maya-paññā) and wisdom arising from meditation (bhāvanā-maya-paññā).

Wisdom arising from giving is wisdom formed of generosity. Volition associated with generosity is of three kinds: volition that arises before, during and after the offering. The wisdom associated with these volitions in each case is wisdom arising from giving. Similarly, in the case of observance of morality, wisdom that arises with the intention: "I will observe the precepts," wisdom that arises while observing them and wisdom that arises on reflection after observing the precepts are wisdom arising from morality.

If the wisdom arising from giving and wisdom arising from morality have been deduced through one's process of thinking and reasoning, then it is to be classed as wisdom arising from thought (cintā-maya-paññā); if it has been gained through hearing from others, they are to be included in wisdom arising from hearing (suta-maya-paññā). Other kinds of wisdom can similarly be classified under the same three headings of wisdom arising from thought (cintā-maya-paññā), and so on.

The teaching: Accomplishing the perfection of wisdom by learning from the wise (paripucchanto budhaṃ janaṃ, paññā-pāramitaṃ gantvā) in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa, Bv 2.134) clearly indicates that the Buddha regards wisdom arising from hearing (suta-maya-paññā) as being the basic wisdom. This is because in this world, one who has not yet acquired basic wisdom cannot know anything through thinking it through for himself; he has to learn it first from the wise by listening to them. Therefore, the Buddha has expounded that one who wishes to fulfil the perfection of wisdom should first acquire knowledge from the wise before he can have any basic wisdom. In brief, wisdom through hearing (suta-maya-paññā) should be acquired before wisdom through thinking (cintā-maya-paññā).

The commentaries, such as the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA), describe the innumerable lives of the Bodhisatta, for example, as the wise men Vidhura, Mahā Govinda, Kudāla, Araka, Bodhi the wandering ascetic, Mahosadha, etc., when he had to fulfil the perfection of wisdom. In these lives, the Bodhisatta had already acquired basic wisdom; he also possessed, and therefore he had, wisdom arising from thought (cintā-maya-paññā). As his basic wisdom, it was already great enough so that acquiring wisdom arising from hearing was no longer his chief concern in those existences.

Four Kinds of Wise Person

The term kavi is derived from the root kava, which means “to praise;” so a person who praises things worthy of praises is called kavi, meaning a “wise person.” A kavi is also a poet, one who is wise in words.

The Discourse about Poets (Kavi-sutta, AN 4.231) describes four kinds of wise persons (kavi):

1. Wise in thinking (cintā-kavi).
2. Wise in hearing (suta-kavi).
3. Wise in meaning (attha-kavi). [1607]
4. Wise in improvisation (paṭibhāna-kavi).

1. One who is capable of knowing a given matter by thinking it out for himself is called wise in thinking (cintā-kavi), a wise man of original thinking. It is the province of such persons to sing verses lauding those deserving praise. Thus, one wise in thinking, is one who composes poems relying solely on his own thinking.

2. One who puts into verse what one knows through hearing is called wise in hearing (suta-kavi).

3. One who does not know through his original thinking or through learning from others but interprets the meaning of a difficult point based upon the knowledge he already possesses of similar problems is called wise in meaning (attha-kavi), a wise man who explains meaning. He writes verses based on a given subject-matter.

4. One who, without having recourse to thinking out himself, or listening to others, or referring to what is already known, has the ability to penetrate at once the meaning of a given subject is called wise in improvisation (paṭibhāna-kavi), a wise man of ready speech, like Ven. Vaṅgīsa during the Buddha's time.

Wisdom is a separate mental concomitant, one of the ultimate realities. In the Enumeration of Phenomena (Dhamma-saṅgaṇī), various names, such as the faculty of wisdom (paññindriya), wisdom (paññā), being wise (pajānanā), etc., are given to wisdom because it is the characteristic of the Abhidhamma to give complete details of everything that should be taught about each subject. The principal term for wisdom is the faculty of wisdom (paññindriya), made up of the words wisdom (paññā) and faculty (indriya).

It is called wisdom (paññā) because it is conducive to understanding in all aspects the four truths or the three characteristics of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and non-self (anatta).

It is called faculty (indriya), a controlling or governing faculty, because it can overcome ignorance (avijjā) and delusion (moha), or because it dominates in understanding real nature. Wisdom (paññā) has the characteristic of creating light. Just as darkness is dispelled as soon as light appears in a dark room, even so, where ignorance blinds us, as soon as wisdom appears, ignorance is dispelled enabling us to see clearly. Therefore, the Buddha has said (SN 1.13): There is no light like wisdom (natthi paññāsamā ābhā).

Wisdom has the characteristic of perceiving things with discrimination. Just as a clever physician discerns which food is suitable for his patient and which food is not, so when wisdom arises, it enables one to distinguish between what is meritorious and what is not. Wisdom also has the characteristic of penetrating real nature as it is. It may be likened to an arrow which, shot by a clever archer, penetrates the target unerringly.

An important point to note with regard to this characteristic of wisdom: Genuine wisdom is knowing a thing as it really is, and such a knowledge is blameless. That is why in the Collection of Meaning in the Abhidhamma (Abhidhammattha-saṅgaha), the mental concomitant of wisdom (paññā-cetasika) is included in the beautiful (sobhaṇa) types of mental concomitants.

The Birth Story about the Courtesan Sulasā

Questions arise concerning wisdom with reference to the actions of the courtesan Sulasā in the Birth Story about the Courtesan Sulasā (Sulasā-jātaka, Ja 419).

In Bārāṇasī, a courtesan by the name of Sulasā saved the life of the robber Sattuka who was about to be executed. She made him her husband, and they lived together. Wanting to possess her jewellery, the robber persuaded her to put on her jewelled ornaments, which were worth 100,000 pieces of money, and she went up a mountain with him. On reaching the top of the mountain, he told her to take off all her jewellery and prepared to kill her. Then Sulasā thought to herself: “He is sure to kill me, I must strike first and kill him by a ruse.” So she begged him: “My dear, even though you are going to kill me, I lose no love for you. Nearing my death, may I pay my respects to you from the four quarters, [1608] front, back and the sides?” Not suspecting her stratagem, the robber allowed her to do so. After paying respects to the robber, who was standing on the edge of a precipice, from the front and the sides, she went behind him and pushed him over the precipice with all her might and killed him. The Bodhisatta, who was a Deva then, living in the mountain, remarked:

*Na hi sabbesu ṭhānesu puriso hoti paṇḍito;
itthī pi paṇḍitā hoti tattha tattha vicakkhaṇā.*

Not in all circumstances is the man the wise one; a woman is also wise and farsighted.

Some raise the question as to whether it is proper for the Bodhisatta to praise Sulasā as being wise. Sulasā’s intention to kill the robber is a matter of committing a wrong deed of killing and cannot be associated with wisdom (paññā-cetasika).

In reply to that, some say that Sulasā’s knowledge was not true wisdom (paññā). Of the three kinds of knowledge: knowledge through perception (saññā), knowledge through consciousness (viññāṇa) and knowledge through wisdom (paññā). Sulasā’s was knowledge through consciousness only, that is to say, through exercise of imagination. That knowledge through consciousness has been referred to, here, as wisdom (paññā).

Others wrongly assert that of the two views: Wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi) and right view (sammā-diṭṭhi), Sulasā had wrong view and the Bodhisatta was referring to her view as wisdom (paññā) and not praising her because of the faculty of wisdom, and, therefore, it is not against Abhidhamma. Both these answers, taking consciousness (viññāṇa) and view (diṭṭhi) as wisdom (paññā) contrary to the principles of Abhidhamma, are entirely wrong.

Sulasā's knowledge that she would defeat the robber, if she adopted a ruse, was true knowledge and was, therefore, wisdom. One should not doubt whether genuine wisdom can be involved in matters connected with evil actions. For example, it is blameless to know discriminatingly about alcoholic drinks which should not be indulged in, and which lead to immoral actions, as to which ones contain more or less alcohol, how much each costs, what will happen if one drinks them, etc. It begins to be immoral only from the moment one thinks of drinking the intoxicant.

Similarly, one can make a thorough study of all the various views and beliefs in the world without any exception, differentiating between what is correct and reasonable and what is wrong. Thus, studying and getting to know about them as they really are, whether right or wrong, is entirely faultless. Only when one misconstrues a wrong view to be a right view is one at fault.

So in Sulasā's case, knowing: "I will defeat him, if I use a ruse," is knowing rightly; it is knowing through wisdom and therefore blameless. But, since the moment of her decision to kill her husband by means of a stratagem, her action had become blameworthy, immoral. It is only with reference to the correct knowledge which initially arose in her, before the deed of killing, that the Bodhisatta praised her, saying she is wise.

As has been said above, we should distinguish clearly between the knowledge about evil on one hand and the commission of evil such as killing on the other. If one persists in the belief that knowledge about evil is not true wisdom, one would make the error of thinking that the great omniscience of the Buddha himself is not free from blemish.

Through his supreme wisdom, the Buddha knows all there is to know, everything moral or immoral, hence the name of omniscience. If true wisdom has nothing to do with anything evil, then the Buddha would have no knowledge whatsoever of evil things; indeed, the Buddha's wisdom is very extensive, infinite and is thus known as omniscience.

In brief, the Buddha knows everything, good or evil. But since he has uprooted all latent defilements, he has no desire to commit anything evil, not to say of the actual deed. Thus reflecting on the attributes of knowing everything that is evil, of having abandoned what should be abandoned and of refraining from doing any evil, we should develop faith in the Buddha.

Again, we should also examine the story of the wise Mahosadha as described in the Birth Story about the Tunnel [1609] (Umaṅga-jātaka, Ja 542). In this story, Cūḷani Brahmadatta, with rulers of his vassal states, surrounded and attacked the royal city of King Videha, who had as his right-hand man the wise Mahosadha. Mahosadha masterminded the defense of the city by devising various stratagems. These tactics were aimed at deceiving the enemy hordes, breaking down their morale, and ultimately forcing them to retreat in all directions in a disorderly rout. Should we opine that deceptive measures adopted by Mahosadha, not being moral undertakings, do not count as wisdom, there would be no occasion for the Bodhisatta to fulfil the perfection of wisdom. As a matter of fact, all the stratagems employed by Mahosadha are the products of the Bodhisatta's wisdom. The Buddha has therefore specifically mentioned the story of Mahosadha as an example of how the Bodhisatta had fulfilled his perfection of wisdom.

In view of what has been said, it should be noted that in the story of Sulasā, the mountain Deva praised Sulasā as a wise person because she indeed had wisdom.

This is an explanation on doubtful points with regard to the characteristics of wisdom.

The Kinds of Wisdom

The definition of “wisdom” given in the commentaries, such as the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA) etc., as the knowledge of, or the knowledge leading to, full comprehension of the four noble truths and the three characteristics refers to the highest (ukkattṭha) type of wisdom. There are also certain types of wisdom which are much lower.

The commentary on the Abhidhamma Analyses (Vibhaṅga), in expounding on wisdom arising from thought (cintā-maya-paññā) and wisdom arising from hearing (suta-maya-paññā), describes the kinds of wisdom involved in “manual labour in earning one's livelihood” (kammāyatana) and in “skills for earning one's livelihood” (sippāyatana). Each is again divided into two kinds, lower and higher. Carpentry is an example of a lower type of manual labour. Farming and trading are of a higher type. Mat-making, weaving, etc. are lower forms of skill for earning one's living, and writing, calculating, etc. are higher forms of skill for earning one's living.

The essential distinction between the forms of livelihood is that when manual labour is done for the sake of livelihood without taking special training, it is of the manual labour in earning one's livelihood type and when skill for earning a livelihood is acquired after special training, it is called skills for earning one's livelihood. When special training is for skill in vocal accomplishments, it is called study of the arts and sciences (vijjāṭṭhāna).

When we discriminate one fire from another, our discrimination is not based on the quality of the fuel used for burning but on the quantity of the fuel, and we say "a small fire" or "a big fire." So also in the case of wisdom, discrimination should be done not on the basis of the quality of what is known, but rather on the basis of the degree or extent of what is known and we should speak of wisdom as "weak" or "powerful," in other words, "simple" or "profound." We should not restrict ourselves to higher forms of knowledge as expounded in the commentary, but also recognize the lower forms as wisdom.

Therefore, one who wishes to fulfil the perfection of wisdom should do so irrespective of the standard of wisdom, whether low or high, and regarding things unknown, one should approach the wise for learning from them.

Therefore, it is said in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa, Bv 2.134): Questioning the wise, he accomplishes the perfection of wisdom (paripucchanto budham janam, paññā-pāramitam gantvā)."

Seven Ways of Developing Wisdom

The Dispeller of Delusion (Sammoha-vinodanī, PTS 276) commentary to the Abhidhamma Analyses (Vibhaṅga), gives seven ways of developing wisdom in the chapter on the foundations of steadfast mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna):

1. Asking the wise again and again (paripuccha-katā).<sup>433</sup>
2. Making objects, both inside and outside the body, pure (vatthu-visada-kiriya).

---

<sup>433</sup> This is in accordance with the Pāli phrase quoted above.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2765

For internal cleanliness, one's hair, nails and beard should not be too long. The body [1610] should not be soiled with sweat and dirt. For external cleanliness, one's clothes should not be old and bad smelling; one's dwelling should be kept clean. When there is impurity inside and outside the body, the wisdom that arises is like the thick flame produced from a dirty wick soaked in the turbid oil of an unclean lamp. In order to have clean and bright wisdom, which is like the flame of a clean lamp, one should keep one's body clean both internally and externally.

3. Bringing the faculties, such as faith, energy, etc., into perfect balance (indriya-samatta-paṭipādanā).

There are five faculties which control consciousnesses and mental concomitants of beings:

1. Faith (saddhā).
2. Energy (virīya).
3. Mindfulness (sati).
4. Concentration (samādhi).
5. Wisdom (paññā).

Each of these has its own function: Faith enables one to give devoted attention to the object of reverence; energy gives support and encouragement enabling one to exert and strive hard; mindfulness keeps track of the object of attention; concentration prevents distraction of mind; and wisdom enables one to see and understand. These faculties must be kept in balance, for if one is in excess, the others would suffer and fail to do their functions.

If the faith faculty is too strong, the other four faculties are bound to be weak; consequently, the energy faculty cannot exercise its function of giving support and encouragement to exertion; the mindfulness faculty cannot fulfil its task of minding the object of attention; the concentration faculty cannot prevent distraction of mind; and the wisdom faculty fails to discern. When the faith faculty is in excess, an attempt should be made to moderate it and bring it into line with the others, either by reflecting on the Dhamma that will normalise it or avoiding reflecting on the Dhamma that will promote and strengthen it.

If the energy faculty is too strong, the faith faculty will not be able to perform its function; the rest of the faculties also cannot perform their respective functions. This excess of energy should be corrected by developing tranquillity. The same holds true in the case of each of the remaining faculties.

What is particularly praised by the wise and virtuous is balancing faith with wisdom and concentration with energy. If one is strong in faith and weak in wisdom, one will have faith in unworthy ones to no purpose.

Being weak in wisdom, one is unable to discern critically who is deserving of reverence and who is not; mistaking what is not true “Buddha, Dhamma, Saṅgha” for the genuine ones, one’s devotion is then of no avail and fruitless.

Mistaken belief of those who wrongly devote themselves to a false Buddha or a false Dhamma is not true faith but only a wrong and harmful conclusion (micchādhimokkha).

If wisdom is strong and faith is weak, one will miss the correct path and follow the wrong one, which leads to the side of cunning. To bring such a person to the right path is as hard to cure as a patient suffering from the ill-effects of wrong medicine. For example, these are two kinds of giving: the gift of volition (cetanā-dāna) and a gift of material objects (vatthu-dāna). A person who has cunning ways of thinking might consider that it is only volition, not the material objects, that would be fruitful in the future; therefore, it is not necessary to actually offer material things as gifts (dāna); thinking to give gifts of volition are sufficient. Such a person, who fails to do meritorious deeds of alms giving, because of his cunning, would be reborn in the lower planes of existence.

Only when faith and wisdom are in balance can one have proper faith in deserving ones, and with the absence of cunning, there can develop many advantages. Energy and concentration should also be in balance; when energy is weak and concentration strong, idleness (kosajja) will result: without any activities but assuming an air of calmness as if in good concentration, one is overwhelmed by indolence.

When energy is strong and concentration weak, there will be agitation and excitement but no steadiness. Overwhelmed by restlessness (uddhacca), one may be distracted with the thought: “If this work does not yield any good result as [1611] expected, it will not be suitable for me. I would abandon it and try something else.”

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2767

When energy and concentration are in equilibrium, idleness (kosajja) and restlessness (uddhacca) get no chance to arise; the balancing of these two leads to the quick attainment of absorption (jhāna).

However, the mindfulness-faculty can never be in excess; there may be only its shortage. In the text, it is likened to salt, a necessary ingredient of all food preparations, or to a prime minister who attends to all the royal business. Therefore, while maintaining the maximum possible mindfulness, the faculties in each of the two pairs: faith and wisdom, energy and concentration, should be kept in perfect balance with each other. Excess of any is a disadvantage. In this connection, Ven. U Buddh has made the following comment in his Assistance with Steadfast Mindfulness (Mahā-satipaṭṭhāna-nissaya):

Excess of faith leads to over-enthusiasm; excess of wisdom leads to craftiness; excess of energy leads to restlessness; excess of concentration leads to mental weariness; but there is never an excess of mindfulness.

4. Avoiding persons without wisdom (duppaññā-puggala-parivajjānaṃ).

A person without wisdom (duppaññā) means an individual who has no wisdom to discern penetratingly such groups of phenomena (dhamma) as the aggregates (khandha), the bases (āyatana), etc. One should keep oneself far away from such people.

5. Associating with the wise (paññavanta-puggala-sevana).

The wise means persons who are possessed of the 50 characteristics of the knowledge of arising and falling (udaya-bhaya-ñāṇa); for details of the 50 characteristics of arising and falling, please consult the Path of the Analytic Knowledges (Paṭisambhidā-magga), or see the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) as translated by Bhikkhu Ñāṇamoli (Chapter XX, paras. 93-104).

Concerning both items 4 and 5 the commentator is only describing the developments of the highest (ukkaṭṭha) type of wisdom. In item 4 a person without wisdom means one who cannot discern penetratingly the group of phenomena, such as the aggregates and the bases; a person with penetrating knowledge of such phenomena can only be one who is of great wisdom. But there are those who, though not possessing wisdom to discern such subtle phenomena as aggregates and bases, know ordinary matters concerning the practice of Dhamma: “It is proper to make such an offering; it is not proper to do so; precepts should be observed thus, they should not be observed otherwise.”

They also know matters concerning worldly living: “This act will prolong one’s life; this act will shorten one’s life.” Such persons cannot be said to be entirely devoid of wisdom. One should cultivate association with them too.

In item 5 also, by defining a wise person as one who is possessed of the 50 characteristics of the knowledge of arising and falling (udayabbaya-ñāṇa), the commentator is referring by way of excellence (ukkaṭṭha-naya) only to the wise who are most highly advanced in insight meditation.

But with regard to acquiring knowledge, the Buddha had expounded in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa): “Taking the example of a monastic going on alms round to all the houses in serial order without discrimination, a learner should approach whoever can answer his questions, regardless of his social or educational status. Therefore, he should avoid only a totally ignorant one and approach all who can help him in his quest of knowledge.”

In short, avoiding only those who are completely incapable of answering any questions, one should associate with those who can furnish him with even the slightest information he is seeking. [1612]

According to the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa), in acquiring wisdom, one should first ask and learn from the wise to develop wisdom through hearing (suta-maya-paññā). Then, if one is not clear about any point, one should reflect on it and think about it, and thus develop wisdom by means of thinking (cintā-maya-paññā).

In the discourse to the Kālāmas (Kesa-mutti-sutta, AN 3.66), the Buddha was told by them that many teachers visited their place, that all of these visiting teachers praised only their own doctrines, denouncing and condemning others and that they had doubt and perplexity as to which doctrine to accept and follow. The Buddha’s reply to them may be summarized as “you should accept the doctrine which you find, after due consideration, to be free of fault.”

This discourse shows that one should first acquire wisdom through hearing (suta-maya-paññā) by listening to the talks of teachers and then think over which doctrine is blameless by using wisdom by means of thinking (cintā-maya-paññā).

Moreover, in the Long Birth Story about Dhammapāla (Mahā-Dhammapāla-jātaka, Ja 447), when the great teacher of Takkasilā went in person to the village of Dhammapāla to find out why the young people of the village did not die before the end of their lifespan, Mahā Dhammapāla, the village headman, who would be reborn as King Suddhodana in times to come, replied: “We listen to all who come and teach. After listening, we ponder upon their teaching. We do not heed what the immoral persons teach, instead we forsake them. We accept only the teachings of the moral persons with which we are delighted and which we follow. Therefore, in our village, the young ones never die before the end of their lifespan.”

This Birth Story (Jātaka) also clearly shows that one acquires wisdom first by means of wisdom through hearing (suta-maya-paññā) and then accepts only what is confirmed to be true by wisdom by means of thinking (cintā-maya-paññā).

Associating with the Wise

The expression “associating with the wise” does not mean merely approaching a wise person and staying with him day and night. It implies learning and acquiring some knowledge from the person who is possessed of wisdom.

The advice “do not associate with the fool,” given as one of the blessings in the Discourse on the Blessings (Maṅgala-sutta, Khp 5, Snp 2.4), does not necessarily prevent staying with a foolish person. One may even live with him for the purpose of coaxing and persuading him onto the right path. In such a case, one is not going against the advice of the Discourse on the Blessings. An example is the sojourn of the Buddha in the Uruvelā Grove in the company of ascetics of wrong view to help them abandon their wrong path.

Thus, only when one accepts the view and follows the practices of a foolish person is one said to be associating with a fool. Likewise, the advice given in the Discourse on the Blessings exhorting one to associate with the wise is well taken, not by merely keeping company with him but only when one acquires some form of knowledge from him, be it only a little.

6. Reflecting on the nature of the Dhamma, which is the resort of profound wisdom (gambhīra-ñāṇa-cariya-paccavekkhaṇa).

Herein, wisdom is like fire, which burns all inflammable things, whether big or small. Depending on the size of what is burning, fire is said to be a small fire or a big one. In the same way, wisdom knows everything there is to know; it is called small, manifest or profound depending on what is known as small, manifest or profound. The Dhamma, which is the resort of profound wisdom, comprises aggregates, bases, etc. The wisdom which arises from the knowledge of these profound subjects is what is meant by profound wisdom. Such profound wisdom is as numerous as there are profound phenomena. An analytical review of all these numerous profound phenomena leads to the development of wisdom.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2770

7. Having the inclination towards developing wisdom (tadādhimuttatā).

In all four postures of lying, sitting, standing and walking, one should be only inclined to the development of wisdom. Having such a mind is one of the causes of developing wisdom.

A summary in verse by U Buddh, of the seven ways of developing wisdom:

1. Asking again and again. [1613]
2. Keeping things clean.
3. Having faculties in balance.
4. Avoiding fools.
5. Associating with the wise.
6. Pondering deeply.
7. Having a mind bent on the development of wisdom.

The Qualities of Wisdom

1. When wisdom takes a predominant place in performing multifarious functions, it acquires the name of one of the four predominance-conditions (vimamsādhīpati).
2. Forming the constituent parts of the 22 controlling faculties are four different faculties which are concerned with wisdom: the wisdom that is included in the 39 mundane consciousnesses associated with knowledge (loka-nāṇa-sampayuttacitta) is called the faculty of wisdom (paññindriya); the wisdom accompanying the consciousness that arises with the path at the first stage of Awakening, the path of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga), is known as the faculty that senses: “I will know the unknown” (anaññātāññassāmīndriya); the wisdom that arises with the fruition state of an Arahant (Arahatta-phala) is called the faculty of one with perfect knowledge (aññātāvindriya); the wisdom that is associated with the six intermediate supermundane consciousnesses that comes between the Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) and Arahāt (Arahatta-phala) stages is termed the faculty of knowledge (aññindriya).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2771

The wisdom that should be fulfilled as a perfection is concerned only with mundane consciousness; thus it is included in the thirteen kinds of moral consciousness (kusala-ñāṇa-sampayutta-citta) of the 39 worldly knowledges (loka-ñāṇa-sampayutta-citta).

The non-functional consciousness (kiriya-citta) belongs only to Arahats; it is not the concern of Bodhisattas who are still worldlings; the resultant consciousness (vipāka-citta) arises without any special effort as a consequence of one's past productive deeds (kamma). Therefore, the wisdom that is associated with these two types of consciousness does not count as perfection. Bodhisattas concentrate only on the mundane wisdom so as to fulfil the perfection of wisdom to its highest degree.

The five controlling faculties (indriya) are included in the 37 constituents of Awakening (Bodhipakkhiya-dhamma), one of them is the faculty of wisdom (paññindriya); this faculty of wisdom is of two kinds: mundane and supermundane. The supermundane kind is not included in the perfection of wisdom developed by a Bodhisatta. Only the wisdom that is associated with mundane moral consciousness which arises while undertaking purification of morality and purification of mind previous to the attainment of the path and fruition states is the perfection of wisdom fulfilled by Bodhisattas.

3. Similarly, in the other four constituents of Awakening are included factors of wisdom (paññā) under different names. Thus, in the five powers (bala), it is known as the power of wisdom (paññā-bala); in the four psychic powers (iddhi-pāda), as accomplishment by examination (vīmaṃsiddhi-pāda); in the seven factors of Awakening (Bojjhaṅga) as investigation of Dhamma (Dhamma-vicaya-sambojjaṅga); and in the eight constituents of the noble path (ariya-maggaṅga) as right view (samma-diṭṭhi).

As with the faculty of wisdom (paññindriya), these various factors of wisdom, under different names, are developed at two different levels: mundane and supermundane. Contemplating on these special qualities of wisdom, may you fulfil the perfection of wisdom to its highest possible stage. [1614]

5. The Perfection of Energy

In matters of the perfection of energy, the texts give the example of a maned lion whose nature is to put forth maximum effort whether in hunting a rabbit or in hunting an elephant. He does not exert himself less in hunting a rabbit because it is a small animal, nor does he strive more in hunting an elephant because of its great size. In both cases, he uses an equal degree of exertion.

Following the ways of a maned lion, a Bodhisatta, while fulfilling the perfection of energy, does not make less effort for ordinary tasks nor puts forth more energy for more arduous ones. He always makes the same amount of maximum exertion, whether the task is small or great.

Deep Impression of Past Exertions of the Buddha

As a result of the habit of employing uniform energy whether attending to big or small affairs in past lives as a Bodhisatta, when he finally became an Awakened One, the Buddha made equal efforts when giving discourses. He did not reduce his effort when delivering an address casually to a single person, neither did he put forth more energy to enable the audience at the extreme end to hear him when addressing a huge assembly as, for example, at the time of delivering the first discourse. He maintained an even voice, putting forth equal energy on both occasions.

The Buddha being blessed with unthinkable majestic glory, his voice, uttered with uniform exertion, reaches all who listen. If there is only one person listening to him, only that person hears the discourse. When there are many people, each person, whether near or far from the Buddha, hears him clearly. This is the special glory of the Buddha.

When the chief disciple, the great elder Sāriputta, gave the discourse of the Discourse on the Even-Minded (Sama-citta-sutta, AN 2.37), as the audience was very large, his normal voice could not reach all of them; he had to make them all hear him with the help of his supernormal psychic powers of accomplishments (iddhi-vidha-abhiññā). However, it was not necessary for the Buddha to do so to make everyone in the audience hear him.

Every Buddha exerts himself to fulfil the perfection of energy in all his previous lives as a Bodhisatta. In addition, in his last birth, when he would gain Awakening, he renounces the world and makes strenuous efforts to practise austerities (dukkara-cariyā) at least for seven days. Having performed the austerities, as the time draws near for becoming a Buddha, he sits on a seat of grass at the foot of the Bodhi tree and makes a resolute effort with a firm determination: “Let only my skin remain; let only my sinews remain; let only my bones remain; let all the blood and flesh dry up, I will not rise from this seat until I have attained omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa).”

Through this effort, he developed the knowledge of insight as powerful as a great diamond insight knowledge (mahā-vajira-vipassanā-ñāṇa), which enables him to realize first the law of dependent origination, followed by the knowledge of the three characteristics of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and unsubstantiality (anatta) of all material and mental phenomena (nāma-rūpa).

