The citizens had thus regained their senses and became reasonable once again. After hearing the verse, it dawned on them: "We have not personally witnessed the fatal event and what we have heard may or may not be true. And there is one point that calls for special consideration: These heretics are bent only on wishing ill to the monastics, wanting their undoing and ruination. We should not make one-sided statements believing in the words of the heretics. We really do not know the truth about these monastics." They began to have a sense of detestation and repentance for their conduct towards the monastics. The scandalous accusations did not last long, after seven days died away completely.

The Murder of Sundarī Exposed

King Kosala had a squad of secret service personnel, who were spread throughout the city, to find those responsible for the death of Sundarī and to bring them to justice.

On one occasion, the murderers were drunk on the liquor which they bought with the money they received from the heretics for slaying Sundarī. Two murderers quarrelled with one another and started making accusations and one of them shouted at the other: "So you are enjoying drinks with the money you got from the heretics for killing Sundarī and keeping her dead body under the heap of decayed flowers." The secret police arrested them and brought them to King Pasenadi Kosala.

The King asked: "Did you kill Sundarī?" They admitted it, saying: "Yes we did your majesty." The king went on to ask: "Who instigated you to commit the crime?" They replied: "At the instigation of those heretics from outside the Buddha's teaching." The heretics were sent for and a formal investigation was made. The heretics admitted their guilt.

The king passed judgment, ordering the heretics to go round the city and proclaim: "We engaged the murderers to kill Sundarī with the sole purpose of bringing about the ruination of the ascetic Gotama. Ascetic Gotama is innocent; his disciples are also absolutely faultless. We are solely responsible for the killing of Sundarī." You must go all over the city and get this message announced by word of mouth.

In obedience to the order of the king, the heretics did as they were bid. The citizens lost their [637] respect for them and were disgusted with them. The heretics had to undergo punishment on the charge of murder. The citizens honoured, revered and esteemed the Buddha and his Saṅgha more than ever before. They made offerings to the Buddha and the Saṅgha with even greater faith.

Buddha's Utterance of Joy

Then a great number of monastics approached the Buddha and sat in a suitable place after paying obeisance to him. They then addressed him: “Most exalted lord, it is indeed an unprecedented event deserving of praise by the snapping of the fingers. Most exalted Buddha, your prophecy that those voices would not last long; that they would last only for seven days and would disappear after a period of seven days has proved to be true, the voices are no more.”

The Buddha was well aware of the fact that there never was a case where a wise, virtuous person could not tolerate even the most heinous accusation by lowly, stupid persons. This feeling of supreme confidence led to repeated development of joy and satisfaction so much so that it reached the point of bursting forth in an utterance of an exalted utterance (Ud 4.8):

Tudanti vācāya janā asaññatā, sarehi saṅgāma-gataṃ va kuñjaraṃ, sutvāna vākyam pharusam udīritam, adhivāsaye bhikkhu aduṭṭha-citto.

Monks, a monastic who has renounced the world for fear of the evil consequences of transient existence should overcome evil forces by toleration, like a war elephant that resists and repulses the arrows from the side of its foe in a battlefield, when attacked by those lowly, stupid persons without any restraint in deed, word and thought, who employ stupid abusing, slandering and accusing, as if attacking you with a double edged sword.

Here a question might arise as to why the Buddha had not revealed the fact that the heretics were at the bottom of the whole affair, though he had full knowledge of this case of conspiracy? The answer is as follows: there is no point in telling this to noble persons (ariya-puggala). The noble persons have, from the outset, complete faith in the nobility of the Buddha and the Saṅgha. And there might be certain persons amongst the ordinary worldlings who would not accept the words of the Buddha when he was revealing the facts of the case. Disbelief in the Buddha amounts to an unwholesome act in thought, which may cause them untold harm and suffering for a long time to come, hence the Buddha's reticence at the time.

In other words, it was not a natural law (dhammatā-acinṇa) to foretell the events and their related sequences. They are not wont to point out a particular person as a culprit in a criminal case. They deal with such matters only in an objective way as in the verse for refutation mentioned above. They were not in a position to deter the misfortune that was destined to befall them either. They had, therefore, taken up an indifferent attitude towards accusations by the people, and of Sundarī's assassination, which formed the cause of those accusations.

And, there is yet another question that may be asked as to the origin of this unwholesome fate of being accused in this most disgraceful manner, when there was a tremendous amount of merit to the credit of the Buddha for incalculable wholesome deeds done throughout 4 immeasurables and 100,000 aeons!

This is the answer: The Buddha was once a habitual drunkard, named Murāli, in a previous existence, at the earlier stage of life as a Bodhisatta. He moved about in the company of immoral, wicked persons and eventually acquired an unwholesome mental attitude. One day, he noticed a Paccekabuddha, known as Surabhi, in the act of rearranging his robes, preparing to enter [638] the town for alms round. Incidentally, a woman was seen to have gone past the Paccekabuddha. Murāli, with a habitual wrong frame of mind happened to make a casual remark: "This monastic indulges in sexual pleasure."

He suffered in the realms of woes for several 100,000s of years for that offence; and he had to pay for the remnant of his past misdeed by being maliciously accused by the people of having indulged in sexual intercourse with the heretic Sundarī, even after attainment to the most exalted state of an Awakened Buddha.

There are twelve kinds of similar retributions in which the Buddha had to suffer for his past misdeeds in previous existences. These are laid down in Apadāna 39.10 and its commentary. [639]

26a: The 8th Rains Retreat (Prince Bodhi)

As stated before, the Buddha observed the seventh Rains Retreat (Vassa) on the emerald stone slab at Tāvātimsa and taught the Abhidhamma throughout. At the conclusion of that Rains Retreat, the Buddha descended to the human world by the triple stairway and taught the Discourse where Sāriputta asked Questions (Sāriputta-sutta, Snp 4.16), and so on, at the base of the stairway, near the gate of the city of Saṅkassa, for the benefit of humans, Devas and Brahmas present. The Buddha then observed the eighth Rains Retreat (Vassa) in the forest of Bhesakaḷā near the town of Susumāragiri in Bhagga province.

The country of Bhagga, where the Buddha observed the eighth Rains Retreat (Vassa), was one of the sixteen historic countries in the Middle Country (Majjhima-desa). Susumāragiri was named after a big crocodile that raised its voice from the river at the moment of laying the foundation-stone of the town. The forest where the Buddha observed the eighth Rains Retreat (Vassa) was named after the location of what was once the abode of a Yakkha by the name of Bhesakaḷā. The forest was a sanctuary.

[The original had a very short account here of the Buddha's meeting with Nakulapitu and Nakulamātā, who had been his relatives in previous lives. I have removed it as the full story is told in the chapter chapter 45a.]

The Story of Prince Bodhi

The story of Prince Bodhi is given here based on two treatises: the Discourse to Prince Bodhi (Bodhi-rāja-kumāra-sutta, MN 85) and Dhṛp 157 and their commentaries. We deal with this story in abridged form.

Prince Bodhi was the son of King Udena. He learnt the art of managing elephants and wielding the iron hook for controlling them from his royal father. As such, he became an expert in elephant taming.

During the reign of King Parantapa, in the country of Kosambī, the queen was one day taking a sun bath with the king in an open space. She was at an advanced stage of pregnancy and was wearing a red blanket. Suddenly a big monster bird came sweeping down and snatched away the queen, mistaking her for a piece of meat. The queen made no attempt [640] to call for help lest it might drop her at the cost of her life.

The bird dropped her at the fork of a tree, its usual place of feasting. Then the queen shouted at the top of her voice, clapping her hands at the same time, with the result that the huge bird flew away from fright. The queen gave birth to a child at the fork of the same tree. She clad herself in the red blanket due to a constant shower of rain all night.

There was a recluse living in the vicinity of the tree. The recluse went to the base of the tree at dawn, as he had heard the voice of the queen the night before and asked her about her race and birth. Once he knew all about it, he made a ladder for her to come down, and took her to his hermitage. The boy baby was named Udena as he was born in a moist (uda) atmosphere of rains and in a mountainous region.

One day, as she received the recluse on his return from the forest, she tempted him to yield to her feminine charms as she was anxious about her own future. As a result, both lived together as man and wife. Years rolled by and King Parantapa of Kosambī passed away. The ex-recluse discovered the king's death by means of his astrological knowledge and intimated the matter to the ex-queen: "Your king had passed away. Do you want your son to stay on in this forest or to return to Kosambī and claim the throne of his father and remain there as a ruler?" The ex-queen acquainted her son with the true aspect of his life to ascertain his attitude. When she learnt of her son's desire to become a king, she confided to the ex-recluse.

The recluse was well versed in incantation that had the power of wielding influence upon elephants. He learnt it from Sakka, who once came and asked the recluse: "Is there anything that causes you to feel worried?" The recluse replied: "Yes, we have been facing the danger of annoying elephants." Sakka taught him incantations and gave him a harp to overcome his trouble. His instructions were that when the recluse wanted the elephants to go away, he should tune the harp in a certain way and recite a certain verse and when he wanted the elephant to come, he should tune the harp in a different way and recite a different verse. The ex-recluse taught the prince how to make use of the harp and to utter the incantation in case of emergency. The prince climbed up in a banyan tree to see for himself how the incantation worked. When he saw the elephants coming towards him, he struck the right chord of the harp and uttered the appropriate incantation and, sure enough, the elephants ran away through fright.

On the following day, he caused the elephants to come, by playing the harp and uttering the incantation as instructed. The elephants came running to him in response to his command. The elephant king lowered its shoulder for the prince to step on it. Riding the elephant, the prince selected young, stout and strong elephants capable of engagement in a battle field. He requested for the red blanket of his mother and her ring to serve as evidence of his lineage. Then paying homage to his parents, he left the forest. He stopped at every village in his attempt to build up an army by announcing: “I am the legal son of the late King Parantapa; anyone wishing wealth and prosperity may join me.”

Surrounding the city with his army, he laid claim to his father’s throne: “I am the legal son of the late King Parantapa. Hand over the throne to his rightful successor.” To support his claim, he showed the red blanket and the ring of his mother to those who seemed to have doubt about his claim. In this manner, he was able to ascend the throne without let or hindrance.

King Udena was very much fond of capturing elephants. He would go without hesitation to any place to capture elephants on being told about the presence of fine elephants. King Candapajjota, a rival of King Udena, was desirous of learning the art of managing elephants from King Udena. He caused the construction of a wooden elephant and kept trained soldiers inside of the sham elephant which served as a trap to catch King Udena as and when he came out to catch elephants. His plan succeeded and King Udena was taken prisoner.

King Caṇḍapojjota sent his daughter, Vāsuladattā, to King Udena to learn the art of elephant management and the two eventually fell in love with each other. King Udena eloped with Princess Vāsuladattā and lived in the town of Susumāragiri in the province of Bhagga. Princess Vāsuladattā gave birth to Prince Bodhi, who learnt from his father, King Udena, the art of elephant management and became an expert in it. [641]

Prince Bodhi Builds the Kokanada Palace

Prince Bodhi caused the construction of a palace with a turreted roof known as the Kokanada (Red Lotus). The turret was of peculiar and unprecedented design and won the admiration of the people. The prince asked the master builder: “Have you constructed a turret of a similar design elsewhere or was it the first of its kind ever constructed by you?” He replied: “Your majesty, this is the first of its kind I have ever constructed.” Whereupon, Prince Bodhi was worried with the thought: “Should the carpenter build a similar turreted mansion for someone else, my palace would no longer be the object of praise and wonder by the people.” An evil, cruel thought entered his head to plot the destruction of the architect and deprive others of having a similar palace built. He was thinking of doing away with the builder either by killing him, or by cutting off his hands and feet or extracting his eyes.

Prince Bodhi happened to confide his brutal plot against the carpenter to one of his close boyhood friends, named Sañjikaputta, who was of kindly disposition and considerate. Sañjikaputta felt certain Prince Bodhi meant what he said, but he was quite against the idea of destroying an innocent man of arts and crafts of such great prominence. He made up his mind to avert the imminent danger and so he went to the carpenter and asked: “Have you finished the work of constructing the turreted palace for Prince Bodhi, or is there anything still left to be done?” When the carpenter said: “All is complete,” he confided, “Prince Bodhi wishes to do away with you, please be careful about your security.”

The master carpenter replied with words of gratitude: “Dear Lord, you have, indeed, done very well by such kind words,” and he told him: “I will do everything as demanded by the circumstances.” When Prince Bodhi asked him: “Master carpenter, is there anything yet to be done in connection with the turret?” He said: “Your majesty, it is not completed yet, there is still lot to be done.” Whereupon, the Prince asked: “What work is left to be done?” The carpenter said in reply: “Your majesty, details will be given later, just provide me with the necessary timber immediately.” The prince demanded: “What kind of timber do you want me to supply?” – “Your majesty, just light wood, light and dry wood,” was the reply. The prince, not suspecting anything, supplied him with light and dry wood as demanded.

The master carpenter subsequently asked the prince: “Your majesty, please do not visit my place of work forthwith, as the kind of job I am about to handle is very delicate, so much so that I will have no leisure to enter into conversation with anybody, excepting my wife who is charged with the task of conveying food.” The prince gave his consent, saying: “Very well.”

The master carpenter stayed in a work cabin and cut the soft wood to measurement and built a “Flying Vehicle” in the form of a Garuḍa bird. On completion of the job, he asked his wife to turn their household property into hard cash and jewellery and to have the family kept in a state of readiness. Prince Bodhi posted security forces around the place where the turret was supposed to be under construction. When everything was ready, the master carpenter had his family gather together at the workshop and after taking their morning meal they went aboard the flying vehicle and flew away. The guards reported the matter to the prince: “Your royal highness, the master carpenter is gone.” The carpenter and his family descended to a region of the Himālayas and settled there permanently. The new settlement developed into a city and he ruled the region as its king. He was known as King Kaṭṭhavāhana.

The Inauguration of the Turreted Palace

Prince Bodhi had in mind to invite the Buddha and his Saṅgha to the inauguration of his palace. Therefore, he caused it to be decorated and smeared profusely with sweet scents. Then he had a white carpet laid from the lowest rung of the ladder.

The prince had no offspring. He thought that there was the chance of getting a son or a daughter should the Buddha care to tread on the white carpet; if not otherwise. That was the idea behind the laying of the white carpet. [642]

When the Buddha arrived at the palace door, the prince paid homage to him in a traditional manner and received his bowl with his hands, saying: “Exalted Buddha, please enter.” But the Buddha would not enter the palace. The prince requested the Buddha three times in succession. At the third time, the Buddha turned round and looked at Ven. Ānanda who at once realized that the Buddha would not tread upon the white carpet. He therefore, turned to the prince and asked him to remove the white carpet since the Buddha would not tread upon it.

Facts relating to Prince Bodhi’s object of laying the white carpet and the Buddha’s refusal to tread upon it are fully explained in the commentary to MN 85. Here we give an abridged form of the exposition.

The prince’s object: Prince Bodhi had no offspring. He had heard that any handsome offerings made to the Buddha usually bring about fitting rewards. He, therefore, made the resolution that he would get an offspring should the Buddha care to tread on the white carpet; if not otherwise.

Prince Bodhi’s former deeds: The prince was an inhabitant of a small island in one of his previous existences. He had a wife who had a similar frame of mind. They killed and ate helpless small birds by mutual consent. The Prince stood the chance of having children had he married a woman other than the wife just described. Since he and his wife were jointly responsible for the destruction of the young birds in the past, they were equally guilty of taking the life of the infant birds. The Buddha was well aware of all this and hence his refusal to tread upon the white carpet that had been purposely laid on that occasion.

There are still some other points to ponder here: The prince was predestined not to get any offspring due to previous actions, and nothing could interfere with the course of cause and effect, even though the Buddha tread upon the carpet laid by the prince with an erroneous idea. He might, through ignorance, make an additional mistake by forming an idea that nothing could be gained by making offerings to a Buddha, notwithstanding the adage that every offering made to a Buddha brings about fitting rewards. He might be led to form such mistaken ideas on this aspect.

Such a practice might be a cause for complaint by members of other sects: “Those monastics are wandering around hither and thither and treading on the white carpets and there is nothing that they dare not do.”

Amongst those monastics who might have occasions to tread on the white carpets during the lifetime of the Buddha, there are monastics replete with supernormal faculties that enabled them to know the mind of the people. Such monastics would tread on carpets as and when they should be tread upon. They would refuse to do so, when circumstance did not allow. Once the Buddha had passed away, the chances of attaining the paths and fruitions endowed with the knowledge of the future would be rare for sentient beings, if not remote. Their faculty of reasoning will deteriorate and they will not be able to decide whether the white carpets should be trod on with advantage or disadvantage. It would be well if they had enough foresight to decide as necessary. If not, the lay devotees might naturally form the idea that: “During the life time of the Buddha, offerings made to the Saṅgha invariably fulfilled their wishes, whereas nothing accrued from the offering made to the monastics of our time. Perhaps they are not devoted to the practise of the path nowadays.” Such thoughts might make them unhappy.

It was for these reasons that the Buddha did not tread on the white carpet, and Ven. Ānanda also stated: “The Buddha did not tread on the white carpet in consideration of the facts stated above and because of concern for the monastics of the generations to come.”

The Prince had the white carpet removed and conducted the Buddha to the mansion and offered him gruel, soft food and sweet meats. When the alms ceremony was over, the prince addressed the Buddha: “Most exalted Buddha, it occurred to me that the state [643] of peace and tranquillity can only be attained by strenuous effort.” Whereupon, the Buddha replied: “Prince, I was also of the same idea when I was a Bodhisatta,” and explained to him the part of his life from the time of taking up austere practices to the time of teaching the Discourse about the Characteristics of Non-Self (Anatta-lakkhaṇa-sutta, SN 22.59) to the Group-of-Five monks, who consequently became Arahats.

Prince Bodhi Takes Refuge in the Three Treasures

When the Buddha had taught the discourse dealing with the establishment of the Group-of-Five monks in the Arahats fruition, Prince Bodhi asked him: “Most exalted Buddha, for one who has a teacher such as you, how long has he to work for the attainment of the Arahats fruition and thereafter enjoy peace and tranquillity?” The Buddha replied: “Prince, in this connection I would ask you a question and you may answer as you deem fit and proper: ‘Aren’t you skilful in managing elephants and the wielding of the goad?’ ” The prince replied: “Yes Lord, I am skilful in elephant management and the wielding of the goad.”

The Buddha went on to ask the prince: “Prince, supposing a person, knowing that you are skilful in the art of elephant management and the wielding of the goad, came to learn the art of elephant management under you and he had these defects, he was: Lacking in confidence, he had not enough confidence to attain the desired standard or goal; he was suffering from a disease bad enough to prevent him from attaining the desired goal; he made false pretence or put on vain and boastful airs, that deterred him from attaining the desired goal; he was lacking in earnest effort to attain the desired goal; he was not intelligent enough to attain the desired goal. Would that person be able to learn the art of elephant management and the wielding of the goad from you?”

The prince replied: “Most exalted Buddha, it will not be possible to train a person with any one of the five defects to attain the desired goal, let alone the question of training one with all those five defects.”

Again, the Buddha put a set of alternative questions: “Prince supposing the person who comes to you to learn the art of elephant management and wielding of the goad has the following qualifications: He had enough confidence that enabled him to reach the desired objective; he was free from any disease, and was one with sound enough health to enable him to reach the desired objective; he did not make false pretence, or he is one with an honest mind that enables him to attain the desired objective; he was one with earnest effort that enabled him to reach the desired objective; he was a man of intelligence capable of attaining the objective. Will it be possible for you to train a person with such qualifications to achieve the desired objective?”

Prince Bodhi replied: “Most exalted Buddha, it will be quite possible for me to train a person to achieve the desired objective even when he has only one out of the five qualifications, the more so if he is one with all the five qualities.”

The Five Elements of Effort

The Buddha then proceeded to teach: [644] “Prince in a similar manner, there are five qualities to be striven after by one who practises meditation:

1. In this Dispensation, a monastic has complete confidence in the Arahata path-knowledge (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) and the omniscience of the Buddha, with the understanding that the Fully Self-Awakened Buddha is replete with the nine attributes.<sup>210</sup>
2. He is free from disease, and possesses an equable frame of mind and body, and is endowed with a gastrointestinal system (pācaka-tejo) which can digest food easily, which is conducive to the practice of meditation.
3. He is free from pretensions and deceptions, presenting himself as he is to the Buddha or to his associates.
4. He is diligent in the work of doing away with what is bad and striving after what is good. He is energetic and steadfast in his effort. He possesses unrelenting zeal to perform deeds of merit, free from fault.
5. He is possessed of wisdom and is one with penetrative knowledge or path-insight into the state of “rising and falling” of the conditioned, (udayabbaya-ñāṇa) that eradicates the suffering of the round of rebirths.

Prince, as already stated, a person who has these five qualities (padhāniyaṅga): faith, freedom from illness, honesty, diligence, and knowledge of the rising and falling of the conditioned, is capable of realizing the Arahata fruition (Arahatta- phala) within seven years under the guidance of a teacher like the Buddha and can thereafter live happily.

26a: The 8th Rains Retreat (Prince Bodhi) – 898

Prince, if a period of seven years be considered to be too long, a person who has these five qualities can realize the Arahāt fruition within six, five, four, three, two, one year under the guidance of a teacher like the Buddha and can thereafter live happily.

Prince, should a period of one year be considered too long, one possessed of these five qualities can realize the Arahāt fruition within seven months under the guidance of a teacher like the Buddha and can thereafter live happily.

Prince, should a period of seven months be considered to be too long, one endowed with these five qualities can realize the Arahāt fruition within six, five, four, three, two, one month, half a month, under the guidance of a teacher like the Buddha and can thereafter live happily.

Prince, should a period of 15 days be considered too long, one endowed with these five qualities can realize the Arahāt fruition within seven days, six days, five, four, three, two, one day under the guidance of a teacher like the Buddha and thereafter live happily.

Prince, should a period of one day is considered to be too long, one endowed with these five qualities can realize the Arahāt fruition within half a day, that is, one endowed with these five qualities and instructed by the Buddha in the evening can realize the Arahāt fruition in the morning; or, when instructed in the morning he can realize the Arahāt fruition in the evening. This was the answer given in response to the question by Prince Bodhi.

Here are some points connected with the five factors (padhāniyaṅga) from a verse written by Ledi Sayādaw, which can be learnt by heart:

Faith, health, honesty, diligence, insight into the state of flux, are the qualities to be striven after, [645] to attain the Arahāt path (Arahatta-magga)!

Of these five mundane factors, confidence or faith (saddhā) may be divided into four classes:

1. The faith of Bodhisattas that has remained unshaken since the time of making the resolution to become a Buddha (āgama-saddhā).

26a: The 8th Rains Retreat (Prince Bodhi) – 899

2. The faith of noble persons (ariya-puggala) that remains unshaken since the time of the realization of path-knowledge (adhigama-saddhā).
3. The faith in the Buddha as one who is perfectly Self-Awakened; in the Dhamma which has been well-taught; in the Saṅgha for its uprightness (okappana-saddhā).
4. A simple adoration through respect for the moral virtues of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha (pasāda-saddhā).

Of these four modes of faith, the faith in the Buddha (okappana-saddhā) should be considered as the factor forming a constituent of the effort factors (padhāniyaṅga).

When Prince Bodhi had heard of the practical and personal knowledge of the Dhamma taught by the Buddha, he said these words of adoration and praise: “One who practises as taught by the Buddha in the evening is able to attain path and fruition in the morning; one who practises as taught by the Buddha in the morning is able to attain path and fruition in the evening. The Buddha is wonderful, the Dhamma is wonderful, the way of teaching the Dhamma, which is good in the beginning, good in the middle and good in the end, is wonderful, indeed.” This the prince said in praise of the way in which the Buddha had taught the Dhamma.

When the youth, Saṅjikaputta, heard of Prince Bodhi’s address of appreciation of the discourse, he spoke against the prince: “This Prince Bodhi has said that Buddha is wonderful, the Dhamma is wonderful and that it is good in the beginning, good in the middle and good in the end, and he also praised the way in which the Dhamma was taught. With all that, the prince does not seem to have taken refuge in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha.”

Whereupon, the prince explained to him in detail: “My dear Saṅjikaputta, please do not say so; please do not say so, please take note of certain facts which I am about to tell you now, that I had heard from my mother in the past: When the Buddha took up residence at Ghositārāma monastery in the country of Kosambī, my mother respectfully approached the Buddha and made a solemn request: ‘Most exalted Buddha, please be so kind as to do honour to my coming child, a son or a daughter, whom I am bearing now, and who takes refuge in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha, by accepting them as a lay devotee, male or female as the case may be, from the time of their birth to the time of their death.’

26a: The 8th Rains Retreat (Prince Bodhi) – 900

My dear Sañjikaputta, when the Buddha took up residence in this very sanctuary of Bhesakaḷā forest in the province of Bhagga, my governess approached the Buddha carrying me in her arms and made a request: ‘Most exalted Buddha, this Prince Bodhi takes refuge in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha, please be so kind as to regard this prince as a lay devotee from today till he breathes his last.’

My dear Sañjikaputta, in addition to the two requests made by my mother and my governess, I do hereby for the third time take refuge in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha. The most exalted Buddha, may you regard me as a devout lay devotee from today forward for the rest of my life!”

A question might arise as to the effectiveness or otherwise of the requests made by his mother and his governess on his behalf. Strictly speaking, they were not effective due to a lack of volition (cetanā) on the part of the person concerned. There is no such thing as taking refuge in the Three Treasures without volition.

Does it mean that the two previous requests were null and void? As a matter of fact, [646] they were not valueless, they served as a stepping stone to devotional faith and placed the prince in good stead. He became aware of the attributes of the Three Treasures when his parents acquainted him with what they had done for him in anticipation of his birth. He virtually became a confirmed lay devotee the moment he was aware of the attributes of the Three Treasures and placed confidence in them.

Prince Bodhi Attains Stream-Entry

After that, Prince Bodhi sat at a place free from the six faults and addressed the Buddha: “Most exalted Buddha! I am one of your devotees. My mother requested for the first time the favour of your accepting me as a lay devotee before I was born and my governess repeated a similar request for the second time holding me in her arms when I was a baby. I have also renewed the request for the third time now I have come of age. Even so you refuse to tread on the white carpet laid by a devotee like me, may I know the reason?”

Whereupon the Buddha asked him: “Prince, what was your object of laying that white carpet?” – “Exalted Buddha, I did it with the thought and wish that if I was to be bestowed with a son or a daughter, you would tread on it,” was his admission.

26a: The 8th Rains Retreat (Prince Bodhi) – 901

The Buddha said in response: “That was the reason why I did not tread upon it.” The prince again asked: “Exalted Buddha, am I destined to go without any offspring, a son or a daughter?” – “Aye, prince,” replied the Buddha.

The prince asked: “What was the cause of it?” the Buddha gave him a hint: “This is because you had been forgetful and had indulged in the five sensual pleasures in association with your wife, as a partner, in a past existence!” The prince requested the Buddha to enlighten him as to when and in what existence had he been forgetful and indulgent in the five sensual pleasures.

The following is the Buddha’s reply to his request: “Once upon a time, hundreds of people went across the ocean by means of a big boat. The boat was wrecked in the middle of the journey and all the travellers perished with the exception of a couple who managed to land on an island by means of a plank.

The island was inhabited by quite a large number of birds, and the couple, being pressed by hunger, managed to satisfy their hunger by baking the eggs of the birds for their meals. When they found that eggs alone would not do, they killed young birds for their meals, throughout their first, second, and third stages of their lives. They did not realize at all that their indulgence in pursuit of luxurious living constituted a wrong deed.”

Having revealed their past immoral deeds, the Buddha proceeded to evaluate their guilt, saying: “Prince, had you and your wife realized your wrong deeds at a certain stage of life, you might have stood a chance of getting offspring at a corresponding stage of your present existence. Had either of you realized the wrong deed, there is a chance of getting offspring on that score. Prince, one who holds oneself dear, will always be aware of the advantages of moral acts in all stages of life, failing which, he might guard himself against wrong deeds at one or the other stage of his life.” The Buddha then went on to teach (Dhp 157):

Attānañ-ce piyaṃ jaññā, rakkheyya naṃ surakkhitāṃ, tiṇṇaṃ aññataram yāmaṃ, paṭijaggeyya paṇḍito. [647]

Prince, a wise person who holds himself dear, guards himself from any shortcomings, in his own interests for both the present and future existences. One should see to it that he cleans the dust of the ten wrong deeds from himself, in his own interests in one or the other of the three stages of life.

26a: The 8th Rains Retreat (Prince Bodhi) – 902

The passage: “A wise person who holds himself dear, guards himself,” should be understood clearly: In the case of an ordinary devotee, he should not consider himself to be well protected by simply shutting himself in the topmost chamber of a mansion with its doors and windows securely fastened and security guards well posted on the outside. In a similar manner, a monastic should not consider himself safe in a cave with its doors and windows securely fastened.

A lay devotee guards himself well only by giving alms and observing the precepts as far as possible. A monastic guards himself by performing his routine duties towards his associates and the elderly monastics, and striving to learn the teaching and practise meditation in the interests of their progress and security.

The passage that reads: “One should see to it that he cleans the dust of the ten wrong deeds from himself, in his own interests in one or the other of the three stages of life” means; it is imperative that a monastic or a lay person should strive to gain merit by observance of the precepts of his own prescribed standard in all stages of life, or failing which, at one of the stages of life.

When one cannot perform meritorious deeds at a young age, he should do it at the second stage of life. Failing which, due to the burden of a household life, he should do it at the last stage of life without fail. Such a person is considered to have worked for his self-purification. One who fails to work for his own purification, is considered to be one who does not “hold himself dear” and to be paving his way to the plane of misery.

In a case where a monastic fails to observe the monastic precepts and practise meditation at the first stage due to pressure of work and studies, he should do so at the second stage. When he could not find time to observe the monastic precepts and practise meditation due to a heavy burden of advanced studies at the second stage, he should, on no account, fail to do it at the third and final stage of life. Only then could he be considered to be a person who works out his own purification, one who holds oneself dear and who would be free of bitter regret. This is the correct interpretation of the lines under consideration.

At the conclusion of the discourse, Prince Bodhi attained the fruition stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti), and the discourse proved to be beneficial to those present on that occasion.

26b: The 8th Rains Retreat (Mahā Moggallāna)

Māra Enters the Belly of Ven. Moggallāna

Once upon a time, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna took up residence at a monastery in the Bhesakaḷā forest sanctuary, near the town of Susumāragiri in the province of Bhagga. While he was taking a walk in an open space, Māra, the evil one, chanced to enter his belly and sat on top of the large intestine. Ven. Mahā Moggallāna felt that his belly weighed heavy like a mass of stone. The belly was tight and weighty as though it was full of cooked gram or a bag full of damp and watery gram. He considered that should the heaviness in his stomach be due to indigestion, it would not be proper to keep on walking in the open. He eventually retired to the chamber and sat on a reserved seat.

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna deliberated as to the cause of the trouble in a normal way. Had he made any attempt to rub his stomach after contemplating on the purity of his morality (sīla) and making a will to do away with all the pain caused by indigestion or disturbances of his internal system, the stupid Māra would have been torn into pieces. But he did not make any attempt to allay his pain in that way, instead, he simply deliberated on its cause in a normal manner.

After scrutinizing the cause of his stomach pain, he noticed that the evil Māra was [648] sitting on top of his large intestine, and he said: “Wicked Māra, get out, don’t you give trouble to the Realised One! Don’t bring trouble upon yourself and suffer the consequences for a long time.”

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna said this because any attempt to give trouble to the children means giving trouble to the parents. In a like manner, to give trouble to the disciples amounts to giving trouble to the master. That was what Ven. Mahā Moggallāna meant when he said: “Don’t you give trouble to the Realised One.”

Māra thought Ven. Mahā Moggallāna was saying: “Wicked Māra, get out, don’t you give trouble to the Realised One! Don’t you try to give trouble to the disciple of the Realised One; don’t bring trouble upon yourself and suffer the consequences for a long time, without seeing me at all.” He was also of the impression that even the Buddha would not have the power to notice him, let alone his disciple. Whereupon, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna made it plain to Māra: “Wicked Māra, I know you and I know what is going on in your mind, don’t you think that I have no power to know about your thoughts. You are the evil Māra, you are presently thinking I know nothing about you, when I said: ‘Get out evil Māra, don’t try to give trouble to the Realised One; don’t you try to bring trouble to the disciple of the Realised One! Don’t you try to give trouble to the disciple of the Realised One. Don’t bring trouble upon yourself and suffer the consequences for a long time.’ You have been thinking that even the Realised One would not have the power to notice you, leave alone a disciple like me. Isn’t that what was going on in your mind?”

Māra came to realize that the elder had actually noticed him and knew his thought, and so he came out of Ven. Mahā Moggallāna’s stomach and hid himself outside the door. When Ven. Mahā Moggallāna noticed him standing outside the door, he said to him: “Wicked Māra, I see where you are at present. Don’t think I can’t see you. I see you standing outside the door.”

Then it occurred to Ven. Mahā Moggallāna: “Odour emitted from the human body can cause inconvenience to celestial beings 100 leagues away in the sky, Māra belongs to the Paranimmitavasavatti realm which is inhabited by powerful Devas who are noted for their purity and delicate body. But, since Māra had placed himself on top of a filthy intestine, it may be assumed that he is out to do me harm and cause my destruction. For a being with such a frame of mind, there is no immoral act that he would be loath to do! He does not seem to have any sense of conscience or concern about the consequences of his evil deeds. It would, therefore, be wise, in the circumstances, to let him know that we were relatives by blood and to make him meek and sober so he can be persuaded to leave.”

With this end in view, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna acquainted Māra with the fact that he was his nephew by revealing the course of his own unwholesome life in a previous existence.

Unwholesome Deeds in the Past

“Wicked Māra, there was an event of interest that occurred in the time of Buddha Kakusandha. I was a Māra by the name of Dūsī and my sister was Kāḷī and you were then the son of my sister. Thus you were my nephew then.”

In this connection, Mahā Moggallāna recounted a succession of paternal and maternal relatives from knowledge handed down from generation to generation. In the case of human beings, a son ascended the throne of his father by inheritance, but this is not the case with beings of the celestial world. A celestial being springs into life to take the place of another

26b: The 8th Rains Retreat (Mahā Moggallāna) – 905

celestial being as and when his predecessor dies, according to his merits. The present Vasavatti Māra was a nephew of Dūsī Māra. After passing away from that existence, he performed good deeds and consequently became Vasavatti Māra, according to his merits. It was not that Dūsī Māra's nephew was still remaining in existence in that realm. [649]

Having acquainted Māra with how they were related by blood in a previous existence, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna went on to reveal the fact that he, in the capacity of Dūsī Māra, had committed a heinous act, and he had to suffer in the plane of miseries for a long time (Māra-tajjanīya-sutta, MN 50 and its commentary).

“Wicked Māra, I was Dūsī Māra during the time of Buddha Kakusandha, whose chief disciples were Vidhura and Sañjīva. The chief disciple, Vidhura, excelled the rest in matters concerning the Dhamma hence he was named Vidhura, meaning a wise elder. Ven. Sañjīva would abide in the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti) with ease wherever he might be, either in a forest, at the base of a tree, or at a secluded place. Once it so happened that cowherds, farmers and passers-by mistook him for a dead monastic in a sitting posture, while he was actually enjoying the attainment of cessation. They all collected fire-wood, dried grass and cowdung and placed them on his body, and wanting to cremate him, they set it alight and departed.”

Non-returners and Arahats wishing to enjoy the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti) perform four preliminary functions of willing: 1) That such possessions of his as are not on his person, may not be destroyed by the five enemies, such as fire, water, etc.; 2) that he may rise up even before a messenger arrives and be ready when his services are required by the Saṅgha; 3) that he may rise up even before the messenger arrives and be ready when called or sent for by the Buddha; 4) that he will not pass away while he is still absorbed in the attainment which is achieved by preliminary ascertainment of the time of expiry of his life-continuum. It is not necessary to will for the safety of what he is wearing, and so on, as not a single thread of his robe could be affected by any danger, including the fire caused by the cowherds and others.

“Wicked Māra, on the following morning, Sañjīva emerged from his attainment, and came out treading on the burning red hot cinders, shaking off dust from the robe, and entered the village for alms round. Cow herders, farmers and passers-by who had cremated him the day before, were struck with wonder when they noticed the great elder on his alms round. They spoke among themselves: ‘This is a sort of miracle which has never occurred before; the monastic was seen to have died in the sitting posture the other day, and now he is miraculously back to life again.’ Wicked Māra, all those people therefore called the great elder by the name of Sañjīva because he sprang back to life again.

Wicked Māra, Dūsī Māra hit upon a plan to create a situation that would agitate the minds of the good natured monastics by cruel means. He thought to himself: ‘I have no knowledge of whence those virtuous, righteous monastics come from and where they are bound for; I will incite the Brahmin householders to decry those monastics who are reputed to be virtuous and righteous, to speak evil of those monastics among themselves, using abusive language, despising, condemning, decrying, and deriding the monastics. Such behaviour on the part of the Brahmin householders will disturb and derange them, thereby creating a chance for me to cause harm to them.’

Wicked Māra, that Dūsī Māra went ahead to incite the Brahmin householders to act according to his instructions by calumniating and humiliating the monastics, with the result that Brahmin householders started to speak ill of the monastics through that misunderstanding: ‘Those monastics with foul means of livelihood, those shavelings of dirty, low castes, born of the arched upper part of a Brahma’s foot, sitting down lazily, gloomily pretending to be enjoying absorption (jhāna), with bent necks and faces drooping down. They may be likened to an owl lying in wait for rats in the foliage of a tree, a fox looking slyly for fish along the banks of a river, like a cat lying in wait for its prey at the mouth of a drainage pipe or at a garbage container, like an ass, with a hole in [650] its back, moping near a garbage dump at a corner in the fencing; those monastic shavelings of dirty, low castes, born of the arched upper part of a Brahma’s foot, sitting down lazily, gloomily pretending to be enjoying absorption (jhāna), with bent necks and faces drooping down.’ ”

They thus abused the monastics by using abusive and harsh words, they calumniated the monastics according to the instruction of Dūsī Māra, through that misunderstanding. Most of those people were reborn in the planes of woe, such as Niraya, the animal worlds, the worlds of the Petas and Asuras, according to their guilt.

26b: The 8th Rains Retreat (Mahā Moggallāna) – 907

We should consider the following points with reference to this passage: “Most of those people were reborn in the four planes of woe,” in order to arrive at a correct view of the case.

If those people were possessed by Dūsī Māra and were made to abuse the monastics as his agents, they were not guilty of an offence because of lack of intent or volition on their part in doing so. Dūsī Māra was solely responsible for this immoral act and it follows that those people were not liable to be reborn in the planes of misery on that score.

What actually happened was this: Dūsī Māra did not attempt to possess them and use them as his agents, but he created a situation that compelled them to turn against the monastics through a misunderstanding. He created scenes that showed the presence of women in the vicinity of the monks; scenes that showed the presence of men in the vicinity of female monastics; monastics in the act of fishing with traps and nets, of catching birds with traps, of hunting with hordes of hounds in the forest, enjoying drinks in the company of women at the liquor shops, dancing and singing; women lingering in the vicinity of monastics and young men in the vicinity of the residence of the female monastics at dusk. These were the tactics adopted by Dūsī Māra.

People noticed such incompatible, discordant scenes whenever they went to the forests, to the parks and to the monasteries, so much so that they were thoroughly disgusted with the monastics and agreed among themselves not to make any further offerings to them saying: “These monastics indulge in acts inappropriate for them. How would we gain merit by making offerings to such base persons?”

They reviled the monastics whenever they saw them and they were thus reborn in the planes of misery for their unwholesome deeds toward monastics.

“Wicked Māra, when Buddha Kakusandha came to know that his monastics had been outraged by the people under the undue influence of Dūsī Māra, he urged his disciples to cultivate the four sublime abodes (Brahma-vihāra): 1) loving-kindness (mettā), 2) compassion (karuṇā), 3) altruistic joy (muditā), 4) equanimity (upekkhā). The monastics cultivated the four sublime abodes, with due diligence as instructed by the Buddha.

When Dūsī Māra found out that such a tactic could not influence the minds of the monastics, whose past existences and future destinations were beyond his range of intelligence, he decided, once again, to reverse the mode of his tactics by influencing the people to pay homage and make offerings, with an ulterior motive to disturb and derange the monastics, thus giving him an opportunity to harm them.

Wicked Māra, those Brahmins did as they were bid, paying homage and offering alms to the monastics. Wicked Māra, most of those people were reborn in the celestial planes of happiness for such deeds of merit.”

Some points of interest with regard to the attainment of the people to the planes of happiness: Just as Dūsī Māra created unpleasant scenes on the previous occasion, so he created pleasant and agreeable scenes to promote devotional faith of the people in the monastics; [651] he created scenes depicting the monastics in different postures; some were flying in the sky, some standing or sitting with crossed-legs, some stitching robes, others teaching or learning the canonical literature, and spreading robes over their bodies in the sky as well as young novices plucking flowers in the sky.

When the people noticed the monastics engaged in such activities wherever they went, in the forests, in the gardens or in the monasteries, they told the people in the town their own experience saying, “These monastics, even young novices are of great glory and powers and worthy of offering. It is greatly beneficial to make offerings to such glorious, worthy monastics.”

People then made offerings to the monastics in the form of robes, food, monasteries and medicine and earned great merit; they were reborn in the celestial planes of happiness after death for such deeds of merit!

“Wicked Māra, this is how Dūsī Māra used his undue influence on the people to pay homage and make offerings to the monastics once again.”

After revealing this part of that fateful event to Māra, Buddha Kakusandha turned to the monastics and urged them to practice meditation: “Come monastics, abide practising meditation by contemplation on the unpleasantness of the physical body (asubha); the repulsiveness of material food (ahāre paṭikūla); the unpleasant, undelightful, unsatisfactory nature of the world (anabhirati), the insubstantial and impermanent nature of conditioned phenomena (anicca). Wicked Māra, in obedience to the exhortation of Buddha Kakusandha, all the monastics meditated on these subjects in the forests or secluded corners and at the base of the trees, with the result that they became Arahats in due course.”

26b: The 8th Rains Retreat (Mahā Moggallāna) – 909

Buddha Kakusandha visited all the residential places of the monastics in the world, regardless of the number of monastics at one place, and urged them to take up meditation. The monastics practised these four kinds of meditation as the foundation of their spiritual work and went on to cultivate insight meditation, ultimately gaining the Arahat fruition.

“Wicked Māra, sometime afterwards, Buddha Kakusandha went on alms round, attended by his right-hand chief disciple, Ven. Vidhura, and Dūsī Māra, failing to get an opportunity to harm the monastics by instigating the householders to revile them or also to honour them, made his last bid to destroy the Saṅgha. He took possession of a youngster and threw a handful of stones at Ven. Vidhura. The stones hit the elder’s head cutting the skin and bruising the skull, as the result of his assault.

Wicked Māra, the elder Vidhura followed behind Buddha Kakusandha with streams of blood running down his head, unmoved or unshaken by the incident. Thereupon, Buddha Kakusandha turned around bodily to look at him, with the look of an elephant and condemned the offender: ‘This foolish Dūsī Māra does not know his limits,’ and at that very moment Dūsī Māra passed away from the world of the Devas, and was reborn in the plane of misery.”

Herein, the passage: “With the look of an elephant” should be understood. When an elephant turns to look at an object, it does not turn its head only, it actually turns its body right round.

The bones of ordinary people are joined together with their edges touching one another; in the case of Paccekabuddhas their bones are joined together by hooks at the end of each joint, in the case of Buddhas their bones are joined together by rings on either side of the joints. It is for this reason that Buddha Kakusandha had to make a complete turn of the body before he could look at the object behind his back, like a golden figure turning round mechanically. Buddha Kakusandha thus turned round and made that remark: “This Dūsī Māra does not know his own limits. He has done an extremely heinous act.”

In connection with the passage: “At this moment Dūsī Māra passed away from the world of [652] Devas and was reborn in the planes of misery,” it should be understood that Devas of the celestial planes usually die in their respective planes at the expiry of their terms of life. It should not be taken, therefore, that Dūsī Māra died in the world of humans. It should be understood that he went back to the celestial plane and passed away from there to be reborn in the plane of misery.

26b: The 8th Rains Retreat (Mahā Moggallāna) – 910

It should be borne in mind that although Dūsī Māra died the moment Buddha Kakusandha turned round to look at the scene of crime, it does not mean that he lost his life on that score. As a matter of fact, his life term was cut off as if by a huge axe because of his atrocious offence against a Buddha's chief disciple who was possessed of great virtue and had vast attributes.

“Wicked Māra, Dūsī Māra had to serve his term of punishment in the Great Hell (Mahā Niraya) also called the Hell of the Six Contacts (Chaphassāyatanika), the Hell of being Pounded by Stakes (Saṅku-samāhata) and the Hell that is Personally Experienced (Paccatta-vedanīya).”

The denizens in the Hell of the Six Contacts type of hell had their sense-organs: eye, ear, nose, tongue and body pierced by tapered iron-rods, and, as a result, they were constantly subject to excessive pain at the site of each sense organ, which is termed “pain through contact.” That plane of misery is accordingly known as the Hell of the Six Contacts plane of misery.

The same hell is also known as the Hell of being Pounded by Stakes plane of misery because it has abundant supply of tapered iron-rods to punish the denizens.

Another name for it is the Hell that is Personally Experienced, because of its nature of self-infliction even without anyone to impose the suffering.

“Wicked Māra, warders of this Great Hell used to come at regular intervals, and told me that when two javelins had come together at my chest it would mark the completion of 1,000 years.”

The passage: “When the two javelins have come together,” needs to be explained. The denizens of this type of hell measure three miles in size. The executioners, in two groups, started to punish them by piercing and lacerating his body from the chest with javelins, saying: “This is the spot where your thoughts arose to do evil.”

Each javelin was of the size of a palm tree in diameter; each party of executioners comprised 50 in number. One group went from the chest towards the head causing severe pain by lacerating with javelins all the way along. The other group made their way towards the feet from the chest in a like manner. Each party took 500 years to reach to the head or to the feet, or 1,000 years to make a complete round trip when the two groups come together again at the chest.

“Wicked Māra, I had to suffer torment in that Great Hell for hundreds of thousands of years, and on being released, I had to pass through a sub-section of that hell, named Ussāda, where I was subjected to punishment more severe than in the Great Hell, for 10,000 years before final release.

Wicked Māra, I had the body of human beings and the head of a fish throughout the time I was being tormented in that hell.

The head of man is round and on it the javelins are liable to slip off whereas the head of fish is long and flat and serves as a good target.

After recounting the events of the past, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna proceeded to preach to Māra in 21 verses to make him repent his own follies:

“The hell where Dūsī Māra was punished for offending the Arahat Vidhura, the disciple of the Buddha, as well as the Buddha himself, has the nature of being tormented by piercing with iron javelins; these javelins give punishment automatically, even without executioners to wield them. Wicked Māra, you are liable to be tormented in such a hell for offending the disciple of the Buddha, who has understood the cause and effect of any deed.

There are certain abodes situated in the middle of the ocean. They have the pleasant appearance of gems with brilliant colours. A great number of Devakaññā can be seen singing and dancing in those abodes. Wicked Māra, you have offended the chief disciple of the Buddha, who is fully [653] aware of these abodes, and the pleasures enjoyed by those celestial maids, and the causal conditions of those pleasures.

That monastic caused the Eastern Monastery, donated by Visākhā, mother of the rich man Migara, to be shaken, even while being watched by the company of the Saṅgha at the instance of the Buddha. Wicked Māra, you will have to suffer the consequences of your offence against the monastics accomplished in supernormal power (abhiññā) and wisdom (paññā).

That monastic caused Sakka’s Vejayanta palace to be shaken with his big toe, with the aid of his supernormal power, thereby frightening all the Devas. Wicked Māra, you will have to suffer the consequences of your offence against the monastic accomplished in supernormal power and wisdom.

That monastic went to the Vejayanta palace of Sakka and asked him this question: “Sakka, do you know the emancipation that is void of all forms of desires?” Sakka, on being asked thus gave the right answer. Stupid Māra, you will have to suffer the consequences of your offence against a disciple of the Buddha, who is accomplished in supernormal power and wisdom and who was able to ask such a question.

That monastic asked the Brahma a question near the Sudhamma Dhamma hall: “Dear lay devotee, are you still of the erroneous view that there is no powerful monastic or recluse capable of coming to the realms of the Brahmas? Have you ever seen the overwhelming radiance of the Buddha that excels those of the illuminations of the Brahmas, of their mansions and of their costumes?” The Brahma answered: “I no longer hold the old erroneous views. I see the radiance of the Buddha that surpasses the illuminations of the Brahmas and of their mansions and of their costumes. Why should I insist anymore that I am a permanent, or an immortal, being?” Wicked Māra, you will have to suffer the consequence of the offence against the disciple of the Buddha, who is accomplished in supernormal power and wisdom that he was enabled him to ask such a question.

That monastic contacted through supernormal power (abhiññā) based on the freedom-absorption (vimokkha-jhāna), the summit of Great Meru and the four islands continents, east, west, south and north, at the time of suppressing the Nāga King, Nandopananda.

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna had covered the Great Meru and the four islands continents through the agency of a created Nāga at that time.

“Wicked Māra, you will have to suffer the consequences of your offence against the disciple of the Buddha, who is accomplished in such supernormal power and wisdom that he was enabled to ask such a question.”

In dealing with Māra, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna was referring to himself as if he was another monastic. Such a mode of teaching is termed the method having reference to another (añña-padesa).

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna managed to subdue Māra by exhibition of his supernormal power (abhiññā) in seven ways from:

1. With reference to the Discourse Rebuking Māra (Māratajjanīya-sutta, MN 50).

26b: The 8th Rains Retreat (Mahā Moggallāna) – 913

2. With reference to his supernormal power to go on teaching tours as in the Stories about Heavenly Mansions (Vimāna-vatthu) and the Stories about Petas (Peta-vatthu).
3. With reference to the exposition of the Discourse concerning Mahā Moggallāna (Mahā-moggallāna-sutta, SN 51.14).
- 4-5. With reference to the Short Discourse on the Destruction of Craving (Cūḷa-taṇhā-saṅkhāya-sutta, MN 37).
6. With reference to the Discourse about a Certain Brahmin (Aññatara-brahma-sutta, SN 6.5).
7. With reference to the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) on the suppression of the Nāga King. [654]
8. Fire does not make any effort to burn the foolish person. It is the foolish person that gets burnt by touching the fire. Just as the foolish person gets burnt by touching the fire, so will you be burnt by offending the Buddha.
9. Māra, you have done sinful acts by offending the chief disciple of the Buddha. Do you think that your sinful act will not produce a fitting result?
10. Wicked Māra, the amount of unwholesome deeds standing against you increases with the progress of time. Wicked Māra, have you not got tired of doing harm to the Buddha? You should have taken your lesson from the evil deeds of your uncle Dūsī Māra who had to suffer in the realms of misery. You should at once cease harming the disciples of the Buddha.

Citing examples Ven. Mahā Moggallāna thus exhorted Māra so as to cause him to repent his follies and to dread the consequences for a long period in the forest sanctuary of Bhesakaḷā, with the result that Māra, with a heavy heart, disappeared on the spot.

26c: The 8th Year (Pañcaggadāyaka)

After observing the eighth Rains Retreat (Vassa) and emancipating sentient beings, who were worthy of emancipation, by teaching the Discourse to Prince Bodhi (Bodhi-rāja-kumāra-sutta, MN 85) and other discourses in the Bhesakaḷā forest sanctuary, near the town of Susumāragiri, the Buddha left for Sāvattḥī to take up residence in the Jetavana monastery.

The following story is drawn from the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta) commentary, in its exposition of the Discourse about the Perfected One (Muni-sutta, Snp 1.12), which, however, is not in agreement with the exposition in the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, Dh 367) commentary.

There was a Brahmin lay devotee by the name of Pañcaggadāyaka. He was so named because of his habit of offering the five kinds of foods that came first and foremost in the process of production:

1. He used to offer the first ears of corns, barley or oats from his fields to the Buddha and the Saṅgha in the form of gruel prepared with milk, in the belief that offering the first products will yield early benefits. This is the offering made of the first crop from the field.
2. When the grain was mature and ripe, he had the grains put in a heap after threshing and winnowing and prepared them into meals and offered them first to the Buddha and the Saṅgha. This is the offering made of the grains from the first part of the harvest.
3. After storing the harvested crops in many granaries, when the first granary was opened, he had some grains from the first lot taken out and prepared them as meals for offering to the Buddha and his Saṅgha. This is the offering made of the grains from the granaries.
4. The cooked food collected from each and every cooking pot was first offered to the monastics. Until such an offering had been made to the Saṅgha, no one was permitted to partake of the food from the pots. This is the first offering made from the cooking pots.
5. He never took his breakfast before collecting a certain amount for offering to the Buddha and his Saṅgha in the morning. In the afternoon he collected a certain amount from his dining table for offering to the poor, in whose absence, the collected food stuff was given to the dogs.

26c: Pañcaggadāyaka – 915

This is the offering made before he took his meals.

Thus he came to be known as Pañcaggadāyaka, “one who made offerings of five kinds on the first occasions.”

One early morning, the Buddha looked into the world with the knowledge of underlying tendencies (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa) and the knowledge of others’ dispositions (indriya-paro-pariyatta-ñāṇa) and perceived the supporting conditions of Pañcaggadāyaka and his wife to be established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga), and so he had himself tidied up and he stayed in his chamber on that particular morning. [655]

All the monastics in the monastery used to assemble at the Buddha’s chamber at the time of going for alms round every morning. They always went for receiving alms in the town with the Buddha leading. But the Buddha used to remain in the chamber behind closed doors whenever he wanted to be all alone. On such occasions, monastics went on alms round all by themselves after circumambulating the scented chamber with the tacit understanding that the Buddha would not go with them for reasons known only to himself.

On that day the Buddha remained in his chamber, behind closed doors, at the time of going for receiving food. He came out only when it was time for Pañcaggadāyaka to have his meal.

He entered the city of Sāvattihī all by himself and the citizens knew that someone would be blessed by him that day, and so they did not come out as usual to invite him for alms offering.

The Buddha went along the route from door to door, and stopped at the door of Pañcaggadāyaka at the time when the Brahmin was holding a bowl of food to be eaten and his wife was in a state of preparedness to fan her husband while he was enjoying the food. His wife was the first person to notice the Buddha standing in front of their house. She tried to keep the Buddha out of sight of her husband by keeping the fan in between the Buddha and her husband. She knew that if her husband saw the Buddha, he would offer all the food in his bowl to the Buddha, thereby requiring her to make a fresh preparation of food for her husband.

At the same time, she was assailed with confusion and irreverence. The Buddha knew all about it and directed the radiance from his body towards the couple. When the husband saw the golden coloured radiance, he asked her: “What’s this?” He looked around and he saw the Buddha standing at the door of the house. Whereupon, the wife dropped the fan, hastened to the Buddha and paid homage and worshipped him, in accordance with the time-honoured tradition. The Buddha uttered a verse in praise of her while she was in the act of standing up, as warranted by the favourable circumstance (Dhp 367):

*Sabbaso nāma-rūpasmiṃ, yassa natthi mamāyitaṃ,
asatā ca na socati, sa ve bhikkhū ti vuccati.*

One who has cut off clinging to mind and matter (nāma-rūpa) without holding the erroneous views of I, my own, he or she is free from sorrow and lamentation. Because of the cessation of mind and matter, he has penetrated the dark mass of defilements and deserves to be regarded as a holy, noble monastic.

The wife of the Brahmin was established in the fruition stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti) at the conclusion of this verse.

The Buddha was invited by the Brahmin into his house and offered a seat. He then offered him his share of the food, pouring water as a token of dedicating food to the Fortunate One, and saying: “Most exalted Buddha, you are the most Arahat person in the world with its Devas and humans. May you receive my offer of food with the alms bowl.” The Fortunate One fulfilled his request by receiving the food offered in his bowl and partaking of it. The Fortunate One then uttered the following verse after his meal, noting that the time was appropriate (Snp 219):

*Yad-aggato majjhato sesato vā, piṇḍaṃ labhetha para-dattūpajīvī,
nālaṃ thutuṃ no pi nipacca-vādī, taṃ vāpi dhīrā muni vedayanti.*

A monastic lives on food enthusiastically offered by supporters, either from the [656] first portion or the middle portion or the last portion of the pot, as his means of livelihood. A monastic gratefully accepts the food regardless of which part of the pot that morsel of food comes from. He is not over-pleased to receive the first portion of food nor is he disturbed by being offered the leftovers. He has abandoned likes and dislikes. Such a person, who is regarded only by wise people as one who has eradicated the pollutants (āsava), is indifferent to the world and worldly incidents.

Pañcaggadāyaka attained the fruition stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti) at the conclusion of the discourse.

26d: The Buddha's Visits to Śrī Laṅkā

The Buddha's First Visit to Śrī Laṅkā

This is an account of the Buddha's three visits to the Island of Śrī Laṅkā, in the first, fifth and eighth year after Awakening, in abridged form, drawn from the Great Chronicle (Mahā-vamsa).

The Buddha observed the first Rains Retreat (Vassa) after becoming a Buddha in the Deer Park at Isipatana, near Bārāṇasī. From there he proceeded to the forest of Uruvelā to emancipate the recluse Uruvelā Kassapa by an exhibition of miracles. At that time, the citizens of Aṅga and Magadha were going to pay their annual homage to the recluse with gifts. The recluse did not wish the Buddha to come to the great festival offering. His thoughts were known to the Fortunate One. So on that very day the Buddha went to Uttarakuru to receive an offering of food, and from thence he returned to Lake Anotatta to have his meal, and at night-fall in the ninth month of Awakening he went to Śrī Laṅkā.

His visit coincided with the conference of Yakkhas held at a spot which is the location of the garden of Mahānāgavana of today, measuring three leagues in length by one league in breadth in the central part of the Island, along the bank of a river. The Buddha went to the place where the Yakkhas were holding the conference and while standing directly above their heads, on the spot where the Mahīyaṅgana Cetiya stands today, he caused heavy rain to fall and strong winds to blow and darkness to descend to frighten them.

The Yakkhas were very much frightened and they beseeched the Buddha to grant them a place of refuge, free from danger. The Buddha consoled them by telling them that he would relieve them of their anxieties and troubles, if he was offered a place on the Island to stay. Whereupon, they replied: "Lord of peace and tranquillity, we hereby offer you this very spot and we beseech you to give refuge to all our kind on this Island."

The Buddha restored peace and calmed the fears of the Yakkhas by causing the rain, storm and blackout to cease and descended to earth and, spreading a leather rug, sat upon it. When the Buddha spread the leather rug over the place, Yakkhas ran away to escape from the unbearable heat emanating from the blazing carpet and took refuge in the remote areas of the Island. The Buddha caused the Island of Giridīpa to come close to Śrī Laṅkā to accommodate the restless Yakkhas. Once all the Yakkhas had settled there, he caused the Island to move back to its original site.

The blazing leather rug was removed as soon as Śrī Laṅkā was rid of all Yakkhas. Then all the good Devas assembled on the Island and held a conference among themselves. The Fortunate One taught the Dhamma to them with the result that millions of beings realized the four noble truths and a countless number of Devas took refuge in the Three Treasures with strong faith.

The Buddha's Relics

Mahā Sumana Deva, a resident of the Sumanakūṭa Mountain, attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti) by hearing the Dhamma at the conference, just mentioned above. He requested the Buddha for an object of worship. The Buddha rubbed his head with his fingers to collect a handful of hair and gave it to Mahā Sumana. After that, the Buddha returned to Uruvelā forest.

Mahā Sumana brought the handful of hair in a gold casket and kept it at a spot that [657] was strewn with a variety of jewellery; it was where Mahīyaṅgana Cetiya is standing today. The gold casket containing the handful of hair was enshrined in a small relic shrine (stūpa) built of amethyst.

In course of time, Ven. Sāriputta's disciple, named Ven. Sarabhu, after the Buddha's passing brought the neck-bone of the Buddha from the cremation by his supernormal power to this place. He sanctified it by enshrining it in the original shrine of small dimension and raised its height to twelve cubits, assisted by a company of monastics. Ven. Sarabhu then returned after reconstruction of the shrine.

Years rolled by and Prince Uddha Cūḷābhaya, younger brother of King Devānampiyatissa rebuilt the old shrine to a height of 30 cubits, enveloping the smaller shrine. Later, King Duṭṭhagāmaṇi again reconstructed that shrine, making it 80 cubits high. Thus, Mahīyaṅgana Cetiya grew to a great height by successive modifications through the years.

The Buddha's Second Visit to Śrī Laṅkā

At a time when the Buddha was residing at Jetavana monastery in Sāvathī, during the fifth Rains Retreat (Vassa), there was a battle being fought, involving huge armies for the possession of an emerald throne between two Nāgas, Mahodara and his nephew Cūḷodara. When the Buddha perceived this unhappy state of affairs, he woke up early and taking his robe and alms bowl, he went to theatre of war, which was the Island of Nāgadīpa, to save the Nāgas from destruction.

Mahodara was a powerful king who claimed sovereignty over the Nāga country, with an area of 500 leagues in that part of the ocean. Mahodara gave away his sister, Kaṇhā, in marriage to another Nāga King who was ruling over the Vaḍḍhamāna mountain region. In due time, they produced a son named Cūḷodara.

Cūḷodara's maternal grandmother gave her emerald throne to Cūḷodara's mother before her death. Consequently a war broke out over the possession of the throne between King Mahodara and his nephew Cūḷodara. These inhabitants of the mountain region were also powerful rulers in their own region with their own big army.

There was a Deva, named Samiddhi Sumana, living in the Rājāyatana tree near the arched entrance to Jetavana monastery. He accompanied the Fortunate One all the way to Nāgadīpa, carrying the Rājāyatana tree as an umbrella, to protect the Fortunate One from the weather, with the permission of the Fortunate One.

This will be further clarified: Samiddhi Sumana was a human being living in Nāgadīpa in his previous existence. Once, he noticed a Paccekabuddha having his meal at the spot where the Rājāyatana Cetiya is standing today. He offered the Paccekabuddha, out of reverence, a bunch of branches for use in washing and cleaning the bowl after his meal.