Energy (virīya), like wisdom (paññā), is a mental concomitant, but whereas wisdom is always associated with moral consciousness, energy being a miscellaneous type of concomitant (pakiṇṇaka-cetasika) is associated with both moral and immoral consciousness and is of the indeterminate type (abyākata), which is neither moral nor immoral. Consequently, energy can be wholesome, unwholesome or indeterminate. Effort which is wholesome is known as right effort (sammā-vāyāma); effort employed for wrong purpose is unwholesome and is called wrong effort (micchā-vāyāma). It is only the right effort which should be cultivated to the fullest extent as the perfection of energy.

Right Exertion

Right effort (sammā-vāyāma) is also known as right exertion (sammappadhāna). The [1615] meaning is the same. In the expositions of right exertion of the Abhidhamma Analyses (Sammappadhāna-vibhaṅga, Vibh 8), the Buddha explains the four kinds of right exertion:

1. The endeavour to prevent the arising at any time, any place, of any object of evil which has not yet arisen or which one cannot call to mind of having arisen at a certain time, at a certain place, on a certain object.
2. The endeavour to put away the evil that has arisen.

As a matter of fact, it is impossible to abandon evil that had already arisen or that had arisen and passed away. The evil that had arisen in the past has ceased, so it is no longer existing. What does not exist cannot be removed. What is to be understood here is that one should strive to prevent arising of new evil which is of similar nature to the one that has arisen before.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2774

3. The endeavour to bring about the arising of the good which has not yet arisen or which one cannot call to mind as having arisen at a certain time, a certain place, on a certain object.
4. The endeavour to maintain and further develop the good that has arisen or that is arising.

Here also, what is to be understood is that one should strive to bring about the repeated arising of the good similar to the one that has already arisen.

Eleven Factors of Developing Energy

The commentaries to the Analysis of Steadfast Mindfulness (Satipaṭṭhāna-vibhaṅga, Vibh 7) and the Long Discourse on Steadfast Mindfulness (Mahā-Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta, DN 22) describe eleven factors in the development of energy.

1. Reflecting on the dangers of the lower worlds of existence (apāya-bhaya-paccavekkhaṇatā).

Energy will develop in him who reflects thus: “If I am lax in making an effort, I may be reborn in the realms of misery (apāya). Of the four realms of misery, if I am reborn in the realm of continuous suffering (avīci), I will suffer intense pains resulting from numerous, terrible tortures; if I am reborn in the animal world, I may be subjected to all forms of ill-treatment by human beings; if I am reborn in the ghost realm (peta-loka), I will be tormented by hunger for the long periods of the aeons between the appearance of one Buddha and of another; if I am reborn in the Asura world (Asura-loka), with a huge body, 60 or 80 cubits in length, of bones and skins only, I will suffer from heat, cold or winds. In any of these terrible rebirths, I will get no chance of developing the four right exertions. This life is my only opportunity to do so.”

2. Perceiving the benefits accruing from the development of energy (ānisamsa-dassāvitā).

Energy will develop in him who, reviewing and seeing the advantages of developing energy, reflects thus: “A lazy man can never get out of Saṃsāra and attain the supermundane paths and fruition states. Only the industrious can attain them. The beneficial result of making effort is the attainment of the supermundane path and fruition states which are so difficult to realize.”

3. Reviewing the path to be trod (gamana-vīthi-paccavekkhaṇatā).

Energy will develop in him who reflects thus: “All Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas and noble disciples of a Buddha realize their goals by being industrious. Exertion is the straight path trod by the noble ones. No idle person can follow this road. Only the industrious take to this path.”

4. Honouring the alms food of devotees (piṇḍapātāpacāyanatā).

This factor is the specific concern of monastics. Energy will develop in him who, regarding with esteem and appreciation the rich food offered by devotees, reflects thus: “These devotees are not my relatives; they give me this alms food not because they want to make their living by depending on me; they do so only because of the great merit that accrues from giving to the Saṅgha. The Buddha does not allow us to eat alms food in a light-minded, irresponsible manner or to live an easy-going life. He permits it only for the [1616] purpose of practising the Dhamma to achieve liberation from Saṃsāra. Alms food is not for the lazy or the indolent. Only men of diligence are worthy of it.”

5. Reflecting on the nobility of the inheritance (dāyajja-mahatta-paccavekkhaṇatā).

Energy will develop in him who reflects thus: “The heritage of the Buddha known as “the treasures of the virtuous” to be received by his disciples is of seven kinds: faith (saddhā), morality (sīla), learning (suta), charity (cāga), wisdom (paññā), conscience (hiri) and concern (ottappa).

The indolent are not entitled to inherit from the Buddha. Just as bad children, disowned by their parents, cannot inherit from them, even so those who are lazy cannot receive the “treasures of the virtuous” as a heritage from the Buddha. Only men of diligence deserve this inheritance.

6. Reflecting on the nobility of the Teacher, the Buddha (Satthu-mahatta-paccavekkhaṇatā).

Energy will develop in him who reflects thus: “My Teacher, the Buddha, is so noble that the 10,000 world-element shook when he took conception as the Bodhisatta for his last life, renounced the world, became an Awakened One, expounded the first discourse (Dhamma-cakkappavattana-sutta), when he performed the twin miracle at Sāvathī to defeat the heretics (titthiya), when he descended from the Tāvātimsa realm to Saṅkassa, when he renounced the vital principle (āyu-saṅkhāra) and when he passed into Parinibbāna. Being a true son or daughter of such a noble Buddha, should I remain care-free and lazy without exerting myself to practise his teachings?”

7. Reflecting on the nobility of one’s own lineage (jāti-mahatta-paccavekkhaṇatā).

Energy will develop in him who reflects thus: “My lineage is not humble; I am descended from the first King Mahā Sammata of pure and high caste; I am the brother of Rāhula who is the grandson of King Suddhodana and Queen Mahā Māyā, who belonged to the House of King Okkāka, one of the descendants of Mahā Sammata; Rāhula is the Buddha’s son; since I have also taken the name of being a Buddha’s son of Sakyan ancestry, we are brothers. Being of such noble ancestry, I should not live a life of indolence but exert myself to practise the noble teaching.”

8. Reflecting on the nobility of companions in the holy life (sabrahmacāri-mahatta-paccavekkhaṇatā).

Energy will develop in him who reflects thus: “My companions in the holy life, the great elders Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, as well as the other great disciples, who practised the noble Dhamma, have already realized the supermundane paths and fruition states. I should follow the way of these venerable companions in the holy life.”

9. Keeping away from those who are indolent (kusīta-puggala-parivajjanatā).

Energy will develop in him who avoids idle people, those who forsake all physical, verbal and mental activities to lie down and roll in sleep like a python that has eaten its fill.

10. Associating with people who are industrious and energetic (āraddha-viriya-puggala-sevanatā).

Energy will develop in him who associates himself with industrious and energetic people who are whole-heartedly devoted only to their task.

Men of dedication (pahitatta) are always determined not to leave their efforts in carrying out a set task until success is achieved or if not successful until death. Those lacking dedication hesitate even before beginning a work with the thought. “Shall I succeed or not?” While carrying out the work, if the expected goal is not easily achieved, he flinches with the thought: “Even though I carry on with the work, I shall not succeed,” and thus they stop putting forth effort.

11. Inclination towards the development of energy in all four postures (tad-adhimuttatā).

Energy will develop in him who is intent on and inclined to cultivating it in all four [1617] postures of lying down, sitting, standing and walking.

These are the eleven factors which develop energy.

The Main Foundation of Energy

The main foundation of energy is spiritual urgency (saṃvega). It is of three kinds:

1. Urgency that disturbs the mind (cittutrāsa-saṃvega).

Disturbance of mind through urgency because of the dangers of elephants, tigers, weapons, such as swords, spears, etc. is known as urgency that disturbs (cittutrāsa-saṃvega). In terms of the Abhidhamma, it is the mental concomitant of aversion (dosa). Through weak aversion arises fear; through strong aversion arises aggressiveness.

2. Urgency from concern (ottappa-saṃvega).

Concern about doing evil is urgency from concern (ottappa-saṃvega). It is a wholesome type of mental concomitant (sobhana-cetasika).

3. Urgency from knowledge (ñāṇa-saṃvega).

Dread that arises as urgency through reflecting on cause and effect is known as urgency from knowledge (ñāṇa-saṃvega). It is the kind of fear of Samsāra felt by the virtuous. In the texts, urgency from knowledge is described also as the knowledge that is accompanied by concern about evil.

One should also include the wisdom of Arahats that arises accompanied by concern on seeing the dangers of conditioned phenomena (dhamma-saṃvega), then there will be four kinds of spiritual urgency (saṃvega).

Of these types of spiritual urgency, only urgency from knowledge (ñāṇa-saṃvega) should be considered as the main spring of energy. When one sees the dangers of Samsāra through wisdom and is stirred by concern, one would certainly work arduously for liberation from these dangers. Without such wisdom, one will not work for it at all.

Even in everyday mundane life, a student who is struck with fear of poverty, that is, one who has urgency from knowledge, will work hard reflecting thus: “Without education, I will be faced with poverty when I grow up.” Another one, who is not moved by such anxiety, that is, one who has no urgency from knowledge, will put forth no effort whatsoever to acquire knowledge.

Similarly, motivated by a fear of poverty, workers assiduously devote themselves to work which provides them with the necessities of life; whereas those who do not consider their future will remain indolent and carefree. It should be surmised from what has been said that only urgency from knowledge can cause the development of energy.

But this applies only to the development of energy which serves as a perfection. As already mentioned, there are two kinds of energy: energy which is developed for a wholesome act and energy developed for an unwholesome act. The energy necessary for an unwholesome act is also caused by the stirring of spiritual urgency (saṁvega), but it is urgency that disturbs the mind (cittutrāsa-saṁvega) and not urgency from knowledge (ñāṇa-saṁvega) that serves as its foundation.

An indigent person in need of money will make an effort to steal; he cannot take up a proper mental attitude (yoniso-manasikāra). This is an example of how wrong effort arises through an unwholesome urgency that disturbs the mind. A person who does not possess a proper mental attitude will have recourse to wrong efforts to prevent possible dangers falling upon him. But a person with the right frame of mind will not exert himself to do wrong actions; he always strives for good ones.

Thus, whereas the main foundation of energy is the spiritual urgency (saṁvega), it is the mental attitude which determines the kind of energy, whether wholesome or unwholesome, to develop. As a perfection, unwholesome energy is not to be considered; it is only blameless, wholesome energy that is reckoned as a perfection.

When we consider the four right exertions, it would seem that only energy that causes wholesome deeds serves as a perfection. But, although an effort may not result in wholesome [1618] deeds, if it is neither a wrong effort nor the kind that would produce unwholesome deeds, it should be counted as a perfection of energy.

As an example of a super effort for perfection, the commentary cites the story of Mahā Janaka. The Bodhisatta, as Prince Janaka, made the effort of swimming for seven days in the ocean when the ship he was travelling in sank. His strenuous endeavour was not motivated by a desire to perform wholesome deeds or to practise generosity, observe morality or cultivate meditation. It does not result in the arising of unwholesome states such as greed, hatred, delusion either and may thus be regarded as blameless. Prince Janaka's supreme exertion, being blameless and free from unwholesomeness, counts as a fulfilment of the perfection of energy.

When the ship was about to be wrecked, 700 people on board wept and lamented in desperation without making any attempt to survive the disaster. Prince Janaka, unlike his fellow travellers, thought to himself: "To weep and lament in fear when faced with danger is not the way of the wise; a wise man endeavours to save himself from an impending danger. A man with wisdom such as I am, must put forth an effort to swim my way through to safety." With this resolve and without any trepidation, he courageously swam across the ocean. Being urged by such a noble thought, his performance was laudable, and the effort he put forth for this act was also extremely praiseworthy.

Bodhisattas in every existence undertake what they have to do bravely and without flinching; not to say of rebirths in the human world, even when he was born as a bull, the Bodhisatta performed arduous tasks. Thus, as a young bull named Kaṇha (Ja 29), the Bodhisatta, out of gratitude to the old woman who had tended him, pulled 500 carts loaded with merchandise across a big swamp.

Even as an animal, the development of energy as a perfection by the Bodhisatta was not slackened; when reborn as a human, the tendency to put forth effort persisted in him. Extreme hardships he went through as King Kusa (Ja 531), in his endeavours to win back the favours of Princess Pabhāvatī who ran away from him because of his ugly appearance, are examples of the Bodhisatta's determined effort, unyielding in the face of difficulties. The latent tendency to develop such energy remained with the Bodhisatta throughout all his various existences.

The Life of Mahosadha

The texts give the Birth Story of Mahosadha (Umaṅga-jātaka, Ja 542) to show the Bodhisatta's fulfilment of the perfection of wisdom. But, in that very life, the Bodhisatta also developed the perfection of energy. On the whole, Mahosadha made use of wisdom as a guide in attending to his multifarious duties, but once a careful decision had been made, it was put into execution by making a continual effort. Such endeavours of Mahosadha, even though they were not intended to develop meritorious deeds of generosity, morality or meditation, should be considered as a perfection of energy since they were made for the welfare of others.

It may be asked whether some of Mahosadha's endeavours did not cause suffering to others. For example, when King Cūḷani Brahmadaṭṭa laid siege to Mithilā with 18 divisions of his indestructible (akkhobhaṇī) army, Mahosadha, devising a stratagem, brought about a complete rout of the great army, causing much suffering to King Cūḷani Brahmadaṭṭa and his hordes. Should we not blame Mahosadha then for his attempts to make his opponents suffer?

In answer to that, take the simile of scaring a snake which is about to catch a frog. Some people take the view that such an attempt is blameworthy because by so doing the frog will no doubt get out of harm's way but the snake will go hungry. The Buddha teaches that volition is the deciding factor in such a situation. If one frightens away the snake in order to make it suffer from hunger, it is blameworthy; on the other hand, if one acts only to get the frog out of danger, without giving any thought to the snake's hunger, it is quite blameless.

Again, in the Questions of King Milinda on the [1619] Question about Devadatta's Going-Forth (Devadatta-pabbajja-pañha, Mil 4.3, PTS 107), the king asked Ven. Nāgasena: "Venerable sir, is it not a fact that the Buddha knew that Devadatta would create a schism if he was permitted to become a monastic. Knowing thus, why did the Buddha admit him into the order? If he did not receive the going forth, he would not be able to cause the schism."

Ven. Nāgasena replies: "King, the Buddha indeed foresaw that Devadatta would create a schism among monastics, but he also knew that if Devadatta did not gain admission into the Saṅgha, he would commit unwholesome deeds, such as holding a "wrong view with a fixed destiny" (niyata-micchā-dīṭṭhi), for which he would suffer worse than he would for causing a schism. Creating the schism would no doubt lead him to the lower realms (apāya), but there is a time limit for suffering in these realms. Staying outside the Saṅgha, however, through his unwholesome deeds, such as holding wrong views with a fixed destiny, he would be doomed to unlimited misery in the realms of intense suffering, Niraya. Foreseeing this possible limit to his suffering, the Buddha, out of compassion, admitted him into the Saṅgha, thus mitigating his agony to a certain extent.

In the same way, by putting to rout the great army of King Cūḷani Brahmadata, without causing suffering to his country, Mahosadha was saving his own country of Mithilā from complete destruction. He acted thus to serve the best interest of both and was free of any blame.

The Qualities of Energy

1. When Energy takes a predominant place in performing multifarious functions, it acquires the name of the predominance of energy (viriyādhīpati), one of the four predominance-conditions (adhīpati).

2. It forms a constituent part of the 22 controlling faculties (indriya) and is known as the faculty of energy (viriyindriya). But only the energy that is associated with mundane moral consciousness is reckoned as the perfection of energy. In the five controlling faculties (indriya) of the things on the side of Awakening (Bodhipakkhiya-dhamma) also, the faculty of energy, just as in the case of faculty of wisdom, is counted as a perfection only when it is included in the mundane purifications of morality and mind.

Likewise, concerning the four kinds of right exertion (sammappadhāna), it is only the energy included in the mundane purification that is considered a perfection.

3. The factor of energy included in the five powers (bala) is known as the strength of energy (viriya-bala); in the four psychic powers (iddhi-pada) as psychic power of energy (viriyiddhi-pāda); in the seven factors of Awakening (bojjhaṅga) as the energy factor of Awakening (viriya-sambojjhaṅga) and in the eight constituents of the noble path (ariya-maggaṅga) as right endeavour (sammā-vāyāma). These various factors of energy under different names are reckoned as perfections of energy only in association with mundane moral consciousness which arises while undertaking mundane purification.

Contemplating these special qualities of energy, may you fulfil the perfection of energy to its highest possible stage.

6. The Perfection of Forbearance

The Chronicles of the Buddhas (Bv 2.144) exhorts one to bear praise and disdain with patience (sammānāvamānakkhama). One should neither be elated when meeting with pleasant objects nor upset when encountering unpleasant objects. It is no tolerance of pleasantness if we develop greed under fortunate circumstances or of unpleasantness if we develop hate under unfortunate circumstances. The essential meaning here is: We are truly patient only when favourable situations are faced without greed and unfavourable ones without hate.

However, with regard to the perfection of forbearance, in illustrative stories the commentaries generally use the term perfection of forbearance (khanti-pāramī) only for tolerance to acts of physical or verbal aggression by others without giving way to anger. The commentary to the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka) expounds in the Chapter on Miscellany: The group of consciousnesses and its concomitants associated with tolerance of wrongs done by others, predominated by the mental factor of non-aversion (adosa-cetasika) and grasped by compassion and skill in means is called the perfection of forbearance (karuṇūpāya-kosalla-pariggahitaṃ satta-saṅkhārāparādha-sahanam adosappadhāno [1620] tad-ākārappa-vatta-cittuppādo khanti-pāramitā). That is, the group of consciousnesses and its concomitants formed in such a mode of tolerance to faults of beings is called the perfection of forbearance.

The sub-commentary to the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) in commenting on the five restraints of morality, mindfulness, wisdom, forbearance and energy, briefly explained in the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA), defines the restraint of forbearance as: Forbearance means enduring; that forbearance is actually the four mental aggregates formed in such a mode of tolerance; some teachers say it is wisdom (paññā) or only the mental factor of non-aversion (khantī ti adhivāsana, sā ca tathā-pavattā khandhā; paññā ti eke, adoso eva vā).

Some scholars take the view: “The exhortation in the Pāli texts to bear praise and disdain with patience, seems to imply that one should tolerate praise as well as disdain. But, in actual experience, one is liable to be displeased and angry only when one is insulted and despised; no one shows such emotions when treated with honour and veneration. Therefore, the term forbearance should be used only when one shows no anger in a situation which would normally provoke anger to many others. To take the Pāḷi text exhortation literally is to equate the perfection of forbearance with the perfection of equanimity, seeing no difference between the two.”

As the authority quoted by these scholars is the aforesaid commentary to the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka) and the sub-commentary to the Path to Purification (Visuddhi-magga), their view may not be set aside.

It should be noted, however, that forbearance is considered to be tolerance of others’ treatment whereas equanimity is indifference towards beings, without hate or love.

Ven. Ledi Sayādaw, in his Assistance to the Discourse on the Blessings (Maṅgala-sutta-nissaya), defines forbearance as: “Not feeling exalted when encountering pleasantness and remaining patient without giving vent to anger when encountering hardships.” This definition is in agreement with the exhortation to bear praise and disdain with patience (sammānāvamānakkhama).

To reconcile the commentary’s exposition and the text: Bodhisattas are by nature serious-minded; pleasant experiences or happy circumstances do not make them excited with greed; they are accustomed to remaining unmoved by them without having to make a special effort to discipline their mind. When faced with an unhappy turn of events, however, they have to make special endeavour to bear it patiently so as to fulfil their perfection of forbearance.

Bodhisattas, who are fulfilling the perfection of forbearance, have to put up with both pleasant and unpleasant experiences so as not to develop greed and ill-will, hence the exhortation given in the text to bear praise without developing greed and to tolerate insults and ill-treatments without generating hate. But it is nothing strange for Bodhisattas, who are serious-minded, to experience pleasantness without being moved by greed; therefore, the commentary comments only upon tolerance, which is to be cultivated as the perfection of forbearance in unpleasant situations which are unbearable to ordinary persons. Viewed in this way, there is no disagreement between the exposition in the commentary and the teaching in the text.

The Nature of Forbearance

Forbearance being the group of consciousnesses and its concomitants led by the mental factor of non-hate (adosa-cetasika), which has the characteristics of lack of ill-will or anger, is not a separate ultimate reality like wisdom or energy. However, when considered by itself as non-hate, it is of course an ultimate reality like wisdom or energy. [1621]

Although forbearance (khantī) is non-hate (adosa-cetasika), every case of non-hate is not forbearance. The non-hate accompanies every arising of a beautiful (sobhana) type of consciousness, but it is called forbearance (khantī) only if it serves as a deterrent to anger when provoked by others. If the beautiful consciousness arises due to any other cause, the non-hate that accompanies it is not called forbearance.

Ven. Puṇṇa's Forbearance

Ven. Puṇṇa's mental attitude serves as a good example of the forbearance one should develop. It is, therefore, briefly described here, based on the Discourse giving Advice to Puṇṇa (Puṇṇovāda-sutta, MN 145).

Once during the Buddha's time, Ven. Puṇṇa approached and informed the Buddha that he would like to go to the Sunāparanta district and live there. The Buddha said to him: "Puṇṇa, the people in Sunāparanta are rough and brutal. How would you feel should they abuse and revile you?"

The venerable replied: "Venerable sir, should the people of Sunāparanta abuse and revile me, I would regard them as good people, control my temper and bear it patiently with the thought: 'These are good people, extremely good people; they merely abuse and revile me, but they do not assault me with their fists and elbows.' "

The Buddha asked him further: "Puṇṇa, suppose the people of Sunāparanta assault you with their fists and elbows, how would you feel?" – "Venerable sir, I would regard them as good people, control my temper and bear it patiently with the thought: 'These are good people, extremely good people; they merely assault me with their fists and elbows, but they do not stone me.' "

The Buddha asked him further how he would feel if people stoned him, beat him with a stick, cut him with a sword or even kill him.

The venerable replied: "Venerable sir, I would control my temper and bear it patiently with the thought: 'The disciples of the Fortunate One, such as Ven. Godhika, Ven. Channa, being weary and ashamed as well as being disgusted with the body and with life, had to commit suicide (satthahāraka-kamma); how fortunate I am. I need not kill myself.’ ” The Buddha then approved of his replies and blessed him.

Again, in the Birth Story about the Teacher Sarabhaṅga (Sarabhaṅga-jātaka, Ja 522), Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, asked the recluse, Sarabhaṅga:

“Recluse of Koṇḍañña ancestry, what may one slay without having to repent? What may one abandon to gain praise from the virtuous? Whose abusive, harsh words should one bear with patience? Give me answers to these questions.”

The Bodhisatta, Sarabhaṅga the recluse, replied:

“One may slay anger without having to repent; one may abandon ingratitude to gain praise from the virtuous; one should bear with patience abusive, harsh words from everyone, whether superior, equal or inferior; the virtuous call this the highest form of patience.”

Again, Sakka asked:

“Recluse, it may be possible to put up with the abusive, harsh words of those who are superior or one’s equal, but why should one tolerate the rude words coming from one’s inferiors?”

The Bodhisatta answered:

“One may bear with patience the rudeness of one’s superior through fear or the abusive language from those who are equal to ward off the danger of rivalry. Both cases are not superior types of patience. But the wise say that to put up with the rude language coming from one’s inferiors, with no special reason to do so, is the supreme form of forbearance.”

Sakka’s Forbearance

Once, in a battle between the Devas of Tāvatiṃsa and the Asuras, the Devas captured [1622] Vepacitti, King of the Asuras, and brought him into the presence of Sakka. As he entered or left the assembly, he reviled Sakka with abusive words, but Sakka endured his behaviour without showing anger (SN 11.4).

Then Mātali, Sakka’s charioteer, asked his master why he remained calm, without showing any resentment in the face of such insults. Sakka’s reply in verse included the following:

Sadattha-paramā atthā, khantiyā bhiyyo na vijjati, yo have balavā santo dubbalassa titikkhati, tam-āhu paramam khantiṃ.

Of all kinds of interest, self-interest is supreme, and amongst acts that promote self-interest, forbearance is the best. He who is strong himself endures the weak; the virtuous call this the supreme forbearance.

Explanation with Quotations from the Texts

Although the above quotations, from the Thematic Discourses about Sakka (Sakka-samyutta, SN 11) and the Birth Story about the Teacher Sarabhaṅga (Sarabhaṅga-jātaka, Ja 522), refer particularly to forbearance to verbal insults, it should be understood that enduring physical assaults is also meant. The texts mention verbal insults because these are more commonly met with than physical attacks. This is borne out by the example of the aforesaid story of Ven. Puṇṇa, which included physical ill-treatments in ascending order of grievousness.

Also, in the Birth Story about Khantivādī (Khantivādi-jātaka, Ja 313), is found the story of the recluse Khantivādī, who set an example of supreme forbearance when King Kalābu tortured him, not only verbally but also physically, causing his death.

Anger and Forbearance

As has been stated above, forbearance is controlling oneself not to resent it when being attacked by others, either verbally or physically. But there is another form of anger which is not connected with verbal or physical wrongs done by others. Suppose a man employs someone to do a certain job and the workman performs it to the best of his ability. But the employer is not satisfied with his work and bursts out with anger. If one controls one's temper in such a situation, it is not forbearance (khantī) it is just giving no vent to anger (akkodha).

In the Long Birth Story about the Golden Goose (Mahā-haṃsa-jātaka, Ja 534), the Buddha teaches the ten duties of kings (dāsa-rāja-dhamma), which include both non-anger (akkodha) and forbearance (khantī).

In carrying out various orders of a monarch, his executives may have performed their tasks well with the best of intentions, but not to his satisfaction. Non-anger (akkodha), as one of the ten duties of kings, forbids him from giving way to royal anger in such a situation. In contrast, forbearance (khantī) which is bearing verbal or physical insults without losing temper is laid down separately as another duty of the king.

Nine Causes of Anger

There are nine causes of anger which arise in relation to oneself, to friends, loved ones or to one's enemies. It may also arise regarding actions in the past, present or future. Thus there are nine causes of anger arising with regard to individuals and with regard to time (Āghāta-vatthu-sutta, AN 9.29):

1. One is angry in relation to oneself, thinking: "He has caused damage to my interests."
2. One is angry in relation to oneself, thinking: "He is causing damage to my interests."
3. One is angry in relation to oneself, thinking: "He will cause damage to my interests."
4. One is angry in relation to one's friends, thinking: "He has caused damage to the interests of my friend."
5. One is angry in relation to one's friends, thinking: "He is causing damage to the [1623] interests of my friend."
6. One is angry in relation to one's friends, thinking: "He will cause damage to the interests of my friend."
7. One is angry in relation to one's enemies, thinking: "He has promoted the interests of my enemies."
8. One is angry in relation to one's enemies, thinking: "He is promoting the interests of my enemies."
9. One is angry in relation to one's enemies, thinking: "He will promote the interests of my enemies."

In addition to the above nine causes of anger, one can also become angry if it is raining too heavily or if it is too windy, too hot, etc. Losing one's temper over matters about which one should not get angry is called irrational anger (aṭṭhāna-kopa). It is the mental factor of ill-will (dosa-cetasika), which arises mostly in those having no reasoning ability. To restrain such irrational anger (aṭṭhāna-kopa) is to remain without anger (akkodha).

Eight Kinds of Strength

In a list of eight kinds of strength of the noble and virtuous is included forbearance (Paṭhama-bala-sutta, AN 8.27). The eight kinds of strength are:

1. Crying is the strength of children.
2. Anger is the strength of women.
3. A weapon is the strength of robbers.
4. Sovereignty over wide territories is the strength of kings.
5. Finding fault with others is the strength of fools.
6. Careful scrutiny is the strength of the wise.
7. Repeated consideration is the strength of the learned.
8. Tolerance to wrongs done by others is the strength of ascetics and Brahmins.

Ascetics and Brahmins

With reference to the terms ascetics and Brahmins (samaṇa-brāhmaṇa) in number 8 of the above list, it may be asked whether ascetics are of equal status.

Outside of the teaching, samaṇa means an ascetic. Within the teaching, it is understood as a monastic, a member of the Saṅgha, a son of the Buddha. The term samaṇa is thus well-known and needs no further explanation.

What requires elaboration is the word brāhmaṇa. The Discourse on the Highest Knowledge (Aggañña-sutta, DN 27) gives an account of how the appellation Brahmin (brāhmaṇa) came to be used first.

At the beginning of the world, after humans had lived on earth for aeons, evil ways had appeared amongst them, and they elected a certain individual to rule over them as King Mahā Sammata “the Great Elected One.” At that time, some people, saying: “The world is being overwhelmed by forces of evil; we do not wish to live in association with people who are so corrupt as to be governed by a king. We will repair to the forest and drive away, wash away, these evil ways,” went to the forest and stayed there meditating and being absorbed in absorption (jhāna). Because they lived in this manner, they were called Brahmins (brāhmaṇa).

Brahmins (brāhmaṇa) is also a Pāḷi word which means “one who has done away with evil.” Brahmins (brāhmaṇa) did not cook their own food; they lived on fruits which had fallen from trees or on alms food collected from towns and villages. They were called Brahmins (brāhmaṇa) because they led a pure, holy life in keeping with the literal meaning of the Pāḷi word “one who has done away with evil.” They were [1624] thus Brahmins by virtue of their holy practice (guṇa-brāhmaṇa).

After a lapse of many aeons, some of these Brahmins by virtue of their holy practice failed to keep up the practice of meditation and absorption (jhāna). They settled down on the outskirts of towns and villages; they composed and taught the Vedas to those eager to learn them. They no longer practised meditation to attain absorption (jhāna) and to cast off evil. But they still retained the name of Brahmins, but they were not Brahmins of strict practice (guṇa-brāhmaṇa) since they no longer possessed the attribute of holy practice.

They could only claim to be Brahmins by birth (jāti-brāhmaṇa), being descended from the Brahmins of strict practice (guṇa-brāhmaṇa). As they could not practice meditation to attain absorption (jhāna), they are regarded to be of an inferior class. But with the lapse of time, writing Vedic books and teaching, they came to be considered as quite respectable and noble. Although these Brahmins by birth would not actually cast off and wash away mental defilements by cultivation of absorption (jhāna), they immersed themselves in the waters of rivers and streams to deceive people, calling their deceptive performances acts of ablution to wash away impurities.

A reference to this practice of washing out one’s sins by Brahmins is found in the Birth Story about Prince Bhūridatta (Bhūridatta-jātaka, Ja 543). Bhūridatta, King of the Nāgas, used to visit the human world to observe the precepts. On one such visit, he failed to return to the Nāga land at the expected time. His two brothers went in search of him.

They were able to retrieve him in time from the captivity of a snake charmer who ill-treated him. He was betrayed by a Brahmin named Nesāda, who saw him observing precepts on top of an ant-hill.

His younger brother, Subhoga Nāga, while following the course of the River Yamunā in search of him, came across the Brahmin Nesāda who was responsible for his capture by the snake charmer. The Brahmin was found immersed in the River Yamunā in order to wash out the impurities of his betrayal.

The Buddha had in mind only Brahmins of strict practice when he said that tolerance is the power of ascetics and Brahmins. The ascetics of the Discourse on the Origins (Aggañña-sutta, DN 27), who, wearing white clothes, practised to rid themselves of defilements were ordinary Brahmins or Brahmins by birth. But when the Buddha made his appearance and started teaching, he described the attributes only by virtue of which one may be called a Brahmin. In the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada), the Buddha devoted the entire Division about the Brahmin (Brāhmaṇa-vagga) of 41 verses (Dhp 383-423) to fully explain the noble qualities possession of which would entitle one to be called a Brahmin. Such Brahmins are all Brahmins of strict practice (guṇa-brāhmaṇa); there is no division of this class. The Brahmins by birth, however, are split into many divisions.<sup>434</sup>

7. The Perfection of Truthfulness

The opening paragraphs of this chapter deal with how the Pāli words for forbearance (khantī) and truth (sacca) are adopted with some change in the Myanmar language and how truthfulness is likened in the Myanmar literature to the morning star, which never deviates from its course. We have left them out of our translation.

Just as the morning star always goes straight without deviating from its course, so one should speak straight and truthfully; such speech alone means truthfulness.

Two Kinds of Truth

Truth (sacca) is not a separate ultimate principle like wisdom (paññā) or energy (virīya). It is truthfulness without having a trace of falsehood. It involves such mental concomitants as restraint (virati-cetasika) and volition (cetanā-cetasika). As truthfulness varies under [1625] different circumstances, truth is basically of two kinds: conventional truth (sammuti-sacca) and ultimate truth (paramattha-sacca).

<sup>434</sup> The last four paragraphs dealing with the etymology of the Myanmar word for brāhmaṇa are left out from our translation.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2791

Only these two kinds of truth are taught by the Buddha; there is no such thing as a third truth; there is no truth other than these two in the entire world.

Of these two kinds, the conventional truth is the truth which agrees with what has been named by people. People generally name things according to their shapes. They call a thing of this shape a “human,” a thing of that shape a “bull,” a thing of another shape a “horse.” Again, among humans, one of this shape is called a “man” and one of that shape a “woman.” There are, in this way, as many names as there are things.

If you call a thing named “man” a man, it is a conventional truth; it is conventionally correct for you to say so. If you call what has been named “man” a bull, it is not a conventional truth; it is not conventionally correct for you to say so. If you refer to someone who has been named “woman” as a “man,” it is not a conventional truth; it is not conventionally correct for you to say so. In this way, one should differentiate between the two truths.

That which not only has been named by people but which really exists in its ultimate sense is called ultimate truth. For example, when it is said: “The thing that knows various sense objects is mind (citta),” the knowing principle is an ultimate truth because it truly exists in its ultimate sense. When it is said, “the thing that changes owing to opposite phenomena, such as heat and cold, is matter (rūpa),” the changing principle is an ultimate truth because it truly exists in its ultimate sense. In this way, mental concomitants (cetasika) and Nibbāna should also be known as ultimate truths because they also truly exist in their ultimate sense.

Of the two kinds of truth, the conventional truth is associated with perception (saññā); in other words, the conventional truth depends on perception. Recognition of things according to their respective shapes as one has been saying since one’s childhood, “such a shape is a man,” “such a shape is a woman,” “such a shape is a bull,” “such a shape is a horse,” and so on, is perception. A person seeing through perception will say, “there exists a human body,” “there exists a man,” “there exists a woman,” etc.

The ultimate truth is the object of wisdom. In other words, it manifests itself through wisdom. The greater the wisdom, the more discernable is the ultimate truth. Wisdom makes an analysis of everything and sees its true nature. When it is said: “The thing that knows various sense objects in the mind,” wisdom investigates whether a knowing principle exists or not and decides that it does. If there were no such thing as knowing, there would never be beings; all would have been sheer matter, such as stones, rocks and the like. Material things are far from knowing. But all beings do cognize various sense objects. When wisdom thus ponders, there manifests itself the principle (citta) which knows sense objects.

Therefore, that mind exists, in an ultimate sense, is clear to those who think through wisdom; the more they think, the clearer they comprehend. But to those who see things through perception, it will not be clear; it will remain indiscernible, because, as has been said before, perception is an identification of shapes. When you say there is mind, the perceptionist may ask, “Is the mind round, flat or square? Is it a powder, a liquid, or a gas?” But you cannot answer that it is round, flat, or square, nor can you say that it is a powder, a liquid or a gas. If you cannot say anything, he may argue that there is no such thing as mind; because if there were such a thing, it must be round, flat or square; it must be a powder, a liquid or a gas. To the perceptionist, who is preoccupied with the idea of concrete forms, mind does not exist simply because it does not assume any concrete form.

Just as the perceptionist cannot see the ultimate truth, so the intellectual cannot see [1626] conventional truth. When the intellectual takes a look at what has been named “man” by the perceptionist, he does so with an analytical mind and makes 32 portions of this person, such as hair on the head, hair on the body, fingernails, toenails, etc. “Is the hair on the head called man?” “Is hair on the body called man?” The answers to these questions cannot be in the affirmative. In the same way, when a similar question on each of the remaining portions of the human body is asked, the answer will be no every time. If none of these portions can be called “man,” the intellectual will say: “Well, there really does not exist such a thing called man.”

Conventional truth appears only when it is seen through perception, but when seen through wisdom, it disappears, so also the ultimate truth, which appears when it is seen through wisdom; when seen through perception, it disappears.

In this connection, what is particularly noteworthy is the fact that Nibbāna is an ultimate truth. This ultimate truth is peace through cessation of all kinds of sorrow and suffering. This peace can be discerned only when it is examined by means of sharp insight but not by means of perception.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2793

Nowadays, some people might like to ask: “Are there palatial buildings in Nibbāna?” “How do those who have passed into Nibbāna enjoy themselves there?” They ask such questions because of their perception of Nibbāna, which, as ultimate truth, lies in the sphere of wisdom.

To be sure, there are no palatial buildings in Nibbāna, nor are there any individuals that pass into Nibbāna. Those who have realized the peace of Nibbāna with their attainment of Awakening are no longer subject to rebirth, and their minds and bodies cease to exist when demise takes place in their final existence, like a great flame of fire goes extinct. Such a cessation is called passing into Parinibbāna. No living entity exists in Nibbāna.

“If that were the case, such a thing as Nibbāna would not exist,” the perceptionist would say, “it is, therefore, useless and unnecessary.” In order to encourage him, others would assert: “Nibbāna is a place where beings are immortal, assuming special mental and physical forms and enjoying incomparable luxury in palaces and mansions.” Then only is the perceptionist satisfied because the assertion agrees with what he has preconceived.

If one looks through perception at something and sees the appearance of its concrete form, it is not absolute (paramattha), but merely a conventional designation (paññatti). So also, if one looks through wisdom at something and sees the disappearance of its form that is not absolute either but merely a conventional designation too. Only when one looks through wisdom and sees its true nature, then is it absolute. The more one looks thus, the more one sees such reality. Therefore, Nibbāna, which is just peace, highly unique absoluteness, should not be sought through perception, which tends to grasp form and substance. Instead, it should be examined through wisdom, which tends to remove form and substance and delve into their true nature so that the peace that is Nibbāna manifests itself.

Conventional truth and ultimate truth are both acceptable, each in its own context, as has been shown above. Suppose a person takes an oath saying: “I declare that there really exist a man and a woman. If what I have declared is not correct, let misfortune befall me,” and suppose another person would also take an oath saying: “I declare that there really do not exist a man and a woman. If what I have declared is not correct, let misfortune befall me;” never will misfortune befall either of them. The reason is: Though the two declarations are against each other, both are correct from their respective points of view. The former, correct from the point of view of conventional usage, is conventional truth; the latter, correct from the point of view of ultimate sense, is ultimate truth.

Although Buddhas intend to teach only the nature of absolute reality, they do not exclude the conventional terms from their teaching. Instead, they mention them side by side with those of ultimate truth. For instance, even in the first discourse, though the emphasis is on [1627] the two extremes and the middle path, it is taught that “the two extremes should not be taken up by a monastic,” in which “monastic” is a mere designation.

[The translators had here written “a recluse,” which implies that the underlying word was samaṇa. The latter, however, is not mentioned in the relevant section, only monastics (bhikkhu) are mentioned there. It should further be noticed that none of the Group-of-Five had been ordained at this time, but they were still referred to by the Buddha as bhikkhu.]

When the Buddha teaches ultimate truth, he uses conventional designations wherever necessary. He does so not just to make a contrast. For ordinary persons, the conventional truth is as important as the ultimate truth. Had the Buddha taught things only in ultimate terms, those with the proper mental attitude will understand that “whatever exists in the world is impermanent, unsatisfactory and unsubstantial,” and they will make efforts to cultivate insight (vipassanā) meditation, which will directly lead them to Nibbāna.

On the other hand, those with an improper mental attitude will hold thus: “It is said that there are only aggregates of mind and matter, which are subject to impermanence, suffering and unsubstantiality in this world. There is no self, nor are there other persons. Then there cannot be such things as ‘my wealth, my son, my wife,’ nor can there be such things as ‘his wealth, his son, his wife.’ One can make use of anything as one desires. Because there is no such thing as ‘he,’ there can be no such thing as ‘killing him,’ no such thing as ‘stealing his property,’ no such thing as ‘doing wrong with his wife.’” Thus will they commit evil according to their wild desires. So, upon their death, they will be reborn in states of suffering. To prevent this, the discourses are delivered embodying conventional terms. The discourse teachings thus form effective measures for beings to prevent them from falling into the four states of suffering.

Besides, the discourse teachings lead beings to such happy states as the human world, the celestial world and the Brahma world because the virtues, namely:

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2795

generosity, morality and tranquillity meditation, which are conducive to rebirth in those states, are most numerous taught in the discourses.

For example, to accomplish a meritorious act of generosity, there must be the supporter, his volition, the recipient and the object to offer. Of these factors, volition alone is an ultimate reality, but the rest are just designations, exclusion of which makes generosity impossible. The same is true of morality and tranquillity meditation.

Therefore, it should be stated without any doubt that conventional truth leads to happy abodes as has been noted. Exclusion of conventional truth, to say the least, will deter fulfilment of the perfections which are required for becoming a Buddha.

Although it is true that the Buddha's teachings of discourses alone would make beings avoid wrongdoings, since the Buddha himself has said that there exist "I," "he," "mine," "his," "my wife and children" and "his wife and children," etc. There is a danger of beings becoming strongly attached to the wrong notion that there really exist such things and becoming gradually removed from the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna. In order to help them reach these paths, fruitions and Nibbāna, the Buddha had to teach ultimate truth as embodied in the Abhidhamma.

The discourses' teaching of the existence of individuals and things belonging to them is made in agreement with designations which are universally used. But by means of the Abhidhamma, the Buddha had to remove their wrong notions, saying that there is no such thing as "I," "he," "man," "woman," etc.; therefore, because of their conventional terms it should not be grasped that they really exist; all is but impermanent, unsatisfactory and unsubstantial.

In this way, the Buddha explained that there exist "I," "he," "man," "woman," etc. only as mere designations or as conventional truth and that these things do not exist in their ultimate sense, hence the need for him to teach both kinds of truth.

Ultimate truth is of two kinds: natural truth and noble truth. All the four ultimate realities: mind, mental concomitants, matter and Nibbāna, constitute natural truth because they are real in the absolute sense. [1628]

In the field of mundane affairs, there are both physical happiness (sukha) and mental happiness (somanassa), which constitute natural truth. If one is in contact with a pleasant object, because of that touch, there arises happiness in one's person. None can deny that, saying: "No, it is not true," or "No, it is not good to be in contact with a pleasant object." Nobody can say so because of the fact that one is really happy to be in contact with a desirable body as a sense object (iṭṭha-phoṭṭhabbārammaṇa).

Similarly, if one's mind is in contact with a pleasant mind object, one enjoys mental happiness. Such a feeling is called a pleasant feeling (somanassa-vedanā). This is irrefutable because the arising of mental happiness is a reality. Thus, it should be held that both happiness (sukha) and pleasure (somanassa) exist in mundane affairs.

The Noble Truths

The Noble Truth of Suffering

In terms of the noble truths, one does not see either happiness (sukha) or pleasure (somanassa) in mundane affairs. If one clings to the view that there exist both happiness and pleasure as natural truth, one cannot be detached from having a worldly outlook; one cannot then attain the state of a noble one (ariya). Therefore, one who aspires to become a noble one (ariya) should make efforts to see that the mental states called happiness and pleasure, in terms of natural truth, are all suffering. These feelings, called happiness and pleasure, are things which cannot remain without change forever; indeed, they are subject to change every second.

Worldlings crave the pleasures of human and divine abodes, wrongly believing that they are a source of happiness and delight. They do so because they do not know such pleasures to be transitory and subject to constant change. They are ignorant of the true nature of these pleasures because they have little intelligence but great craving. Such ignorant people will look upon them as enjoyable and delightful before the process of decay and deterioration sets in. But it is in their nature to change, and when that happens, these people become sad much more than they had been happy.

For example, a poor man will become very happy the moment he hears that he has won a lottery prize. Then he starts daydreaming how to spend and enjoy his wealth to make up for his former poverty. While he is building castles in the air, he loses all his money through some misfortune. It may be imagined how unhappy he will be then. His sorrow at the loss of his wealth will be far greater than his happiness on becoming suddenly rich.

In the field of worldly affairs, everything is associated with both enjoyment and sorrow. The five sense-pleasures are enjoyable to worldlings. But the Buddha says that they are more suffering than enjoyment. Unlike worldlings, however, the Buddha's disciples do not find them enjoyable, much less the Buddha. Yet, the Buddha does not say that they are totally devoid of pleasantness; he only says that there is little pleasantness but much sorrow in them.

In any situation, the wise and virtuous always consider first whether there is fault or no fault but never whether there is pleasantness or unpleasantness. If there is fault, they take no interest in it, even if there is pleasantness. They decide it is undesirable to them. If there is no fault, they take it to be desirable even if pleasantness is absent.

Supposing someone is told that he could rule a country as a Universal Monarch just for one day, but that the next day he would be executed. Then there would be none who dares or desires to rule. From the point of view of a worldling, a Universal Monarch's life for one day, which has never been enjoyed before, may be entirely attractive. But as there is the impending death on the following day, which is a great disadvantage, there would be nobody who will enjoy one day's life of such a Universal Monarch.

In the same way, seeing that everything is perishable, the noble ones cannot hold temporary pleasure, which occurs just before it vanishes, as enjoyment. One can become a noble person only through contemplation that "there is no such thing as happiness in this world; everything is impermanent; as there is no permanence, there is no happiness; there is but sorrow."

Only by developing insight through the contemplation that everything in the world is of the nature of suffering, it is possible to become a noble one (ariya). The aggregates of phenomena, which [1629] are the objects of such meditation, is called a noble truth. In other words, since the noble ones meditate on this aggregate of mundane phenomena as they really are, it is called a noble truth.

The insight that, in the cycle of existence which are called the three worlds, there is no enjoyment at all but only suffering, according to the right view held by those who are working for the attainment of the noble state and by those who have already attained the same, is a truth; it is therefore called the noble truth of suffering.

In short, the five aggregates of clinging (pañcūpādānakkhandha), also named the phenomena of the three mundane planes of existence, are all suffering, and they are nothing but suffering. The five aggregates of clinging are: the aggregate of matter (rūpa), the aggregate of feelings (vedanā), the aggregate of perceptions (saññā), the aggregate of volitions (saṅkhāra) and the aggregate of consciousness (viññāṇa), which form objects of attachments as “I,” “mine,” “myself.” These five aggregates are called the noble truth of suffering.

The Noble Truth of the Cause of Suffering

The five aggregates that are clung to (pañcūpādānakkhandha), which form the noble truth of suffering, do not arise by themselves. They have reasons for their arising, the most fundamental and important being craving for sense objects.

In the world, every being is subject to suffering because he or she is to toil daily for the essentials of living, and all this is motivated by craving. The more one craves for good living, the greater one’s suffering is. If one would be satisfied with a simple life, living very simply on bare necessities, one’s misery would be alleviated to a corresponding extent. It is clear, therefore, that suffering, wrongly believed to be good living, is caused by craving.

Beings do all kinds of acts for wanting better things, not only for the present life but also for coming existences. When a new birth appears as a result of those acts, the real cause for this new birth is found to be the craving that motivates those acts.

Craving is called the noble truth of the cause of suffering because it is truly that craving which is the origin of suffering (upādānakkhandha) in the new birth. In other words, craving is the true cause of the aggregates, which causes suffering. This noble truth of the cause of suffering (dukkha-samudaya-sacca) is also referred to, in short, as the truth of the cause (samudaya-sacca).

The Noble Truth of the Cessation of Suffering

Craving, called the truth of the cause of suffering, like the gum of the Ironwood tree, clings to various mundane sense objects, but, like flies which cannot approach a burning iron, it cannot form an attachment to Nibbāna.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2799

The reason for this is that the ultimate reality, Nibbāna, the unconditioned element, is unattractive from the point of view of craving. To explain: Craving arises from feeling, as the Buddha has stated: With sensation as condition there is craving (vedanā-paccayā taṇhā) in the doctrine of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda), and accordingly craving owes its existence to feeling. But the unconditioned Nibbāna has nothing to do with feeling as it is not the kind of happiness that is to be felt; it is but peaceful happiness (santi-sukha).

Then the question arises: Totally devoid of sensation, can Nibbāna be likeable and desirable? If somebody asked like this, he does so because he thinks feeling is real happiness, or he does not consider that peaceful happiness is real happiness.

The answer is: There are two kinds of happiness; happiness derived from feeling (vedayita-sukha) and happiness derived from peace (santi-sukha). Here is a simile: Suppose there is a rich man who is fond of food. He expends much to nourish himself with sumptuous delicacies. But a Vijjādhara, one who is sustained by magical power, may find a rich man's food disgusting, let alone finding it attractive, as he is endowed with the power of living without eating. When asked: "Of these two, who is happier as far as food [1630] is concerned?" a man of craving will say a rich man is happier because he enjoys highly sumptuous food whenever he desires, while the latter enjoys nothing. They will say so because, being overwhelmed by craving, they believe that feeling which stimulates craving is something to be esteemed.

Men of intelligence, on the other hand, will say that the Vijjādhara is happier. A rich man, having a refined palate, must go in quest of elaborate foodstuffs. Having acquired them, he is flooded with the troubles of making the necessary preparations (paṭisaṅkhāraṇa-dukkha) and longing for novelty (āsā-dukkha). To enjoy happiness derived from feeling (vedayita-sukha) is to be burdened with these twin sufferings (dukkha); there is no escape from them. The Vijjādhara has no such suffering; he lives happily having nothing to do with food. There is no trace of worries in his happiness, which is absolute. Thus, they will say he is happier.

Men of craving say that a rich man is happier because they do not see any of his troubles; what they do see is his enjoyment of food. They have no good impression of the peaceful life of the Vijjādhara who does not need to eat at all. Instead, they envy a rich man's way of living and want to become rich themselves. In the same way, craving has no high opinion of, and no desire or yearning for the happiness derived from peace (santi-sukha), the unconditioned Nibbāna, which is devoid of feeling and which indeed is peace.

In this connection, the Discourse on the Happiness of the Peace of Nibbāna (Nibbāna-sukha-sutta, AN 9.34) says: “Once, Ven. Sāriputta, while staying in the midst of monastics, said: ‘Friends, Nibbāna is indeed happiness; Nibbāna is indeed happiness.’” Then Ven. Udāyi asked: “How can Nibbāna be happiness, friend Sāriputta, if there is no feeling?” Ven. Sāriputta replied: “Friend Udāyi, Nibbāna being devoid of feeling is in itself happiness.”

Worldly people who lack intelligence view the five aggregates, the truth of suffering, as happiness. Intelligent worldly people and the noble ones view the cessation of the five aggregates, like the extinction of a great fire, as happiness.

A simile to illustrate the superiority of happiness derived from cessation and extinction for those worldly people of poor intelligence is as follows: A patient, who is suffering from chronic, acute flatulence takes medicine from a good physician. Consequently, he gets completely cured of his disease. It may be imagined how happy he would be. At that moment, he has no pleasant sensation whatsoever; what he experiences is simply the extinction of the flatulence trouble. He will certainly be delighted, knowing: “Now my trouble is gone!” as his suffering has ceased to trouble him. The flatulence is nothing when compared with the suffering of Samsāra. If one takes delight in the extinction of that insignificant trouble, why will he not find happiness in the extinction of the great suffering of Samsāra. He certainly will be overjoyed.

Nibbāna

What is Nibbāna, the cessation of suffering? When the unconditioned element (asaṅkhata-dhātu), the unique ultimate reality, which has the characteristics of peace, is realised with the fourfold knowledge of the path, all the defilements, numbering 1,500 are completely eradicated and never will they rise again. In any existence, when the path to becoming an Arahant (Arahatta-magga) is attained, the suffering, in the form of the five aggregates, ceases once and for all immediately after death, just as a heap of fire has been extinguished. There is no more rebirth in any realms of existence. That unconditioned element, the unique ultimate reality, which has the characteristics of peace is called Nibbāna.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2801

The worldlings do not know well the nature of Nibbāna as the noble ones do. If they, without knowing it, say or write to let others understand it as the noble ones do, they could go wrong. Let alone speaking of Nibbāna, when they speak even of a mundane object which they know of only from books, as though they have seen it with their own eyes, they are likely to make mistakes. The common worldlings not being able to see every aspect of it like the noble ones do, should speak of Nibbāna only in the aforesaid manner. [1630]

When Nibbāna is considered as to what it is like, those who have not understood what it really is, are likely to regard Nibbāna as a kind of indestructible country or city. When Nibbāna is mentioned as a secure city in a discourse at a water-pouring ceremony, it is just a figurative usage. Nibbāna is not a city, nor is it a country. Yet there are some who believe and say that Nibbāna is a city where those who have passed into it live happily with mind and body free of old age, sickness and death. The truth is that the passing of Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas and Arahats into Nibbāna means the complete cessation of the five aggregates of an Arahata at his death in his last existence; they will no longer appear in any realm of existence. Nibbāna is the ultimate reality which is the object of the paths and fruitions. Parinibbāna is complete cessation of the material and mental aggregates which will never come into being again. Their passing into Nibbāna is not going into the city of Nibbāna. There is no such thing as the city of Nibbāna.

When people perform meritorious deeds, their teachers will admonish them to pray for Nibbāna. Though they do so accordingly, they generally do not know well what Nibbāna means. So they are not very enthusiastic about it. The teachers, therefore, should ask them to pray for the extinction of all suffering and sorrow because the devotees will understand thoroughly and pray enthusiastically and seriously.

Two Kinds of Nibbāna

Suppose there is a very costly garment. When its owner is still alive, you say: “It is an excellent garment with a user.” When he dies, you say: “It is an excellent garment with no user.” The same garment is spoken of in accordance with the time when the user is alive and when the user is no longer alive. Similarly, the unconditioned element, the ultimate reality of Nibbāna, which has the characteristic of peace and which is the object the venerable ones contemplate by means of the paths and fruitions, is called Nibbāna with the five aggregates remaining (sa-upādisesa-nibbāna) before his death; after his death, however, since there are no longer the five aggregates that contemplate Nibbāna, it is called Nibbāna with the five aggregates no longer remaining (anupādisesa-nibbāna).

The peace of Nibbāna is aspired for only when it is pondered on, after overcoming craving by wisdom. The peace of Nibbāna, which is something which should really be aspired for, will not be understood if craving is foremost in one's thinking and not overcome by wisdom.

Three Kinds of Nibbāna

Nibbāna is also of three kinds according to its attributes which are clearly manifest in it: 1) Nibbāna which is void (suññata-nibbāna); 2) Nibbāna which is devoid of cause (animitta-nibbāna); and 3) Nibbāna which is devoid of craving (appaṇihita-nibbāna).

1. The first attribute is that Nibbāna which is devoid of all impediments (palibodha); hence it is called Nibbāna which is void (suññata-nibbāna).
2. The second attribute is that it is devoid of consciousness (citta), mental concomitants (cetasika) and matter (rūpa), which, as conditioned things, are the cause of defilements.

Conditioned things, whether mental or material, cannot only arise individually and without combining with one another. Material things arise only when at least eight of them form a combination. That is why they are called units of eight (aṭṭha-kalāpa). Mental things also arise only when at least eight elements make a combination. By this is meant the fivefold consciousness (pañca-viññāṇa). When such combinations of mental and material components brought together to form an aggregate are wrongly taken to be “myself,” “my body,” “a thing of substance,” they give rise to mental defilements, such as craving, hatred, etc. Conditioned things are thus known as a ground or cause (nimitta). In particular, mundane consciousness, mental concomitants and matter are called a ground or cause. In Nibbāna, however, there are no such things of substance as “myself,” “my body,” which cause the emergence of defilements; hence, the name Nibbāna which is devoid of cause (animitta-nibbāna). [1632]

3. The third attribute is that Nibbāna is devoid of craving (taṇhā). As has been said before, Nibbāna has nothing to crave for. Nibbāna is not to be craved for. Therefore, it is also called Nibbāna which is devoid of craving (appaṇihita- nibbāna). In this way, there are three kinds of Nibbāna according to its attributes.