For this deed of merit, he became a Tree Deva of the Rājāyatana tree near the arched entrance to the garden of Jetavana, owned by Prince Jeta. The Rājāyatana tree stood outside the monastery since the time of its construction. The Buddha brought Sumiddhi Sumana together with the Rājāyatana tree which was for his own benefit and in the interest of the Island.

The Buddha, on arrival at the Island, sat in the sky above the middle of the battle grounds and caused complete darkness in the area to frighten the combatants in the battle. Then he caused the area to become bright and clear again to relieve the Nāgas of fear and anxiety. The Nāgas, on seeing him, felt happy and rallied around him and worshipped at his feet with profound respect.

When the Buddha taught the Dhamma to them in the interest of peace and tranquillity, [658] the two rival Nāga kings were very much delighted and they were interested in the teaching, so much so that they made an offering of the emerald throne to him by their mutual agreement.

Then the Buddha came down and sat on the throne and partook of the delicious food offered by the Nāgas and taught the Dhamma to them again, with the result that 800 million Nāgas, both of land and water, took refuge in the Three Treasures with great faith. These events marked the first visit to Śrī Laṅkā by the Buddha.

Maṇi-akkhika, the Nāga King of Kalyāṇi region, a maternal uncle of Mahodara, also arrived at Nāgadīpa to take part in the war. He had already taken refuge in the Three Treasures at the time of the Buddha's first visit to Śrī Laṅkā. He made a solemn request to the Buddha: "Exalted lord, you have, indeed, done a great deed of kindness to us by your exhortations. Had you not come to this place, by now we would have been reduced to ashes. Our ardent wish is that, out of compassion, you do honour to the place of my dwelling, Kalyāṇi, by your visit when you come to Śrī Laṅkā on the next occasion." The Buddha kept silent to signify his acceptance of the invitation.

Then the Fortunate One urged them to build Rājayatana Cetiya on that spot as a memorial to the happy occasion. He presented the Rājayatana tree to them and returned the emerald throne with instructions to hold them as sacred objects of veneration: "Nāga lords, these two objects should be held in high reverence as relics of my utensils (paribhoga-cetiya) in your own interest and for your continued prosperity." The Buddha, after leaving those instructions, returned to Jetavana monastery at Sāvathī. These events marked the second visit to Śrī Laṅkā by the Buddha.

The Buddha's Third Visit to Śrī Laṅkā

Three years later, Maṇi-akkhika, the Nāga King, went to Sāvathī to invite the Buddha cordially to Śrī Laṅkā, while he was in residence at Jetavana monastery. It was on a full moon day of May (Vesākha), during the eighth year after the Buddha's attainment to Buddhahood, and one day after Maṇi-akkhika's arrival. The Buddha, on being informed of the time for the meal, put on his robe and went across to Śrī Laṅkā, together with 500 monastics.

The Nāga King Maṇi-akkhika, accompanied by his Nāgas, conducted the Buddha and his monastics to a jewelled pandal near the site where Kalyāṇi Cetiya is now situated and offered delicious celestial food to him and the monastics with profound respect.

After teaching Maṇi-akkhika and all the Nāgas, the Buddha travelled through the sky to the Sumanakūṭa hill and left an impression of his foot, in order that future generations might hold it as a sacred place (pāda-cetiya). He went to the base of the hill in the company of monastics to spend the day and proceeded to Dīghavāpī.

During his sojourn at Dīghavāpī, he and the monastics enjoyed fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti) on the spot where the Dīghavāpī Cetiya is standing today. This is one of the sacred places held in high reverence by the people from the days of yore. From here, the Buddha proceeded to the Garden of Mahā Meghavana.

On arrival at Meghavana garden, together with the 500 monastics, the Buddha sat and enjoyed fruition-attainment together with the monastics. On the spot where the Buddha sat a sapling of the original Mahā Bodhi tree was planted.

From there, they proceeded to the location of the Mahā Cetiya and together they enjoyed fruition-attainment. Rising from this attainment, they proceeded to the present location of Thūpārāma Cetiya and enjoyed fruition-attainment together again.

Rising from this fruition-attainment, they went to Silā Cetiya, which still [659] stands today, and taught the Dhamma to all the Devas who happened to be gathered there at that time. After which, together with his 500 monastics, the Buddha returned to Jetavana monastery. These events marked the Buddha's third visit to Śrī Laṅkā, and so this concludes the account of the Buddha's three visits to Śrī Laṅkā. [660]

27a: The 9th Rains Retreat (Ghosaka and Māgaṇḍiya)

The Rich Man Ghosaka

This short account of the rich man of Kosambī has been compiled from the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, DhP 21) commentary, and the Numerical commentary (Khujjuttarā-sāmāvatī-vatthu, AN 1.14.7, PTS 1.420), where fuller accounts are given.

Prior to the appearance of the Fully Self-Awakened Buddha, a deadly infectious disease (ahi-vātaka) broke out in the country of Allakappa, and the toll of this plague affected anything from 10-20 in a family at a time. Those who evacuated to other countries escaped death. One of the citizens left Allakappa together with his wife and a baby son. But they suffered from a shortage of food in the middle of crossing a barren land and were in a state of exhaustion. The parents took turns to carry the baby for some time.

The husband was of the idea that crossing the desert would not be possible with the extra load of the baby on their shoulder. So he kept himself a bit behind the wife by slowing down his speed as though pressed by the call of nature. He placed the child on the ground in a sitting posture and resumed his journey. When the wife did not see her son in his hands, she enquired about the child, asking: “My lord, where is my baby?” The husband replied: “What good will he be under such stress and strain. We could produce many children so long as we are alive!” The wife screamed in anger: “Such a brute you are, I will not go along with a cruel person like you.” The husband confessed his inconsiderate act and apologized to her: “Please pardon me for my fault.” They continued their journey again after picking up the child.

The fatigued couple, with the baby to carry, managed to cross the sandy plain with great difficulty. By evening, they reached the cowherds’ hut where they had cooked rice with pure milk for their own consumption. When they saw the couple and the child, they at once realized that the strangers were hunger-stricken, and offered them a big pot full of rich milk gruel. The wife was moderate in eating and so she ate just the right measure of food while the greedy husband ate very much, beyond his limit, so much so, that he died of indigestion the next morning. As he was very much attached to the people in the cowherds hut before his death, he took conception in the womb of a dog who lived there. The dog gave birth to a lovely puppy in due time. It was well looked after by the cowherd as though it was his own child. The two were very much attached to each other and the puppy followed the cowherd wherever he went.

One morning, a Paccekabuddha stopped at the door of the cowherd to receive alms food. The cowherd paid respect and offered food and requested the Paccekabuddha to stay and the cowherd would provide him the requisites. The Paccekabuddha took up residence in a grove not far from his dwelling. The cowherd used to take the puppy along with him whenever he went to visit the Paccekabuddha. He used to strike the boulders and dry stumps with a stout staff, on the way to the dwelling of the Paccekabuddha, to frighten away the beasts of prey. The puppy took careful note of his master's activities.

On one occasion, the cowherd made it plain to the Paccekabuddha that he might not attend on him personally everyday for one reason or other. He assured the Paccekabuddha that the little dog would come to his dwelling to accompany him to and from his hut, on his behalf, in case of his failure to do it himself.

One day, the cowherd sent his little dog to accompany the Paccekabuddha from the forest to his hut. The little dog went there, and, on arrival, lay on its belly stretched at the feet of the Paccekabuddha. The Paccekabuddha realized that the little dog was sent to fetch him. Hence, he took his robe and alms bowl. Being desirous of testing the intelligence of the dog, he deliberately went in a wrong direction. Whereupon, the little dog went in front of him and blocked his way. It gave way only when the Paccekabuddha resumed the right [661] direction. He barked aloud at the same spots where his master used to strike the boulders and dried stumps with a stout staff to frighten away the beasts of prey. The Paccekabuddha used to give it a big lump of food out of his own bowl every day. The dog was very much attached to the Paccekabuddha for showing such kindness to him.

At the end of the Rains Retreat (Vassa), the cowherd offered a piece of cloth to the Paccekabuddha for making robes and said: "Reverend Sir, the Rains Retreat (Vassa) has come to a close and I would leave it to you to stay on at the same place or go to any place of your own choice, as pleases you." As the Paccekabuddha appeared to have a desire to leave for another place, the cowherd accompanied him to a certain distance and returned to his hut. When the little dog discovered that the Paccekabuddha had left for good, it died of a broken heart and was reborn in the Deva realm of Tāvātimsa.

27a: The 9th Rains Retreat (Ghosaka and Māgaṇḍiya) – 925

He was endowed with a voice that excelled that of the other Devas of the celestial world, as a reward for barking aloud and frightening the beasts of prey as he passed through the forest in the company of the Paccekabuddha in his previous existence. He was therefore known as Ghosaka Deva for having a voice that covered the whole of Deva realm.

While Ghosaka was enjoying the luxurious life of a Deva in Tāvātimsa, Udena was the King of Kosambī in the world of humans.<sup>211</sup> Then Ghosaka Deva died and was conceived in the womb of a courtesan in Kosambī, during the reign of Udena. When the courtesan came to know that she had given birth to a son, she had the newly born babe cast on the garbage dump.

One of the supervisors of workmen, in the employment of the rich man of Kosambī, noticed the child in the middle of a flock of crows, on his way to his master's house. He was impressed by the look of the lovely child and thought there was a bright future for the child. Therefore, he picked up the baby and sent him to his house, under the care of one of his workmen while he continued his way to his master's house.

That morning the rich man of Kosambī met a wise man on his way to the palace of the King Udena. The rich man asked the wise man: "Master, have you studied the astrological signs of the stars and their trends?" The astrologer examined the movements and behaviour of the planets on the spot and replied: "Anyone born today is destined to become a rich man in Kosambī, as he is born in conjunction with such and such stars and planets."

On hearing the prediction of the astrologer, the rich man of Kosambī turned to his attendants and gave instructions: "My dear men, the prediction of this wise man are always axiomatic and determinate. My wife is an expectant mother, and, you better go to my house and find out if she has given birth to a child." The attendants rushed to his house and hurried back to tell him that his wife has not yet given birth to a child. He sent his men out again to find if there is any child born in the city on this day.

The attendants went all over the town to find out if there was any child born on that day. They discovered that there was a newly born babe in the house of his own supervisor. When this was brought to his notice, the rich man sent for the supervisor, and on his arrival, asked him a few questions.

Rich Man: Is it true that there is a baby in your house who is born today?

Supervisor: Yes, Master.

Rich Man: Can you give me that child?

Supervisor: I can't give, Master.

Rich Man: Take 1,000 pieces of money in exchange for the baby!

The supervisor tried to speculate mentally: "This baby may or may not live long, the question of life and death is beyond my power of decision." In view of this matter of uncertainty, he decided to accept the money in exchange for the baby.

The rich man conceived an idea: "Should my wife give birth to a girl, he would be treated [662] as my own son; should she give birth to a boy, he would be killed." After a few days, the wife of the rich man gave birth to a boy.

The Brutal Acts of the Rich Man of Kosambī

He thought of placing the adopted son Ghosaka, the son of a courtesan, in the cow-shed to be killed by being trodden on by oxen. He accordingly asked his servants to place the babe at the gate of the cowshed. The boy was placed at the exit of the cow-shed, as instructed by the rich man.

A big bull, the chief of the herd was the first to come out of the compound and finding the baby lying helplessly on the ground, it shielded him from the imminent danger of being trodden on by standing over him with its four legs placed around him like a fence. On seeing Ghosaka, the cowherds expressed this opinion among themselves: "This child must be a favoured child of fortune, even animals seem to know of his attributes," and so with mutual consent they took him to their house to be looked after

The rich man enquired as to the fate of the baby and was told that he was safe, under the care of the cowherds. He regained possession of the baby by giving the cowherds 1,000 pieces of money in exchange for him. He then commanded his men to throw the baby away at the cemetery.

The baby was abandoned in the cemetery at a time when the rich man's goat-herd was tending a herd of goats there. A milking she-goat caught sight of the baby and left the herd to put herself in such a posture as to afford an opportunity for the baby to suck her milk. She left the baby only after feeding him in the manner just described. On departure from the pasture in the evening, she went to feed the baby again, in the same manner. The goat-herd's attention was drawn by the strange movements of that she-goat on that day, and he saw for himself that the she-goat was feeding the baby as if it was her own babe. The goat-herd thought to himself: "This baby must be a favoured child of fortune, even animals seem to know his attributes," and so he brought the baby to be looked after in his own house.

On the next morning, the rich man sent his men to find out what had happened to the baby. When he was told that the baby was safe under the care of a goat-herder, he sent his men to redeem the baby in exchange for 1,000 pieces of money and commanded them to place the baby on the cart-track, in the busy part of the town, so that he might be killed by being trodden by the carts of a passing trader on the following day.

His servants did as they were told. A train of carts came into the town as expected but the oxen that drew the first cart saw the baby in their track, so they stood still with their legs fixed like four pillars. The leader of the traders saw the strange spectacle and was greatly moved by it, so much so that he picked up the babe and looked after him himself, as the baby appeared to be a favoured child of fortune with a bright future.

The rich man sent out his men to find out if the baby had been killed, by being trodden on by the carts of the traders, and was told that the boy was safe under the care of the leader of the traders. He again asked them to redeem the child in exchange for 1,000 pieces of money and to throw the baby down a steep cliff at a distance from the town.

The baby was thrown upside down by the servants, but the child fell right on top of a workshop of those who manufactured mats from reeds. The mats made of reeds proved to be as soft as cotton that had been ginned 1,000 times due to his deeds of merits in the past. The leading workman opined that the baby was a favoured child of fortune with a bright future, and so he brought the child to his house for adoption.

The rich man sent out his men again to enquire into the state of the child. When he came to know all about the babe, he asked his servants to recover the baby in exchange for 1,000 pieces of money, and to bring him to his house.

27a: The 9th Rains Retreat (Ghosaka and Māgaṇḍiya) – 928

In due course the rich man's own son and Ghosaka came of age. The rich man [663] again made a plot to kill the lad in a conspiracy with his trusted potter. He therefore went to the potter and confided to him that there was a stupid son in his house whom he wanted to do away with secretly by hook or by crook. The potter said: "Rich man, you shouldn't have said such a thing, speaking a speech is so full of evil."

The rich man thought that the potter would not do something for nothing, and so he paid him 1,000 pieces of money to make him yield to his persuasions. He was successful because there is no one who cannot be corrupted by bribery. The potter accepted the money and told the rich man: "I will arrange for the pot-kilns to be kept ready on such and such a day, and you might send the boy to me on that date by appointment."

The rich man marked time and on the day of the appointment, he asked the youthful Ghosaka: "My dear son, I require many pots and I have arranged with our potter to supply them by certain date, you might go now to the potter and ask him to do as he was bid by me, without any delay." Ghosaka replied: "Very well," and left the house.

On seeing Ghosaka on the road, the rich man's own son came running to him and asked for help: "Elder brother, I've lost many marbles while playing a game with my playmates. I do pray that you try to recover the loss I've sustained." Whereupon, Ghosaka said: "I can't do it now, because our father has sent me on an errand." The rich man's own son made another request: "If so, just play for me and recover the lost balls. I will go on the errand on your behalf." Whereupon, Ghosaka said: "In that case, you might go to the potter's place and convey the message of your father to the potter in detail while I play with the boys to recover the marbles you lost to them."

The rich man's son went and conveyed his father's message to the potter, on behalf of Ghosaka as agreed. The potter said he would carry out his father's orders. He took the boy into his house and hacked him into pieces with an axe and put the pieces of the dead boy's body into a mud pot which was later kept along with the unbaked mud-pots in the kiln.

Ghosaka won quite a lot of marbles and he waited for the return of his younger brother for a time. When the younger boy failed to turn up, he went to the potter's place to look for him and returned home when no trace of his younger brother could be found.

The rich man was astonished to see the return of Ghosaka at a distance and was at a loss to know what had happened. He got up before Ghosaka could even take a seat to explain the matter. “Dear son, did you not go to the potter’s place?” The youth replied: “No, father, I didn’t go.” He asked him again: “Why did you not go?” The youth explained the reason why he did not go and why the younger brother went there on his behalf, in detail.

The rich man felt as if he was reeling under the weight of the great earth and scolded him: “My dear son, what do you mean by that?” and so saying he hurried to the place of the potter with a greatly agitated mind. When he got to the house of the potter, he could not tell the full facts of the tragedy and so he simply uttered: “Look, my man, look my man.” But the potter gave him a stiff reply: “Rich man, what do you mean by that, when it is too late!” The rich man had to return home without any further ado. He was reduced to a mental wreck from that time.

The rich man of Kosambī did not take his meal together with Ghosaka from that time onwards, and deliberated as to how to do away with his son’s rival. He wrote a note and asked Ghosaka to deliver it to one of his supervisors at a certain village and to tell him verbally that the contents of the note must be translated into action at once. He also instructed the lad to contact one of his boyhood friends, a rich man of Gāmaka, and stop at his home for the meals on the way to his destination. Ghosaka had come of age by that time.

Ghosaka paid respect to the rich man and left. On arrival at the village of Gāmaka, he found his way to the rich man’s house and stood worshipping in front of him. The local rich man was shaving his beard by the side of a window. When he noticed the lad, he asked: “Young man [664] from where have you come?” He replied with due respect: “Father, I am the son of a rich man of Kosambī.” The Gāmaka rich man was delighted to see the son of his boyhood friend.

By that time, one of the maids of the daughter of the rich man was on her way to the market to fetch some flowers for her mistress. She stopped by the rich man who asked her: “Maid, tarry a little, you might wash and brush the feet of Ghosaka and arrange for the provision of a bed for him.” The maid did as she was bid and then went to the market to fetch some flowers as usual.

27a: The 9th Rains Retreat (Ghosaka and Māgaṇḍiya) – 930

On seeing the maid with a collection of flowers, the daughter of the rich man scolded her: “You have loitered on the road today, what on earth had made you take such a long time in fetching the flowers?”

Whereupon, the servant girl replied: “Mistress, I’ve never seen such a beautiful youth before. He is said to be the son of your father’s boyhood friend. It is beyond my power to express his handsomeness and graciousness. Your father asked me to wash his feet and provide a bed when I was on my way to the market to fetch flowers for you, hence the delay.”

The daughter of the rich man of Gāmaka happened to be the wife of the lad Ghosaka four existences ago. On hearing about the youth, she was assailed by uncontrollable affection for him.

The daughter of the Gāmaka rich man, accompanied by her maid, went to the bedroom and found Ghosaka sound asleep. She noticed a note tied to the edge of his waist-cloth and, out of curiosity, detached it quietly and read it. She discovered that the youth had brought a note that would cause the loss of his own life. She had it torn into pieces and wrote another one in substitution for the original one, before the lad woke up: “Dear supervisor, I am sending my son to you. My boyhood friend, Gāmaka, the rich man, has a daughter who has attained the age of puberty. I want you to collect all the yields accrued from our own estates and regroup them into lots of 100 of each kind for presentation at the matrimonial ceremony between the daughter of the Gāmaka rich man and my own son, and I wish you to act as my duly accredited representative on that happy occasion.” I also wish you to give me an account of the matrimonial ceremony with a statement of expenditure incurred in connection with the marriage, in due course. And it was signed by the rich man of Kosambī.

She had the fresh note nicely stamped with a fabricated seal and tied it to the edge of the waist-cloth of the lad as though nothing untoward had happened to it during his sound sleep.

Ghosaka spent a day in that house and resumed his journey after taking leave from the rich man. On arrival at the place of the supervisor, he promptly handed over the note with the information that the contents of the note should be translated into action at once. The supervisor, after reading the note, summoned all the villagers and addressed the gathering: “My dear men, although you do not seem to care much about me, my own master, the rich man of Kosambī, has entrusted me with the responsibility of arranging, on his behalf, a matrimonial ceremony for his son, Ghosaka, and the daughter of the rich man of Gāmaka. It asks that all the products issued from this area should be collected and grouped into lots of 100 of each kind for presentation to the couple as his gifts.

When everything was set, he arranged for the matrimonial ceremony to be performed in a traditional manner and sent a report to the rich man of Kosambī, to the effect that the [665] matrimonial ceremony had been conducted and that everything had been done in compliance with his instructions, with a detailed statement of the accounts attached thereto.

On hearing the news, the rich man of Kosambī felt like one suffering from burns and uttered: “Alas! I have been ruined beyond redemption.” He suffered both physical and mental agony and was eventually attacked with acute dysentery, and, yet he had not given up the idea of denying the estate to Ghosaka by hook or by crook. He, therefore, wrote a note with an ulterior motive and sent it to the lad. The note read: “Why have you, my son, stayed there long after your marriage. I want you to come back home urgently.”

Upon receipt of the letter, simple-minded Ghosaka made preparations for the return journey. The daughter of the Gāmaka rich man perceived that the simpleton Ghosaka never knew that it was she who was responsible for his present luxurious life. So she tried to detain him by her own clever tactics. She convinced him by saying: “My dear man, don’t be so hasty. One should make the necessary arrangements before one goes to one’s relatives.” She delayed his early departure for good reasons.

The rich man of Kosambī, with an undaunted will, sent another note stating that he had broken down in health through an acute attack of deadly dysentery and that he was in a state of hopelessness and the situation warranted Ghosaka’s immediate return. The daughter of the Gāmaka rich man could not help worrying that, by that time, the truth connected with their union and other things was at stake.

“My dear man, the rich man of Kosambī is not your own father, though you have all along regarded him as your father. He had sent you to his supervisor with a note containing express instructions to kill you right away. I personally destroyed that fateful note and substituted it with a fresh one of my own design that brought about our union. He did not call you for nothing but to expose that you are not his successor. You should wait until his death.”

Soon afterwards a rumour that the Kosambī rich man had died was afloat and the couple made preparations to go there with attendants. The intelligent wife warned her husband to enter the building with great caution and to post escorts around the house beforehand. She accompanied her husband as he entered the house, raising her hands and crying as if lamenting. She found her way to the rich man who was lying in a dark corner and struck his chest with her head, as if in great sorrow sending the dying man already weak with ailment to an early death.

After the cremation of the corporeal relics (sarīra-jhāpana) of the rich man of Kosambī, Ghosaka, by generous bribing, induced the intimate servants of the deceased to tell outsiders that he was the son of the late old man.

Title of Rich Man of Kosambī

Seven days after the death of the rich man of Kosambī, King Udena considered that he had to find a person to succeed him, one with the desirable qualifications who would earn the title: “The Rich Man of Kosambī (Kosambī-seṭṭhi).” He ordered his royal servants to find out if the late rich man had a son or not. All the intimate servants of the late rich man unanimously reported that he had a son by the name of Ghosaka, who was worthy of succeeding his father. King Udena then conferred the title of “The Rich Man of Kosambī” on Ghosaka complete with insignia of office.

When Ghosaka became The Rich Man of Kosambī, his wise and intelligent wife said: “My dear lord, although we are of lowly origins, we have become great and glorious by virtue of our meritorious deeds of the past, and let us, therefore, maintain it by performing meritorious deeds with redoubled zeal and enthusiasm.” Her husband readily accepted her good proposals, and the couple mutually agreed to spend 1,000 pieces of money every day in unbroken generosity (nibaddha-dāna), without any breach or breakage throughout their lives. [666]

The Recluses of Kosambī

There were three distinguished rich men in Kosambī country before the time of the Fully Self-Awakened Buddha. They were Ghosaka, Kukkuṭa and Pāvārika who were boyhood friends. They looked upon 500 recluses as their teachers in the absence of the Buddha and looked after them well. All the recluses used to take up residence at Kosambī during the rainy season, which lasted for four months, and retreated to the forests of the Himālayas in the summer and winter seasons, lasting eight months.

Years rolled by, and one day, the recluses felt exhausted after crossing a vast barren land without water on their way from the Himālayas to Kosambī. They eventually came upon a huge banyan tree and naturally entertained the hope that from the look of the banyan tree, there would be a guardian deity powerful enough to provide them with water.

The guardian deity of the banyan tree thought it would be well to fulfil the need of the recluses, and he caused a stream of water, about six inches in volume, to flow from the fork of the tree. When the recluses saw the silvery water, they received it with their cups and quenched their thirst, and then they began to think that it would be a good thing if the guardian deity could also provide them with food, since they happened to be in the thick of a forest far away from the villages. Whereupon, the guardian deity offered them celestial gruel, which was suitable for the recluses.

The recluses thought, since the guardian deity had provided them with food and water, they now had a desire to see him in person. The recluses asked him: “Deva, you are enjoying such pleasure; therefore, we wonder what kind of deeds of merit you did in your previous existence?” The deity replied: “I observed the eight precepts for half a day in my previous existence.”

This will be further explained: This guardian deity of the banyan tree was one of the servants of Anāthapiṇḍika in his previous life. It was customary amongst the occupants of the house of Anāthapiṇḍika that everyone should observe the precepts on every holy day. One early morning of an Observance Day a workman was required to go to the place of work to perform his duties. When Anāthapiṇḍika took a list of the recipients of food for that day, he discovered that the workman was the only one who had gone to the forest for work that day. So he allowed the cook to draw food for the evening, just enough for that workman. The cooking woman drew the allotted ration and kept it ready prepared for him. On his return, the cook gave him the share of food reserved for him.

When the workman found that the whole house was unusually quiet that day, he enquired about the unusual silence and the empty mess room from the cook. “It is an Observance Day, so all the occupants of the house are observing the precepts,” was her reply. He asked her again: “Is it true, Mother?” She nodded her head, saying: “Yes, it is.” – “Dear mother, please enquire from the rich man if one could keep precepts for the remaining part of the day.”

The cook obliged him by putting his question to the rich man, who replied: “It is tantamount to keeping observance of precepts for half a day but not for a full day. On hearing the words of the rich man, the workman washed his mouth and made a formal vow to observe the precepts and went to his place and kept the precepts till he fell asleep. He died of exhaustion on the following morning and was reborn as a guardian deity of a huge banyan tree on the fringe of a forest.

On hearing the full account of his previous existence, the recluses asked the deity: “You have spoken about the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha, which we have never heard of before. Is it true that a fully Self-Awakened Buddha has appeared?” When the deity answered in the affirmative, the recluses asked: “Where is that Buddha residing at presently?” The deity said: “The Realised One is residing at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattḥī.”

The recluses left, saying: “Dear Deva of the banyan tree, we are going to pay homage to [667] the Buddha! They arrived at Kosambī on the way to Sāvattḥī. The three rich men extended cordial reception to the recluses and invited them to receive food on the following morning. There was a festival on a grand scale on that day.

As soon as they had taken their meal, the recluses said as a token of courtesy: “We are going.” Surprised by such words, the rich men asked: “Revered sirs, it is quite unusual that you uttered such words when you have stayed only for a day on this occasion, though you have usually stayed for one, two, three or four months on previous occasions; we pray that you enlighten us as to the reason why you depart so early in the day?” Whereupon, the recluses replied: “Rich men, you have, indeed, spoken truly. The Fully Self-Awakened Buddha has appeared already, and death is certain, though we know not how or when. Therefore, we are in great haste to go to the Buddha.” The rich men asked for permission to go along with them.

The recluses said a few words of encouragement in response to their request: “You might stay behind and come afterwards as you all are saddled with worldly affairs which restrict your movements. We will go ahead of you.” They left Kosambī and found their way to Sāvattḥī without stopping too long on the way. On their arrival at Sāvattḥī, they went immediately to the Buddha who fed them with the sweet elixir of Dhamma. The recluses became Arahats through path-knowledge acquired by hearing the teaching of the Buddha.

The Three Rich Men Attain Stream-Entry

The three rich men left Kosambī, each with 500 carts fully loaded with gifts of all sorts for offering, arrived at Sāvattthī eventually. They stayed at a spot in the vicinity of Jetavana and erected temporary alms booths before they went to pay homage to the Buddha. On their arrival at the feet of the Buddha, they sat in suitable places. The Buddha then taught discourses in harmony with their dispositions, with the result that the three of them attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti). They made offerings of gifts on a large scale for fifteen days in succession. They cordially requested the Buddha to do them the honour of visiting Kosambī. The Buddha said in response: “Buddhas naturally prefer places of seclusion!”

They enthusiastically replied: “This is understood, exalted lord!” and added, “kindly honour us by your visit, on receipt of our formal invitation in due time,” and after making three rounds keeping the Buddha on the right side, they went their way home, building resting centres at every one league’s distance between Sāvattthī and Kosambī. On arrival at Kosambī they publicised the appearance of the Fully Self-Awakened Buddha far and wide. Each rich man constructed big monasteries in their own garden lands at great costs, in anticipation of the arrival of the Buddha.

The three monasteries were named after their supporters, so that the one donated by Ghosaka was called Ghositārāma, the one by Kukkuṭa was called Kukkuṭārāma, the one by Pāvārika in his mango garden was called Pāvārikambavana. When everything was ready, the three rich men despatched a cordial address of invitation to the Buddha, through a special messenger.

Brahmin Māgaṇḍiya and His Wife

[What follows is based on the Discourse to Māgaṇḍiya (Māgaṇḍiya-sutta, Snp 4.9, and its commentaries.)

The Buddha, on his way to Kosambī, in the company of many monastics, perceived that Brahmin Māgaṇḍiya and his wife were destined to attain the Arahata fruition. He, therefore, diverted his route from the main road towards the direction of the market-town of Kammāsadamma in Kuru country.

27a: The 9th Rains Retreat (Ghosaka and Māgaṇḍiya) – 936

Brahmin Māgaṇḍiya returned early after spending almost all night outside the village in offering lights, according to their custom. On his way to the village to receive food in the morning, the Buddha noticed Māgaṇḍiya coming from the opposite direction at a distance. He grasped the opportunity of making his presence known to the old Brahmin. On seeing him, Māgaṇḍiya thought to himself: “I have all along been looking for a suitable bridegroom for my daughter, who is as charming as she is, who has a golden body and has assumed the form of a recluse. [668] This recluse is charming and good looking, he is a match to my daughter.” With this idea, he went straight back to his house.

There was a link in the chain of Māgaṇḍiya’s births, being a recluse in one of his existences. Therefore he had a natural inclination towards a recluse.

Old Māgaṇḍiya told his wife: “Dear one, I’ve never seen such a recluse before. The one whom I’ve seen has a golden colour. He has the appearance of the Great Brahma. He is really a match to my daughter Māgaṇḍiyā. Get my daughter Māgaṇḍiyā dressed up hurriedly.” As they were busy with dressing up their daughter, the Buddha left a pair of footprints (pada-cetiya) at the spot where he had first seen the old Brahmin, and entered the town to receive alms food.

The impression of footprints of the Buddha stands on the spot of his own choice but not on any other place. At the same time, his footprints are visible only by privileged persons and nothing could stand in their way of seeing them: no bull elephant, no torrential rain, no violent destructive storm could destroy these foot prints (see the commentary to Dhp 21).

The old Brahmin, his wife and daughter went to the place where he had caught sight of the Buddha, but they could not see him as he had gone into the village by that time. The old Brahmin grumbled at the way in which his wife had taken so long in dressing their daughter that the recluse had gone away. The wife asked the Brahmin: “Let him be gone, but do tell me in which direction he has gone.” The old Brahmin retorted: “He’s gone that way,” and eventually they found the footprints of the Buddha. The old man said: “Here are his footprints, he must have gone in that direction.”

On seeing the footprints, the old Brahmin’s wife thought: “This Brahmin is really ignorant. He is not intelligent enough to know the intricacies of the treatises in the Veda,” and to ridicule her husband, she made this caustic remark: “Brahmin, you are such a fool as to have said that you would give away our daughter to this person whose footprints are quite different from those of worldlings, who have the stains of passion (rāga), malice (dosa) and delusion (moha). Brahmin, look at his footprints which characterize those of a Fully Self-Awakened Buddha, who has broken open the enveloping dome of the defilements; just look at those footprints with care.”

Rattassa hi ukkuṭikam padam bhava, duṭṭhassa hoti saha-sānupīṭitam, mūḷhassa hoti avakaḍḍhitam padam, vivaṭṭa-chadassa idam-īdisam padam.

The footprint of one with strong lust does not touch the ground in the middle; the footprint of one with a great amount of anger is more marked at the heels; the footprint of one with a great amount of delusion is marked by the impression of its toes and heels. The footprint, we are seeing, is free from all these and therefore it is evident that it belongs to the omniscient one who had done away with all forms of defilements.

The old Brahmin felt uneasy in his mind because of his wife’s caustic remarks and complained: “Woman, you are rude and aggressive.” While they were thus engaged in arguing, the Buddha had taken his meal in the company of the monks and he made his appearance at a place where the Brahmin could easily see him.

When Brahmin Māgaṇḍiya saw the Buddha coming from a distance, he scolded his wife and said: “The person whom I spoke of is here,” and so saying he approached the Buddha and made things plain to him: [669] “Recluse! I have been looking for you all over the place since earlier in the day. There is no one in the whole world who is as pretty as my daughter, and there is no one in the world as handsome as yourself. I wish to give you my daughter to attend upon you as a housewife.”

The old Brahmin spoke directly and simply. Whereupon, the Buddha said, in response to his offer: “Brahmin, I had no desire whatsoever for the three charming daughters of Māra of the celestial plane of Vasavatti, who stood by my side and wooed and tempted me with talk of love-making full of sweet charms. So you might imagine how I would not have any desire for your daughter, Māgaṇḍiyā!” and he recited the following verse (Snp 4.9):

Disvāna Taṇham Aratim Ragañ-ca, nāhosi chando api methunasmiṃ,

kim-evidam mutta-karīsa-puṇṇam, pādā pi nam samphusitum na icche.

Although the three charming daughters of Māra: Taṇhā, Araṭī, and Ragā approached me under the Goatherder’s banyan tree with firm determination to tempt me to enjoy sensual pleasure by mutual co-operation with them, I had not the least desire to yield to their wishes nor was there the slightest taint of sensual passion in me. In the same way, I have not the slightest taint of sensual desire on seeing this young Māgaṇḍiyā whose physical body is full of filth such as excreta and urine. I have not the slightest desire to touch her, even with my feet.

The Buddha uttered this verse as though he was communicating not with the Brahmin but with a different person. Māgaṇḍiyā, the daughter of Brahmin Māgaṇḍiya, harboured resentment towards the Buddha for insulting her by saying her body was full of filth such as excreta and urine and what not. “He should have rejected me in a simple manner that does not affect my dignity. I will revenge this insult, as and when opportunity occurs, hereafter.” Thus Māgaṇḍiyā sowed the seed of enmity against the Buddha.

Māgaṇḍiya and His Wife Become Arahats

The Buddha did not give any heed to the resentment harboured by the young lady, Māgaṇḍiyā, and proceeded to preach the Dhamma to the old Brahmin, Māgaṇḍiya, in harmony with his disposition. Māgaṇḍiya and his wife became noble Non-returners (Anāgāmī) at the conclusion of the discourse. In due time, the couple considered that no useful purpose will be served by continuing to live the household life after attainment to the exalted state of Non-returner for any length of time, and they entrusted their young daughter, Māgaṇḍiyā, to her paternal uncle, Cūḷa Māgaṇḍiya, before they received ordination. They both became Arahats free from the pollutants (āsava) after ordination. After emancipating Māgaṇḍiya and his wife, the Buddha resumed his journey to the country of Kosambī and arrived there eventually.

Buddha Accepts Three Monasteries

When the three rich men heard of the arrival of the Buddha in the company of monastics, they arranged for his reception on a grand scale and conducted him to the monasteries. On arrival at the monasteries, they sat at appropriate places and after paying their respects, addressed the Buddha: “Most exalted Buddha, the three monasteries which have been built, are intended to be offered to all the members of the noble Saṅgha. We humbly request the favour of your acceptance of the three monasteries for use by the Saṅgha who arrive [670] from the four quarters of the compass.” The Buddha was pleased to accept them, as requested by the supporters. The three rich men then invited the Buddha for the performance of ceremonies at the feast the next day and then they made their departure. The Buddha stayed in the monasteries donated by the three rich men and observed the ninth Rains Retreat (Vassa) in the country of Kosambī.

As a matter of course, the facts connected with the slave girl Khujjattarā, Queen Sāmāvatī, and Queen Māgaṇḍiyā need to be included here to complete the picture. But facts connected with Khujjattarā and Sāmāvatī will be given when we come to the “Saṅgha Jewel” later on, see chapter 45b. A full account of Māgaṇḍiyā may be had by reference to the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada) commentary on Dhṛ 21. It is proposed to deal here only with certain pertinent facts that warrant inclusion at this place.

Māgaṇḍiyā’s Evil Acts

At the time the Buddha was observing the ninth Rains Retreat (Vassa) in Kosambī, the young woman Māgaṇḍiyā had become the Chief Queen of King Udena. This is how it happened: Māgaṇḍiyā was left by her parents to the care of her paternal uncle, Cūḷa Māgaṇḍiya, before they received ordination. King Udena made her his queen after consultation with her uncle Cūḷa Māgaṇḍiya. A separate chamber with 500 maids of honour was allotted to her by the king. Māgaṇḍiyā was thus a Queen of King Udena by the time the Buddha kept the ninth Rains Retreat (Vassa) at Kosambī.

Having come to understand that the Buddha had arrived at Kosambī, she caused all the reckless, starving drunkards to be summoned, and she bribed and instigated them to call the Buddha by derogatory names as taught by her. When the Buddha entered the city on the following day, in response to the invitation of the three rich men to a feasting ceremony, the reckless drunkards reviled the Buddha by calling him the names taught by Māgaṇḍiyā.

Ven. Ānanda implored the Buddha to leave the place: “Most exalted Buddha, let us not continue our stay at a town where we have been abused. Let us go to another town!” Whereupon, the Buddha replied: “Dear Ānanda, Buddhas are totally indifferent to the eight worldly vicissitudes and all those boisterous and abusive noises are bound to die off within a period of seven days and no more.

27a: The 9th Rains Retreat (Ghosaka and Māgaṇḍiya) – 940

The abusers are liable to pay for their own demerit. You need not fret and bother yourself by their shortcomings!”

This is an abridged form of the exposition in the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) commentary to Khujjuttara and Sāmāvatī’s stories in AN 1.14.7; the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada) commentary to Dh 320-322 gives a more detailed exposition.

Extraordinary Volitional Efforts of the Three Rich Men

The three rich men invited the Buddha into the city and made offerings of all kinds on a large scale. The Buddha took residence at their monasteries in rotation and received offerings in the same manner. In other words, when the Buddha occupied Ghositārāma monastery on a certain day, he would receive alms food from Ghosita’s house on the following day. In the same manner the Buddha received alms food from Kukkuṭa and Pāvārika, in order of succession.

After a lapse of one month, it dawned on the three rich men: “Buddhas have appeared for the purpose of safeguarding sentient beings and promoting their well-being; we should see to it that all the citizens should also take a share in the meritorious deeds.”

They accordingly afforded an opportunity to all the citizens to participate in the meritorious deeds, with the result that all the citizens made offerings in their respective streets, quarters or by formation of charitable societies at that time.

27b: The 9th Rains Retreat (Schism)

A Great Dispute within the Saṅgha

When the Buddha was residing in the Ghositārāma monastery, there arose a dispute [671] between a monastic who was versed in the discipline (vinaya) and another monastic who was versed in the discourses (sutta), both were living in the same monastery.

One day, the one versed in the discourses entered the privy and came out, leaving a certain amount of water in the cup which was usually kept in the privy for common use. The monastic versed in the discipline, on entering the privy after him, saw the amount of water that was left in the cup, came out and asked the one versed in the discourses: “Friend, did you leave some water remaining in this cup?” The one versed in the discourses replied: “Friend, yes, I did,” with all sincerity. The one versed in the discipline complained: “Well, friend, don’t you know that such an act is tantamount to commission of an offence (āpatti)?” The one versed in the discourses replied: “No, I didn’t know, my friend.” Then the one versed in the discipline explained: “Friend, to leave any amount of water in the cup is an offence (āpatti).”

The monastic versed in the discourses said: “If I am guilty of an offence, I am prepared to remove the offence by confessing.” Whereupon, the monastic versed in the discipline explained: “Friend, if such an act was committed through forgetfulness and without any volition there lies no fault.” On hearing this, the monastic versed in the discourses formed the idea that he had not committed the offence of leaving behind some water in the cup.

The monastic versed in the discipline had thought that such an offence as leaving the remaining amount of water in the cup does not amount to an offence (āpatti) by reason of absence of mind, which is devoid of volition. As a matter of fact, such an offence is tantamount to an offence (dukkāṭa-āpatti) no matter whether such an act was committed through forgetfulness or without volition.

The monastic versed in the discipline told his disciples that the monastic versed in the discourses did not know when he was guilty of an offence, in an attempt to decry the one versed in the discourses. And when the disciples of the monastic versed in the discipline met the disciples of the one versed in the discourses, the former told the latter that their teacher had no knowledge of the guilt he had committed. When his disciples brought this news to his knowledge, the monastic versed in the discourses said: “That monastic versed in the discipline himself told me that I was not guilty of that offence, and now, he had changed his words and accused me of being guilty of that offence. He has told a lie.”

The disciples of the monastic versed in the discourses went and told the disciples of the monastic versed in the discipline: “Your teacher is a liar.” The quarrel thus began. The monastic versed in the discipline managed to obtain the support of his own associates and charged the monastic versed in the discourses with the offense of not seeing the fault as a fault (āpattiyā adassane ukkhepanīyam) and suspended him with a formal resolution.

The monastic who was thus suspended, being well-informed and of social standing, approached his friends and associates and said: “This is a case where there was no fault, not a case where there is fault. I am unfallen, I have not fallen. I am unsuspending, I am not suspended. Although they have suspended me I am not guilty, I was suspended by a formal act which was not legally valid. I would beseech you to stand by me as my partisans on account of the rule, on account of the discipline (Vinaya). He thus gained many friends, supporters, and associates. A messenger was also sent to monastics in the villages and country to explain the situation. Thus the monastics in the country who were his associates also became his partisans.

The disciples of the suspended monastics versed in the discourses went to those who suspended them and complained by way of refutation: “Friends, that is a non-guilty case, it is not a case entailing any offence (āpatti). Wherefore, the monastic versed in the discourses was not guilty of any offence. He is unsuspending though he has been suspended by a formal act, because it was not legally valid.”

The monastics involved in suspending, in turn, told the suspended monastics that, it was a case of an offence (āpatti), it was not a non-offence case, the monastic versed in the discourses was, therefore, guilty of an offence; it was not that he was not guilty; therefore he deserved to be suspended by a formal act of suspension which was legally valid: “Friends, do not pursue this course, do not attend upon him any more.” But their appeals fell on the deaf ears of the monastics versed in the discourses; they continued in attending upon the suspended monastic, [672] following him wherever he went.

The Buddha Exhorts the Rival Factions

An unknown monastic approached the Buddha and reported with respect all that had happened. Whereupon, the Buddha uttered: “The Saṅgha is divided, the Saṅgha is divided,” twice in succession and went to the monastics who had suspended the monastic versed in the discourses and addressed them from a prepared seat.

Monastics had, by then, not actually been divided, but the Buddha had said it in anticipation of the imminent danger of a division in due course of time. For instance, one might have said: “The rice grains have ripened,” when one noticed the break of rains ushering in the season for harvesting, although they were yet ripe; hence, the Buddha’s utterance.

The Buddha said: “Monastics, you should not, through pride and vanity, think of suspending or expelling a monastic on account of a simple matter. Let us suppose that a certain monastic might be guilty of an offence (āpatti) though he did not think that it was an offence, on the one hand. On the other hand, there might be monastics who held it to be an offence (āpatti). Monastics, if those monastics know concerning that monastic: “This venerable one is well-informed and well versed in the Discourses and the Discipline (Dhamma-Vinaya) and the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha), intelligent and wise, experienced, conscientious, scrupulous and desirous of the three training practices; if we expel this monastic for not seeing the offence, if we do not carry out the Observance together with this monastic, and carry out the Observance without this monastic, by doing so, there will be dispute, strife, fighting, there will be a schism in the order, there will be an altercation in the order, dissension in the order, differences in the order.” Monastics, knowing this, monastics should not suspend or expel a monastic for not seeing an offence to ward off schism and promote unity.

Monastics, you should not, through pride and vanity, think of suspending or expelling a monastic on account of a simple matter. Let us suppose that a certain monastic might be guilty of an offence (āpatti) though he did not think that it was an offence, on the one hand. On the other hand, there might be monastics who held it to be an offence (āpatti). Monastics, if those monastics know concerning that monastic: This venerable one is well informed and well versed in the Discourses and the Discipline (Dhamma-Vinaya) and the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha), intelligent and wise, experienced, conscientious, scrupulous and desirous of the three training practices; if we expel this monastic for not seeing the offence, and do not perform the Invitation (Pavāraṇā) ceremony inviting one another for pardon together with this monastic, if we perform the Invitation without this monastic; if we do not carry out a formal act of the order (Saṅghakamma) together with this monastic, if we will carry out a formal act of the order without this monastic; if we do not sit on a seat together with this monastic, if we sit on a seat without this monastic; if we do not sit to drink gruel together with this monastic, if we sit to drink gruel without this monastic; if we do not sit in a refectory together with this monastic, if we sit in a refectory without this monastic; if we do not dwell under the same roof with this monastic, if we dwell under one roof without him; if we do not pay respect according to seniority, greet or worship with joined palms, together with this monastic, if we will pay respect according to seniority, greet or worship with joined palms without this monastic; by doing so, there will be dispute, strife, fighting, there will be schism in the order, there will be an altercation in the order, dissension in the order, differences in the order. Monastics, knowing this, monastics should not suspend or expel such a monastic for not seeing an offence to ward off schism and promote unity.”

After teaching the above discourse on the need for unity in the Saṅgha to the monastics who had suspended the monastic, the Buddha went over to the disciples of the suspended monastic who was well-versed in the discourses and delivered this discourse: “Monastics, when you have committed an offence, you should not think that amends should not be made for the offence, thinking: ‘We have not committed an [673] offence.’

Monastics, supposing a certain monastic might be guilty of an offence (āpatti), though he did not think it was an offence, on one hand; and on the other hand, there might be monastics who held it to be an offence (āpatti). Monastics, if that monastic, who thinks he has not committed an offence, knows concerning those monastics: These venerable ones are well informed and well versed in the Discourses and the Discipline (Dhamma-Vinaya) and the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha), intelligent and wise, conscientious, scrupulous and desirous of the three training practices. Either because of me or because of anyone else, these monastics should not take a wrong action through selfish desire, ill-will, through ignorance, through fear.

If these monastics suspend me for not seeing an offence and if they do not carry out the Observance together with me, if they carry out the Observance without me; if these monastics do not perform the Invitation ceremony together with me, if they perform the Invitation ceremony without me; if they do not carry out a formal act of the order (Saṅgha-kamma) together with me, if they will carry out a formal act of the order without me; if they do not sit on a seat together with me, if they sit on a seat without me; if they do not sit to drink gruel together with me, if they sit to drink gruel without me; if they do not sit in a refectory together with me, if they sit in a refectory without me; if they do not dwell under the same roof with me, if they dwell under one roof without me; if they do not pay respect according to seniority, greet or worship with joined palms, together with me, if they will pay respect according to seniority, greet or worship with joined palms without me; by doing so, there will be dispute, strife, fighting, there will be schism in the order, there will be altercation in the order, dissension in the order, differences in the order. Monastics, knowing this, the monastic, should confess the guilt even out of faith in the Saṅgha to ward off schism and promote unity.”

After delivering this discourse for unity of Saṅgha, the Buddha rose from the seat and departed.

The monastic versed in the discourses had honestly expressed his desire to confess and to ask for pardon, if he had committed an offence when the monastic versed in the discipline made a complaint at first. When he was told subsequently that any offence committed through thoughtlessness and without volition does not amount to offence or a wrong act he sincerely thought he was free from guilt.

Had the Buddha decided to blame those versed in the discipline for suspending the monastics versed in the discourses on such grounds, they would have accused him of taking sides with their opponents, thus exposing themselves to the risk of committing an offence against him, a demerit that could direct them to the realms of misery.

Again, the monastic versed in the discourses had knowingly left a certain amount of water in the cup and as such, he was guilty of an infringement of a light offence (dukkata-āpatti). His disciples had expressed their opinion that such a judgment was legally invalid, through attachment to their teacher.

Had the Buddha decided to approve the judgment of those versed in the discipline on such grounds, the disciples of the monastic, who was versed in the discourses, would naturally accuse him of taking sides with their opponents thus exposing themselves to the risk of committing an offence against him, a demerit that could direct them to realms of misery.

It should be borne in mind therefore, that the Buddha had thus refrained from putting blame on either of the rival groups in the interest of peace and tranquillity and after delivering discourses for the unity of the Saṅgha, made his departure from that place. [674]

Exposition on Being in Communion

Now at that time, monastics who had been suspended carried out the Observance (Uposatha) and performed the formal legal acts (Saṅgha-kamma) in the boundary hall (sīma) of the same monastery; whereas those who had expelled the former, carried out the Observance and performed the formal legal acts by having gone outside the monastery.

One of the monastics of the latter group approached the Buddha with profound respect and addressed him: “Most exalted Buddha, those monastics who had been suspended carried out the Observance and performed the formal legal acts in the boundary hall (sīma) of the same monastery; whereas those who expelled the former carried out the Observance and performed the formal legal acts by having gone outside the monastery.”

Whereupon the Buddha gave the following answer to that monastic: “Monks, in case those suspended monastics carry out the Observance and perform other legal acts in accordance with the procedure for a motion and proclamation (ñatti-kamma-vācā) laid down by me, in the boundary hall (sīma) of the monastery, their performances must be held to be quite in order and legally valid.

In the same way, if you, the suspending monastics, who have suspended the former, carried out the observance and performed other legal acts in accordance with the procedure for a motion and proclamation (ñatti-kamma-vācā), laid down by me, in the boundary hall (sīma) of the monastery, your performances also must be held to be quite in order and legally valid.

Monks, what is the reason for this? The suspended monastics belong to a different communion from yours, they are not associated with you and you belong to a different communion from theirs through not associating with them.

Monks, there are two grounds for belonging to a different communion (ñāṇa-saṁvāsa): 1) One’s own effort; one makes oneself belong to a different communion; and 2) being suspended by the Saṅgha for not seeing an offence (apatti), for not making amends, for not abandoning a wrong view. Thus there are these two grounds for belonging to a different communion.

Monks, there are two grounds for belonging to the same communion (samāna-saṁvāsa): 1) One's own effort, one makes oneself belong to the same communion; and 2) the whole Saṅgha lifts the suspension and restores (osaraṇīya-kamma) the monastic who was suspended (ukkhepanīya-kamma).

There are two grounds for being in a different communion (ñāṇa-saṁvāsa) and two grounds for being in the same communion (samāna-saṁvāsa), as explained by the Buddha.

There are two groups or two types of monastics: 1) Lawful monastics (Dhamma-vādi) who suspended the guilty monastics; and 2) unlawful monastics who are suspended for being guilty of one or the other offence (adhamma-vādi). Should a monastic, residing with one group or the other, decide, after scrutinizing the views of both groups of monastics, that the monastics who are suspended are unlawful monastics, and the monastics, who suspended them are lawful ones, he himself has made himself of different communion from the suspended monastics and of the same communion with the suspending monastics.

Conduct of the Monastics in the Dispute

Now, at that time, monastics fell into dispute, quarrelling and causing strife at the refectories in the villages. They behaved unsuitably towards one another in action and in speech. They came to blows. People looked down upon them, criticized them. Well conducted and modest monastics reported this unhappy state of affairs to the Buddha who [675] sent for the disputing monastics.

Having made enquiries and having rebuked them, the Buddha gave an appropriate talk and addressed them thus: “Monastics, when the Saṅgha is divided, and if it is not behaving according to the rules, if there is discord, you should sit down separately, thinking: ‘At the very least we must not behave unsuitably towards one another in physical action and in speech. We cannot come to blows.’ Monastics, when the Saṅgha is divided, if it is behaving according to rule and if there is friendliness, you may sit down next to one another.” These are the guidelines given to the rival monastics for observance, whenever there is dissension amongst the Saṅgha.

The two rival groups of monastics went on quarrelling, making strife, and falling into disputes in the midst of the Saṅgha, wounding one another with the weapon of the tongue. The Saṅgha was unable to quell the dispute.

Then a certain monastic approached the Buddha, having paid respects to him, he stood at a suitable distance and reported the matter and requested him to approach the quarrelling monastics.

Whereupon, the Buddha went to the monastics and exhorted them: “Monastics, it is not at all right and proper for you to be quarrelling, fighting and opposing one another. Enough! No disputes, no quarrelling, no contentions.”

Whereupon, a monastic of the suspended group, who had the welfare of the Buddha at heart, said: “Most exalted Buddha, let the lord of the Dhamma wait, let the Fortunate One remain unconcerned, intent on abiding in peace for the present. We will be responsible for these disputes, quarrels and strife.” This was his appeal to the Buddha. The Buddha exhorted them twice in the same strain, and the monastic of the suspended group repeated his appeal for two times in succession.

The suspended monastic was a well-wisher of the Buddha. He took pains to appeal to him not to trouble himself about the matter at a time when the flame of anger was at its peak.

But the Buddha perceived that the two rival groups would come back to their senses once the anger was removed, and so out of compassion for these monastics, he delivered a discourse on the life story of Dīghāvu with that objective in view.

The Story of Dīghāvu

This story has been compiled from the story about the Chapter about the Monks from Kosambī (Kosambakakkhandhaka, Vin Mv 10). For further particulars, refer to the Birth Story about King Dīghiti of Kosala (Dīghīti-kosala-jātaka, Ja 371), and the Birth Story at Kosambī (Kosambī-jātaka, Ja 428).

Once, there was a king of Benares by the name of King Kāsi, who had a great amount of wealth, a big army consisting of war chariots, elephants, horses, infantry, a vast expanse of land, a big treasury and fully stocked granaries. The King of Kosala, by the name of Dīghīti, was poor, having only a small amount of wealth, a small army, a limited number of war chariots, elephants, horses and infantry, a small treasury and granaries. Monastics, King Brahmadata, alias King Kāsi, prepared for war against King Dīghīti, and marched towards Kosala with a great army comprised of war chariots, elephants, horses and infantry.

On hearing the alarming news, King Dīghīti of Kosala weighed in his mind: “King Brahmadata of Kāsi is rich, he owns an enormous amount of wealth, has a great army, comprised of war chariots, elephants, horses and infantry, a big treasury, a vast expanse of land and granaries, whereas, I am comparatively poor, having a small amount of wealth, a small army and I am sure to be defeated by the first attack launched by that king. As such, it would be wiser to evacuate than to be defeated.” Therefore, taking his queen, he fled from his city long before the enemy reached it.

Monastics, King Brahmadata took possession of King Dīghīti’s troops, chariots, territory, [676] treasuries and granaries, and reigned over his newly conquered land. Dīghīti, the king and his queen arrived at Benares in due course, and took refuge at a potter’s house, on the fringes of the city, in the guise of wandering ascetics.

The Queen Conceives a Child

Monastics, after some time, the Queen of King Dīghīti became pregnant and developed a strong desire for a certain particular thing, such as to see at sunrise a fourfold army, fully arrayed, fully equipped, standing on level ground and to drink the water used in the washings of swords. The queen made it known to her husband, King Dīghīti of Kosala, that she had conceived a child and that she had a strong desire to see a fully equipped army at sunrise, and to drink water used in the washing of swords.

Whereupon, the King of Kosala said: “Dear queen, how will it be possible for us to see a fully equipped army and to get water used for the washing of swords, when we are in a humble condition!” The queen replied: “Your majesty, I will die if my wishes are not fulfilled.”

At that time, King Dīghīti’s boyhood friend was the Brahmin priest of Brahmadata, King of Kāsi. Monastics, Dīghīti, King of Kosala went to see his boyhood friend, the Brahmin priest and told him: “My dear friend, my queen is pregnant, and she has a strong desire to see a fully equipped army standing on a vast and level plain, and to drink the water used in the washing of swords.”

Whereupon, the Brahmin said: “Your majesty, in that case, I should like to see the queen.” Monastics, the queen went to see the Brahmin priest. When the Brahmin noticed the queen coming from a distance, he got up and arranging his upper garment over one shoulder and with his hands clasped announced joyously: “Indeed, a king of Kosala is in your womb,” for three times in succession. And he assured the queen: “Be happy, good queen, you will get a chance at sunrise to see the fully equipped fourfold army arrayed on a level ground and drink the washing of swords.”

Monastics, the Brahmin priest went to King Brahmadata of Kāsi and addressed him, saying: “Your majesty, the signs which I can see are such that a fully equipped army must appear on a vast plain at sunrise and the royal swords are to be washed then.” The king ordered his courtiers to carry out the instructions given by the Brahmin priest.

Dīghāvu is Born

The queen of King Dīghīti had her strong desires fulfilled as arranged by the Brahmin; she had seen a fully equipped army standing on a vast plain and drunk the water used in washing the swords. Monastics, she gave birth to a baby son in due time and he was named Dīghāvu.

Monastics, when Prince Dīghāvu had grown to an age of discretion, it occurred to King Dīghīti: “The King Brahmadata of Kāsi had hitherto done much harm to us; he had seized our army, war chariots, elephants, horses, and territories including small villages; deprived us of our treasuries and granaries. He would do away with the three of us at once if he found out our whereabouts; it would be safer for our son, Dīghāvu, to stay outside the city. He accordingly arranged for Dīghāvu to stay aloof from them at a place outside the boundaries of the city. Monastics, Prince Dīghāvu learnt various arts and sciences at that time during the period of his exile.

Monastics, a barber of King Dīghīti of Kosala had free access to the palace of the King of Kāsi. Monastics, when the barber saw the king and queen of Kosala taking refuge in an old hut of the potter under the guise of ascetics on the outskirts of the city, he went to King Brahmadata of Kāsi and reported: “Your majesty, King Dīghīti and his queen have been taking refuge in a hut of a potter under the guise of ascetics on the outskirts of the city.” Monastics, King Brahmadatta ordered his attendants to bring the king and queen of Kosala to him. The attendants did as they were bid.

Monastics, King Brahamadatta of Kāsi gave orders to his servants: “Courtiers, fasten [677] the hands of King Dīghīti and his queen at their backs tightly, shave their heads with a razor, beat a drum that produces harsh and broken sound, take them from street to street, from crossroads to crossroads, beating them all along the way, and finally take them out of the city by the southern gate to be cut up into four pieces. Their remains must be discarded to the four quarters.” The executioners did as they were ordered by the king.

King Kosala’s Doctrine of Peace

At that time, Prince Dīghāvu had a longing to see his parents. He thought to himself: “It is quite a long time since I have seen my parents, I had better go and see them now.” He therefore entered the town and came face to face with his ill-fated parents, with their hands fastened tight at their backs, their heads shaved, being beaten up and paraded from street to street, from crossroads to crossroads to the unbearable sounds of the drums. He was greatly shocked and choked with a deep sense of sorrow, but he managed to go to his parents, even with strained emotions.

Monastics, when King Dīghīti saw his son, Dīghāvu coming from a distance, he uttered these words of advice meant for his son: “My dear son, Dīghāvu, do not look far and do not look close either; my dear son, Dīghāvu, revenge does not promote peace; my dear son, Dīghāvu, only non-resentment gives peace.”

When King Dīghīti uttered such words of advice, the courtiers misunderstood him and said: “This King Dīghīti of Kosala had lost his head; where is his son, Dīghāvu? Whom is he addressing as: ‘My dear son, Dīghāvu, do not look far and do not look close either; my dear son, Dīghāvu, revenge does not promote peace; my dear son, Dīghāvu, only non-resentment gives peace?’ ”

When King Dīghīti heard their remarks, he retorted: “My dear men, I am not speaking thus through loss of mind, only wise men will understand the meaning of what I said.”

King Dīghīti uttered the same words of advice three times and the executioners made the same comments three times. King Dīghīti gave the same explanation to them, to show that he was mentally sound and that it was meant for wise men who would understand the meaning.

Monastics, the executioners went on punishing the royal couple all along the route and finally took them out of the city via the south gate, as instructed by their king. King Dīghīti and his queen were cut into four pieces and their severed limbs discarded to the four quarters. The executioners went back into the city after posting guards at the place of execution.

Monastics, Prince Dīghāvu went into the city and came out with some liquor for presentation to the guards, who soon got drunk and fell into deep slumber. Dīghāvu collected a pile of firewood and placed the remains of his royal parents on top of the pile and cremated them in the traditional way. He raised his clasped hands in a respectful manner and circumambulated about the bonfire.

At that time, King Brahadatta was in the upper chamber of his palace. He caught sight of Dīghāvu through the window, in the act of circumambulating the funeral pyre three times with his palms joined and raised toward it. It at once occurred to him: “That man must be one of the near relatives or kinsmen of Dīghīti, and the one who would certainly do something against me.” He was greatly annoyed that no one was thoughtful enough to bring such a case to his notice. [678]

Prince Dīghāvu Serves as Elephant Keeper

Monastics, Prince Dīghāvu went into the jungle and mourned over the loss of his royal parents, weeping for a long while and then he re-entered the city. He went to the elephant stable near the palace and requested the royal elephant master to employ him as a trainee. His request was readily granted.

Monastics, Prince Dīghāvu used to get up early and sing sweet songs and play the harp harmoniously at the elephant shed every morning. On hearing the singing and playing of the harp, King Brahadatta asked his couriers as to who was the singer who played on the harp early in the morning every day. The courtiers gave the king a full description of the singer who played the harp. The king then ordered his men to bring the singing lad who played the harp so well.

When the couriers brought Dīghāvu before the king, he was asked: “Boy, is it you who sings sweet songs and plays the harp so well at the elephant stable early in the morning everyday?” The prince gave his answer in the affirmative. Then the king ordered him to sing and to play his harp in his presence.

Monastics, Prince Dīghāvu sang songs sweetly in harmony with the tuning of the harp, in compliance with the royal orders. The king was greatly delighted with his performance and ordered the boy to serve him as one of the attendants. The prince undertook to serve as an attendant to the king. In due course, he was upgraded to a confidential position of trust in consideration of the five qualities that he possessed: 1) Getting up earlier than the king; 2) going to bed after the king; 3) always being alert and willing to serve; 4) doing all that would please the king; and 5) being in the habit of speaking well and affectionately.

Prince Dīghāvu Honours His Father's Words

Monastics, one day, King Brahmadata of Kāsi ordered Prince Dīghāvu to harness the royal chariot: “Dear lad, harness the chariot, we will go into the deer forest.” The prince replied: “Very well, your majesty,” and when everything was set, he reported the matter to the king: “Your majesty, the chariot is ready, and it is up to your majesty to decide when to leave.” The king started off hunting for big game in the forest followed by a company of his army.

Prince Dīghāvu drove away the royal chariot at such a great speed that it eventually got cut off from the royal followers. When they had gone far enough, King Brahmadata ordered Prince Dīghāvu: “Boy, we have been cut off from the party, I am tired and you might unharness the chariot, so that I might take some rest.” The prince unharnessed the royal chariot and sat cross-legged on the ground. The king lay down to relax with his head resting on the lap of the young lad. He soon fell into a slumber through tiredness.

Monastics, when the king was sound asleep, Prince Dīghāvu's mind began to work: “This King Brahmadata of the Kāsi country has done much harm to us. He had forcibly seized our army, elephants, horses, chariots, territories, treasuries and granaries. It was he who has killed my parents; the opportunity for revenge upon him has presented itself now.”

He drew his sword out, monastics, but his father's advice crossed his mind: “My dear son, do not look far and do not look close either; my dear son, Dīghāvu, revenge does not promote peace; my dear son, Dīghāvu, only non-resentment gives peace.” Thinking “It would not be right for me to go against my father's advice,” he replaced the sword in its sheath.

For a second time, for a third time, Prince Dīghāvu drew his sword out to wreak vengeance on his old enemy and for the second and third time he replaced his sword in its sheath, remembering the advice given by his royal father. [679]

Then Brahmadata, the King of Kāsi, frightened and agitated, alarmed, unsteadily got up all of a sudden from his sleep. Whereupon, Prince Dīghāvu asked him: “Your majesty, what has caused you to get frightened, agitated and alarmed?” The king replied: “Boy, I dreamt in my sleep that I was running away for my life through fright, running from the son of the King of Kosala who was chasing me with a sword.”

Monastics, then Prince Dīghāvu held the head of King Brahmadata with his left hand and drew out the sword with his right hand and said: “Your majesty, the son of the late King of Kosala is no one other than myself. You have done much harm to us, you have forcibly seized our army, elephants, horse, chariots, territories, treasuries and granaries. It was you who killed my royal parents. Now, it is my turn for revenge on you!”

Whereupon, King Brahmadata touched Prince Dīghāvu’s feet with his head and entreated him for mercy by granting him life: “Dear Dīghāvu, please grant me life.” He thus entreated for mercy three times in succession. Then the prince replied: “How will it be possible for me to grant life to a king! It is a king who should grant me life.” – “Well then, dear Dīghāvu, you grant me life and I will grant you life.”

Monastics, Brahmadata, the King of Kāsi and Prince Dīghāvu granted life to one another, and they took hold of one another’s hands. They vowed to do no harm to one another. Then the king asked Dīghāvu: “My dear son, please get the royal chariot which is waiting and let us return.” The prince said: “Very well, your majesty.” When everything was set, he reported that everything was ready and it was up to his majesty to leave as and when he so wished.

Monastics, once the king had mounted the chariot, Prince Dīghāvu drove the chariot with accelerated speed and they caught up with the army in no time. King Brahmadata of Kāsi, accompanied by his troops then returned to the city. On arrival at the royal palace, the king had the councillors and ministers assembled and addressed them: “Good sirs, what would you do if Dīghāvu, the son of King Dīghīti, could be found now?”

Then some said: “We would cut his hands off.” Others said: “We would cut off his feet,” again others said: “We would cut off his hands and feet, ears, nose, ears and tongue; we would cut off his head.” The king pointing his finger, said: “This is Prince Dīghāvu, son of the late King Dīghīti of Kosala. Nothing should be done against him now. Just as he has granted me life, so also have I granted him life.” Thus King Brahmadata of Kāsi made this proclamation.

Prince Dīghāvu’s Doctrine of Peace

King Brahmadata of Kāsi then asked Prince Dīghāvu: “My dear son, your father is believed to have spoken four phrases to you: ‘My dear son, Dīghāvu, do not look far and do not look close either; my dear son, Dīghāvu, revenge does not promote peace; my dear son, Dīghāvu, only non-resentment gives peace.’ My dear son, Dīghāvu, what did your father mean?”

Prince Dīghāvu gave the following reply in response to the king’s query: Your majesty, my father advised me: “Not to look far.” This should be understood to mean: “One should not be at enmity with other people for any length of time.” Your majesty, my father advised me: “Not to look close, either.” This should be understood to mean: “Do not shorten the term of friendship, but strengthen and prolong ties of friendship.”

Your majesty, my father advised me: “My dear son, enmity could not be brought to an end by any act of revenge.” You can only do away with enmity by [680] avoidance of revenge. Your majesty, in case I assassinated you for killing my parents, your well-wishers would undoubtedly try to kill me. That would not end the chain of events, for my well-wishers would turn against your well-wishers, and the endless chain of events would go on for ever and ever!

Now that your majesty had granted me life and I have done likewise, the question of enmity or revenge should no more arise and so my good father said: “My son, revenge does not pay, harbour no resentment and be happy,” with that end in view. Thus Prince Dīghāvu interpreted the meaning of his father’s advice on the end of strife. To this objective, the wise men of olden days had also left the following lines for our guidance:

1. Don’t prolong the cause of enmity.
2. Don’t shorten the term of friendship.
3. Friendliness eliminates enmity.
4. Resentment begets revenge.

Monastics, when Prince Dīghāvu had explained the underlying meaning of his father’s advice, King Brahmadata of Kāsi said: “My dear men, it is indeed wonderful, such a marvellous thing has never occurred before. This Prince Dīghāvu is so wise that he could explain to us at length, what his father had uttered in abridged form!” Thus the King of Kāsi spoke highly of Prince Dīghāvu and formally returned the possessions of his father, the late King Dīghīti of Kosala, comprising the army, elephants, horses, chariots, territories, treasuries and granaries, and above all, he gave his daughter, who had come of age, to Prince Dīghāvu.”

Buddha’s Exhortation

“Monastics, it will be seen that, even those kings in arms could come to friendly terms through forbearance and kindly disposition! Monastics, when those of you who have become members of the Saṅgha within the domain of my instructions that are good in the beginning, good in the middle, and good at the end, cannot forgive and act in a friendly way, how can you expect to uphold the dignity and maintain the nobility and purity of my teaching?”

Then the Buddha repeated, for the third time, the exhortation he had given before: “Monastics, it is not at all right and proper for you to be quarrelling, fighting and opposing one another. Enough! No disputes, no quarrelling, no contentions.” At this last exhortation also, the monastic who belonged to the suspended group addressed the Buddha as before: “Most exalted Buddha, let the lord of the Dhamma wait, let the Fortunate One remain unconcerned, intent on abiding in peace for the present. We will be responsible for these disputes, quarrels and strife.” The Buddha then considered: “These useless people, without hope of achieving the paths and fruitions, are really incorrigible. It’s not easy to bring them to their senses,” and he departed from that place.

The Buddha entered Kosambī early in the morning for alms food and after his meal returned to the monastery. He then had his lodging kept in order and carrying his robe and the alms bowl he stood in the midst of the monastics and gave the following exhortations in ten verses (Kosambiya-jātaka, Ja 428):

Puthu-saddo samajano, [681] na bālo koci maññatha, Saṅghasmim bhijjamānasmim, nāññam bhiyyo amaññarum.

Those monastics, with foul mouths and rude manners, have boisterous, cheerless voices; they are the same type of persons as those with impure hearts; there is no one amongst them who knows his own folly or foolishness. Above all, none of these monastics has realized that dissension amongst the members of Saṅgha has arisen because of his own conduct.

Parimuṭṭhā paṇḍitābhāsā, vācā-gocara-bhāṇino, yāvicchanti mukhā-yāmaṃ, yena nītā na taṃ vidū.

Those monastics, with foul mouths and rude manners, are greatly infatuated by delusion, intent upon quarrelling and under the guise of wise and intelligent persons. They do not dwell in contemplative mood. They open their mouths wide and utter abusive language without any sense of shame or dread of blame. None of them keep silent as a gesture of regard and respect for the Saṅgha. They are ignorant of the fact that such quarrels and conflicts invariably lead to a state of shamefulness. They do not perceive that ill-will leads them on to such shameful acts.

*Akkocchi maṃ avadhi maṃ, ajini maṃ ahāsi me,
ye ca taṃ upanayhanti, veraṃ tesāṃ na sammati.*

If you harbour resentment against a person for having abused you, tormented you, overpowered you, robbed or deprived you of your property; and if you do not care to forbear against that aggressor in the interest of peace and tranquillity, the flame of enmity will not die down, but it will keep on burning up to the time of dissolution of a world-element.

*Akkocchi maṃ avadhi maṃ, ajini maṃ ahāsi me,
ye ca taṃ nupanayhanti, veraṃ tesūpasammati.*

If you do not harbour any resentment against a person who has abused you, who has tormented you, who has overpowered you, who has robbed or deprived you of your property, through forbearance and equanimity, the flame of enmity is bound to dwindle to a vanishing point for lack of fresh fuel!

Na hi verena verāni, sammantīdha kudācanaṃ, averena ca sammanti, esa Dhammo sanantano.

In this world, the flame of animosity cannot be extinguished by harbouring resentment and taking revenge on one another. To wash ordure by means of ordure will not be of any avail! Ordure could only be cleaned by means of pure [682] water. In the same manner, the flame of animosity could only be extinguished, and peace and tranquillity restored, by forbearance and loving-kindness. This is the path that all the Buddhas and Paccekabuddhas have hitherto followed.

*Pare ca na vijānanti, mayam-ettha yamāmase,
ye ca tattha vijānanti, tato sammanti medhagā.*

Amongst the masses of monastics, the unintelligent and quarrelsome monastics are ignorant of the fact that they are on their march towards the kingdom of death, with the movement of time! Whereas, those intelligent and thoughtful monastics, amongst the masses of monastics, are fully alive to the fact that all conditioned things are getting closer to the jaws of death with the progress of time. Consequently, quarrel and conflicts are extinguished and peace and tranquillity prevail.

*Aṭṭhicchinnā pāṇa-harā, gavāssa-dhana-hārino,

When friendships could be fostered and tranquillity established by peaceful means with the kings, who had mercilessly broken the bones and limbs of our parents through malice, assassinated them, robbed us of our cattle and the worldly possessions of our parents by brute force, I personally do not know why you monastics, my own beloved sons, cannot foster brotherly feeling among yourselves, and re-establish a state of tranquillity and stability among yourselves! It is certainly possible!

When a mindful person obtains a friend in the Dhamma, who is accomplished in the three training practices (sikkha), who is self-composed, prudent and wise, he should take delight in associating with him, and strive to overcome external enemies, such as elephants, leopards and tigers, and extirpate the internal foes, such as greed, hatred and delusion, leaving an ascetic life in search of truth.

Should a mindful person fail to obtain a friend in the Dhamma who is accomplished in the three training practices (sikkha), who is self-composed, prudent and wise, he should strive after the ultimate truth all alone, by way of the ascetic life, after the manner of those ancient monarchs who abdicated their thrones, abandoned their countries and renounced the world, such as, Mahā Janaka and Arindama, or like a bull elephant of Mataṅga breed which roams the forest all alone. [683]

*Ekassa caritaṃ seyyo, natthi bāle sahāyatā,
Eko care na ca pāpāni kayirā,

To wander all alone, leading the life of an ascetic, and striving after the ultimate truth, deserves praise and admiration. There is no prospect whatsoever for the acquisition of faith and insight or development of morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā), through association with lowly ignorant persons. One should strive, single handed, after the ultimate goal, like a bull elephant wandering all over the forests without any cares of the world! No evil deeds should be performed.

The Buddha delivered this discourse in ten verses, while standing in the midst of the members of the Saṅgha (Saṅgha), after which, he proceeded all alone to the village of Bālakaloṇaka. [684]

28: The 10th Rains Retreat (Pāḷileyaka)

Bālakaloṇaka was the feudal village of the wealthy Upāli. The Buddha went to that village without telling either his chief disciple or any great disciple, not even Ven. Ānanda. Like a bull elephant that leaves his herd, he went there all by himself, taking his bowl and robe.

For there would be no living being whom the Buddha was to enlighten during the coming tenth Rains Retreat (Vassa). His lone departure from Kosambī city was a device to admonish the contentious and quarrelsome monks. He set off to Pāḷileyaka forest and on his way, as he wanted to gladden and bolster up the elder Bhagu, who was then staying in solitude in a forest-dwelling with Bālakaloṇaka village as the resort for alms.

When the Buddha thus went alone, 500 monks said to Ven. Ānanda: “Ven. Ānanda, the Buddha has set out by himself. Let us follow him!” Ānanda then replied: “Brethren, when the Fortunate One packs up his beddings, takes his bowl and robe and sets out alone without any attendant monk and without asking the Saṅgha for leave, then it is his wish to go unaccompanied. A disciple should act in accordance with the will of his teacher. Therefore, these days you should not follow the Master.” Thus Ven. Ānanda did not let them go, nor did he himself follow the Master, knowing the Buddha’s wish.

When Ven. Bhagu saw from afar the Buddha coming alone to Bālakaloṇaka village, he prepared the seat, kept the water ready for the Buddha to wash his feet, and the board to wash his feet on and the potsherd to rub them with. He welcomed the Buddha and took his bowl and robe. Sitting on the seat prepared by Ven. Bhagu, the Buddha washed his feet and asked Ven. Bhagu, who was seated in a reverent posture at a suitable distance: “Are you fit and well, monk? Do you have enough food? Do you get alms without hardship?” – “Venerable sir, I am alright. I have enough food. I get alms without hardship.” The Buddha then gave a talk on the benefit of living in solitude and then he proceeded to the Eastern Bamboo Grove.

Anuruddha, Nandiya and Kimila

At that time, the three venerables: Anuruddha, Nandiya and Kimila were living in the Eastern Bamboo Grove. When the watchman of the grove saw from a distance the Buddha approaching, he mistook him for an ordinary monk and tried to block the way saying: “Monk, do not enter this grove. Three noble clansmen, who are bent on their own welfare, reside in this grove. Do not cause discomfort to them.”

28: The 10th Rains Retreat (Pāḷileyaka) – 961

Just as a hungry man longs for food, a thirsty man longs for drinking water, a man oppressed by cold longs for heat, a man oppressed by heat longs for cold, or a sad man longs for happiness, even so the Buddha, being weary of the disunited and contentious Kosambī monks, pondered as to who the virtuous men living there could be. While so doing, there appeared in his vision these three noble clansmen. Wishing to encourage them, he considered thus: “If I do so, this would be a good way to admonish the Kosambī monks.” Hence he made his visit to the Eastern Bamboo Grove, the abode of the said three good monks.

The grove where Ven. Anuruddha and others were dwelling was fenced, guarded and conserved by its owners so that the fruit, flowers, gum and wooden buildings in it might be safe from depredation by all sorts of people. [685]

When the watchman saw from afar the Buddha coming, he thought: “Here in this grove are the three worthy people still living in harmony. Quarrels and disputes tend to arise at any place where another person resides. Such a person might move about, attacking and destroying like a wild bull with sharp horns and such destruction could bring about dissension that makes it impossible for two persons to get along together. This visiting monk might create discord at one time or another and destroy the united and happy stay of the three noble people. He seems impressive, he has golden colour and looks like one who is fond of good food. From the time he arrives here, by praising his lay followers, who would offer him good meals, and by doing this and that, he might undermine the mindful monastic life led by the three good monks.

Besides, there is accommodation only for the three: There are only three lodges, three walks, three day retreats, three couches and three boards. There is nothing extra. This big monk, a newcomer, has a bulky body; perhaps he could be a recluse of long standing. He might displace the present occupants at an improper time, thereby making them unhappy in every respect.” Thus thinking, he forbade the Buddha’s entry into the grove saying: “Do not disturb their comfort!” as he totally did not want the unhappiness of the worthy monks.

It may be questioned: Did the watchman try to stop the master knowing that he was the Buddha or did he do so unknowingly? The answer is: he did so unknowingly. When the Buddha went about with the splendour of a Buddha in the company of monks, everybody recognized him without asking: “Who is this man?” But now as he went to the Eastern Bamboo Grove wishing: “Let nobody know of my being a Buddha,” he covered his radiance and other Buddha glories by means of his supernormal powers as if he had hidden them all under a drapery and he moved along incognito as the big full moon that is covered by clouds, personally taking his bowl and robe. The watchman stopped the Buddha because of his ignorance of the Awakened One.

While staying at his day retreat, Ven. Anuruddha overheard the watchman’s word: “Monk, do not enter this grove!” and thought to himself: “Only we three are dwelling in this grove; there is no other resident here. The watchman was speaking as though he were communicating with a monk. Who could that monk be?” He then rose and standing at the door he looked over the road and saw the Buddha.

On the part of the Buddha, as soon as he caught a glimpse of Ven. Anuruddha, he emitted the radiance of his body. Splendid with the various major and minor marks, the body gave out light that was glorious like a strip of golden cloth spread out. Then it occurred to Ven. Anuruddha: “Like a man who stretches his hand to grasp by the neck a cobra with its hood erected, the poor man does not know that it is the Buddha whom he is dealing with, the foremost personality in the world. He speaks as if he were dealing with an insignificant monk.” So he commanded his man saying: “Watchman, do not stop the Buddha! Here comes our master, the Fortunate One!”

Ven. Anuruddha did not welcome the Buddha alone, for he considered: “We three are staying here in harmony at present. If I alone were to welcome the Buddha, it would not make for harmonious living. I will bring my friends and do the welcoming together with them. My friends too adore the Buddha just as I do.” Wishing to meet the Buddha with his two friends, he went to their day retreats and called out to them. “Come, brethren! Come, brethren! Our master, the Fortunate One, has arrived!” Then the three venerables extended their welcome to the Buddha in unison, one taking his bowl and robe, another preparing the seat and the third keeping the water, the board and the potsherd ready so that he might wash his feet.

Herein with his hands red like a newly blossomed lotus, the Buddha took [686] some crystal-clear water and poured it over his golden coloured insteps, and washed his feet rubbing one with the other. It may be asked: Why did the Buddha wash his feet even though his body was free from dust and dirt? The answer is: He washed his feet in order to cool his body as well as to gladden the three venerables. To make the latter reason more explicit: By thus washing his feet, the Buddha could make the venerables immensely delighted with the thought: “With the water brought by us, the master cleansed his feet and thus made use of it.” Hence the Buddha’s washing of his feet despite the fact that his body had no stains whatever.

After respectfully doing obeisance to the Buddha, the three venerables took their proper seats. Then the Buddha asked: “How are you, my dear Anuruddhas? Are you all fit and well? Do you have enough food? Are you free from hardship in getting food?”

Ven. Anuruddha replied: “Fortunate One, we are fit and well. We have enough food. It is not hard for us to get food.”

Herein, of the three monks Ven. Anuruddha was the most senior. If honour be shown to Anuruddha, the senior-most venerable, it follows that honour was shown to the juniors as well. That was why the Buddha addressed Ven. Anuruddha by name. Alternatively, in the Pāḷi text the name Anuruddha has a plural case-ending literally meaning: “My dear Anuruddhas,” in his address the Buddha used what is known as the elliptical method (virūpeka-sesa) covering also the remaining two venerables.

Again, the Buddha asked: “In living together, do you have harmony and happiness, Anuruddhas, without dispute, and like milk and water do you mix well, looking upon one another with amiable eyes?” – “We really have harmony and happiness, knowing no disputes,” Anuruddha answered, “And we mix well like milk and water, looking upon one another with the eyes of amity.” – “How do you manage to do so, Anuruddha?” the Buddha asked further.

This Ven. Anuruddha explained: “Fortunate One, living in this grove, I consider thus: ‘Great indeed is my gain! I have attained a great fortune, for I am sharing this dwelling with these co-residents of such good nature! Fortunate One, towards these two friends I perform physical acts, verbal acts, and mental acts with loving-kindness (mettā), both in their presence as well as in their absence. Fortunate One, thinking: “If I practise setting aside my will, and act according to theirs, that will be good,” and so I practise giving priority to their will over my own. Fortunate One, though we three are of different bodies, we are, as it were, of one and the same mentality.’ ” Thereafter Ven. Nandiya and Ven. Kimila spoke to the Buddha in the same way.

Herein with reference to the words said of the performance of physical, verbal and mental acts with loving-kindness, whether in the presence or in the absence of others, the physical and the verbal acts in the others’ presence took place while living together; the same two acts in the others’ absence took place while living apart; the mental acts, however, happened while living together or while living apart.

To elaborate: When a fellow monk saw a couch, a board, a wooden article or an earthenware misplaced by another monk, he did not ask insolently: “Who has used this?” Instead he picked it up and restored it to its proper place as though he himself had misplaced it. Moreover, he cleaned any place that needed cleaning. Thus the physical act performed by one was performed with loving-kindness in the presence of others.

When one of the co-resident monks went away, either of the remaining monks similarly restored the monastic articles left behind in disorder by the departed monk. He cleaned any place that needed cleaning. The physical act thus performed was that performed with loving-kindness in the absence of others. [687]

Living together with other venerables, one spoke with them sweet and delightful words, appealing words, words worthy of lifelong remembrance, words of the Dhamma; one gave an audible talk on the Dhamma, discussed the Dhamma, and put questions and gave answers to them. Any of these varied verbal acts and others of his, was performed with loving-kindness in the presence of others.

When the others left for another place, the remaining monk, Ven. Anuruddha, for instance, extolled their virtues saying: “My dear friend Ven. Nandiya or Ven. Kimila is endowed with such moral virtues and practical virtues.” His verbal act of this kind was that performed with loving-kindness in the absence of others.

“May my friend Ven. Nandiya or Ven. Kimila be free from harm! May he be free from any hatred and ill-will that are perverse and destructive! May he be happy both physically and mentally!” Such a mental act of focusing his thoughts of goodwill towards others in their presence as well as in their absence was performed with loving-kindness on both occasions.

How did each of the three venerables put aside his own idea and act in accordance with that of the others? Suppose one’s bowl should show wear, another's robe should get dirty and the third's meditation cell was littered and needed tidying, while these three things should happen simultaneously, if the owner of the bowl said first: "My bowl has been worn; I have to make a new bowl by baking," then the others would not say: "My robe is dirty and I have to wash it," or "I have to remove the litter from my meditation cell." Instead, they would enter the forest and the other two would lend a hand in baking the bowl. Only after finishing the task of baking would they wash the robe or tidy the cell. If the second monk said first: "I have to wash my robe," or the third said first: "I have to remove the litter," the others would similarly attend to it and only after getting it done would they turn to their own business. This was the way how one fulfilled the others' wishes, leaving aside one's own.

Having thus asked about the value of the unity (sāmaggi-rasa) of the three persons and having known thus of the full value of their unity, the Buddha desired again to question them about the signs of their heedfulness (appamāda-lakkhaṇa) and asked: "Anuruddhas, how is it; do you abide inclined towards Nibbāna by putting in great effort and without negligence?" – "Fortunate One," answered Ven. Anuruddha, "We do indeed abide inclined towards Nibbāna by putting in great effort and without negligence." Again the Buddha asked: "How do you abide inclined towards Nibbāna by putting in great effort and without negligence?"

Ven. Anuruddha replied: "Fortunate One, one resident in this grove, after coming back before others from the alms round in the village, prepares seats, keeps the water and board ready for washing the feet, and places the potsherds for rubbing them with; he sets the vessels ready for placing the first portions of food; he fetches the water for drinking and the water for other purposes.

The monk, who returns later from the alms round in the village, partakes of the remaining food, in case he desires. If he does not, he disposes of it at a place where there is no green grass or plants; or he throws it into the water that has no small creatures; he folds up the seat; he restores the water, the board and potsherds to their proper places; he does so with regard to the vessels after washing them; he stows away the water pot for drinking and those for other purposes; he sweeps the mess-room.

If he finds any water pot empty, whether for drinking, or for general use or for the bathroom, he fills it. If it is heavy, he calls another monk by giving him a signal with his hand and the two carry it with their joined hands. Fortunate One, we do not utter a word for the purpose of carrying the water pot. Fortunate One, once in every five days we pass the time fruitfully by discussing the Dhamma throughout the night. [688] Fortunate One, in the aforesaid manner do we abide inclined towards Nibbāna by putting in great effort and without negligence.”

28: The 10th Rains Retreat (Pāḷileyaka) – 966

Herein, a remarkable thing was that these venerables did not go together on alms round; as they delighted in fruition attainment (phala-samāpatti), they rose, did early ablution, fulfilled their duties, retired to their respective meditation cells and engaged in fruition attainment for a certain resolved period.

Of the three venerables, the one who rose from the fruition attainment for the resolved period before the others went out ahead of them for alms. On his return, he came to know that: “The other two are late; I have come back early,” he then covered his bowl, prepared the seat and did other things. If he had food in his bowl just enough for himself, he simply sat down and ate it. If the food was more than enough, he put the first portion into the vessel, covered it and ate his portion. Having eaten, he washed the bowl, dried it, put it into its bag and, taking his bowl and robe, he went to his day retreat.

When a second monk came to the dining room, he perceived: “One has come ahead of me; the other is later than me.” If he saw enough food in his bowl, he simply sat down and ate it. If the food was less than enough, he took some food left behind by the first monk from the vessel. If the food in his bowl was more than enough, he first put the surplus portion into the vessel and ate his meal just to sustain himself and, like the earlier monk, went to his day retreat.

When the third one came to the dining room, he understood: “The other two have come and gone before me, I am the last.” And he partook of his meal in the manner of the second one, after finishing his meal, he washed the bowl, dried it and put it into its bag and stowed the seat away. He threw away the remaining water from the drinking water pot and also that from the pot for general use and kept the pots upside down. If there was any leftover food in the vessel, he discarded it on the ground where there was no green grass or into water free from tiny living creatures and washed the bowl and stowed it away. After sweeping the mess-room, he removed the dust and kept the broom at a place free from termites and, taking the bowl with him, he retired to his day retreat. Such was the daily routine of the venerables at the dining hall outside the dwelling in the forest.

28: The 10th Rains Retreat (Pāḷileyaka) – 967

Fetching water for drinking and for general purpose was a duty done in the dwelling place. If one of the three noble venerables saw a water pot empty, he carried the pot to the pond, washed it both inside and out, filled it with water through a filter, and, if the pot proved too heavy for him, he placed it near the pond and called another person by gesture. In seeking a helping hand, he never made a sound by mentioning or without mentioning the other person's name.

Because if he were to cry for help by mentioning somebody else's name, it would be a disturbance to the meditation of the monk concerned. That was why he never cried out the name. Should he make a sound calling somebody without mentioning his name, both monks would come out from their meditation cells, vying each other to get to the caller first. In that case, since it was a job that could be done only by two, the third one would find himself unwanted and his meditation engagement would be interrupted unnecessarily. For this reason the caller did not make a sound without mentioning the name.

If he were not to make a sound, how did he try to get help? After filling the pot through a filter, he approached the day retreat of another monk, making no sound with his footsteps; seeing him he called him by a hand gesture that attracted him. Thereafter the two monks joined their hands, carried the pot together and kept the water for drinking or for general use.

With reference to the words: "Once in every five days we would pass the time fruitfully by discussing the Dhamma throughout the night," the fourteenth, the fifteenth, and the eighth of the bright or the dark fortnight, these three days served as the three occasions on which the Dhamma was usually heard. Without disrupting [689] these three days of Dhamma talks, once in every five days, did both venerables, Nandiya and Kimila, bathed not long after noon and went to Ven. Anuruddha. At his place they met and exchanged questions and answers on any of the Three Baskets. While they were thus doing, the day dawned. Thus far did Ven. Anuruddha, who was asked by the Buddha as to the signs of heedfulness, reply that they were not negligent even on the occasions that normally cause negligence to others.

A further explanation: For other monks, the time of their going on alms round, leaving the dwelling for alms, adjusting the lower garment, putting on the upper robe, making a round, teaching the Dhamma, expressing their appreciation of the alms giving, partaking of alms food on return from the town or the village, washing the bowl, putting the bowl into the bag, and stowing away the bowl and robe, these were the eleven occasions on which they prolonged their talks that had nothing to do with heedfulness and thereby they became negligent of their meditation duties.

Ven. Anuruddha, therefore, meant to say: “As for us, even on these occasions which cause others to indulge in loose talk, opposed to meditation, never have we done such a thing as prolongation of speech that is opposed to meditation and that is outside meditation though we may be physically free from engagement as practical meditation (vihāra-samāpatti) was uncalled for on these occasions.” He thereby explained the signs of their heedfulness at its height even at times when others were negligent. By these words, he further meant to indicate that there was no negligence at all on their part by not being absorbed in practical meditation on the occasions other than the aforesaid eleven.

Pāḷileyaka Forest

As has been said above, the Buddha, having explained the advantages of living in solitude to Ven. Bhagu at the village of Bālakaloṇaka for half a day and the whole night, entered the village of Bālakaloṇaka for alms the following day with Ven. Bhagu as his companion. After sending him back from that very place, the Buddha went alone to the Eastern Bamboo Grove with the thought: “I shall meet the three clansmen who are living in harmony.” He talked to Vens. Anuruddha, Nandiya and Kimila about the benefits of living in harmony, and having asked them to remain there at the Eastern Bamboo Grove, he proceeded alone and arrived at Pāḷileyaka village.<sup>212</sup>

The villagers welcomed the Buddha and made offerings to him. Having constructed a dwelling for him in the forest, named Rakkhita, near the village, they requested him: “May the Fortunate One stay here at this Rakkhita forest-dwelling.” In the Rakkhita forest there was a huge Sāla tree named the Auspicious Sāla (Bhadda-sāla) near the Buddha’s dwelling place. The Buddha stayed near that tree having his dwelling in the forest with Pāḷileyaka village as his alms resort.

Then it occurred to him as he was staying in solitude: “I could not live at ease, being with the Kosambī monks who indulge in disputes under my eyes or in my absence and created quarrels in the Saṅgha. Now that I am alone and unaccompanied, away from those disputing and quarrelling monks, my stay is happy.”

Pāḷileyaka Elephant

At that time, there was a certain full grown male elephant, the leader of a herd, living still with young males, females, courting males and sucklings. Living in this manner, he had to feed on the grass without tender tips; all the branches and twigs brought down from the trees by him were eaten up by other elephants. He also had to drink muddy water. Besides, when he rose from the ford, females went past him, and knocked against him.

Then it occurred to him: “Living with such members of my herd compels me to eat [690] the grass that has lost the tender tips as they have been eaten earlier by others. Whatever I have brought down from the trees is being devoured by them. It is the turbid water that I have to drink. Female elephants jostle my body when I come up from the water. It were well if I would live away from the herd!” So thinking, he left the herd and happened to go to the Buddha near the huge Sāla tree in the Pāḷileyaka Rakkhita forest.

Herein Pāḷileyaka was originally the name of the village. The original name of the forest was Rakkhita. Since the Rakkhita forest was near the village of Pāḷileyaka, it was also called Pāḷileyaka, because it was close to the village. The elephant that had come to that forest was also referred to as the Pāḷileyaka elephant-king.

When the elephant was sick of living with the herd and entered the forest he saw the Buddha seated at the foot of the Sāla tree. On seeing him, he felt calm, like a man who has his grief allayed by the water from 1,000 pots. With devotion in his heart, he was attracted to the Buddha and stood near him. From that time onwards, as his daily routine, he swept the ground around the Auspicious Sāla tree and the Buddha’s dwelling place with a twig so that the ground might be cleared of grass and plants, he brought water to the Buddha for washing his face, he fetched water for his bathing, he offered a small twig to be used as a tooth-cleaner, he brought sweet, delicious fruits of different sizes and offered them to the Buddha, who took them for food.

With his trunk, the elephant brought firewood. By rubbing the fire sticks with one another, he produced fire, into which he put stones to bake them. When the stones became hot, he rolled them down into a stone basin by means of a stick; then he tried to ascertain whether the water was hot enough or not; if he knew it was, he approached the Buddha and stood near him. Perceiving that the elephant wanted him to bathe, the Buddha went to the stone basin and bathed. In the same way did the elephant also keep the drinking water. What should be taken as remarkable from this is that the Buddha drank boiled water that had been cooled.

When the Buddha<sup>213</sup> entered the village for alms food, the Pāḷileyaka elephant carried his bowl and robe on his head and went along with him. When the Buddha reached the edge of the village, he said to the elephant: “Pāḷileyaka, it is not fit for you to follow me beyond this point. Get me my bowl and robe!” Thus he let the elephant put down his requisites from his head, and, carrying them by himself, he entered the village.

The elephant waited at the same spot until the Buddha returned and when the latter came back, he greeted him and in the previous manner, he took his bowl and robe. On arriving home in the forest dwelling, he placed them in their proper place; and waiting on the master, he fanned him with a twig. When night fell, thinking: “I will give protection to the Buddha,” he held a big stick with his trunk and roamed in the forest till dawn to ward off any danger from lions, tigers and leopards.

From that time onwards, the huge forest came to be known as Pāḷileyaka Rakkhita Forest, for it was guarded by the Pāḷileyaka elephant.

He performed in like manner all his duties beginning with offering of the water for the Buddha to wash the face at daybreak. In this way the Buddha spent the tenth Rains Retreat period in the Pāḷileyaka forest, receiving service rendered by the Pāḷileyaka elephant.

Criticism of the Kosambī Monks

While the Buddha was thus spending the Rains Retreat (Vassa) in the Pāḷileyaka forest, the wealthy [691] Ghosaka and other lay devotees and supporters, residents of Kosambī, went to the Ghositārāma monastery and not seeing him, they inquired: “Venerable sirs, where is the master staying?” To this, the monks give a sad answer saying: “Supporters, the master has gone to the Pāḷileyaka forest.” – “Why?” asked the lay devotees. “The master tried to restore unity in us as we were disunited,” said the monks. “Having developed hatred among ourselves we refused to be united, hence the master’s departure to the Pāḷileyyaka forest.” – “How is this, sirs?” asked the lay people: “Despite your ordination from the Buddha’s hand, and despite his attempt to restore your unity, do you remain disunited?” The monks admitted that it was true.

Many male and female devotees, citizens of Kosambī, agreed saying among themselves: “These Kosambī monks, who have been ordained by the Fortunate One, are not united in spite of his efforts to unite them. On account of them, we have long been deprived of the chance to behold the master. We will give no seats to them, nor will we pay respects!” From that time onwards, the quarrelsome and contentious monks of Kosambī were no longer treated with respect much less with the four requisites.

Because of the scarcity of food and starvation, the monks became emaciated day by day and came to their senses after a few days. They confessed their faults and apologized to one another with salutations; they also begged the laity’s pardon, saying: “We have become united, supporters, please treat us as before!” – “Have you tendered your apology to the master?” asked the lay people. “No, supporters, I have not, not yet.” – “Then you had better do so. After doing so, we will treat you, sirs, as before,” replied the lay people tactfully. Since it was a Rains Retreat (Vassa) period, the monks did not dare to visit the Buddha and had to pass the three months of the Rains Retreat miserably.

The Monkey Inspired by Pāḷileyyaka Elephant

Enjoying the service of Pāḷileyyaka elephant the Buddha stayed happily in the Pāḷileyyaka forest for the three Rains Retreat (Vassa) months. At that time, a monkey, seeing the daily duties performed actively and energetically by the Pāḷileyyaka elephant, became inspired and thought to himself: “I too will do some deeds of merit towards the master.” One day, while roaming about, he found a tree-branch with a honeycomb devoid of bees, broke it and brought it with the broken branch to the Buddha. He then cut a plantain leaf, on which he placed the honeycomb and offered it to the Buddha. The Buddha accepted it.

The monkey watched to see whether the Buddha would enjoy it or not, and he saw him remaining in his seat and just holding the honeycomb without eating it. The monkey investigated, wondering why. He took the honeycomb by its edge and turned it round, only to see the bee-eggs, which he slowly and gently removed and offered it again to the Buddha. Then only did he eat it.

So elated was the monkey that he joyously danced about, moving from one tree branch to another. While so doing, both the branches, which he was holding with his hand and which he was treading on, broke off and fell on a tree stump. With his body pierced by the stump but with his mind devoted to the Buddha, he died and was reborn in a golden mansion measuring 30 leagues in the Deva abode of Tāvatiṃsa. He was known as Makkakaṭṭha Deva, the monkey god, having 1,000 female celestials as his retinue.

Pāḷileyaka Elephant's Thought

To Pāḷileyaka elephant, who had been fulfilling his daily duties to the Buddha in the aforesaid manner, it occurred thus: “Associated with young males, females, courting males and sucklings, I could not live in peace formerly. I had to feed on the grass without sprouts; all the branches and twigs brought down from trees were devoured by the others. I had to drink unclean water. What is more, female elephants showed no regard for me and I was rudely jostled by them when I came up from the water. Now that I have departed from them, I can live alone in peace.” [692]

Knowing his own peaceful life away from his companions and knowing also the thought of Pāḷileyaka elephant, the Buddha breathed forth this exalted utterance (udāna):

Etam nāgassa nāgena, īsādantassa hatthino, sameti cittaṃ cittena, yad-eko ramatī mano.

Being alone in this forest named Rakkhita I, the teacher of the three classes of beings, humans, Devas and Brahmas, take delight. In the same way, this elephant, named Pāḷileyaka, delights being alone in this very forest. Therefore, the thought of Pāḷileyaka elephant, who possesses the pole-like tusks, is the same as mine, who has been named the Buddha-nāga, the elephant-like Buddha, living in the seclusion of the forest.

Ven. Ānanda's Entreaty to the Buddha

The Buddha, observing Rains Retreat (Vassa) in the forest of Pāḷileyaka, enjoying the service rendered by Pāḷileyaka elephant, became well-known throughout the whole of Jambūdīpa. The wealthy Anāthapiṇḍika, the monastery supporter Visākhā and other high-born residents of Sāvattthī sent messages to Ven. Ānanda saying: “Venerable sir, kindly help us to get an opportunity to see the Fortunate One!”

28: The 10th Rains Retreat (Pāḷileyaka) – 973

Five hundred monastics who had been staying all over the place approached Ānanda at the end of the Rains Retreat (Vassa) and made a request to him with these words: “Friend Ānanda, it has been long since we last heard a discourse from the master. Friend Ānanda, we beg you. We would like to have a chance again to listen to the Fortunate One.”

Then Ven. Ānanda went to the Pāḷileyaka forest leading the 500 monks, but he thought that it would not be nice to draw near the Buddha together with such a large crowd, as the Buddha had been living a solitary life for the whole Rains Retreat (Vassa). He, therefore, left the monks somewhere else and approached the Buddha by himself.

On seeing Ven. Ānanda, Pāḷileyaka elephant rushed to him carrying a stick in the grip of his trunk, for he mistook him for an enemy. When the Buddha saw this, he stopped the elephant saying: “Go away, Pāḷileyaka, go away! Do not block his way. This monk is my attendant.” The elephant then dropped the stick and made a gesture to express his desire to take Ven. Ānanda’s bowl and robe. But Ven. Ānanda refused to hand them to him.

Then the elephant thought: “If this monk were conversant with the rules of an attendant, he would not put his requisites on the stone slab which is the seat of the master.” Ven. Ānanda laid down his bowl and robe on the ground.

Never does a well conducted person or a man versed in duties place his belongings on the seat or the bed of the respected teacher.

After paying obeisance to the Buddha, Ven. Ānanda sat down in a blameless place. “Dear son, Ānanda, did you come alone?” asked the Buddha. When informed that he came together with 500 monks, the Buddha inquired further: “Where are those 500 monks now?” – “I came, having left them somewhere else, as I did not know the inclination of the Fortunate One,” replied Ven. Ānanda. “Bring them here, dear Ānanda,” the Buddha ordered.

As had been ordered by the Buddha, Ven. Ānanda called the 500 monks who came and paid respects to the Buddha and took their appropriate seats. When the Buddha had exchanged friendly greetings with them, the monks said to the Buddha: “You, Fortunate One, are gentle partly because you have become a

Buddha and partly because you come of an aristocratic family. You have done a difficult thing by living all by yourself for the whole Rains Retreat (Vassa). It seems that you have had no one to attend to your needs, nobody to bring you the water for washing your face and so on.” – “Monks,” said the Buddha, “Pāḷileyyaka elephant has fulfilled all the duties due to me. In fact, one who has a good companion of such a nature should live with that companion. In the absence of such a companion only a solitary life is praiseworthy. He then gave the following three verses [693] (Dhp 328-330).

*Sace labhetha nipakaṃ saḥāyaṃ,
saddhiṃ caraṃ sādhu-vihāri-dhīraṃ,
abhibhuyya sabbāni parissayāni, careyya tenattamano satīmā.*

When a mindful person obtains a friend in the Dhamma, who is accomplished in the three training practices (sikkha), who is self-composed, prudent and wise, he should take delight in associating with him, and strive to overcome the external enemies, such as elephants, leopards and tigers, and extirpate the internal foes, such as greed, hatred and delusion, leaving an ascetic life in search of truth.

*No ce labhetha nipakaṃ saḥāyaṃ,
saddhiṃ caraṃ sādhu-vihāri-dhīraṃ,
ājā va raṭṭhaṃ vijitaṃ pahāya, eko care mātaṅgarañ-ñeva nāgo.*

Should a mindful person fail to obtain a friend in the Dhamma who is accomplished in the three training practices (sikkha), who is self-composed, prudent and wise, he should strive after the ultimate truth all alone, by way of the ascetic life, after the manner of those ancient monarchs who abdicated their thrones, abandoned their countries and renounced the world, such as Mahā Janaka and Arindama, or like a bull elephant of Mataṅga breed which roams the forest all alone.

*Ekassa caritaṃ seyyo, natthi bāle saḥāyatā,
eko care na ca pāpāni kayirā,
apposukko mātaṅgarañ-ñeva nāgo.*

To wander all alone, leading the life of an ascetic, and striving after the ultimate truth, deserves praise and admiration. There is no prospect whatsoever for the acquisition of faith and insight or development of morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā), in association with lowly, ignorant persons. One should strive, single handed, after the ultimate goal, like a bull elephant wandering all over the forests without any care in the world! No evil deeds should be performed.

At the end of the verses the 500 monks became established in the Arahat fruition (Arahatta-phala).

Then Ven. Ānanda conveyed the messages of the wealthy Anāthapiṇḍika and the monastery supporter Visākhā and all, saying: “Fortunate One, the five billion noble supporters, laymen and women, citizens of Sāvattihī, headed by Anāthapiṇḍika the merchant, are waiting in great hopes for your coming.” – “In that case, dear Ānanda, bring my bowl and robe,” so saying the Buddha set out from the Pāḷileyaka forest.

At that time Pāḷileyaka elephant came and lay across the path that was to be taken by the Buddha and the assembly of monastics. When the monastics asked: “Fortunate One, what is the elephant doing?” the Buddha replied: “Monks, this elephant is desirous of offering alms food to you. In fact, this elephant has specially rendered service to me for a long time, for which I am grateful. He ought not to be disappointed. Let us turn back, monks!” With these words, the Buddha turned back, leading the monks.

Pāḷileyaka went into the forest and gathered various edible fruits, such as jack fruit, bananas and so on; he brought them, kept them in heaps for offering to the monks the following day. There were so many even 500 monks could not eat them all.

When the meal was over, the Buddha had his bowl and robe brought and left the forest. Pāḷileyaka elephant made his way through the monks and stood across right in front of the Buddha again. “Fortunate One, what is the matter with the elephant?” the monks asked. “This elephant wants me to turn back and to send you, dear sons, away,” answered the Buddha, who also said to the elephant: “This time I am going, without turning back. With this body of yours it is not possible for you to attain absorption (jhāna), insight (vipassanā), the paths and fruitions. Stay behind!” On hearing these words, the elephant, putting his trunk into his mouth and weeping, followed the assembly of monks headed by the Buddha. Indeed, if he were able to make the Buddha return, for his whole life he would serve the master just as he previously did.

28: The 10th Rains Retreat (Pāḷileyyaka) – 976

On reaching the outskirts of the Pāḷileyyaka village, the Buddha addressed his last words to the elephant: “Pāḷileyyaka, beyond this point is no habitat of yours. A human abode is dangerous. You had better remain here!” The elephant stood lamenting with his eyes set upon the Buddha as far as he could see, and when he lost sight of the Buddha he died of a broken heart at that very spot. By virtue of his meritorious state of devotion to the Buddha, he was reborn as a Deva with a retinue of 1,000 celestials in a golden mansion, 30 leagues wide; he bore the famous name of Pāḷileyyaka Deva.

Kosambī Monks’ Apology to the Buddha

The Buddha journeyed on and eventually arrived at Jetavana monastery in Sāvattḥī. Getting the news that the Fortunate One has come to Sāvattḥī, the monks of Kosambī [694] headed for Sāvattḥī to apologize to the Buddha.

The following is from the Vinaya story about the Chapter about the Monks from Kosambī (Kosambakakkhandhaka, Vin Mv 10).

At that time Ven. Sāriputta, the General of the Dhamma, hearing of the arrival of the Kosambī monks, approached the Buddha, paid respects to him and sat down in a faultless place. He then said to the Buddha: “It is said, exalted Buddha, that the quarrelsome and contentious Kosambī monks are coming to Sāvattḥī. Exalted Buddha, how should we deal with them?”

The Buddha replied: “Dear son Sāriputta, in that case you should abide by the Dhamma.” – “How could we know, exalted Buddha, what is the Dhamma and what is not?” asked Ven. Sāriputta. This led to the Buddha’s instruction of the following eighteen characteristics of unrighteousness (adhamma) and the other eighteen characteristics of righteousness (Dhamma).

Eighteen Characteristics of Unrighteousness

“Dear son Sāriputta, an unrighteous person should be known by eighteen characteristics. Here in this Dispensation, a monk indicates:

1. What is not Dhamma as Dhamma.
2. What is Dhamma as not Dhamma.
3. What is not Vinaya as Vinaya.
4. What is Vinaya as not Vinaya.
5. What the Buddha does not teach as the teaching of Buddha.

28: The 10th Rains Retreat (Pāḷileyyaka) – 977

6. What the Buddha teaches as not the teaching of the Buddha.
7. What the Buddha does not practise as the practice of the Buddha.
8. What the Buddha practises as not the practice of the Buddha.
9. What the Buddha does not prescribe as the rule of the Buddha.
10. What the Buddha prescribes as not the rule of the Buddha.
11. What is not an offence as an offence.
12. What is an offence as not an offence.
13. What is a minor offence as a major offence.
14. What is a major offence as a minor offence.
15. What is an expiable offence as inexpiable.
16. What is not an inexpiable offence as expiable.
17. What is a gross offence as not a gross offence.
18. What is not a gross offence as a gross offence.

Dear son Sāriputta, by these eighteen characteristics should an unrighteous person be known.”

Eighteen Characteristics of Righteousness

“My son Sāriputta, a righteous person should be known by eighteen characteristics. Here in this Dispensation, a monk indicates:

1. What is not Dhamma as not Dhamma.
2. What is Dhamma as Dhamma.
3. What is not Vinaya as not Vinaya. [695]
4. What is Vinaya as Vinaya.
5. What the Buddha does not teach as not the teaching of the Buddha.
6. What the Buddha teaches as the teaching of the Buddha.
7. What the Buddha does not practise as not the practice of the Buddha.
8. What the Buddha practises as the practice of the Buddha.
9. What the Buddha does not prescribe as not a rule of the Buddha.

28: The 10th Rains Retreat (Pāḷileyaka) – 978

10. What the Buddha does prescribe as the rule of the Buddha.
11. What is a not an offence as no offence.
12. What is an offence as an offence.
13. What is a minor offence as a minor offence.
14. What is a major offence as a major offence.
15. What is an expiable offence as an expiable offence.
16. What is an inexpiable offence as an inexpiable offence.
17. What is a gross offence as a gross offence.
18. What is not a gross offence as not a gross offence.

Dear son Sāriputta, by these eighteen characteristics should a righteous person be known.” Thus taught the Buddha.

Herein, this is an instruction given by using the method of teaching with reference to individuals (puggala-dīṭṭha-dhamma-desanā); the eighteen items, such as indicating what is not Dhamma as Dhamma, indicating what is Dhamma as not Dhamma, indication of a gross offence as not a gross offence, and indication of what is not a gross offence as a gross offence, are called the eighteen characteristics of unrighteousness (adhamma-vatthu). They are also called the eighteen causes of schism in the Saṅgha (bheda-kara-vatthu). He who possesses any of these eighteen characteristics is to be known as an unrighteous person (adhamma-vādī).

Similarly, on the side of righteousness, the eighteen items, such as indicating what is not Dhamma as not Dhamma, indicating what is Dhamma as Dhamma, indicating a gross offence as a gross offence, and indicating what is not a gross offence as not a gross offence, are called the eighteen characteristics of righteousness (Dhamma-vatthu). He who possesses any of these characteristics is to be known as a righteous person (Dhamma-vādī). Thus the purport of the Buddha’s instruction should be understood briefly.

The distinction between positive and negative items:

The following explanation is taken from the commentary to the Chapter about Schism in the Saṅgha (Saṅgha-bhedakakkhandhaka, Vin Cv 7):

Of these two sets of eighteen items, by way of the discourses (suttanta), the ten wholesome actions (kusala-kamma-patha) are the Dhamma; the ten unwholesome actions (akusala-kamma-patha) are not Dhamma. Likewise, the 37 constituents of Awakening (Bodhi-pakkhiya-dhamma): the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna), the four right efforts (sammappadhāna), etc. are Dhamma.

Wrongly enumerated aggregates of the above constituents: the three<sup>214</sup> foundations of mindfulness, the three right efforts, the three bases of psychic powers (iddhi-pāda), the six faculties (indriya), the six mental powers (bala), the eight factors of Awakening (bojjhaṅga), the nine constituents of the path (maggaṅga); as well as the four attachments (upādāna), the five hindrances (nīvaraṇa), the seven latent desires (anusaya) and the eight wrong views (micchā-diṭṭhi), these and other aggregates are not Dhamma.

If someone, after taking any of these false aggregates which are not Dhamma, and after discussing with others and coming to an agreement with them saying: “We shall indicate and speak of this group of what is not Dhamma as Dhamma, if we do so, we shall belong to the higher class of teaching families and we ourselves shall become well-known in society,” and then declares: “This indeed is Dhamma!” he indicates what is not Dhamma as Dhamma. [696]

Likewise, if he, taking any of these true aggregates, declares: “This indeed is not Dhamma,” he indicates what is Dhamma as not Dhamma.

In terms of Vinaya, if a person questions another’s offence, makes him realize it and takes action correctly in accordance with the latter’s confession, that is a righteous action (dhamma-kamma). If a person, without questioning, without making him realize it and without bringing about his confession, takes action incorrectly, that is an unrighteous action (adhamma-kamma). If one speaks of a righteous action as unrighteous, then one indicates Dhamma as not Dhamma.

By way of the discourses, the elimination of lust (raga), hatred (dosa) and delusion (moha), the fivefold restraint (saṃvara): restraint by precepts (sīla-saṃvara), restraint by mindfulness (sati-saṃvara), restraint by knowledge (ñāṇa-saṃvara), restraint by forbearance (khanti-saṃvara), restraint by energy (virīya-saṃvara); the fivefold abandoning (pahāna): abandoning of evil through right view (tad-aṅga-pahāna), abandoning through mental concentration (samādhi-pahāna), abandoning by cutting off (samuccheda-pahāna), abandoning through being peaceful (paṭippassaddhi-pahāna), and abandoning through attainment of Nibbāna (nissaraṇa-pahāna), and reflection so that there can be no lust, hate and delusion.

<sup>214</sup> [There are four foundations of mindfulness, not three, so it is wrong. Same with the others, which are all one constituent short].

28: The 10th Rains Retreat (Pāḷileyaka) – 980

These aggregates of elimination, restraint, abandoning and reflection, form discipline; or, in reverse form, the aggregates of non-elimination, non-restraint, non-abandoning, and non-reflection on lust, etc. form what is not discipline.

In terms of Vinaya, completeness of the five factors: candidate (vatthu), boundary hall (sīma), assembly (parisā), announcement (ñatti), and formal text (kamma-vācā) is discipline; incompleteness or defectiveness of these five is not discipline.

By way of the discourses, the four foundations of mindfulness, the four right efforts, the four bases of psychic powers, the five faculties, and the eight constituents of the path, these doctrinal aggregates are what the Buddha teaches; never does the Buddha teach that there are three foundations of mindfulness, three right efforts, three bases of psychic powers, six faculties, six psychic powers, eight factors of Awakening, and nine constituents of the path.

In terms of Vinaya, there are four expulsion (pārājika)<sup>215</sup> rules, thirteen rules needing a meeting of the Saṅgha (Saṅghādisesa),<sup>216</sup> two undeclared (aniyata)<sup>217</sup> rules, 30 forfeiture and confession (nissaggiya-pācittiya)<sup>218</sup>

<sup>215</sup> Expulsion (Pārājika): Any transgressor of these rules is defeated in his purpose in being a monastic. The four offences of this kind are: 1) Indulgence in sexual intercourse; 2) taking with intention to steal what is not given; 3) intentional deprivation of a human life; and 4) making claim to attainments which he does not really possess.

<sup>216</sup> The rules needing a meeting of the Saṅgha (Saṅghādisesa): An offence of this kind entails a formal meeting of the Saṅgha to decide the case, and the action to be taken against the offender of the rule. The first of these offences is intentional emission of semen.

<sup>217</sup> Undeclared (Aniyata): The nature of such offence is to be determined whether it is Expulsion (Pārājika), Requiring a meeting of the Saṅgha (Saṅghādisesa) or a confession (pācittiya) offence, as in the case of a monk who sits in a place secluded, unseen and convenient for an immoral purpose. The other case is when he does so in a rules, etc. These are taught by the Buddha; never does the Buddha teach that there are three expulsion rules, fourteen rules needing a meeting of the Saṅgha, three undeclared rules, 31 forfeiture rules, etc. The set of rules taught implies the set of rules prescribed.

By way of the discourses, everyday absorption in fruition attainment (phala-samāpatti), absorption in attainment of great compassion (mahā-karuṇā-samāpatti), survey of the world of sentient beings through the Buddha-eye (Buddha-cakkhu) consisting in both the knowledge of underlying tendencies (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa) and the knowledge of others' dispositions (indriya-paro-pariyatta-ñāṇa),<sup>219</sup> delivery of relevant discourses and [697] relation of pertinent stories as demanded by the occasion, these doings form the practice of the Buddha. No absorption in fruition attainment, no absorption in attainment of great compassion, etc., do not form a practice of his.

In terms of the Discipline (Vinaya), observance of the Rains Retreat (Vassa) residence in a certain town or a village at the request of the devotees concerned, a journey at the end of the Rains Retreat (Vassa) period after informing the devotees concerned, or after performing the Invitation (Pavāraṇa); greeting visiting monks with the words: “Are you keeping fit, dear friends? Are you faring well?” and so on; doings of these and other things form the practice of the Buddha. Not doing of such things do not form a practice of his.

In certain Vinaya rules, there are such lines as: “He who unknowingly commits an offence is not guilty; he who commits without intent to steal is not guilty; he who commits without intent to cause death is not guilty,” and so on. The set of rules like these is the collocation of non-offences. “He who knowingly commits an offence is guilty; he who commits with place seen and inconvenient for an immoral purpose but convenient for talking immorally to the woman.

<sup>218</sup> Forfeiture and confession (nissaggiya-pācittiya): Offences of this kind involve forfeit and confession, the first of them occurs when a bhikkhu keeps more than permissible number of robes: he has then to surrender the extra ones and confess his offence. See U Ko Lay, Guide to Tipitaka, pp. 11-12, Burma Piṭaka Association Rangoon. 1986.

28: The 10th Rains Retreat (Pāḷileyaka) – 982

intent to steal is guilty; he who commits with intent to cause death is guilty,” and so on. The set of rules like these is the set of offences.

Of the seven kinds of offences: expulsion (pārājika) offences, offences needing a meeting of the Saṅgha (Saṅghādisesa), heavy (thullaccaya) offences, confession (pācittiya) offences, acknowledgement (pāḍidesanīya) offences, wrong-doing (dukkata) offences and wrong speech (dubbhāsī) offences, the latter five are minor and not gross while the former two expulsion and offences needing a meeting of the Saṅgha are major and gross.

Of these seven kinds of offences, the last six are expiable (sāvasesa) offences as the offender’s monkhood still remains. That is to say, if he commits any of the latter six kinds, his state of monkhood is still valid even though he is guilty. The expulsion offence is inexpiable. This is to say, if he violates an expulsion rule he totally loses that validity leaving no traces whatever of monkhood in him.

In this way the nine pairs of Dhamma and what is not Dhamma, etc. should be understood.

Like Ven. Sāriputta, Vens. Mahā Moggallāna, Mahā Kassapa, Mahā Kaccāyana, Mahā Koṭṭhika, Mahā Kappina, Mahā Cunda, Anuruddha, Revata, Upāli, Ānanda and Rāhula, also heard of the coming of the Kosambī monks to Sāvattihī. They approached the Buddha and asked him, as Ven. Sāriputta did. Then also did the Buddha teach them the eighteen ways of righteousness and the eighteen ways of unrighteousness just as he had taught Ven. Sāriputta.

The Buddha’s aunt, Ven. Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī, learnt of the coming of the Kosambī monks and she visited the Buddha. She paid him obeisance, stood at a proper place and put the same question as Ven. Sāriputta. The Buddha then told Ven. Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī thus: “In that case, Gotamī, listen to the sayings of both groups of monks. Having listened, you should prefer the view, wish, liking, and accept the righteous of the two parties. All that is to be expected from the community of monastics by the community of female monastics should be desirable only from the righteous.”

On receiving the news, the wealthy Anāthapiṇḍika, supporter of the Jetavana monastery and Visākhā, the supporter of the Eastern Monastery, also went to the Buddha and reported the matter. To them the Buddha said: “Anāthapiṇḍika and Visākhā, in that case give alms to both parties! Having given alms, listen to the sermons from both! Having listened, you should prefer the view, wish, liking and accept the righteous monks!” [698]

The following, however, is from the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada) commentary:

On hearing the news that the quarrelsome Kosambī monks were coming to the city of Sāvattthī, King Pasenadi Kosala approached the Buddha and said: “Fortunate One, I would not like to grant permission to those Kosambī monks to enter my kingdom.” To this the Buddha replied: “Your majesty, those Kosambī monks are virtuous. It was only on account of a dispute that they took no heed of what I said. Now they are coming to apologize to me. Let them come!” – “Fortunate One, I would not like to let them come into the monastery,” said the king. As the Buddha rejected his desire as before, the king kept quiet.

When the Kosambī monks arrived in Sāvattthī, the Buddha made a special effort to keep the monks quiet and to provide them with accommodation at the outlying parts of the monastery. Not only did the other monks shun their company but all visiting monks of modesty asked the Buddha: “Who are the quarrelsome and contentious Kosambī monastics, Fortunate One?” the Buddha pointed out the monks, saying: “They are these monks!” The virtuous visitors said: “We are told that they are the quarrelsome and contentious Kosambī monks. We are told that they are the Kosambī monks who defy the Buddha’s words!” They pointed their fingers at them, and the Kosambī monks felt so ashamed that they dared not raise their heads but threw themselves at the feet of the Buddha and begged his pardon.

Then the Buddha said: “Monks, you became monastics under an omniscient Buddha, and although I tried to bring about harmony, you disobeyed me which was indeed a grave mistake on your part. A good wise Bodhisatta of ancient times once listened to the advice of his parents, who were about to be killed and following their advice, secured the kingship of two great countries later on, though the parents had been put to death.”

The Buddha then related the Birth Story at Kosambi (Kosambiya-jātaka, Ja 428), the story of Dīghāvu related above in detail. The Buddha added: “In this way, monks, although his parents were killed, the Bodhisatta Prince Dīghāvu gave heed to the advice of his parents and eventually won the daughter of King Brahamadatta and became ruler of the two great kingdoms of Kāsi and Kosala.

28: The 10th Rains Retreat (Pāḷileyyaka) – 984

You, dear sons, however, did not follow my word and committed so great a wrongdoing.” The Buddha then uttered the following verse (Dhp 6):

*Pare ca na vijānanti, mayam-ettha yamāmase,
ye ca tattha vijānanti, tato sammanti medhagā.*

Here in the midst of the crowded assembly of monks, those who are foolish and quarrelsome do not realize that we are drawing near the king of death every minute, as they lack the eye of wisdom. In that very assembly, the wise monks who were brilliant, however, realized that they are approaching death from moment-to-moment. On account of that realization, quarrels and disputes completely cease through right practice.

At the end of the verse, the monks who had assembled there became established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) and higher states. By means of these sermons the Buddha saved and converted humans, Devas and Brahmas in the Pāḷileyyaka forest for the whole period, beginning from the end of the tenth Rains Retreat (Vassa) up to the beginning of the 11th. [699]

29: The 11th Rains Retreat (Kasibhāradvāja)

The Buddha's Daily Activities

After staying at Jetavana monastery in Sāvattthī for as long as there were beings to be converted, the Buddha journeyed again and eventually reached the Brahmin village named Ekanāḷa, in the district of Dakkhiṇāgiri, so named because it lay to the south of the hill that stood near the city of Rājagaha in Magadha country. There he observed the 11th Rains Retreat (Vassa) with the Brahmin village as his resort for alms.

While dwelling in the monastery named Dakkhiṇāgiri, as usual the Buddha did two series of activities: Before the meal, or morning, activities (pure-bhatta-kicca) and after the meal activities (pacchā-bhatta-kicca). Having finished the morning activities, he did the after the meal activities which were of four kinds. At the end of the fourth, he surveyed the world of sentient beings with his Buddha-eye (Buddha-cakkhu) that consists of the knowledge of underlying tendencies (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa) and the knowledge of others' dispositions (indriya-paro-pariyatta-ñāṇa), and saw in his vision Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja who had the potential to become an Arahat because of his past meritorious deeds.