This truth of the cessation of suffering is, in short, called the truth of cessation (nirodha-sacca). This truth of cessation is the unconditioned (asaṅkhata) element. It is not conditioned by any factor. Therefore, this truth of cessation, the unconditioned element, the ultimate reality of Nibbāna, is called an uncaused phenomenon (appaccaya-dhamma) or unconditioned phenomenon (asaṅkhata-dhamma) in the the Enumeration of Phenomena (Dhamma-saṅgaṇī).

The Noble Truth of the Path

Though Nibbāna is causeless, not conditioned by any cause and always exists, it is not possible to realise its peace without a cause. It can be realised only through a cause. That cause is nothing but the noble practice. Therefore, the noble practice that leads to Nibbāna, the cessation of suffering, is termed the course of practice that leads to the cessation of suffering (dukkha-nirodha-gāminī-paṭipadā).

The Middle Path

Living in the enjoyment of sensual pleasures in the world, fulfilling the demands of craving, is not the path for the attainment of Nibbāna, which is the cessation of suffering. It is just an ignoble practice called devotion to the pleasure and happiness in sense pleasures (kāma-sukhallikānuyoga). Efforts to make oneself suffer by exposure of one's body to fire or to the sun, by keeping one's hand raised continuously, with a view to preventing mental defilements from appearing, do not form the way to Nibbāna, the cessation of suffering. It is another ignoble practice called devotion to self-mortification (attakilamathānuyoga). Avoiding self-indulgence in sensual pleasures on the one hand and self-mortification on the other, following only the middle path which is neither too comfortable nor too arduous, like the string of a harp which is neither too taut nor too loose, is the practice that surely leads to Nibbāna. This practice which is neither easy nor difficult is called the middle practice (majjhima-paṭipadā).

This middle course is called the path (magga), the way leading to Nibbāna. Wrong view, etc. which are unwholesome, are called the path to a bad destination (duggati-magga) or simply the wrong path (micchā-magga) as they lead to the four suffering states (apāya). Right view, etc., which is mundane and wholesome, is called the path to a good destination (sugati-magga) or the right path (sammā-magga) as they lead to Nibbāna. The commentary on the Analysis of the Truths (Sacca-vibhaṅga, Vibh 4) explains that these factors, such as right view, etc. which constitute path consciousness are called path (magga) because they are sought by those who aspire for Nibbāna; because these factors lead to Nibbāna and because they find their way to Nibbāna after eradicating mental defilements.

This path is not of one factor only; it is of eight factors, as will be shown below; hence it is called the path of eight constituents (aṭṭhaṅgika-magga), which are:

1. Right view (sammā-diṭṭhi), which is knowledge of the truth of suffering, knowledge of the truth of the cause of suffering, knowledge of the truth of the cessation of suffering and knowledge of the truth of the path leading to the cessation of suffering. Thus it is the fourfold knowledge.
2. Right thought (sammā-saṅkappa); there are three kinds of right thought: thought of liberating oneself from sensuous defilements (kilesa-kāma) and sensuous objects (vatthu-kāma), as has been explained in the section on the perfection of renunciation (nekkhama-pāramī); thought of not destroying others, and thought of not harming others.
3. Right speech (sammā-vācā), which is refraining from the four evil kinds of speech.
4. Right action (sammā-kammanta), refraining from the three evil actions.
5. Right livelihood (sammā-ājīva), which is livelihood that is free of the seven evils.
6. Right exertion (sammā-vāyāma), exertion so as not to give rise to unwholesomeness that has not yet occurred; exertion so as to eradicate unwholesomeness that has occurred; exertion so as to give rise to wholesomeness that has not yet occurred and [1633] exertion so as to develop wholesomeness that has occurred.
7. Right mindfulness (sammā-sati), mindfulness so as to be aware of one's body, feelings, consciousness and mental hindrances, etc.
8. Right concentration (sammā-samādhi), the first, second, third and fourth absorptions (jhāna).

These eight constituents do not arise simultaneously in the mundane fields; they arise in combination with one another as far as possible. When they come to the supermundane field, however, all eight arise simultaneously. Only these eight constituents which arise simultaneously at the moment of attaining the supermundane path are collectively called the noble truth of the path. Thus, by the noble truth of the path leading to the cessation of suffering is meant the group of eight factors beginning with right view that arise as a whole and simultaneously. The path which is included together with the fruition and Nibbāna in the collection of supermundane phenomena stands for all these eight constituents which form the noble truth of the path.

Truth of Learning and Truth of Practice

The truths we have so far discussed are those learnt from the scriptures (pariyatti-sacca). But what really counts as a perfection of truth is the truth of practice (paṭipatti-sacca) fulfilled by the noble ones such as Bodhisattas and others. The truth of practice means truthful speech or telling the truth (vacī-sacca). Fulfilment of such a practice in one's self is fulfilment of the perfection of truth. It is the truth that Bodhisattas and other noble persons fulfil in particular, and this truth is of three kinds:

1. The truth told so that one will be believed by others (sadda-hāpana-sacca).
2. The truth told so that one's wish may be fulfilled (icchā-pūraṇa-sacca).
3. The truth told so that telling lies may be avoided (musā-viramaṇa-sacca).

1. The Truth Told so That One Will Be Believed by Others

Of these three truths, the way Bodhisattas fulfil the truth told so that one will be believed by others is mentioned in the Birth Story about the Lotus Stalks (Bhisajātaka, Ja 488). The full story of the Birth Story about the Lotus Stalks may be read in the Birth Stories (Jātaka) book. The story in brief is as follows.

The Birth Story about the Lotus Stalks

Once upon a time, a Brahmin youth, Mahā Kañcana by name, who was born in the city of Bārāṇasī, went forth in renunciation into a forest, together with ten companions, including his young brothers, one young sister, a male servant, a female servant and a friend. They made their lodgings at a suitable distance near a lotus pond and lived on gathered fruits.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2806

In the beginning, they all went out together to look for fruits; talking to one another, they behaved like townsfolk or villagers, not like forest-dwellers. To stop this unpleasant situation, the eldest brother Mahā Kañcana said: “I alone will go out for fruits. You all stay behind to practise Dhamma in peace.” Then the other brothers said: “You are the chief of us all. It is not proper for you to gather fruits. The sister and the female servant should not do so either for they are women. But the eight of us will do so by turns.” This was agreeable to everyone and the remaining eight male persons gathered fruits on rotation to feed them all.

As time went by, they became so content that they did not care for fruits but took lotus sprouts from the nearby pond and shared amongst themselves in this manner. The one on duty brought lotus sprouts into the leaf hut and divided them into eleven portions. The oldest of them took his portion first and, after striking the stone drum, went back to his place to eat it peacefully and carried on with his practice. When the next senior member heard the sound of the stone drum, he took his share and struck the drum in turn. In this manner, they took their food one after another, went back to their place to eat and continued to practise. Thus, they did not see one another unless there was a special reason.

As their practice was so severe, causing Sakka’s seat to tremble, the Lord of the Devas [1634] sought out the reason and came to know it. He became doubtful that these people were really detached from sensual pleasures. In order to investigate the matter, he kept the eldest brother’s share of food hidden by his supernormal power for three days continuously.

When the oldest brother came to take his share on the first day, he did not see it and thought that it must have been left out through forgetfulness; he then said nothing and went back to his place to continue his meditation.

On the second day also he found his share missing; thinking that his share was purposely left out as a punishment because of someone thinking that he was guilty of something, he remained quiet as on the first day.

On the third day, when he did not find his share, he thought that he should apologize if he was guilty, and in the evening, he summoned the others by striking the stone drum. He said: “Why did you not give me my share of food?”

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2807

Please speak out if I am guilty. I will give an apology to you.” Then the first younger brother stood up and, after paying his respects to the eldest brother, said: “Sir, could I get your permission to speak only for myself?” On getting the permission, he took an oath, saying: “Sir, if I had stolen your share of food, may I come into possession of horses, cattle, silver, gold and a beautiful wife here at this place and stay with my family enjoying a mundane life.” This form of oath suggests that as much as objects of desire give us pleasure when we are in possession of them, we feel grieved and distressed when we are bereft of them. The oath was taken to despise the objects of desire.

The eldest brother said: “You have taken a very severe oath. I believe you did not take my food. Go and sit in your place.” The rest of the group, covering their ears, also said: “Brother, please do not say so. Your word is very serious and terrible.” They covered their ears because as meditators, they found sense pleasures disgusting; sensuality was so dreadful that they could not bear even to hear something associated with it.

Then the second younger brother said: “Sir, if I have stolen your lotus sprouts, may I become one who wears flowers, puts on sandalwood paste from Kāsi, has many children and who is very much involved in and attached to sensuality.” In this way, the remaining eight persons took similar oaths individually.

In this Birth Story (Jātaka), the ascetic Mahā Kañcana, leader of the group, was the Bodhisatta, and the rest were destined to become foremost disciples of the Buddha in their own right. Therefore, having attained spiritual maturity, they really abhorred sensuality. Each of them was bold enough to take such a dreadful oath to convince the others.

Since that oath was based on what was true, it was the same as the truth (vacī-sacca) fulfilled by Bodhisattas. In their individual oaths, the main point was: “We did not steal your share of lotus sprouts.” Since it was a true statement, it amounts to truth.

Such words as: “May I also have this or that,” which in effect means: “May I encounter this or that,” are included as proposed punishment for oneself in the oath, just to make the others believe him or her. Accordingly, this truth is called the truth told so that one will be believed by others (sadda-hāpana-sacca). The oath that has been taken from the times of ancient Mahā Sammata kings down to the present governments are all truths told so that one will be believed by others (sadda-hāpana-sacca).

Taking of a Corporal Oath

Before the subject-matter of an oath was put into writing as a sacred text, the taking of an oath was done verbally and was called “swearing an oath.” From the time when written sacred oaths came into existence, purely verbal taking of an oath has been replaced by holding the sacred text or placing it on one’s head; thus, taking of a corporal oath by holding a sacred text has come into use. This gives rise, in Myanmar parlance, to “holding the sacred text” for taking a corporal oath and “administering the corporal oath” for making someone else hold the sacred text. Only the form of taking an oath for oneself, whether it is taken verbally or by holding the sacred text, in order to convince others, saying: “What I have said is the truth; if not, may such and such a misfortune befall me,” etc. should be named the truth told so that one will be believed by others (sadda-hāpana-sacca). [1635]

An utterance not based on truth but made just to consign others to destruction is not an oath but merely a curse. An example may be seen in the following story, which is based on a section of the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada) commentary (on Dhṛ 3).

The Story of Devila and Nārada

In the past, while King Brahmādatta was reigning in the city of Bārāṇasī, a recluse, Devila by name,<sup>435</sup> was living in the Himālayas. On his visit to Bārāṇasī, in order to obtain vinegar and salt, with the owner’s permission he stayed in a potter’s hut near the city. Soon, another recluse called Nārada came for a similar purpose and stayed at the same place. At night, when the time for sleeping came, the newcomer noted Devila’s sleeping place as well as the door at the entrance to the hut and went to bed. But, after lying down at his place, Devila moved to the entrance and slept crosswise in the middle of the doorway.

When Nārada went out in the dead of the night, he happened to tread on Devila’s matted hair. Devila then said: “Who has stepped on my hair?” Nārada replied gently: “Sir, I have, because I did not know that you were sleeping here. Please accept my apology,” and he left the hut while Devila was grumbling.

<sup>435</sup> [The name is also written Devala.]

Then, just in case Nārada should do it again when he came back, Devila completely reversed his lying position and went to sleep. When Nārada returned, he thought: “When I went out, I wrongly stepped on his hair because I did not know where his head lay; I shall now go in by the other way.” Thus, he happened to tread on his neck. Devila asked: “Who trod on my neck?” – “It is I, sir,” said Nārada. “You wicked recluse!” said Devila, “The first time, you stepped on my hair. This time you stepped on my neck. Curse you, I will.” – “Sir, I am not guilty,” said Nārada, “The first time I was wrong because I did not know the way you were sleeping. Now I came by another way so as not to wrong you again. Please pardon me,” said Nārada in apology.

“Wicked recluse, I will curse you,” threatened Devila. Then despite Nārada’s plea, Devila uttered a curse: “Tomorrow morning, as soon as the sun rises, may your head split into seven pieces!” – “In spite of my apologies you cursed me,” said Nārada, “May the guilty one’s head be split into seven pieces.” Thus Nārada put Devila under a similar curse in retaliation.

Unlike Devila’s curse, Nārada’s was free of anger and volition to harm him. He cursed him just to make him fear and admit his wrong. He was so powerful that he could see over 80 aeons of time, i.e., the past 40 and the future 40 aeons.

When he looked into Devila’s future, he foresaw that the latter would be destroyed. So out of compassion for Devila, he tried with his power to prevent the sun from rising.

When the sun did not rise at the time it was due to, people thronged to the palace and shouted in unison: “King, the sun does not rise while you are ruling over us. Please improve your conduct so that the sun reappears. The king pondered on his conduct and did not see anything wrong. He thought that there must be some other reason, such as a quarrel among ascetics in his country. On enquiry, he came to know about the quarrel between the two recluses. The king then went overnight to the recluses. Under instructions from Nārada, he placed a solid mass of earth on Devila’s head and made him plunge into a pond by force. When Nārada withdraw his power, no sooner had the sun risen than the solid mass of earth was split into seven pieces. Devila then moved to another place in the water and came out of it safe and sound.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2810

Devila's curse in this story: "Tomorrow morning, as soon as the sun rises, may your head be split into seven pieces!" is for Nārada, uttered with anger. Thus it was not an oath but a mere curse.

Like the curse in this story, there are curses recorded in the Myanmar inscriptions of old. For instance, the Nadaungtat relic shrine (stūpa) inscription, dated 1175. CE, on the northern side of the Cūlamuni Shrine of Bagan, reads near the end: "For he who destroys my work of merit, may seven generations of his descendants be destroyed. May he suffer in Avīci hell, and may he not be liberated but become rooted there even when Buddhas of successive aeons come and try to save him." Such a curse is something that is not done by Bodhisattas. In [1636] fact, it is a verbal evil called "harsh speech" (pharusa-vācā). In other words, it is the kind of abusive words uttered by mean persons.

Birth Stories Illustrating Aspects of Truth

Truth told so that one will be believed by others (sadda-hāpana-sacca) may be understood not only from the Birth Story about the Lotus Stalks but also from the Birth Story about Mahā Sutasoma (Mahā-sutasoma-jātaka, Ja 537). A summary of this latter story runs as follows.

The Birth Story about Mahā Sutasoma

Once, the cannibal Porisāda, who formerly was the King of Bārāṇasī, but who was now living in a forest, made a vow to bathe the trunk of a banyan tree with the blood of 101 kings if his foot, which had been pierced by an acacia thorn, was healed in seven days. The foot healed, and he succeeded in capturing 100 princes. At the command of the deity of the tree to make the number of captured kings complete, he was to catch King Sutasoma of Kuru. He managed to do so while Sutasoma was returning from the Migājina Park and carried him away on his shoulder.

Then Sutasoma said: "I have to go home for a while, because, on my way to the Migājina Park, I met a Brahmin called Nanda, who offered to teach me four verses worth four hundred pieces. I have promised him I would learn them on my way back from the Park and asked him to wait for me. Let me go and learn the verses and keep my promise. After that, I will come back to you." – "You sound like you are saying: 'Having been freed from the hands of death, I will come back to death!' " replied the man-eater. "I do not believe you."

Then Sutasoma said: “Friend Porisāda, in the world, death after living a virtuous life is better than a long life full of wickedness, as it is blamed by others. Words uttered not truthfully cannot protect one from rebirth in a state of suffering after one’s death. Friend Porisāda, you may rather believe if somebody were to say: “The strong winds blew away rocky mountains into the sky,” or “The sun and the moon have fallen to earth,” or “All rivers flow upstream,” but never believe it if somebody says: “Sutasoma tells lies.” Friend Porisāda, if somebody says: “The sky has been split up,” or “The ocean has dried up,” or “Mount Meru has been wiped out without a trace,” you may believe it. But never believe if somebody says: “Sutasoma tells lies.”

But still Porisāda was not fully convinced. As Porisāda remained adamant, Mahā Sutasoma thought: “This Porisāda still does not believe me. I will make him believe me by taking an oath.” So he said: “Friend Porisāda, please put me down from your shoulder. I will convince you by taking an oath.” Porisāda then put him down from his shoulder. “Friend Porisāda, I will hold the sword and the spear and take the oath. I will take leave of you for a short time and will fulfil my promise given to Brahmin Nanda to learn the verse from him in the city. Then I will come back to you to keep my promise. If I do not say the truth, may I not gain rebirth in a royal family, well protected by weapons such as this sword and this spear.”

Then Porisāda thought: “This King Sutasoma has taken an oath which ordinary kings dare not do. No matter whether he comes back or not, I too am a king. If he does not come back, I will get the blood out of my arm to sacrifice it for the deity of the banyan tree.” Thus thinking, Porisāda set Bodhisatta Sutasoma free.

This truth of King Mahā Sutasoma uttered to convince Porisāda is also the truth told so that one will be believed by others (sadda-hāpana-sacca). This is the kind of perfection of truthfulness which Bodhisattas have to fulfil.

2. The Truth Told so That One’s Wish May Be Fulfilled

This second truth spoken to have one’s desire fulfilled (icchā-pūraṇa-sacca) may be learnt from the Birth Story about the Wise Suvaṇṇasāma (Suvaṇṇasāma-jātaka, Ja 540) as well as from other stories.

The Birth Story about the Wise Suvāṇṇasāma

In the Birth Story about the Wise Suvāṇṇasāma, the Bodhisatta Suvāṇṇa, looking after his blind parents, went to fetch water from a river. King Pīḷiyakkha, who was out hunting, saw him and shot him with an arrow, mistaking him for a supernatural being. Being overcome by the poisonous effect of the arrow, the Bodhisatta became unconscious. King Pīḷiyakkha brought the Bodhisatta's father and mother to the place where the Bodhisatta was lying in a dead faint. On their arrival there, his father Dukūla sat down and lifted his head, while his mother Pārikā sat down, held his feet, placing them on her thigh, and cried. They [1637] touched their son's body and feeling the chest, which still had body heat, the mother said to herself: "My son has not died yet. He is just unconscious because of the poison. I will remove that poison by my words of solemn truth." Accordingly, she made an asseveration comprising seven points:

1. Formerly, my son Sāma has practised righteousness (Dhamma-cāri). If this be true, may the poison that afflicts my son be withdrawn.
2. Formerly, my son Sāma has engaged in noble practice. If this be true, may the poison that afflicts my son be withdrawn.
3. Formerly, my son Sāma has spoken only truth. If this be true, may the poison that afflicts my son be withdrawn.
4. My son Sāma has looked after his parents. If this be true, may the poison that afflicts my son be withdrawn.
5. My son Sāma has shown respect to the elders in the family. If this be true, may the poison that afflicts my son be withdrawn.
6. I love my son Sāma more than my life. If this be true, may the poison that afflicts my son be withdrawn.
7. May Sāma's poison disappear by virtue of the meritorious deeds done by his father and by me.

Then Suvāṇṇasāma, who was lying on one side, turned over to the other side. The father, thinking: "My son is still alive, I will also say words of solemn truth," made an asseveration comprising the same seven points as the mother's. Then the Bodhisatta changed his lying position again.

At that moment, a goddess, Bahusundarī by name, who had been Suvāṇṇa's mother in the past seven existences and who was now staying at Gandhamādana hill, came from the hill to the spot where Suvanṇasāma was lying and made her own asseveration: “I have long been dwelling at Gandhamādana hill in the Himālayas. Throughout my life, there is none whom I love more than Suvanṇasāma. If this is true, may Sāma’s poison vanish. In my abode at Gandhamādana hill, all the trees are scented ones. If this be true, may Sāma’s poison vanish.” While the father, the mother and the goddess were thus lamenting, the handsome and youthful Bodhisatta Suvanṇasāma quickly sat up.

In this story, the words of truth are uttered by his mother, Pārikā, his father, Dukūla and the goddess Bahusandarī in order to have their wish of eradicating the poison inside Suvanṇasāma and helping him recover, were fulfilled and are, therefore, called the truth told so that one’s wish may be fulfilled (icchā-pūraṇa-vacī-sacca).

The Birth Story about the Wise Mariner Suppāraka

The truth told so that one’s wish may be fulfilled (icchā-pūraṇa-vacī-sacca) occurs also in the Birth Story about the Wise Mariner Suppāraka (Suppāraka-jātaka, Ja 463).

The story in brief is this: In days gone by, the Bodhisatta, Suppāraka by name, who was highly learned, was living in the sea-port town of Kurukaccha, or as is sometimes written, Bhārukaccha. He had long worked as the captain of a ship and had become blind through his eyes being in contact with the sea-water, and so he had retired. However, at the request of certain merchants, he took control of a ship sailing out into the sea. After seven days, because of an unseasonal gale, the ship could not hold its course and wandered astray on the sea for four months. It then went beyond such seas as Khuramālisamudra, Aggimālisamudra, Dadhimālisamudra, Kusamālisamudra and Nalamālisamudra, and was about to reach the most terrible sea of Balavāmukhasamudra. At that moment, captain Suppāraka said that whoever came to this sea was not able to retreat but would drown. This made all the merchants cry in fright.

Thinking: “I will save all these people by an asseveration,” the Bodhisatta made a solemn declaration: “Since I came of age, I have never ill-treated even a single person; I have not stolen another’s property, even a blade of grass or a piece of split bamboo; I have not eyed even with an iota of lust another person’s wife; I have not lied; I have not taken any [1638] intoxicating drink, even with the tip of a grass blade. On account of this truthful declaration of mine, may the ship get home safe and sound.” Then the ship that had wandered aimlessly for four months turned back to Kurukaccha as though it were a mighty being and arrived at Kurukaccha port within one day by virtue of the Bodhisatta’s asseveration.

This truth of Suppāraka the wise is also the truth told so that one’s wish may be fulfilled (icchā-pūraṇa-vacī-sacca) as it was made to have his wish of saving the lives of all fulfilled.

The Birth Story about King Sivi

This story is told in the Birth Story about King Sivi (Sivi-jātaka, Ja 499): In the city of Ariṭṭhapura, in the Sivi country, the Bodhisatta, King Sivi, gave away 600,000 pieces daily in generosity. Even then, he was not content and thought that he would like to give away parts of his body. In order to fulfil the king’s desire, Sakka came down in the guise of a blind Brahmin and said to the king: “King, both your eyes can see but mine cannot. If you would give me one of yours, you can see with the remaining one, and I will also see with the eye given by you. So kindly give me one of your eyes.” The king was delighted, for someone had come to him the very moment he was thinking of giving. He summoned his surgeon Sīvika and ordered: “Take out one of my eyes.” The surgeon, ministers and queens all tried to dissuade him, but he stood by his order, and Sīvika could do nothing but take out one of the king’s eyes. Looking at the extracted eye with the one remaining, the king happily expressed his aspiration for Perfect Self-Awakening (Sammā-sambodhi) and handed the gift of his eye over to the Brahmin.

When the Brahmin, who in reality was Sakka, put the eye into his eye-socket it fitted like it was original. King Sivi, seeing this, was so delighted that he asked Sīvika: “Take also my other eye out.” Despite protests from his ministers, the king had his remaining eye taken out and given to the Brahmin. The latter put the king’s eye into the socket of his other eye which became as good as the original. He then gave his blessings and disappeared as though he had returned to his home.

As King Sivi became totally blind and was not fit to rule, he moved to a dwelling place near a pond in the royal gardens, where he reflected on his act of generosity. Sakka then came to him and walked to and fro nearby so that the king would hear his footsteps. When the king heard him, he asked who it was. Sakka replied: “I am Sakka. Ask for any boon you want.” – “I have plenty of wealth, such as gems, gold and silver. I want only death, for both my eyes are gone now,” said the king. “King, you say you want death. Do you really desire to die? Or do you say so only because you are blind?” When the king answered he desired so because he was blind, Sakka said: “King, I am not able to make you see again. You can see only with the power of your truthfulness. Make a solemn declaration of truth.” The king then uttered:

“I adore those many people who came to me for gifts, and I also adore those who actually asked for what they needed. By virtue of this truth, may my eyesight be restored to me.”

No sooner had he said so than the first eye appeared in him. Then again, he made another declaration of truth:

“When the blind Brahmin came to me for my eye, I gave him both of mine. In so doing, my heart was full of joy. By virtue of this truth, may the other eye be restored to me.”

Accordingly, he regained his second eye. These two eyes were not the ones which were with him at his birth, neither were they divine eyes. In fact, they were the eyes which appeared by the power of his verbal perfection of truthfulness. This truth of King Sivi was also the truth told so that one’s wish may be fulfilled as it was spoken to have the wish for the restoration of his eyesight fulfilled.

The Birth Story about the Fish

In the Birth Story about the Fish (Maccha-jātaka, Ja 34), the Bodhisatta, when reborn as a fish, made an asseveration because the water in the pond had dried up as a result of a draught, and the fish in it were eaten by crows. He declared solemnly: “Although I was born as a fish whose species survives by living upon one another, I have never eaten even a fish of the size of a rice-grain. By virtue of this truth, may there be a great [1639] thunderous downpour.” No sooner had he declared this than there occurred a heavy rain.

The Birth Story about the Young Quail

Again, in the Birth Story about the Young Quail (Vaṭṭaka-jātaka, Ja 35) the Bodhisatta was born into a quail family. When he was still unable to fly or walk, there broke out a great forest fire and both of his parents fled. Thinking: “In this world there are such things as the virtues of pure morality, truthfulness and compassion. I have no other recourse to make but an oath of truth,” he uttered:

“I have wings, but I cannot fly. I have legs, but I cannot walk. My parents have fled. O forest fire, please pass me by.”

The forest fire then went back a distance of sixteen acres and became extinct after leaving the young quail unharmed.

In this connection, there is something that calls for clarification. In the aforesaid Suvaṇṇasāma story and others, asseverations were based on meritoriousness, and it is, therefore, appropriate that the respective wishes were fulfilled. But the young quail’s asseveration was not so based. What he said was simply: “I have wings, yet I cannot fly; I have legs, yet I cannot walk. My parents have fled.” His asseveration is in fact based on what is not meritorious. Why then had his wish been fulfilled?

The basis of an asseveration is truthfulness whether it is meritorious or not. Even if a speech is connected with meritoriousness but not spoken truthfully, it is not a truth; it has no power nor does it bear fruits. Truthfulness, which is a truthful speech alone, has power and bears fruits.

Being truthful, the Bodhisatta’s speech amounted to a truth and achieved what was desired. Though it was not a speech of meritoriousness, it was not demeritorious either. Even if a speech is connected with demeritoriousness, but spoken truthfully, it amounts to a truth and achieves what is desired.

The Birth Story about the Ascetic Kaṇha Dīpāyana

This is known from the Birth Story about the Ascetic Kaṇha Dīpāyana (Kaṇha-dīpāyana-jātaka, Ja 444). Once, the Bodhisatta Dīpāyana, together with a friend, after giving away their wealth, became ascetics in the Himālayas. He later came to be known as Kaṇha Dīpāyana. One day, Kaṇha Dīpāyana was visited by the householder Maṇḍavya, the supporter of his dwelling place, his wife and son Yaññadatta. While the parents were engaged in a conversation with their teacher, Yaññadatta was playing with a top at the end of a walk. The top rolled into the hole of a mound, which was the abode of a snake. When the boy put his hand into the mound to retrieve his toy, he was bitten by the snake and fell down suddenly, being overcome by the snake’s poison.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2817

Learning what had happened to their son they brought him and placed him at the feet of Kaṇha Dīpāyana. When the parents requested him to cure their son of snake bite, he said: “I do not know any remedy for snake bite. But I will try to cure him by a declaration of an oath.” Placing his hand on the boy’s head, he uttered: “Being tired of human society, I became an ascetic. But I could live the happy life of an ascetic only for seven days. Since my eighth day as an ascetic, I have not been happy up till now for 50 years. I have reluctantly struggled along only with self-restraint. By the power of this truthful saying, may the poison vanish so that the boy survives.” Then the poison drained away from the boy’s chest and seeped into the earth.