The Buddha came to know this: “On my visit to the Brahmin's lands, my conversation with him will take place. When the conversation is over, the Brahmin, having listened to my discourse, will become an Arahat.”

The Buddha therefore went to the Brahmin's farm, conversed with him and gave him a discourse called the Discourse to Kasibhāradvāja (Kasibhāradvāja-sutta, SN 7.11, Snp 1.4). The discourse in the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta) and its commentary is the basis for the following narration.

With reference to the Buddha's activities, the Collection of the Thematic Discourses (Saṃyutta-nikāya) commentary and others enumerate five series of activities, whereas the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta) commentary combines the latter four, give only two: the morning activities and the after the meal activities. The idea, however, is the same. Hence two series according to the Anthology of Discourses commentary and five series according to the other commentaries, which add the activities in the first watch of the night (purimayāma-kicca), the activities in the middle watch (majjhima-yāma-kicca) and the activities in the last watch (pacchima-yāma-kicca). These five series of activities will be described in serial order so that readers might develop their devotion.

1. The Buddha's morning activities (pure-bhatta-buddha-kicca).

The Buddha rose early in the morning and, in order to honour his attendant monk with merit, as well as to see to his own physical well-being, he cleaned his body by washing his face first and then spent the rest of the time engaged in fruition attainment (phala-samāpatti) in quietude till the time for going on alms round. Then he adjusted his lower garment, girded his waist, put on his robe, took his bowl and entered the village, sometimes alone and at other times in the company of monks. His entry into the village took place sometimes in a natural manner and at other times attended by miracles.

For instance: When he went on alms round, gentle breezes blew, cleaning the ground before him. Clouds repeatedly dropped water, putting the dust to rest along the way, and followed the Buddha like a canopy above him. The winds also blew, bringing the blossoms from all places and scattering them to make a bed of flowers all the way along. The naturally high ground lowered itself and became even. So did the naturally low ground become high and level with other parts of the ground automatically. Stones, pebbles, potsherds, stumps and thorns moved away on their own accord. When the Buddha put down his foot on the ground, the surface became even; or the lotus flowers, which were as big as carriage wheels, and which provided a delightful touch, arose under the feet for ready support. [700]

As soon as the Buddha laid his right foot on the threshold at the entrance of a town or a village, the six-hued radiance streamed out from his body as though they poured liquid of gold on the edifices, including square-roofed and pinnacled houses, or as though they covered them with exquisite drapery. The radiance rushed from place to place making them all luminous with brilliant lights. Horses, elephants, birds and other animals made agreeable sounds while remaining in their respective places. Similarly, drums, harps and other musical instruments produced pleasant music, even without players. Ornaments, such as necklaces, earrings, bangles, arm-bands, etc., which were worn by the people, sounded sweet automatically. From these signs they knew: "Today the Fortunate One comes into our town or village for alms food!"

Well-dressed and well-robed people came out of their houses with scents, flowers and other offerings in their hands. They gathered on the main road in the town-centre and paid respects with their offerings respectfully. They asked for monks, as many as they could afford, to provide meals, saying: “Venerable sirs, give us ten monks,” “Give us 20,” “Give us 100,” and so on. They also took the alms bowl of the Buddha and placed the seats and treated the monks to meals.

After partaking of his food, the Buddha instructed the devotees according to their inclinations so that some might be established in the three refuges, others in the five precepts, others in the monkhood, still others in one of the fruitions of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti), Once-returning (Sakadāgāmī) and Non-returner (Anāgāmī) and the rest became Arahats. In this way, he uplifted the multitudes spiritually by teaching them the Dhamma and finally he returned to the monastery.

On arrival at the monastery, the Fortunate One sat on his Buddha-seat, ready made in the round fragrant pavilion and waited until the monks had eaten their meals. When they had finished eating, the attendant monk would inform the Buddha. Then only did he go into the scented chamber.

All these were the Buddha’s activities in the morning. There were still others done in detail but not described here. These were recorded in the Discourse concerning Brahmāyu (Brahmāyu-sutta, MN 91).

2. The Buddha’s after the meal activities (pacchā-bhatta-buddha-kicca).

After the meal, the Buddha sat on the seat prepared by the attendant monk near the scented chamber, at the meeting place of the monks and washed his feet. Then standing on the washing-board, he exhorted the monks thus: “Monks, work out the completion of the threefold training with diligence. Rare indeed is it to live in the time of the appearance of a Buddha in the world. Rare indeed is it to have human life. Rare indeed is it to have faith. Rare indeed is it to become a monastic. Rare indeed is it to have an opportunity of listening to the Dhamma.”

At such meetings, some monks asked the Buddha about meditation. To them, he instructed on meditation methods according to their inclinations. They then paid respects to him and retired to their respective day-resorts or night-resorts, some going to the forest, some to the foot of a tree, some to certain places up in the hills while others went to the celestial realms of the Catumahārājika, Tāvātimsa, Yāma, Tusita, Nimmānarati or Paranimmitavasavattī Devas.

Thereafter, the Buddha entered the fragrant chamber and lay down on his right side, if he wished for a moment, without abandoning mindfulness. With his body eased, he rose and surveyed the world of sentient beings during the second period of the day. During the third period, however, as he was to live depending upon the village-resort for alms, residents of towns or villages, who had given morning alms, nicely dressed and robed, gathered in the monastery, bearing scents and flowers and other offerings, to listen to the Buddha's discourse in the afternoon. Then the Buddha arrived in a miraculous way agreeable to the audience and sat down on his sacred Buddha-seat, which was prepared in the Dhamma hall where sermons were delivered. Then he gave a talk on the Dhamma which was appropriate to the length of the time available and dismissed the audience when he knew the time was up. The people, having saluted him, then left. [701]

3. The Buddha's activities in the first watch of the night (purima-yāma-buddha-kicca).

Having finished his daytime activities after the meal, the Buddha, if he wanted to bathe, rose from his Buddha-seat and went to the place where the attendant monk had fetched the water for his bath. Taking the bath-robe from his attendant's hand, he entered the bathroom.

While the Buddha was bathing, the attendant monk brought a seat for him and placed it somewhere in the fragrant chamber. Having bathed, he put on the well-dyed and double folded robe, girding his waist, with his upper robe under the right arm and over the left shoulder, he then sat alone in the Buddha-seat, which was prepared in the fragrant chamber for a moment of quiet.

After a while, monks would arrive from their respective day-resorts and night-resorts to wait upon him. At such meetings, some monks presented their problems, some asked about meditation subjects, while others made requests for a discourse. To them all, the Buddha gave his help by fulfilling their wishes and thereby spending the early hours of the night.

4. The Buddha's activities in the middle watch of the night (majjhima-yāma-buddha-kicca).

When the monks departed, after paying their salutations to the Buddha as the Buddha's activities were over, Devas and Brahmas, from all over the 10,000 world-element, took the opportunity of approaching him to ask questions which had arisen in their thoughts. The questions asked were extensive and covered a wide range of topics but the Buddha answered them, leaving none unanswered. Thus, he let the hours around midnight pass.

5. The Buddha's activities in the last watch of the night (pacchima-yāma buddha-kicca).

The last watch of the night near to daybreak was divided into three parts: The first part was used for walking up and down in order to ease the strain due to his sitting posture since dawn; the second part was taken up by his lying down on his right side without losing his mindfulness in the fragrant chamber; and in the third part, he rose from lying, sat cross-legged, surveying the world of sentient beings through his twofold Buddha-eye: The knowledge of underlying tendencies (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa) and the knowledge of others' dispositions (indriya-paro-pariyatta-ñāṇa), to find out individuals, who had in their past lives done meritorious (adhikāra) deeds, such as generosity (dāna), morality (sīla), etc., in the presence of former Buddhas. This is the exposition given in the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya) and the Collection of the Thematic Discourses (Saṃyutta-nikāya) commentaries and other works.

The exposition of the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta) commentary, reads as follows: The morning time was divided into four periods; in the first period the Buddha walked to and fro; in the second period, he lay down on his right side in the fragrant chamber without losing mindfulness, which was noble lying; the third period was spent engaged in the absorptions (jhāna) on fruition attainment (phala-samāpatti). In the fourth period, he was absorbed in the absorption of great compassion (mahā-karuṇā-samāpatti) and he surveyed the world of sentient beings by the aforesaid twofold Buddha-eye so that he could see what beings had less dust on their eyes, what beings had more dust, and so on.

Thus it was customary for the Buddha to carry out diligently the five kinds of activities daily wherever he stayed. In accordance with that practice, when the Buddha was now dwelling, during the 11th Rains Retreat (Vassa), at the Dakkhiṇāgiri monastery, he also performed these duties. One day, when he made a survey of the world of sentient beings through his Buddha-eye, which was one of his activities during the last watch of the night, he saw in his vision, by his omniscience, the Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja who was endowed with great merit (adhikāra) that would contribute to his becoming an Arahat. On [702] further reflection, he foresaw thus: "This Brahmin will today hold the ploughing ceremony. When I get to his ploughing field, my conversation with him will take place. At the end of my conversation, on listening to my discourse, he will don the robe and become an Arahat.” The Buddha then remained at Dakkhiṇāgiri monastery waiting for the moment.

Kasibhāradvāja’s Ploughing Ceremony

That day witnessed the ploughing ceremony of Kasibhāradvāja Brahmin, a native of Ekanāḷa village. The Brahmin was so named because he was a farmer (kasi) of the Bhārādvāja clan.

The Brahmin’s programme for the first day of the ploughing and sowing festival was as follows: 3,000 bulls of draught were kept in readiness; all their horns were dressed beautifully in gold sheaths and so were their hoofs in silver sheaths. All of them were adorned with white flowers and the scented prints of the five fingers. They possessed the mark of the best breed, each with a splendid head and four legs. Some had the dark-brown colour of collyrium stones, some had crystal white colour, some coral red while others were splotchy like the cat’s-eye stone (masāra-galla).

Likewise, 500 farm workers, in white garments and bedecked with fragrant flowers, their right shoulders bearing large floral wreaths, were shining as they were besmeared with orpiment and realgar all over their bodies. When they set forth, they did so in groups, each having ten ploughs. The front of the ploughs, the yokes and the goads were covered with gold plates. Of the 500 ploughs, the very first had eight bullocks harnessed to it; each of the remaining ones had four bullocks. The rest of the bullocks were brought as reserves to replace those which were tired. To each group of ten ploughs was attached a cartload of seeds. The ploughing was done by each farm-worker in turn. In this way the sowing was accomplished.

The landlord, Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja himself, had his beard and moustache groomed early in the morning, he had also bathed, applied paste of great fragrance to his body, put on his garment worth 500 pieces and placed an upper robe worth 1,000 on his left shoulder, each of his fingers had two rings, thus making 20 rings all together, his two ears wore ear-plugs with the design of the lion’s mouth; his head had a turban like that of Brahma, a gold ornament with a pattern of flowers was worn at his neck. Surrounded by a host of Brahmins, he supervised the work.

29: The 11th Rains Retreat (Kasibhāradvāja) – 991

Thereafter the Brahmin's wife had many pots of milk food cooked and brought by carts. She bathed with scented water, fully dressed herself and went to the farm in the company of other Brahmin women.

In the Brahmin's house everything was perfumed. Parched rice was strewn everywhere. Pots filled with water, banana-trees, flags, banners and streamers were used for decoration. And, with scents, flowers, etc., worship was done. In the field, cylinder-shaped and flat flags were hoisted everywhere. Assistants, workers, and those who assembled there numbered 2,500. Everyone was in new clothes and milk rice had been prepared for them.

When everything was ready for the occasion at the farm, the Brahmin had his golden bowl, which was normally used for his own eating, cleansed and filled with milk rice flavoured with butter, honey and molasses. He then had it offered in sacrifice to the god of the plough. The Brahmin's wife had bowls of gold, silver, white copper and red copper distributed among the 500 farm workers, and she herself fed them by pouring the milk rice into their bowls, one after another, with a cup-like ladle. After finishing the offerings to deities, however, wearing his sandals with red straps and holding a red walking-stick of gold, the Brahmin went from place to place to oversee things as required, and to say: "Pour milk-rice into this man's bowl! Put butter into this man's bowl! Ladle out molasses into his bowl!" This was how the ploughing ceremony of the Brahmin landlord Kasibhāradvāja was held.

The Buddha Visits the Ploughing Ceremony

At that time, while staying at the fragrant chamber, the Buddha knew that the [703] milk rice feast was going on and decided that the time has come to exhort the Brahmin. Hence, he adjusted his lower robe, girded his waist, put on his upper robe, took his alms bowl, and went alone to the place where the ploughing ceremony was in progress.

Herein whenever the Buddha wished to collect alms food, the stone alms bowl in blue (inda-nīla) that had been presented by the Four Great Kings appeared automatically in the Buddha's hands; it was not necessary for him to go elsewhere and bring it. As the bee comes to a variety of flowers, so the bowl presented itself to him.

One may ask: "Why did the monks not follow the Buddha?" The answer is: When the Buddha was desirous of going alone, he entered the fragrant chamber at the time of collecting food in the morning and remained there after closing the door. From that hint the monks knew: “Today the master wants to go alone into the town or the village. Surely the master must have seen in his vision somebody to convert.” Knowing thus, they took their respective alms bowls and went on their rounds after circumambulating the fragrant chamber. On that day too the Buddha did this. That was the reason why the monks did not go with the Buddha.

At the time of the Buddha’s visit, the Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja was still presiding at the milk-rice feast for the members of his retinue. The Buddha then reached the site of the feast and stood at a suitable distance.

The Buddha’s going to and standing on the feasting ground was just to grant his blessing to the Brahmin. In fact, he went there not because he wanted to partake of his share like a destitute. To elaborate: The Buddha had relatives numbering 160,000 which comprised 80,000 maternal relatives and 80,000 paternal relatives. These relatives could afford to provide permanent sustenance by their wealth. Indeed the Buddha donned the robe not for food. Truly, he became an ascetic with the determination: “For countless aeons I had given the five great gifts and fulfilled the perfections. Thereafter, having liberated myself from Samsāra, I will liberate beings worthy of liberating, as much as I am liberated. Having tamed myself with the restraint of the six senses, I will tame beings worthy of taming, as much as I am tamed. Having calmed myself with the extinction of all the heat of the moral defilements, I will calm beings worthy of calming, as much as I am calm. Having attained myself the element of peace with regard to the body and defilements, I will teach beings worthy of attaining the element of peace with regard to the body and defilements, as much as I do.”

Therefore, it was because he wanted to liberate these beings as much as he had liberated himself from Samsāra; it was because he wanted to tame those beings as much as he had tamed himself with the restraint of the six senses; it was because he wanted to calm those beings as much as he had calmed himself with the extinction of all the heat of the defilements; it was because he wanted those beings to attain the element of peace with regard to the body and moral defilements that he wandered about the world. In his present wandering, he went and stood there on the ground, where the feast of milk rice was in full swing, in order to show his favour to the Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja.

29: The 11th Rains Retreat (Kasibhāradvāja) – 993

The Buddha, having stood at a place high enough for him to be seen and to be heard by Kasibhāradvāja, emitted his bodily-radiance in a colour like a mixture of gold liquid and yellow orpiment. Far brighter than the light of 1,000 suns and 1,000 moons, the radiance reached up to the distance of 80 cubits. Enveloped on all sides by the Buddha's body light, the walls of the Brahmin's workshop, the trees around and the lumps of turned-over earth and other objects looked like solid gold.

At that time the people who were helping themselves to the milk rice saw the peerless Buddha with the glowing Buddha-splendour. Accordingly, they washed their hands and feet and, with their joined hands raised in adoration, they stood surrounding the Buddha. When the Brahmin saw the Buddha being surrounded by the people, he became unhappy, [704] thinking: "My work has been purposely disrupted!" Noticing the major and minor marks, the Brahmin wrongly remarked: "This monk Gotama, only if he were to work for his material progress he would have achieved something like the ruby hairpin worn on their heads by all the people in the whole of Jambudīpa. He could have accomplished any sort of well-being! Yet, being lazy, he does nothing but eats the food that he gets at ploughing ceremonies and other functions. He goes about giving priority to the maintenance of his physical frame."

Because of his unhappiness and misapprehension, the Brahmin spoke to the Buddha contemptuously as follows: "Monk, I do the ploughing and sowing, by doing so I make a living. Though I possess no marks like yours, my work is not adversely affected. O monk, you too should plough and sow like me, by doing so, live a happy life as I do. To you who are endowed with the signs of greatness, what benefit will fail to accrue?"

The Brahmin had already learnt: "The glorious Prince Siddhattha has come into being at the palace of the Sakyans, in the city of Kapilavatthu! That prince has become an ascetic after renouncing the luxurious life of a Universal Monarch!" He therefore recognized that Prince Siddhattha was this monk. He spoke to the Buddha in the above manner because he meant to censure him, saying: "Having given up the luxuries of a world-king, should you, who have now become a monk, feel weary?" Or, as the Brahmin was of sharp intelligence, he said so not because he wanted to denounce him but because he personally had witnessed the Buddha's attractive frame, and desired to extol his wisdom and lead him into a dialogue.

Then as the Brahmin farmer Kasibhāradvāja was somebody worthy of conversation with, the Buddha wanted to instruct him in accordance with his inclinations. Revealing himself as the top cultivator in the world of sentient beings, with its Devas and Brahmas, in order to give a Dhamma talk the Buddha said: “Brahmin, like you I too plough the field and sow the seeds and live happily thereby.”

Then it occurred to Kasibhāradvāja: “This monk Gotama says: ‘I too plough the field and sow the seeds,’ but I do not see his farming implements such as a yoke, goad, etc. Is he telling me a lie or is he not?” Then the Brahmin looked at the Buddha and examined him from the feet to the top of his hair and saw clearly that he was fully endowed with the marks of a great man. He therefore pondered: “There is no reason for a man endowed with these marks to say what is untrue.” At that moment there arose in him a sense of adoration for the Buddha and he abandoned such a rude mode of address as ‘ascetic,’ and called him by his clan name, and said: “We do not see venerable Gotama’s yoke, plough, ploughshare, goad and bullocks. Even though you asserted: ‘Brahmin, like you I too plough the field and sow the seeds and live happily thereby.’” The Brahmin then asked in verse (Snp 76):

Kassako paṭijānāsi, na ca passāma te kasim, kasim no pucchito brūhi, yathā jānemu te kasim.

Gotama, you declare that you are a farmer. But I do not see your implements, a yoke, plough and others things that are required for farming. As you are now asked, please tell us in such a way that we might know these farming implements of yours, Gotama.

To the question put forth by the Brahmin, the Buddha gave a complete reply in four verses, three containing the answers themselves and the fourth the conclusion. The text of the verses and their translations are as follows (Snp 77-80):

Saddhā bījaṃ tapo vuṭṭhi, paññā me yuga-naṅgalam, hirī ṭsā mano yottam, sati me phāla-pācanam.

“Brahmin Bhāradvāja! My faith is the seed, a faith which is of four kinds: faith inspired by the determination to become a Buddha (āgama); faith inspired by the attainment of path and fruition (adhigama); faith inspired by the understanding of the attributes of the Three Treasures (okappana); and faith inspired by the sight and sound of what is pleasing to the heart

(pasāda).<sup>220</sup> My restraint of the six senses is the rainfall that contributes to the development of the plants. My insight wisdom (vipassanā-paññā) and the fourfold path-wisdom (magga-paññā) are the yoke and the log of the plough. My conscience (hiri) and concern (ottappa) regarding evil deeds are the twin shafts of the plough. My mind generating concentration (samādhi) is the ropes which are of three kinds, one for tying, another for harnessing and a third for linking. My mindfulness (sati) accompanied by insight-wisdom, and that accompanied by path-wisdom are the plough-teeth and the goad.

The Brahmin asked exclusively about the yoke, plough and other implements. But the Buddha answered by adding essential facts omitted in the question. He did so because of the analogy between the two root-causes of faith and seeds. Such a way of teaching is an asset of every Awakened One. The Buddha, desirous of teaching by disclosing that asset, and by supplying the other required factors of the same analogy, said that his faith formed the seeds.

What is meant by the analogy between the two root-causes? Did not the Brahmin ask only with reference to the implements such as a yoke, plough and the like? Then why did the Buddha talk about his faith by comparing it to the seeds and by bringing it into his answer though not mentioned in the Brahmin's question? If an answer contains something not asked about, is it not irrelevant to the questions? Although the Brahmin confined his questions to farm implements, such as the yoke, plough and the like, why did the Buddha touch upon extra things as well in his answers such as faith equalling the seeds and so on? Did not this render his answer irrelevant? Such queries might crop up. The answer is: never did the Buddha speak without relevance. It was customary for the Buddhas to teach by introducing new facts by way of analogy.

Here references should be noted as follows: The Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja asked about farming with reference to the yoke, plough and other implements. But the Buddha, who was thus asked, did not leave out anything at all from his answer saying: "Oh, this was not asked by the Brahmin." Such regard, on the part of the Buddha, indicated the care taken for the Brahmin out of compassion. The Buddha spoke of farming from the very beginning so that the Brahmin might understand the whole business, together with the four points of: 1) Root-cause (mūla); 2) support (upakāra); 3) accumulation (sambhāra); and 4) result (phala) that were excluded from his questions. Though the Brahmin failed to ask fully because his knowledge and wisdom were not deep enough, the Buddha answered all the unasked, but essential points as well in his answer because his compassion was so great.

29: The 11th Rains Retreat (Kasibhāradvāja) – 996

Seeds are the basic requirement for farming. If there are no seeds, there is no farming. The quantity of seeds determines the amount of farm work. There is no farm work done more than what is demanded by the seeds. Hence the seeds are the [706] principal root-cause of farming. On account of this, the Buddha desired to describe the task of farming beginning from that root-cause. Because the seed was the root-cause of the secular farming theme of the Brahmin's question, it was analogous to the root-cause of the spiritual farming of the Buddha, and so he also wished to add the very analogy. Hence he said: "My faith is the seed." As has been said above, the analogy between the root-cause of secular farming, i.e., seeds, and the root-cause of spiritual farming, i.e., faith. Thus the profound significance of this statement should be understood.

Again, it may be argued: "What the Brahmin asked should have been answered first. Why did the Buddha answer at the beginning and not later what was not asked by the Brahmin?"

The answer in brief: 1) Though the seed-like faith should be answered later, the Buddha answered it first because it would benefit the Brahmin much; 2) the rainfall-like sense-restraint and the seed-like faith are related to each other as cause and effect; hence the rainfall-like sense-restraint was spoken of immediately after the seed-like faith, though it should have been done so later on.

To expand on the answer: 1) The Brahmin was intelligent. But as he was born in a family of wrong views, his faith was very weak. One who is strong in intelligence but weak in faith, does not believe others, not even his teachers. He does not practise what should be practised and is likely to fail thereby to attain the extraordinary paths and fruitions.

Kasibhāradvāja's faith, free from mental defilement, was weak because of his birth in a family of wrong views. Therefore his weak faith combined with strong intelligence could not earn him the paths and fruitions. The combination is somewhat like a bullock yoked together with an elephant. It was the faith that would lead the Brahmin to the spiritual attainment.

29: The 11th Rains Retreat (Kasibhāradvāja) – 997

Therefore, in order to establish him in faith which was required, the Buddha, incomparably skilful in teaching, taught faith first though it should come later.

Rainfall is immensely beneficial to the seeds. The relationship between cause and effect could be fully appreciated only if the Buddha spoke of rainfall immediately after his reference to the seeds. Hence his answer concerning rainfall, which should have followed later, was given next to the answer concerning the seed-like faith.

Not only the rainfall, but the Buddha spoke of the shafts of the plough, ropes, etc. at their respective and appropriate places in the sequence. The characteristics and other particulars of faith may be learned from the texts concerned.

The analogy between faith and seeds is this, the natural seeds, the basic cause of the farming of the Brahmin, did two things: shooting roots downwards and developing sprouts upwards. Similarly, the seed-like faith, the basic cause of the spiritual farming by the Buddha, performed two things: shooting the roots of morality (sīla) downwards and developing the sprouts of tranquillity (samatha) and insight (vipassanā) upwards.

Just as the natural seeds absorb the nutritious elements of the soil as well as of the water through the roots and grow to bring maturity to the crop through their stems, even so the seed-like faith absorbs the elements of tranquillity and insight through the roots of morality and grows to bring maturity to the crop of noble fruition (ariya-phala) through the stem of the noble path (ariya-magga).

Just as the natural seeds that lie in fertile soil attain development with their roots, sprouts, stems and ears, producing sap and paddy crop full of grains, even so the seed-like faith that lies in the fertile soil of the mental process attains development with moral purity (sīla-visuddhi), producing the sap of the noble path (ariya-magga) and the crop of the Arahāt fruition full of analytical knowledge (paṭisambhidā) and the super knowledges (abhiññā). Hence the Buddha's saying: "My faith is the seeds."

With reference to the saying: "My restraint of the six senses is the rainfall." Just as the Brahmin's paddy seeds and the paddy-plants that had come out from the [707] seeds always grew abundantly without withering because they received the help of the rainfall, even so the Buddha's morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā), that had their immediate cause in the seed-like faith, constantly develop without weakening.

29: The 11th Rains Retreat (Kasibhāradvāja) – 998

By this saying the Buddha pointed out the profound meaning as follows: “Brahmin, if it rains after you have sown the seeds, that is all right. If not, you have to provide water by yourself. As for me, I attach the yoke and plough of insight wisdom (vipassanā-paññā) and path-wisdom (magga-paññā) to the plough of conscience (hirī) and concern (ottappa) by means of the rope of concentration (samādhi); then harnessing the draught-bullocks of energy (viriya) I prick and drive them with the goad of mindfulness (sati); thus I plough the fertile field of my mental processes and sow the seed-like faith. Never has there been a time when the seed-like faith is deprived of rain water. Rain in the form of restraint of the six senses is always falling on the fertile field of my mental processes.”

With reference to the Buddha’s saying: “My insight wisdom and path-wisdom are the yoke and the plough.” The Brahmin’s yoke and plough are analogous to the Buddha’s insight-wisdom and path-wisdom. The yoke is the support for the plough shafts. It lies before the latter, to which it is connected. It is also something on which the ropes depend. It serves by making the draught-bullocks move together. Likewise, wisdom is the chief support of faultless virtues led by conscience and concern. It is also the head and forerunner of faultless virtues. As it cannot exist without the shaft-like conscience and concern, the latter should be bound up with the yoke of wisdom. As it is something on which the rope of concentration depends, it gives support to the latter. As wisdom checks both excessive and meagre exertions, it serves it by regulating the movement in unison of the draught-bullocks of energy.

When ploughing is done, the log fitted with plough-teeth breaks up the soil. It also destroys big and small roots. Similarly, the Buddha’s log of wisdom fitted with the plough-teeth of mindfulness breaks up the four masses (ghāna): the mass of continuity (santati); the mass of composition (samūha); the mass of function (kicca); and the mass of sense objects (ārammaṇa). It also destroys all the big and small roots of the mental defilements (kilesa). Hence the Buddha’s saying: “My insight-wisdom and path-wisdom are the yoke and the plough.”

With reference to the saying: “My conscience and concern are the twin shafts of the plough.” Conscience and concern are born together and exist together. When conscience is experienced, concern also is then experienced. Hence the translation: “My conscience (hirī) and concern (ottappa) regarding evil are the twin shafts of the plough.”

29: The 11th Rains Retreat (Kasibhāradvāja) – 999

Just as the Brahmin's plough shafts hold on the yoke and the log, even so the Buddha's twin shafts of conscience and concern hold onto the yoke and the log of mundane insight wisdom (lokiya-vipassanā-paññā) and supermundane path wisdom (lokuttara-magga-paññā), as the existence of these two kinds of wisdom depends on conscience and concern regarding evil. The yoke and the log do their respective jobs as has been mentioned before only when they are bound up with the shafts. Only then are they neither shaky nor loose but remain tight and fastened. In the same way, the aforesaid two kinds of wisdom perform their respective duties only when they are bound up with the twin shafts of conscience and concern. Only then are they neither slack nor weak but remain tight and fastened and unmixed with unwholesome things that may arise from lack of conscience (ahirīka) and lack of concern (anottappa). Hence the Buddha's saying: "My conscience and concern of evil deeds are the twin shafts of the ploughs."

With reference to the saying: "My mind is the ropes," the key word "mind" here means "concentration." Hence the translation: "My mind generating concentration is the ropes, which are of three kinds: one for tying, another for harnessing and the third for linking."

There are three kinds of ropes, one for tying, i.e., tying the shafts and yoke; [708] another for harnessing, i.e., harnessing the draught bullocks to the yoke, and the remaining one for linking, i.e., linking the driver with the bullocks. Just as the Brahmin's three ropes kept the shaft, the yoke and the bullocks together and made them accomplish their respective tasks, even so the Buddha's rope of concentration helped him focus the shafts of conscience and concern, the yoke of wisdom and the bullocks of energy on a single sense object and made all these carry out their respective functions. Hence the Buddha's saying: "My mind generating my concentration is the ropes."

With reference to the saying: "My mindfulness accompanied by insight wisdom and that accompanied by path wisdom are the plough-teeth of the plough and the goad." Just as the natural plough-teeth guard and lead the plough pole, even so mindfulness guards wisdom by exploring the perspective of wholesome things and bringing them into focus. In many Pāḷi texts therefore the Buddha teaches mindfulness to be the protector. By never being negligent, the plough-teeth of mindfulness precede the plough-pole of wisdom. Indeed the factors that have been investigated by the preceding mindfulness are penetrated by the following wisdom.

29: The 11th Rains Retreat (Kasibhāradvāja) – 1000

Just as the natural goad, warning the bullocks of the danger of being pricked or beaten, gives them no chance of retreating and stopping, but checks their going astray, even so the goad of mindfulness, warning the bullock-like energy of the danger of falling into suffering states, gives it no chance of idling, retreating and stopping, and checks thereby its mental wandering in undesirable sensual pleasures; fastening it to meditation practice, it also deters the bullock-like energy from following the wrong path. Hence the Buddha's saying: "My mindfulness accompanied by insight-wisdom and that accompanied my path-wisdom are the plough-teeth and the goad."

Kāya-gutto vacī-gutto, āhāre udare yato, saccam karomi niddānam, soraccam me pamocanam.

Brahmin Bhāradvāja! Just as you make your field secure by fences, even so I, the teacher of the three classes of beings, make the field of my mental process secure by the fences of the threefold wholesome physical conduct and fourfold wholesome verbal conduct. By this is taught the moral restraint under the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha-saṁvara-sīla). With regard to the use of the four requisites, I restrain myself well to avoid the 21 unlawful ways of acquisition. By this is taught the moral practice of gaining a pure livelihood (ājīva-pārisuddhi-sīla). With regard to the stomach, I restrain myself well by eating moderately. By this is taught the moral practice of depending on requisites (paccaya-sannissita-sīla), represented by knowledge of moderation concerning food (bhojane mattaññutā). Through the eightfold noble speech (ariya-vohāra) with truthful words, I uproot the weeds of the eightfold ignoble speech (anariya-vohāra), the weeds of falsehood. Being an Arahāt, delighting in the state called Nibbāna, means the outright removal of the plough, the complete giving up of the field and the perpetual retirement belonging to me, the teacher of the three classes of beings.

The meaning here is: "Brahmin, just as you make, after sowing the seeds, a barrier of thorns, a barrier of trees, a barrier of logs or a barrier of bamboos, so that cattle, buffaloes and deer have no access and cannot destroy the crop; even so I, after sowing the seeds of faith, build the three big walls of moral restraint under the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha), the moral practice of living a life of purity and the moral practice of depending on requisites, so that cattle, buffaloes and deer in the form of the defilements, such as passion, hatred, delusion, etc, could have no access and destroy the crop of the various meritorious deeds that I, who am a great farmer, possess. [709]

Paraphrase: Brahmin, just as you, after doing the external (bāhira) work of ploughing, with the hands or with the sickle, pull out and get rid of the weeds, which are damaging to the crop, even so I, after doing the internal (ajjhattika) work of spiritual ploughing, pull out and get rid of the following eightfold ignoble speech, the weeds of falsehood:

1. To say “I see” when not seeing.
2. To say “I hear” when not hearing.
3. To say “I attain” when not attaining.
4. To say “I know” when not knowing.
5. To say “I see not” when seeing.
6. To say “I hear not” when hearing.
7. To say “I do not attain” when attaining.
8. To say “I do not know” when knowing.

On this eightfold ignoble speech, the weeds of falsehood, do I perform the pulling out, cutting off and eradicating with the hands or the sickle of the eightfold noble speech, the truthful words, such as:

1. To say “I see not” when seeing not.
2. To say “I hear not” when hearing not.
3. To say “I do not attain” when not attaining.
4. To say “I do not knownot” when not knowing.
5. To say “I see” when seeing.
6. To say “I hear” when hearing.
7. To say “I attain” when attaining.
8. To say “I know” when knowing.

Brahmin, your removal of the plough, your giving up of the field and your retirement is not forever since you have to do the job of ploughing again in the evening, next week or next year. My removal of the plough, my giving up the field and my retirement is not like yours. Indeed, Brahmin, until I became an Arahat, I knew no such thing as the removal of the plough, the giving up of the field and retirement. I will explain further, Brahmin, since the lifetime of Buddha Dīpaṅkara I have not removed the plough, given up the field and retired until I attained the wisdom of the path to omniscience. For the whole period of four immeasurable periods (asaṅkhyeyya) and 100,000 aeons (kappa), I had to do the internal work of spiritual farming by harnessing the four big bullocks of right exertion to the plough of wisdom.

Brahmin, after restlessly doing the spiritual farming for the aforesaid period of four immeasurables and 100,000 aeons, only when I became an Arahat that is encircled by all the attributes of a Buddha, sitting on the golden throne that is undefeated (aparājita) under the Mahā Bodhi tree, which indeed is peace, the end of all worries, did I take off the bullocks of energy from the plough of wisdom, give up the field of mental processes and retire once and for all by engaging as long as time permitted in the Arahat fruition. Now I have nothing at all to do with the work of farming again.”

Viriyaṃ me dhura-dhorayhaṃ, yogakkhemādhivāhanaṃ, gacchati anivattantaṃ, yattha gantvā na socati.

Brahmin Bhāradvāja! My two kinds of energy (virīya), physical (kāyika) and mental (cetasika), form a pair of draught bullocks that are harnessed to the plough at the front; or, my four kinds of right exertion (sammappadhāna) are the two pairs of draught bullocks. That pair of two bullocks of physical and mental energy of mine or those two [710] pairs of bullocks of right exertion of mine are able to lead me to Nibbāna that is free from the torment caused by the four bonds, the bonds of sensual pleasure (kāma-yoga) and so on. Having gone to Nibbāna where a farmer like me would not grieve at all, to that Nibbāna, free from grief, did I attain without returning through the power of wisdom and knowledge.

Just as the Brahmin's plough-pole drawn by a pair of draught bullocks harnessed at the front crushed earth-masses and destroyed big and small tree roots, even so the Buddha's log of wisdom, drawn forcefully by the twin bullocks of physical and mental energy, crushed the fourfold earth-mass: the mass of continuity (santati), the mass of composition (samūha), the mass of function (kiicca) and the mass of sense objects (ārammaṇa). I also got rid of the big and small tree-roots of mental defilements.

29: The 11th Rains Retreat (Kasibhāradvāja) – 1003

Alternatively, just as there were two pairs of bullocks for the Brahmin's plough, four bullocks in all, one pair attached to the first yoke and the other attached to the next, even so there were at the Buddha's Dhamma-plough the fourfold right exertion corresponding to the Brahmin's two pairs of bullocks; just as the Brahmin's two pairs of bullocks attached to his plough struggle energetically and accomplished two functions: the function of destroying the weeds that had grown, as well as the weeds that would grow, and the function of generating the paddy plants, even so the Buddha's fourfold exertion corresponding to the Brahmin's two pairs of bullocks energetically struggled and accomplished two functions: the function of removing unwholesomeness that had arisen as well as unwholesomeness that would arise, and the function of generating wholesomeness.

Paraphrase: "Brahmin, just as your two pairs of draught bullocks move in the direction of the east, in the direction of the west and so on as you drive them, even so the bullocks – my two pairs of right exertion – move straight to Nibbāna as I drive them in that direction; the difference between your moving and mine is this: when your two pairs of bullocks reach the edge of the field they turn back. But my two pairs of bullocks, my right exertion, have been moving towards Nibbāna without turning away since the lifetime of Buddha Dīpaṅkara.

Your two pairs of bullocks could not manage to reach the place where a farmer like you is free from sorrow. As for my two pairs of bullocks, in the form of right exertion, they have managed to reach the place of Nibbāna free from sorrow of a farmer like me."

Evam-esā kasī kaṭṭhā, sā hoti amatapphalā, etaṃ kasīṃ kasitvāna, sabba-dukkhā pamuccati.

Brahmin Bhāradvāja! I, the teacher of the three classes of beings, have done the Dhamma-ploughing in my person without interruption for four immeasurables and 100,000 aeons. That Dhamma-ploughing of mine bears the fruit of Nibbāna with the rich taste of peace. It bears that tasty fruit of Nibbāna not only for me, but for anyone, be he a human, a Deva or a Brahma when the harnessing of the bullocks of right exertion and the Dhamma-ploughing is done in one's person without interruption one could be free from all suffering and attain Nibbāna.

29: The 11th Rains Retreat (Kasibhāradvāja) – 1004

In this way, the Buddha, in delivering the discourse to Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja, concluded it by fixing it with the pinnacle of the Arahat fruition and leading it up to the height of Nibbāna.

Having listened to this profound teaching, the Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja came to a good understanding: “Despite my eating of the crop obtained from my ploughing, I feel hungry next day as usual. The Dhamma-ploughing of venerable Gotama, however, produces the fruit of deathlessness called Nibbāna. Having partaken of that fruit of deathlessness from the Dhamma-ploughing, one could liberate oneself from suffering once and for all.” [711]

Thus the Brahmin developed devotion, understood clearly and was desirous of doing what every devotee would do: He poured milk rice into the golden bowl, which was meant for his own use and worth 100,000 pieces of money, then he added butter, honey, molasses, etc., to it so that it looked attractive. Finally he covered the golden bowl with a white cloth and took it himself and offered it respectfully to the Buddha with these words: “May venerable Gotama have the milk rice! Venerable Gotama is indeed a ploughman, for he has done the Dhamma-ploughing which produces the crop of Nibbāna!” Then the Buddha delivered these two verses to the Brahmin:

Gāthābhigītāṃ me abhojaneyyaṃ, sampassataṃ brāhmaṇa nesa Dhammo, gāthābhigītāṃ panudanti Buddhā, Dhamme satī brāhmaṇa vutti-r-esā.

Brahmin Bhāradvāja! The food obtained by uttering verses ought not to be enjoyed at all by me. Enjoyment of such food thus obtained is not the custom of Buddhas, those who observe purity in livelihood. Therefore they reject the food obtained by uttering verses. Brahmin Bharadvāja! When one observes purity of livelihood, one seeks the four requisites lawfully without being attached to any family just like stretching one’s hand in space. Such is the way of making a pure living by all the Buddhas.

Herein a question may arise: did the Buddha utter the verses to get the milk rice, for mention is made of the food obtained by uttering verses? The answer is: No, the Buddha did not utter the verses to get the food. In fact, he did not receive even a ladleful of food though he stood near the field since early that morning; yet he uttered the three verses clearly describing how he performed the Dhamma-farming and thereby explaining fully the attributes of a Buddha. And the food thus received happened to be like something acquired by dancers by dancing and singing. Hence the food obtained by uttering verses. Such food is not worthy, nor to be eaten by the Buddhas. Hence it ought not to be enjoyed at all.

The verse contains four lines: The first three lines point out the purity of the discourse by absolving the Buddha from any blame and accusation by the unwise, who would say: “By singing this song the monk Gotama made the unfaithful and displeased Brahmin desire to give, and thereby accepted the food. This discourse of the monk Gotama was intended to attract the material offering of the food.” The fourth line indicates the purity of the Buddha’s livelihood.

When the Buddha uttered this the Brahmin Bhāradvāja became sad, thinking: “Venerable Gotama has rejected my milk rice. He said it was not worth eating. I am so unfortunate! I have been deprived of the opportunity of giving alms.” He thought further: “If venerable Gotama does not accept my milk rice, it were well if he would accept something else from me.” Then it occurred thus to the Buddha, who was aware of this: “After setting aside the hour for alms round I came here with the idea that I would arouse faith in the Brahmin within so limited a time. Now the Brahmin is dejected; should he form a wrong attitude towards me through dejection, he would not be able to attain the penetrative knowledge of supreme Nibbāna.” Being desirous of fulfilling the Brahmin’s wish so that he would cultivate faith in him, the Buddha uttered the following verse:

*Aññena ca kevalinaṃ mahesiṃ, khīṇāsavaṃ kukkucca-vūpasantaṃ,
annena pānena upaṭṭhahassu, khettaṃ hi taṃ puñña-pekkhassa hoti.*

Brahmin Bhāradvāja! With food and drink, other than this, [712] attend upon the Arahāt, who is free from the pollutants (āsava), endowed with all the attributes of a Buddha, the habitual seeker of such virtues as higher morality, whose scruples have been quenched.

Though the Buddha tried to arouse the desire in the Brahmin to give, he said only implicitly. He did not say directly: “Give it to me, bring it to me.” Only a Buddha’s Dispensation, with its eight marvellous characteristics, is the excellent great field of fertile soil for you, who have a bent on deeds of merit.

29: The 11th Rains Retreat (Kasibhāradvāja) – 1006

Then the Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja thought: “I have brought this milk rice for the sake of the Buddha. Therefore I should not give it to somebody else of my own accord,” and asked: “Venerable Gotama, in that case, to whom should I offer this milk rice?”

The Buddha replied:

Brahmin, neither in the world of celestial beings together with its Devas, Māras and Brahmas, nor in the world of human beings with its ascetics, and Brahmins, princes and commoners, do I see anybody, apart from me or my disciples, who can well digest that milk rice when eaten. Therefore, Brahmin, you should dump it in a place without green grass or in the water without insects.

Herein why could nobody among Devas and human beings digest this milk rice? It could not be digested because this coarse human food was mixed with the soft and delicate ambrosia of Devas. When the Brahmin was pouring the food intended for the Buddha, the Devas added ambrosia to it. It could have been digestible if it were only pure ambrosia and eaten by Devas, and so would have been the unmixed milk rice eaten by men.

The milk rice being coarse, even though mixed with the soft ambrosia, Devas could not digest it because they had delicate bodies and the food was indigestible for them. So was it for humans because it contained ambrosia and humans have coarse bodies.

As for the Buddha, he could digest the milk rice mixed with ambrosia by virtue of his natural metabolism. Some teachers attribute this ability to the Buddha’s physical and mental powers. For the Arahats, disciples of the Buddhas too, the food was digestible because of their power of concentration and their knowledge of how to eat it in moderation. This was not possible for others, not even for those with psychic powers. Or, this should not be a matter for speculation, it concerns only Buddhas.

The Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja floated the milk rice in the insect-free water. It at once made a sizzling sound and there arose much vapour from all sides, just as a ploughshare that has been baked the whole day sizzles and produces much vapour all round when it is dumped into water.

Thereupon the Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja became afraid with his hair standing on end, and approached the Fortunate One. Touching the feet of the Fortunate One with his head, he said: “Venerable Gotama! Very delightful indeed is your teaching! Just as an object lying prone is turned upside down; or a covered object is uncovered; or a man who has lost his way is shown the right way; or a torch is lighted in darkness in order that people with eyes may see different objects; so also venerable Gotama has clearly taught the Dhamma to me in many ways. Venerable Gotama! I seek refuge in you, in the Dhamma and in the Saṅgha! Venerable Gotama! Let me be initiated! Let me be ordained under you!”

The Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja became a monk under the Fortunate One and not long after his ordination, Ven. Kasibhāradvāja retired alone to a quiet place. There he practised the Dhamma, exerting his effort vigilantly and vigorously with his mind bent on Nibbāna. Finally, he attained and became an Arahat. [713]

30: The 12th Rains Retreat (Famine)

Having thus spent the 11th Rains Retreat (Vassa) at the Brahmin village of Ekanāḷa, giving discourses such as the Discourse to Kasibhāradvāja (Kasibhāradvāja-sutta, SN 7.11, Snp 1.4) and others to those who were worthy of conversion, the Buddha set out from the village at the end of the Rains Retreat (Vassa), distributing the cool medicinal water of the deathless among Devas and humans, and eventually reached the city of Verañjā. He then took up residence with 500 monks, who were of high, noble birth, in terms of virtue, near the margosa (nimba) tree, which was occupied by a demon, Naḷeru by name, near Verañjā city.

The following is based on the Section about Verañjā (Verañja-kaṇḍa, Vin Pār 1, PTS 3.1) and its commentary.

The Brahmin Verañja's Visit to the Buddha

Then the Brahmin Verañja heard the good news as follows: “Friends, the monk Gotama, the Sakyan Prince who has become an ascetic, is staying together with 500 highly virtuous monks near the margosa tree which is occupied by the demon Naḷeru near our city of Veranjā.

The good reputation of Ven. Gotama goes up to the top of the universe (Bhavagga), spreading all over thus: “That Buddha is called an Arahat because he is worthy of special honour; he is called Perfectly Self-Awakened One because he understands all phenomena perfectly by himself; he is called endowed with understanding and good conduct (vijjā-caraṇa-sampaññā), because of his wisdom and practice; he is called Well-gone (Sugato) because he speaks good words; he is called the one who understands the worlds (loka-vidū) because he knows the three worlds analytically; he is called the unsurpassed guide for those people who need taming (anuttaro purisa-dammasārathi) because of his power in training people; he is called the Teacher of gods and men (Satthā-deva-manussānam) because these beings are taught by him; he is called Awakened (Buddha) because he realizes the four truths by himself and let others realize them; he is called Fortunate One (Bhagavā) because he is endowed with the sixfold glory.

That Fortunate One comprehends the world of space (okāsa-loka) with its Devas, Māras and Brahmas, as well as the world of sentient beings (satta-loka) with its ascetics and Brahmins, princes and commoners, through his wisdom, and teaches them.

The Fortunate One proclaims the Dhamma that is good in all its three phases: the beginning, the middle and the end, and that is also complete with the letter and the spirit, meaning that nothing new is to be added. He taught the noble practice that is perfect and pure all round, meaning that there is no flaw to be taken out. The sight of such a sage, an Arahāt, is indeed wonderful.” This is what the Brahmin heard.

Thus the Brahmin Verañja visited the Buddha and exchanged words of joy with him. Having thus exchanged words of joy and words worthy of remembrance, the Brahmin took his seat, which was free from the sixfold faults; thereafter, he began to censure the Buddha: “Venerable Gotama, I have heard that the monk Gotama neither bows down, nor gives a welcome, nor extends an invitation to seats to old, aged, mature Brahmins of previous generations who are nearing the end of their lives. Venerable Gotama, what I have heard happens to be true. Indeed you, venerable Gotama, neither bow down, nor give a welcome, nor extend an invitation to seats to old, aged, mature Brahmins of previous generations who are nearing the end of their lives. Venerable Gotama, doing no reverential act, such as bowing, etc., is indeed outright unfair.” [714]

Being untainted with the two defects of exalting oneself (attukkaṃsana) and humiliating others (paravambhana) but with his calm heart sprinkled with the clear water of great compassion (mahā-karuṇā), and desiring to dispel the Brahmin’s ignorance and to point out the fairness on his part, the Buddha said: “Brahmin, in the world of space with its Devas, Māras and Brahmas and in the world of beings with its monks and Brahmins, princes and commoners, I see nobody to whom I should pay respect, welcome, or give an invitation to seats. Should I even casually pay respect, give a welcome or extend an invitation to seats to somebody, then his head will break into seven and fall to the ground.”

Despite such a reply by the Buddha, Verāñja, being unwise, did not grasp that the Buddha was the greatest in the world; instead he became irritated at the words rightly uttered by the Buddha, so he accused: “Venerable Gotama is a man of tasteless nature!” In order to soften the Brahmin’s heart, the Buddha did not give a directly opposite answer and, in order to show that there was reason for him to be called in a way: “A man of tasteless nature,” he said: “Brahmin, there is reason for saying of me, ‘The monk Gotama is a man of tasteless nature.’”

30: The 12th Rains Retreat (Famine) – 1010

The reason is this: Brahmin, pleasure in forms, pleasure in sounds, pleasure in odours, pleasure in tastes, and pleasure in touch – all these pleasures I have rejected. For this reason, let one speak of me, if one so desires: ‘The monk Gotama is a man of tasteless nature.’ But we Buddhas absolutely do not have the taste meant by you.”

Herein what the Brahmin meant was: “Bowling, welcoming, raising folded palms and paying respect in the world are styled the taste that creates harmony between people (sāmaggi-rasa). That taste of harmony (sāmaggi-rasa) was totally absent in venerable Gotama. That was why he accused the Buddha saying: “Venerable Gotama is a man of tasteless nature,” meaning he is entirely devoid of the taste of harmony.

On the other hand, the Buddha meant that pleasure in forms, pleasure in sounds, pleasure in odours, pleasure in tastes, pleasure in touches, each of these five can be called the taste of harmony, for each comes into being only when such factors as object, sense, etc., combine harmoniously. As all this taste of harmony had been uprooted by him, he was free from all these five kinds of taste of harmony. With that meaning in mind, one might label him a tasteless man if one so desires, so he declared: “We Buddhas do not absolutely have the taste meant by you.”

In this connection, why did the Buddha assert: “We Buddhas do not absolutely have the taste meant by you?” Did this not amount to acknowledging the supposition that Buddhas should observe the taste of harmony, such as bowing, welcoming, etc., as meant by the Brahmin? Such a question may arise. The answer is that it did not. He who should, but did not, observe the taste of harmony by bowing, welcoming, etc., meant by the Brahmin, deserved the label: “A man without good taste,” for he showed no taste of harmony though he was required to do so. As for the Buddha, he had nothing whatsoever to do with the taste of harmony meant by the Brahmin for he was the greatest in the three worlds. Therefore, in order to point out the fact clearly that he was above such an observance, the Buddha declared: “We do not absolutely have the taste meant by you.”

Being unable to put the blame on the Buddha thus for his lack of the taste of harmony (sāmaggi-rasa) demanded by him, the Brahmin willingly brought another accusation:

“Venerable Gotama is a useless person!” [715] In order to show that there was a different reason for him to be called such, the Buddha said: “Brahmin! There is reason for speaking of me: ‘The monk Gotama is useless.’ The reason is this:

30: The 12th Rains Retreat (Famine) – 1011

Brahmin, use of forms, use of sounds, use of odours, use of tastes and use of touches, with lust and greed, all these uses I have rejected. Brahmin, for this reason, there is an absence of this sort of usage (paribhoga), use of the five sense objects with lust and greed, and so let one speak of me, if one so desires: ‘The monk Gotama is a useless person.’ But we Buddhas absolutely do not have the uses meant by you.”

Herein what the Brahmin meant was: Bowing and other acts of respect shown to one’s elders are recognized in the world as used for harmony (sāmaggi-paribhoga); as there was no making of such use on the part of the Buddha, he was accused, saying: “The monk Gotama is a useless man.”

According to the Buddha, he had done away with the use of the five sense objects: forms, sounds, odours, tastes and touches with lust and greed. As such, he was thus free from such enjoyment. With that meaning in mind he approved that one might speak of him as useless.

Being also unable to put the blame on the Buddha thus, the Brahmin willingly brought another accusation: “Venerable Gotama is a believer in non-action!” In order to show, as before, that there was a different reason for him to be called such, the Buddha said: “Brahmin! There is a reason for speaking of me thus: ‘The monk Gotama is a believer in non-action!’ The reason is this: Brahmin, I declare that the three physical wrong-doings, the four verbal wrong-doings, the three mental wrong-doings, and all the remaining unwholesome deeds should not be done. For this reason, let one speak of me, if one so desires: ‘The monk Gotama is a believer in non-action.’ But we Buddhas absolutely do not have the non-actions meant by you.”

Herein what the Brahmin meant was: All the people in the world have the practise of clansmen (kula-cāritta), such as bowing before one’s elders and so on. As the Buddha did not practise that he was labelled: “A believer in non-action.”

The Buddha, however, meant that he taught that wrong deeds should not be committed, which might be taken as non-action (akiriya-vāda). He approved therefore that, with that meaning in mind, one might speak of him as: “A believer in non-action.”

Being also unable to blame the Buddha thus, the Brahmin willingly brought another accusation: “Venerable Gotama is a believer in annihilationism!” In order to soften the Brahmin’s heart, the Buddha desired, as in the previous explanations, to show that there was a reason for him to be called such, and said:

30: The 12th Rains Retreat (Famine) – 1012

“Brahmin, there is reason for speaking of me thus: ‘The monk Gotama is a believer in annihilationism.’ The reason is this: Brahmin, I give instructions to annihilate passion (rāga), to annihilate hatred (dosa), to annihilate delusion (moha) and also to annihilate other wrong deeds. Brahmin, for this reason, one may speak of me, if one so desires thus: ‘The monk Gotama is a believer in annihilationism.’ But we Buddhas absolutely do not have the annihilationism meant by you.”

Herein as the Brahmin did not see the Buddha’s act of respect, such as bowing, welcoming, etc., shown to old people, he thought: “The worldly tradition of paying respect has [716] been destroyed on account of the monk Gotama,” and labelled him: “An annihilationist.”

The Buddha, however, taught people to do away with greed, hatred and delusion and other evil deeds by means of their respective kinds of path-knowledge. He approved, therefore, that, with that meaning in mind, one might speak of him as: “An annihilationist.”

Being also unable to put the blame on the Buddha thus, the Brahmin willingly brought another accusation: “Venerable Gotama is a man having the nature of loathing!” In order to show, as before, that there was a different reason for him to be called as such, the Buddha said: “Brahmin, there is a reason for speaking of me thus: ‘The monk Gotama is a man having the nature of loathing.’ The reason is this: Brahmin, I loathe three physical wrong-doings, the four verbal wrong-doings, the three mental wrong-doings and other wrong deeds. Brahmin, for this reason, one may speak of me if one so desired thus: ‘The monk Gotama is a man having the nature of loathing.’ But we Buddhas absolutely do not have the loathing meant by you.”

Herein the Brahmin thought that the Buddha did not follow the practice of clansmen (kula-cāritta), such as bowing before one’s elders and so on, only because he loathed them. Therefore, the Brahmin labelled him: “A man having the nature of loathing.”

The Buddha, however, meant that he loathed wrong deeds and approved therefore that, with that meaning in mind, one might speak of him as: “A man having the nature of loathing.”

Being also unable to put the blame on the Buddha thus, the Brahmin willingly brought another accusation: “Venerable Gotama is a destroyer!” In order to show, as before, that there was a different reason for him to be called such, the

Buddha said: “Brahmin, there is reason for speaking of me thus: ‘The monk Gotama is a destroyer.’ The reason is this: Brahmin, I give instructions to destroy passion, to destroy hatred, to destroy delusion and also to destroy other evil deeds. Brahmin, for this reason, let one speak of me, if one so desires thus: ‘The monk Gotama is a destroyer.’ But we Buddhas absolutely do not have the kind of reason meant by you.”

Herein as the Brahmin did not see the Buddha’s act of respect, such as bowing, welcoming, etc., shown to old people, he thought the Buddha was a destroyer of the great practice of paying respect to an elder (vuddha-pacāyana), and labelled him: “A destroyer.”

The Buddha, however, taught people to remove and eliminate passion, hatred, delusion and the remaining wrong deeds. He approved therefore that, with that meaning in mind, one might speak of him as: “A destroyer.”

Being also unable to put the blame on the Buddha thus, the Brahmin willingly brought another accusation: “Venerable Gotama is a tormentor!” In order to show, as before, that there was a different reason for him to be called as such, the Buddha said: “Brahmin, there is reason for speaking of me thus: ‘The monk Gotama is a tormentor.’ The reason is this: Brahmin, I [717] proclaim that the three physical evils, the four verbal evils, the three mental evils and all the remaining unwholesome deeds are tormenting things (tāpanīya-dhamma), things causing sorrow to all humans and other beings. Brahmin, I declare that one, who has eliminated these wrong-doings, is a tormentor of tormenting factors. Brahmin I, who am a good wayfarer like former Buddhas, have eliminated these evil deeds. Brahmin, for this reason, let one speak of me, if one so desires thus: ‘The monk Gotama is a tormentor.’ But we Buddhas absolutely do not have the tormenting meant by you.”

Herein what the Brahmin meant was this: Those who perform an act of respect, such as bowing, welcoming, etc., delight old people. Those who did not torment the hearts of the latter. The Buddha did not perform that. Therefore the Brahmin thought the monk Gotama was a tormentor of the aged and labelled him as such.

The Buddha, however, called evil deeds tormenting factors (tapa-dhamma), because they tend to torment the world of beings. The elimination of these evil deeds had been done on his part. “He who has done away with evil deeds is a tormentor (tapassī),” so goes the definition (tape assī ti tapassī).

He therefore approved the label given to him as: “An eliminator of tormentors,” or rather, “a tormentor of all evils’ known as torments (tapa).”

Being also unable to put the blame on the Buddha thus, the Brahmin willingly brought the last accusation: “Venerable Gotama is a man far from rebirth in the Deva realm!” As the Buddha had got rid of all four forms of future rebirth, he desired to show, in a different manner, that he was free of rebirth (apagabbha), and said: “Brahmin, there is a reason for speaking of me thus: ‘The monk Gotama is far from rebirth.’ The reason is: Brahmin. I proclaim that an Arahant who has rejected the four ways of birth that would take place in the future is far from rebirth (apagabbha), one beyond rebirth. Brahmin I, who am a good wayfarer like former Buddhas, have utterly destroyed all these four ways of rebirth. Brahmin, for this reason, one may speak of me, if one so desires thus: ‘The monk Gotama is far from rebirth (apagabbha), a man beyond rebirth.’ But we Buddhas absolutely do not have the rebirth meant by you.”

Herein, what the Brahmin meant was this: Paying respect to one’s elder, such as bowing, welcoming, etc., was a meritorious act that was conducive to rebirth in the divine abode. Believing thus, he labelled the Buddha: “A man far from rebirth in the Deva realm!” for he saw him doing none of those respectful gestures. Therefore, the Buddha had no chance to attain the celestial realm; instead he would abide in the womb of a mother in the human world in the future, which was disgusting.

The Buddha, however, meant that he had no future birth whatsoever. He therefore approved the label given to him: “A man far away from rebirth.”

Though the Brahmin Verañja had thus condemned the Buddha with these eight accusations, such as saying he is: “A man of tasteless nature,” and so on, but from the outset of his meeting him, the Buddha set both his eyes on him with tranquillity, out of compassion. Just as the round full moon rises in the cloudless sky, just as the sun shines high in autumn, even so the Buddha, being omniscient, became desirous of dispelling the darkness of ignorance that lay in the Brahmin’s heart. Thus, he had turned those charges made by the Brahmin into words of honour to him.

Now, the Buddha was to show the magnificence of his compassion and the earth-like mind that was unshaken by the eight conditions of the world and the calm heart, undisturbed however much others would abuse him, he reflected: “This Brahmin thoughtlessly believes that he is senior to me, the Buddha, only on account of the conventional marks of his old age, such as grey hair, [718] broken teeth, wrinkles of the skin, and the like. He knows not even a bit that he is being followed closely by the danger of rebirth, besieged by the danger of old age, overwhelmed by the danger of ill-health, threatened by the danger of death; nor does he realize that as a stump in Saṃsāra he could die today and would become a messenger of the King of Death, lying on its back, tomorrow. However, he came to me with great effort. Let his visit to me be a beneficial one.”

In order to make clear that he was peerless, eldest, and foremost among beings, the Buddha elaborately delivered his discourse in the following manner: “Brahmin, suppose a hen has eight eggs, or ten, or twelve. Suppose the hen does her three jobs: She sits well on the eggs, provides them with heat, and imbues them well with her odour. Of all the chicks that lie in the eggs so treated one comes out first with ease after breaking the shell with its claws and beak. Would you call it senior or junior?” asked the Buddha. “Venerable Gotama, it should be called senior. Of all the chicks, the little one that has come out first after breaking the shell is the oldest, as its making of appearance is the earliest,” answered the Brahmin.

Then the Buddha said: “Brahmin, in the same way, of all beings lying in the shell of ignorance (avijjā) and being wrapped up all round by the shell of ignorance, I am the first to have realized the unmatched, supreme path-knowledge of an Arahat with omniscience after breaking through the shell of ignorance. Brahmin, I therefore am the oldest of all those existing in the world of sentient beings.”

Herein an explanation of the simile may be made as follows. Now with reference to the part of the simile (upamāna), the second part of the comparison, which is the little chicks: the eggs do not rot because the mother-hen looks after them in three ways: by sitting on them, by providing heat to them and by imbuing them with her odour. The wet outer membranes then dry up. The egg-shells also become thinner and thinner day by day. The claws and the beak of the chicks grow bigger and harder. The little birds get stronger. Since the shells become thinner and thinner as days go by, the light outside the shells penetrates them. Then the chicks think: “For a long time we have stayed in the confinement with our legs and wings cramped. The light appears outside. We shall live outside comfortably where the light is.” Desirous of coming outside, they kick the shells with their legs. They also forcefully stretch out their necks. Therefore the eggs are broken. The chicks then emerge from the shells, flapping their small wings and chirping for the moment. Of all these chicks, the one which comes out first should be named as the senior-most.

30: The 12th Rains Retreat (Famine) – 1016

With reference to what it is likened to (upameyya), the first member of the comparison which is the Buddha: The three forms of the hen's treatment: Sitting, heating and imbuing with her odour, may be likened to the Buddha's three acts of contemplation (anupassanā) on impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and non-self (anatta) under the Mahā Bodhi tree while still a Bodhisatta. The egg's being unrotten due to the hen's threefold treatment may be likened to the non-shrinkage of the Bodhisatta's insight knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa) due to his threefold contemplation. The drying up of the wet outer membrane of the egg due to the hen's threefold treatment may be likened to the cessation of the Bodhisatta's craving (nikanta-taṇhā) for the three existences due to his threefold contemplation. The shell's gradual thinning day after day due to the hen's threefold treatment may be likened to the thinning of the shell of ignorance step by step on the part of the Bodhisatta due to his threefold contemplation. The growing bigger and harder of the claws and the beaks of the chicks due to the hen's threefold treatment may be likened to the growing sharper, firmer, clearer and more confident of the Bodhisatta's insight-wisdom due to his threefold contemplation. The time of the growth of the chick's claws and beak due to the hen's threefold treatment may be likened to the time of maturity, the time of development and the time of perfection of the Bodhisatta's insight knowledge which was due to his threefold contemplation. The moment of the happy emergence of [719] the chick, flapping its small wings after kicking the shell with its legs and striking the shell with its beak and thus breaking open the shell which was due to the hen's threefold treatment may be likened to the moment of the Bodhisatta's realization of the attributes of a Buddha with ease, after attaining the insight knowledge and breaking open the shell of ignorance by means of the path of an Arahat which was won eventually and flapping the wings of psychic powers, all this being due to his threefold contemplation.

Therefore, in order to continue to show that by this practical means, he had attained the stage of incomparable supremacy, the Buddha elaborately related how he endeavoured in meditation through the fourfold diligence at the Mahā Bodhi tree; how he gained, as a result, mundane (lokiya) absorptions (jhānas) how he acquired the super knowledges (abhiññā) such as remembrance of his former existences (pubbe-nivāsa-ñāṇa) as a result of meditation based on the mundane absorptions (jhāna) in the first watch of the night of the full moon of May (Vesākha), in the year 528 BCE, and was born first by noble birth (ariya-jāti), later, with the beak-like super knowledges breaking open the shell of ignorance that had concealed the series of his past bodies, how he had acquired the psychic power of the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu) in the middle watch of that night and was born for a second time, by noble birth after with the beak-like super knowledges, breaking open the shell of the ignorance that had concealed his rebirths after death (cuti-paṭisandhi); how he had acquired the path-knowledge to become an Arahāt, which was the third enlightening knowledge named destruction of the pollutants (āsavakkhaya) in the last watch of the same night and was born for a third time, by noble birth after the beak-like super knowledges broke open the shell of ignorance that had concealed the four noble truths.

In this way, when the Buddha, out of great compassion for the Brahmin Verañja, had thus related his being great by noble birth through the discourse, clearly describing the threefold knowledge, the Brahmin became rapturous both physically and mentally, and came to know the greatness of the Buddha and reproached himself: “I have wrongly accused the omniscient Buddha, who is supreme among the three worlds of individuals and endowed with all virtues, by saying that: He has failed to show respect to old people! Ignorance, friends, is disgusting indeed!”

Being convinced that: “This Gotama is the foremost, for he was born first by noble birth in the world; unique in all virtues, he is also the best,” the Brahmin supplicated the Buddha as follows: “The greatest in the world indeed is venerable Gotama! The best in the world indeed is venerable Gotama! It is very delightful indeed, Venerable Gotama! It is very delightful indeed, Venerable Gotama! To use a worldly simile, just as what was turned upside down has been turned upside up; just as what was covered has been uncovered; just as one following the wrong path has been told the right path; just as a torch has been lighted in the dark so that those who have eyes will see a variety of things; even so venerable Gotama has taught me the Dhamma in many ways. I approach Venerable Gotama, and recognize venerable Gotama, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha, as my shield, shelter and refuge. From today onwards, Venerable Gotama, kindly accept me as a lay devotee (upāsaka) established in the threefold refuge for life!”

Having taken refuge, the Brahmin begged him, saying: “May venerable Gotama observe the Rains Retreat (Vassa) together with the community of monks in Verañjā, as an act of kindness done to me!” Keeping silent the Buddha agreed to do as requested by the Brahmin. Clever in behavioural studies, the Brahmin reflected: “If venerable Gotama does not accept my word, he should have rejected it by deed or by word, now that he assumes no appearance of refusal, but of consent, he must have accepted it in his heart.” Having known the Buddha’s acceptance, he stood up from his seat and paid respects to him from the four quarters and encircled him three times, keeping him at his right. Though he had accused [720] the Buddha, since his arrival, for showing no signs of reverence to elders, he was not content at all in repeatedly doing homage to him in all three manners – physically, verbally and mentally – now that he had analytically understood his virtues. Placing his folded hands on his head and facing in the direction of the Buddha as far as he could see, he withdrew, walking backward. It was only at the point where he lost sight of the Buddha that he finally made obeisance to his heart’s content and departed. At the request of the Brahmin Verañja, the Buddha observed the twelfth Rains Retreat (Vassa) in the city of Verañjā with his 500 monks.

Famine in Verañjā City

At that time Verañjā was short of food. It was hard to make a living there. There were white bones all over the city. People had to draw lots for food rations. Therefore it was not easy for the monks to get enough food by going round with an alms bowl in their hands. The horse-merchants of the northern region (Uttarā-patha) were then staying with 500 horses in Verañjā to take shelter from showers of rain during the rainy season. At the horse-yards the merchants made a regular donation of one measure (pattha) of barley to each monk. When the monks entered the city in the morning for alms food and did not get any, they went to the horse-yards and each received one measure of barley which they brought to the monastery and pounded it in small mortars and ate it.

Travelling was impossible on account of heavy rains during the four months of the rainy season in Verañjā. Hence the horse-merchants stayed there to take shelter from the rains. They had lodges and stables built, and enclosures made on unflooded grounds outside the city for such a stay. These sites of the horse-merchants were known as horse-yards.

They brought the barley which they had steamed to make it last long and free from worm-holes and which they had husked so that they might use it as horse-food where grass and such fodder were not available. These merchants of the Uttarāpatha were not faithless like the people of the

Dakkhiṇāpatha. They had faith and cherished the Three Treasures. One morning, when they went into the city on business, they found the monks in groups of seven or eight going about for alms but getting nothing. And so, they discussed among themselves: “These good monks are observing the Rains Retreat (Vassa) depending on this Verañjā city. But there is famine here. Not getting a bit of food, they are immensely troubled. Since we are visitors, we are not capable of providing them with rice gruel and food daily, but our horses get food twice a day, once at night and once in daytime. It will be good to take one measure of barley out of the morning fodder of each horse and give it to each monk. If we do so the good monks will not be hard pressed; and the horses will still have enough food.” They then went to the monks and informed them of their decision, they also requested them, saying: “Venerable sirs, please accept one measure of barley and make it into food in a befitting way and eat it.” Hence they made a regular offering of one measure of barley to each monk every day.

When the monks entered Verañjā in the morning for alms food and went round the whole city, they did not get even a word of excuse, let alone food. When they reached the horse-yards outside the city, each of them was given one measure of barley and brought it to the monastery. Since there were no lay attendants to make gruel or food for them and as it was not proper to do the cooking by themselves, they formed groups of eight or ten and pounded the barley in small mortars. Each consumed his share after adding water to it, for they thought: “In this way we shall have a light livelihood (sallahuka-vutti) and be free from the wrongdoing of cooking by oneself (sāmapāka-dukkata-āpatti). After having eaten, they engaged in ascetic practices without worry.

For the Buddha, however, the horse-merchants donated one measure of barley and the proportionate amount of butter, honey and molasses. Ven. Ānanda brought the offerings and ground the barley on a stone slab. Anything prepared by a man of merit and intelligence is naturally delightful. Having ground the barley, he mixed it with butter and so on [721] and offered it to the Buddha. Then Devas put ambrosia into the ground barley. That same ground barley the Buddha partook of and spent the time engaged in fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti). Since the arrival of the famine, the Buddha had not moved about for alms.

Herein it may be asked whether Ven. Ānanda was an attendant (upatthaka) to the Buddha during the Rains Retreat (Vassa) period in Verañjā. Answer: he was, but he did not hold the post permanently yet. Explanation: During the first period after Awakening, the first 20 years of his ministry, the Buddha had no permanent personal attendant. Sometimes he was served by Ven. Nāgasamāla, sometimes by Ven. Nāgita, sometimes by Ven. Meghiya, sometimes by Ven. Upavana, sometimes by Ven. Sāgata, sometimes by Ven. Sunakkhatta, who was a Licchavī Prince before his ordination. These monks waited upon the Buddha of their own accord and left him when they so desired.

When the aforesaid monks were serving, Ven. Ānanda remained unconcerned, and he personally performed all his duties big and small on their departure. The Buddha also accepted him, for he thought: “This worthy relative of mine, Ānanda, is the best to serve me in all these matters of such a nature, though he has not secured the post of my personal attendant.” Hence Ven. Ānanda’s preparation and offering of the barley mixed with butter, honey and molasses as there were no other attendants in Verañjā during this Rains Retreat, and the Buddha’s engagement in fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti) took place after partaking of the food. In this connection, the following questions and answers should particularly be noted:

Question: Is it true that people normally tend to struggle much to do deeds of merit at a time when food is scarce? Is it true that they think they themselves should not enjoy things but give them to monks in generosity? Why then did none of these people offer even a ladleful of food while the Buddha was keeping Rains Retreat (Vassa) in Verañjā? Why was the Brahmin Verañja not mindful of the Buddha’s presence though he had very earnestly requested the Buddha to spend the rainy season there?

Answer: The negligence on the part of the Brahmin and the people was due to Māra’s magical control and deception of them. Explanation: Māra possessed the Brahmin as soon as he left the Buddha. He also did the same thing to the citizens of Verañjā and the people in the environs of the city, the environs covering a distance of one league, within which, the monks on their morning alms round could move about, going and coming. Māra confused all these people and made them forget about the Buddha and the community of monks and went away. Nobody, therefore remembered even to show respect to the Buddha.

Question: Did the Buddha keep the Rains Retreat (Vassa) without anticipating Māra’s magical control?

Answer: No, not without anticipating, he kept it even though he foresaw Māra’s act of magic.

30: The 12th Rains Retreat (Famine) – 1021

Question: Despite his knowledge in anticipation, why did the Buddha keep the Rains Retreat (Vassa) only in Verañjā, but not in Campā, Sāvattihī, Rājagaha, or in any other city?

Answer: In that very year, in that very period, even if the Buddha stayed in the northern continent of Uttarakuru or in the Tāvatisa abode of Devas, the possession by Māra would take place all the same, let alone in Campā, Sāvattihī, Rājagaha or anywhere else. In that year Māra was overwhelmed with malice, ill-will and hatred against the Buddha. In the city of Verañjā, however, it was also foreseen by the Buddha that the horse-merchants would come to the monks' honour and relief. Hence he observed his Rains Retreat only in Verañjā.

Question: Was Māra not able to control the horse-merchants magically?

Answers: Yes, Māra was able to do so. But it was only after his attempt to control and deceive the citizens by magic that they arrived in Verañjā.

Question: Though they arrived only after Māra's attempt, why did he not come [722] back and exercise his magical influence on the merchants?

Answer: He did not because he was powerless to do so. Explanation: By no means can Māra do harm to three things meant for the Buddha: 1) The meal cooked and brought as an offering; 2) the offering of food decided to be a constant duty by those who think: We shall give the Buddha throughout such and such period; and 3) an object brought to the monastery and offered by word of mouth saying: "This is for the Buddha's use as part of the four requisites."

Further explanation: The following are the four things that nobody can do harm to: 1) The food that is brought and about to be offered and the four requisites intended to be a permanent offering which are deposited for the Buddha; 2) the life of the Buddha that usually is four-fifths of the human lifespan of the period in which he appears. That is to say that no one could disrupt the life of our Buddha Gotama before he was 80 years old which was four-fifths of 100, the normal lifespan of people in his day; 3) the Buddha's major and minor marks and his bodily-radiance; in fact, the radiance of the moon, the sun, Devas or Brahmas disappears on coming to the place where the Buddha's marks and radiance shine; and 4) the Buddha's omniscience. Therefore it may be taken that the barley to which harm could not be done by Māra was consumed by the Buddha and his 500 monk disciples.

30: The 12th Rains Retreat (Famine) – 1022

The Buddha's past deed (kamma) which caused him to meet with such famine along with his 500 monks in Verañjā was this: Ninety-two aeons (kappa) ago, during the Dispensation of the Buddha Phussa, the Bodhisatta became a man of bad character on account of his association with wicked friends. He then wrongfully uttered to Buddha Phussa's disciples such unwholesome words as: "You had better bite coarse barley food and eat it but do not eat any good rice (sāli)!" That evil past deed (kamma) was the reason for his encounter with famine as he was keeping the Rains Retreat (Vassa) in Verañjā (see Ap. 39.10).

Buddhas ask even though they know. They know and they do not ask, for there is nothing that they do not know. They know the opportune time and they ask. They know the opportune time and they do not ask. They ask what is connected with benefit; they do not ask what is not connected with benefit. What is not connected with benefit, they do away with through path-knowledge. They ask monks for two reasons, either to give a discourse or to lay down a rule for disciples.

The Buddha then asked Ven. Ānanda: "What, dear son Ānanda, does the sound from the small mortars mean?" Ven. Ānanda replied, stating what has been told above. At that moment the Buddha uttered: "Excellent, Ānanda excellent! You, Ānanda, who are of good moral character, have overcome rice cooked with meat by not yielding to scarcity of food, by not wanting and by not at all letting yourself to be led astray by desire. The meaty rice that you have thus overcome will also be looked down upon by future generations."

Ven. Moggallāna's Bold Words

Ven. Moggallāna was one who had reached the height of perfection of knowledge as a disciple on the seventh day after he had become a monk. He was also placed by the Buddha as the foremost among those who possessed supernormal powers. [723]

Depending on his supernormal powers he thought: "Food is scarce in Verāñjā now. Monks are having much trouble. What if I were to turn over the earth and give for food the essence of the earth from the bottom layer." Then he continued to reflect: "As I am staying in the presence of the master, it does not befit me to do so without seeking his permission. Such an action would be tantamount to rivalry.” So he went to the Buddha and bowed low before him and took his seat at an appropriate place.

Then Ven. Moggallāna addressed the Buddha thus: “Exalted Buddha, Verānjā is short of food now. It is hard to stay there. There are white bones all over the city. Lots are drawn for making a living. It is not easy to get enough food by going round with an alms bowls in the hands. The bottom layer of the earth is pleasant for its sweetness, like honey that is free from bees and bee-eggs. Pray, exalted Buddha, let me turn up the soil of this great earth so that the monks may enjoy its essence from the bottom layer.”

Then the Buddha asked: “Dear son Moggallāna, how would you treat the beings living on the earth?” Ven. Moggallāna answered: “Exalted Buddha, I will change my one hand into something like the earth. Then I will transfer the beings, from the natural earth on the hand that is changed into the earth. With the other hand, I will turn up this natural earth.”

Then the Buddha uttered words of rejection: “No, dear son Moggallāna, it is not proper. Do not wish to turn up the earth. It may lead to misunderstanding among living beings.”

Herein what should be noted with regard to the words: “It may lead to misunderstanding among living beings,” is this, famine occurs not only now, it will occur also in the future. From where can monks get a fellow monk endowed with supernatural power like you then? Though future monks may be Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna), Once-returners (Sakadāgāmi), Non-returners (Anāgāmi), dry-vision (sukkha-vipassaka) Arahats, or only those who have attained absorptions (jhāna) but not psychic powers, and even Arahats of analytical knowledge, yet as they lack supernormal powers, they will approach the house of their lay devotees for food. Then it may occur to the devotees thus: “Monks during the Dispensation of the Buddha were accomplished in the threefold training. In the Buddha’s lifetime, they had the benefits of their super knowledges (abhiññā) and when there was famine they could turn up the earth and enjoy the earth’s essence. Nowadays there are no monks who have fully undertaken the threefold training. If there were such monks, they would do the same as those of the Buddha’s time did. They would not let us eat anything that is raw or cooked. They will give us only the earth’s essence.” This thought will make them misunderstand about the noble ones themselves that: “There are no noble ones!” Those, who condemn the noble ones on account of their misunderstanding will be reborn in suffering states. Hence the Buddha prohibited the turning up of the earth's soil.

At that time, as Ven. Moggallāna failed to get permission, he desired to change his request and said: “Pray, exalted Buddha, let all monks go to the northern continent!” the Buddha again forbade it as before: “Dear son Moggallāna, it is not proper. Do not desire to make them go to the northern continent!” These indeed were the bold words of Ven. Moggallāna.

Herein though it was not said directly that: “It may lead to misunderstanding among living beings,” it should be understood that the Buddha rejected the idea of going on alms round to the northern continent on those very grounds, for it had been explained before. Note should be taken as in the previous manner.

What would he have done if the Buddha had given him permission? Through his supernormal powers he would have turned the great ocean into a small ditch that could be crossed over by a single stride and paved a new road straight from the Naḷeru margosa tree to the northern continent; he would also have created the continent like any village, which they have frequented for food, with streets for going and coming so that monks could go in and out conveniently. [724]

Ven. Sāriputta's Request

At that time Ven. Sāriputta, who was alone in seclusion, wondered: “Whose Dispensations among exalted Buddhas did not last long and whose Dispensations did?” With this query he emerged from his seclusion in the evening and approached the Buddha and bowed low before him and took his seat at an appropriate place. Then he asked the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, while I was staying in seclusion, I wondered: ‘Whose Dispensations among exalted Buddhas did not last long and whose Dispensations did?’ ”

Herein it may be argued: “Was not Ven. Sāriputta able to answer his own questions?” Answer: “He was able to do so in some cases and unable to do so in others.” Explanation: he could decide: “The Dispensation of these Buddhas did not last long and the Dispensations of these Buddhas did.” But he could not decide: “They did not last long for these reasons and they lasted long for these.”

Ven. Mahā Paduma, however, states: “It was not difficult for the chief disciple, who had reached the height of the sixteenfold wisdom and knowledge, to decide the reasons. But deciding by himself, though he was living with the Buddha, would be like discarding the balance and weighing something by the hand. Hence his question was put to the Buddha.”

At that time, being desirous of answering Ven. Sāriputta’s question, the Buddha said: “Dear son Sāriputta, the Dispensations of the Buddhas Vipassī, Sikhī and Vessabhū did not last long through successive generations of disciples; but those of the Buddhas Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana, and Kassapa lasted long through successive generations of disciples.”

Then Ven. Sāriputta asked: “Exalted Buddha, why did the Dispensations of the Buddhas Vipassī, Sikhī and Vessabhū not last long?”

The Buddha answered: “Dear son Sāriputta, the Buddhas Vipassī, Sikhī and Vessabhū did not bother to give discourses to their disciples elaborately. Their teachings of the nine divisions, such as Discourses (Sutta), Mixed Poems and Prose (Geyya), etc., were so few. Nor did they prescribe disciplinary rules for them. Nor did they recite the Authoritative Rules (Pātimokkha). When they passed away and when their immediate disciples passed away, the later generations of disciples, who were of diverse names, clans and births, let the Dispensations become extinct rapidly.

Dear son Sāriputta, just as flowers of different kinds placed on a wooden board without being strung are scattered, blown away and destroyed by the wind for the very reason that they are not strung; even so, when these Buddhas and their immediate disciples passed away, their teachings disappeared fast amongst later disciples of diverse names, clans and births. The other three Buddhas, knowing the intentions of their disciples with their minds, bothered to exhort them.

Dear son Sāriputta, there took place an incident in former times. In a certain terrible forest, Buddha Vessabhū knew the minds of his thousand monks with his mind and exhorted them: “Cultivate these three wholesome thoughts: The thought of renunciation (nekkhamma-vitakka), the thought of non-harming (avyāpāda), the thought of non-violence (avihiṃsā). Do not cultivate these unwholesome thoughts: the thought of sensual pleasure (kāma-vitakka), the thought of harming (vyāpāda), the thought of violence (vihiṃsā). Bear in mind that they are impermanent (anicca), unsatisfactory (dukkha), unsubstantial (anatta) and unpleasant (asubha). Do not bear in mind that they are permanent

Dear son Sāriputta, the thousand monks who had thus been exhorted by Buddha Vessabhū became Arahats, free from the pollutants (āsava). The minds of these thousand monks, therefore, were entirely cut off from grasping of anything through craving and wrong view that: ‘This am I, this is mine!’ They were totally emancipated from the pollutants (āsava), had come to complete cessation, in the sense of not arising again. With regard to the terrible forest, the terror of the forest was such that those who were not free from passion generally had gooseflesh upon entering it. What has been said is the reason for the short-lived Dispensations of the Buddhas Vipassī, Sikhī and Vessabhū.”

With reference to the statement that the three Buddhas: “Did not bother to give discourses to their disciples elaborately.” They did not do so, not because they were idle. In fact, there is no such thing as indolence or lack of industry on the part of Buddhas. Explanation: When Buddhas teach, they do so with the same degree of effort whether they are to teach a single person or two persons, or the whole universe full of beings. They do not reduce their energy when seeing that the audience is small; nor do they increase their effort when seeing that the audience is big. Just as the lion, king of animals, goes out in search of food after seven days spent in the den, chases and catches his prey with the same speed, whether they are big or tiny, because he is resolved that his speed should not be inadequate, even so when Buddhas deliver their sermons to their listeners whether they form a multitude or only an inconsiderable gathering, they do so with equal industry, for they have a noble purpose not to decrease their respect for the Dhamma.

Unlike our Buddha, who taught in detail as though he were to fill the ocean, these three Buddhas, in fact, did not elaborate on their teachings. The reason was that, in those times, beings had little dust of defilements in their wisdom-eyes. Explanation: In the lifetimes of these three Buddhas, beings enjoyed longevity, and the amount of dust that covered their wisdom-eyes was also slight. Beings in those days were therefore instantly converted on listening to just one verse connected with the four truths. It was therefore not necessary to preach to them elaborately. Hence the teachings of these Buddhas in nine divisions were so meagre.

In the time of these three Buddhas, since their monastic disciples were wholly free from wrongdoings, no authoritative Monastic Rules (āṇā- pātimokkha) associated with the seven portions of offences had to be promulgated. Only the recitation of the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha) was known to them. Even the Advisory Rules they did not recite fortnightly.<sup>221</sup>

These long-lived Buddhas had two generations of disciples to follow them: The immediate disciples and the later disciples who were monks ordained by those immediate disciples. At the time when the later disciples, under the second category emerged, since there had been no disciplinary rules from the outset and since the disciples, who were of diverse names, clans and births, did not feel obliged to protect and preserve the small amount of discourses but remained careless as though they shirked their duty, thinking: “Such and such a venerable will do it, such and such a venerable will do it,” they did nothing for safeguarding the teachings by holding Councils (Saṅgāyana). Hence, there was a rapid disappearance of their Dispensations.

With regard to the statement: “The Dispensations of the long-lived Buddhas did not last long,” it originally meant to say that their Dispensations did not last long for many generations of disciples. The life of Buddha Vipassī, however, was 80,000 years long; the lifespan of his immediate disciples also was 80,000 [726] years, so was the lifespan of the last generation of later disciples who were ordained by the immediate disciples. Therefore, the Dispensation with the two generations of disciples lasted for 160,000 years after the demise of the Buddha. In terms of generations of disciples, however, there were only two, and this small number of generations was meant, in speaking of the shortness of the Dispensation; it was spoken, one should particularly remember, not in terms of years, but of generations.

Having heard of the reasons for the short-lived Dispensations in terms of generations of the disciples of the three Buddhas: Vipassī, Sikhī and Vessabhū, the noble Sāriputta, being desirous of hearing the reasons for the long-lived Dispensations of the other three Buddhas: Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana and Kassapa, continued to ask the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, why did the Dispensations of the Buddhas Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana and Kassapa last long?”

The Buddha answered: “Dear son Sāriputta, the Buddhas Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana and Kassapa gave elaborate discourses to their disciples. Their teachings of the nine divisions, such as Discourses (Sutta), Mixed Poems and Prose (Geyya), etc., were numerous. They prescribed disciplinary rules for them, and recited the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha). When they passed away and when their immediate disciples passed away, therefore, the generations of their later disciples, who were of diverse names, clans and births, caused the Dispensations to last long.

30: The 12th Rains Retreat (Famine) – 1028

Dear son Sāriputta, just as flowers of different kinds strung on a string and placed on a wooden board cannot be dispersed, blown away and destroyed by the wind for the very reason that they are strung, even so, when these Buddhas and their immediate disciples passed away, their teachings lasted long through the efforts of later generations of disciples of diverse names, clans and births.

Dear son Sāriputta, the aforesaid factors – elaborate teaching, a large number of discourses, the promulgation of the disciplinary rules and the recitation of the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) – together formed the reason for the long existence of the teachings of the three Buddhas: Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana and Kassapa.”

Herein, with regard to the long existence of the Dispensations of these three Buddhas, the lengthy duration in terms of both lifespan and generations of disciples should be noted. Explanation: The lifespan at the time of Buddha Kakusandha was 40,000 years; at the time of Buddha Koṇāgamana, 30,000 years; and at the time of Buddha Kassapa, 20,000 years. Many generations, one after another, of these immediate disciples nurtured and carried forward the Dispensation. In this way, the teachings of these three Buddhas long endured in terms of both lifespans and generations of disciples.

As for our inestimable Lord of the Three Worlds, he should have been born when the lifespan was 10,000 years, which was half that of Buddha Kassapa; if not, he should have been born in the period of 5,000 years lifespan, 1,000 years or 500 years lifespan. But his wisdom was not mature enough then. It attained maturity only when the lifespan was 100 years, which is very short indeed. Therefore, it should be stated that although the Dispensation of our Buddha lasted long in terms of generations of disciples, it did not last as long as did the Dispensations of those former Buddhas in terms of years.

Having thus learnt the reason for the long existence of the Dispensations of the Buddhas Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana and Kassapa, Ven. Sāriputta came to the conclusion that the laying down of rules is the main cause for the perpetuity of the Dispensation of a Buddha. Wishing to ensure the perpetuity of the Dispensation of the present Buddha, he rose from his seat, adjusted his robe, covered the left shoulder, and raised his hands in [727] adoration towards the Buddha. He, then emphatically requested the master with these words: “May the exalted Buddha lay down disciplinary rules so that this Dispensation may last long! May he recite the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha)! Exalted Buddha, it is time to promulgate the rules vital to the long standing of the teaching, and to recite the rules! Exalted Gracious One, the time has come to lay down and to bring about the rules which are noted for the lasting endurance of the Dispensation!”

Being desirous of telling him that the time is not ripe yet for laying down rules, the Buddha said: “Wait, dear Sāriputta! Wait, dear Sāriputta! Only the Buddha knows the proper time for promulgating rules and reciting the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha)!”

1. Dear Sāriputta, as long as there do not take place in the Saṅgha some wrongdoings which are the basis for the pollutants (āsava) in this Dispensation, the Buddha does not lay down rules for the disciples nor does he proclaim the Monastic Rules. Dear Sāriputta, when there take place some wrongdoings in the Saṅgha which are the basis for the pollutants in this Dispensation, only then does he lay down the rules and proclaim the Monastic Rules, only for the benefit of eliminating those wrongdoings.
2. Dear Sāriputta, as long as the Saṅgha does not have a large number of monks of long standing, there do not take place some wrongdoings which are the basis for the pollutants in this Dispensation. Dear Sāriputta, when the Saṅgha has a large number of monks of long standing there take place in it some wrongdoings which are the basis for the pollutants in this Dispensation, then only for the benefit of eliminating those wrongdoings, which are the basis for the pollutants, does the Buddha lay down rules and proclaim the Monastic Rules.
3. Dear Sāriputta, as long as the Saṅgha does not thrive, there do not take place in it some wrongdoings which are the basis for the pollutants in this Dispensation. Dear Sāriputta, when the Saṅgha thrives, and there take place in it some wrongdoings which are the basis for the pollutants in this Dispensation, then only for the benefit of eliminating these wrongdoings, does the Buddha lay down rules and proclaim the Monastic Rules.

4. Dear Sāriputta, as long as the Saṅgha does not know many gains there do not take place in it some wrongdoings which are the basis for the pollutants in this Dispensation. Dear Sāriputta, when the Saṅgha knows many gains and there take place in it some wrongdoings which are the basis for the pollutants in this Dispensation, then only for the benefit of eliminating those wrongdoings, does the Buddha lay down rules and proclaim Monastic Rules.
5. Dear Sāriputta, as long as the Saṅgha does not have much knowledge there do not take place in it some wrongdoings which are the basis for the pollutants in this Dispensation. Dear Sāriputta, when the Saṅgha has much knowledge and there take place in it some wrongdoings which are the basis for the pollutants in this Dispensation, then only for the benefit of eliminating those wrongdoings, does the Buddha lay down rules and proclaim the Monastic Rules.

Dear Sāriputta, now the Saṅgha is free from immoral persons, free from blemishes, free from impurities, clean, and stands in the essence of such virtues as morality and the like. Dear Sāriputta, of these 500 monks, the lowest is a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna), whose assured destination is the three higher stages of the path, for he will never be reborn in suffering abodes.”

Herein by the pollutants (āsava) is meant moral defilements and suffering such as accusations, killings, imprisonment, etc., by others in this life, and suffering through rebirth in the suffering states hereafter. Since such wrongdoings as sexual intercourse, stealing, killing human beings, etc., form the ground for the pollutants (āsava), they are called the bases for the pollutants (āsavaṭṭhaniyā). [728]

At the time when Ven. Sāriputta made the request for laying down the rules, transgression had not occurred at all. Had the rules such as the four Expulsion (Pārājika) rules and others been laid down before the actual taking place of transgressions, such an action would not have escaped private abuse, blame and public censure.

How would such an action not have escaped? If rules were to be laid down in advance, all the necessary rules would have been done so, saying: “If a monk commits sexual intercourse,” and so on. Laying down the rules before seeing the transgression, others would abuse, blame privately and censure publicly as follows: “Why does the monk Gotama bind us to these rules, taking for granted that the Saṅgha of monks adheres to him and follows his words? Why did he lay down the Expulsion rules? Have not these clansmen become monks after renouncing their great luxury, vast circles of relatives and princely wealth that they had in their possession? Are they not content with what is just enough for their food and what is just enough for their clothing, and do they not abide with extreme respect in the threefold training and without regard for their bodies and lives? Among such good men, who would indulge in such worldly practices (loka-āmisā) as sexual intercourse, stealing another’s property, taking another’s life, earning his living by falsely claiming attainments.

Even if the four Expulsion rules were not laid down, has it not been made clear that sexual intercourse, stealing, etc., are not proper, not practicable, for even while as a novice one keeps the precepts, saying: ‘I take upon myself the rule of staying away from taking life,’ and so on?” Such would have incurred private abuse, blame and public censure.

Moreover, probably the Buddha’s wisdom would not have been known to beings. The rules that had been laid down would have been destroyed. They would not have lasted. To use a worldly simile, a medical doctor lacking in skill sends for a man who has no ulcer yet but who would soon suffer from an ulcer and says: “Come, man, on this part of your body there will appear an ulcer, bringing no benefit but threatening your life. Get it treated early!” – “Very well, sir. Can you yourself give treatment to it?” Saying thus the man submits himself to the doctor, who then gives surgical treatment to that part of the man’s body without an ulcer and causing the skin to become normal by taking out the blood, applying the medicine, dressing, cleaning, and so on. Thereafter, he asks the man saying: “I have cured your ulcer. Give me the cost of the medicine!”

The man who has been medically treated may then privately abuse, blame and openly censure the surgeon without skill in his presence, saying: “What is this foolish doctor talking about? Which disease of mine has been cured by this foolish doctor? As a matter of fact, has not the stupid surgeon caused trouble to me? Has he not removed part of my body?” The man may not feel grateful to the doctor.

In the same way, had the Buddha laid down the rules for his disciples before the actual wrongdoings happened, he would not have escaped private abuse, and so on. His wisdom might not have been known to beings.

30: The 12th Rains Retreat (Famine) – 1032

The rules that had been laid down would have been destroyed. They would not have lasted. Hence the Buddha said, in the negative: “Dear Sāriputta, as long as there do not take place wrongdoings in the Saṅgha, a Buddha does not lay down the rules for the disciples,” and so on.

Herein, the time when wrongdoings have not taken place means the time which was not ripe yet for laying down rules. The time when wrongdoings have taken place means the time which is ripe for doing so. The laying down of rules at an inopportune time might bring about the aforesaid blame and censure. The same action, taken as required by the occurrence of wrongdoings, may be likened to a skilful medical doctor who gives the ulcer that has appeared curative treatment by operating on it, applying medicine, dressing, cleaning and so on and causes the recovery of the ulcer and the normalcy of the skin. The Buddha may be likened to him, who is not abused but honoured for his distinguished service in his medical profession, for he was similarly not abused and blamed privately or otherwise but [729] honoured for his distinguished efficiency in the matter of his omniscience. The rules laid down would not then be impaired but would stand intact for long.

By the words in the first statement is shown the opportune and inopportune time for laying down rules. By the words in the second, third, fourth and fifth statements, is shown the time when wrongdoings occurred. The elaborate meaning of these words may be taken from the Section about Verañjā (Verañja-kaṇḍa, Vin Pār 1, PTS 3.1).

Taking Leave at the End of the Rains Retreat

After the Buddha had thus explained in detail the question of laying down the disciplinary rules to Ven. Sāriputta, the general of the Dhamma, he spent the whole Rains Retreat (Vassa) at Verāñjā and performed the Invitation (Pavāraṇā) on the Great Invitation Day, the full moon of November (Assayaṇa), at the end of the Rains Retreat. Then he called Ven. Ānanda and said: “Dear Ānanda, when the Buddhas have observed the Rains Retreat at the request of others, it is not their custom to depart without asking them for leave, or, they depart only after informing them. Come, Ānanda, let us go and seek permission from Brahmin Verañja.” After finishing his meal, the Buddha, with Ven. Ānanda as his companion, visited Verañja’s place in the afternoon, illuminating the city gates and all the roads and streets with his body radiance.

30: The 12th Rains Retreat (Famine) – 1033

When the Buddha stood at the door of the Brahmin's house, the Brahmin's men, seeing the Buddha, reminded their master; only then did Verañja regain a sense of his responsibilities and get up from his seat excitedly to prepare a seat worthy of the noble one; he then welcomed and invited him respectfully saying: "Please come this way, exalted Buddha!" the Buddha walked along as had been invited by the Brahmin and sat down on the prepared seat. It was the time when Māra had withdrawn his spell. "Brahmin, we have observed the Rains Retreat (Vassa) at your invitation. Now we inform you that we want to go elsewhere!"

Verañjā replied to the Buddha: "Right, venerable Gotama. You have observed the Rains Retreat (Vassa) at our invitation. But I have not given alms yet. The reason for that is not because we have nothing to give, not because we do not want to give. People of household life have too many things to do. Where can they have a chance to give? May venerable Gotama accept, together with the company of monks, my food tomorrow."

The Brahmin did not know about the magical influence of Māra. He thought his absent-mindedness was due to the affairs and drawbacks of household life, hence his supplication to the Buddha.

It occurred then to the Buddha: "If I do not accept the Brahmin's invitation, demerit will develop for him, and to all the Verañjā citizens as well for that matter, who would think: 'The monk Gotama seems to be angry because he receives no alms for the whole period of the three Rains Retreat months. Therefore, he rejects even a single meal despite my request. The monk Gotama has no patience. He is not an omniscient one!' Let there be no development of demerit to them!" Out of compassion, the Buddha accepted the invitation by keeping silent. Thereafter, he made the Brahmin know the futility of being occupied with domestic affairs and their drawbacks. With a Dhamma talk appropriate at that moment, the Buddha showed the two benefits; one for this life and the other for the next. He also made him dedicated to good deeds, and enthusiastic about and happy with them. Then he rose from his seat and departed.

Verañja's Great Alms Giving

30: The 12th Rains Retreat (Famine) – 1034

After the departure of the Buddha, the Brahmin Verañja summoned all his family members and other inmates of the house to a meeting, at which he said: “Dear ones, I have not offered even a single day’s meal to the Buddha though I invited him to stay here for the three months of the Rains Retreat. Let us now offer alms meant for the three months Rains Retreat period in a single day.” Having given instructions thus, the Brahmin had excellent food cooked, and next morning he had his place decorated and seats worthy of noble ones prepared. After [730] setting up an exquisite offering of perfumes and flowers, he sent for the Buddha with the word: “It is meal time now, venerable Gotama, the food is ready!”

Accompanied by 100 monks, the Buddha arrived at Verañja’s house and sat together with them on the seats prepared. Verañja personally served the Saṅgha of monks, headed by the Buddha, with delicious meals until they were satisfied and refused to take more.

As the Buddha removed his hand from the alms bowl after finishing the meal, Verañja offered him a set of three robes which were worth 3,000. Each robe cost 1,000. To each monk too, he offered a set of two pieces of cloth to make robes. The value of each robe cloth was 500. Hence the amount of his donation made to the monks was 500 thousand.

Only this much comes from the canonical text, the commentarial account is as follows.

As he was not satisfied with this offering of robes worth 500,000, the Brahmin Verañja offered again a large number of rugs, bolts of cloth made in Pattunna country, each costing 7,000 or 8,000, so that they might be cut and made into garments of double layers, shoulder coverings, waistbands, water strainers, etc.

He also gave each monk jugs and bottles filled with medicinal ointment heated 100 or 1,000 times and worth 1,000. There was nothing left out from the four requisites he presented for their use. He gave away in generosity all the necessities to the monks.

Having done such a great alms giving, the Brahmin sat down together with his wife and children, respectfully paying respects to the Buddha. Owing to Māra’s magic, he had lost the opportunity of enjoying the taste of immortality in the form of a discourse throughout the Rains Retreat. In order to make up the Brahmin’s loss and to fulfil his wish, the Buddha let the rain of immortality fall heavily in a single day. He taught the double advantages for the present life and the next and established him in meritorious deeds. Finally, the Buddha made Verañja zealous and delighted in good deeds, and then he left the place.

Together with his wife, Verañja respectfully raised his hands in adoration towards the Buddha and his assembly of monks and followed them to see them off, requesting: “Exalted Buddha, kindly do us another favour by visiting us once again!” Then the Brahmin returned with tears trickling from his eyes.

After staying in Verañjā for as long as he wished, the Buddha left the city. Being desirous of reducing the great circular journey, he led the monks, who had been so tired and fatigued because of the scarcity of food during the whole Rains Retreat, along the direct route, bypassing Sorreyya, Saṅkassa, and Kaññakuḅḅa cities. On arriving at the crossing at Payāga, the Buddha crossed the Ganges and reached Bārāṇasī. At this city too he stayed for as long as he wished, and then he headed for Vesālī. Having arrived at Vesālī the Buddha sojourned at Kūṭāgāra, the monastery with the gable, in the Great Wood.

Having stayed in the Great Wood in Vesālī, teaching those worthy of conversion, the Buddha left that city and eventually arrived in Sāvattḥī and stayed at Jetavana monastery.

The Birth Story about the Sorry Drink

An event then happened, leading to the relation of the Birth Story about the Sorry Drink (Vālodaka-jātaka, Ja 183) by the Buddha: Five hundred lay devotees in the city of Sāvattḥī left their domestic undertakings, wandered in one group with their wives from place to place, listening to the discourses of the Buddha. Among them some were Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna), some were Once-returners (Sakadāgāmi) and the rest Non-returners (Anāgāmi). There was not a single worldling (puthujjana) amongst them. Those who extended an invitation to the Buddha included 500 lay devotees.

There lived also 500 young attendants who, while waiting upon the 500 devotees, ate what was leftover. After eating the leftover food at breakfast, they slept as [742] they had nothing more to do, and when they woke up they went to the river Aciravatī and wrestled among themselves on the banks of the river, shouting loudly. Their masters, the 500 lay devotees, however, did not shout at all but kept quiet and engaged in fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti) in solitude.

When the Buddha heard the loud noises of the 500 eaters of leftover food, he asked Ven. Ānanda: “What are these noises, Ānanda?” – “These noises belong to the 500 eaters of leftover food, exalted Buddha,” replied Ven. Ānanda.

Then the Buddha said: “Ānanda, not only now do they eat leftover food and shout loudly, but in former times too they did the same thing. Not only now do these 500 devotees remain quiet, but in former times too they did so too.” Upon being requested by Ven. Ānanda, the Buddha related the past incident as follows:

“In ancient times when King Brahmadata was reigning in Bārāṇasī, the Bodhisatta was born into the family of a noble man and when he came of age, he became a counsellor to the king.

One day, hearing of a rebellion in a border area, he harnessed 500 horses of Sindhava breed and went to the border with the fourfold army. After restoring peace there, he returned to Bārāṇasī and asked his officers to give the horses syrup made from grapes, saying: ‘These horses are fatigued. Let them have a grape drink.’ The officers did as they were told by the king.

The 500 horses then took the flavoured and tasty grape-drinks and went to their stables and stayed quietly in their respective places.

After giving the syrup to the horses, there was a lot of grapes remaining but without flavour and taste. The officers asked the king: ‘What shall we do with the remains from the grapes?’ – ‘Comrades,’ said the king, ‘knead them in water and filter them with pieces of coarse cloth made of fibres from marsh date palms and give the water to the mules that carry the food for the horses.’ The officers acted as they were ordered to by the king.

The mules, who carried the food loads, took the filtered secondary juice and became intoxicated with pride and they frolicked about braying, jumping and running in the courtyard. The king opened the palace window, and looking at the courtyard, he asked the Bodhisatta, the counsellor: “Look, wise man, after drinking the secondary grape juice, these 500 mules are intoxicated with pride and they frolic, braying, jumping and running about. But the Sindhava horses, after drinking the flavoured and delicious syrup of grapes made no sound, not showing any frolicsome behaviour, they keep quiet. What is the reason? So he put a question in the following verse (Ja 183):

*Vālodakam apparasam nihīnam, pivā mado jāyati gadrabhānam,
imañ-ca pivāna rasam pañitam, mado na sañjāyati sindhavānam.*

Wise man! The mules that have taken the secondary grape syrup of less taste and poor quality and filtered with a piece of cloth made of fibres from marsh date palms, are intoxicated with pride. Such intoxication has not happened to the Sindhava horses though they have taken the delicious grape juice. What is the reason?

In order to give his answer to the king, he uttered the following verse:

Appam pivivāna nihīna-jacco, so majjatī tena janinda puṭṭho, dhorayha-sīlī ca kulamhi jāto, na majjatī agga-rasam pivivā.

Your majesty! The lowly born mule that has been effected by its insignificant birth becomes intoxicated after drinking an inconsiderable [743] amount of secondary grape syrup. The Sindhava horses that strenuously renders service to the country, though he had taken the sweetest taste of the juice extracted from fresh grapes, is not intoxicated because of his birth in a high family.

What the verse means to say is that because the mules are inferior by birth, they become intoxicated after drinking less tasty secondary juice. On the contrary the Sindhava steeds, on account of their superiority by birth, do not show conceit or are not intoxicated with conceit though they have taken the primary juice of best quality.

On hearing the Bodhisatta's saying, the king had the mules driven out from the courtyard. Taking the Bodhisatta's advice the king performed meritorious deeds, beginning with alms giving and passed away to another existence according to his deeds (kamma).

Having delivered the Birth Story about the Sorry Drink (Vālodaka-jātaka, Ja 183), the Buddha concluded the story thus: "The 500 mules then have now become the 500 attendants who eat the leftover food. The 500 Sindhava horses then have now become the 500 noble lay devotees. The King of Bārāṇasī then is now Ānanda. The wise counsellor then is now I myself, the Buddha.”

31: The 12th Year (Rāhula)

[A section here on Sudiṇṇa and the events leading up to the laying down of the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) have been moved to the 20th Rains Retreat where they more properly belong, as that is when the Rules started to be propagated.]

The Advice to Rāhula (MN 62)

While the Buddha was staying at Jetavana monastery in Sāvattihī, the Buddha's son, Rāhula, was then a novice of eighteen years of age. He had reached his 11th year as a novice (sāmaṇera). One day the Buddha entered the city of Sāvattihī in the morning for alms food, and the novice Rāhula followed the Buddha closely.

When the Buddha and Rāhula were thus walking, the latter close behind the former, the Buddha was as splendid looking as a grand bull elephant that marches out of a jungle to come upon the pleasant ground in a grove of Sāla tree in full bloom. Rāhula too was as splendid looking as a young elephant that comes close behind the bull elephant. The Buddha was as splendid looking as the lion king that marches out of his ruby cave to look for food in the evening. Rāhula too was as splendid as a young lion that comes close behind the great lion king. The Buddha was as splendid as the tiger king that marches out of his forest resembling a jade cave. Rāhula, too, was as splendid as a young tiger that comes close behind the tiger king.

The Buddha was as splendid as the Garuḷa king that emerges out of a forest of cotton trees while Rāhula was as splendid as a young Garuḷa that comes close behind the Garuḷa king. The Buddha was as splendid as the golden goose king that flies up to the sky from Cittakūṭa Mount while Rāhula was as splendid as a young golden goose that comes close behind the goose-king.

The Buddha was as splendid as a large golden boat that sails in Lake Chaddanta while Rāhula was as splendid as a smaller golden boat that comes behind the larger one. The Buddha was as splendid as the Universal Monarch who roams in the firmament by the power of his Wheel-Treasure while Rāhula was as splendid as the eldest royal son who comes close behind the monarch. The Buddha was as splendid as the moon, the lord of the stars that roams in the cloudless sky while Rāhula was as splendid as the morning star that comes along behind the moon.

31: The 12th Year (Rāhula) – 1040

The Buddha was born in the lineage of King Okkāka, a descendent from Mahā Sammata. So was the novice Rāhula. The Buddha belonged to the warrior class (khattiya), having a birth that was as pure as the milk poured into a conch. So was Rāhula. The Buddha's body was adorned with the 32 marks of a great person and was as attractive to the hearts of others as a jewel gatepost erected at the gate of a celestial city or as a coral tree is when it is in full bloom. So was Rāhula's body.

In this manner these two extraordinary men, noble ones, who had realized their unique aspirations of the past, who had become ascetics from out of the ruling class, who possessed royal gentleness, who had golden complexions, and who bore the marks of a Great [744] Man, walked along the same road, being resplendent as though they were to overcome by means of their own splendour, the splendour of two moons, two suns, and each pair of such deities as Sakka, Suyāma, Santusita, Sunimmita, Vasavattī, Mahā Brahma, and others.

While they were thus resplendent, Rāhula closely following the Buddha from behind, watched his father carefully from the surface of the soles up to the tip of the hair and saw his father's resplendence generated by the glory of a Buddha. Wonder-struck, he thought thus: "As his body frame is exquisite with the 32 major marks and surrounded by body lustre, he is resplendent as though he were amidst the drizzle of gold dust, as a golden mountain encircled by streaks of lightning, as a golden gatepost exquisite with the seven kinds of gems that are strung on mechanical threads, as a golden mountain screened by red rugs though he is attired in dark red rag-robles, as a golden gatepost inlaid and adorned with coral creepers, as a golden shrine honoured with vermilion powder, as a golden sacrificial post painted with lac, as the moon that rises all of a sudden from between red clouds. The Buddha's possession of splendour that is caused by the power of his perfections, 30 in all, is endlessly amazing!"

Thereafter he looked at his own self and developed craving associated with household life on account of his own frame: "I am of beauty, too. If the Buddha were a Universal Monarch, lord of the four continents, he would have appointed me chief (parināyaka), the position reserved for the eldest son. In that case, the whole of Jambudīpa would become splendid."

While the Buddha was walking ahead it occurred to him thus: "Now the body of my son Rāhula has grown full with flesh and blood. It is a time when one's mind restlessly wanders about all the attractive objects such as sights, sounds, etc. I wonder with what thoughts he is occupied now while he passes away his time?”

While the Buddha was thus reflecting, he found out clearly his son’s thoughts were accompanied by greed and craving towards the household life (gehasita-taṇhā-lobha), he found out Rāhula’s thoughts as though he saw a moving fish in clear water, and as though he saw his own image in the round mirror. This led him to decide as follows: “While following behind me, my son, the novice Rāhula, had developed craving for the household life on account of his own body, thinking: “I am beautiful. My appearance is pure and clean. Landing not at a right path and following a wrong path, he directs his mind to unworthy sense objects. Like a travelling man who has lost his way, he is heading for a place which is not worth visiting. If the arising defilement of greed were to stay in him and be allowed to grow, this would not give him a chance to see clearly his own welfare, as well as that of others, in their true perspective. This will lead him to the four suffering states of purgatory, animals, Petas, and Asuras, and also to conception in a mother’s cramped womb. Thus will he be thrown into the wheel of Saṃsāra that knows no beginning (anamatagga). In fact, this greed produces what is fruitless. It destroys the meritorious consciousness. Owing to it, a terrible danger may occur in one’s mental continuum, which is not seen by men. One who has craving does not see the cause and its effect clearly.

When a being is overwhelmed by greed, complete darkness reigns. A big mechanized boat, fully loaded with treasures, is not to be neglected, even for a moment, if water is seeping in through the breakage of the planks, and as the breakage should be blocked up quickly, so the novice Rāhula should not be negligently left aside. Before the defilement of greed destroys the treasures of the virtuous, such as morality and the like, that have accrued to him, I shall subdue those moral defilements of his.”

In such an event the Buddha used to look back by turning around his whole body like a bull elephant which is called the elephant-look (nāga-vilokana). The Buddha stood, after turning his whole body as though a golden statue was turning mechanically, and he addressed Rāhula: “Rāhula, there is matter (rūpa) of the past, matter of the future, and matter of the present; matter inside the body and matter outside the body; rough matter [745] and soft matter; bad matter and good matter; far matter and near matter. All this matter of these eleven kinds is not mine, it is not I, it is not my self, thus must matter be contemplated as it really is through insight (vipassanā) knowledge and wisdom.”

When Rāhula asked: “Exalted Buddha, must only matter be contemplated thus? Gracious One, must only matter be contemplated thus?” the Buddha answered: “Matter must be contemplated thus, Rāhula; sensation (vedanā) must be contemplated thus; perception (saññā) must be contemplated thus; volitions (saṅkhāra) must be contemplated thus; consciousness (viññāṇa) must be contemplated thus.”

Herein the reason for Rāhula’s question: “Must only matter be contemplated thus?” was as follows. On hearing the Buddha’s instruction that: “All this matter of eleven kinds is not mine, it is not I, it is not my self, thus this matter should be contemplated as it really is, through insight knowledge and wisdom,” it occurred to Rāhula, who had developed skill in the application of methods (naya-kusala-ñāṇa), thus: “The Fortunate One said: ‘All matter must be thus contemplated through insight knowledge and wisdom,’ but how must the remaining four aggregates, such as sensation, perception, etc., be contemplated? It should follow that they must also be contemplated as in the case of the aggregate of matter!” Hence, his question was on the basis of his skill in the application of methods.

Indeed, Ven. Rāhula possessed a high degree of intelligence. When taught just one thing saying: “This should not be done,” he would then ponder that: “This too should not be done; this also should not be done,” and penetratingly proceeded in hundreds of thousands of ways. Similarly, when instructed in just one thing, saying: “This should be done,” he would then ponder: “This too should be done; this also should be done,” and he was able to penetrate by hundreds of thousands of means.

Besides, Ven. Rāhula cherished the threefold training. Early in the morning, in the precincts of the Buddha’s scented chamber, he would scatter daily a measure (pattha)<sup>222</sup> of grains of sand and utter: “May I today get from the Fortunate One or from my preceptor Ven. Sāriputta words of advice as much as this sand.”

He put forward his questions because he wished to practise fully as he possessed skill in the application of methods (naya-kusala) and cherished the three trainings.

On receiving the Buddha's reply Ven. Rāhula considered thus: "After knowing the craving that has its base in my body, the Fortunate One did not admonish me indirectly saying to the effect that: 'A monk should not have such an idea!' Neither did he send a messenger to me saying: 'Go, monk, ask him not to have such an idea!' In fact, he stood face to face with me and gave me a Buddha's instruction as though he seized a thief together with the stolen property, catching hold of his top knot. Hard it is to get a Buddha's advice even in the long duration of uncountable (asaṅkhyeyya) aeons! Who, on getting the instruction of a Buddha in person, would care to enter a town or a village for food if he were truly wise?"

Accordingly, Rāhula gave up his alms food round and turned back from the spot where he heard the Buddha's exhortation without following the Buddha further and sat down at the foot of a tree.

Though the Buddha saw Rāhula turning back, he did not forbid him by saying: "Rāhula, do not go back yet. This is the time for you to go on alms round," for he had conceived an idea: "Let Rāhula take the food of immortality of the body-related mindfulness (kāya-gatā-sati) for the day!" [746]

Ven. Sāriputta's Daily Duties

The duties of Ven. Sāriputta, while he was staying alone, were different from those when he was staying together with the Buddha. While the two chief disciples were staying alone they would sweep their residential ground early in the morning, wash themselves, engage in absorption (jhāna), sit quietly, and go on alms round, each according to his wish.

While they were staying with the Buddha, the two chief disciples would not do so. While they were thus staying with the Buddha, the Buddha, in the company of the monks, first went for alms food. When the Buddha had left thus for alms, Ven. Sāriputta would come out from his cell, and being aware that a residence of monks is a place which can sometimes be made pleasant by themselves or which cannot be done so at other times, he would go round the precincts and sweep the place that had not been swept, dispose of the rubbish that had not been disposed of, keep a drinking water pot at a suitable distance where there was none. Visiting a sick monk, he would ask: “Friend, what food shall I bring for you? Which food do you want to have?” He would also go to those who had not observed even a single Rains Retreat (Vassa) and advise them: “Friends, be happy in the Buddha’s Dispensation! But do not be indolent! The Buddha’s teaching contains practice as its essence!” Having done all these, he would go on alms round following the other monastics.

For example, when the Universal Monarch, the lord of the four continents, desired to go to a certain place, he marched out first with the fourfold army, his eldest son, the vice-chief, followed him supervising the troops. In the same way, the Fortunate One, the Universal Monarch of the true law, who set in motion the Dhamma Wheel, went in the company of monks first; Ven. Sāriputta, the Buddha’s eldest son and his vice-chief, the general of the Dhamma, went on alms round following all other monastics after performing all his duties mentioned above.

When Ven. Sāriputta, as the last person, went out for alms after finishing his work in the Jetavana monastery on that very day, he saw Ven. Rāhula seated cross-legged with his body upright, cultivating mindfulness and urged him with encouraging words to develop the meditation of mindfulness on the in-breath and out-breath (ānāpāṇa-sati-bhāvanā): “Rāhula, develop the meditation of mindfulness on the in-breath and out-breath! When the meditation of mindfulness on the in-breath and out-breath is developed, when it is repeatedly developed, it will be of great benefit.”

Herein, it may be questioned as to why Ven. Sāriputta urged and encouraged Rāhula to develop the meditation of mindfulness on the in-breath and out-breath.

Answer: Because the meditation of mindfulness on the in-breath and out-breath was agreeable to Rāhula’s disposition.

Explanation: Not being aware of the fact that the Buddha had taught Rāhula meditation on matter, he noticed that the way Rāhula was seated motionless would go best with the meditation of mindfulness on the in-breath and out-breath. Hence his encouraging words.

With reference to the words: “When the meditation of mindfulness on the in-breath and out-breath is repeatedly developed, it will be of great benefit,” the way the benefit accrues is as follows: A monastic who develops the meditation of mindfulness on the in-breath and out-breath can become an Arahāt in one sitting; even if he cannot become an Arahāt, he can become an Arahāt when nearing his death (sama-sīsī); if not, during his rebirth in a celestial abode, he can become an Arahāt after listening to the Dhamma from a Deva; if not, he can become a Paccekabuddha at a time when there is no Perfect Buddha; if not, he can become an Arahāt by quick super knowledge (khippābhīñṇā) like Ven. Bāhiya Dārucciya in the lifetime of a later Buddha. In this way the meditation of mindfulness on the in-breath and out-breath is of great benefit.

Discerning the great benefit thus, Ven. Sāriputta urged and encouraged Rāhula, who had taken him as preceptor and who was his co-resident pupil (saddhi-vihārika), to practise the meditation of mindfulness on the in-breath and out-breath.

In this way, the Buddha and Ven. Sāriputta gave Rāhula meditation on matter and meditation of mindfulness on the in-breath and out-breath respectively and went away. Rāhula remained at the monastery.

Although, knowing that Rāhula was left behind, the Buddha did not personally bring food for him, nor did he send food through Ven. Ānanda nor did he inform his male [747] and female supporters, such as King Pasenadi, Anāthapiṇḍika the wealthy merchant, etc., of the matter. Had they known of this, they would have pots of food conveyed by means of a carrying pole.

Like the Buddha, Ven. Sāriputta did nothing. For that very day Ven. Rāhula received no food at all and had none whatsoever. Despite his being deprived of provisions thus, he did not mind a bit, thinking: “Though the Fortunate One knows that I have been left behind at the monastery, he does not bring, in person, the food he obtained, nor does he send through somebody else, nor does he tell lay people of the matter. Though my preceptor also knows that I have remained behind at the monastery, he too does nothing for me.” How could there be a low or high opinion, contempt or admiration, in him on account of that? There was neither. In the morning as well as in the daytime, he engaged in meditation on the element of matter as taught by the Buddha: “It is true that matter is impermanent for such and such a reason, it is true that matter is suffering for such and such a reason; it is true that matter is unpleasant for such and such a reason; it is true that matter is insubstantial for such and such a reason.”

He reflected thus incessantly like a man who urgently kindles a fire, and in the evening he pondered: “I have been instructed by my preceptor to develop the meditation of mindfulness on the in-breath and out-breath. I will take up his instruction. In fact, one who does not follow the advice of one's preceptor is one who is hard to exhort (dubbaca). There is no worse oppression for me than a censure by my fellow-monks saying: 'Rāhula is hard to exhort; he does not even follow his preceptor's advice!' ”

Desiring to ask about the meditation of mindfulness on the in-breath and out-breath, he came out from his cell, and approached the Buddha. Paying obeisance most respectfully, he sat down in a blameless place, and asked: “Exalted Buddha, how is the meditation of mindfulness on the in-breath and out-breath developed? How is it repeatedly developed so that it becomes to be of great benefit?” Then the Buddha explained to Rāhula in detail:

1. How to develop meditation: On the 20 portions (koṭṭhāsa) of the earth element, on the twelve portions of the water element, on the four portions of the fire element, on the six portions of the wind element which altogether are the great elements (mahā-bhūta), on the space element which is a dependent matter (upādā-rūpa).
2. How to develop meditation on the unshakable signs (tādi-bhavalakkhaṇa), the characteristics of which are similar to those of the elements of earth, water, fire, wind and space: On loving-kindness (mettā); on compassion (karuṇā); on altruistic joy (muditā); on equanimity (upekkhā); on unpleasantness (asubha); on the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā); the Buddha gave a discourse which included the advantages urging him to practise all these forms of meditation.

On the meditation of mindfulness on the in-breath and out-breath, which formed the original question put forth by Rāhula; the Buddha explained it in detail, showing the benefit derived therefrom.

Discourses to Ven. Rāhula

Several discourses were delivered to Ven. Rāhula by the Buddha:

1. The Questions for a Novice (Sāmaṇera-pañha, Khp 4).
2. The Advice to Rāhula [748] given in Ambalaṭṭhika Park (Ambalaṭṭhika-rāhulovāda-sutta, MN 61).

3. The Continual Advice to Rāhula (Abhiṅḡha-rāhulovāda-sutta, Snp 2.11).<sup>223</sup>
4. The Thematic Discourses connected with Rāhula (Rāhula-saṃyutta, SN 18).
5. The Long Discourse giving Advice to Rāhula (Mahā-rāhulovāda-sutta, MN 62).
6. The Short Discourse giving Advice to Rāhula (Cūḷa-rāhulovāda-sutta, MN 147).

The gist of these discourses is as follows: At the time when the Buddha visited the palace at Kapilavatthu for the first time and met Prince Rāhula who was then seven years old, the prince asked for his inheritance, grasping the edge of the Buddha's robe, and said: "Father, you whose defilements have all been put away! Please grant me my inheritance!" Accordingly the Buddha handed him over to Ven. Sāriputta to ordain him as a novice.

1. Thereafter the Buddha decided to make some exhortations to Rāhula, for he thought: "Children tend to speak of all kinds of things, proper as well as improper." He then summoned his son and said: "Rāhula, a novice should not indulge in animal talk (tiracchāna-kathā), such as those about princes and rulers and the like, which are not conducive to the paths and fruitions. Dear son, if you wish to talk, talk about such and such Dhamma." And the Buddha gave Rāhula a discourse, The Questions for a Novice by name, containing ten questions and 55 answers that are never left out by all Buddhas from their teaching.

2. Again the Buddha considered: "Children are liable to tell lies. They are likely to say: 'I see,' when they do not; or 'I do not see,' when they do see. Therefore I shall exhort Rāhula in advance." Hence, he taught the Advice to Rāhula given in Ambalaṅṅhika Park which enumerates seven examples in order: first, the four examples of water cups which can be easily seen by the eye, the two examples of an elephant in warfare, and one example of a mirror.

3. Besides these, the Buddha taught Rāhula another discourse which forbade the arising of craving for the four requisites, which removed desire, greed and craving for the five sensual pleasures, and explained the significant advantages of association with good friends.

4. The Thematic Discourses connected with Rāhula teach him not to develop craving and desire for the three kinds of existence wherever one is born.

5. The Long Discourse giving Advice to Rāhula was delivered in order not to cultivate the householder's lust (gehassita-chanda-rāga), thinking: "I am beautiful, my look is clear and serene," with reference to one's body.

6. After that when the Buddha was in his fourteenth year as an Awakened One when Rāhula was newly ordained as a monastic but had not yet completed a Rains Retreat (Vassa), the Short Discourse giving Advice to Rāhula was taught so that Rāhula might become an Arahāt right away.

Of the above discourses, nothing can be said of the date of the deliverance of the Continual Advice to Rāhula. In fact, it was taught by the Buddha off and on.

1-2. The Questions for a Novice and the Advice to Rāhula given in Ambalaṭṭhika Park were delivered when Rāhula was a young novice of seven years old.

4. The Thematic Discourses connected with Rāhula was given occasionally during the period between Rāhula's novitiate which commenced when he was seven and his ordination as a young monastic who had not yet observed even a single Rains Retreat.

5. The teaching of the Long Discourse giving Advice to Rāhula took place when Rāhula was eighteen.

6. The teaching of the Short Discourse giving Advice to Rāhula took place when Rāhula had just become a monastic with no experience even for a Rains Retreat (Vassa).