Yaññadatta opened his eyes; seeing his parents, he called out just once: “Mother, Father,” and went to sleep again writhing. The ascetic said to the father: “I have done my part. You, too, should do yours.” Then the father said: “I have never been pleased whenever ascetics and Brahmins visited me. But I have not let this be known to anybody else. Instead, I have hidden my feeling. When I give alms, I do it reluctantly. By this truthful saying may the poison vanish so that my little son, Yaññadatta, survives.” The poison remaining above the waist drained away into the earth.

The boy sat up, but he still could not rise. When the father asked the mother to follow suit, she said: “I have something to declare as an oath. But I dare not do it in your presence.” When the father insisted, she obliged, saying: “I hate the snake that has bitten my son. I hate the boy’s father as much as I hate the snake. By this truthful saying may the [1640] poison vanish so that my son survives.” Then all the poison drained away into the earth and Yaññadatta stood up and played again with his top.

The basis of the respective asseverations of the ascetic teacher and his two devotees was an unwholesome matter which each had long kept to themselves. Now, he or she had revealed it boldly saying what was true. As this was truthfulness their wish was completely fulfilled by its power.

In this connection, it may be asked: “If the truth, whether it is based on a wholesome or unwholesome matter, was fruitful, as has been mentioned, can it be similarly efficacious nowadays?”

The answer is: Of the three kinds of truthfulness, avoidance of telling lies or speaking truthfully in every matter (musā-viramaṇa-sacca) is something that is always spoken by the virtuous. The ancient persons of virtue who had made asseverations, as mentioned in the texts, had lips which were the domain of truthfulness where the avoidance of telling lies dwelt forever. Such a domain was so pure and noble that truthfulness which was born in it was wish-fulfilling. In ancient times, when truthfulness prospered and shone forth, an evil thing such as falsehood would quickly result in an undesirable punishment; so also truthfulness would result in a desirable reward.

More Birth Stories

Falsehood would quickly bring about punishment in those days, as is known from the Birth Story about the King of Cetiya (Cetiya-jātaka, Ja 422).

According to this story, King Cetiya knowingly lied, saying one of the two candidates for the post of royal chaplain was senior and the other junior, although the reverse was true; in consequence, he was swallowed up by the earth.

But nowadays, adhering to the maxim: “No lie, no rhetoric,” people mostly tell lies. Thus, the evil domain of falsehood has been created and truthfulness born in this domain cannot produce beneficial results in a visible manner. Similarly, consequences of falsehood are not conspicuous either.

Other stories which contain fruitful asseverations are as follows:

The Birth Story about Cane Juice (Naḷa-pāna-jātaka, Ja 20) tells of the reeds which became hollow throughout because of the truthfulness shown by the Bodhisatta, the monkey king.

The Birth Story about Queen Sambulā (Sambula-jātaka, Ja 519) tells of the complete cure of Prince Soththisena’s leprosy because of the truthful words spoken by crown Princess Sambulā.

The Birth Story about the Wise Mūgapakkha (Mūga-pakkha-jātaka, Ja 538) tells of the birth of the Bodhisatta, Prince Temiya, to the Chief Queen Candā Devī when she made an oath of truth after her observance of morality (sīla).

The Birth Story about King Mahā Janaka (Mahā-janaka-jātaka, Ja 539) tells of the escape of the Crown Prince Polajanaka from his bondage of iron chains and from prison because of his words of truth.

The Birth Story about the Wood Gatherer (Kaṭṭha-hāri-jātaka, Ja 7) tells of an asseveration made by a mother, a chopper of fuel wood. In order to convince the king that he was the father of her child, she threw the child into the sky taking an oath of truth, by which the boy remained sitting cross-legged in the sky.

The Long Birth Story about the Peacock (Mahā-mora-jātaka, Ja 491) tells of the escape of birds from their respective cages because of an oath of truth declared by a Paccekabuddha, who, formerly as a hunter, had caught the Bodhisatta, the peacock king, in a square. On hearing the Dhamma talk of the Bodhisatta, he gained Awakening and became a Paccekabuddha. As advised by the Bodhisatta, he made an asseveration thus: “I am now liberated from the bondage of defilements. May all the birds that I have kept in cages at home go free the way I do.” How powerful the asseveration is in these stories should be understood.

Truthfulness during the Buddha’s Time

Once during the Buddha’s time, there was a threefold misfortune of disease, demons and famine in the city of Vesālī. The Buddha went there accompanied by monastics and taught [1641] Ven. Ānanda how to recite the verses of oath. Ven. Ānanda spent the whole night walking within the three walls of the city, chanting the verses by virtue of which all three misfortunes vanished. This story is mentioned in detail in the commentary of the Discourse about the Treasures (Ratana-sutta, Khp 6, Snp 2:1). The verses of oath, comprising a number of verses, forms a protection (paritta) discourse called the Discourse about the Treasures. It begins with an attribute of a Buddha: “In the worlds of Devas, humans, Nāgas and Garuḷas, there exist various treasurers, but none is comparable to the treasures of the Buddha. By virtue of this truth, may all beings be free of the threefold misfortune and be happy.” In the Discourse about the Treasures, there are twelve verses of asseveration which reveal the various attributes of the Three Treasures, i.e., the Buddha, Dhamma and Saṅgha, and together with the three verses ascribed to Sakka, there are fifteen verses of asseveration. This discourse was recorded in the Buddhist Councils.

The Discourse concerning Aṅgulimāla (Aṅgulimāla-sutta, MN 86) contains another story that also took place in the lifetime of the Buddha. While the Buddha was sojourning at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvathī, Ven. Aṅgulimāla told the Buddha about a woman in confinement who had difficulty in delivering a baby. Under instructions from the Buddha, Ven. Aṅgulimāla went to the woman to help her by means of an oath of truth. “Since the day I became a noble one,” declared Ven. Aṅgulimāla, “I have never intentionally taken the life of a sentient being. By virtue of this truth may the mother and the son be well.” The mother then gave birth to her son without any more trouble and both were well.

In this way, in the lifetime of the Buddha, too, solemn declarations of truth were efficacious and fruitful.

Truthfulness in Śrī Laṅkā

When Buddhism had spread to Śrī Laṅkā after the Parinibbāna of the Buddha, Ven. Mahā Mitta's mother was suffering from breast cancer. The mother sent her daughter, a nun, to Ven. Mahā Mitta for some medicine. "I know nothing of normal drugs," said Ven. Mahā Mitta, "I will tell you a certain form of medicine: 'Since the moment of my ordination, I have never looked at a woman with a lustful eye. Because of this truthful declaration, may my mother become well again.' When you get back to my mother, run your fingers over her body while repeating what I have just said." The sister went back to the ailing mother and carried out his instructions. No sooner had she done so than the mother's cancerous affliction dissolved like foam. So says the chapter giving the Exposition of Morality (Sīla-niddesa) in the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga, Vism 1).

A similar story is told in the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA) PTS 103) commentary. While explaining the word sampatta-virati, "abstinence by custom," it says that a woman was suffering from a certain disease. Being told by the physician that hare's meat was needed for a cure, the older brother sent the younger one, Jaggana, to a farm to look for a hare. On seeing Jaggana, a hare ran away in fright and was caught in a tangle of creepers. It then screamed. Jaggana rushed there and seized the hare. But he thought: "It is not justified to kill this little creature just to save my mother's life," and set the hare free and went home. "Have you got one?" asked the older brother. When Jaggana told his brother what he had done, the latter scolded him vehemently. Then Jaggana approached his mother and while standing by her, he uttered: "Since my birth, I have never known any instance of the intentional killing of a creature by me. By virtue of this truth, may my mother become well and happy." At that very moment, the mother became well and happy again.

In this way, it should be noted that the truth told so that one's wish may be fulfilled (icchā-pūraṇa-sacca) was individually performed also after the Parinibbāna of the Buddha. [1642]

3. The Truth Told so That Telling Lies May Be Avoided

Stories related to the truth told so that telling lies may be avoided (musā-viramaṇa-sacca) are known from the Birth Story about the Wise Vidhura (Vidhura-jātaka, Ja 546) and other Birth Stories. The following is a summary of the long narration of the Vidhura story.

The Birth Story about the Wise Vidhura

When King Korabya and Puṇṇaka the Yakkha were playing a game of dice, they agreed to bet as follows: Should the king lose, Puṇṇaka would take anything from the king, except the king's person, the Chief Queen, and the white parasol. Should Puṇṇaka lose, on the other hand, the king would take from him the Manomaya Gem and the thoroughbred horse. The king lost the contest and Puṇṇaka asked: "I have won, O king, give me the stakes as agreed."

As it was a fact that the king had lost, he could not refuse, but allowed Puṇṇaka to take anything he wanted. Puṇṇaka said he would take Vidhura the minister. Then the king pleaded: "The minister is my person. He is also my refuge. Therefore, he should not be compared with other treasures of mine, such as gold, silver, etc. He should be compared only with my life. Thus, I cannot surrender him."

Then Puṇṇaka said: "We shall not get anywhere if we are arguing whether he belongs to you or not. Let us go to him and abide by his decision." The king agreed, and they went to the minister, whom Puṇṇaka asked: "Minister, as the minister of the Kurus, you are praised even by Devas for standing by righteousness. Is it true? Are you King Korabya's servant? Are you a relative of the king's and of equal rank? Or are you a relative of the king's but of higher rank? Is your name Vidhura meaningful (anvattha) or without meaning (rūlhi)?"

The last question means to say like this: In this world, there are two kinds of names. The first is a name the meaning of which does not agree with what it represents (rūlhi); instead, it is a name given at random. The other is a name the meaning of which agrees with what it represents (anvattha). For example, if some ugly person is named Pretty Boy, it is just a name given at random because the name does not suit the boy. If some handsome person is named Pretty Boy, it is a name the meaning of which agrees with what it represents because it goes well with the appearance.

When Puṇṇaka asked whether Vidhura’s name was a name without meaning or a name the meaning of which agrees with what it represents, he wanted to verify whether the minister was righteous or not, for the name Vidhura means unequalled, and signifies a virtuous person who eradicates evils. Should the minister not abide by righteousness, his name would then be a name given at random (rūlhi). Should he abide by righteousness, his name would then be a name in harmony with his true nature (anvattha).

Then the minister thought to himself: “I can say that I am a relative of the king, I am of higher rank or I am not at all related to the king. But in this world there is no refuge like truthfulness. I should speak out what is true.” So he said: “Friend, there are four kinds of servitude in the world:

1. The servitude of one born of a female slave.
2. The servitude of one bought by money.
3. The servitude of one who serves voluntarily.
4. The servitude of a prisoner of war.

Of these four servitudes, I am a servant who comes to serve the king voluntarily.” So the minister answered truthfully. Such an answer given truthfully, without deceit, was a speech of truth but not a truth told so that one will be believed by others (sadda-hāpana-sacca) because the speech was made not to convince others; nor was it a truth told so that one’s wish may be fulfilled (icchā-pūraṇa-sacca) because it was made not to get one’s wish fulfilled. It was made just to avoid telling lies and therefore was avoidance of telling lies (musā-viramaṇa-sacca) only.

The Birth Story about the Wise Suvāṇṇasāma

Similarly, in the Birth Story about the Wise Suvāṇṇasāma (Suvāṇṇasāma-jātaka, Ja 540), when King Pīḷiyakkha asked Suvāṇṇasāma: “What is your clan? Whose son are you? Tell me the clan to which you and your father belong.” He would have believed it if Suvāṇṇasāma were to say: “I am a Deva,” “a Nāga,” “a Kinnara,” “of a royal family” or if he were to give any other answer. But he thought he should say nothing but the truth; so he said truthfully: “I am a fisherman’s son.” Suvāṇṇasāma’s [1643] speech was like Vidhura’s, it was not to make others believe nor was it to get his wish fulfilled. In fact, it was a speech made to avoid falsehood (musā-viramaṇa-sacca).

The Birth Story about Prince Bhūridatta

In the Birth Story about Prince Bhūridatta (Bhūridatta-jātaka, Ja 543) also, when the Brahmin Nesāda approached the Bodhisatta, a Nāga who was observing the precepts, and asked him: “Who are you? Are you a powerful god? Or are you a mighty Nāga?” – “This man will believe me,” thought the Nāga King, and thinking: “I could say I am a divine being, but I ought to tell him the truth,” he told him that he was a powerful Nāga. This speech of the Nāga King, like Vidhura’s, was made not to make others believe, nor was it to have one’s wish fulfilled. But it was made to avoid falsehood and to reveal the truth (musā-viramaṇa-sacca).

What constitutes the sixth of the ten perfections is this avoidance of falsehood (musā-viramaṇa-sacca). Bodhisattas of old always made it a point to cultivate this kind of speech which is an avoidance of falsehood, so they fulfilled the perfection of truthfulness by speaking truthfully, existence after existence. If they kept silent to avoid having to tell lies and to observe truthfulness, it was not pure truth (vacī-sacca) because there was no speech at all. It was only avoidance of falsehood (virati-sacca).

Only when circumstances demand to convince others did Bodhisattas use truth of the first kind, the truth told so that one will be believed by others (sadda-hāpana-sacca); otherwise they did not. Similarly, only when they were required to get their wish fulfilled, did they make use of the truth of the second kind, the truth told so that one’s wish may be fulfilled (icchā-pūraṇa-sacca). As regards the third kind, the truth told so that telling lies may be avoided (musā-viramaṇa-sacca), they always resorted to it on all occasions. Following their examples, those who are virtuous should speak truth that avoids falsehood (musā-viramaṇa-sacca) and make efforts to cultivate it.

Two More Kinds of Truth

The aforesaid truths may be classified under two headings only, namely:

1. Truth that accomplishes something the moment one speaks (vacī-bheda-siddhi-sacca).
2. Truth that entails a follow-up after one has spoken (pacchānurakkhaṇa-sacca).

As has been mentioned before, the truth told so that one will be believed by others of the Birth Story about the Lotus Stalks; the truth told so that one's wish may be fulfilled of the Wise Suvanṇasāma (Ja 540), the Wise Mariner Suppāraka (Ja 463), King Sivi (Ja 499), the Fish (Ja 34), the Young Quail (Ja 35), Kaṇhadīpāyana (Ja 444), Naḷapāna (Ja 20), Sambulā (Ja 519), Temiya (Ja 538), Janaka (Ja 539), Kaṭṭhavāhana (Ja 7) and the Peacock (Ja 491) and the truth told so that telling lies may be avoided by Vidhura (Ja 545), Suvanṇasāma (Ja 540) and Bhūridatta (Ja 543), produced results as soon as they were individually spoken out. There was nothing more to be performed to achieve results. Therefore, such truths are to be known as truth that accomplishes something the moment one speaks (vacī-bheda-siddhi-sacca).

But the truthfulness shown by King Sutasoma to Porisāda in the above-mentioned the Birth Story about Mahā Sutasoma (Ja 537) was different. It was a truth told so that one will be believed by others (sadda-hāpana-sacca), spoken to convince Porisāda that he would definitely return to him. This promise would be fulfilled when the king returned to the cannibal, and only then would his truthfulness be established. For this, he had to make special arrangements to effect his return to the Bodhisatta. This truthfulness of King Sutasoma was therefore of the truth that entails a follow-up after one has spoken (pacchānurakkhaṇa-sacca).

In the same way, the truthfulness practised by King Jayaddisa in the Birth Story about Prince Jayaddisa (Jayaddisa-jātaka, Ja 513) and that practised by Prince Rāma in the Birth Story about Rāma's Father, King Dasaratha (Dasaratha-jātaka, Ja 461) are both truths that entail a follow-up after one has spoken (pacchānurakkhaṇa-sacca).

The Birth Story about Prince Jayaddisa

With reference to King Jayaddisa's truthfulness, here is the story in brief (Jayaddisa-jātaka, Ja 513). While King Jayaddisa of the city of Uttara Pañcāla, in the kingdom of Kapila, was going on a hunting spree, on the way, he met the Brahmin Nanda, who had come back from Takkasilā and who wished to deliver a discourse. The king promised to hear the discourse from him on his return and went to the forest.

On arrival in the forest, the king and his ministers divided the hunting ground among themselves, each one had his own allocated area to catch deer. But one escaped through the king's location, and the king had to pursue it with all his might. After a long pursuit, he [1644] managed to catch the deer; he cut it into two halves and carried them, hanging from a pole on his shoulder. Having taken a rest for a short while under a banyan tree, he stood up to continue his journey. At that moment, the Yakkha-like human Porisāda, who was dwelling at the banyan tree, prevented him from going, he said: "You have now become my prey. You must not go."

The Yakkha-like human was not a real Yakkha. He was, in fact, the king's older brother, who, while an infant was caught by a Yakkhinī. But she had no heart to eat the baby and brought him up as her own son. So he had a Yakkha's mental and physical behaviour. When his foster mother, the Yakkhinī, died, he was left alone and lived like a Yakkha.

Then King Jayaddisa said: "I have an appointment with a Brahmin who has come back from Takkasilā. I have promised him to hear his discourse. Let me go and hear it, after which I will come back and be true to my word." The Yakkha-like human set him free, readily accepting the king's assurance.

The Yakkha-like human and the king were brothers in reality. Because of their blood relationship, which was not realized by either of them, the former had some compassion for the latter and let him go.

The king went to hear the Brahmin's discourse and was about to return to the Yakkha-like human. At that moment, his son, Prince Alīnasattu, the Bodhisatta, pleaded with the king that he should go on behalf of his father. As the son insisted, the father allowed him to go. The king's word: "I will come back," had to be kept and made true after it had been spoken; so it was a truth that entails a follow-up after one has spoken (pacchānurakkhaṇa-sacca).

The Birth Story about Rāma's Father, King Dasaratha

The Birth Story about Rāma's Father, King Dasaratha (Dasaratha-jātaka, Ja 461), in brief: After giving birth to an older son, Rāma, the younger son, Lakkhaṇa and the daughter, Sitā Devī, King Dasaratha's Chief Queen passed away. The king took a new queen, of whom Prince Bhārata was born. The new queen repeatedly pressed the king to hand over the throne to her own son Bhārata. The king summoned his two senior sons and said: "I am worried about you, you might be in danger because of the new queen and her son Bhārata. The astrologers have told me that I would live twelve more years. So you should stay in a forest for twelve years after which you should come back and take over the kingship.”

Then Prince Rāma promised his father that he would obey him, and the two brothers left the city. They were joined by their sister, as she refused to be separated from them. In spite of the astrologers’ prediction, the king died early, after only nine years, because of his worries about his children. Then the ministers, who did not want to have Bhārata as their king, went after the royal children. They told them of the king’s death and requested them to return to the city and rule over the people. But Prince Rāma said: “I have promised my father to return only after twelve years as my father had ordered. If I return now, I will not be keeping my promise to my father. I do not want to break my word. Therefore, take my brother, Prince Lakkhaṇa and my sister, Sitā Devī, and make them Crown Prince and Crown Princess, and you ministers should rule the country yourselves.” Here, Prince Rāma had to wait for the end of the time limit so that what he had agreed upon with his father would be substantiated. This too was truth that entails a follow-up after one has spoken (pacchānurakkhaṇa-sacca).

Truth concerning Time

In order to make an easy distinction between truth that accomplishes something the moment one speaks (vacī-bheda-siddhi-sacca) and truth that entails a follow-up after one has spoken (pacchānurakkhaṇa-sacca), there are four kinds of truth according to a brief classification:

1. Truth concerning the past only.
2. Truth concerning the past and the present.
3. Truth concerning the future only.
4. Truth concerning no particular time.

Of these four, the one concerning the future is truth that entails a follow-up after one has spoken, and the remaining three are truth that accomplishes something the moment one speaks.

Of the truths in the Birth Story about the Wise Suvāṇṇasāma (Suvaṇṇasāma-jātaka, Ja 540), the collection of truths uttered by the Bodhisatta’s parents concerned the past, for they said: “Sāma had formerly practised Dhamma; he used to cultivate only noble practices; he used to speak only the truth; he had looked after his parents; he had shown respect to the elders.”

The truth uttered by his parents that: “We love Suvanṇasāma more than our lives and the truth uttered by Queen Bahusundarī that: “There is no one whom I love more than [1645] Sāma,” were truths which concern no particular time.

The collection of truths told so that one’s wish may be fulfilled (icchā-pūraṇa-sacca) in the Wise Mariner Suppāraka (Ja 463) and King Sivi (Ja 499) Birth Stories concerned the past. Similarly, that contained in Kaṇhadīpāyana (Ja 444) and Naḷapāna (Ja 20) Birth Stories also concerned the past.

In the Young Quail (Ja 35) Birth Story, the utterance, “I have wings, but I cannot fly; I have legs, but I cannot walk,” concerned both the past and the present.

The truth saying: “There is none whom I love more than you,” in the Sambulā (Ja 519) and that of the Chief Queen, Candā Devī, in the Birth Story about the Wise Temiya (Temiya-jātaka, Ja 538) concerned no particular time.

In this way, the relationship between the truths and their respective times referred to may be considered and noted.

The Supreme Perfection of Truthfulness

With reference to the perfection of truthfulness, the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA) commentary and the commentary on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) explain that King Mahā Sutasoma’s perfection of truthfulness was the supreme perfection because, in order to keep his word true, the king went back to Porisāda as promised at the risk of his own life. In this case, the vow was made in the presence of Porisāda, but as it was a mere utterance, its purpose had not yet been fulfilled; to fulfil it, the vow still remained to be kept. As he had promised: “I will come back,” he returned even after he had been back in the city of Indapattha. At first, when he promised: “I will come back,” his sacrifice of life did not appear imminent. It became so only when he returned to Porisāda from Indapattha. Therefore, in the commentaries, he is mentioned as “the king who protected his truthfulness, sacrificing his life (jīvitam cajitvā saccam anurakkhantassa),” but not as “the king who made an oath at the risk of his life (jīvitam cajitvā saccam bhaṇantassa).”

Reflections on the Two Kinds of Truth

In this connection, the truthfulness of King Mahā Sutasoma and that of minister Vidhura are worthy of a comparative study. The minister's truthfulness was his truthful saying: "I am a servant," as is told in vs. 102 of the Birth Story about the Wise Vidhura (Vidhura-jātaka, Ja 546). As soon as he said so, his truthfulness was accomplished. But, when he said that he had nothing to worry about, he could not die just being a servant. Therefore, one might say that Vidhura's truthfulness was inferior to Sutasoma's.

However, it may be considered that Vidhura was prepared to sacrifice his life, thinking to himself: "That young man may like to do away with me after taking me away. If he does so, I will accept death." For, as he was wise, he must have pondered like this: "This young man asked for me, but did not want to honour me. If he had a desire to honour me, he would have openly told me his purpose and invited me for the same, but he did not invite me. He won possession of me by gambling and would not set me free." Besides, though he was a young man, he was a Yakkha by birth. Seeing his behaviour, the minister must have noticed that he was a tough, wild person. Another thing that should be taken into consideration is this: When Vidhura had, by way of farewell, exhorted the king and his family members and said: "I have done my job," the young Yakkha, Puṇṇaka, replied (vs 196): "Do not be afraid. Firmly hold on to the tail of my horse. This will be the last time for you to see the world while you are living." Vidhura boldly retorted: "I have done no evil that would lead to states of suffering. Why should I be afraid?" From this word of the minister, it is clear he had decided to sacrifice his life.

All this points to the fact that Vidhura's truthfulness contained some risk to life and was thus not inferior to Sutasoma's; it should be concluded that it was, if not superior, it was at least of the same class as that of Sutasoma.

The unique feature of this perfection of truthfulness in contrast to the previous ones is that it possesses the power to have one's desire fulfilled because of the truth uttered. In the Birth Story about Mahā Sutasoma (Mahā-sutasoma-jātaka, Ja 537, vs 62) it is also said:

"Of all the tastes which prevail on this earth, the [1646] taste of truth is the sweetest."

Therefore, one should exert great efforts in order to enjoy the delicious taste of truth.

8. The Perfection of Resolution

The Pāli word adhiṭṭhāna is usually translated as “resolution.”<sup>436</sup> If one fulfils resolution as a perfection one has to establish it firmly and steadfastly in one’s mind. That was why, when the Bodhisatta Sumedha reflected on the perfection of resolution (adhiṭṭhāna-pāramī), he likened it to a rocky mountain, which is unshaken by strong winds but remains firmly rooted at its own place.

From this comparison, it is clear that resolution (adhiṭṭhāna) means bearing in mind without wavering at all, as regards to what one is determined to do. Therefore, if one intends to attain the knowledge of the paths and fruitions or omniscience, i.e., if one is determined to become a Buddha, one’s determination to practise for achieving them must be borne in mind as firmly as a rocky mountain.

Resolution has thus been likened to an unshaken mountain, and there are various kinds of resolution as described in the texts.

Resolution concerning the Observance Day

The Chapter about the Observance Day (Uposathakkhandhaka, Vin Mv 2) mentions three kinds of Observance Day:

1. The Saṅgha observance (Saṅgha-uposatha).
2. The group observance (gaṇa-uposatha).
3. The individual observance (puggala-uposatha).

1. The Saṅgha observance is the one that is observed at the meeting of a minimum of four monastics inside a monastic boundary hall (sīma) on the full moon and new-moon days. There, the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) are recited by one monastic to whom others listen respectfully. Such an observance is also called an Observance Day (Uposatha) with a summary recitation of the text of the disciplinary rules (suttuddesa-uposatha).

---

<sup>436</sup> Then the author goes on to explain the Myanmar word, which is a translation, not only of adhiṭṭhāna but also of samādāna used in observing precepts. As the author’s explanation, though elaborate, is chiefly concerned with the Myanmar word, we left it out from our translation.

2. If there are only two or three monastics, they observe the group observance (gaṇa-uposatha) because the word Saṅgha is used only for a meeting of at least four monastics; when there are only two or three monastics, the word (gaṇa) is used. If the number of monastics is three in a group observance, a motion is put first, and if it is two, no motion is needed. Then each of the monastics declares in Pāḷi that he is free from any offences. Therefore, it is also known as an observance meeting where monastics declare their purity (pārisuddhi-uposatha).

3. If there is only one monastic, he observes an individual observance (puggala-uposatha). But before doing so, he should wait for other monastics to join him, provided there is still time. When the time has passed without other monastics arriving, he is to hold the Observance Day (Uposatha) alone. The Buddha has enjoined that he is to resolve: “Today is my Observance Day (ajja me uposatho paṇṇaraso adhiṭṭhāmi).” This means that he is mindful of this day constantly. Such an observance is known as an observance kept firmly in one’s mind (adhiṭṭhāna-uposatha). This is the resolution concerning the Observance Day.

Resolution concerning the Robe

Monastics are required to perform a resolution (adhiṭṭhāna) or an assignation of ownership (vikappana) concerning the robe within ten days after its acquisition. If the robe is kept more than ten days without performing either, it is to be discarded according to the Vinaya. The monastic concerned also commits thereby a confession (pācittiya) offence; therefore, within ten days of its acquisition, he must resolve, saying: “I undertake to put on this robe.” Then the robe is not to be discarded, and he does not commit the offence. Resolution concerning the robe means making up one’s mind firmly to use the robe either as a lower garment, an upper garment, an outer garment or for general use (see Vin Np 1, PTS 3.195).

Resolution concerning the Bowl

Similarly, when a monastic acquires a bowl, he should resolve within ten days of its acquisition, saying: “I undertake to use this bowl.” If he does not do so in ten days, he has to discard it as required by the Vinaya. He also commits a confession (pācittiya) offence. Resolution [1647] concerning the bowl means determining firmly that “this receptacle is my bowl.”

Resolution (adhiṭṭhāna) in these three cases is used as a technical term belonging to the Vinaya. It has nothing to do with the following three cases.

Resolution concerning Absorption

In the case of absorption (jhāna), when, for instance, the first absorption has been attained, one should cultivate and develop it in the five ways of mastery (vasī-bhāva), so it is said in the First Exposition of the Meditation Device (Pathavī-kasiṇa-nidessa) and in other places in the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga). When the first absorption has been attained, one is to continue practising it until one gains complete mastery of the absorption in all five ways.

1. Reflecting (āvajjana).
2. Entering (samāpajjana).
3. Resolution (adhiṭṭhāna).
4. Rising (vuṭṭhāna).
5. Reviewing (paccavekkhaṇā).