Among these Discourses, the Continual Advice to Rāhula was given in order to exhort Rāhula incessantly:

1. The Questions for a Novice was taught to make Rāhula avoid talking about improper things.

2. The Advice to Rāhula [748] given in Ambalaṭṭhika Park was to instruct him not to tell lies knowingly.

31: The 12th Year (Rāhula) – 1049

3. The Thematic Discourses connected with Rāhula was given in order to let Rāhula [749] receive the doctrine concerning insight meditation (vipassanā).
4. The Long Discourse giving Advice to Rāhula was taught in order to eradicate the five sensual pleasures, the craving and greed for household life.
5. The Short Discourse giving Advice to Rāhula was given in order for Rāhula to become an Arahat when the fifteen maturities of freedom (vimutti-paripācanīya) had ripened in him while he was still just a freshman in the community of monastics.

With reference to this point, Ven. Rāhula, desirous of extolling the Buddha's virtues, spoke in the midst of monastics as follows:

Kikīva bījaṃ rakkheyya, cāmarī vālam-uttamaṃ, nipako sīla-sampanno, mamaṃ rakkhi Tathāgato.

As a female pheasant protects her egg, as a yak safeguards his precious tail, so the Fortunate One, my father, the apple of the eye to the three classes of beings, has sheltered me, his own flesh and blood, in the manner of which is comparable to that adopted by the pheasant or the yak, so that I might become an Arahat.

In this way, many discourses were delivered by the Buddha in connection with Ven. Rāhula. [750]

32a: The 13th Rains Retreat (Meghiya)

After staying at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattḥī during the period after the twelfth Rains Retreat (Vassa) and converting and exhorting such beings as humans, Devas and Brahmas through the Long Discourse giving Advice to Rāhula (Mahā-rāhulovāda-sutta, MN 62) and other discourses, the Buddha arrived eventually at the town of Cālīka. Having arrived there, he took up residence at the monastery on the hill, named Cālīka, and observed the thirteenth Rains Retreat (Vassa).

Herein there was moving marshy soil all around the town except in the area of the town gate. As the marshland was unsteady, the town in the middle of that land gave the impression of being shaky to those who viewed it from afar; therefore, the town was called Cālīka (Shaky).

There stood a hill near the town. As the entire hill was white, it too looked shaky to those who saw it during the Observance (Uposatha) days of the dark fortnight. Hence its name also was Cālīka.

On the top of the hill was a big monastery built for the Buddha by his male and female supporters. The Buddha spent the thirteenth Rains Retreat at the Cālīka monastery on Cālīka Hill.

Discourse to Ven. Meghiya (Ud 4.1)

While the Buddha was thus observing the thirteenth Rains Retreat (Vassa) at the big monastery on the Cālīka Hill, Meghiya was the temporary attendant fulfilling the major and minor duties to the Buddha.

Explanation: The Buddha had no permanent attendant (upaṭṭhāka) during the first 20 Rains Retreats (Vassa) called the first period after awakening (paṭhamabodhi). Sometimes Ven. Nāgasamāla, sometimes Ven. Nāgita, sometimes Ven. Upavāṇa, sometimes the monk Sunakkhatta, a former Licchavī Prince, sometimes Ven. Cunda, a younger brother of Ven. Sāriputta, sometimes Ven. Sāgata, and sometimes Ven. Meghiya waited upon the Buddha. During the Buddha's thirteenth Rains Retreat at the big monastery on the Cālīka Hill it was Ven. Meghiya who was serving the Buddha temporarily.

Then one day, Ven. Meghiya approached the Buddha, and fell at his feet in veneration. Then while standing, he said: "Exalted Buddha, I would like to enter the village of Jantu on alms round.” – “Meghiya,” replied the Buddha, “You know the time for going,” which means: “You may go as you wish.”

32a: The 13th Rains Retreat (Meghiya) – 1051

So Ven. Meghiya entered the village of Jantu on alms round and after finishing his meal, he left Jantu for the bank of the river Kimikāḷā (Black Worm), where he took a leisure walk to and fro. While he was doing so, he saw a Mango Grove which was very appealing with its trees standing not very far from one another in green foliage, pleasant with its dark shade and excellent landscape, and delightful as it amused the hearts of those who happened to enter it.

Seeing thus, the following thought arose: “This Mango Grove is appealing, pleasant and delightful. It is a place proper for those clansmen who are desirous of practising meditation. If the exalted Buddha were to permit me, I should come back here for meditation practice.”

That Mango Grove was the place where he, as a monarch, had enjoyed kingly pleasures when he was reborn in his 500 former existences successively. That was why the desire to stay there arose in him as soon as he saw the grove.

Then Ven. Meghiya returned to the Buddha and paid homage to him. While sitting, he reported the matter in detail, beginning from his entry into the village for alms food to the occurrence of his idea to revisit the Mango Grove for meditation practice. He added this request: “Exalted Buddha, provided you give me permission, I would like to go back to the [751] Mango Grove to meditate there.” Being requested thus, the Buddha prohibited his going there: “Wait, dear Meghiya! At the moment, I am alone, wait till someone else comes!”

Herein as requested by Meghiya, the Buddha pondered and came to know that Meghiya’s intelligence had not attained maturity yet. That was the reason for his prohibition. He said: “At the moment I am alone,” because he thought: “If I tell him thus, and if his meditation ends in failure in the Mango Grove, he will come back entirely without embarrassment, but with love for me.” The Buddha said so in order to soften his mind.

For a second time Meghiya made the request: “Exalted Buddha, as you have accomplished the sixteenfold task of the path, you have nothing else to accomplish, nor have you to develop what has been accomplished. As for me, exalted Buddha, I have yet to accomplish the sixteenfold task of the path completely. Also, I have yet to develop further what has been accomplished. If the exalted Buddha gives me permission, I would like to go to the Mango Grove to meditate there.” For the second time also the Buddha rejected Meghiya’s request, saying as before: “Wait, dear Meghiya! At the moment I am alone, wait till someone else comes!”

For the third time Meghiya made the request. This time the Buddha did not bar him but said: “Dear Meghiya, how can we Buddhas prevent somebody who is asking for meditation? Dear Meghiya, do as you think fit.” Then Ven. Meghiya rose from his seat, made obeisance to the Buddha and went to the Mango Grove. Having entered the grove, he sat at the foot of a tree to spend the day.

The stone slab at the foot of the tree where Meghiya was then sitting was the same one he had used as a seat, happily surrounded by various dancers, when he was a ruler in his 500 successive existences in the past.

The moment he sat, it appeared as though his monkhood had slipped away. He felt, as in a dream, that he had assumed kingship, being accompanied by dancers and sitting under a white umbrella and on the throne worthy of noble personages.

Then with his attachment to royal luxuries, there gradually arose in him unwholesome thoughts of sensuality (kāma-vitakka) connected with sensual objects (vatthu-kāma). At that moment, he saw as in a dream two thieves who had been caught red-handed were brought and placed before him. Thoughts of ill-will (vyāpāda-vitakka) gradually occurred to him as he had to pass a sentence to execute one of the thieves. Thoughts of violence (vihimsā-vitakka) gradually took place in him as he had to pass a sentence to imprison the other one.

In this way the three kinds of unwholesome thoughts: sensual thoughts, thoughts of ill-will and violent thoughts, besieged Meghiya, giving him no chance to escape, as a tree overwhelmingly entangled by creepers or as a honey-gathering man is overpowered when stung by bees.

Then Ven. Meghiya reflected: “Oh, how strange it is! Oh, how unusual it is! We are the ones who have renounced the world and joined the Saṅgha through faith (saddhā), yet we are overcome by the three wicked, unwholesome thoughts of sensuality, ill-will and violence!”

As Ven. Meghiya was seized by the three unwholesome thoughts from all sides, he was not able to do what was proper to meditation: “Certainly, it was only after foreseeing this that the farsighted Fortunate One had prohibited me,” he thought, and thinking further: “I must report this to the master,” he rose from his seat and went to the Cālika Hill where the Buddha was. Having paid his respect, he sat at a proper place and related what had happened to him: “Exalted Buddha, these three wicked, unwholesome thoughts of sensuality, [752] ill-will, and violence repeatedly arose in me as I was staying in that Mango Grove. As these thoughts repeatedly arose in me I reflected: “Oh, how strange it is! Oh, how unusual it is! We are the ones who have renounced the world and joined the Saṅgha through faith (saddhā), yet we are overcome by the three wicked, unwholesome thoughts of sensuality, ill-will and violence!”

Herein it may be asked: “Why did the Buddha permit Ven. Meghiya to go to the Mango Grove?” Because the Buddha knew Meghiya would go there even without his permission, leaving him alone anyway. If he were prevented, he would think wrongly and misunderstand, saying to himself: “The Buddha does not permit me because he desires just one thing, which is my service.” The Buddha was also aware thus: “If Meghiya had this misunderstanding, it would have been a loss and long suffering to him,” hence the Buddha gave permission.

When Ven. Meghiya had finished relating what had happened to him, he sat down, and while he was sitting down, the Buddha, being desirous of giving him an appropriate Dhamma talk, uttered the following: “Meghiya, there are five factors that would lead the mind’s liberation from defilements to maturity,” and so on.

Dear Meghiya, the following five factors help make immature mental liberation mature. These five are:

1. Association with good friends.
2. Having morality.
3. Listening to and reflection on the ten kinds of speech.

Speech connected with less desire; speech connected with contentment; speech connected with quietude; speech connected with aloofness; speech connected with energy; speech connected with morality; speech connected with concentration; speech connected with wisdom; speech connected with the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna; and speech connected with reflective knowledge.

4. Having developed energy.
5. Having wisdom as to the arising and falling nature of things.

32a: The 13th Rains Retreat (Meghiya) – 1054

Only when one is associated with a good friend, which forms the first factor, can one acquire the remaining four.

Dear Meghiya, having established himself in the said five factors, an earnest practising (yogāvacara) monastic must go to the next stage, which is developing four things: He must develop notions of the loathsomeness of things (asubha) to eradicate lust (rāga); he must develop mindfulness of breathing in and out (ānāpānassati) to eradicate distracting thoughts (vitakka); and he must develop the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) to eradicate egoistic conceit (māna). True, Meghiya, to the one who perceives impermanence, perception of non-self (anatta-saññā) manifests, the one who perceives non-self can shed his egoistic conceit and realize Nibbāna even in the present life.”

Knowing this the Buddha breathed forth the following two verses of exalted utterances (Udāna 4.1): [753]

*Khuddā vitakkā sukhumā vitakkā, anuggatā manaso uppilāvā,
ete avidvā manaso vitakke, hurāhuram̐ dhāvati bhanta-citto.*

Inferior thoughts and subtle thoughts follow the mind and make it frisky. He who does not understand these thoughts is not stable mentally and runs from one sense object to another.

*Ete ca vidvā manaso vitakke, ātāpiyo saṁvaratī satīmā,
anuggate manaso uppilāve, asesam-ete pajahāsi Buddho.*

Understanding these thoughts, the noble disciple (suta-buddhā), endowed with energy that can burn up mental defilements and who has mindfulness, is able to block the thoughts that follow the mind and make it frisky. The noble disciple, who understands the four truths, is able to abandon the thoughts of sensuality and others, completely.

To Ven. Meghiya, who had returned to the Buddha as he was entangled by the three wicked and unwholesome thoughts and could not meditate in that Mango Grove, the Buddha said: “You have done something seriously wrong, for you left me alone although I begged you saying: ‘Wait, dear Meghiya! At the moment I am alone; wait till someone else comes!’ A monastic should not yield to the desire of the mind. The mind is light and quick. One should try only to keep it under one's control.”

Then the Buddha uttered the following two verses (Dhp 33-34):

Phandanam capalam cittam, durakkham dunnivarayam, ujum karoti medhavi, usu-karo va tejanam.

Dear Meghiya, just as a proud, brave fletcher makes the curved arrow straight to his satisfaction by scorching it, even so a man with penetrative knowledge can make his mind upright by scorching it by means of energy, both physical and mental. The mind which is excitable by the six sense objects, such as form (rūpa), sound (sadda), etc., which is not stable but fickle in a single sense object, which cannot be fixed in a proper sense object and is thus difficult to control, can hardly be prevented from wandering about the improper sense objects.

*Varijo va thale khitto, okamokata-ubbhato,

Dear Meghiya, just as the fish born in water, when taken out of its watery abode and thrown on land, restlessly jumps about, even so the mind in pursuit of the enjoyment of the five sense objects, when taken out from the vast watery expanse of sensual pleasure and kept on the land of insight meditation (vipassanā) in order to abandon the evil defilements within oneself in the manner of abandoning by cutting off (samuccheda-pahāna), restlessly hops about almost to death as it is away from the five water-like sense objects and heated by the four kinds of energy in the form of strenuous [754] meditation.

At the end of these Dhamma-verses, Ven. Meghiya was established in the fruition of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti). Many other people also became Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna) or noble ones.

32b: The 14th Rains Retreat (Rāhula)

After observing the thirteenth Rains Retreat (Vassa) at the big monastery on Cālika Hill, near Cālika Town and teaching worthy beings by means of the Dhamma talks, such as the Discourse to Meghiya (Meghiya-sutta, Ud 4.1) etc., as has been mentioned above and after remaining there for the post Rains Retreat period for as long as there existed beings to be enlightened, the Buddha set out from there, administering the cool water of elixir to humans, Devas and Brahmas. Eventually, he arrived in Sāvattihī and stayed at the Jetavana monastery to observe the fourteenth Rains Retreat.

Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Mahā Moggallāna

At that time, Ven. Sāriputta went with his follower monks to a certain big monastery in the district and spent the rainy season. The people of the district visited Ven. Sāriputta and promised to give him a large number of robes for the Rains Retreat (Vassa).

Having performed the Invitation (Pavāraṇā) ceremony at the end of the Rains Retreat, Ven. Sāriputta, being desirous of visiting the Buddha even before the Rains Retreat robes were offered, said to the monks: “Friends, when the lay devotees bring Rains Retreat robes for the young monks and novices, accept them and send them to me. Or store them well and give the message to me.” Having said thus, Ven. Sāriputta set out to visit the Buddha.

When he arrived in Sāvattihī, many monks whispered among themselves, saying: “Friends, still Ven. Sāriputta appears to have greed? That was why he came to the Fortunate One only after saying to the monks, who remain there: ‘When the lay devotees bring Rains Retreat robes for the young monks and novices, accept them and send them to me. Or store them well and give the message to me.’”

When the Buddha came to the assembly of monks, he asked: “Monks, what are you talking about?” When the monks replied that they were talking about such and such a matter, the Buddha said: “Monks, in my eldest son, Sāriputta, there is not the slightest amount of greed. Indeed, he left word with his disciples because he thought to himself thus: ‘Let the meritorious deeds of the devotees not decrease! Let the righteous acquisition of robes for the young monks and novices not decrease!’” Thereafter he uttered the following verse (Dhp 420):

*Āsā yassa na vijjanti, asmim̐ loke paramhi ca,
nirāsāsam̐ visam̐yuttam̐, tam-aham̐ brūmi brāhmaṇam̐.*

O my dear sons, my dear monks! In the mental continuum of an Arahāt, whose pollutants (āsava) are gone, craving that clings to things does not exist, not even the minutest part of it, in the present world as well as in the next, as it has been broken and uprooted through the fourfold path-knowledge in the manner of abandoning by cutting off (samuccheda-pahāna). The Arahāt, whose pollutants (āsava) are gone, who is totally emancipated from the 108fold craving and who is dissociated from every kind of mental defilement, him naturally do I declare a true Brahmin!

By the end of the Dhamma talk, a large multitude of people attained the fruition of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti) and so on.

As Ven. Sāriputta was misunderstood by the monks who said that Ven. Sāriputta seemed to have greed, so was Ven. Moggallāna once misunderstood too. His incident was somewhat similar to that of Ven. Sāriputta. What was different in the case of Ven. Moggallāna was, after asserting that there was no greed in him, the Buddha [755] gave another verse as follows (Dhp 411):

Yassālayā na vijjanti, aññāya akatham̐kathī, amatogadham-anuppattam̐, tam-aham̐ brūmi brāhmaṇam̐.

O my dear sons, my dear monks! In the mental continuum of an Arahāt whose pollutants (āsava) are gone, craving that clings to things does not exist, not even the slightest part of it, as it has been broken and uprooted through the fourfold knowledge in the manner of abandoning by cutting off (samuccheda-pahāna). Having analytically understood the Three Treasures, the triple training and the dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) wheel in their true nature, he is free from doubt. The Arahāt whose pollutants (āsava) are gone, who has plunged wisely into the deathless Nibbāna and became an Arahāt straight away, him naturally do I declare a true Brahmin.

By the end of this Dhamma talk a large multitude of people attained the fruition of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti) and so on.

Rāhula Attains Awakening

The Buddha was still staying at Jetavana, Sāvattthī, observing the fourteenth Rains Retreat (Vassa) in that city. At that time, Rāhula had completed 20 years of age and had become a newly ordained monk, and had not completed a Rains Retreat as a monastic.

One day, at daybreak, when the Buddha surveyed the world of beings, a thought arose in him: “The fifteen maturities of freedom (vimutti-paripācanīya-dhamma) have now ripened in Rāhula. What if I were to exhort and guide him so that he would take a step further towards the attainment of the paths and fruitions of Awakening!” Herein, the fifteen factors leading to Awakening are:

Three factors with reference to faith (saddhā):

1. Dissociation from faithless persons.
2. Association with faithful persons.
3. Reflection on discourses causing faith.

Three factors with reference to energy (virīya):

4. Dissociation from lazy persons.
5. Association with energetic persons.
6. Reflection on discourses causing energy.

Three factors with reference to mindfulness (sati):

7. Dissociation from unmindful persons.
8. Association with mindful persons.
9. Reflection on discourses causing mindfulness.

Three factors with reference to concentration (samādhi):

10. Dissociation from persons of unconcentrated mind.
11. Association with persons of concentrated mind.
12. Reflection on discourses causing absorption (jhāna) and emancipation (vimokkha).

Three factors with reference to wisdom (paññā):

13. Dissociation from unwise persons.
14. Association with wise persons.
15. Reflection on on the profound wisdom discourses.

Besides, the five faculties (indriya): faith (saddhā), energy (virīya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā); the five perceptions of weariness (nibbedha-bhāgiya-saññā): the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā), suffering (dukkha-saññā), non-self (anatta-saññā), abandoning (pahāna-saññā) and freedom from lust (virāga-saññā); the five factors as contained in the Discourse to Meghiya<sup>224</sup> (Ud 4.1): association with good friends, having morality, listening to and reflection on the ten kinds of speech, having [756] developed energy, and having wisdom as to the arising and falling nature of things (udayabbaya-saññā); these also make the fifteen factors of emancipation (vimutti).

Having conceived this idea the Buddha entered Sāvattihī city in the morning for alms and after finishing his meal, he departed from the alms resort and said to Rāhula: “Bring a mat to sit on, Rāhula, and let us go to the Andhavana grove to spend the day there.” – “Very well, exalted Buddha,” he answered and followed the Buddha closely carrying the mat.

At that time, several thousands of Devas and Brahmas who had resolved to have certain spiritual attainments together with Pālita, the Nāga King, who was to become Rāhula, in the presence of the Buddha Padumuttara 100,000 aeons ago, also followed the Buddha in close succession with the belief that the Fortunate One would exhort and teach Rāhula so that he would take a step further towards the attainment of the paths and fruitions of Awakening.

Herein, these several thousands of Devas and Brahmas, who had resolved spiritually 100,000 aeons ago and had been waiting, asked among themselves: “When will the Fortunate One’s exhortation and guidance take place so that Rāhula would become an Arahat as a further step?” When the Buddha thought of exhorting and guiding Rāhula, as his faculties, such as faith, energy, etc., had finally grown, these several thousands of celestial beings, who had been longing all the time for that opportune moment of the Buddha’s thinking, for they had shared the desire for spiritual growth, assembled in the Andhavana grove knowing that conditions were thus becoming favourable to them as well.

Yasorata and the Andhavana Grove

Herein a short account of the Andhavana Grove near Sāvattthī city will be reproduced from the exposition on the Discourse about the Anthill (Vammika-sutta, MN 23).

The grove was widely known as Andhavana in the time of two Buddhas, that is Buddha Kassapa and our Buddha Gotama. Explanation: The body relics of the Buddhas who are of short span of life do not become one mass. In accordance with their resolution, they disintegrate. Therefore, our Buddha, who was of short lifespan, considered thus: “I shall not exist long. As my lifespan is short, only a small number of beings will be able to see me. There are far more beings who have no chance to do so. They will carry my relics to different places to worship and attain celestial abodes.” Consequently, he resolved immediately before his Parinibbāna: “May my bodily relics disintegrate!” hence, the breaking up of the relics of our Buddha.

The bodily relics of the long-lived Buddhas, however, remain as a mass like solid gold. As Buddha Kassapa, who appeared at a time when the people’s lifespan was 20,000 years, was long lived, his relics remained, taking a solid form. Then the people discussed among themselves: “The relic remains in a solid form. It cannot be broken up. What shall we do with it?” After discussion, they agreed on constructing a solid shrine (cetiya), which was the one and only monument. They decided unanimously that its size should be one league in height as well as in circumference. When they discussed the bricks and cement, they made decisions to lay bricks of gold, each costing 100,000 on the outer side, while bricks of gold, each costing 50,000, on the inner side. For cement, realgar and orpiment powder and oil for liquid were used. There were to be four gates, of which one was the King’s undertaking, another, for Prince Paṭhavindhara’s, still another, the undertaking of the officials led by the general and the final one being that of the people led by the chief merchant.

Of these four groups, the first three were men of wealth; so they took their own gold and started their work at their respective gates. But there was delay in the work assigned to the last group as its members did not have sufficient wealth. Then a lay devotee who was well-versed in the Three Baskets (Tipiṭaka) and who was a Non-returner (Anāgāmi), named Yasorata, understanding the reason for the delay, prepared 500 carts and [757] went round the country, crying out to the citizens and urging them to participate in the act of merit: “People, countrymen! Buddha Kassapa has now attained Parinibbāna after existing like a great golden mountain for 20,000 years. A great jewelled shrine, one league in measurement, to house the only bodily relic of that Buddha, is under construction. Please contribute whatever you can afford, whether gold, silver, gems of the seven kinds, realgar or orpiment.”

The people generously gave gold, silver and other materials as much as they could. Those, who could not afford, participated in the act of merit by giving rice, oil and the like. The Non-returner (Anāgāmi) lay devotee, Yasorata, had rice, oil, pulses, etc., sent as provisions for the workers. He bought gold with the remaining things on the barter system and had it sent. In this way, roaming all over Jambudīpa, he received donations and handed them over for the work.

When construction was finished, the executive elders from the work site of the shrine gave a letter to him saying: “The construction of the shrine has been finished. Please, master, come and pay homage to it!” Yasorata had also sent a letter with the message reading: “I have urged and made the whole of Jambudīpa take part in this meritorious act. Try to complete the shrine by using whatever is available.” The two letters crossed midway. But the letter from the worksite reached him earlier.

Having read the letter, Yasorata thought: “I should pay homage to the shrine,” and set out alone. On the way, 500 robbers were terrorizing travelers in a forest grove. Some of them saw the devotee and told the others: “This elderly man had collected gold and silver from the entire Jambudīpa. Pots of gold are rolling on and on,” and they seized him.

Then Yasorata asked: “Young, men, why did you seize me?” The robbers replied: “You have collected all the gold and silver from the entire Jambudīpa. You must give us a little each out of that gold and silver.”

“Do you know, young men, that Buddha Kassapa has attained Parinibbāna? A great shrine of one league in size for enshrining the body relic of that Buddha is being built. For that great edifice, I have tried to get the people involved in this act of merit, it is not for me. And whatever I received, I send to the work site from the place of donation. I have nothing, not a single thing that is worthy, other than the clothes on my body.” Then some robbers said: “What the gentleman told us is true. So let us set him free.” But others asserted: “This man is honoured by the king as well as by the ministers. On seeing any of us in a street at town-centre, he would disclose the matter to them and bring misfortune to us,” thus they spoke, representing those who did not want to free him.

Yasorata, the Non-returner (Anāgāmī) lay devotee, assured them saying: “Young men, I will not create trouble for you.” He said so out of compassion for the robbers, but not because he had attachment for his life. Then a dispute arose among the robbers, one group willing to continue his detention and the other willing to let him go. Finally, the former group won more votes and Yasorata was slain.

At that very moment, as they committed a grave crime to the extent of slaying a highly virtuous man, a Non-returner (Anāgāmī), the eyes of the robbers suddenly went blind, as the flame of an oil lamp is extinguished. The 500 robbers moved about touching this and that with their hands and each of them wailing: “Where are my eyes?” Some who had relatives were taken by their relatives to their respective homes. Others who had no kinsfolk had to live there miserably in leaf-roofed huts under the trees in the forest.

People, who came to the forest, took pity on the blind robbers and gave rice, meal packets and other kinds of food to them, as much as they could. Those who went there for gathering vegetables were asked on their return: “Friends, where have you been?” and they answered: “We have been to the Forest of the Blind (Andhavana).” [758]

In this way, the forest came to be known, far and wide, as Andhavana during the Dispensations of the two Buddhas. What was peculiar about it was its location near a deserted district during the Buddha Kassapa’s ministry. During the ministry of our Buddha, however, it stood at the back of the Jetavana monastery, near the city of Sāvattthī, like a meditation centre where clansmen, wanting the calm of the five sense objects stay.

The Short Discourse Giving Advice to Rāhula

[What follows is based on the Short Discourse Giving Advice to Rāhula (Cūḷa-rāhulovāda-sutta, MN 147).]

The Buddha then entered the Andhavana and sat on the seat prepared under a certain tree nearby Ven. Rāhula, who, having done obeisance respectfully to the Buddha, took a seat. To Rāhula, who had thus taken his seat, the Buddha gave the following Dhamma talk.

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, what do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is the sensitive matter called eye, permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Is the impermanent sensitive matter called eye unsatisfactory or satisfactory?”

Rāhula: “Unsatisfactory, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Should the impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable sensitive matter called eye be taken falsely through craving as mine (etaṃ mama), through conceit as I (esohāṃ asmi), and through wrong view as my self (eso me attā)?”

Rāhula: “No, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, what do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is this or that form called object, permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Is this impermanent form called object unsatisfactory or satisfactory?”

Rāhula: “Unsatisfactory, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Should this or that impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable form called object be taken falsely through craving as mine, through conceit as I, and through wrong view as my self?”

Rāhula: “No, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, what do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is eye consciousness (cakkhu-viññāṇa) the element of seeing, permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Is the impermanent eye-consciousness unsatisfactory or satisfactory?”

Rāhula: “Unsatisfactory, venerable sir.”

32b: The 14th Rains Retreat (Rāhula) – 1064

Buddha: “Should the impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable eye-consciousness be taken falsely through craving as mine, through conceit as I, and through wrong view as my self?”

Rāhula: “No, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, what do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is eye-contact (cakkhu-samphassa), permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Is the impermanent eye-contact unsatisfactory or satisfactory?”

Rāhula: “Unsatisfactory, venerable sir.” [759]

Buddha: “Should the impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable eye-contact be taken falsely through craving as mine, through conceit as I, and through wrong view as my self?”

Rāhula: “No, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, what do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Are the four mental aggregates of feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), volitions (saṅkhāra) and particular consciousness (viññāṇa), depending on the contact of the eye, permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Should the four impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable mental elements be taken falsely through craving as mine, through conceit as I, and through wrong view as my self?”

Rāhula: “No, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, what do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is the sensitive matter called ear permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, venerable sir.” etc.

This is the teaching on the five items concerning the ear (sota-pañcaka).

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, what do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is the sensitive matter called nose permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, venerable sir.” etc.

This is the teaching on the five items concerning the nose (ghāna-pañcaka).

32b: The 14th Rains Retreat (Rāhula) – 1065

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, what do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is the sensitive matter called tongue permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, venerable sir.” etc.

This is the teaching on the five items concerning the tongue (jivhā-pañcaka).

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, what do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is the sensitive matter called body permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, venerable sir.” etc.

This is the teaching on the five items concerning the body (kāya-pañcaka).

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, what do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is the sensitive matter called mind permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Is the impermanent sensitive element called mind unsatisfactory or satisfactory?”

Rāhula: “Unsatisfactory, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Should the impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable sensitive element called mind be taken falsely through craving as mine, through conceit as I, and through wrong view as my self?”

Rāhula: “No, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, what do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is mind and matter called ideation (dhammārammaṇa) permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Is the impermanent mind and matter called ideation unsatisfactory or satisfactory?”

Rāhula: “Unsatisfactory, venerable sir.” [760]

Buddha: “Should the impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable mind and matter called ideation be taken falsely through craving as mine, through conceit as I, and through wrong view as my self?”

Rāhula: “No, venerable sir.”

32b: The 14th Rains Retreat (Rāhula) – 1066

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, what do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is mind-consciousness (māno-vinnāna) permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Is the impermanent mind consciousness unsatisfactory or satisfactory?”

Rāhula: “Unsatisfactory, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Should the impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable mind consciousness be taken falsely through craving as mine, through conceit as I, and through wrong view as my self?”

Rāhula: “No, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, what do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is mind contact (mano-samphassa) permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Is the impermanent mind contact unsatisfactory or satisfactory?”

Rāhula: “Unsatisfactory, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Should the impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable mind-contact be taken falsely through craving as mine, through conceit as I, and through wrong view as my self?”

Rāhula: “No, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, what do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Are the four mental aggregates, such as sensation (vedanā), perception (saññā), volitions (saṅkhārā) and consciousness (viññāṇa), arising from mind-contact (mano-samphassa), permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Are the four impermanent mental aggregates unsatisfactory or satisfactory?”

Rāhula: “Unsatisfactory, venerable sir.”

Buddha: “Should the four impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable mental aggregates be taken falsely through craving as mine, through conceit as I, and through wrong view as my self?”

32b: The 14th Rains Retreat (Rāhula) – 1067

This is the teaching on the five items concerning the mind (mano-pañcaka).

Such a discourse delivered by asking three times so that the three points of impermanence, suffering and non-self might become clear is called a Dhamma teaching turned three times (teparivaṭṭa-dhamma-desanā.)”

“My dear son, Rāhula, when a knowledgeable disciple of mine views thus, he becomes weary of the sensitive matter called eye, he becomes weary of various forms and objects of seeing, he becomes weary of eye-consciousness, he becomes weary of eye-contact, he becomes weary of the four mental aggregates: sensation, perception, volitions and consciousness arising from eye-contact.

He becomes weary of the sensitive matter called ear; he becomes weary of various sounds and objects of hearing ...

He becomes weary of the sensitive matter called nose; he becomes weary of various odours and objects of smelling ...

He becomes weary of the sensitive matter called tongue; he becomes weary of various tastes and objects of savouring ...

He becomes weary of the sensitive matter called body he becomes weary of various contacts and [761] objects of touching ...

He becomes weary of the sensitive element called mind; he becomes weary of the objects of ideation. He becomes weary of cognition; he becomes weary of mind-contact; he becomes weary of the four mental aggregates: sensation, perception, volitions and consciousness arising from mind-contact. On becoming weary he is free from attachment, on being free from attachment, he is liberated from mental defilements; on being liberated from the mental defilements, he knows by reflection that he is liberated from the mental defilements.

He gains knowledge through successive reflections thus: Rebirth for me is over. The noble practice has been finished. The task for the path has been carried out. There is nothing more to be done for the path.”

When the Buddha has delivered this Short Discourse giving Advice to Rāhula, Ven. Rāhula became established in Awakening. Among thousands of Devas and Brahmas, some become Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna), some Once-returners (Sakadāgāmi), and the rest Non-returners (Anāgāmi) and some Arahats according to their perfections (pāramī).

Māra's Threat to Ven. Rāhula

(Dhammapada, Dh 351-352.)]

One day, when night fell, a large number of venerables went into the Jetavana monastery, visited Ven. Rāhula's place and took their seats. As Ven. Rāhula was a junior monk, he could not prevent senior venerables from taking his seat, so he then looked for another place and, finding none, had to lie down at the entrance to the fragrant chamber of the Buddha. At that time, the young Rāhula had just become an Arahant but he had not completed a Rains Retreat (Vassa) yet as a monastic.

From the celestial abode of Vasavatti, his residence, Māra saw Ven. Rāhula lying at the entrance of the Fragrant Chamber and conceived an idea: "The monk, Gotama's small finger, Rāhula, who will suffer when hurt, is sleeping outside the fragrant chamber. The monk Gotama himself is sleeping inside. If I hurt the small finger, it would mean that I hurt the monk Gotama as well."

So he assumed the appearance of a huge elephant, approached Ven. Rāhula and embraced Ven. Rāhula's head with his trunk; moreover he made a heron-like sound at a high pitch. Even while sitting in the Fragrant Chamber, the Buddha knew it was Māra and said: "Hey Māra, even 100,000 Māras, let alone you, are incapable of frightening my son Rāhula. In fact, my son has no fear at all. He is free from craving, very energetic and highly intelligent."

In order to stamp his word with the seal of Dhamma, the Buddha uttered the following two verses (Dhp 351-2):

*Ñiṭṭhaṅgato asantāsī, vīta-taṅho anaṅgaṇo;
acchindi bhava-sallāni, antimoyam samussayo.*

Hey Māra, disturbing one! My son Rāhula is one who has realized the goal of the spiritual life (brahma-cariya-pariyosāna). He is absolutely free from fear, he is purified of the 108 kinds of craving; he is devoid of the 1,500 mental defilements; he has uprooted the thorns and spikes of all existences such as sensual (kāma), material (rūpa) and immaterial (arūpa) existences. The body of my son Rāhula in the present existence is his last body.

Vīta-taṅho anādāno, nirutti-pada-kovido, akkharānaṃ sannipātāṃ, [762] jaññā pubbāparāni ca, sa ve “antima-sārīro, mahā-pañño mahā-puriso” ti vuccati.

He who is purified of the 108 kinds of craving, has no attachment at all; he does not grasp the five aggregates of the body and the mind as “I,” “mine” and “my self,” he is clever in respect of the fourfold analytical knowledge of meaning, truth, wit and analysis; sees the combinations of letters known as natural speech (sabhāva-nirutti) as they really are; he clearly knows the preceding syllable from the following and the following syllable from the preceding.

If one knowing no natural speech says phusso wrongly with reference to the mental concomitant of phassa: he knows it is phasso, the correct word of the natural speech.

Of the three syllabic word cetanā, for instance, if the initial syllable alone is distinct, from it he correctly knows the indistinct middle and final ones: if the middle syllable alone is distinct, from it he correctly knows the indistinct initial and final in like manner; if the final syllable alone is distinct, from it he correctly knows the indistinct initial and middle in like manner. That person, having his final life, is indeed to be spoken of as a man of great wisdom, an extraordinary man free from the 1,500 moral defilements.

By the end of the discourse many attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) and so on. Aware of the fact that the Buddha came to know his identity, Māra disappeared from that very place.

The Discourse about the Yakkha Suciloma

The Discourse about the Yakkha Suciloma (Suciloma-sutta) is contained in the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta, Snp 2.5) and the Collection of the Thematic Discourses (Saṃyutta-nikāya, SN 10.3). Here the discourse will be retold according to the commentary.

One day when the Buddha emerged from the attainment of great compassion (mahā-karuṇā-samāpatti) immediately before dawn and surveyed the world of sentient beings with his Buddha-eye consisting in the knowledge of the inclinations and disposition of others (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa) and the knowledge of the thoughts and intentions of others (indriya-paro-pariyatti-ñāṇa), he saw the past deeds of merit belonging to the two Yakkha friends: Suciloma and

Kharaloma, which would bring about their attainment of Stream-entry. Hence, he took his bowl and robe and set out, even at dawn, and sat on the lithic couch called Ṭaṅkita at the mansion of Suciloma near the village of Gayā.

Ṭaṅkita lithic couch was a stone slab placed on four stones; it served as a seat.

At that time, the two Yakkha friends went out in search of food, wandering about the place somewhat near the Buddha. Of the two Yakkhas, one in his past life happened to have smeared his body with the oil belonging to the Saṅgha without seeking permission. For that unwholesome act, he suffered in hell and was reborn in a Yakkha family near the bank of the lake at Gayā. As a result of his wrong doing, his limbs were big and small and were frighteningly distorted. His skin was like a tiled roof with his skin resembling scales of a fish and terribly rough to touch. When he frightened others, his skin or scales became bloated. As he had a rough body surface, he was called Khara the Yakkha.

The other Yakkha was a supporting lay devotee during the lifetime of the Buddha Kassapa. He used to go to the monastery and listened to the discourse on every day a discourse was taught, which was eight days a month. One day, when the invitation for attendance to the discourse was being announced, he heard it from his farm where he was cleaning it. Without taking a bath lest it should take time, he entered the Observance (Uposatha) hall with his dirty body and lay on a very costly rug on [762] the ground, showing no care for it.

Because of this and other acts, he suffered in Niraya and became a member of a Yakkha family near the lake at Gayā. As a subsequent result of his bad deeds, he had a terribly ugly look. His body hair was sharp-pointed and pricking like needles. When he frightened other beings, he did so as though he were piercing them with needles. Because he had needle-like hair, he was given the name Suciloma.

Going out of their abode to look for food, the two Yakkha friends walked for some time and returned by the same way. While visiting another place, they happened to reach a place that was somewhere close to the Buddha. Then Kharaloma said to Suciloma what he honestly thought: “That man is a monk!” Suciloma replied: “That man is not a true monk; he is a false monk. I will investigate to find out for certain whether he is a true monk or not.”

Herein, on seeing the appearance of a monk, Kharaloma honestly said: “That man is a monk!” Suciloma was of opinion that: “If the man is fearful, he is not a true monk; he is a false monk,” and wrongly thinking that the Buddha would be frightened, he hastily said: “That man is not a true monk; he is a false monk.” Then he became desirous of making an investigation. Hence he added: “I will investigate to find out for certain whether he is a true monk or not.”

Thereafter Suciloma went up to the Buddha and bent his big ugly, bristling body towards the Buddha. The Buddha suddenly moved his body to the other side. This prompted Suciloma to ask: “Are you frightened by me, monk?” – “Dear Yakkha,” answered the Buddha, “I am not frightened by you. Your body contact is indeed rough and vile though!”

Seeing the Buddha without the slightest trace of fear, Suciloma thought: “Despite his experience of my body that was so rough, this man, though a real human, is not afraid. Now I shall present to him some problems worthy of an omniscient Buddha’s sphere of wisdom (Buddha-visaya). He will not be able to tackle them fully. Then I shall torment him in so many ways.” So he said rudely: “Monk, I shall ask you some questions. If you cannot give me a thorough answer, I shall drive you mad; or, I shall burst open your heart; or, I shall throw you to the other bank of the river by catching hold of your legs.”

Then the Buddha with his face gladdened by great compassion said: “Friend Yakkha, the celestial world with its Devas, Māras and Brahmas, and the terrestrial world with its ascetics, Brahmins and princes, in either of these two worlds, I see none who is able to make me mad, or to burst open my heart, or to throw me to the other bank of the river by catching hold of my legs. Be that as it may, friend Yakkha, ask me whatever questions you want. I shall answer your questions without leaving out anything.” When the Buddha invited the Yakkha’s questions the way an omniscient Buddha would, Suciloma put his question thus in verse (Snp 273):

*Rāgo ca doso ca kuto-nidānā, aratī ratī loma-haṁso kutojā,
kuto samuṭṭhāya mano-vitakkā, kumārakā dhāṅkam-ivossajanti.*

Monk! Where do lust and hate have their source? Displeasure in the wholesome things of a quiet forest monastery, pleasure in the five sense objects, and goose flesh (cittutrāsa-dhamma) the sign of a terrified mind, from what do these three kinds of emotion arise? As village children throw up a crow for fun after tying its feet with a rope, from where do the ninefold thoughts appear and overthrow wholesome consciousness?

Then the Buddha gave his answer and taught Suciloma Yakkha with the following verses (Snp 274-275):

*Rāgo ca doso ca ito-nidānā, aratī ratī loma-haṁso itojā, ito samuṭṭhāya mano-vitakkā, [764]
kumārakā dhaṅkam-ivossajanti.*

Dear Yakkha! Lust and hate have their source in this body. These three kinds of emotion: Displeasure in the wholesome things of a quiet forest monastery, pleasure in the five sense objects, and goose flesh arise from this body. As village children throw up a crow for fun after tying its feet with a rope, so the ninefold thoughts appear from this very body and overthrow wholesome consciousness.

Snehajā atta-sambhūtā, nigrodhasseva khandhajā, puṭhū visattā kāmesu, māluvā va vitatāvane.

Friend Yakkha! As shoots of a banyan tree appear on its trunk, so do lust, hate and the like caused by the sap of craving appear on this very body; just as creepers in the forest wrap up the tree that they cling around, so innumerable moral defilements attach themselves in a strange manner to the sense objects and pleasures.

Ye naṁ pajānanti yato-nidānaṁ, te naṁ vinodenti suṇohi Yakkha, te duttaraṁ ogham-imaṁ taranti, atiṇṇa-pubbaṁ apunabbhavāyā.

Listen, friend Yakkha! Certain persons know thoroughly that the physical frame, which is the embodiment of the five aggregates, and which forms the truth of suffering, has its source in craving and greed, which forms the truth of the cause of suffering; they drive away that craving and greed, the truth of the cause of suffering, by means of the truth of the eightfold path leading to the cessation of suffering. These noble ones, who have thus driven away craving and greed, the cause of suffering, cross over this fourfold torrential flood of moral defilements, the flood which is difficult to overcome, which has not been crossed over in their past existences in

32b: The 14th Rains Retreat (Rāhula) – 1073

Saṃsāra, not even in a dream, for the non-arising of rebirth, which is the truth of the cessation of suffering.

When the two Yakkha friends had heard these Dhamma verses, both of them attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) as the verses came to an end. As soon as the two friends become noble Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna), their original ugliness and bad looks disappeared. With a bright golden complexion and bedecked in Deva ornaments, they assumed an appearance that was pleasant to beholders. [765]

33a: The 15th Rains Retreat (Sakyans)

After staying in Sāvattḥī for the fourteenth Rains Retreat (Vassa), the Buddha remained in that city, after the end of the Rains Retreat, for as long as there were beings worthy of teaching. Thereafter, he set out to administer the medicinal Dhamma to all beings: humans, Devas and Brahmas, and he eventually arrived in the city of Kapilavatthu and observed, together with a host of monks, the 15th Rains Retreat at Nigrodhārāma, which was built and given to him on his first visit by the Sakyan Prince Nigrodha, and which had been named after him as Nigrodhārāma.

The Discourse to Mahānāma

[The following is retold from the Discourse to Mahānāma (Mahānāma-sutta, SN 55.37) and its commentary.]

While the Buddha was thus staying at Nigrodhārāma of Kapilavatthu in the Sakyan country, Prince Mahānāma paid a visit to him, did obeisance and sat down at a proper place. Then the prince asked the Buddha: “By doing what, exalted Buddha, does one become a lay devotee (upāsaka)?”

Buddha: “Mahānāma, taking refuge (saraṇa-gamana) in the Buddha; taking refuge in the Dhamma and taking refuge in the Saṅgha. By doing so, Mahānāma, one becomes a lay devotee.”

Prince: “By doing what, exalted Buddha, is a lay devotee endowed with morality (sīla)?”

Buddha: “Mahānāma, abstaining from taking life, abstaining from taking what is not given, abstaining from wrong sexual acts, abstaining from telling lies and abstaining from taking strong drink, a cause of unmindfulness. By doing so, Mahānāma, a lay devotee is endowed with morality.”

Prince: “By doing what, exalted Buddha, is a lay devotee endowed with faith (saddhā)?”

Buddha: “In this Dispensation, Mahānāma, a lay devotee believes that the Buddha is an Arahāt because he is worthy of extraordinary homage, that he is a Fortunate One because he has great glory in the sense of Awakening. By believing so, Mahānāma, a lay devotee is endowed with faith.”

33a: The 15th Rains Retreat (Sakyans) – 1075

Herein, he is talking about the nine attributes of the Buddha in an elliptical way (upalakkhaṇa-naya) of teaching, a lay devotee who believes in the nine attributes of the Buddha also believes in the six attributes of the Dhamma and in the nine attributes of the Saṅgha. Therefore, it means to say that a lay devotee who is convinced of the attributes or the Three Treasures is endowed with faith.

Prince: “By doing what, Exalted Buddha, is a lay devotee endowed with charity (cāga)?”

Buddha: “In this Dispensation, Mahānāma, a lay devotee abides at home with his mind freed from the impurity of stinginess (macchera), he gives away with full detachment; he washes his hand to give with while his hand is wet; he takes delight in giving; he is pleasing to alms seekers as he shuns wearing a grim face; he delights in offering and distributing things. By doing so, Mahānāma, a lay devotee is endowed with generosity.” [766]

Prince: “By what, Exalted Buddha, is a lay devotee endowed with wisdom (paññā)?”

Buddha: “In this Dispensation, Mahānāma, a lay devotee is wise; he has wisdom which is pure and noble, which destroys moral defilement, which leads to Nibbāna, the end of suffering, and which helps him understand the rise and fall (udayabbaya-ñāṇa) of mind and matter. All this makes him endowed with wisdom.”

More details about Mahānāma, the Sakyan Prince, will be given in chapter 45a.5.

Prince Suppabuddha

[The following is based on the Dhamma Verses (Dhammpada, Dh 128) and its commentary.]

While staying at Nigrodhārāma, Kapilavatthu, in the country of Sakka, the Buddha spoke a verse beginning with: “Monks, he who stands in the air cannot escape from death ...” (Dhp 128) in connection with his uncle and father-in-law Suppabuddha, a Sakyan Prince.

Elaboration: the Buddha’s uncle, Prince Suppabuddha, bore a grudge against the Buddha for two reasons. He thought: “This nephew and son-in-law of mine, Prince Siddhattha, Buddha Gotama, has abandoned my daughter Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī and renounced the world. And having ordained my son Devadatta into the monkhood he treats him as an enemy.” One day, thinking: “I should not give him a chance to have his meal,” he blocked the Buddha’s way, by standing in the middle of the road and preventing him from passing.

At that time, when the Buddha came in a company of monks to that place, the prince’s men informed him of the Buddha’s visit. “Men,” said the prince bitterly, “tell Prince Siddhattha, my nephew, to take another road. He is not older than I am. Therefore I cannot make way for him.” Despite his men’s repeated plea, the prince said the same thing and kept on standing in the road and drinking.

Failing to get permission from his uncle, the Buddha turned back from that place. Suppabuddha then sent a spy with these words: “Go, man, take note of what my nephew has to say, and come back.”

While turning back, the Buddha smiled and Ven. Ānanda asked him about the reason for his smile. “Dear Ānanda,” the Buddha asked in return, “Did you see my uncle Suppabuddha?” – “Yes, exalted Buddha,” replied Ven. Ānanda. The Buddha then foretold the following: “Dear Ānanda, my uncle Suppabuddha, who refused to make way for me, has made a very serious mistake. Seven days from now, he will be swallowed up by the earth at the bottom of the stairs leading down from the upper terrace.”

Having overheard these words, the spy went back to Suppabuddha who asked: “What did my nephew, who has turned back, say?” The man told him of all he had heard. The prince then conceived an idea: “What my nephew has said cannot go wrong. Whatever he says comes true. Despite this I will accuse him of falsehood now. He said that I would be swallowed up by the earth on the seventh day. He said it without mentioning the place, but he did say I was to be swallowed by the earth at the foot of the stairs. From now on I will never go anywhere near the foot of the stairs. If I do not go there, I shall not be swallowed by the earth there! On not being swallowed at the end of seven days, I shall accuse my nephew, the Buddha, of false speech.”

After getting this idea, Prince Suppabuddha had his belongings taken up to the top of the residence and had the stairway removed and the doors locked; at each doorway he placed a couple of wrestlers, whom he ordered: “In case I try to descend absent-mindedly, you must prevent me.” So he remained in his cosy chamber on the seventh and top terrace of his residence.

33a: The 15th Rains Retreat (Sakyans) – 1077

Hearing of the matter, the Buddha said: “Monks, the word of a Buddha is never ambiguous, it is only of one meaning that is truthful no matter whether my uncle Prince Suppabuddha stays only on the terrace, or takes flight and remains in the sky, or comes down and abides in a boat in the ocean, or dwells inside a mountain. On the very spot I [767] have mentioned, at the foot of the stairs, he will be swallowed by the earth.” Being desirous of teaching by connecting the former speech with the latter, the Buddha uttered the following verse (Dhp 128):

Na antalikkhe na samudda-majjhe, na pabbatānaṃ vivaraṃ pavissa, na vijjatī so jagatippadeso, yatthaṭṭhitāṃ nappasaheyya maccu.

Monks, he who stands in the air cannot escape from death; nor can he who lies in the middle of the ocean; he who enters a hole or a cleft in a mountain and lives there still cannot escape from death; there is no space on the ground, not even that of a hair’s breath, that is not plagued by death.

By the end of this verse, innumerable persons attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) and so on.

On the seventh day, while the road leading to the palace where the Buddha would take his meal was being blocked, Suppabuddha’s state horse, which was kept under the mansion, got away from the ropes with which he was tied to a post, kicking the walls around and neighing forcefully. Nobody was able to control or capture him. While up on the terrace of the mansion, Suppabuddha heard the cries of his state horse and asked what it was all about. His servants then replied that the prince’s charger had broken loose.

As soon as he saw the prince, the state horse stood quietly. Suppabuddha could not help trying to catch the horse, he then rose from his seat and went up to the door which opened by itself. The stairway that had been removed previously stood at its original place. The wrestlers who were on guard caught hold of the prince by the neck and, instead of pushing him back into the mansion, threw him down the stairs. The doors on all seven floors opened up of their own accord. The stairways were reinstated by themselves. The guards on each floor threw him down successively by catching hold of him by the neck.

33a: The 15th Rains Retreat (Sakyans) – 1078

After that, when he got down to the foot of the stairs leading to the ground, the great earth opened, making a roaring sound, and received Suppabuddha, the Sakyan Prince. Having entered the earth, the prince fell into the Avīci hell.

33b: The 15th Year (Sakka)

While staying at Nigrodhārāma of Kapilavatthu and observing the fifteenth Rains Retreat (Vassa), the Buddha distributed the cool water of the Dhamma, the elixir of deathlessness, to worthy beings. When the 15th Rains Retreat came to an end, he set out from Kapilavatthu in accordance with a Buddha's practice and arrived eventually at Jetavana in the good city of Sāvattihī.

While he was staying there, the Buddha delivered a teaching beginning with: "The gift of Dhamma, which is the teaching and learning of Dhamma, excels all other gifts," (Dhp 354) upon being questioned by Sakka, the Lord of the Devas. The details are as follows:

Once the Devas of the Tāvātimsa celestial abode met and raised four questions:

1. What is the best of all gifts?
2. What is the best of all tastes?
3. What is the best of all delights?
4. Why should Awakening, the end of craving, be called the best?

Not a single Deva was able to answer these four questions. In fact, one Deva asked another, who, in turn, asked another, and so on. Asking like this among themselves, they roamed about the 10,000 world-element for twelve years without getting the answers.

Knowing nothing of the meaning of these questions, though twelve years had passed, the Devas residing in the 10,000 world-element assembled and went up to the Four Great Kings. When asked by the Four Great Kings as to why they had made a great assembly, the Devas said: "We came to you as we have four questions which we are unable to solve." – "What are the four questions, friends?" asked the Deva kings. "Out of the innumerable [768] gifts, tastes, and delights, which is the best gift, taste and delight? Why is Awakening, the end of craving, the best?" asked the Devas, "Finding no answers to these questions, we have come to you."

Then the Four Great Kings said: "We too do not know the meaning of these questions, friends. But our lord Sakka is capable of knowing promptly when he reflects on the significance of the questions that may be forwarded by 1,000 persons. Sakka is superior to us in intelligence, wisdom and glory. Come, we shall go to Sakka.” When the Four Great Kings took them to Sakka and when asked by him about such a great assemblage, the Devas explained the matter to him.

“Devas!” said Sakka: “The significance of these four questions cannot be known by anyone except the Buddha. In fact, these four questions are for a Buddha to solve. Where is the Buddha staying now?” Sakka added: “Come, we shall go to the exalted Buddha and ask him.” Together with all these Devas, Sakka illuminated the whole of Jetavana at night and approached the Buddha, did obeisance to him and stood at a proper place. When the Buddha enquired about their coming in such a great multitude, Sakka replied: “The Devas, Fortunate One, have these questions to ask. There is none other than you, venerable sir, who is able to answer them, who could know the true significance of the questions. Please explain the meaning clearly to us, exalted Buddha.”

“Very well, Sakka!” said the Buddha. “Having fulfilled the perfections and performed unflinchingly the fivefold generosity, I achieved omniscience just to eliminate the doubts of persons like you. The answers to your four questions are as follows:

1. Of all gifts, the gift of Dhamma is the best.
2. Of all tastes, the taste of Dhamma is the best.
3. Of all delights, the delight in Dhamma is the best.
4. Awakening, as the end of craving, is the best because of the cessation of all suffering.

Having spoken thus in prose the Buddha uttered the following verse (Dhp 354):

*Sabba-dānaṃ Dhamma-dānaṃ jināti, sabba-rasaṃ Dhamma-raso jināti;
sabba-ratiṃ Dhamma-rati jināti, taṇhakkhayo sabba-dukkhaṃ jināti.*

Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, the gift of Dhamma, which is the teaching and learning of Dhamma, excels all other gifts overwhelmingly. The taste of Dhamma, consisting in the 37 factors of Awakening and the nine supermundane attainments, excels all others overwhelmingly. The delight in Dhamma excels all other delights overwhelmingly. Awakening, at the end of craving, absolutely overcomes all suffering.

Explanation of the Meaning

Even if robes, as soft as layers of a banana trunk, were given to Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas and Arahats, who were seated up in the abode of Brahmas in a universe with no space between one another, a four line verse, which was delivered in that assembly in appreciation of the gift, is far superior. In fact, the value of such a gift of countless robes is not even a 256th part of the value of the Dhamma verse which was delivered in appreciation of the gift of robes; hence, the excellence of speaking, teaching and learning the Dhamma.

Even to those who put in efforts to organize and manage it so that the multitude might listen to the Dhamma, the benefit accrued is immense. To the gift of food in bowls, each and every one of them filled with a sumptuous meal; to the gift of medicine in bowls, each and every one of them filled with butter, oil and such like; to the gift of hundreds of thousands of dwellings like the Mahā Vihāra; to the gift of [769] hundreds of thousands of pinnacled mansions like the Lohapāsāda; even to the various gifts, including the Jetavana monastery given by Anāthapiṇḍika and others to Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas and Arahats who were seated and occupying the whole of the aforesaid universe with no space between one another; to all these gifts, the gift of the Dhamma taught in a four line verse, least of all in appreciation of a material gift, is far superior.

Why? Because those who perform the wholesome act of giving the aforesaid four requisites: Robes, food, dwellings and medicine, do so only after hearing the Dhamma, not otherwise. If they had not heard the Dhamma they would not have given even a ladleful of rice gruel or a spoonful of food. For this reason the gift of Dhamma excels all other gifts.

To make the facts more explicit: Leaving out Buddhas and Paccekabuddhas, even Ven. Sāriputta and other noble ones, who had intelligence that could help them count the rain drops when it rained heavily and endlessly for the whole lifespan (āyu-kappa), were unable to make such noble attainments as Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) and higher stages on their own, without hearing the Dhamma. In fact, it was after hearing the teaching of Ven. Assaji and others that they attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala); it was by listening to the Buddha's teaching of the Discourse concerning Dīghanakha (Dīgha-nakha-sutta, MN 74) and others, that they attained discipleship (sāvaka-pāramī-ñāṇa). For this reason, too, the gift of the Dhamma (Dhamma-dāna) is more admirable than the gift of requisites (paccaya-dāna). Hence the Buddha's saying: "The gift of the Dhamma excels all other gifts overwhelmingly."

All kinds of tastes including the taste of fruit, the taste of flowers, the taste of flavours, even that of the food of the Devas, are the cause of rebirth in Saṃsāra and of falling into suffering. The taste of the ninefold supermundane Dhamma together with the 37 factors of Awakening, are more praiseworthy than all mundane tastes. Hence the Buddha's saying: "The taste of Dhamma (Dhamma-rasa) excels all other tastes overwhelmingly."

All kinds of delights in earthly things, such as sons, daughters, riches, women, dancing, singing, music, etc., are the cause of rebirth in Saṃsāra and of falling into suffering. Joy (pīti) that arises in one, through one's attention paid to the Dhamma while speaking, teaching or hearing it, causes elation, even tears and gooseflesh. Such joy that can put an end to the suffering in Saṃsāra and bring about welfare to the extent of realization of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) is more praiseworthy than all kinds of delight in earthly things. Hence the Buddha's teaching: "The delight in Dhamma (Dhamma-rati) excels all other delights overwhelmingly."

All kinds of craving disappear the moment the Arahant path is attained. The Arahant path is immediately followed by its result which is the Arahant fruition. As the Arahant fruition arises at the end of craving, it is called the destruction of craving (taṇhakkhaya). As the Arahant fruition, the destruction of craving, overcomes all suffering, it is the Dhamma that is superior to and more praiseworthy than all other things. Hence the Buddha's saying: "The Arahant fruition, the end of craving, absolutely overcomes all suffering."

When the Buddha explained the verse in detail, 84,000 sentient beings realized the four truths and were converted. Having listened to the Buddha's elaborate teaching, Sakka did obeisance to him and made a request: "Exalted Buddha, although the gift of the Dhamma is so great and praiseworthy, why are we not allowed to share the merit of it? From now on, please make the Saṅgha give our share of merit from the gift of the Dhamma."

Having heard Sakka's request, the Buddha called a meeting of the Saṅgha and said: "From now on, monks, after giving a Dhamma-speech, be it a grand one, or an ordinary one, or one given to those who visit you, or at least one given in appreciation of some alms giving, share the merit, which accrue to you from the [770] Dhamma-speech, with all beings.”

33c: The 16th Rains Retreat (Āḷavaka)

King Āḷavaka, of the city of Āḷavī, was in the habit of pursuing pleasurable hunting in a deer forest once a week, leaving behind all his enjoyment at the palace together with the female courtiers and dancers. In order to ward off the dangers of rebels, foes and thieves, and to prevent his contemporary rulers from attacking him, he took up a sporting exercise to boost his kingly might.

One day, just before he set out for hunting, he had an agreement made with his military officers: “He, from whose charge a deer escapes, must be responsible for that deer,” and when they got to the forest a deer ran away from the king’s charge.

As he was quick and strong, the king, equipped with a bow, immediately followed the deer on foot for up to three leagues. Antelopes can run continuously only for three leagues. Therefore, when the king had covered that distance, he killed the deer that was lying exhausted in a pond, with an arrow. He cut up the animal into two pieces. Though he did not want its flesh, he carried it by means of a pole lest he should be ill-spoken of as one who was unable to catch the deer. On his way back he saw a shady banyan tree in new and old foliage at a place that was neither too near nor too far from the city; he approached the foot of the tree to take some rest.

Now, the Yakkha Āḷavaka had been granted a boon by Vessavaṇa, the Deva King, that whoever came into the vicinity of the banyan tree as far as its shadow fell at noon could be his food.

Herein, it should not be taken that those who came under the tree only at midday could be eaten by him. The fact was that those who came into the vicinity of the tree covered by the shadow of the tree at noon would be eaten, whether they came by day or by night.

When the Yakkha saw the king come under his banyan tree, he showed himself in person and wanted to eat the king. The king gave the two halves of the deer to the Yakkha as he wanted him to be set free. But the Yakkha did not do so, saying: “Since it came into my hand, is it not mine? How could you, Great King, seek your freedom by giving me the deer?”

Then the king made a promise to the Yakkha saying: “Set me free! I shall send you each day a man and a pot of cooked rice.” Still the Yakkha refused to release him, he said: “You might forget about it, being intoxicated with your kingly luxuries. As for me, I cannot eat those who do not come up to my residence, nor can I eat those who do not voluntarily give themselves up. How would I live if you were released?” Then the king satisfied the Yakkha by saying: “The day I fail to send you food, you may devour me.” He regained his freedom from the Yakkha’s hand and returned to the city of Āḷavā.

While waiting for the king at the make-shift shelter of branches that they had constructed midway, the officers saw the king coming back; they greeted the king and received him, saying: “Why did you try so hard to catch the deer, Great King, did you fear a loss of dignity?” Relating nothing of the incident, the king returned to the city and had his breakfast. Then he summoned the administrative minister of the city and secretly told him of the promise which he had given to the Yakkha.

“Have you agreed upon the time, Great King?” asked the minister. “No, I have not,” replied the king. “You have made a mistake, Great King,” said the minister. “Yakkhas are to have access only to things that are limited. As you have not put a limit, the whole district is in danger of disease. Be that as it may, Great King, though you have been wrong, do not worry, but enjoy your royal comfort, I shall do what is to be done in this matter.” The minister rose early and went to the prison and made an announcement to the criminals who had been sentenced to death, he said: “Those who wish to survive may come out.”

He took the convict that came out first and had him bathed and fed, he then sent him saying: “Take this pot of rice to the Yakkha!” As soon as the convict got into the shade of the banyan tree, the Yakkha assumed a very terrible frame and ate him as though he were biting [771] lotus stalks and stems.

Through the supernatural power of Yakkhas, a human body, including its hair, etc., turns into a lump of butter.

Those who escorted the convict and the food for the Yakkha saw Āḷavaka devouring the man, became frightened and told their intimate friends of the matter. From that time onwards the news that: “The king catches thieves and feeds them to the Yakkha,” spread and people abstained from stealing.

At a later time, as there were no new thieves and all the old ones were gone, the prisons became empty. Then the minister reported the matter to the king, who had his gold and silver dropped on all the main roads of the city, thinking that somebody might want to pick it up. But nobody touched it even with his foot lest they should be accused of theft.

When the King of Āḷavaka failed to get new recruits of thieves in this way, he discussed it with his ministers, who advised him, saying: “We shall make people send one aged person from each household in serial order. An aged person means one who by himself is about to enter the mouth of death.” But the king rejected the advice saying that people would then be terrorized with the thought: ‘The king has the heart to send my father to the Yakkha!’ or: ‘He is cruel enough to send my grandfather to the Yakkha!’ I do not prefer that plan.”

Then the ministers presented their alternate idea thus: “In that case Great King, make people send their children who are lying on their backs in their cradles, each day. Such children have no such affection as: ‘This is my mother,’ or: ‘This is my father.’” Upon this the king agreed and let him do so. The minister started executing the plan.

Mothers fled from the city with their children, and pregnant women fled too. After bringing up their children in another country, they brought back their young children to the city.

In this manner the daily feeding of the Yakkha took place for twelve long years. One day, when the royal servants roamed about the city looking for children, they found not a single child. So they reported to the king: “Leaving aside your son, Prince Āḷavaka, in the palace, there are no children in the city.” The king replied: “As I love my son, so do all these people love their respective sons. But in this world there is none more lovable than one’s own self. Go, men, save my life by giving my son to the Yakkha!”

At that time, the queen, the mother of Prince Āḷavaka, had her son bathed with scented water and adorned with ornaments. She was sitting with her son wrapped in soft white pieces of cloth and placed him at her bosom to let him sleep. Under the command of the king, the royal servants went there, and while the queen and 16,000 female attendants were crying, they took away the chief nurse and the prince, declaring that the little prince would become food for the Yakkha.

The Buddha’s Visit to Āḷavi

On that day the Buddha rose early in the morning and engaged in the attainment of great compassion (mahā-karuṇā-samāpatti) in the fragrant chamber inside the Jetavana monastery. And when he surveyed the world by his twofold Buddha eyes, consisting in the knowledge of the inclinations and disposition of others (āsayaṇusaya-ñāṇa) and the knowledge of the thoughts and intentions of others (indriya-paro-pariyatti-ñāṇa) he saw in his vision three significant things: The past merit of Prince Āḷavaka that would lead him to become a Non-returner (Anāgāmi-phala); the past merit of the Yakkha Āḷavaka that would lead him to Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala); and the past merit of 84,000 beings that would lead them to the realization of the eye of the Dhamma (Dhamma-cakkhu), the penetration of the four truths, at the end of his discourse.

Accordingly, at daybreak he performed his morning duties. Before he finished his afternoon undertakings, at sunset on that new moon day, he set out on foot alone and unaccompanied, taking his bowl and robes, on a journey of 30 leagues from Sāvattḥī, and entered the precinct of the Yakkha's residence.

Now where did the Buddha stay? Did he stay in the Yakkha's mansion that was invisible to [772] ordinary people and near the banyan tree? Or did he sit at the foot of the banyan tree? He took his seat in the Yakkha's mansion. Explanation: As Yakkhas saw their mansions, so did the Buddha see them. Therefore, he went up to the Yakkha's mansion and stood at its gate.

At that time, Āḷavaka was attending a meeting of Yakkhas in the Himavanta. The door keeper of Āḷavaka, the Yakkha by the name of Gadrabha (Donkey), approached the Buddha and paid his respects. And a dialogue took place between Gadrabha and Buddha:

Gadrabha: "Exalted Buddha, did you come only at sunset?"

Buddha: "Yes, Gadrabha, I came only at sunset. If it were not a burden to you, I would like to spend the night in Āḷavaka's mansion."

Gadrabha: "Exalted Buddha, it is not a burden to me. But that Yakkha Āḷavaka is violent. He does not show respect even to his parents. Therefore please do not prefer to stay there."

Buddha: "Gadrabha, I know of Āḷavaka's violence. There would not be a bit of harm to me. I want to stay for the night there in Āḷavaka's mansion, if you do not feel my stay burdensome."

Gadrabha: "Exalted Buddha, Āḷavaka is like an iron pan aglow with fire. He is absolutely ignorant of parents, monks, Brahmins and the Dhamma. Those who come to this place he drives them mad, or bursts open their hearts, or throws them beyond the ocean or beyond the universe by catching hold of their legs.”

Buddha: “Gadrabha, I know all about this. If it were not burdensome to you, I would like to stay in Āḷavaka’s mansion for the night.”

Gadrabha: “Exalted Buddha, it is not burdensome for me. But Āḷavaka might kill me if I were to give you permission without first informing him. Exalted Buddha, let me go to him therefore and tell him of the matter first.”

Buddha: “Gadrabha, tell him as you like.”

Gadrabha: “Exalted Buddha, please consider then whether you should stay here or not.”

Having said thus, Gadrabha paid his respects to the Buddha and departed to the Himavanta. Then the door of Āḷavaka’s mansion opened by itself, and the Buddha entered and took his seat on the divine, jewelled throne which Āḷavaka usually sat on, on important and auspicious days, enjoying divine luxuries. Being seated, the Buddha emanated golden-yellow (pīta) radiance.

Beholding the yellow radiance, Āḷavaka’s female attendants gathered, did obeisance to the Buddha and sat around him. The Buddha gave a miscellaneous Dhamma talk to them, saying: “Yakkhīs, as you have in the past given alms and observed morality and honoured those who deserved honour, you attained divine luxuries. Now also, do as you have done before. Abide not by jealousy (issā) and stinginess (macchhariya),” and so on. Having heard the sweet talk of the Dhamma, they gave 1,000 cheers and remained sitting and surrounding the Buddha.

Having arrived at the Himavanta, Gadrabha the Yakkha told Āḷavaka respectfully: “Āḷavaka, King of the Yakkhas, who knows no suffering! May I draw your attention to something, please be informed: The Buddha has come and is sitting in your mansion.” Then Āḷavaka made a gesture, meaning to say: “Be quiet! Shut up! I will go back immediately and do whatever is necessary.”

Herein Āḷavaka was so strong in wrong thinking that he took the Buddha’s stay in his mansion as a disgrace, and out of pride as a Yakkha, he hushed up the news, thinking: “Let nobody amidst this assembly of Yakkhas hear of it.”

33c: The 16th Rains Retreat (Āḷavaka) – 1089

Then the two noble Devas, Sātāgiri and Hemavata, agreed between themselves to go visit the Buddha at Jetavana before they went to attend the assembly of Devas. Riding different vehicles, they set off by air together with their hosts of retinue.

Routes existed nowhere in the space for the Yakkhas. They only had to find out [773] their way, avoiding celestial mansions that were standing there.

Āḷavaka's mansion, however, was situated on the ground. It was well secured, surrounded by properly fixed walls, doors, turrets and archways. Above the mansion was spread a net made of white brass. The mansion was like a box. It was three leagues in height, over which there formed an aerial route used by divine Yakkhas.

When the two friends, the divine Yakkhas Sātāgiri and Hemavata, happened to come just above the mansion on their way to visit the Buddha, and were unable to proceed. In fact, up to the top of the universe above, nobody can pass over the place where a Buddha is seated.

Therefore, when they thought of the cause for their inability to go further, they saw the Buddha and descended to the ground like a stone that has been thrown up falls earth-bound. Having made obeisance to the Buddha, they listened to a discourse and circumambulated the Buddha, and asked for his permission to leave: "Exalted Buddha, we have to attend a meeting of divine Yakkhas." Saying some words in praise of the Three Treasures, they headed for the Himavanta, the venue of their meeting. On seeing the two noble Devas, Āḷavaka rose from his place and invited them saying: "Please take your seats here."

The Fury of Āḷavaka

The two friends informed Āḷavaka: "Friend Āḷavaka, in your mansion the Fortunate One is still sitting. You are so lucky! Go, friend Āḷavaka, wait upon the exalted Buddha!"

To a faithless person, the pious word connected with faith is unbearable, so is the word connected with morality to an immoral one; the word connected with knowledge to an ignorant one; the word connected with generosity to a miser; and the word connected with wisdom to a fool.

The words of the two friends, encouraging faith in the Buddha, were unbearable to Āḷavaka, who had no faith. Therefore, on hearing words of praise of the Buddha, the faithless the Yakkha Āḷavaka became furious. His heart crackled with rage like lumps of salt thrown into fire. He asked in anger: “What kind of man is the so-called exalted Buddha who is sitting in my mansion?”

33c: The 16th Rains Retreat (Āḷavaka) – 1090

Then the two noble Devas said to Āḷavaka: “Friend Āḷavaka, do not you know of our master, the Fortunate One? He is a very prominent and noble personage. Even while in the Tusita abode of Devas, he made five investigations and they related the biography of the Buddha up to his delivery of the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse. They also told the Yakkha of the 32 portents that took place at the time when the Bodhisatta was conceived, and so on. Friend Āḷavaka, have you not seen those marvellous portents?” they asked. Although he had seen them, he was carried away by anger, and he replied, hiding the truth: “No, I have not.”

The two Devas then became dissatisfied and said: “Whether you have seen them or not, what is the use of your seeing or not seeing? Friend, what are you going to do to our master, the exalted Buddha? Compared with him, you are like a calf that has been born today near a bull with his hump swaying; like a baby elephant that has been born today near a bull elephant in must with his granular secretion flowing from the three parts: the trunk, the tip of the male organ and the ears; like an old ugly fox, near a lion-king who is graceful with his round back and shoulders and with long bright mane; and like a young crow with its broken wings near a Garuḷa King with his body of 150 leagues in size. Go and do what is to be done.”

Being furious, the Yakkha got up from his seat, and standing firmly with his left foot placed on the flat rock of red orpiment, he shouted: “Is your master, the Buddha, powerful? Or, is it I, who is powerful? You will see now who is more powerful!” So shouting he stamped with his right foot on the top of Mount Kelāsa that was of 60 leagues. Then just as fiery particles fall off from the glowing iron that has been excessively heated in the blacksmith’s furnace and that is put on [774] the anvil and hammered, even so Mount Kelāsa broke up into layers of rock. Standing on the mountain top, the Yakkha declared roaringly: “I am Āḷavaka indeed.” The roar overwhelmed the whole Jambudīpa. There have been four great roars which were heard by all Jambūdīpa

1. The roar: “I have won! I have won!” made by the Yakkha general, Puṇṇaka, when he beat King Dhanañjaya Korabya in the game of dice as told in the Birth Story about the Wise Vidhura (Vidhura-jātaka, Ja 545).

2. The roar: “I will eat up all wicked monks, wicked nuns, wicked male lay devotees and female lay devotees and unrighteous men,” made by Vissakamma in the guise of a big black dog under the command of Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, when the Dispensation of Buddha Kassapa deteriorated.
3. The roar: “King Kusa, the Sīhassara, whose voice is bold and penetrating like that of a lion king, am I!” made by the Bodhisatta Kusa, after going out of the city with Princess Pabhāvati on the back of his elephant, when the seven kings, desirous of winning the Princess’s hand in marriage, besieged his city, see the Birth Story about King Kusa (Kusa-jātaka, Ja 531).
4. The present one: “I am Āḷavaka indeed!” made by the Yakkha standing on Mount Kelāsa.

When those shouts were made it seemed that they appeared before each and every town-gate and village-gate throughout the whole of Jambūdīpa.

Because of Āḷavaka’s power, the Himavanta, 3,000 leagues in vastness, trembled. Thereafter, the Yakkhas attacked the Buddha with the nine kinds of missiles in the way mentioned in the section on the vanquishing of Māra in chapter 7.

Despite his attack with such missiles, Āḷavaka was unable to make the Buddha flee. Consequently, he marched towards the Buddha, leading a frightening army composed of four divisions: elephants, horses, chariots and foot-soldiers, and mixed up with various forms of Yakkhas armed with weapons.

The ghosts made all sorts of guises and threats and, shouting: “Seize him! Kill him!” they appeared as though they were overpowering, coming from the sky above the Buddha. But they dared not go near to the Buddha, like flies which dare not approach a solid, hot glowing iron.

Although they dared not go near, they did not retreat in a short time, unlike Māra and his enormous army, who turned back immediately after being defeated, on the verge of the Bodhisatta’s awakening at the Mahā Bodhi tree. Instead, Āḷavaka and his Yakkhas, spent half the night making disturbances.

Having failed in his attempt to frighten the Buddha by displaying various terrible objects for half the night, he conceived an idea: “It were well if I would fling the weapon of the divine white cloak that is invincible!”

There are four most powerful weapons in the world. They are:

1. Sakka’s thunderbolt.
2. Vessavaṇa’s iron club.
3. Yama’s side glance.
4. Āḷavaka’s divine white cloak.

Explanation:

1. If Sakka, in his fury, were to discharge his thunderbolt towards Mount Meru, it would pierce the mountain, which is 168,000 leagues in height, making a hollow right through it, and come out from the bottom.

2. Vessavaṇa’s iron club, when hauled by him in anger, as in his earlier days, when he was still a worldling (puthujjana), would chop off the heads of thousands of Yakkhas and, after returning, would lie in its original position.

3. When an angry Yama, the king of hell, glances sideways, thousands of Kumbhaṇḍas are destroyed, making a hissing sound like sesame seeds when thrown into the red-hot iron pan.

4. If the Yakkha Āḷavaka, flying into a rage, were to throw up his divine white cloak into the sky, there would be a drought for twelve years. If it were thrown upon the earth, all the trees and plants and others things would dry up, and the land would be deprived of vegetation for twelve years. If it were thrown into the ocean, all the waters in it would be dried up, like drops of water would in a red-hot pot. When flung at a Meru-like mountain it would fall, breaking up into fragments.

With that idea Āḷavaka took off his divine white cloak, so powerful a weapon, and while standing, he was poised to cast it. At that time, all the Devas, most of whom belonged to the 10,000 world-element, assembled quickly, for they had decided: “Today the Fortunate One will tame the violent Yakkha Āḷavaka. At that taming place, we will listen to the Buddha’s teaching.” Apart from those willing to listen to the teaching, the Devas, who wished to watch the fight, also gathered there. In this way the entire vault of heaven was full of celestial beings.

The Taming of Āḷavaka

[The following is based on the Discourse to Āḷavaka (Āḷavaka-sutta, Snp 1.10) and its commentary.]

Then Āḷavaka, rising up and up, around the Buddha and roaming about, hurled his weapon of the divine white cloak towards the Buddha. Making a terrible sound in the sky, like the weapon of thunder, and emitting smoke all over and burning with flames, the cloak flew towards the Buddha but on coming near him, it turned into a foot-towel and dropped at his feet, destroying the Yakkha's pride.

On seeing this, Āḷavaka became powerless, he felt he had utterly lost his pride like a bull with its horns broken or like a poisonous cobra with its fangs taken out. He then reflected: "The weapon of the divine white cloak has failed to overcome the monk Gotama. Why?" Then he made a guess: "The monk Gotama abides in loving-kindness. This must be the reason. Now I will deprive him of loving-kindness through an annoying speech."

So he said: "Monk Gotama, without my permission why did you enter my mansion and take the seat amidst female attendants like a householder? Is it not improper for a monk to enjoy what is not given and to mix with females. Therefore, if you abide by the rules of a monk, Gotama, get out of my mansion at once!"

With reference to Āḷavaka's speech, only the essential portion was recited as the text in the Buddhist Councils; the rest is taken from the commentary.

The Buddha then accepted the Yakkha's order and went outside the mansion, giving a very pleasant reply: "Very well, friend Āḷavaka."

A hostile man cannot be calmed by hostility. That is true! Just as a piece of the bear's gall put into the nostril of a wild furious dog will make it worse, even so a rude ferocious person, when retaliated upon with rudeness and ferocity, will become more violent. In fact, such a man should be tamed only with gentleness. This natural phenomenon, the Buddha understood thoroughly. Hence, he uses mild words and yielding action.

Then the Yakkha thought: "The monk Gotama is very quick to obey indeed. He went out at my command, given but once. Without a cause I have fought against him for the whole night, the monk Gotama who is so docile, that he goes out. Āḷavaka's heart began to be softened thus. He continued to ponder: "But I am not certain yet whether his going out was caused by his obedience or by his anger. Now I will make an enquiry."

So he asked the Buddha again: "Come in, monk Gotama!"

The Buddha, in order to make the Yakkha's mind flexible and to feel certain of his docility, said again pleasingly: "Very well, friend Āḷavaka," and re-entered the mansion.

In this way, the Yakkha tested the Buddha by his repeated orders to know for sure whether the latter was really obedient, for the second time and the third he said: "Come in," and then "Go out." The Buddha followed the Yakkha's orders so that he might become more and [776] more soft-minded. So great was the Buddha's compassion indeed! If the Buddha were to disobey the Yakkha, who was violent by nature, his rough heart would become more and more boisterous and be unable to receive the Dhamma.

To cite a worldly simile, just as a little son, naughty and crying, is helped to become good by giving him something that he wants and by doing something that he likes, even so the Buddha who was like the great mother to the three worlds, acted according to his command in order to make the Yakkha Āḷavaka, who was like a little wild and rough son who was crying out of anger, docile.

Another simile, just as a wet nurse, with a gift and persuasion, suckles a naughty baby, who refuses to take milk, even so the Buddha, who is like the great wet nurse to the three worlds, followed whatever the Yakkha had to say, thereby fulfilling the latter's desire by way of persuasion in order to feed the Yakkha, who was like the naughty baby, on the sweet milk of the supermundane Dhamma.

Still another simile, just as a man, desirous of filling a glass jar with the sweet food or medicine containing four ingredients (catu-madhu), cleanses the inside of the jar, even so the Buddha, desirous of filling the jar-like heart of the Yakkha with the four ingredient-like supermundane Dhamma, had to clean the Yakkha's heart of the dirt-like anger. He therefore obeyed the Yakkha three times by going out of the mansion and coming into it as he had been ordered by him.

Thereafter the Yakkha entertained a wicked desire thus: “The monk is really docile. When ordered, but once: “Go in,” he went in; when ordered but once: “Come out,” he came out. In this way, ordering him to go in and to come out, I will make him weary during the whole night. Having made him weary thus will I throw him to the other side of the Ganges by holding him by his two legs.” Accordingly, he asked the Buddha for the fourth time: “Come out, O monk Gotama!”

Then the Buddha knew the Yakkha’s wicked intention. He also foresaw what the Yakkha would do if he said something to him, Āḷavaka would think of asking some questions to the Buddha, and that would create a golden opportunity for the Buddha to preach. Therefore he replied: “I know the vicious plan that is in your mind. So I will not get out. Do whatever you like.”

Prior to Āḷavaka’s encounter with the Buddha, in former times too, when recluses and wandering ascetics, endowed with higher psychic powers came by air, they visited the mansion out of curiosity to find out whether it was a golden, or a silver, or a ruby one. To these visitors, the Yakkha put questions. If they were unable to give him the answers, he would do harm by driving them mad, or by ripping their hearts out, or by throwing them by the legs to the other shore of the Ganges.

The following is how Yakkhas do harm: They make a man mad in two ways, by showing him their horrible looks and by gripping and crushing his heart. Knowing that the first way would not cause madness to recluses and wandering ascetics, Āḷavaka did not employ the first method; instead he reduced his body to a delicate frame by his own supernatural power and entered the persons of these powerful ascetics and crumpled their hearts with his grip. Then their mental processes could not remain stable and they went out of their senses. He also burst open the hearts of these ascetics who went mad thus. As they could not answer his questions, he would tell them not to come again and would fling them by the two legs to the other side of the Ganges.

So Āḷavaka recalled the questions he had asked on previous occasions and thought: “Now I will ask the monk Gotama in this manner and, then, if he fails to give me satisfactory answers, I will make him mad, burst open his heart and fling him by the legs to beyond the Ganges. Thus will I torment him.”

So he said rudely: “Great monk Gotama, I am going to ask you some questions. If you cannot answer them thoroughly I will make you mad, or cause your heart to burst, or hold you by your legs and throw you across the river.”

From where did Āḷavaka’s questions come? Answer: His parents had learnt the questions numbering eight, together with their answers from Buddha Kassapa, [777] whom they worshipped. The parents taught him all the questions and answers when he was young.

As time went by Āḷavaka forgot the answers. He then had the questions put down in orpiment on gold plates, lest they should get lost, and he kept the plates at the entrance of the mansion. In this way, Āḷavaka’s questions had their source in a Buddha, and they were the ones which only Buddhas could answer as they belonged to the sphere of the Buddhas (Buddha-visaya).

On hearing the Yakkha’s words, the Buddha wished to show the unique power of the Buddhas; unique in the sense that it was not shared by any in the world, for nobody could do any harm to the four things in their possession; the gains accrued to them, their life, their omniscience, and their physical radiance.

So the Buddha said: “Friend Yakkha, all over the dual worlds, the world of divine beings, such as Devas, Māras and Brahmas, and the world of human beings, such as monks, Brahmins, princes and commoners, I see none who could cause me madness, or who could explode my heart, or who could fling me over the river.”

After barring the cruel intent of the Yakkha, the Buddha added in order to make him ask: “Friend Yakkha, in spite of that, you may put whatever questions you like.” Thus the Buddha extended his invitation, the kind that omniscient Buddhas adopt.

Herein there are two kinds of invitation: One made by omniscient Buddhas and Bodhisattas, and the other made by other individuals. Omniscient Buddhas and Bodhisattas invite questions with full self-confidence: “Ask whatever you like. I will answer your questions, leaving nothing unanswered.” Other individuals do so but with less confidence, saying: “Ask, friend. On hearing your question, I will answer if I know.”

Āḷavaka’s Questions and the Buddha’s Answers

When the Buddha made the kind of invitation usually adopted by omniscient Buddhas thus, Āḷavaka put his questions in verse as follows (Sn̄p 183):

Kim sūdhā vittam purisassa seṭṭham, kim su suciṇṇam sukham-āvahāti, kim su have sādu-taram rasānam, katham jīvim jīvitam-āhu seṭṭham?

O monk, Gotama by clan! What is the most praiseworthy property of men in this world? What, when practised continuously for days can convey the threefold happiness of humans, Devas and Nibbāna? Of all enjoyable tastes, what indeed is by far the best for living beings? How is one's life, the most praiseworthy among living beings, as sweetly declared by numerous men of virtue such as Buddhas and others?

In this manner the first question: “What is the most praiseworthy property of men in this world?” is asked by using the term which is of a leading nature. Such a way of speaking is called the detailed (ukkaṭṭha) method. Therefore it is to be noted that the term men here represents both male and female. The question means: “What is the best thing for all men and women?”

By this verse the following four questions are meant:

1. What is the best property in the world?
2. What, when practised day by day, can lead to the three blissful states of humans, Devas and Nibbāna?
3. What is the sweetest of all tastes?
4. What living is the best?

Then the Buddha, desirous of answering in the same way as Kassapa Buddha did, uttered [778] the following answers in verse (Snp 184):

Saddhīdha vittam purisassa seṭṭham, Dhammo suciṇṇo sukham-āvahāti, saccam have sādu-taram rasānam, paññā-jīvim jīvitam-āhu seṭṭham.

Friend Yakkha by the name of Āḷavaka! In this world the most praiseworthy property of every man and woman is faith (saddhā), mundane as well as supermundane.

The ten wholesome deeds or the three good works of generosity, morality and meditation, which practised day and night continuously, can convey the threefold bliss (sukha) for humans, Devas and Nibbāna.

Of all enjoyable tastes, the truth (sacca), which is significant of Nibbāna, the reality in its ultimate sense (paramattha-sacca) or the truthful speech of oral auspiciousness (vacī-maṅgala) achieved by refraining from falsehood (virati-sacca), indeed is by far the best for all beings.

Men of virtue, such as Buddhas and others, declare that the life following the right course of conduct continuously is the most praiseworthy.

Herein the meaning, at moderate length should be taken thus: Just as various mundane properties, such as gold, silver, etc., though their usefulness bring about both physical happiness (kāyika-sukha) and mental happiness (cetasika-sukha), just as they prevent one having thirst, hunger and other forms of suffering, just as they effect the cessation of poverty, just as they form the cause for gaining pearls, rubies, etc., just as they attract admiration from others, even so, the two kinds of faith (saddhā), mundane and supermundane, bring about both secular happiness and spiritual happiness; even so, faith being the leading virtue of those who take the right course of conduct, prevents one from suffering in Saṃsāra, such as rebirth, old age, and so on; even so, it effects the cessation of the poverty of virtues; even so it forms the cause for winning the Dhamma Jewel such as the seven constituents of wisdom (bojjhaṅga) which are the mindfulness constituent (sati-sambojjhaṅga) and others (Dhp 303):

Saddho sīlena sampanno, yaso-bhoga-samappito, yaṃ yaṃ padesaṃ bhajati, tattha tattheva pūjito.

He who possesses faith (saddhā), and morality (sīla), who also has a retinue and wealth, is honoured wherever he goes.

As the Buddha preaches thus, a faithful individual is honoured or praised by all human and divine beings. Therefore, the two kinds of faiths, mundane and supermundane, are said by the Buddha to be one's property.

This property of faith is the cause of the threefold unique happiness of humans, Devas and Nibbāna. Moreover, it is the cause of gaining such secular treasures as gold, silver and the like. This is true: only he who is faithful and performs alms givings can acquire secular treasures. The property of one without faith is just fruitless. Therefore, the property of faith is said to be the most praiseworthy possession.

When the ten wholesome works, or, alternately, the three deeds of generosity (dāna), morality (sīla) and meditation (bhāvanā), are performed day after day, they bring happiness to the performer, as they did to Soṇa, Raṭṭhapāla and other sons of wealthy persons; they bring divine happiness to the performer, as they did to Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, and others; they bring the bliss of Nibbāna to him, as they did bring to Prince Mahā Paduma and others.

Something to be licked and enjoyed is called tasty. Various tastes, such as the [779] taste of roots, the taste of stems, etc., and the other parts of a plant contribute to the development of one's body. But they can convey only secular happiness. The taste of the truth caused by refraining from falsehood (virati-sacca) and speaking only the truth (vacī-sacca) contribute to one's mental development through tranquillity (samatha) and insight (vipassanā) meditation and other meditative practices. They lead to spiritual happiness. Awakening called the taste of emancipation (vimutti-rasa), as developed through the taste of the peace of Nibbāna, the ultimate truth (paramattha-sacca), is sweet and delicious. Therefore, these three tastes of ultimate truth, refraining from falsehood and truth are the best of all tastes.

An individual, who lacks both eyes: The eye of intelligence in mundane development and the eye of intelligence in supermundane development, is called a blind person (andha-puggala). One having only the eye of intelligence in mundane development and lacking the eye of intelligence in the Dhamma, is called one-eyed (eka-cakkhu), one who has both eyes of intelligence is designated as an individual who has two eyes that can see (dvi-cakkhu-puggala).

Of these three kinds of individuals, a two-eyed lay devotee lives by doing his domestic tasks, by taking refuge in the Three Treasures, by keeping the precepts, by fasting and by fulfilling other human social duties only through wisdom. A monk lives by accomplishing his ascetic undertakings, such as purification of morality (sīla-visuddhi), purification of mind (citta-visuddhi) and others, through wisdom. Only the life of one who abides by wisdom is praiseworthy, the noble ones, such as Buddhas, declared. They do not say that the life of one who lives just by respiration is praiseworthy.

On hearing the Buddha's answer to his four questions, the Yakkha Āḷavaka became very glad, and being desirous of asking the remaining four, he uttered the following verses (Snp 185):

Katham su tarati ogham, katham su tarati aṇṇavam, katham su dukkham-acceti, katham su parisujjhati?

Exalted Buddha, how, or by what does one cross over the four rough whirlpools? How, or by what does one cross over the ocean of Saṃsāra?

How or by what does one overcome the round of suffering? How or by what does one cleanse oneself of mental impurities?

When the Yakkha had questioned him thus, the Buddha uttered the following verse as he wished to answer as before (Snp 186):

Saddhā tarati oghaṃ, appamādena aṇṇavaṃ, vīriyena dukkham-acceti, paññāya parisujjhati.

Friend by the name of Āḷavaka! By faith (saddhā) one crosses over the four rough whirlpools, by heedfulness (appamāda), which is repeated performance of the ten wholesome deeds, one crosses over the ocean of Saṃsāra; by energy (virīya) one overcomes the round of suffering; by wisdom (paññā) one cleanses oneself of mental impurities.

Herein, he who crosses over the four whirlpools, can also cross over the ocean of Saṃsāra, can overcome the round of suffering and be aloof from moral impurities; but: 1) He who lacks faith (saddhā), as he does not believe in the worthy practice of crossing over the four whirlpools, cannot engage in meditation which is the crossing over. Therefore, he cannot go beyond them; 2) he who neglects the crossing by indulging in the five sensual pleasures, as he holds fast to these very pleasures, cannot get beyond the ocean of Saṃsāra; 3) he who is not energetic but indolent, by mixing with unwholesome things, lives miserably; 4) a fool, as he does not know the good path of practice leading to the purification of moral impurities, cannot get away from such mental defilements. Hence the Buddha's answer revealing faith as [780] opposed to faithlessness (asaddhiya), heedfulness (appamāda) as opposed to heedlessness (pamāda), energy (virīya) as opposed to indolence (kosajja) and wisdom (paññā) as opposed to delusion (moha).

Again in this answering verse faith or the faculty of faith is the fundamental cause of the four factors of Stream-winning (Sotāpatti-yāṅga): an association with the virtuous (sappurisa-saṃseva), listening to the law of the virtuous (saddhamma-savaṇa), proper contemplation (yoniso-manasikara), and engagement in tranquillity and insight meditation in accordance with the ninefold supermundane Dhamma (dhammānuddhamma-paṭipatti).

Only the possession of faith leads to the development of the four factors of the Stream-winning factors, and only the development of these four factors leads to Stream-entry (Sotāpatti), or the winning of the stream. Hence by the first answer in the verse reading: Saddhāya tarati oghaṃ,

33c: The 16th Rains Retreat (Āḷavaka) – 1101

“By faith one crosses over the four whirlpools of rough waters,” the path of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga), which is the crossing over of the whirlpool of wrong beliefs (diṭṭhogha), as well as the noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna), are meant.

The noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna), as he has diligence equivalent to the repeated deeds of merit, accomplishes the second path and is to be reborn but once in the human world; he crosses over the ocean of Saṃsāra. The feat has not been performed yet by Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga) has its source in the whirlpool of becoming (bhavogha). Hence by the second answer in the verse reading: Appamādena aṇṇavam, “By diligence one crosses over the ocean of Saṃsāra,” the Once-returning (Sakadāgāmī-magga), which is the crossing over of the whirlpool of becoming (bhavogha), as well as the noble individual Once-returners (Sakadāgāmī) are meant.

The noble Once-returners (Sakadāgāmī) accomplish the third path by energy and overcome the lust-related suffering, which has its source in the whirlpool of sensual pleasures (kāmogha.) The feat has not been performed yet by Once-returning (Sakadāgāmī-magga). Hence the third answer in the verse reading: Viriya dukkham-acceti, “By energy one overcomes the round of suffering,” the Non-returner (Anāgāmī-magga), which is the crossing over of the whirlpool of sensual pleasures (kāmogha), as well as the noble individual Non-returners (Anāgāmī) are meant.

The noble Non-returner (Anāgāmī), as he is free from the mire of sensuality, accomplishes the fourth path through the pristine pure insight wisdom and abandons the extreme impurities of ignorance (avijjā), which has not been eradicated yet by the Non-returner (Anāgāmī-magga). Hence the fourth answer in the verse reading: Paññāya parisujjhati, “By wisdom one cleanses oneself of mental impurities,” the Arahata path (Arahatta-magga), the crossing over of the whirlpool of ignorance (avijjogha), as well as the Arahata are meant.

At the end of the verse, an answer that was taught with Awakening as its apex, the Yakkha Āḷavaka was established in the Stream-entry fruition (Sotāpatti-phala).

Āḷavaka Attains Stream-Entry

Now that the Yakkha Āḷavaka had been impressed by the word wisdom (paññā), that is contained in the fourth answer of the verse: Pannāya parisujjhati, “by wisdom is one is cleansed of one's mental impurities," uttered by the Buddha, as was typical of a noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna), he became desirous of asking further questions, a mixture of mundane and supermundane problems, and uttered the following six lines (Snp 187):

Katham su labhate paññam, katham su vindate dhanam, katham su kittim pappoti, katham mittani ganthati, asmā lokā param lokam, katham pecca na socati? [781]

Exalted Buddha! How is the twofold wisdom, mundane and supermundane, gained? How is the twofold wealth, mundane and supermundane, attained? How is fame achieved? How are friends bound? Through what, one does not grieve on passing away from this world to the next?

By this verse the Yakkha Āḷavaka meant to ask about these five problems:

1. The means to get wisdom.
2. The means to get wealth.
3. The means to get fame.
4. The means to get friends.
5. The means to escape sorrow in the next life.

Being desirous of teaching Āḷavaka properly that there were four things contributing to the acquisition of the twofold wisdom, mundane and supermundane, answering the first question, the Buddha delivered the following verse (Snp 188):

Saddahāno arahatam, Dhammam Nibbāna-pattiyā, sussūsam labhate paññam, appamatto vicakkhaṇo.

Friend by the name of Āḷavaka! He who has deep faith in the ten wholesome deeds and the 37 constituents of Awakening that contribute to the attainment of Nibbāna taught by Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas and Arahats; who respectfully pays attention to the wise; who is mindful and earnest; and who reflects thoroughly on the two speeches, one well-spoken (subhāsita) and the other ill-spoken (asubhāsita), acquires the twofold wisdom, mundane and supermundane.

33c: The 16th Rains Retreat (Āḷavaka) – 1103

By this answer the Buddha meant to say that these four are the means to gain wisdom:

1. Faith (saddhā).
2. Attention (sussūsā).
3. Heedfulness (appamāda).
4. Reflection (vicakkhaṇā).

To make the meaning more explicit: Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas and Arahats realize Nibbāna through the ten wholesome deeds at the beginning and through the 37 constituents of Awakening later on. Therefore, these ten wholesome deeds and the 37 constituents of Awakening are to be designated as the means to Nibbāna. Only he, who has profound faith (saddhā), can possess both mundane and supermundane wisdom.

The possession of wisdom, however, is not possible just by faith. Only when the faithful individual develops attention (sussūsā) by approaching the wise, serving them, by listening to their pious words, can he win these two kinds of wisdom. That is to say, having faith that leads to Nibbāna, he must go to his preceptor (upajjhāya) and fulfil his duties towards him. When the preceptor, being pleased with his fulfilment of duties, teaches him, he must listen carefully. His approach to his preceptors, his service towards him, his listening to his word – all these briefly make up the term attention, respectful obedience. Only one who possesses attention, can realize mundane wisdom as well as supermundane wisdom.

Only when the faithful and respectful listener further develops heedfulness (appamāda) and reflection (vicakkhaṇā) on well-spoken speech (subhāsita), and ill-spoken speech (dubbhāsita), can he realize the twofold wisdom. He who lacks these four cannot gain wisdom.

With regard to the interrelation between these four and the supermundane wisdom: 1) By faith (saddhā) a man takes up the practice which leads to wisdom; 2) by [782] attention (sussūsā) he listens respectfully to the Dhamma which leads to wisdom (paññā); 3) by heedfulness (appamāda) he does not forget what he has learnt; 4) by reflection (vicakkhaṇā) he considers deeply what he has learnt so that it may remain intact and without distortion and widens his knowledge and wisdom.

Or, 2) By attention a man respectfully listens to the Dhamma which leads to wisdom; 3) by heedfulness he bears in mind what he has learnt so that it may not be forgotten; 4) by reflection he ponders the profound significance of what he has borne in mind.

The repeated practice of these four brings one closer to the ultimate reality of Nibbāna and becoming an Arahāt. In this manner, the development of the supermundane wisdom of the path and that of the fruition is to be noted.

After answering the first question thus, did the Fortunate One, being desirous of answering now the second, third and fourth questions, uttered the following verse (Snp 189):

Patirūpa-kārī dhuravā, uṭṭhātā vindate dhanam, saccena kittim pappoti, dadaṃ mittāni ganthati.

Friend Yakkha by the name of Āḷavaka! He who performs these two things leading to both worldly and spiritual wealth in harmony with the place and time; who, by mental energy, does not abandon his duty, and who is physically energetic as well, certainly gains the twofold wealth. By auspicious, truthful speech does one attain a good reputation, such as: “This man is the speaker of truth,” or, by the attainment of ultimate reality of Nibbāna does he reach fame, and people might say: “He is a Buddha,” “He is a Paccekabuddha,” or “He is a noble disciple of the Buddha.” He who, without stinginess but wholeheartedly, gives somebody what he or she wants makes friends.

By the first half of the verse the Buddha answers that the twofold wealth can be attained through three factors: Following the practice that is in harmony with the place and time, leading to wealth, having mental energy and having physical energy. By the third foot of the verse, the third question is answered. By the fourth foot, the fourth question is answered.

Herein, the way worldly wealth is attained through suitable practice, mental energy and physical energy may be noted from the well-known Birth Story about the Little Merchant (Cūḷaka-seṭṭhi-jātaka, Ja 4) which tells of a man who becomes rich, gaining 200,000 within four months beginning with a dead rat as his starting capital.

With reference to the attainment of spiritual wealth, it should be understood from the story of Ven. Mahā Tissa. Explanation: The aged elder Mahā Tissa of Ceylon once decided to live only using the three postures of sitting, standing and walking, and he actually did so, fulfilling his duties. Whenever he felt slothful and drowsy, he soaked a head-pad made of straw, normally used as a cushion for things carried on the head, with water, put it on his head and went into the water to the depth of his throat to remove his sloth and drowsiness (thīna-middha). After twelve years, he became an Arahat.

Having answered thus the first four questions in the way in which the worldly and spiritual things for the layman and the monk are mixed, the Buddha now wished to answer the fifth question. Accordingly he uttered the following verse (Snp 190):

Yassete caturo dhammā, saddhassa gharam-esino, saccam Dhammo dhiti cāgo, sa ve pecca na socati.

He who is faithful and seeking the benefit of one's home, in whom exist four things: Truthfulness (sacca), wisdom (dhamma), physical and mental energy (dhiti) and generosity (cāga), indeed does not worry about his departure to the next existence.

After answering the fifth question thus, the Buddha wished to urge the Yakkha Āḷavaka and uttered this verse (Snp 191): [783]

yadi saccā damā cāgā, khantiyā bhiyyodha vijjati.*

Friend Yakkha by the name of Āḷavaka! In this world, if there were any virtue better than the twofold truthfulness (sacca) for the attainment of good reputation, if there were any virtue that is better than taming (dāma) through prudence, which is part of wise obedience for the attainment of worldly and spiritual wisdom; if there were any virtue that is better than giving (cāga) for the making of friends; if there was any virtue better than forbearance (khantī) in the form of physical and mental energy for the making of worldly and spiritual wealth; if there was any virtue better than these four: truthfulness, taming, giving and forbearance, for the elimination of grief hereafter; or if you think there are any virtues better than these, I pray you, for your satisfaction ask many others, those monks and Brahmins, such as Purāṇa Kassapa, who falsely claim that they are omniscient Buddhas.

When the Buddha uttered thus, the Yakkha Āḷavaka said to the Buddha in verse, the first half of which explains that he had already removed his doubt through his attainment of the path-knowledge, the doubt as to whether he should ask

Purāṇa Kassapa and so on, and the second half explains the reason for his having no intention to ask. Āḷavaka then uttered this verse (Snp 192):

Katham nu dāni puccheyyam, puthū samaṇa-brāhmaṇe, yohaṃ ajja pajānāmi, yo attho samparāyiko.

Exalted Buddha! Now that I, your disciple, Āḷavaka by name, have cut off all doubts by means of the sword of the knowledge of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga-ñāṇa), why should I ask many monks and Brahmins who unrighteously claim that they are omniscient Buddhas? Indeed I should not ask them as I am free from the endangering defilement of doubt (vicikicchā). As you have instructed me, I, who am your disciple, Āḷavaka by name, come to know personally and clearly, on this day, that instruction of yours, regarding the attainment of wisdom, the attainment of wealth, the attainment of fame and the making of friends, and regarding the virtues that do not lead to grief hereafter. Therefore, I need not ask other persons for my satisfaction.

Now the Yakkha Āḷavaka uttered again the following verse in order to show that the knowledge he had acquired had its source in the Buddha (Snp 193):

Atthāya vata me Buddho, vāsāyāḷavim-āgamā, yohaṃ ajja pajānāmi, yattha dinnam mahapphalam.

The Fortunate One, lord of the world and omniscient Buddha, has out of compassion come to the city of Āḷavī to spend the whole Rains Retreat (Vassa) period for the development of my worldly and spiritual welfare. The gift faithfully given by the omniscient Buddha is of great fruit ranging from the bliss of humans and Devas to the bliss of Nibbāna. That omniscient Buddha, who deserves the best gift, I have come to know now thoroughly.

Having told in verse that he had now acquired the means to develop his welfare, Āḷavaka now uttered again this verse in order to express his wish properly to do for the welfare of others (Snp 194):

So aham vicarissāmi, [784] gāmā gāmaṃ purā puram, namassamāno Sambuddham, Dhammassa ca Sudhammatam

Exalted Buddha whose sun of glory shines bright I, your disciple Āḷavaka, from today onwards till the day I met with the master, with my joined hands raised to my head in adoration, will wander from one celestial abode to another, from one celestial city to another, proclaiming aloud the countless attributes of the Buddha, the Lord of the Three Worlds, and the attribute of the Dhamma of the ten constituents: The four paths (magga), the four fruitions (phala), Nibbāna and the entire collection of your teachings, containing the means of emancipation from the round of suffering, and the attributes of the Saṅgha, the eight classes of its members, the noble ones who carefully follow the various admirable practices of the threefold training.

The Presentation of Prince Āḷavaka

It was the time when the following four events simultaneously took place:

1. The end of Āḷavaka's verse.
2. The coming of daybreak.
3. The reception of Āḷavaka's verse with wild acclaim.
4. The sending of Prince Āḷavaka to the Yakkha's mansion.

When the king's men from the city of Āḷavī heard the tumultuous acclaim, they thought to themselves: "Such a roar could not have occurred about any personage other than the Fortunate One. Could it be that the Fortunate One has come?" On seeing the bodily-radiance of the Buddha, they no longer remained outside the mansion but entered it without fear. There, in the Yakkha's mansion, did they encounter the Buddha seated and the Yakkha Āḷavaka standing with his hands joined in adoration.

After seeing thus, the king's men bravely handed the little Prince Āḷavaka over to the Yakkha Āḷavaka, saying: "Great Yakkha, we have brought this Prince Āḷavaka to give you in sacrifice. You may eat him if you wish. Do as you please." As Āḷavaka had already become a noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) at that time and especially as he was told so in front of the Buddha, he felt greatly ashamed.

Then Āḷavaka tenderly took over the little prince with his two hands and offered him to the Buddha, saying: "Exalted Buddha, I offer this royal child to you. I give you the boy in generosity. Buddhas are kind and protective to sentient beings for their welfare. Exalted Buddha, please receive him, this Prince Āḷavaka, for his welfare and happiness." He also uttered this verse (SnA, PTS 1.240):

Imaṃ kumāraṃ sata-puñña-lakkhaṇaṃ, sabbāṅgupetaṃ paripuñña-byañjanaṃ, udagga-citto sumano dadāmi te, paṭiggaha loka-hitāya cakkhumā.

Exalted Buddha of the fivefold eye! Being elated and happy I, Āḷavaka by name, faithfully give you the Prince named Āḷavaka, who possesses more than 100 marks owing to his past meritorious deeds, who also has all the big and small limbs and a developed physical appearance. Buddhas look after the sentient beings for their benefit. Kindly accept the prince for his own welfare.

The Buddha accepted the little Prince Āḷavaka with his hands. While he was thus accepting, in order to give his blessing for the benefit of long life and good health of the Yakkha and the prince, the Buddha uttered three verses, each omitting a line to be filled up by somebody else. That blank in each verse was filled up three times as the fourth line by the Yakkha in order to establish the little prince in the three refuges. The incomplete verses [785] which were uttered by the Buddha and completed by the Yakkha are as follows:

Buddha:

*Dīghāyuko hotu ayaṃ kumāro,
tuvañ-ca Yakkha sukhito bhavāhi,
abyādhitā loka-hitāya tiṭṭhatha.*

May this Prince Āḷavaka live long! Yakkha Āḷavaka, may you also have physical and mental happiness! May you both remain long, being free from the 96 diseases, for the welfare of many!

Yakkha:

Ayaṃ kumāro saraṇam-upeti Buddhaṃ.

Exalted Buddha! This Prince Āḷavaka takes refuge in the Fortunate One, lord of the world, and omniscient Buddha.

Buddha:

*Dīghāyuko hotu ayaṃ kumāro,
tuvañ-ca Yakkha sukhito bhavāhi,
abyādhitā loka-hitāya tiṭṭhatha.*

May this Prince Āḷavaka live long! Yakkha Āḷavaka, may you also have physical and mental happiness! May you both remain long, being free from the 96 diseases, for the welfare of many!

Yakkha:

Ayaṃ kumāro saraṇam-upeti Dhammaṃ.

Exalted Buddha! This Prince Āḷavaka takes refuge in the Dhamma consisting of the ten features, such as the four paths, four fruitions, Nibbāna and the entire body of teaching.

Buddha:

*Dīghāyuko hotu ayaṃ kumāro,
tuvañ-ca Yakkha sukhito bhavāhi,
abyādhitā lokahitāya tiṭṭhatha.*

May this Prince Āḷavaka live long! Yakkha Āḷavaka, may you also have physical and mental happiness! May you both remain long, being free from the 96 diseases, for the welfare of many!

Yakkha:

Ayaṃ kumāro saraṇam-upeti Saṅghaṃ.

Exalted Buddha! This Prince Āḷavaka takes refuge in the Saṅgha of the noble ones in the ultimate and noble sense of the word (paramattha-ariya).

Then the Buddha entrusted the little prince to the king's officers, ordering: "Bring up this royal child and later return him to me!"

The original name of the prince was Āḷavaka. As has been said, the day the Yakkha was tamed, the prince was passed from the hands of the royal officers to the Yakkha's hands, from the Yakkha's hands to the Buddha's hands, from the Buddha's hands back to the hands of the officers. Hence he was named Hatthaka Āḷavaka – Āḷavaka who has been handed over from person to person.

When the officers returned, carrying the little prince, they were seen by farmers and foresters and other people, who asked timidly: "How is it? Is it that the Yakkha does not want to devour the prince because he is too small?" – "Friends, do not be afraid," replied the officers, "The Fortunate One has made him free from danger," and they related the whole story to them.

Then the entire city of Āḷavī cheered, shouting: Well done! Well done! The people faced in the direction where the Yakkha Āḷavaka was and roared: “The Fortunate One has caused safety! The Fortunate One has caused safety!” When it was time for the Buddha to go to town for alms food, the Yakkha went along, carrying the Buddha’s bowl and robe half the way down to see the Buddha off, and then he returned to his mansion. [786]

After the Buddha went on alms round in the city of Āḷavī and when he had finished his meal, he sat on the splendid seat which was prepared under a tree in quietude at the city gate. Then King Āḷavaka came with his hosts of ministers, troops and they were joined by the citizens of Āḷavī who did obeisance to the Buddha and sat down around him and asked: “Exalted Buddha, how could you tame such a wild and cruel Yakkha?”

The Buddha then delivered the aforesaid Discourse to Āḷavaka (Āḷavaka-sutta, Snp 1.10) in twelve verses in which he started his narration with the attack made by the Yakkha and related in detail: “In this manner did he rain down nine kinds of weapons, in this manner did he exhibit such horrible things, in this manner did he put questions to me, in this manner did I answer his questions.” By the end of the discourse 84,000 sentient beings realized the four truths and found emancipation.

Now King Āḷavaka and the citizens of Āḷavī built a shrine for the Yakkha Āḷavaka, near the original shrine of the Deva Vessavaṇa. And they regularly made offerings to the Yakkha of things worthy of divine beings (devatā-bāli) such as flowers, perfumes, etc.

When the little prince grew up into an intelligent youth, they sent him to the Buddha with these words: “You, prince, have secured a new lease of life because of the Fortunate One. Go and serve the master. Serve the Saṅgha of monks as well!” The prince approached the Buddha and the monks and rendered his service to them, practised the Dhamma, and was established in the Non-returning fruition (Anāgāmi-phala). He also learned all the teachings of the Three Baskets (Tipiṭaka) and acquired a retinue of 500 lay devotees for the Buddha. At a later time the Buddha held a convocation where the devout layman and Non-returner Prince Hatthaka Āḷavaka was placed foremost among those who lavishly showered upon their audience the four bases of sympathy (saṅgaha-vatthu). [787]

34a: The 17th Rains Retreat (Beauty)

After taming and converting the Yakkha Āḷavaka while observing the 16th Rains Retreat (Vassa) at Āḷavī city, the Buddha exhorted and taught those beings who were worthy of his teaching. When the Rains Retreat came to an end, he journeyed from the city of Āḷavī and eventually reached the city of Rājagaha and he stayed at the Veḷuvana monastery in that city to keep the 17th Rains Retreat.

Sirimā the Courtesan

Here is a brief account of Sirimā the courtesan, which should be known in advance: Merchants of Rājagaha who belonged to a trading guild, having personally witnessed the splendour of the city of Vesālī, which was due to the courtesan Ambapālī, told King Bimbisāra on their return to Rājagaha that a courtesan should be kept in their city too. When the king granted permission to do so, they appointed a very pretty woman, Sālavatī by name, a courtesan with appropriate ceremonial emblems who was duly recognized by the king. A fee of 100 coins was charged for those who wanted to enjoy her company for one night.

When the courtesan first gave birth to a son, the infant was abandoned on a road, but was picked up, adopted and named Jīvaka by Prince Abhaya. On coming of age, he went to Takkasilā and studied medicine under a prominent teacher till he became accomplished. He was, in fact, later to be famous as the physician Jīvaka, and his name is well-known even today.

Sālavatī's second child was a daughter. As a daughter could follow her mother's occupation as a courtesan, she was not abandoned, unlike in Jīvaka's case, but nurtured well. The name Sirimā was given to her. On her mother's death, Sirimā succeeded her and was recognized as city courtesan by the king. Those, who wished to seek pleasure with her for one night, had to pay 1,000 pieces of money. This is a brief account of the courtesan Siramā.

The Buddha's Instruction to Sirimā

While the Buddha was keeping the 17th Rains Retreat (Vassa) at Veḷuvana in Rājagaha, Sirimā was still a lady of great beauty. What was peculiar about her was this: During one rainy season, she did something wrong against the Buddha's female lay devotee (upāsikā) Uttarā, who was daughter-in-law of the wealthy merchant, Puṇṇa, and who was a noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna). In order to beg Uttarā's pardon, she confessed to the Buddha who had finished his meal together with members of the Saṅgha at Uttarā's house. On that very day, after listening to the Buddha's discourse, given in appreciation of the meal, she attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) when the verse beginning with (Dhp 223): Akkodhena jine kodham, "through kindness one should overcome anger," uttered by the Buddha came to a close.

This is just an abridgment. A detailed account will be given when we come to the section on Nandamātā Uttarā in the chronicle about the female lay devotees, chapter 45b.

The day after her attainment of Stream-entry, the courtesan Sirimā invited the Saṅgha with the Buddha at its head for alms and gave an alms giving on a grand scale. From that day onwards, she undertook repeated (nibaddha) giving of alms food to a group of eight monastics. Beginning from the first day of her invitation, the eight monastics went in their turn to Sirimā's place constantly for food. Speaking respectfully, Sirimā said: "Please accept butter, venerable sirs! Please accept milk, venerable sirs!" and she offered alms by putting her supplies to the brim of the bowls of the eight monks who came in turn. The food received by a monk from Sirimā's house was sufficient for three or four monks. Sirimā spent sixteen coins each day for offering food.

One day, one of the eight monks went to Sirimā's place as it was his turn, had his meal [788] there and went to another monastery that was more than three leagues away from Rājagaha. One evening, while the visiting monk was sitting at the place reserved for waiting upon the great elder of the monastery, his fellow monks, asked him in their speech of welcome (paṭisanthāra): "Friend, where did you have your meal and come over here from?" The visiting monk replied: "Friends, I came after having the meal which is the permanent offering made to eight monks by Sirimā." Again the monks inquired: "Friend, did Sirimā make her offering attractive and give it to you?" – "Friend, I am not able to praise her food fully. She offered the food to us after preparing it in the best possible manner. The food received by one from her is sufficient for three or four to enjoy. It is particularly fortunate for one to see her beauty rather than to see her offering. That woman, Sirimā, is indeed one endowed with such and such signs of beauty and fairness of limbs, big and small!” Thus the visiting monk replied, extolling Sirimā’s qualities.

Then one of the monks, after hearing the words in praise of Sirima’s qualities, fell in love with her, even without actual seeing her. Thinking: “I should go and see her,” he told the visiting monk his years of standing as a monastic and asked about the order of monks who were presently due to be at Sirimā’s house. “Friend,” replied the visiting monk, “if you go now you will be one of those at Sirimā’s place tomorrow and receive the food for the eight (aṭṭhaka-bhatta) monastics.” Hearing the reply, the monk set out at that very moment, taking his bowl and robe. Though he could not reach Rājagaha that night, he made a great effort to continue his journey, and he arrived in Rājagaha at dawn. When he entered the lot-drawing booth and stood there, the lot came to him, and he joined the group to receive the food for the eight monastics at Sirimā’s residence.

But Sirimā had been inflicted with a fatal disease since the previous day when the former monk left after having the meal offered by her. Therefore she had to take off her ornaments that she usually put on and lay down on her couch. As her female servants saw the eight monks coming according to their lot, they reported to Sirimā. But she was unable to give seats and treat them personally by taking the bowls with her own hands as in the previous days. So she asked her maids, while lying: “Take the bowls from the monks, women. Give them seats and offer the rice-gruel first. Then offer cakes and, when meal time comes fill the bowls with food and give them to the monks.”

“Yes, madam,” said the servants, and after ushering the monks into the house, they gave them rice-gruel first. Then they offered cakes. At meal time, they made the bowls full with cooked rice and other foods. When they told her of what they had done, Sirimā said to them: “Women, carry me to see the venerable ones, I would like to pay my respect to them.” When they carried her to the monks, she did obeisance to the monks respectfully with her body trembling as she could not remain steady.

The monk, who had become amorous with Sirimā without even seeing her previously, now gazed upon her and thought: “This Sirimā looks still beautiful despite her illness. How great her beauty would have been when she was in good health and adorned with all ornaments.” Then there arose in his person wild lustful passions as though they had accumulated for many millions of years. The monk became unconscious of anything else and could not eat his meal. Taking the bowl, he went back to the monastery, covered the bowl and put it down in a certain place. Then he spread out a robe on which he lay down. No companion monk could persuade him to eat. He starved himself by entirely cutting off food.

That evening Sirimā died. King Bimbisāra had the news sent to the Buddha, saying: “Exalted Buddha! Sirimā, the younger sister of the physician Jīvaka is dead.” On hearing the news the Buddha had his message sent back to the king, asking him: “Do not cremate the remains of Sirimā yet. Place her body on its back at the cemetery and guard it against crows, dogs, foxes, etc.” The king did as he was instructed by the Buddha.

In this way, three days passed and on the fourth day, Sirimā’s body became swollen. Worms came out profusely from the nine openings of the body. The entire frame burst out and was bloated like a boiling-pot. King Bimbisāra sent the drummers all over the city of Rājagaha to announce his orders: “All citizens, except children, who are to look after their houses, must come to the cemetery to see the remains of Sirimā. Those who fail to do so [789] will be punished with a fine of eight coins each.” He also sent an invitation to the Buddha to come and observe Sirimā’s body.

The Buddha then asked the monks: “Let us go and see Sirimā’s body!” The young passionate monk would not follow the advice of others but starved himself, and remained lying down. The food kept in the bowl four days ago had now gone stale. The bowl also had become filthy. Then a friendly monk told the young monastic: “Friend, the Buddha is about to go and see Sirimā’s body.” Though he was oppressed severely by hunger, the young monk got up as soon as he heard the name Sirimā. “What do you say, friend?” he asked. When the friend replied: “The Buddha, friend, is going to see Sirimā. Are you coming along?” Answering: “Yes, I am,” he threw away the stale food, washed the bowl, put it in the bag and went along with other monks.

Surrounded by monks, the Buddha stood on one side at the cemetery. There were also groups of nuns, members of the royalty and male and female lay devotees, standing on other sides. When all had gathered, the Buddha asked the king: “Great King, who was this woman?” – “Exalted Buddha, she was a young woman named Sirimā, sister of the physician Jīvaka,” answered the king. “Was she Sirimā, Great King?” the Buddha asked again. When the king affirmed it, the Buddha said: “Great King, in that case, if she was Jīvaka’s sister, have an announcement made by beating the drum that: ‘Those who desire Sirimā may take her on the payment of 1,000 pieces of money.’ ”

The king did as instructed by the Buddha. But there was no one who would say even “Hey!” or “Ho!” So the king informed the Buddha that: “Nobody would like to take her,” the Buddha said: “Great King, if there is none to take her for 1,000 pieces of money then reduce the price,” the king then had it announced that those who would like to take her by paying 500. Again none was found desirous of taking her by paying that amount of money. Again the price was reduced to 250, 200, 100, 50, 25, five, one coin, half a coin, one fourth of a coin, one sixteenth of a coin, just a liquorice seed. But nobody came out to take her body. Finally it was announced that the body might be taken for free, without making any payment at all. Still no one muttered even “Hey!” or “Ho!”

The king reported the matter to the Buddha, saying: “Exalted Buddha, there does not exist a single person who would take it even when free of charge!” the Buddha then spoke as follows: “You monks, my dear sons! Behold this woman Sirimā who had been dear to many. Formerly in this city of Rājagaha one could seek pleasure with her by paying as much as 1,000 pieces of money. Now nobody would like to take her even without paying anything at all! The beauty that was so highly valued has now come to destruction. Monks, through your eyes of wisdom observe this physical frame that is always intolerably suffering!” Then the Buddha uttered the following verse (Dhp 147):

Passa citta-kataṃ bimbaṃ, arukāyaṃ samussitaṃ, āturaṃ bahu-saṅkappaṃ, yassa natthi dhuvāṃ ṭhiti.

My dear sons, monks! There is no such a thing as a nature of firmness or of steadfastness in this bodily frame, not even the slightest bit. The body which is made pleasant and exquisite with dress and ornaments, flowers and perfumes and other forms of cosmetics; which is composed of limbs big and small, beautiful and proportionate, giving a false impression of splendour, which can stand upright because of its 300 bones; which is constantly suffering and intolerable; which is wrongly thought of by many blind worldlings to be pleasant, befitting and fortunate as they know no truth and [790] have no intelligence, and which is unpleasant as the whole thing is disgustingly full of loathsomeness, trickling down from the sore-like nine openings. With your penetrating eye, have a look at such a body, study repeatedly!

By the end of the discourse, 84,000 beings realized the four truths and attained emancipation, and the young monk who had loved Sirimā became established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).

While the young monk was starving himself, Sirimā died and was reborn as Chief Queen to Suyāma Deva of the Yāma celestial abode. The Buddha, in the company of monks, took the young monk and went to watch the remains of Sirimā that was not cremated yet but kept by King Bimbisāra under the Buddha's instructions at the cemetery where dead bodies were thrown away. Similarly, the citizens as well as the king himself were present there.

There, at the cemetery, the people talked among themselves: "Friends, in the past it was hard to get your turn to see and enjoy her even by paying 1,000 pieces of money. But now no person would like to do so even for a liquorice seed."

In connection with the story of Sirimā, the account contained in the Discourse about Victory (Vijaya-sutta, Snp 1.11) and its commentary, will be included here, for it has so much appeal.

The celestial Queen Sirimā accompanied by 500 divine chariots came to the cemetery. To the monks and lay people who had assembled there at the cemetery, the Buddha delivered the Discourse about Victory (Vijaya-sutta) and to the young monk he uttered in his exhortation the verse beginning with: Passa citta-katam bimbam, "there is no such a thing as a nature of firmness or of steadfastness in this bodily frame," as preserved in the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, Dh 147).

The Discourse about Victory

The first verse spoken by the Buddha (Snp 195):

Caram vā yadi vā tiṭṭham, nisinno uda vā sayam, samiñjeti pasāreti, esā kāyassa iñjanā.

Walking or standing; sitting or lying down; bending one's joints or stretching them; all these postures of walking, standing, sitting, lying down, stepping forward, stepping backward, bending and stretching are movements of the body.

By this verse is meant the following: In this body there is no person who walks, no person who stands, no person who stretches. In fact, one should:

1. Know that it is the mind that desires to walk, stand, sit or lie down.

34a: The 17th Rains Retreat (Beauty) – 1118

2. Know that it is the mind that conditions the wind element that pervades the body and causes movement.
3. Know that when the wind element pervades the body new matter arises, and it is the matter that walks.
4. Know with intelligence that what walks is no person or self, but it is matter which does the walking.
5. Know with intelligence that what stands is no person or self, but it is matter which does the standing.
6. Know with intelligence that what sits is no person or self but it is matter which does the sitting.
7. Know with intelligence that what has lain down is no person or self, but it is matter which does the lying down. [791]
8. Know with intelligence that what bends is no person or self, but it is matter which does the bending.
9. Know with intelligence that what stretches in and out is no person or self, but it is matter that does the stretching.

In accordance with the above lines:

1. When the mind desires to walk, the wind element, conditioned by the mind pervades the body. Because of the pervasion of the wind element, there appears the bodily gesture of striding in the desired direction. That is to say, particular forms of matter come into being in succession by the gesture of striding towards another desired place. Because of the striding gesture of these successive forms of matter, such a gesture is called “going” in worldly parlance.
2. Similarly, when the mind desires to stand, the wind element, conditioned by the mind, pervades the body. Because of the pervasion of the wind element, there appears the vertically erection of the body. That is to say, particular forms of matter come into being in succession by vertical erection. Because of the vertical erection of these successive forms of matter in linking the upper part and the lower part of the body, such a gesture is called “standing” in worldly parlance.
3. Similarly, when the mind desires to sit, the wind element, conditioned by the mind, pervades the body. Because of the pervasion of the wind element, there appears the bending gesture of the lower part and the erecting gesture of the upper part of the body. That is to say, particular forms of matter come into being in succession by the bending of the lower part and the erection of the upper part of the body. Because of the partly bending and partly erecting gesture of these successive forms of matter, such a gesture is called “sitting” in worldly parlance.