1. The first kind is reflection (āvajjana), that is, a reflection as to what factors are contained in his first absorption and as to which factor is of what character. At the beginning, he does not discern them easily. There may be a delay, for he is not yet skilled in reflecting. As he gains experience, he discerns them more easily. Then, he is said to be endowed with mastery of reflection.

2. The second kind is entering (samāpajjana) absorption, consciousness being absorbed into the stream of one's consciousness, that is, absorption consciousness continuously arising in the stream of one's consciousness. After mastering reflection, he has to gain mastery of absorption. He can do so by repeatedly developing the absorption he has attained, just as by repeatedly reciting, one can master the literary piece that one has learnt by heart. If he tries for absorption before attainment of such mastery, absorption consciousness does not arise easily in the stream of one's consciousness. This becomes easier only after mastering the development of absorption. Then he is said to be endowed with mastery of absorption.

3. The third kind is resolution (adhiṭṭhāna), determining as to how long he wants to remain in absorption (jhāna). If he tries to determine the duration of absorption before mastery of resolution, absorption consciousness may occur for either longer or shorter periods than that of his determination. Suppose he resolves: “Let absorption consciousness constitute my stream of consciousness for one hour,” the absorption attainment may break off before or after one hour. This is because he is not yet skilled in making a resolution. Once he is skilful enough, he can remain in absorption for the exact length of the time he has resolved. Then he is said to be endowed with mastery of resolution.

4. The fourth kind is rising (vuṭṭhāna) from absorption (jhāna). Rising from absorption means change of absorption consciousness to the life-continuum (bhavaṅga-citta). He then has mastery of rising from absorption at the exact time of his determination (vuṭṭhāna-vasī-bhāva).

5. The fifth kind is reviewing (paccavekkhaṇā), recollecting all the factors contained in the absorption (jhāna). In thus recollecting, as in reflecting (āvajjana), they do not become manifest to him easily for lack of mastery on his part. Only when he gains mastery, they become manifest more easily. Reflection (āvajjana) is a stage in the process of reflection (paccavekkhaṇā-vīthi), and reviewing (paccavekkhaṇā) is the stage that immediately follows the stage of reflection. If he has mastered reflection, he has mastered reviewing as well. Therefore, he who is endowed with mastery of reflection is endowed with mastery of reviewing; so it is stated in the texts. Among the five kinds of mastery, what we are concerned with here is mastery of resolution (adhiṭṭhāna-vasī-bhāva).

Ten Kinds of Supernormal Power

The Exposition of the Kinds of Psychic Powers (Iddhi-vidha-niddesa) in the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga, Vism 12) enumerates ten kinds of supernormal power (iddhi).

1. The power of resolution (adhiṭṭhāna-iddhi).
2. The power concerning transformation (vikubbana-iddhi).
3. The power concerning creation (mano-maya-iddhi).
4. The power concerning imminent supermundane wisdom (ñāṇa-vipphāra-iddhi).
5. The power concerning pervasion of concentration (samādhi-vipphāra-iddhi).

6. The power of the noble ones (ariya-iddhi).
7. The power arising from deeds and results (kamma-vipākajā-iddhi).
8. The power arising from merit (puññavanta-iddhi).
9. The power arising from magicians (vijjā-maya-iddhi). [1648]
10. The power that accrues from various accomplishments (sammā-payoga-iddhi).

1. Power concerning resolution (adhiṭṭhāna-iddhi); when, for instance, one resolves: “Let there be 100 or 1,000 copies of myself,” then the copies appear miraculously, and their number is exactly what one has determined. It is the power to project copies of oneself appearing. The copies may or may not be in the same posture.

2. Power concerning transformation of oneself into the form of a Nāga or of a Garuḷa (vikubbana-iddhi); here, vi- means “various” and kubbana “making.” It is the power to make oneself assume various forms as one wishes.

3. Power concerning the creation of a mind-made image (mano-maya-iddhi), that is, to create a miniature copy of oneself inside one’s own body. Mano-maya means “mind-made.” It is neither the projection of copies as in the case of power concerning resolution (adhiṭṭhāna-iddhi) nor the transformation of one’s form as in the case of the power concerning transformation of oneself into the form of a Nāga or of a Garuḷa (vikubbana-iddhi). It is the power to create a miniature copy of oneself inside one’s own body.

4. Power concerning miraculous phenomena due to the influence of imminent supermundane wisdom (ñāṇa-vipphāra-iddhi). This power can be understood from the stories of Ven. Bākula and others.

Ven. Bākula

The story of Bākula occurs in the commentary on the Great Disciples in the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (AA 1.14.38; PTS 1.304, see also ch. 43.33). The following, in brief, is an extract from the same story.

Bākula was the son of a wealthy man of Kosambī. On the day his birth was celebrated, the infant was taken to the River Yamunā for a ceremonial bath, but he was swallowed by a fish. The fish, feeling very hot in the stomach, swam away. On its arrival at Bārāṇasī, a certain fisherman caught it and hawked it in the city. The wife of a wealthy man of Bārāṇasī bought the fish, and when its stomach was cut open, a beautiful baby was found inside the fish. Since she had no child of her own and was longing for one, she was extremely delighted, saying to herself: “This is my very own.”

When the strange news reached the parents at Kosambī, they hurried to Bārāṇasī to claim their son. But the lady of Bārāṇasī refused to give him back, saying: “The baby came to us because we deserve him. We cannot return him to you.” When they went to court to settle the dispute, the judges gave their verdict that the baby belonged equally to both pairs of parents. In this way, the baby had two mothers and two fathers, on account of which he was named Bākula, bā = two, kula = family, hence a boy of two families.

It was a miracle that the boy was not harmed though he was swallowed by a fish. The miracle was due to the power of the knowledge of the path of a Arahat (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) which was certainly to be attained by Bākula in that very existence, or, maybe it was due to the influence of the glorious knowledge of the perfections (pāramī-ñāṇa) that was inherent in the boy and that would enable him to attain without fail the knowledge of the path of a Arahat in that very life. Such power is said to be the power concerning miraculous phenomena due to the influence of imminent supermundane wisdom (ñāṇa-vipphāra-iddhi).

Novice Saṅkicca

Novice Saṅkicca was conceived by the daughter of a householder of Sāvattthī. The mother died when she was about to give birth to the baby. While her body was being cremated, it was pierced with iron spikes so that it might burn better. A spike hurt the baby’s eye, and the baby cried. Knowing that the baby was still alive, people took the body down from the funeral pyre, cut open the stomach and took out the baby. The baby grew up in due course and at the age of seven became an Arahat.

The boy’s miraculous escape from death was also attributed to the power of the knowledge of the path of an Arahat (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa), or it was attributed to the influence of the power of the boy’s inherent knowledge of the perfections (pāramī-ñāṇa) that helped him attain the knowledge of the path of an Arahat (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa).

5. Power by the pervasion of concentration (samādhi-vipphāra-iddhi). The miraculous phenomenon that occurs when one is about to enter upon, is entering upon, or has [1649] just entered upon absorption (jhāna) is due to the pervasion of concentration (samādhi). The power that causes such a miracle is called the power by the pervasion of concentration (samādhi-vipphāra-iddhi). With reference to this power, the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) narrates a number of stories beginning with the story of Sāriputta, which alone will be reproduced here.

Ven. Sāriputta

One day, while Ven. Sāriputta was staying with Ven. Moggallāna at a gorge called Kapota, he had his head newly shaven and engaged himself in absorption (jhāna) in an open space during a moonlit night. When a mischievous Yakkha, who had come with a friend of his, saw Ven. Sāriputta's cleanly-shaven, shining head, he became desirous of striking it with his hand. His friend advised him not to do so, yet he struck Ven. Sāriputta's head with all his might. The blow was so hard that the sound of it roared violently like thunder. But Ven. Sāriputta felt no pain, as the power of concentration (samādhi) pervaded throughout his body.

6. When noble ones (ariya) desire to contemplate loathsome objects as though they were unloathsome, or unloathsome objects as though they were loathsome, they can do so. Such a power of a noble one to contemplate any object in whatever way they wish is called the power of the noble ones (ariya-iddhi).

7. Creatures like birds fly in the sky. To possess that ability to fly, they do not have to make any special effort in the present life. It is a result of what they did in past existences (kamma-vipākajā-iddhi). Devas, Brahmas, the first inhabitants of the world and Asuras have also the ability to move about in space. The power to perform such feats is a result of what they did in past existences (kamma-vipākajā-iddhi).

8. Universal Monarchs (Cakka-vatti) and the like can travel in space. They can do so because they have accumulated merits for themselves (puññavanta-iddhi). Those who accompany the Universal Monarch in his aerial travels can do so because they are associated with the monarch, who is the real possessor of merits. The riches and luxuries that belong to such wealthy persons as Jotika, Jaṭila, Ghosaka, Meṇḍaka and others (see chapter 45c) are also powers arising from merit (puññavanta-iddhi).

The difference between those powers that are a result of what they did in past existences (kamma-vipākajā-iddhi) and powers arising from merit (puññavanta- iddhi) is this: The powers that are a result of what they did in past existences (kamma-vipākajā-iddhi) are due not to one's deeds done in the present life but due according to one's deeds done in the past; it accompanies one's birth. The powers arising from merit (puññavanta-iddhi) are due not only to one's past deeds but also due to one's present efforts made in support of those deeds. It does not accompany one's birth; it becomes full and operative only when supported by one's deeds in the present life. To a Universal Monarch, the Treasure of the Wheel does not arise at his birth. It arises only when he has observed certain precepts and fulfilled the special duties of a Universal Monarch. So this particular power is due not entirely to one's past deeds but also due to one's present supporting efforts.

9. Aerial travels and such feats by Vijjādharas, those who bear magical knowledge (vijjā-maya-iddhi). The power acquired by means of the art of specially contrived mantras, medicine, etc.

10. The power that accrues from various accomplishments (sammā-payoga-iddhi). The scope covered by this power (iddhi) is vast. The path and fruition that are attained as a result of proper endeavours is the highest form of power that accrues from various accomplishments (sammā-payoga-iddhi). In short, all accomplishments that result from learning arts and crafts, the three Vedas, the Three Baskets (Tipiṭaka) or, to say the least, from agricultural activities, such as ploughing, sowing, etc. are all powers that accrue from various accomplishments (sammā-payoga-iddhi).

Of these ten powers (iddhi), the first, the power of resolution (adhīṭṭhāna-iddhi), is the power of resolution to project copies of oneself by the hundred or by the thousand, such as the power possessed by Ven. Cūḷapanthaka and others. Ordinary people who are not possessors of such power make similar resolutions, but because they lack the basic factor of absorption (jhāna) or concentration (samādhi), they do not realize what they have resolved; on the other hand, possessors of such power have their resolution fulfilled because their absorption or concentration is strong enough to help them. [1650]

Resolution Preceding the Attainment of Cessation

When a Non-returner (Anāgāmī) or an Arahant who is endowed with all eight attainments (samāpatti) is about to enter upon the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti), he resolves thus: “During the period of my absorption in the attainment, let no destruction befall my belongings that are kept apart from me. If the Saṅgha wants my presence, may I be able to rise from my attainment before the messenger comes to me. Promptly, may I be able to do so when the Buddha summons me.” Only after resolving thus, he enters upon attainment.

In accordance with his resolution, during the period of his absorption in the attainment, his personal effects kept apart from him cannot be destroyed by the five kinds of enemy. When the Saṅgha wants him during that very period, he has already arisen from his attainment before the messenger’s arrival. No sooner has the Buddha called for him, than he emerges from his attainment. No damage can be done by the five enemies, water, fire, kings, thieves and unloved heirs, to his possessions, such as robes, etc. that are on his body because of the power of his attainment, even though he has not previously resolved for their safety.

Three Kinds of Resolution

Resolution is of three kinds, according to context:

1. Resolution made so that signs occur if something is going to happen (pubba-nimitta-adhiṭṭhāna).
2. Resolution made so that one’s wish comes true (āsīsa-adhiṭṭhāna).
3. Resolution made so that one’s duties are fulfilled (vata-adhiṭṭhāna).

1. Resolution made so that portending signs appear before something happens (pubba-nimitta-adhiṭṭhāna); this kind of resolution (adhiṭṭhāna) may be understood from the Birth Story about the Nāga King Campeyya (Campeyya-jātaka, Ja 506) and other stories. The extract from the Birth Story about the Nāga King Campeyya, in brief, is given here.

The Birth Story about the Nāga King Campeyya

When the Nāga King Campeyya told his Queen Sumanā that he would go to the human abode to observe precepts, the queen said: “The human abode is full of dangers. If something happens to you by what signs should I know?” The Nāga King took her to the royal pond and said: “Look at the pond. Should I be caught by an enemy, the water will become dark; should I be caught by a Garuḷa, the water will boil; should I be caught by a snake-charmer, the water will turn red like blood.” After that, the Nāga King left for the human abode to observe the precepts for fourteen days.

But the king was caught by a snake-charmer and could not return home even after a month. Worried about his safety, the queen went to the pond and saw the surface of the water had turned red like blood.

This resolution of the Nāga King Campeyya is a resolution made so that signs occur if something is going to happen (pubba-nimitta-adhiṭṭhāna) because he made the firm determination beforehand for the appearance of portending signs.

Similarly, according to the Introduction to the Birth Stories (Jātaka-nidāna) commentary, when Prince Siddhattha renounced the world, he cut off his hair and threw it up into the sky resolving: “May this hair remain in the sky if I will become Awakened; if not, let it fall back to the ground.” The hair hung in the sky like a festoon. This resolution was made to know in advance whether or not he would become a Buddha, so it is a resolution made so that signs occur if something is going to happen (pubba-nimitta-adhiṭṭhāna).

Again, after six years of strenuous asceticism, after he had eaten the milk rice offered by Sujātā on the bank of the Nerañjarā, he set the golden bowl afloat on the river with the resolution: “If I will become a Buddha, may this bowl go upstream; if not, may it go downstream,” and the bowl went upstream until it reached the Nāga King Kāḷa. The resolution on this account also is a resolution made so that signs occur if something is going to happen (pubba-nimitta-adhiṭṭhāna).

Similarly, any resolution made in the world to know beforehand by portent whether one’s wish will be fulfilled or not is resolution made so that signs occur if something is going to happen (pubba-nimitta-adhiṭṭhāna). This kind of resolution (adhiṭṭhāna) is still practised today and is thus well known. Some people are used to lifting the stone placed at a famous relic shrine (stūpa) or at a nat or spirit shrine after resolving: “If my plan will materialise, may the stone be heavy; if not, may it be light,” or vice versa. After lifting the stone, they read the omen, whether they would succeed or not, from the feel of the stone’s weight. [1651]

2. Resolution made so that one’s wish comes true (āsīsa-adhiṭṭhāna). The resolution made so that one’s wish comes true (āsīsa-adhiṭṭhāna) is a resolution made so that one’s wish gets fulfilled. This kind of resolution may be known from the Birth Story about the Wise Vidhura (Vidhura-jātaka, Ja 546).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2839

Vidhura, the minister, was taken away from King Korabya by Puṇṇaka the Yakkha, who had won the game of dice. It is stated in the commentary on vs 197 of this particular Birth Story that, having valiantly thundered: “Of death I am not afraid,” Vidhura resolved: “May my lower garment not go off against my wish.” Reflecting on his perfections, he tightened his garment and followed Puṇṇaka by catching hold of the tail of his horse fearlessly and with the dignity of a lion-king. This resolution made by Vidhura is a resolution made so that one’s wish comes true (āsīsa-adhiṭṭhāna).

In the Birth Story about Cane Juice (Naḷa-pāna-jātaka, Ja 20), 80,000 monkeys headed by their king, the Bodhisatta, found it difficult to drink the water from a pond that was protected by a wild water-demon. The monkey king then took one of the reeds that grew around the pond, made an asseveration that the reed be rid of the joints and blew air into it. The reed became hollow throughout, with no joints. He thereby made it possible for his followers to drink the water through the hollow reeds. But there were too many monkeys, and the king was unable to provide each with a hollow reed. So he resolved: “Let all the reeds around the pond become hollow.” This resolution made by the monkey king to fulfil his wish to let the monkeys drink the water individually is also a resolution made so that one’s wish comes true (āsīsa-adhiṭṭhāna).

In the Birth Story about the Dog (Kukkura-jātaka, Ja 22), it is mentioned that the leather straps of the chariot of King Brahmadata of Bārāṇasī were gnawed by the dogs bred in the inner city. Under the wrong impression that the leather-eating dogs were owned by the citizens living in the outer city, royal servants chased them in order to kill them. So the dogs dared not live in the city and gathered at a cemetery. Knowing the true reason of the trouble and realizing that the leather straps of the royal chariot could have been eaten only by the dogs of the inner city, the leader of the pack, the Bodhisatta, asked them to wait while he went to the palace. While he entered the city, he concentrated his thoughts on the perfections, and diffusing his loving-kindness (mettā), he resolved: “May nobody be able to hurl stones or sticks at me.” This resolution, too, made to fulfil his wish that the dogs of the outer city might be safe from harm, is a resolution made so that one’s wish comes true (āsīsa-adhiṭṭhāna).

In the Birth Story about the Wise Outcaste Mātaṅga (Mātaṅga-jātaka, Ja 497), and during the reign of King Brahmadata of Bārāṇasī, the Bodhisatta was born an outcaste (caṇḍāla) and was called Mātaṅga. The daughter of a wealthy man of Bārāṇasī was named Diṭṭha Maṅgalikā because she believed in the auspiciousness of pleasant sights. One day, she went to a garden to amuse herself with her maids. On the way, she saw Mātaṅga who went into the city. Though he kept himself aside, as he was of low birth, the sight of his person aroused displeasure in Diṭṭha Maṅgalikā, who, therefore, returned home thinking that it was not an auspicious day for her. Her followers were also annoyed, saying: “Because of you, we will have no fun today,” they beat him until he became unconscious; thereafter they departed. When Mātaṅga regained consciousness after a while, he said to himself: “These people of Diṭṭha Maṅgalikā have tortured an innocent man like me.” Then he went to the house of Diṭṭha Maṅgalikā’s father and lay at the entrance with a resolution: “I will not get up until I win Diṭṭha Maṅgalikā’s hand.” This resolution of Mātaṅga made to humble Diṭṭha Maṅgalikā’s pride is also a resolution made so that one’s wish comes true (āsīsa-adhiṭṭhāna).

In the commentary on the Great Division (Mahā-vagga) of the Vinaya, too, it is said thus: Just after his Awakening, the Buddha stayed for seven weeks at seven different places in the vicinity of the Bodhi tree, spending a week at each place. At the end of the last seven day’s stay at the foot of a Rājāyatana tree, the brothers Tapussa and Bhallika came to him and offered some cakes. The Buddha considered how to accept the offer of cakes. The bowl offered by Brahma Ghaṭikāra had disappeared the day the Buddha accepted the milk rice offered by Sujātā. Then the Four Great Kings presented the Buddha with four emerald bowls. But the Buddha refused to accept them. The Deva kings then offered the Buddha four stone bowls having the colour of kidney beans. To strengthen their faith, the Buddha accepted the bowls and resolved: “May the bowls merge into one.” Then the bowls became one with four concentric brims. This resolution of the Buddha also is a resolution made so that one’s wish comes true (āsīsa-adhiṭṭhāna).

The Difference between Resolution and Truth

It seems that the resolution made so that signs occur if something is going to happen (pubba-nimitta-adhiṭṭhāna) and the resolution made so that one’s wish comes true (āsīsa-adhiṭṭhāna) of this section on resolution (adhiṭṭhāna) and the truth told so that one’s wish may be fulfilled (icchā-pūraṇa-sacca) of the section on truth (sacca) are one and the same because all these are concerned with fulfilment of one’s wishes.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2841

With regard to the truth told so that one's wish may be fulfilled (icchā-pūraṇa-sacca), when Suvāṇṇasāma's mother, father and the Devī Bahusundarī made their respective resolutions, they all wished for the disappearance of the poison from the arrow that struck Suvāṇṇasāma; with regard to the resolution made so that signs occur if something is going to happen (pubba-nimitta-adhiṭṭhāna), too, when the Bodhisatta made his resolution, throwing up the hair he had cut-off into the sky, he wished that the hair would hang in the sky if he would become a Buddha; with regard to the resolution made so that one's wish comes true (āsīsa-adhiṭṭhāna), too, when Vidhura made his resolution, his wish was to keep his dress intact. The connection of these resolutions with their respective wishes makes one think that they all are the same. That is why some people nowadays combine the two words, truth (sacca) and resolution (adhiṭṭhāna), into one, saying: "We perform a truth-resolution (saccādhīṭṭhāna)."

In reality, however, truth (sacca) is one thing and resolution (adhiṭṭhāna) is another of the ten perfections. Therefore, they are two different things, and the difference is this: As has been said before, it is truth (sacca) whether it is of a good or evil nature. A wish based on that truth is told so that one's wish may be fulfilled (icchā-pūraṇa). But when one's wish is not based on some form of truth, the determination made of one's own accord to have one's wish fulfilled is resolution (adhiṭṭhāna).

In the Birth Story about the Wise Suvāṇṇasāma (Suvāṇṇasāma-jātaka, Ja 540), when Suvāṇṇasāma's parents made an asseveration, they said: "Sāma has formerly practised only righteousness," which is the basic truth. And they added: "By this truthful saying, may his poison vanish," which is their wish, thus expressing a wish based on what was true (icchā-pūraṇa-sacca).

When the Bodhisatta threw up the hair he had cut-off into the sky, resolving: "If I should become a Buddha, may the hair remain in the sky," he did so without any basis of truth. His truthfulness was made for portending signs, which would let him know beforehand of his becoming a Buddha.

The resolution made by Vidhura when he was about to follow Puṇṇaka by holding onto the tail of his horse: "May my dress remain intact," is also a resolution made so that one's wish comes true (āsīsa-adhiṭṭhāna) because it has no truth as a basis and is, therefore, a mere determination of his wish (āsīsa-adhiṭṭhāna).

Thus, the difference between truth (sacca) and resolution (adhiṭṭhāna) lies in the presence or absence of the basis of truth.

3. Resolution made so that one's duties are fulfilled (vata-adhiṭṭhāna). There are those who undertake the habits of a bull (go-sīla) and practices of a bull (go-vata): Cattle eat and discharge faeces and urine while standing; in imitation of cattle, some ascetics during the lifetime of the Buddha did the same, believing that by so doing they would be purified and liberated from Saṃsāra. That is not to say that cattle had that wrong view, but only those ascetics who imitated cattle had. This practice (vata) is connected with evil.

But resolution (adhiṭṭhāna) has nothing to do with such wrong practices, for it belongs to the noble practice of the perfections (pāramī). Here, practices (vata) refers to the observance of such noble practices as generosity, morality, etc.; when one resolves to observe these practices, such an action may be termed a practice of resolution (vata-adhiṭṭhāna), but mere resolution and mere designation do not amount to fulfilling the perfection of resolution. The reason is that resolution (adhiṭṭhāna) does not belong to the past nor does it belong to the present. One fulfils the perfection of resolution when one observes in the future exactly as one has resolved firmly now; and however ardently one resolves at present, if one fails to observe later, one's resolution is useless and meaningless.

This idea is expressed in the Signs of Intelligence (Kavi-lakkhaṇā). A line in it reads to the effect that resolution should be compared to the horn of a rhinoceros, a beast which has one horn, not two. Just as a rhinoceros has only one horn, so should one stick to his resolution steadfastly and firmly, and not waveringly. This line of the Signs of Intelligence (Kavi-lakkhaṇā) agrees with such sayings as “like a rocky mountain (yathā pi pabbato selo)” as mentioned in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa, Bv 2.153). Its meaning has been shown above.

The different resolutions as classified before, such as resolution (adhiṭṭhāna) concerning the Observance Day (Uposatha), resolution concerning the robe, and resolution concerning the bowl, cannot be included under the resolution made so that portending signs appear before something happens (pubba-nimitta-adhiṭṭhāna), the resolution made so that one's wish comes true (āsīsa-adhiṭṭhāna) and the resolution of practice (vata-adhiṭṭhāna), for they are the [1653] resolutions made as required by the Discipline. On the other hand, the resolution of one of the five masteries (vasī-bhāva), and the resolution that precedes the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti) and that which belongs to the ten powers (iddhi) are a resolution made so that one's wish comes true (āsīsa-adhiṭṭhāna).

The Bodhisattas and the Three Kinds of Resolution

Of these three kinds of resolution, the Bodhisattas practise the resolution made so that portending signs appear before something happens (pubba-nimitta-adhiṭṭhāna) and the resolution made so that one's wish comes true (āsīsa-adhiṭṭhāna) not for fulfilling the perfection of resolution but for meeting some requirements under certain circumstances. On the other hand, it is this resolution of practice (vata-adhiṭṭhāna) that they practise to fulfil the perfection of resolution (adhiṭṭhāna) that leads to becoming an Arahat (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇā) and omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa).

In order to mention a little of the way they practise this particular resolution, here is an extract from the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka, Cp 1.51-52):

*Nisajja pāsāda-vare, evaṃ cintesahaṃ tadā:
“Yaṃ kiñci mānusaṃ dānaṃ, adinnaṃ me na vijjati, yo pi yāceyya maṃ cakkhuṃ, dadeyyaṃ avikampito.”*

Sāriputta, when I was King Sivi, I thought to myself while in the palace:
“Of the kinds of giving (dāna) that people give, there is nothing that I have not given. Should somebody ask for my eye, unshaken I will give it to him.”

By this, King Sivi meant to say that he had firmly resolved: “If someone comes to me today and begs for my eye, without hesitation, I will offer it to him.” When Sakka, in the guise of a Brahmin, went to ask for one eye, true to his resolution, he unhesitatingly gave away both his eyes to him. This resolution of King Sivi is to be understood with reference to giving (dāna).

In the chapter on Bhūridatta's practice, it is said (Cp 2.13-14):

*Caturo aṅge adhiṭṭhāya, semi vammikam-uddhani.
Chaviyā cammena maṃsena, nahāru-aṭṭhikehi vā, yassa etena karaṇīyaṃ, dinnaṃ yeva harātu so.*

This describes how the Nāga King Bhūridatta resolved when he observed the precepts. It means:

Having resolved with regard to the four components of my body: skin, both thick and thin, flesh and blood, muscles and bones, I lay on the top of the anthill, he who has some use for any of these four components, let him take it, for I have already made a gift of them.

Wishing to promote his observance of the precepts, King Bhūridatta resolved: “I will guard my morality at the sacrifice of the four components of my body.”

This resolution of King Bhūridatta is in connection with morality (sīla).

Also in the Birth Story about the Nāga King Campeyya (Campeyya-jātaka, Ja 506) the Nāga King Campeyya went to observe the precepts after telling his queen of the signs that would show when he was in danger in the aforesaid manner; it is mentioned in the commentary: Having told of signalling signs and having resolved to observe the precept on the fourteenth day of the new moon, Campeyya left the abode of Nāgas for the human world and lay on the top of an ant-hill (nimittāni ācikkhitvā cātuddasī-uposatham adhiṭṭhāya nāga-bhavanā nikkhamitvā tattha gantvā vammikam-atthake nipajji). This resolution of Campeyya was purely for observing morality (sīla).

In all these stories, giving (dāna) or morality (sīla) is one thing and resolution (adhiṭṭhāna) is another. King Sivi’s gift (dāna) occurred the moment he gave his eyes, but his resolution took place when he resolved to do so before the actual giving. Therefore, resolution came first, and it was followed by the act of giving.

Also in the case of morality (sīla) observed by the Nāga kings the resolution was first and then came the act of observance of morality (sīla). In the secular affairs, too, it is natural to do things only after making up one’s mind: “I will do like this.”

Prince Temiya’s Resolution

The Bodhisatta was once the son of the King of Kāsi and named Temiya (Mūgapakkha-jātaka, Ja 538). He was so named [1654] by his father because on the day he was born, it rained heavily in the whole country of Kāsi and people became wet (temīya) and happy. When the prince was one month old, while he was on the lap of his father, four thieves were brought to the king, who ordered them to be punished. The prince was shocked to see this and became sad, thinking: “What shall I do to escape from this palace.”

The next day, while he was staying alone under the white parasol, he reflected on his father’s action and was scared to become a king. To him, who was pale like a lotus flower crushed by the hand, the guardian goddess of the parasol, who was his mother in one of his previous births, said: “Do not worry, son, if you want to escape from this royal residence, pretend to be dumb, deaf and mute. Your wish will be fulfilled.” Then the prince made a resolution and acted accordingly.

For sixteen years the prince was tested by various means, but he remained firm without deviating from his resolution. Then the father ordered: “My son is really dumb, deaf and mute. Take him to the cemetery and bury him there.”

Although he was variously tested and presented with difficulties for sixteen long years, he remained resolute, as explained in the example of a rocky mountain mentioned in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa). His firm, unshaken determination is an act of tremendous resoluteness. Only when one fulfils one’s practice (vata) of resolution with the kind of determination of Prince Temiya, with all might and valour and without wavering, will one be carrying out the fulfilment of the perfection of resolution as observed by the Bodhisattas.

9. The Perfection of Loving-Kindness

Three Kinds of Love

Teachers of old have translated the word mettā of mettā-pāramī as “love” or “loving-kindness.” Similarly, they translate pema also as “love.” Love meant by mettā is a specialised term, while love meant by pema is a general one.

Therefore, pema is divided into three:

1. Love between men and women and is generated by craving (taṇhā-pema); this love is called an erotic sentiment (siṅgāra) in books on rhetoric.
2. Attachment between parents and children, among brothers and sisters, based on living together in the same house (geha-sita-pema). This kind of love is called affection (vacchala) in rhetoric.

Both love generated by craving (taṇhā-pema) and love based on living together in the same house (geha-sita-pema) are not wholesome; the former is passion (taṇhā-rāga), while the latter is greed (lobha).

3. Loving-kindness or unbounded benevolence shown towards others for their well-being (mettā-pema). This love is entirely free from attachment or desire to live always together with others. People may be living poles apart, and yet one is happy to hear that those living far away are prospering. Such separation does not prevent one from feeling satisfied with their well-being. Therefore, loving-kindness (mettā) is pure and noble and has been also called a sublime abode (Brahma-vihāra). That is to say, developing such love is living in a sublime state of mind. Not only loving-kindness (mettā), but compassion (karuṇā), altruistic joy (muditā) and equanimity (upekkhā) are also sublime abodes (Brahma-vihāra).

So the sublime abodes (Brahma-vihāra) comprise all four virtues. They are also known as four noble practices (brahma-cariyā). Another name for the sublime abodes (Brahma-vihāra) is the immeasurables (apamaññā), for they are the mental qualities to be developed and extended towards all beings, whose number is limitless.

It should be carefully noted that development of loving-kindness is not development of impure craving-love (taṇhā-pema) and affection-love (gehasita-pema) but that of pure and noble loving-kindness (mettā-pema); how to develop loving-kindness (mettā) will be shown later.

Loving-Kindness and Hatelessness

Loving-kindness (mettā) is a reality which exists in its ultimate sense (paramattha). But when ultimate realities are enumerated, loving-kindness is not shown as a separate item, for it is covered by the [1655] mental concomitant of hatelessness (adosa-cetasika), which has a wider connotation. Loving-kindness forms a part of that mental concomitant of hatelessness (adosa-cetasika).

According to the the Collection of Meaning in the Abhidhamma (Abhidhammattha-saṅgaha), the mental concomitant of hatelessness (adosa-cetasika) is associated with 59 beautiful thoughts (sobhana-citta). Whenever these 59 thoughts (citta) arise, there arises the mental concomitant of hatelessness (adosa-cetasika) too. Hatelessness can contemplate various objects, but loving-kindness (mettā) can have only living beings as its object. In performing different acts of giving (dāna) or observing various kinds of morality (sīla), there invariably arises hatelessness (adosa). But each time hatelessness arises in this way, it is not necessarily loving-kindness. Only when one contemplates living beings with the thought: “May they be well and happy,” wishing them prosperity, can hatelessness (adosa-cetasika) be called loving-kindness (mettā).

With reference to the aforesaid, in the perfection of forbearance (khantī-pāramī), too, forbearance may mean hatelessness (adosa-cetasika), but not all hatelessness is forbearance; when one is wronged by others, one restrains oneself from showing hate or anger (dosa) to them, and only such hatelessness should be taken as forbearance. Similarly, not all hatelessness should be taken as loving-kindness but only that hatelessness that arises in the form of goodwill towards other beings should be.

Kinds of Loving-Kindness

With reference to loving-kindness, people say that loving-kindness is of 528 kinds. But in reality it is not so. It should be noted people say so because according to the Path of the Analytic Knowledges (Paṭisambhidā-magga), there are 528 ways of developing loving-kindness. Of the 528 ways, five are without specifications of beings (anodhiso). They are:

1. All beings (sabbe sattā).
2. All breathing beings (sabbe pāṇā).
3. All existing creatures (sabbe bhūtā).
4. All persons or individuals (sabbe puggalā).
5. All those who have come into individual existences (sabbe atta-bhāva-pariyāpannā).

When one directs one's thought to all beings that exist in the 31 planes of existence in any one of these five ways, they all are embraced without any one of them being left out. Since everyone is covered by these five ways, these five are called the five unlimited (anodhiso) individuals. Odhi of anodhiso means “boundary, limit,” hence anodhiso is “having no limit.”<sup>437</sup>

When loving-kindness is directed towards beings who are specified, the classification is as follows:

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2848

1. All females (sabbā itthiyo).
2. All males (sabbe purisā).
3. All noble persons (sabbe ariya).
4. All ignoble persons, those who have not attained the state of being noble ones (sabbe anariya).
5. All Devas (sabbe deva).
6. All humans (sabbe manussā).
7. All Petas belonging to lower worlds (sabbe vinipātikā).

Each of these seven belongs to a separate category of beings, and accordingly, they are called limited (odhisa) or the seven limited beings. In this way, there are twelve kinds of beings, five unlimited (anodhisa) and seven limited (odhisa), to whom loving-kindness (mettā) should be directed. How loving-kindness is directed to these twelve categories of beings is taught as follows:

1. May they be free from enmity (averā hontu).
2. May they be free from ill-will (abyāpajjā hontu). [1656]
3. May they be free from unhappiness (anīghā hontu).
4. May they be able to keep themselves happy (sukhī attānam pariharantu).

When loving-kindness is suffused in these four ways on each of the above twelve categories of persons, the modes of suffusing loving-kindness become 48 in number. There is no mention of directions in these 48 modes.

When the four cardinal points, the four intermediate points and the upward and downward directions are mentioned in each of these 48 modes, there will be 480 modes altogether: “May those beings in the east be free from enmity, from ill-will, from suffering and may they be able to keep themselves happy.” In this way, beings in other directions also should be suffused with loving-kindness thus the number of modes of suffusing loving-kindness become 480.

If 48 modes of suffusing without mention of directions are added to those 480 modes, the total becomes 528. These 528 modes of suffusing loving-kindness are named briefly as the “suffusion of loving-kindness” by teachers of old and composed as a traditional chant. If one desires to suffuse loving-kindness in the first way in Pāḷi, one should do so by reciting: Sabbe sattā averā hontu, “may all beings be free from enmity.” Continuously repeating in this way means development of loving-kindness. If one desires to do so in the second way in Pāḷi, one should recite: Sabbe sattā abyāpajjā hontu, “may all beings be free from ill-will.” Continuously repeating in this way also means the development of loving-kindness. In this manner, all the 528 ways of suffusing loving-kindness (mettā) should be understood.

The development of loving-kindness in these 528 ways, as shown above, is taught in the Path of the Analytic Knowledges (Paṭisambhidā-magga) and is well-known. In that text there is no mention of the development of compassion (karuṇā), altruistic joy (muditā) and equanimity (upekkhā) at the end of that of loving-kindness (mettā) though. But, nowadays, suffusion of loving-kindness, as published in some books, contains at the end of the development of loving-kindness: 1) dukkha-muccantu, “may they be free from suffering,” which is a development of compassion (karuṇā); 2) yathā laddhā sampattito māvigacchantu, “may they not suffer loss of what they have gained,” which is a development of altruistic joy (muditā); and 3) kammassakā, “they have their productive deeds (kamma), as their own property; each being is what his or her deeds makes,” which is a development of equanimity (upekkhā). They are included by the ancient teachers so that those who wish to develop compassion, altruistic joy and equanimity may do so by taking the development of loving-kindness as a guide.

Therefore, if one desires to develop compassion, one should incline one’s thoughts towards living beings like this: Sabbe sattā dukkhā muccantu, “may all beings be free from suffering;” if one desires to develop altruistic joy: Sabbe sattā yathā laddhā sampattito māvigacchantu, “may all beings not suffer loss of what they have gained;” if one desires to develop equanimity: Sabbe sattā kammassakā, “all beings have their productive deeds (kamma) as their own property.”

But this does not mean that only this way, as mentioned in the scriptures, should be adopted but not others. Because for covering all beings without any classification, there are not only terms like: satta, pāṇa, bhūta, puggala and atta-bhāva-pariyāpannā, all of which indicate beings; but there are such words as sarīrī, dehī, jīva, pajā, jantu, hindagu, etc. which also mean beings. To suffuse beings with the thought: Sabbe sarīrī averā hontu, “may all those having bodies be free from enmity,” etc. is also to direct loving-kindness (mettā) towards them.

The number of ways to direct loving-kindness is also given as four in the Path of the Analytic Knowledges (Paṭisambhidā-magga). But there are other ways as well, for instance: Sabbe sattā sukhino hontu, “may all beings be happy.” Sabbe sattā khemino hontu, “may all beings be secure” and such thoughts are also loving-kindness. The fact that suffusing beings with one’s loving-kindness by using other Pāli words and by adopting other ways also constitutes development of real loving-kindness is shown in the Discourse on Friendliness Meditation (Metta-sutta, Khp 9, Snp 1.8).

Development of Loving-Kindness

The Discourse on Loving-Kindness (Mettā-sutta) was delivered by the Buddha in connection with forest-dwelling monastics and was recited at the Councils and preserved in the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta, Snp 1.8) and the Supplementary Readings (Khuddaka-pāṭha, Khp 9). The discourse first describes fifteen virtues which those desirous of developing loving-kindness should be [1657] endowed with. These fifteen are known as the fifteen virtues to be endowed with before developing loving-kindness (mettā-pubba-bhāga).

The discourse says: He who is clever in what is noble and profitable and who desires to abide contemplating Nibbāna through wisdom, the Nibbāna which is peaceful and blissful, should endeavour to be endowed with the following:

1. An ability to execute what is good.
2. Uprightness in conduct.
3. Total straightforwardness.
4. Being receptive to the words of the wise.
5. Gentleness in manners.
6. Having no conceit.
7. Being easily content with what one has.
8. Being easy to support.
9. Not being burdened by unnecessary cares and duties.
10. Having frugal living.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2851

Not having too many personal belongings for one's travel; a monastic should travel light only with his eight requisites, just as a bird flies taking with it only its wings.

11. Having calm and serene sense-faculties.
12. Having mature wisdom with regard to faultless things.
13. Having modesty in one's deeds, words and thoughts.
14. Having no attachment to one's supporters, male or female.

Which is particularly concerned with monastics, as the discourse is originally meant for them. Lay people also should not have attachment to friends.

15. Not doing even the slightest deed that would be reproved by the wise.

The discourse explains how to develop loving-kindness after becoming endowed with these fifteen virtues, saying: Sukhino vā khemino hontu, sabbe sattā bhavantu sukhittā, “may all beings be happy and secure, may all beings in their hearts be happy!” etc.

How to develop loving-kindness, as taught in the Discourse on Loving-Kindness (Mettā-sutta), should be briefly noted as follows:

1. Loving-kindness developed in an all-inclusive manner covering all beings (sabba-saṅgāhika-mettā).
2. Loving-kindness developed by dividing beings into two groups (duka-bhāvanā-mettā).
3. Loving-kindness developed by dividing beings into three groups (tika-bhāvanā-mettā).

1. Loving-kindness developed in an all-inclusive manner covering all beings (sabba-saṅgāhika-mettā). Of these three ways of development of loving-kindness, that of loving-kindness developed in an all-inclusive manner covering all beings is explained in Pāḷi as suffusing thus: Sukhino vā khemino hontu, sabbe sattā bhavantu sukhittā, “may all beings be happy and secure, may all beings in their hearts be happy!” If one wishes to develop loving-kindness according to this explanation, one should recite and contemplate as follows:

1. May all beings be happy physically (sabbe sattā sukhino hontu).
2. May all beings be secure (sabbe sattā khemino hontu).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2852

3. May all beings be happy mentally (sabbe sattā sukhittā hontu).

This is the development of loving-kindness developed covering all beings (sabba-saṅgāhika-mettā) as taught in the Discourse on Loving-Kindness (Mettā-sutta).

2. Loving-kindness developed by dividing beings into groups of two (duka-bhāvanā-mettā). Loving-kindness developed by dividing beings into groups of two (duka-bhāvanā-mettā) and loving-kindness developed by dividing beings into groups of three (tika-bhāvanā-mettā) are both likely to be confusing to those who do not know how to interpret the Pāli text, but how one may get confused will not be explained, lest it should cause more confusion.

The loving-kindness developed by dividing beings into groups of two (duka-bhāvanā-mettā) is developed by recognising [1658] there are four pairs of beings, namely:

1. The pair of frightened and unfrightened beings (tasa-thāvara-duka).
2. The pair of seen and unseen beings (diṭṭhādiṭṭha-duka).
3. The pair of far and near beings (dūra-santika-duka).
4. The pair of those who have been born and those in the womb of their mothers (bhūta-sambhavesi-duka).

1. May all those worldlings and noble learners who are frightened, and may those Arahats who are without fright, without exception, be happy both physically and mentally (tasā vā thāvarā vā anavasesā sabbe sattā bhavantu sukhittā). Contemplating thus is the development of loving-kindness to the pair of frightened and unfrightened beings (tasa-thāvara-duka-bhāvanā-mettā).

2. May all those beings seen and unseen, without exception, be happy both physically and mentally (diṭṭhā vā adiṭṭhā vā anavasesā sabbe sattā bhavantu sukhittā). Contemplating thus is the development of loving-kindness to the pair of seen and unseen beings (diṭṭhādiṭṭha-duka-bhāvanā-mettā).

3. May all those beings living far and living near, without exception, be happy both physically and mentally (dūrā vā avidurā vā anavasesa sabbe sattā bhavantu sukhittā). Contemplating like this is the development of loving-kindness to the pair of far and near beings (dūra-santika-duka-bhāvanā-mettā).

4. May all those beings who have been born and those who are still in the womb of their mothers, without exception, be happy both physically and mentally (bhūtā vā sambhavesi vā anavasesā sabbe sattā bhavantu sukhittā).

Contemplating like this is the development of loving-kindness to those who have been born and those still in the womb of their mothers (bhūta-sambhavesi-duka-bhāvanā-mettā).

The above-mentioned four ways of the development of loving-kindness is called loving-kindness developed after dividing beings into groups of two (duka-bhāvanā-mettā).

3. Loving-kindness developed by dividing beings into groups of three (tika-bhāvanā-mettā). This loving-kindness developed by dividing beings into groups of three is of three kinds:

1. The set of three of tall, short and medium beings (dīgha-rassa-majjhima-tika).
2. The set of three of large, small and medium-sized beings (mahantāṇuka-majjhima-tika).
3. The set of three of fat, thin and medium beings (thūlāṇuka-majjhima-tika).

1. May all those beings having long bodies, those having short bodies and those having bodies of medium length, without exception, be happy both physically and mentally (dīghā vā rassā vā majjhimā vā anavasesā sabbe sattā bhavantu sukhittā). Contemplating thus is the development of loving-kindness to the set of three of tall, short and medium beings (dīgha-rassa-majjhima-tika-bhāvanā-mettā).

2. May all those beings having big bodies, those having small bodies and those having bodies of medium size, without exception, be happy both physically and mentally (mahantā vā aṇukā vā majjhimā vā anavasesā sabbe sattā bhavantu sukhittā). Contemplating thus is the development of loving-kindness to the set of three of large, small and medium-sized beings (mahantāṇuka-majjhima-tika - bhāvanā-mettā).

3. May all those beings having fat bodies, those having thin bodies and those having bodies of medium build, without exception, be happy both physically and mentally (thūlā vā aṇukā vā majjhimā vā anavasesā sabbe sattā bhavantu sukhitattā). Contemplating thus is the development of loving-kindness to the set of three of fat, thin and medium beings (thūlāṇuka-majjhima-tika-bhāvanā-mettā).

The above-mentioned three ways of development of loving-kindness are called loving-kindness developed after dividing beings into groups of three (tika-bhāvanā-mettā).

Since these three ways of development of loving-kindness: Developed towards all beings, developed by dividing beings into groups of two and developed by dividing beings into groups of three are thoughts of loving-kindness, developed with the desire to see others attain prosperity and happiness, they are called loving-kindness wishing for benefit and happiness (hita-sukhāgama-patthanā-mettā).

Similarly, thoughts of loving-kindness developed with the desire to see others free from misfortune and not suffering are called loving-kindness wishing for freedom from loss and suffering (ahita-dukkhāgama-patthanā-mettā). This kind of loving-kindness is described in Pāḷi: [1659]

Na paro paraṃ nikubbetha, nātimaññetha katthaci na kañci, byārosanā paṭigha-saññā, nāññam-aññassa dukkham-iccheyya.

May one not deceive another; may one not despise another; may they not wish to cause suffering to one another by offending and hurting, physically, verbally and mentally.

Contemplating like this is the development of loving-kindness wishing for freedom from loss and suffering.

It may be asked: “Why is the development of loving-kindness described not in one way only but in several different ways in the Path of the Analytic Knowledges (Paṭisambhidā-magga) and the Discourse on Loving-Kindness (Mettā-sutta)?”

The answer is: The mind of a worldling roams about continuously from one sense object to another. The mind, in such a state, cannot be kept steady on the object of loving-kindness by adopting one means only. Steady concentration of the mind can be achieved by repeated change of method of contemplation. Therefore, a variety of ways of developing loving-kindness was taught by the Buddha. Sages of later times, too, were obliged to explain it in different ways.

Or, an alternative explanation: Those who develop loving-kindness are of different basic aptitudes; for some, the unlimited loving-kindness (anodhisa-mettā) method is more comprehensible; for others, either the limited loving-kindness (odhisa-mettā) method is more intelligible; or the mode of suffusing beings in different directions with loving-kindness is more lucid; or the inclusive (sabba-saṅgāhika) means is clearer; or developing in pairs (duka-bhāvanā) is more suitable; or the developing in triads (tika-bhāvanā) is more appropriate. Since the different basic aptitudes of those who develop loving-kindness require adoption of diverse means suitable for each individual, the Buddha had to teach these different methods, and later teachers had to explain them fully.

The Bodhisatta's Loving-Kindness

How the Bodhisatta had developed loving-kindness and fulfilled the perfection of loving-kindness has been explained in the Birth Story about the Wise Suvaṇṇasāma (Suvaṇṇasāma-jātaka, Ja 540) and told in the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka). The story as told in the Basket of Conduct (Cp 3.13), in brief, is as follows:

“Dear Sāriputta, when I was Suvaṇṇasāma, living in the residence made ready by Sakka, I directed loving-kindness towards lions and tigers in the forest. I lived there surrounded by lions, tigers, leopards, wolves, buffaloes, spotted deer and bears. None of these animals was frightened by me, nor was I frightened by any of them. I was happy living in the forest, as I was fortified with the powers of loving-kindness.”

From this passage, we know nothing of Suvaṇṇasāma's family, birth, etc.; we know only of his noble and happy living without a trace of fear from the beasts in the forest, sustained by the virtues of his loving-kindness.

In the Birth Story about the Wise Suvaṇṇasāma (Suvaṇṇasāma-jātaka, Ja 540), however, it is said that when the Bodhisatta Suvaṇṇasāma was struck by an arrow, he asked: “Why did you shoot me with the arrow?” and King Pīḷiyakkha replied: “While I was aiming at a deer, the deer that had come nearer to the point of the arrow fled, being frightened by you. So I was annoyed and shot you.” Then Suvaṇṇasāma replied: “Seeing me, deers are not frightened, nor are the other beasts of the forest (na maṃ migā uttasanti, arañṇe sāpadānipi).” He also said:

“King, even Kinnaras who, with a very timid nature, are living in the Mount Gandhamādana, would joyfully come to me while they are roaming in the hills and forests.”

From this verse, it is known that the Bodhisatta Suvāṇṇasāma, living in the forest, directed loving-kindness towards all forest-dwelling animals, including Kinnaras, and that he was accordingly loved by each and every animal in the forest.

In the list of eleven advantages that accrue by developing loving-kindness, one is: being loved by Devas, Amanussa and humans. But from the Suvāṇṇasāma story, we know that animals too love one who develops loving-kindness.

The eleven advantages of developing loving-kindness have been shown in connection with the Observance Day with Nine Factors (navāṅguposatha), in the section on the perfection of morality above.

The Story of Ven. Visākha

Of these eleven advantages, in connection with the love of Devas, demons and ghosts (amanussānaṃ piyo), the story of Ven. Visākha is cited in the Analysis of the Sublime States (Brahma-vihāra-niddesa) [1660] of the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga, Vism 9).

Visākha, a householder of Pātaliputta, having heard about Śrī Laṅkā, was desirous of going to that country to devote himself to the practice of Dhamma. After leaving his wealth to his family, he crossed over to Śrī Laṅkā and became a monk at the Mahā Vihāra. For five months, he studied the two books of monastic rules (dve mātikā), and then left the Mahā Vihāra for a group of monasteries which were suitable places for meditation. He spent four months at each monastery.

On his way to the hill-monastery called Cittala, Visākha came to a junction of two roads and while he was thinking which road to follow, the Deva of the hill guided him to the right direction. Accordingly, he arrived at the monastery and stayed for four months there. After planning to go to another monastery the following day, he went to sleep. While he was thus sleeping, the spirit of an emerald green tree sat on a wooden plank at the edge of a staircase and wept. “Who is weeping here?” asked the monk. “I am the spirit of the emerald green tree, sir,” was the reply. “Why are you weeping?” – “Because you are about to leave.” – “What advantage is there to you of my staying here?” – “Your stay here makes the local Devas, Yakkhas and others show loving-kindness to one another, and so love prevails among them. After your leaving, they will quarrel among themselves, even using harsh words.”

“If my stay here really helps you live happily as you have indicated,” said the monk, “I will stay on for another four months.” When the four months had lapsed, the monk was about to leave and the spirit wept again. In this way, the monk could not leave the place at all and passed into Nibbāna at the same monastery of Cittala.

The story shows that those who receive loving-kindness not only love him who directs loving-kindness to them, but they show goodwill to one another under the influence of his loving-kindness.

Loving-Kindness of a Hunter

In the Long Birth Story about the Golden Goose (Mahā-haṃsa-jātaka, JA 534), when the Bodhisatta, the king of the geese, was caught in a snare, he suffered much from injury. At the instance of the goose general, the repentant hunter picked up the goose king tenderly and nursed him with loving-kindness to relieve his pain. Even the weals raised by the snare did not remain on his feet, which became normal with the veins, flesh and skin undamaged because of the power of the hunter’s loving-kindness.

This is but a pertinent extract from the Long Birth Story about the Golden Goose. The story in full may be learnt from the same Birth Story (Jātaka). Similar stories are told in the first Short Birth Story about the Golden Goose (Cūḷa-haṃsa-jātaka, Ja 502), the Birth Story about the King of the Deer Rohanta (Rohanta-miḡa-jātaka, Ja 501) and the second Short Birth Story about the Golden Goose (Cūḷa-haṃsa-jātaka, Ja 533). The power of loving-kindness may be well understood from these stories.

Passion in the Guise of Loving-Kindness

He who wants to direct his loving-kindness towards beings should be careful about one thing, and this is not to have developed passion (rāga) in the guise of loving-kindness, as it is warned in the Book about the Guides (Nettipakaraṇa) commentary: “Passion in the guise of loving-kindness is deceiving (mettāyanā-mukhena rāgo vañceti).” In the Analysis of the Sublime States (Brahma-vihāra-niddesa) of the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga, Vism 9), too, it is stated:

“Extinction of anger means fulfilment of loving-kindness, but arising of passion means destruction of loving-kindness.”

When a man directs his loving-kindness towards another to whom he has shown anger, the anger disappears, and there appears in him loving-kindness, which is goodwill. Therefore, disappearance of anger leads to appearance of loving-kindness. If passionate attachment appears in him while he is thus developing genuine loving-kindness, his genuine loving-kindness fails. He has now been deceived by passion, which assumes the semblance of loving-kindness. [1661]

As loving-kindness is one of the ten perfections, it should be directed towards other beings until they return their goodwill to oneself, as was shown in the example of the Bodhisatta Suvaṇṇasāma and others. Not only is loving-kindness included in the ten perfections, but it is also found in the 40 methods of tranquillity (samatha) meditation, which leads to the attainment of absorption (jhāna) and the super knowledges (abhiññā). Therefore, Bodhisattas and virtuous men of ancient times developed loving-kindness, and, with sharp and intense concentration, attained the absorptions (jhāna) which are called full concentration (appanā) in Pāḷi.

To give illustrations of such an attainment while fulfilling the perfections, the Birth Story about the Best (Seyya-jātaka, Ja 282) and the Birth Story about the King Ekarājā (Ekarāja-jātaka, Ja 303) may be cited.

The Birth Story about the Best

A synopsis of the Birth Story about the Best: King Brahmadatta of Bārāṇasī ruled righteously, fulfilling his ten kingly duties. He gave alms, kept the five precepts and observed the eight Observance Day precepts. Then a minister who had committed a crime in the palace was expelled by the king from the kingdom. He went to the neighbouring country of Kosala, and while serving the king there, he urged him to attack and conquer Bārāṇasī which, he said, could easily be done. King Kosala followed his suggestion, arrested and imprisoned King Brahmadatta, who put up no resistance at all, along with his ministers.

In the prison, Brahmadatta directed his loving-kindness towards Kosala, who had robbed him of his kingdom, and, in due course, Brahmadatta attained loving-kindness absorption (mettā-jhāna). Because of the power of that loving-kindness, the robber King Kosala felt burning sensations throughout his whole body, as if it were burnt with torches. Suffering from particularly severe pain, he asked his ministers: “Why has this happened to me?” They replied: “King, you suffer thus because you have imprisoned King Brahmadata, who is endowed with morality.” Thereupon Kosala hurried to the Bodhisatta Brahmadata, begged for forgiveness and returned Bārāṇasī to Brahmadata, saying: “Let your country be yours again.” From this story, it is clear that loving-kindness is conducive to attainment of absorption (jhāna).

The Birth Story about the King Ekarājā

The story of King Ekarājā: Once upon a time, a minister serving King Brahmadata of Bārāṇasī committed an offence. The story thus begins with the same incident as that in the previous Birth Story about the Best. Both the the Birth Story about the Best and the Birth Story about the King Ekarājā are like the Birth Story about One with Great Virtue (Mahā-Sīlava-jātaka, Ja 51). For the full story read the latter.

What is peculiar to the story of King Ekarājā is this: While the King of Bārāṇasī was sitting in great state with his ministers in the courtyard, King Dubbhisena of Kosala had him tied and caged and then hung upside down above a doorstep in the palace. Having developed loving-kindness with the robber king as the object of his contemplation, Brahmadata attained the absorptions (jhāna) and the super knowledges (abhiññā). He managed to release himself from bondage and sat cross-legged in the sky.

Dubbhisena’s body became burning hot, and the heat was so intense that he rolled from side to side on the ground, grumbling: “It’s so hot; it’s so hot.” Then he asked his ministers: “Why has this happened to me?” The ministers replied: “King, you suffer very painfully like this because you have wrongly arrested and suspended upside-down the virtuous and innocent king.” – “In that case, go and release him quickly.” Under this order, the royal servants promptly went to where King Brahmadata was and saw him sitting cross-legged in the sky. So they turned back and reported the matter to King Dubbhisena.

The Buddha’s Loving-Kindness

Once, while members of the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha were travelling to Kusināra, the Malla princes made an agreement among themselves that any one of them who did not extend his welcome to the congregation would be punished. Accordingly, a Malla Prince, Roja by name, who was a friend of Ven. Ānanda while he was a layman, extended his welcome with other Malla princes to the congregation. Thereupon Ven. Ānanda said admiringly to Roja that it was a great opportunity to do so, as the congregation was under the Buddha's leadership. Roja replied that he did so not because he had faith in the Three Treasures but [1662] because of the agreement made among themselves. Finding Roja's reply unpleasant, Ven. Ānanda approached the Buddha and told him of it. He also requested the Buddha to make Roja's mind more pliant. The Buddha then directed his thoughts of loving-kindness exclusively to Roja, who could not remain still in his residence and like a calf which has been separated from its mother, went to the monastery where the Buddha was staying. With genuine faith in the Buddha arising in him, he paid homage to the Buddha and listened to his discourse, as a result of which he became a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna).

At another time, too, when members of the Saṅgha, with the Buddha at its head, entered the city of Rājagaha and went on alms round, Devadatta, after consulting King Ajātasattu, sent Nāḷāgiri the elephant, who was in must, to attack the Buddha. The Buddha overcame the elephant by suffusing him with loving-kindness. Then the citizens of Rājagaha recited with joy the following verse (Aṅgulimāla-sutta, MN 86):

Daṇḍeneke damayanti, aṅkusehi kasāhi ca, adaṇḍena asatthena, ahaṃ dantomhi tādīnā.

Some cattle-trainers, elephant-trainers and horse-trainers tame their respective animals by beating or hurting them with a goad or a whip. However, the mad elephant Nāḷāgiri has been tamed by the Buddha without any stick or weapon.

10. The Perfection of Equanimity

The Meaning of Equanimity

A literal translation of the Pāḷi word upekkhā would be “taking up a balanced view,” which means maintenance of a neutral position between the two extremes of sorrow and happiness. Traditional Myanmar scholars rendered it as “indifference.”

If the meaning of this rendering is not well thought of, one is liable to misinterpret it as “being inattentive,” “being negligent.” But equanimity is not remaining inattentive or negligent. Equanimity pays attention to objects but only in a balanced manner with the feeling of neutrality when encountering objects of sorrow or objects of happiness.

Development of Equanimity

The development of equanimity is the same as that of loving-kindness mentioned in the Path of the Analytic Knowledges (Paṭisambhidā-magga). As mentioned above, the methods to be adopted in developing loving-kindness are 528 because there are four basic modes. On the other hand, in developing equanimity, there is only one mode, which is kammassakā, meaning “all beings have deeds (kamma) as made by them, which are their own property.” Therefore, the methods, in this case, form one quarter of 528 which is 132.

As in developing loving-kindness, there are twelve categories of beings: five unlimited (anodhisa) and seven limited (odhisa). Since there is just one mode, we have twelve methods only that are to be adopted before applying them to the ten directions:

1. All beings have productive deeds as their own property (sabbe sattā kammassakā).
2. All breathing things have productive deeds as their own property (sabbe pāṇā kammassakā).
3. All existing creatures have productive deeds as their own property (sabbe bhūtā kammassakā).
4. All persons or individuals have productive deeds as their own property (sabbe puggalā kammassakā).
5. All those who have come into individual existences have productive deeds as their own property (sabbe atta-bhāva-pariyāpannā kammassakā).
6. All women have productive deeds as their own property (sabbā itthiyo kammassakā).
7. All men have productive deeds as their own property (sabbe purisā kammassakā).
8. All noble ones have productive deeds as their own property (sabbe ariyā kammassakā). [1663]

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2862

9. All persons who have not yet attained the state of noble ones have productive deeds as their own property (sabbe anariyā kammaṣṣakā).
10. All Devas have productive deeds as their own property (sabbe devā kammaṣṣakā).
11. All humans have productive deeds as their own property (sabbe manussā kammaṣṣakā).
12. All Petas belonging to the lower worlds have productive deeds as their own property (sabbe vinipātikā kammaṣṣakā).

When these twelve are applied to the ten directions, the result is 120. To these are added twelve methods which have no reference to any direction, and the total number of methods becomes 132. Any one of these suitable methods may be used in developing equanimity (upekkhā), but it should not be taken that the other methods are inapplicable.

As in the case of loving-kindness, one may develop equanimity by using other terms for beings and persons if one so desires. The word kammaṣṣakā may also be replaced by other Pāḷi terms of the same meaning, which are mentioned in the Discourse on the Subjects for Continual Reflection (Abhiñha-paccavekkhitabbaṭṭhāna-sutta, AN 5.57). There it is said: All beings have productive deeds that they own, it is productive deeds that they are heir to, it is productive deeds that they are born from, productive deeds are their kinsfolk, productive deeds are their refuge (sabbe sattā kammaṣṣakā, kamma-dāyādā, kamma-yoni, kamma-bandhū, kamma-paṭissaranā).

1. Having productive deeds as one's property (kammaṣṣakā).
2. Having productive deeds as one's heritage (kamma-dāyādā).
3. Having productive deeds as one's origin (kamma-yoni).
4. Having productive deeds as one's kinsfolk (kamma-bandhū).
5. Having productive deeds as one's refuge (kamma-paṭissaraṇā).

Since all five Pāḷi terms have one and the same significance, one may develop equanimity (upekkhā) by substituting all beings have productive deeds as one's property (sabbe sattā kammaṣṣakā) with any of the following four expressions that pleases one or that is understood well by one:

All beings have productive deeds as their heritage (sabbe sattā kamma-dāyādā).
All beings have productive deeds as their origin (sabbe sattā kamma-yonī).
All beings have productive deeds as their kinsfolk (sabbe sattā kamma-bandhū).
All beings have productive deeds as their refuge (sabbe sattā kamma-paṭissaraṇā).

A Point to Consider

In this connection, a point to consider is this: It is clear that loving-kindness is a perfection to be fulfilled for the welfare of beings and thus deserves to be considered as a noble perfection. On the other hand, though equanimity is a perfection to be fulfilled, it is a mental disposition which holds that “happiness or suffering is one’s lot in life; if one is possessed of good deeds conducive to happiness, one will be happy; if one is possessed of bad deeds conducive to suffering, one will suffer. I can do nothing to alter the productive deeds of others.” Is it not difficult to call such an attitude noble? Will it be wrong if one says that equanimity is an attitude of mind which does not care for the welfare of beings and which remains apathetic towards them? It is therefore necessary to consider why equanimity is ranked as an exalted perfection.

In both secular and spiritual matters, it is natural that something which is difficult to get is of great value, and something which is easy to get is of little value. It is, therefore, a common knowledge that in the world, easily available materials, such as pebbles and sand, are cheap, whereas gold, silver, rubies and other gems, which are hard to come by, are precious.

Similarly in spiritual matters, greed, hate and other unwholesome mental states are likely to arise easily; accordingly, they are of little worth. It requires no special exertion to let them arise. As a matter of fact, what is difficult is to prevent them from arising in an uncontrollable manner. They are indeed like useless weeds. On the other hand, giving (dāna), morality (sīla) and other wholesome deeds cannot happen without putting forth the necessary effort; they do not take place automatically. One such meritorious deed is the development of genuine loving-kindness which is even superior to giving and morality. This genuine loving-kindness is indeed difficult to be developed. [1664]

There are three types of persons: a foe (verī-puggala), neither foe nor friend (majjhata-puggala) and a friend (piya-puggala). It is difficult to develop loving-kindness directed towards a foe (verī-puggala), but not so difficult towards neither a foe nor friend (majjhata-puggala); on the contrary, it is easy to direct loving-kindness towards a friend (piya-puggala). Loving-kindness that has as its object neither a foe nor neither foe nor friend but only a friend is loving-kindness of no value, no matter how often it is developed, because it is just a performance of an easy task.

If one desires to fulfil the perfection of loving-kindness properly, one should develop loving-kindness directed towards oneself first. Since such a development is in one's own interest, loving-kindness arises easily and fully without fail. This loving-kindness which is complete, as it is developed for one's own self, should serve as an example. Hence, loving-kindness should be directed towards oneself first.

When loving-kindness is directed towards a foe, neither friend nor foe and a friend, one should do so all alike without any discrimination, in the same manner one has done towards oneself. Could it be easily done? No, it could not be. Indeed, it is difficult to develop loving-kindness even towards a friend the way one does towards oneself, let alone towards a foe or a neutral person; as has been instructed by the Buddha, there is no person like oneself that one loves (atta-samaṃ pemaṃ natthi) (see SN 1.13, passim). Only when loving-kindness, which is so difficult to develop towards a friend, can be developed not only towards a friend but also towards the other two persons on a par with oneself and without the slightest difference, can it become genuine perfection of loving-kindness.

This suggests how difficult it is to develop genuine loving-kindness and how great its value is. On account of the development of this form of loving-kindness, as has been stated above, Suvaṇṇasāma was loved by wild beasts like tigers, lions, etc. It is even more difficult to develop equanimity (upekkhā) as a perfection than to develop loving-kindness for the same purpose.

It is not easy to develop equanimity even towards a neutral person of the three types. People would say: "I remain equanimous with regard to him now," or "In this matter, I adopt the attitude of he is the owner of his own productive deeds (kammasakā)," and so on. As such a saying signifies unconcern and disinterest, equanimity appears to be of little importance. In reality, equanimity presupposes paying attention to, and taking interest in, the object of contemplation, but as a neutral observer.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2865

As it is easy to develop loving-kindness towards a friend, so it is easy to develop equanimity towards a neutral person. Because one does not love or hate him, it is easy to keep one's attitude towards him balanced without any desire to see him happy or to see him suffer. But it is more difficult to develop equanimity towards a foe. Because, if one hates him, one rejoices easily when he declines, and one envies him when he prospers. It is hard to prevent both mental states from arising; when either of them sets in, even in the slightest manner, one fails to maintain equanimity.

It is still more difficult to develop equanimity towards a friend than towards a foe. Because one is already attached to a friend, one is delighted when he prospers or distressed when misfortune befalls him. It is difficult to prevent both delight and distress from arising in oneself.

Only when one maintains equanimity with the same attitude towards all three types of persons as towards oneself, without any of the above-mentioned difficulties, can the development of equanimity be possible. As long as there is partiality in one's attitude towards these three types of persons, equanimity is far from successful.

As has been said, the development of equanimity is not an attitude of unconcern or neglect; on the contrary, it does pay attention to and takes an interest in the object of contemplation. In doing so, one says to oneself: "Nothing can be done to make beings, including myself, happy or unhappy. Those who are possessed of good deeds will be happy and those who are possessed of bad deeds will be unhappy. Since their happiness and unhappiness are related to their past deeds, nothing can be done about them." Only profound reflection in this vivid manner, with living beings as objects of contemplation, constitutes genuine equanimity. Since it involves neither anxiety nor uneasiness, it is noble, serene and calm. The more it goes beyond loving-kindness, the higher its spiritual standard is.

Like loving-kindness, equanimity is one of the 40 subjects of tranquillity (samatha) meditation and one of the ten perfections. One who desires to meditate on equanimity according to the tranquillity method does so [1665] only for the highest absorption (jhāna) and not for the lower ones. Those who are slow to grasp, reach the highest stage of absorption (jhāna) only by acquiring them five times. For them, the Buddha has taught the fivefold absorption, which is called the fivefold (pañcaka) method. The absorption acquired for the first time by them is the first absorption, the one acquired for the second time is the second absorption and so on up to the fifth absorption. In this way, there are five absorptions for the dull.

The intelligent, however, reached the highest absorption after acquiring them four times. For them, the Buddha has taught the fourfold absorption, which is known as the fourfold (catukka) method. The absorption accomplished for the first time is the first absorption, and so on. In this way, there are four absorptions for the intelligent.

Those who have not attained any absorption (jhāna) in either of these two ways should not try to meditate yet on equanimity for the highest stage of absorption. Equanimity, as a subject for meditation, belongs to the fifth absorption in the fivefold (pañcaka) method and to the fourth absorption in the fourfold (catukka) method. The dull can meditate on equanimity only when they have attained the fourth absorption and the intelligent only after acquiring the first three absorptions, by means of other tranquillity subjects. Because equanimity, as has been said, is subtle, serene and noble, it thus belongs to the highest absorption (jhāna) and not to the lower ones.

Loving-kindness (mettā), on the other hand, belongs to the lower four or three absorptions. This indicates the fact that equanimity is superior to loving-kindness. If equanimity is not intended as a subject for meditation but intended as a perfection to be fulfilled, it can be developed at any time.

The Story about Bristling Hair

With regard to the perfection of equanimity, the story of the Bodhisatta's hair-raising, severe efforts in fulfilling the perfection of equanimity will be reproduced from the commentary to the Basket of Conduct (Mahā-lomahaṃsacariyā, Cp 3.15).

Once, the Bodhisatta was born in a family of wealth and rank. When the time came for his education, he went to a well-known teacher. After completing his education, he returned to his parents to look after them. On their death, his relatives urged him to protect and increase the riches that he had inherited.

However, the Bodhisatta had developed fear of all realms of existence, and his fear was based on the nature of impermanence of all conditioned things. He also had perceived the loathsomeness of the body and had no desire at all to be entangled in the thicket of defilements associated with a household life. In fact, his desire to get out of the world of sensuality had long been growing.

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2867

Accordingly, he wanted to renounce the world after abandoning his great wealth. “But because of the renown, my renunciation will make me famous,” he thought to himself. Since he disliked fame, gain and honour shown to him, he did not renounce the world.

In order to test himself whether he could unshakably stand the vicissitudes of life, such as gaining and not gaining wealth, etc., wearing the usual clothes, he left the house. His special desire was to fulfil the highest form of the perfection of equanimity by enduring the ill-treatment of others. Leading a noble life of austerities, he was thought by people to be a feeble-minded eccentric, one who never showed anger to others. Regarded as a person to be treated not with respect but with impudence, he roamed about villages and towns, big and small, spending just one night at each place. But he stayed longer wherever he was shown the greatest insolence. When his clothes were worn out, he tried to cover himself with whatever remnant was left. And when that piece was torn away, he did not accept any garment from anybody but tried to cover himself with anything available and kept moving.

After living such a life for a long time, he arrived at a village. The village children there were of an aggressive nature. Some children, belonging to widows and associates of the ruling class, were unsteady, conceited, fickle-minded, garrulous, indulging in loose talk. They wandered around, always playing practical jokes on others. When they saw aged and poor people walking along, they followed them and threw ashes on their backs. They tried to place nettles under the old people’s arm-pits just to make them feel uncomfortable. When the old people turned round to look at them, they mimicked their movements and manners by bending their backs, curving their legs, pretending to be dumb, etc. and had great fun, [1666] laughing among themselves.

When the Bodhisatta saw the unruly children, he thought: “Now I have found a good means of support for the fulfilment of the perfection of equanimity,” and he stayed in the village. Seeing him, the mischievous kids tried to make fun of him, who, pretending as though he could no longer endure them, and as though he was afraid of them, ran away. Still, the children followed him wherever he went.

The Bodhisatta, on the run, reached a cemetery and thought to himself: “This is a place where no one will prevent these mischievous youngsters from doing harm. I have now a chance to fulfil the perfection of equanimity to a high degree.” He went into the cemetery and slept there using a skull as a pillow. Getting an opportunity to indulge in devilry, the foolish children went where the Bodhisatta was sleeping and insulted him in various ways, spitting phlegm and saliva on him and doing other evil things and went away. In this way, they ill-treated the Bodhisatta every day.

Seeing these wrong acts done by the wicked children, some wise people stopped them. With the knowledge that: “This indeed is a holy ascetic of great power,” they all paid respects to him with utmost reverence.

The Bodhisatta kept the same attitude towards both the foolish kids and the wise people. He showed no affection to the latter who honoured him, nor aversion to the former who insulted him. Instead, he took a neutral stance between affection and aversion with regard to both parties. In this way, he fulfilled the perfection of equanimity.

Though this story is called the Long Story about Bristling Hair (Mahā-lomahaṃsa-cariyā), the name Mahā Lomahaṃsa was not that of the Bodhisatta. It just refers to the effect on those who come to know of how the Bodhisatta had practised; this horrible story could make their hair stand on end, hence, the story’s name Mahā Lomahaṃsa.

Fulfilment of Equanimity

The extinction of hate and love is the fulfilment of equanimity (upekkhā). The perfection of equanimity signifies stilling of these two mental states. There is no perfection of equanimity unless both are calmed.

In special affairs, staying in a negligent mood, without taking interest in anything, leads to the impairment of equanimity. Such an attitude cannot be called equanimity. It is only unawareness, which is wrongly thought to be equanimity.

Real equanimity is not indifference or unawareness. It sees both good and evil, which lead to happiness and suffering respectively. But he who observes equanimity reflects clearly: “I am not concerned with these matters of happiness and suffering; they are the results of their own good and evil deeds.”

In the commentary to the Book about the Guides (Nettipakaraṇa) it is stated: “Extreme absent-mindedness appearing as indifference with regard to various sense objects, either good or bad, is deceptive. Delusion (moha) disguised as equanimity is deceptive. Reluctance to perform deeds of merit also tends to deception by assuming the appearance of the sublime mode of equanimity. Indolence (kosajja) in doing good deeds is also likely to pretend to be equanimity. Therefore, one should take care of oneself not to be deceived by either delusion or indolence that is apt to behave like equanimity.

Essence of Equanimity

Equanimity in an ultimate sense is a separate entity. It is a mental concomitant (cetasika) called specific neutrality (tatra-majjhataṭā). But all the mental concomitants of specific neutrality cannot collectively be called the perfection of equanimity. Specific neutrality is a mental concomitant that is associated with all beautiful thoughts (sobhana-citta); it accompanies each arising of a beautiful thought. Specific neutrality which can be regarded as genuine perfection of equanimity pays attention to beings and reflects: “Happiness and suffering of beings are conditioned by their deeds (kamma) in which nobody can intervene. They have deeds as their own property and cause.” Specific neutrality (tatra-majjhataṭā) that arises out of contemplation, not of beings, but of the Three Treasures, alms giving and observance of the precepts, cannot constitute a perfection of equanimity. [1667]

When equanimity is maintained, contemplating happiness and suffering of beings, specific neutrality does not arise alone but all associated consciousnesses and mental concomitants appear with it. Though the object of specific neutrality and the object of its associates are one and the same, equanimity, with regard to the happiness and suffering of beings, is its main function. Therefore, this specific neutrality is designated a perfection of equanimity. Its associated consciousnesses and mental concomitants also come to be included in the perfection of equanimity; specific neutrality plays the leading role and this is the only difference between it and its associates.

Ten Kinds of Equanimity

There are other kinds of equanimity that cannot be included in the perfection of equanimity, though each of them is an ultimate reality. The Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) and the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA) enumerate ten such equanimities:

1. Equanimity with six factors (chaḷaṅgupekkhā).
2. Equanimity as sublime living (Brahma-vihārupekkhā).

The Second Treatise on the Perfections – 2870

3. Equanimity as a factor of Awakening (Bojjhaṅgupekkhā).
4. Equanimity of effort (viriyupekkhā).
5. Equanimity regarding formations (saṅkhārupekkhā).
6. Equanimity regarding feelings (vedānupekkhā).
7. Equanimity resulting from insight (vipassānupekkhā).
8. Equanimity as specific neutrality (tatra-majjhātupekkhā).
9. Equanimity resulting from the third absorption (jhānupekkhā).
10. Equanimity from the purity of the fourth absorption (pārisuddhupekkhā).

1. There are six sense objects, good and bad, that appear at the six sense spheres. Arahats are not delighted when the sense objects are desirable and not dejected when these are undesirable. Always being endowed with mindfulness and comprehension, they take them in with equanimity, maintaining their natural purity of mind. This kind of mental equipoise is called equanimity with six factors (chaḷaṅgupekkhā). That is, equanimity with six factors: the six sense spheres and six-objects.

2. Equanimity which views that happiness and suffering of beings occur according to their deeds is equanimity as sublime living (Brahma-vihārupekkhā). The perfection of equanimity is this kind of equanimity.

3. When efforts are made to attain the path and the fruition, if some factors are weak and other strong, the weaker ones are to be strengthened and the stronger are to be suppressed, but when these factors of the path reach the status of factors of Awakening (Bojjhaṅga), their associated factors are of equal strength. Equanimity observed equally on these elements is called equanimity as a factor of Awakening (Bojjhaṅgupekkhā).

4. In making efforts to attain the paths and fruitions, energy extended for just the required amount, neither too much nor too little, is equanimity of effort (viriyupekkhā).

5. In making efforts for the attainment of concentration, path and fruition states, remaining detached from conditioned things (saṅkhāra-dhamma), such as the hindrances (nivaraṇa) that are to be eradicated by means of the first absorption (jhāna) is called equanimity regarding formations (saṅkhārupekkhā). This equanimity regarding formations arises when the insight (vipassanā) wisdom matures. Before its maturity, one needs to make efforts to eradicate conditioned things (saṅkhāra-dhamma). But once the maturity is acquired, it is no longer necessary to make special efforts to eradicate them. Only an attitude of indifference is needed for the purpose.

6. Feeling experienced neutrally, without delight or dejection, when taking in a sense object is equanimity regarding feelings (vedanupekkhā).

7. Maintaining a mental equilibrium in developing insight into the nature of impermanence and other characteristics of the aggregates is called equanimity resulting from insight (vipassanupekkhā).

A brief explanation of insight (vipassanā) may be given here in this connection. Vi means “special” and passana “seeing.” Hence, vipassanā is “special seeing” or “insight.” Perceiving that there are concrete things, such as men, women and so on, is an ordinary knowledge, common to all. It is an understanding based on perception but not a special understanding based on profound wisdom. Insight is knowing: “In reality there are no such things as ‘I’ or ‘he.’ What is termed ‘I’ or ‘he’ is just an aggregate of matter and mind that is subject to destruction and dissolution. These aggregates are [1668] continuously decaying without interruption. There is no sign of impairment only because every decaying object is being endlessly replaced by a newly conditioned thing.”

8. Equanimity observed without making efforts to maintain specific neutrality on these correlated phenomena that are well-balanced in their respective functions is called equanimity as specific neutrality (tatra-majjhatsupekkhā).

9. In developing absorption (jhāna), remaining indifferent to the sublime bliss that appears at the third absorption is called equanimity resulting from the third absorption (jhānupekkhā). It is the equanimity that is acquired only in the third absorption (jhāna).

10. Being purified of all opposing factors and requiring no effort in pacifying them is called equanimity from the purity of the fourth absorption (pārisuddhupekkhā). It is the equanimity in the fourth absorption (jhāna) stage which is free of all opposing factors.

Of these ten, six: equanimity with six factors, equanimity as sublime living, equanimity as a factor of Awakening, equanimity as specific neutrality, equanimity resulting from the third absorption and equanimity from the purity of the fourth absorption, are the same in their ultimate sense. They are all mental concomitants that are specific neutrality (tatra-majjhataṭṭā-cetasika).

Why are they then enumerated as six kinds? Because they differ from one another in their time of arising. A simile is given in the above-quoted commentaries to explain this point: A man, in his childhood, is called a boy (kumāra); when he becomes older, he is called a youth (yuva); again, when he becomes older, he is called an adult (vuddha), general (senāpati), king (rāja), etc. A man is thus called differently according to the stages and positions in his life.

To make it clearer, their distinctions are due to the differences in their functions, which are as follows:

1. As has been stated before, to contemplate all six sense objects, good and bad, with equanimity is the function of equanimity with six factors (chaḷaṅgupekkhā).
2. To contemplate the happiness and suffering of beings with equanimity is the function of equanimity as sublime living (Brahma-vihārupekkhā).
3. In striving to achieve the absorptions (jhāna), path and fruition states, to contemplate with equanimity the hindrances that are to be removed is the function of equanimity as a factor of Awakening (Bojjhaṅgupekkhā).
4. To develop energy neither too much nor too little than what is required is the function of equanimity of effort (viriyupekkhā).
5. To contemplate with equanimity all correlated factors, without encouraging or suppressing is the function of equanimity regarding formations (saṅkhārupekkhā).
6. To contemplate sensations with equanimity is the function of equanimity regarding feelings (vedanupekkhā).
7. To contemplate with equanimity the three characteristics of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and non-self (anatta) is the function of equanimity resulting from insight (vipassanupekkhā).
8. To contemplate with equanimity the associated factors which are well balanced is the function of equanimity as specific neutrality (tatra-majjhataṭṭupekkhā).

9. To contemplate with equanimity even the most sublime bliss of the absorptions (jhāna) is the function of equanimity resulting from the third absorption (jhānupekkhā).

10. To contemplate with equanimity which is purified of all opposing factors is the function of equanimity from the purity of the fourth absorption (pārisuddhupekkhā).

Thus, not only the differences of functions but also those of the sense objects should be noted. Equanimity of effort is a concomitant of effort (viriyacetasika), and equanimity regarding feelings (vedanupekkhā) is a concomitant of feeling (vedanā-cetasika): These two equanimities are quite separate from other concomitants (cetasika) in terms of Dhamma.

Equanimity regarding formations and equanimity of effort are both concomitants of wisdom (paññā-cetasika). But they have two different functions as follows: Contemplating without making special efforts on the three characteristics of conditioned things (saṅkhāra) is equanimity resulting from insight; equanimity, when contemplating without fear of conditioned things (saṅkhāra) is equanimity regarding formations. [1669]

Equanimity as a Perfection and the Ten Equanimities

The list of these ten equanimities mentioned by the commentators do not directly include equanimity as a perfection. One might, therefore, be anxious to know: Is the exclusion due to the fact that equanimity as a perfection is not associated with any of the ten, or is it an oversight on the part of the commentators? It could not be said that the commentators were so negligent as to leave it out from their list. It is to be taken that the perfection of equanimity is contained in the equanimity as a sublime living (Brahma-vihārupekkhā).

However, some are of the opinion that the equanimity as a sublime living and the perfection of equanimity are two different things. According to them, taking up one and the same attitude towards one's foe and friend is the perfection of equanimity; taking up one and the same attitude towards the happiness and suffering of beings, with the thought that these two conditions are the result of their own deeds, is equanimity as a sublime living.

That is to say, the perfection of equanimity contemplating the happiness and suffering of beings is not the perfection of equanimity but equanimity as sublime living.

However, the nature of the perfection of equanimity is explained in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa, Bv 2.164) thus:

Tatheva tvaṃ sukha-dukkhe, tulā-bhūto sadā bhava, upekkhā-pāramitaṃ gantvā, Sambodhiṃ pāpuṇissasi.

Therefore, in suffering and happiness, you should be like the scales of a balance, having come to the perfection of equanimity, attain Full Awakening.

In this verse, sukha-dukkhe tulā-bhūto means “in suffering and happiness, you should be like the scales of a balance.” Thus, contemplation of happiness and suffering is taught as the basis of the perfection of equanimity also in the Story about Bristling Hair (Mahā-loma-haṃsa-cariya, Cp 3.15), where it is said:

*Ye me dukkhaṃ upaharanti, ye ca denti sukhaṃ mama, sabbesaṃ samako homi...
Sukha-dukkhe tulā-bhūto yasesu ayasesu ca.*

There, also on the basis of those two stages in life, it is taught:

Some people do harm to me, while others give comfort, my attitude towards all of them is the same ... Whether in suffering and happiness, or in fame and disgrace, I am like the scales of a balance.

In the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA) and the Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentary mentioned above, explanations are given also on the basis of those two mental states: happiness and suffering. “Though the village boys’ ill-treatment of the Bodhisatta, such as the spitting of phlegm, would normally cause suffering and the villagers’ honouring him with flowers, scents, etc. would normally cause happiness, the Bodhisatta viewed both with a balanced attitude of mind. The Bodhisatta’s equanimity that did not deviate from that balanced position was the supreme perfection of equanimity (paramattha-upekkhā-pāramī).

Besides, when the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) and the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA) explain the characteristics, functions, etc. of equanimity as a factor of Awakening (Brahma-vihārupekkhā), it is said thus: Equanimity has the characteristics of viewing beings with neutrality (sattesu majjhata-kara-lakkhaṇa upekkhā). “Beings” here is used as a general term; it means those who offend and those who show kindness towards oneself or those who are happy and those who are suffering. Therefore, taking up a neutral attitude towards one's foe and friend alike is clearly equanimity as a factor of Awakening (Brahma-vihārupekkhā). Therefore, it clearly means that the perfection of equanimity is also included in equanimity as a factor of Awakening.