4. Similarly, when the mind desires to lie down, the wind element, conditioned by the mind, pervades the body. Because of the pervasion of the wind element, there appears the horizontally stretching gesture of the body. That is to say, particular forms of matter come into being in succession by the horizontally stretching gesture of the body. Because of the horizontally stretching of these successive forms of matter, such a gesture is called “lying down” in worldly parlance.

In the case of “bending” or “stretching” too, as the mind desires to bend or to stretch, the mind-conditioned wind element pervades the joints. Because of this pervasion of the wind element, the bending or the stretching gesture appears. That is to say particular forms of matter come into being in succession to form the bending or the stretching gesture. Because of the bending or the stretching gesture of these successive forms of matter, such a gesture is called “bending” or “stretching” in worldly parlance.

Therefore, all these gestures of walking, sitting, sleeping, bending or stretching belong to the body. That is to say, particular forms of matter come into being by their respective gestures. In this body there is no individuality, no entity, no soul that walks, stands, sits, lies down, bends or stretches. This body is devoid of any individual entity, any soul, that does the walking, the standing, the sitting, the lying down, the bending or the stretching, what is in reality is mind preceding the wind element (SnA, PTS 1.247).

vāyu-nānattato nānā, hoti kāyassa iñjanā.*

On account of the particular state of mind, the particular state of the wind element arises. On account of the particular state of the wind element, the particular state of the body’s movement arises.

This is the ultimate sense of the verse. By this first verse the Buddha teaches the three characteristics: the characteristic of impermanence (anicca-lakkhaṇa), the characteristic of suffering (dukkha-lakkhaṇa) and the characteristic of non-self (anatta-lakkhaṇa).

The way he teaches is as follows: [792] When one remains long in any of the four postures of walking, standing, sitting and lying down, one becomes painful and uneasy. In order to dispel that pain and uneasiness, one changes one's posture.

The characteristic of suffering is covered over by change in posture. In order to not let the characteristic of suffering appear, it is hidden by means of another posture. That is why the wise say: "The posture (iriyāpatha) covers the characteristic of suffering."

Thus by the three feet beginning with: Caram vā yadi vā tiṭṭham, "whether walking or standing," the characteristic of suffering covered up by a change of posture is taught.

Change of one posture to another is due to body-pain. The cause, which is body-pain, the characteristic of suffering, is known from the aforesaid effect which is change of posture.

In the same way, as there is no posture of standing, sitting, etc., while one walks, the characteristic of impermanence covered by continuity (santati) is taught by the Buddha who says: Esā kāyassa iñjanā, "all these postures of walking, standing, sitting, lying down, stepping forward, stepping backward, bending and stretching are movements of the body."

Further explanation: The uninterrupted arising of matter and mind is called continuity. Because of this continuity, which is the uninterrupted arising of matter and mind, the cessation and disappearance of matter and mind, that is, the characteristic of impermanence, is not seen. That is why the wise say: "Continuity covers the characteristic of impermanence." By his teaching: Esā kāyassa iñjanā, the Buddha means to say: "All these postures of walking, standing, sitting, lying down, stepping forwards, stepping backwards, bending and stretching are movements of the body."

In each posture, an aggregate of mind and matter, in harmony with the posture, arises uninterruptedly. With the change of each posture, the aggregate of mind and matter changes or disappears too. Therefore, it is understood that by the fourth and last line, the Buddha teaches the characteristic of impermanence covered by continuity.

As has been said above, in ultimate reality, it is because of the mind, which desires to walk, to stand, to sit or to lie down that the mind-conditioned wind element arises. Because the wind element pervades the body, particular forms of matter, such as the gesture of walking, of standing, of sitting or of lying down, arise. With reference to these gestures people say: “One walks,” “One stands,” “One sits,” “One lies down,” “One steps forward,” “One steps backwards,” “One bends,” or “One stretches.” In ultimate reality, however, this is the mere arising of particular forms of matter as they rise into being by certain combined causes in harmony. That is to say this is the mere arising of particular forms of matter by the gestures of walking, standing, etc., as motivated by the combination in harmony of the causes belonging to both the matter and the mind of the body. Those who teach soul theory (atta-vāda) have no profound knowledge of this, so they say: “The soul itself walks, stands, sits or lies down.” On the contrary the Buddha declares that it is not the soul that does the walking, standing, sitting and lying down. Esa kāyassa iñjanā, “all these are but movements of the body appearing through their respective gestures, accomplished by a number of causes which harmoniously come together.”

The following account of the four masses is reproduced from the sub-commentary to the Enumeration of Phenomena (Dhamma-saṅgaṇī) and the sub-sub-commentary (Anuṭṭhā).

Herein, there are four masses (ghāna):

1. Mass of continuity (santati-ghāna).
2. Mass of coherence (samūha-ghāna).
3. Mass of functions (kicca-ghāna).
4. Mass of sense objects (ārammaṇa-ghāna).

Of these four:

1. The arising of physical and mental elements by uniting, combining and cohering with one another so that they appear as a whole without any gap is the mass of continuity (santati-ghāna).

Herein, “without any gap” means the cessation of the preceding element [793] coincides with the arising of the following or, as soon as the preceding element ceases the following arises. This is said by the sub-commentary to be: Purima-pacchimānaṃ nirantaratā, “the absence of a gap between one element and the next.” By arising thus without any gap, it seems that the arising elements are more powerful and overwhelming and the ceasing elements less manifest; so people then have a wrong impression that what we see now is what we saw previously. This is proved by the fact that when a burning stick is turned round and round, it is thought to be a ring of fire. This indeed is the mass of continuity.

2. The arising of mental elements, such as contact (phassa), and of physical elements, such as the earth element (paṭhavī), by uniting, combining and cohering with one another so that they all give the impression of their being one in reality is a mass of coherence. When mental and physical elements arise, they do so not as one natural quality (sabhāva-satti). On the mental side, there are at least eight elements, such as eye-consciousness (cakkhu-viññāṇa), and seven mental concomitants, dealing with all consciousness (sabba-citta-sādhāraṇa-cetasika); on the physical side too, there are at least eight elements, by which eight material units are referred to. Thus, at least eight natural qualities, whether mental or physical, give the impression that they are but one, by uniting, combining and cohering with one another; such is meant by a mass of coherence (samūha-ghāna). This indeed is the mass of coherence.

3. Elements belonging to a mental or physical unit arise, performing their respective functions. When they arise, it is difficult for those who have no knowledge of Abhidhamma to understand this is the function of contact (phassa), this is the function of sensation (vedanā), this is the function of perception (saññā), and so on. Likewise, it is difficult for them to understand this is the function of the earth element (paṭhavī), this is the function of the water element (āpo), this is the function of the wind element (vāyo), this is the function of the fire element (tejo),” and so on. Thus the functions of the elements, being difficult to grasp, make their appearance as a whole by uniting, combining and cohering with one another; such is called a mass of functions (kicca-ghāna). This indeed is the mass of functions.

4. Elements belonging to each mental unit collectively pay attention to elements belonging to each physical unit form a single object for one’s attention by uniting, combining and cohering with one another, leading one to the impression that they are just one natural quality, in reality it is a mass of sense objects (ārammaṇa-ghāna). This indeed is the mass of sense objects.

In short, several physical and mental elements arise as a result of a cause (paccayuppannā); but it is hard to discern their differences in terms of time, nature, function and attention and thus they create the false impression that they are but one unit; they are called respectively mass of continuity (santati-ghāna), a mass of coherence (samuha-ghāna), a mass of functions (kicca-ghāna) and a mass of sense objects (ārammaṇa-ghāna).

In dealing with ultimate reality, the quality of an element is to be discerned. For instance, with regard to a chilli seed, the mind is to be focussed only on its taste. Only when the natural quality of an element is discerned with the eye of wisdom can the ultimate reality be penetrated. Only when the ultimate reality is penetrated, is the mass (ghāna) dissolved. Only when the mass is dissolved, is the knowledge of non-self (anatta) gained. If the natural quality is not discerned with the eye of wisdom, ultimate reality cannot be penetrated. If the ultimate reality is not penetrated, the mass is not dissolved. If the mass is not dissolved, the knowledge of non-self is not gained. That is why the wise say: “Mass (ghāna) covers up the characteristic of non-self (anatta).”

By the fourth foot of the first verse the Buddha reveals the characteristic of [794] non-self that is covered up by the masses, for he says there, Esā kāyassa iñjanā, “all these postures do not belong to a soul or an entity, but they are, in fact, just the movements of the physical and mental elements accomplished in their respective functions.” Deep indeed is the teaching. It cannot be understood through the eye of ordinary wisdom.

Having thus taught by way of the three characteristics, the meditation subject of void or absence (suññatā) of permanence (nicca), happiness (sukha), and soul (atta), and in order to preach the two kinds of loathsomeness, that of the living (saviññāṇaka-asubha) and that of lifeless (aviññāṇaka-asubha), the Buddha uttered more verses (Snp 196):

Aṭṭhi-nahāru-saṃyutto, taca-maṃsāvalepano, chaviyā kāyo paṭicchanno, yathā-bhūtaṃ na dissati.

This living body is composed of 300 bones, 900 tendons that bind the bones and 7,000 capillaries that help experience the tastes. It is plastered by the thick inner skin in white and 900 extremely stinking and disgusting lumps of flesh. This living body is covered by the thinner outer skin of different colours as the walls of a house are painted brown, etc; therefore the reality of loathsomeness is entirely indiscernible in true perspective to the fools who are blind for lack of wisdom.

34a: The 17th Rains Retreat (Beauty) – 1124

The nature of the body is said to be as follows: Just as in a house, beams, purlins, principal rafters and common rafters and other substantial parts are fastened and kept immovable by means of rattan stems, even so in the body the 360 substantial bones are fastened and kept immovable by means of the rattan-like 900 tendons. Just as walls of bamboo matting are plastered with cowdung and fine earth, even so the bones and the tendons are plastered by the 900 lumps of flesh. As the walls of the house are finished with cement, so the body is wrapped up by the thicker skin. The aforesaid bones, tendons, lumps of flesh and thicker skin have by nature a foul and loathsome smell. But, as the walls are painted in different colours, such as brown, yellow, green, red, etc., in order to make the house look beautiful, the bones, tendons, lumps of flesh and the thicker skin are covered by the paint-like outer, thin skin, which is flimsy like the wing of a fly, in brown, golden, red, or white colour. The skin is so flimsy that when it is taken off from the body and rolled into a ball, its size would be as small as a plum seed. Therefore those without the eye of wisdom cannot see its loathsomeness in its true state.

In order to preach that the variety of unpleasant internal organs must be seen by penetrating them with the eye of wisdom – the organs, very impure, foul smelling, disgusting and loathsome but which are not obvious to all people because they are thus enveloped by the thicker skin that is again covered by the coloured outer skin – the Buddha went on to utter these verses (Snp 197-198):

*Anta-pūro udara-pūro, yakana-peḷassa vatthino, hadayassa papphāsassa, vakkassa pihakassa ca.
Siṅhāṇi-kāya kheḷassa, sedassa ca medassa ca, lohitassa lasikāya, pittassa ca vasāya ca. [795]*

This living body is not filled with sandalwood perfume, etc. In fact, this body is filled with such things as intestines, newly eaten food, liver, urine, heart, a pair of lungs, a pair of kidneys and the spleen. This living body is filled with the mucus of the nose, saliva, sweat, fat, blood, sinovial fluid, bile, and marrow.

Having taught thus, by these two verses that there is nothing in the body that is worth keeping with pleasure like pearls, rubies and so on and that this body is, in fact, full of impurities, the Buddha uttered the following two verses in order to reveal the internal impurities in contrast to the external appearance and in order to combine those already enumerated with those not enumerated yet (Snp 199-200):

*Athassa navahi sotehi, asucī savati sabbadā, akkhimhā akkhi-gūthako, kaṇṇamhā kaṇṇa-gūthako.
Siṅghāṇikā ca nāsato, mukhena vamatekadā, pittam semhañ-ca vamati, kāyamhā seda-jallikā.*

Besides, from the nine sore openings of the living body ever uncontrollably flow at all times, day and night, filthy and loathsome elements. From the eyes flows an unclean secretion: from the ears flow the unclean wax. Impure mucus sometimes flows from the nose. Sometimes frothy food, when vomited, comes out through the mouth. Sometimes the bile as organ (baddha) and the bile as fluid (abaddha) and the phlegm come out frothy from the mouth. From the body, day and night, sweat, salt, moisture, dirt and other impurities come out at all times.

Herein since the flow of excrement from the opening of the rectum and that of urine are understood by many and since the Buddha wished to show his regard for the occasion, the individual and the audience concerned, he did not mention them explicitly and as he desired only to say that there were impurities that flow by other means as well, he summarized all in the expression: Kāyamhā seda-jallikā, “other impurities come out at all times.”

By these two verses the Buddha gave a simile: Just as when rice is cooked, the impure rice water comes up with the scum and overflows the brim of the pot, even so when the food eaten is cooked by means of the digestive fire element generated by one’s past deeds (kammaja-tejo-dhātu), impurities, such as secretion of the eyes, ears, etc., come up and overflow the body.

The head is recognized as the most sacred part of the body. Because of the sacredness, or sometimes through conceit, the head is not bowed in showing respect even to those worthy of respect. In order to show that the body was impure and loathsome by the fact that even the head, as the most sacred part of the body, was devoid of essence and purity, the Buddha uttered this verse (Snp 201):

Athassa susiramī sīsamī, mattha-luṅgassa pūritamī, subhato nam māññati, bālo avijjāya purakkhato.

Besides, the hollow head of the living body is disgusting, it is filled with the brain. The fool, who is blind to reality through craving, conceit and false views because he is enveloped wrongly by ignorance, wrongly takes the body thus: [796] “Beautiful is my body indeed. Beautiful am I indeed. My beauty is permanent!”

Having thus taught the loathsomeness of the living, now, in order, to preach the loathsomeness when life is destroyed, in other words, having taught that even the body of the Universal Monarch is full of putridness, and that therefore even life filled with all kinds of luxury is also unpleasant, the Buddha uttered this verse (Snp 202):

*Yadā ca so mato seti, uddhumāto vinīlako,

When the body is dead because of the absence of three factors: Life (āyu), or material and mental life (jīvita), body temperature (usmā) or the fire element generated by the past deeds (kammaja-tejo) and consciousness (viññāṇa) it becomes swollen like a leather bag filled with air, it turns black through loss of the original complexion and it lies in the coffin deserted at the cemetery. Then all relatives and friends have no regard for him thinking: “It is certain that the dead will not come to life again.”

In this verse, by “dead (mato)” is shown impermanence; by “lies in the coffin (seti)” is shown a lack of vitality. By both words, it is urged that the two kinds of conceit, the conceit due to living (jīvita-māna) and that due to strength (bala-māna), should be rejected.

By “swollen (uddhumāto)” is shown the destruction of shape; by “turns black (vinīlako)” is shown the loss of the original complexion. By both words it is urged that the conceit due to beauty and that due to good shape should be rejected.

By “deserted (āpaviddho)” is shown the total absence of what is to be taken back; by “at the cemetery (susānasmim̃)” is shown the loathsomeness that is so intolerable that the body is not worth keeping at home. By both words, it is urged that the grasping with the thought: “This is mine,” and the impression that: “It is pleasant,” should be rejected.

By the words “all the relatives and friends have no regard for it (anapekkhā honti ñātayo),” is shown that those who formerly adored the deceased no longer do so. By showing thus it is urged that the conceit due to having a large number of companions around (parivāra-māna) should be rejected. By this verse, the Buddha thus pointed out the lifeless body that has not disintegrated yet.

Now in order to point out the loathsomeness of the lifeless body that has disintegrated, the Buddha uttered this verse (Snp 203):

Khādanti naṃ suvānā ca, siṅgālā vakā kimī, kākā gijjhā ca khādanti, ye caññe santi pāṇino.

Domestic dogs and jackals, wolves and worms, eat that discarded body at the cemetery; crows and vultures also eat it; other flesh eating creatures, such as leopards, tigers, eagles, kites and the like, also devour it.

In this way the Buddha taught the nature of this body by virtue of the voidness (suññatā) meditation through the first verse beginning with: Caram vā yadi vā tiṭṭham, “whether walking or standing,” by virtue of the loathsomeness of the living body through the six verses beginning with: Aṭṭhi nahāru saṃyutto, “his living body is composed of 300 bones,” and by virtue of the loathsomeness of the lifeless body through the two verses [797] beginning with: Yadā ca so mato seti, “when the body is dead.”

Furthermore, the Buddha revealed, thereby, the state of the fool who thought that the body was pleasant, for he was overcome by ignorance regarding the body that was really devoid of permanence (nicca), pleasantness (subha) and self (atta). By so doing, the Buddha disclosed the fact that the round of suffering (vaṭṭa-dukkha) indeed was led by ignorance (avijjā). Now, in order, to point out the state of the wise man regarding the body of such nature and the fact that the end of suffering (vivaṭṭa) was led by the three phases of thorough understanding (pariññā), the Buddha uttered these verses (Snp 204):

Suvāna Buddha-vacanaṃ, bhikkhu paññāṇavā idha, so kho naṃ parijānāti, yathā-bhūtañ-hi passati.

In this Dispensation of the Buddha which consists of eight wonders, the monastic, who is a worldling (puthujjana), a learner (sekkha) or a meditator (yogāvacara), endowed with insight (vipassanā), having heard properly this discourse of the Buddha named the Discourse about Victory (Vijaya-sutta, Snp 1.11), sometimes called the Discourse on Disinterest in the Body (Kāya-vicchandānika-sutta) sees with the eye of insight the body in its true nature; he therefore discerns the body clearly through the three phases of understanding (pariññā): knowledge (ñāta), judgement (tīraṇa) and abandoning (pahāna).

34a: The 17th Rains Retreat (Beauty) – 1128

The way of discernment of the body by the three phases of understanding (pariññā) is as follows: After inspecting carefully a variety of merchandise, a merchant considers: “If I buy it at this price my profit would be this much.” Then only he buys the merchandise and sells it at a profit. In the same way, the worldling, learner or meditating monastic inspects his body with his eye of wisdom and comes to understand thoroughly, by understanding-knowledge (ñāta-pariññā): “Things that truly constitute the body are merely bones, sinews, etc. which are directly mentioned in the text and hair on the head, hair on the body, etc. which are not directly mentioned in the text.” He then reflects and judges the body with the eye of insight and comes to understand by judgment (tīraṇa-pariññā): “The phenomena that occur in the body are only impermanent (anicca), unsatisfactory (dukkha), and non-self (anatta).” Finally, he arrives at the noble path (ariya-magga) and comes to understand by abandoning (pahāna-pariññā) and abandons his attachment to the body or his desire and passion for the body.

Herein, because this body, which is visible to all, would not have been thoroughly understood through the three phases of understanding (pariññā) should there be no chance to listen to the Buddha’s teaching, in spite of the body’s visibility, because such thorough understanding is possible only when his teaching is heard, and in order to point out that there is also the way of understanding the characteristics of voidness (suññata), etc. through the three phases of understanding (pariññā) and also to point out that those who are outside the Buddha’s Dispensation are unable to discern in this manner, the Buddha uttered: Sutvāna Buddha-vacanāṃ idha, “in this Dispensation of the Buddha.”

On account of the female monastic Ven. Nandā and on that of the monastic whose mind craved for the beauty of Sirimā, the Discourse about Victory (Vijaya-sutta) was delivered. Of the four assemblies, the assembly of monks ranks highest; it was only that very assembly of monks that was ever close to the Buddha. Anybody, be he a monk or a layman, who meditates on impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and selflessness (anatta), can be designated a monastic. In order to point out these things, the Buddha uses the term monastic, not because the three phases of understanding (pariññā) are confined to monastics. This import should also be noted in particular.

Now, in order to point out the way of seeing things as they really are in accordance with the words: Yathā-bhūtañ-hi passati, “he therefore discerns the body clearly,” the Buddha uttered this verse (Sn̐ 205): [798]

ajjhatañ-ca bahiddhā ca, kāye chandaṃ virājaye.*

Even as this living body full of loathsomeness walks, stands, sits and lies down, because it is not without the three factors of physical and mental life (āyu), the kamma-generated body heat (usmā) and consciousness (viññāṇa) so was the lifeless body of loathsomeness at the cemetery, which before its death could walk, stand, sit and lie down, as it was then not without those three factors.

Even as the dead, lifeless body is now unable to walk, stand, sit or lie down because of the cessation of those three factors, so will this body of mine be unable to walk, stand, sit or lie down because of the cessation of the very three factors.

Thus, the practising wise one who ponders and discerns the events of the body threatened by the danger of Samsāra should be able to uproot the attachment to, or the desire and passion for, the internal body as well as the external, by means of the fourfold path-knowledge, in the mode of abandoning by cutting off (samuccheda-pahāna).

In this verse, by identifying oneself with the lifeless body one abandons the defilement of anger (dosa-kilesa) that would arise with regard to the external body as he ponders: Yathā idaṃ tathā etaṃ, “even as this living body of mine is, so was that lifeless body of loathsomeness in the past.”

By identifying the lifeless body with oneself, one abandons the defilement of passion (rāga-kilesa) that would arise in the internal body as he ponders: Yathā etaṃ tathā idaṃ, “even as this lifeless body, so will be my living body in future.”

As one knows, by one’s wisdom, the manner of mutual identification of the two internal and external bodies, or of the two living and lifeless bodies, one abandons one’s defilement of ignorance (moha-kilesa), i.e., ignorance of the nature of both bodies.

In this way, even at the earlier moment of the arising of insight (vipassanā) one knows things as they really are and removes the three roots of unwholesomeness, greed (lobha), hatred (dosa) and delusion (moha). At the later moment of the arising of insight, through the four stages of the path, one can abandon all desire and passion, leaving no trace of them, in the mode of abandoning by cutting off (samuccheda-pahāna). This import is to be noted.

Having pointed out the level of learners (sekkha-bhūmi), the Buddha now desired to point out the level of those beyond learning (asekkha-bhūmi) and uttered this verse (Snp 206):

Chanda-rāga-viratto so, bhikkhu paññānavā idha, ajjhagā amataṃ santim, Nibbānaṃ padam-accutaṃ.

In this teaching which consists of eight wonders, or, with regard to this body, living or lifeless, within or without, the monastic, who has totally abandoned all craving and desire, who possess the path-wisdom of an Arahāt, who has reached the fruition immediately after the path and become an Arahāt, attained Nibbāna that is deathless or excellent like ambrosia, the cessation of all conditioned things (saṅkhāra) or the characteristic of peace, the release from craving, the state absolutely free from the nature of falling, the goal that can be attained by path-wisdom.

By this verse, the Buddha meant to say that the one who practises in the manner mentioned previously, abandons craving and desire, or all moral defilements led by craving and desire, and secures the two elements of Nibbāna.

Having taught thus the loathsomeness meditation (asubha-kammaṭṭhāna) by means of the [799] living (saviññānaka) body and the lifeless (aviññānaka) body together with its culmination in the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna, the Buddha uttered again the two final verses in order to censure, by a brief discourse, the unmindful living (pamāda-vihāra) that was dangerous to such greatly fruitful meditation (Snp 206-207):

*Dvipādakoyaṃ asuci, duggandho parihārati, nānā-kuṇapa-paripūro, vissavanto tato tato.
Etā-disena kāyena, yo maññe uṇṇam-etave, paraṃ vā avajāneyya, kim-aññatra adassanā.*

This human body, having two feet, which is full of impure, disgusting things and is foul-smelling, has to undergo daily maintenance such as through bathing, perfuming, etc. But despite such daily maintenance it is still filled with numerous kinds of filth, and from the nine openings and the pores on the body flow incessantly such disgusting things as saliva, secretion of the eye, sweat, mucus of the nose, wax of the ear, in spite of repeated attempts to cover them up by applying perfumes and wearing flowers.

By the body, or because of the body, which is thus impure and full of disgusting things, the fool, whether male or female, may think, through craving, that: “This is my body!” Through conceit that: “This I am indeed!” Through wrong view, that: “My body is lasting!” which only enhances one’s arrogance. On the other hand one may despise others for their lowly birth, name, clan and the like. In so exalting oneself and despising others what reason can be there other than not discerning the four truths in their true perspective. It is only due to one’s ignorance of the four truths that one praises oneself and has contempt for others.

By the end of the discourse, 84,000 beings realised the four truths and were released. The divine Queen Sirimā attained the Non-returner fruition (Anāgāmi-phala). The monastic who was previously enamoured of Sirimā attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).

This Discourse is called by three names: 1) The Discourse about Victory (Vijaya-sutta); 2) the Discourse on Disinterest in the Body (Kāya-vicchandanika-sutta); and 3) the Discourse to Nandā (Nandā-sutta). The reason is:

1. It leads to the victory (vijaya) over desire and passion (chanda-rāga) or craving and greed (taṇhā-lobha) for the body; hence it is called the Discourse about Victory (Vijaya-sutta).
2. It teaches the eradication of desire and passion, craving and greed, for the body; hence it is called the Discourse on Disinterest in the Body (Kāya-vicchandanika-sutta).
3. The story of the courtesan Sirimā was the introduction to the second delivery of the discourse. This very discourse was previously given to Ven. Janapadakalyāṇī Nandā in Sāvattihī; hence it is called the Discourse to Nandā (Nandā-sutta).

Explanation:

1. The Discourse about Victory (Vijaya-sutta) was first taught in connection with Ven. Janapadakalyāṇī in Sāvattihī.

2. The same discourse was taught with reference to the courtesan Sirimā in Rājagaha.

The account of the second teaching has been told. That of the first teaching was as follows:

Ven. Janapadakalyāṇī Nandā

While visiting the city of Kapilavatthu for the first time after becoming a Buddha, the Buddha exhorted the Sakyan Prince and ordained Prince Nanda and [800] others. Five years later when he granted permission for ordination of females as female monastics the three Sakyan princesses:

1. Nandā, sister of Ven. Ānanda.
2. Abhirūpanandā, daughter of the Sakyan Prince Khemaka.
3. Janapadakalyāṇī Nandā, fiance of Prince Nanda were also ordained.

At the time of their ordination, the Buddha was still staying in Sāvattthī. Of these three princesses, Abhirūpanandā was so-called because of her great beauty. Janapadakalyāṇī Nandā too saw nobody else comparable to her in beauty. Since both were highly conceited with their beautiful appearance, they never approached the Buddha nor did they want to see him either; for they thought: “The Buddha dispises beauty. In various ways, he points out the fault in good looks.”

“Why then did they become female monastics?” it may be asked. The answer is: “Because they had none to depend on in society; hence their becoming female monastics.”

Explanation: The husband of the Sakyan Princess, Abhirūpanandā, died on the day they were married. Then the parents made her a nun against her will.

Janapadakalyāṇī became a nun because she had lost her hope to win back her fiance when the latter, as Ven. Nanda, became an Arahat. Then she thought: “My Lord, Prince Nanda, my mother Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī, and other relatives have joined the Saṅgha. It is indeed a misery to live without one’s kinsmen in the world of householders,” and finding no solace in living in an organised community of families. Both of their ordinations took place, but not out of faith (saddhā).

Knowing the maturity of wisdom of both, the Buddha gave an order to Ven. Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī that: “All female monastics are required to come in turn for receiving an exhortation.” When their turn came, the elder nuns sent someone else on their behalf. This prompted the Buddha to issue another order: “Coming in person to me, in turn, is compulsory. Sending a representative is not permitted.”

Thereafter, one day, Ven. Abhirūpanandā came to the Buddha to receive his exhortation. Then the Buddha stirred her mind by means of his created figure of a woman and by uttering the following verses of exhortation (Dhp 150):

Aṭṭhīnaṃ nagaraṃ kataṃ, maṃsa-lohita-lepanaṃ, yattha jarā ca maccu ca, māno makkho ca ohito.

Dear daughter Abhirūpanandā! Just as a typical barn for storing crops is built by fixing timber, by binding it with rattan stems, and by plastering it with earth, even so the barn-like body has been built by the carpenter-like craving by fixing the 300 bones, by binding it with sinews, and by plastering it with 900 lumps of flesh and a measure (pattha) of blood. Deposited in it are old age, death, conceit and ingratitude (1st line = Nandātherīapadānaṃ, Thī 19a; 2nd line = Thg 394b):

*Āturaṃ kuṇapaṃ pūtiṃ, passa nande samussayaṃ;
Uggharantaṃ paggharantaṃ, bālānaṃ abhinanditaṃ.*

Dear daughter Abhirūpanandā! Behold carefully with the eye of wisdom, the body which is constantly painful, impure, stale, having a flow of filth going upwards and downwards, that body the fools are highly fond of.

The second half of the verse in the Verses of the Elder Nuns (Therī-gāthā) reads (Thī 19b): [801]

Asubhāya cittaṃ bhāvehi, ekaggāṃ susamāhitaṃ.

Which may be translated as:

Develop your absorption (jhāna) consciousness on the loathsomeness of the living body, the consciousness that has one-pointedness by access concentration (upacāra-samādhi) and that is well concentrated by fixed concentration (appana-samādhi). The following verse reads (Thī 20):

Animittañ-ca bhāvehi, mānānusayam-ujjaha, tato mānābhisamayā, upasantā carissasi.

Dear daughter Abhirūpanandā! Develop incessantly your meditation on impermanence (anicca-bhāvanā), your meditation on suffering (dukkha-bhāvanā) and your meditation on non-self (anatta-bhāvanā) which are collectively designated as things having no sign of permanence (animitta). Uproot the impression of “I” that has latently come along in the Saṃsāra which has no beginning. By so doing in the mode of abandoning by cutting off (samuccheda-pahāna), dear daughter, you will live with all the heat of moral defilement quenched.

By giving his exhortation by these verses, as mentioned in the Verses of the Elder Nuns (Therī-gāthā), the Buddha established the elder Abhirūpanandā in the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala) in due course.

One day, the citizens of Sāvattthī gave alms and observed the precepts in the morning. They also dressed themselves well and went to the Jetavana monastery, carrying unguents and flowers and other offerings to attend to the Buddha’s discourse. When the discourse was over, they did obeisance to the Buddha and entered again into the city. The female monastics also returned to their living quarters after listening to the discourse.

In the city of Sāvattthī, the lay people, as well as the female monastics, spoke in praise of the master as follows: There is nobody who fails to have devotion on seeing the Buddha in the assembly of Devas and humans, who are particularly attracted by four things: His body (rūpa), his voice (ghosa), his austerity (lūkha) and his Dhamma. To wit:

1. Those who are mainly attracted to body (rūpappamāṇika) become devoted to the Buddha when they see his splendid beauty with his major and minor signs and the radiance of light in six colours.
2. Those who are mainly attracted to his voice (ghosappamāṇika) become devoted to the Buddha when they hear his good reputation as a Bodhisatta from numerous Birth Stories (Jātaka) and his voice as a Buddha that has eight qualities.
3. Those who are attracted to austere use of the four requisites and scarcity of moral defilement (lūkhappamāṇika) become devoted to the Buddha when they know of his few wants of the four requisites and of his striving (dukkara-cariyā).

4. Those who are mainly attracted to such virtues as morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā) and other attributes (dhammappamāṇika) become devoted to the Buddha when they reflect on one of his five attributes, such as morality as an attribute (sīla-guṇa), mental concentration as an attribute (samādhi-guṇa), wisdom as an attribute (paññā-guṇa), emancipation as an attribute (vimutti-guṇa) and insight leading to emancipation as an attribute (vimutti-ñāṇa-dassana), which are all beyond compare.

In this way, words were spoken everywhere in praise of the Buddha, words that [802] incessantly overflow from their mouths.

1) Two thirds (66%) of beings are attracted to his body; 2) four-fifths (80%) are attracted to his fame and voice; 3) nine-tenths (90%) are attracted to his austere use of the four requisites and scarcity of moral defilement; 4) one in 100,000 is attracted to such virtues as morality, concentration and wisdom. However numerous beings are they all make four divisions if divided in this way.

Of these four divisions of beings, those who fail to be devoted to the Buddha were very few, far more were those devoted. Explanation: 1) To those attracted to his body, there was no beauty more attractive than the Buddha's; 2) to those attracted to fame and voice, there was no fame and voice more attractive than the Buddha's; 3) to those attracted to his austere use of the four requisites and scarcity of moral defilement, there was no austerity than that of the Buddha who gave up fine clothes made in the country of Kāśi, gold vessels, the three golden palaces befitting the three seasons and replete with various sensual pleasures, but who put on rag-robes, used a lithic bowl, stayed at the foot of a tree for lodging, etc.; and 4) to those attracted to such virtues as morality, concentration and wisdom, there was no attribute more attractive in the whole world than the attributes of the Buddha such as morality, concentration, etc. In this way, the Buddha held in his grip the entire world of beings, so to speak, who formed the four categories (catuppamāṇika).<sup>225</sup>

When the Ven. Janapadakalyāṇī Nandā got back to her dwelling, she heard various words in praise of the Buddha's attributes, and it occurred to her: "These people are talking about the attributes of my brother the Buddha as though their mouths have no capacity to contain them all. If the Buddha were to speak ill of my beauty the whole day long how much could he do so? What if I go to the Buddha and pay homage to him and listen to his discourse without showing my person.” Thus thinking she told her fellow female monastics: “I shall come along with you to listen to his discourse.” The other female monastics were glad and went to the monastery taking along Ven. Nandā as they thought: “It took Ven. Nandā so long to approach the master! Surely, the master will discourse marvellously in various exquisite ways.”

The Buddha foresaw the visit of the elder nun and created by his supernormal power the figure of a very pretty fifteen or sixteen year old maiden and made her stand fanning him in order to humble Ven. Rūpanandā’s pride in her own beauty, just as a man removes a thorn with a thorn or a prick with a prick.

Together with other female monastics, Ven. Rūpanandā moved towards the Buddha and paid homage to him, after which she remained amidst her companions, watching the Buddha’s splendour from the tip of his feet up to the top of the hair. Then seeing the lady standing fanning the Buddha at the side, as the Buddha had created it, Ven. Rūpanandā thought: “Oh, so fair is this maiden indeed!” And her thought led her to an extreme fondness of the created beauty and a burning desire to have that very beauty herself as she lost pride in her own beauty.

Then the Buddha while discoursing changed the age of the created maiden to 20. A lady is at the height of her beauty indeed when she is sixteen. Beyond that age she is not so fair. Therefore when the age of the created maiden was changed, Ven. Rūpanandā saw with her own eyes the decrease of the lady’s beauty, and her desire and passion (chanda-rāga) became less than before.

Thereafter, the Buddha increasingly changed the age of the created maiden step by step to that of a lady not being yet in labour, to that of a lady having given birth but once, to that of a middle-aged lady, to that of an aged lady and to that of an old one of 100 years, unsteady with a walking stick in her hand and with her body freckled all over. While Ven. Rūpanandā was watching her, the Buddha caused death to overcome the created old lady, her remains thereafter bloated and decomposed and had a disgustingly foul smell.

On seeing the decaying process of the created figure, Ven. Janapadakalyāṇī Rūpanandā reflected on it: “This process I am watching now, all of us beings are commonly subject to,” and the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) arose in her; following which the perception of [803] suffering (dukkha-saññā) and the perception of non-self (anatta-saññā) also occurred to her. The three kinds of existences manifested to her, making her helpless like a blazing house.

Then the Buddha, coming to know that Ven. Nandā was engaged in meditation, uttered the following verses that were most appropriate to her (DhpA PTS 3.118):

*Āturam asuciṃ pūtiṃ, passa Nande samussayaṃ, uggharantaṃ paggharantaṃ, bālānaṃ abhipatthitaṃ.
Yathā idaṃ tathā etaṃ, yathā etaṃ tathā idaṃ,
dhātuto suññato passa, mā lokaṃ punar-āgami, bhava chandaṃ virājetvā, upasanto carissati.*

Dear daughter Nandā! Behold carefully with the eye of wisdom, the body which is constantly painful, impure, stale, having a flow of filth going upwards and downwards, that body only fools are highly fond of.

Dear daughter Nandā, as this internal body is subject to impermanence, suffering, etc., so is the external body. As that external body you have seen, discards all its various stages and comes to the state of being swollen, etc., so will this internal body of yours discard all its various stages and come to the state of being swollen, etc.

With the eye of insight (vipassanā) see both the internal and external bodies as devoid of such elements as earth or self and things associated with self. Do not desire to come again to the world of the five aggregates of attachment. Eradicate in the mode of abandoning by cutting off (samuccheda-pahāna) your craving for the three existences of the sense-realm (kāma), form-realm (rūpa) and formless-realm (arūpa). If you have eradicated these, you will abide with all the heat of your moral defilements quenched.

At the end of the verse Ven. Janapadakalyāṇī Nandā was established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). Then did the Buddha give the Discourse about Victory (Vijaya-sutta) teaching in order to preach insight meditation (vipassanā) with the accompaniment of voidness (suññatā) so that Ven. Nandā might reach the higher paths and fruitions.

The Buddha gave this Discourse about Victory (Vijaya-sutta) firstly, to Janapadakalyāṇī when he was in his fifth or sixth year after his

34a: The 17th Rains Retreat (Beauty) – 1138

Awakening; , and later, it was in his 17th year that he delivered it to the monk craving for Sirimā.

When the delivery of the discourse was over, Ven. Nandā was greatly stirred with fear, thinking: “Oh, it was so stupid of me! To this brother of mine, the Buddha, who taught me such a wondrous doctrine, paying much attention to me and so compassionately, I had failed to come and attend earlier!” Having feared thus she repeatedly reflected on the discourse and diligently practised voidness (suññatā) meditation, and accordingly, in two or three days’ time, she became an Arahat.

34b: The 18th Year (Delaying)

The Weaver's Daughter

[The following is based on Dhp 174 and its commentary.]

Having emancipated a large number of deserving people according to their respective dispositions, beginning with the poor man of Āḷavī who searched for his lost bullock, the Buddha observed the eighteenth Rains Retreat (Vassa) on a hill near Cāliya, administering the cool water of the Dhamma to those who sought to be emancipated.

At the close of the eighteenth Rains Retreat (Vassa) on the Cāliya Hill, the Buddha journeyed again from place to place and arrived in Sāvattḥī and stayed at Jetavana.

Three years prior to the Buddha's stay at Jetavana, at the end of the 18th Rains Retreat, the Buddha went to Āḷavī city and the citizens invited him and gave a great alms giving. After finishing the meal, the Buddha gave a Dhamma talk in appreciation of the people's alms giving. The talk which included such exhortations as follows: "Dear supporters, you men and women! Meditate on death thus: 'My life is not lasting; death will certainly occur to me. It is certain that I shall die. My life will end in death; life is not permanent, but death is!' The benefits of meditation on death are these: On seeing a snake, a man without a stick is frightened, like him, those who have not meditated on death, die making terrible sounds that are caused by fear. A man with a stick, however, is not frightened but remains calm at the sight of a snake, for he can overpower the snake and catch it by means of his stick and send it away. In the same way, those, who are accomplished in meditation on death, are not frightened at their last moment when death is drawing near but pass away without fear and courageously. Therefore, you should meditate on death as has been said above."

While other people were minding their own business after hearing the Buddha's talk, a sixteen-year old daughter of a weaver gave good heed to it thus: "Oh, the word of Buddhas is indeed wonderful! I should meditate on death!" So she engaged herself in that meditation day and night. From the city of Āḷavī, the Buddha returned to Jetavana. The girl for her part continuously meditated for three full years.

34b: The 18th Rains Retreat (Delaying) – 1140

After three years, the Buddha, while sojourning now at Jetavana, surveyed the world of sentient beings one morning and saw that very daughter of a weaver in his vision. When he [806] made further investigation as to what might happen to her, he came to know as follows: “The girl has meditated on death for three long years since she heard my talk on it. Now I shall go to Āḷavī and ask her four questions. When she gives answers to them, I will cheer her on all four answers. Then I will utter the Dhamma-verse beginning with (Dhp 174): Andha-bhūto ayaṃ loko, ‘this world is composed of numerous worldly people, who do not see.’ At the end of the verse the girl will attain Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). On account of her, a multitude of people will also benefit.”

Foreseeing this, the Buddha, in the company of 500 monks, left Jetavana for Āḷavī and arrived at the monastery, named Aggāḷava. Hearing the news of the Buddha’s arrival, the people of Āḷavī went, in happy mood, to the Aggāḷava monastery and invited the Saṅgha with the Buddha as its head for a meal.

The weaver’s daughter also learned of the Buddha’s arrival and became joyous at the thought: “My spiritual father and teacher, the Buddha of the Gotama clan, whose beautiful face may be likened to a full moon, has arrived,” and thought further as follows: “Three years ago I saw the golden-complexioned Buddha. Now I have another opportunity to view the Buddha’s body in the brightness of gold and to listen to his sweet and nourishing talk on Dhamma.”

At that time, the girl’s father was about to go to the weaving shed; so he asked his daughter before he went: “Dear, I have fixed some person’s fabric on the loom. It remains unfinished with only about a hand span left unwoven. I will finish it today. Wind the woof quickly and bring it to me.”

The girl was now in a dilemma, thinking: “I am desirous of listening to the Fortunate One’s teaching. Father has also urgently asked me to do something else. What should I do now? Should I listen to the Fortunate One’s discourse first, or should I wind the woof and hand it to father first?” Then she decided thus: “If I fail to send the woof, father will hit me or beat me. Therefore only after winding the woof shall I hear the Dhamma.” So sitting on a small stool she wound the woof.

The citizens of Āḷavī, after serving the Buddha with a meal, were holding the bowls of dedication water to hear the Buddha’s teaching in appreciation of their good deeds. The Buddha, however, kept silent, for he pondered: “For the sake of this girl, a weaver’s daughter, I have travelled this journey of 30 leagues. The girl has not got a chance to hear me. Only when she does get a chance to listen to my talk, shall I give a discourse of appreciation.”

While the Buddha was remaining silent no one whosoever in the world of sentient beings dared to ask him to speak.

The girl wound the woof, put it in a basket, and, on her way to her father, she stood at the edge of the audience. The Buddha too looked at the girl, stretching his neck. From the way the Buddha glanced at her she knew: “The Fortunate One wants me to go closer to him, for while sitting amidst such a great assembly he looks directly at me.”

Herein it may be asked: “Why did the Buddha stretch his neck and look at her?” Answer: For it occurred to the Buddha thus: “If she goes to her father without listening to my discourse even at the edge of the assembly, she will die a worldling (puthujjana) and her destiny after her death will not be safe. But if she goes after coming to me and listening to my discourse her destiny will be a safe one, for she will attain Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) and will be reborn in a divine mansion in Tusita. Besides, there would be no escape for her from death on that very day. That was why the Buddha stretched out his neck and looked at the girl.

After taking the cue from the Buddha, and approaching the Buddha by passing through his six radiant lights, she paid homage and stood at a proper place. The following questions and answers between the Buddha and the girl then took place:

Buddha: “Where did you come from, young lady?”

Young lady: “I do not know, exalted Buddha.”

Buddha: “Where are you going?” [807]

Young lady: “I do not know, exalted Buddha.”

Buddha: “Do you not know, young lady?”

Young lady: “I do, exalted Buddha.”

Buddha: “Do you know, young lady?”

Young lady: “I do not, exalted Buddha.”

In this way the Buddha asked the girl four questions. Realising what was meant by the Buddha, the girl gave her answers which had a profound significance.

34b: The 18th Rains Retreat (Delaying) – 1142

Those people, who did not understand the significance, reproached her, saying: “Behold this girl, friends! In her conversation with the Buddha she spoke at random, she spoke just nonsense. When asked: ‘Where did you come from?’ she should have answered: ‘I came from the weaver’s home,’ when asked: ‘Where are you going?’ she should have answered: ‘To the weaver’s work-shop.’”

The Buddha, after silencing the people, asked the girl: “Young lady, when I asked you: ‘Where did you come from?’ Why did you say you do not know?”

Then the girl answered: “Exalted Buddha, you knew, of course, that I came from the weaver’s home. Indeed, by: ‘Where did you come from?’ You meant to say from which existence did I come to this weaver’s daughter’s existence. I do not know from which existence I came, hence my answer: I do not know.”

The Buddha then expressed his appreciation for the first time, saying, “Well said, well said! Young lady you have answered the question raised by me.”

He asked another question: “Young lady, when I asked you: ‘Where are you going?’ Why did you say you did not know?”

The girl answered: “Exalted Buddha, you knew, of course, that I am going to the weaver’s work-shop with the woof basket in my hand. Indeed, by asking: ‘Where are you going?’ You meant to say, to which existence I was going after this human existence. To which existence I am going I do not know. Hence my answer: ‘I do not know.’”

The Buddha then expressed his appreciation for the second time, saying: “You have answered the question raised by me.”

He asked still another question: “Young lady, when I asked you: ‘Do you not know?’ Why did you say you did?”

The girl answered: “Exalted Buddha, I know I am bound to die. Hence my answer: I know.”

The Buddha then expressed his appreciation for the third time, saying: “You have answered the question raised by me.”

He asked still another question: “Even then, young lady, when I asked you: ‘Do you know?’ Why did you say you do not?”

34b: The 18th Rains Retreat (Delaying) – 1143

The girl answered: “Exalted Buddha, I do know that I am bound to die. I, however, do not know what time will I die, whether at night, during day time, in the morning, or when. Hence my answer: ‘I do not know.’”

The Buddha then expressed his appreciation for the fourth time, saying: “You have answered the questions raised by me.”

Then the Buddha addressed the audience: “You do not know even this much of the significance in the answers given by this girl. You reproach her, and that is all you can do. Verily those who lack the eye of wisdom are blind despite their organic eyes. Only those who have the eye of wisdom have sight.” After that the Buddha spoke this Dhamma-verse (Dhp 174):

Andha-bhūto ayam loko, [808] tanukettha vipassati, sakuṇo jālam-uttova, appo saggāya gacchati.

My virtuous audience! This world composed of numerous worldly people who do not see is like the blind, for they lack the eye of wisdom. In this multitude of countless worldly people only a few highly intelligent ones can reflect and discern the nature of the conditioned mind and matter in the light of the three characteristics. Just as the quails that escape from the bird-catcher’s net are of inconsiderable number, even so only a small number of sharp, intelligent persons attain the abode of humans and Devas and the bliss of Nibbāna.

At the end of the teaching, the weaver’s daughter was established in the state of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). The teaching was also beneficial to many other people.

The girl took the woof-basket and proceeded to her father, who was then dozing while sitting at the loom. When the daughter pushed and moved the basket casually it hit the end of the shuttle and dropped making a sound.

Her father, the weaver, woke up from dozing and pulled the shuttle by force of habit. Because of its excessive speedy motion the end of the shuttle struck the girl right in the chest. The girl died on the spot and was reborn in the Tusita Deva-abode.

When the weaver looked at his daughter, he saw her lying dead with her body stained with blood all over. The weaver was then filled with grief. Thereafter, he came to his senses and thought: “There is no one other than the Buddha who can extinguish my grief.” So thinking he went to the Buddha, most painfully weeping and after relating the story, said: “Exalted Buddha, kindly try to ease my lamentation.”

The Buddha caused some relief to the weaver and said: “Do not be sad, devotee. The volume of the tears that you have shed on the occasions of your daughter’s death in the past while in this Samsāra of unknown beginning is far greater than the volume of the waters of the four great oceans.” Having said this, the Buddha delivered a discourse on the beginningless round of births and deaths (anamataggiya-samsāra, see SN 15). Now with little sorrow, the weaver begged the Buddha to ordain him, and after becoming a monastic he put effort in meditation and soon became an Arahāt.

A Male Lay Devotee

Having spent the seventeenth Rains Retreat (Vassa) at Veḷuvana in Rājagaha and converted those humans, Devas and Brahmas worthy of conversion through various discourses, including with the Discourse about Victory (Vijaya-sutta, Snp 1.10) as has been told above, the Buddha set out on a journey when the Rains Retreat was over and eventually arrived in Sāvattḥī and took up residence at Jetavana.

Then one day, while staying in the fragrant chamber of Jetavana, he surveyed the world of beings at daybreak and saw a poor man of Āḷavī city. Knowing of his past merit that would lead him to the attainment of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti), the Buddha went to Āḷavī [804] in the company of 500 monks. The citizens of Āḷavī, as they were the Buddha’s followers, possessing right belief, respectfully invited the monks headed by the Buddha to a feast.

When the poor man learned of the arrival of the Buddha, he felt happy thinking: “I will have a chance to listen to a discourse in his presence.” Then an incident took place on the day the Buddha was about to enter the city. A bullock, belonging to the poor man, ran away as the rope tied to it broke.

The poor man then thought: “What shall I do? Shall I first search for the bullock or first listen to the discourse?” And he decided to search for the bullock first and listen to the Buddha’s discourse later, without worry. So he left home in search of the lost bullock.

34b: The 18th Rains Retreat (Delaying) – 1145

The Āḷavī citizens offered seats to the Saṅgha led by the Buddha and served them with food and made arrangements for the Buddha's discourse in appreciation of the meal. "For the poor man, I have taken this journey of 30 leagues," reflected the Buddha, "he has now entered the forest to look for the lost bullock. I shall give a Dhamma talk only when he comes." With that idea he remained silent.

It was late in the morning when the poor man found his bullock and put it into the herd. Then he thought: "At this hour I have no chance to give my service in any form. Yet, I will just pay my respects to the Buddha." Though he was severely oppressed by hunger, he did not think of going home but rushed to the Buddha, did obeisance to him and stood at an appropriate place.

When the man was standing thus, the Buddha asked the head worker at the alms giving: "Supporter, is there any surplus food after feeding the Saṅgha?" – "Yes, exalted Buddha," answered the head worker, "there is a full meal." The Buddha then ordered him to feed the poor man.

The head worker let the man sit at the very place where the Buddha requested and served him well with gruel, hard and soft food. Having eaten with relish, the man washed his mouth thoroughly.

Nowhere else in the Three Baskets is the Buddha found to have himself asked somebody to feed a householder.

After eating the food with relish to his satisfaction, the poor man's mind became calm with one-pointedness. Then the Buddha taught him in serial order with talk on generosity (dāna-kathā), talk on morality (sīla-kathā), talk on celestial abodes (sagga-kathā), talk on the faults of sensual pleasures (kammānaṃ ādinava-kathā), talk on the advantages of renunciation (nekkhamme ānisamsa-kathā) and finally he taught the four truths. At the end of the teaching, having given appreciation of the alms giving, the Buddha rose and departed. The people saw him to the monastery and went back to Āḷavī.

While the monks were going along with their master, they sarcastically talked among themselves: "Friends, look at what the master did. Absolutely nowhere else did he ask to arrange for feeding a layman! But today, just on seeing a poor man, he himself has arranged to get the gruel and other foods set for him." The Buddha turned back and asked what they were talking about. When he knew what it was about, the Buddha said: "Yes, you are right! Monks, I took this tedious journey of 30 leagues just because I saw his past merit had potential enough to lead him, the poor lay devotee, to the path and fruition of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti). He was very hungry. Since daybreak, he had been searching for his lost bullock by roaming about the forest region. If I had taught him without feeding him, he would not have been able to penetrate my teaching because of suffering from hunger. Having thus reflected, I asked for food for him in this manner. There is no ailment like hunger.” Then he uttered the following verse (Dhp 203):

Jighacchā-paramā rogā, saṅkhāra-paramā dukhā, etaṃ ñatvā yathā-bhūtaṃ, Nibbānaṃ paramaṃ sukhaṃ.

My dear sons and monks! Hunger surpasses all oppressing and painful [805] ailments. Amongst all ailments, hunger is the worst. By giving treatment but once, other ailments might be completely cured. Or they are allayed for days, for months or for years. The ailment of hunger, however, cannot be quenched by eating once. The treatment of it consists in feeding day after day. Therefore, it means that of all ailments hunger is the worst.

The conditioning factors (saṅkhāra) of the five aggregates surpass all suffering. As long as these factors exist, suffering will not come to an end. Therefore, it means that of all suffering the conditioning factors of the five aggregates are the worst.

The unconditioned element, the ultimate Nibbāna, is the highest happiness. Happiness that is felt (vedayita-sukha) and liked by worldly people is enjoyable only when it exists. When it reaches the moment of destruction, when it is destroyed and gone, there is neither comfort nor enjoyment. The peace of Nibbāna never has a destructive nature but it remains peaceful forever; hence it is the best of all happinesses. Knowing this as it really is, the wise man realizes the happiness of Nibbāna.

By the end of the discourse numerous beings attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) and other fruitions.

34c: The 19th Year (Conversions)

Having travelled to the city of Āḷavī and other places distributing the cool medicinal water of deathlessness among humans and Devas, the Buddha spent the 19th Rains Retreat (Vassa) also at the monastery on Cāliya Hill, doing the same among those beings who were worthy of release.

After spending the 19th Rains Retreat at Cāliya, the Buddha set out again at the end of the Rains Retreat and eventually arrived in Rājagaha and stayed at Veḷuvana.

The Hunter Kukkuṭamitta

While the Buddha was staying at Veḷuvana, he gave a Dhamma talk beginning with: Pāṇimhi ce vaṇo nassa, “if there is no sore or injury in the palm of a hand,” with reference to the family of Kukkuṭamitta, the hunter. The details of the story are as follows: The daughter of a wealthy man in Rājagaha, on coming of age, was made by her parents to live in comfort in a splendid chamber on the top floor of a seven-storied mansion. She was cared for by a maid-servant provided by her parents. One evening, while she was viewing the street through the window, she saw Kukkuṭamitta, the hunter, who earned his living by killing deer, for which he carried 500 snares and 500 stakes.

At [809] that time the hunter, who had killed 500 deer, was in a front seat of his cart driven by himself and fully loaded with deer-meat for sale. The girl fell in love with him and after handing her maid some presents, she sent her with these words: “Go, dear maid, give these presents to the hunter and try to get information about the time of his return.”

The maid-servant went and gave the presents to the hunter and asked: “What time will you go home?” – “After selling the meat today,” said the hunter, “I shall go home tomorrow early morning by such a such a gate.” Having got the hunter’s reply, the maid-servant returned and told her mistress about it.

The mistress then packed her clothings, ornaments, gold and silver that she should take with her, and putting on dirty garments early that morning, she carried a water-jar on her head and left her house as though she were going to the river-side. Reaching the place mentioned in the hunter’s reply, she waited for the hunter's coming. The hunter came out from the city driving his cart early that morning. The lady then followed the hunter's cart close behind.

On seeing the young lady, the hunter said: "Lady, I do not know whose daughter you are. Please do not follow me." – "You did not ask me to come," replied the lady, "I came on my own accord. Drive on in your cart quietly." The hunter repeated his words to prevent her from following him. Then the young lady said: "Lord, one should not bar the fortune that has come to oneself." Only then the naive hunter came to understand without any doubt the reason for her following him, he picked the young lady up on to the cart and drove away.

The parents of the young lady searched for their daughter everywhere and could not find her. At long last they concluded that she must have died and held a ceremony in memory of their daughter (mataka-bhatta). Because of her living together with the hunter, the lady gave birth to seven sons and she had them married on their coming of age.

The Liberation of the Hunter's Family

On surveying the world of sentient beings in the early morning one day, the Buddha saw the hunter Kukkuṭamitta (Chicken-friend) together with his seven sons and seven daughters-in-law who came into the view of his supernormal vision. When he investigated the reason, he discerned that the past merit of all these fifteen persons would lead them to the attainment of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga). Taking his bowl and robe, the Buddha went alone early that morning to the place where the snares were set up. That day not a single animal happened to be caught.

The Buddha then put his footprint near the hunter's snares and sat down in the shade of the bush in front of him. Carrying his bow and arrows, Kukkuṭamitta went early to that place and checked the snares, one after another; he found not a single deer was caught, and all he saw were the Buddha's footprints.

Then it occurred to him thus: "Who could have set the animals free from the snares and roamed about?" Having a grudge against the Buddha even before he saw him and while moving about, he saw the Buddha sitting under the bush in front of him. Thinking: "This then must be the one who had released my ensnared animals. I will kill him with an arrow," he bent the bow and pulled the string with all his might.

The Buddha permitted him to bend the bow and pull the string, but he did not permit him to release the arrow. The Buddha performed a miracle so that the hunter could do the bending of the bow and the pulling of the string but not the shooting. Not only was he unable to shoot the arrow, he was also helpless in unbending the bow. It appeared that his ribs were going to break, and the saliva flowed from his mouth. Looking very exhausted, he stood like a stone statue.

The seven sons went to the father's house and asked their mother during a conversation with her: "Father is taking so long. What would be the reason for his delay?" When their mother said: "Follow your father, dear sons," they went after their father, each holding [810] his bow and arrows. Seeing their father standing like a stone figure, and seeing the Buddha sitting in the shadow of the bush, they thought: "This man must be the enemy of our father." Everyone of them then tried to bend his bow and pull the string. On account of the Buddha's miraculous power, however, they all stood there like stone figures, just like their father.

Their mother then wondered: "What is the matter? My sons are also taking too much time!" With her seven daughters-in-law, she went after them and saw all eight persons: the father and his sons. When she looked around, wondering: "Who were these eight, the father and his sons, aiming at while so standing?" and she saw the Buddha, and with her both arms up she shouted aloud: "Do not destroy my father!"

Hearing the cry of his wife, Kukkuṭamitta the hunter thought: "Oh, I am ruined! This man is said to be my father-in-law. Oh, I have done a great misdeed!" The seven sons also thought: "This man is said to be our grandfather! We have made a great mistake!" Thereafter, under the impression that: "This man is my father-in-law!" the hunter cultivated loving-kindness towards the Buddha. So did the seven sons with the notion that: "This man is our grandfather!"

Then the mother of these seven sons, the daughter of a wealthy man said: "Discard your bows and do obeisance to my father." As he knew the eight men had become soft-minded, the Buddha let them put down their bows. He now withdrew his miraculous power that he had previously exercised in order to prevent them from laying down their bows. The eight people then did obeisance to the Buddha, saying: "Kindly forgive our wrong, exalted Buddha," and they took their seats in the proper place.

When they were thus seated the Buddha gave a series of talks to them, a family of sixteen members: Talk on generosity (dāna-kathā), talk on morality (sīla-kathā), talk on celestial abodes (sagga-kathā), talk on the faults of sensual pleasures (kammānaṃ ādinava-kathā) and talk on the advantages of renunciation (nekkhamme ānisaṃsakathā) in this order. At the end of the talk, Kukkuṭamitta the hunter and his seven sons and the seven daughters-in-law, were established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). Having thus helped them realise Stream-entry, the Buddha entered Rājagaha for alms and returned to the monastery in the afternoon.

The Buddha was then asked by Ven. Ānanda: “Where have you been, exalted Buddha?” – “I have been to the home of Kukkuṭamitta the hunter, my dear son Ānanda,” was the answer. “Have you, exalted Buddha, made him one who refrains from the wrong-doing of taking life? Have you admonished and emancipated him?” – “Yes I have, dear Ānanda,” the Buddha answered. “All of them, with Kukkuṭamitta as the fifteenth member, are now established in unwavering faith, absolutely free from doubts in the Three Treasures, and they have become people who refrain from the evil act of killing.”

The monks interrupted them, saying: “Exalted Buddha, there is also the hunter’s wife; was she not there?” – “Yes, she was,” answered the Buddha. “Monks, that housewife has already become a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) while still living as a girl in her parent’s home.”

Then a discussion took place at a religious meeting in the Dhamma-hall (Dhamma-sāla), as follows: “Friends, Kukkuṭamitta’s wife, a merchant’s daughter, had attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) while still a young woman who was still living with her parents. Thereafter she followed the hunter to his home and had seven sons. Asked by her husband to bring the bow, the arrow, the spear, the stake, or the net, she would bring them to him. The hunter on his part would carry those weapons given by his Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) wife and would commit the evil deed of taking life day after day for a long time. How is it friends? Do those Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna), the noble ones, too commit such a crime?”

The Buddha came to the monk’s meeting and asked: “What was the subject-matter of your discussion, monks, before I came here?” The monks answered: “We were discussing this matter of Kukkuṭamitta’s wife, the daughter of a merchant.”

Thereupon the Buddha said: “Monks, the noble ones, Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna), never commit such a crime as killing. The hunter’s wife brings him such weapons as bow and arrow because she was mindful of her duty, the duty that the wife must obey her husband’s word. She had no [811] intention to make the hunter go to the forest with the weapons in his hand for the evil practice of taking-life; she had not the slightest idea of that sort.

For example, if there is no sore on the palm of the hand, one who uses that hand to hold poison cannot be harmed by the poison; similarly, to him who does not do any evil because he has no unwholesome intention, no bad result accrues to him though he may have fetched the weapon.”

Having said thus, the Buddha spoke the following verse as a continuation of his utterance (Dhp 124):

Pāṇimhi ce vaṇo nāssa, hareyya pāṇinā visam, nābbaṇaṃ visam-anveti, natthi pāpaṃ akubbato.

Monastics, if there is no injury in the palm of a hand, poison cannot enter it. Therefore with the hand without any sore or injury, one is able to carry the poison safely. Similarly, to him who has not done a wrong thing because he has no unwholesome volition, there arises not the slightest act of wrongdoing just by bringing a bow and the like.

As poison cannot hurt the hand free from a boil or a cut, so he who just passes over a weapon, such as a bow and an arrow, does not do evil as he has no wicked intention. That is to say, as no poison can affect the healthy hand, so no desire for doing evil can approach his stout heart.

By the end of the teaching, many attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) and other fruitions.

The Past Merit of Kukkuṭamitta’s Family

At a later time, in the Dhamma-assembly, the monks were engaged in a conversation among themselves: “Friends, what was the past merit that caused the attainment of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga) of Kukkuṭamitta, the hunter, who had seven sons and seven daughters-in-law? Why was he born in a hunter’s family?”

Thereupon the Buddha came and asked: “Monks, what were you taking about?” and getting the reply as to what they were talking about, the Buddha related the story of the hunter’s past merit as follows: “Monks, in times past, when people were holding a discussion on the construction of a huge shrine over Buddha Kassapa's relics, they deliberated the question as to what should be used for fine earth and what for liquid.

34c: The 19th Year (Conversions) – 1152

Then they got an idea to use orpiment for fine earth and sesame oil for the liquid, and they all agreed to do so. The people had the orpiment powdered and mixed it with sesame oil and used it as cement plaster to hold the bricks together. The bricks that were laid inside the shrine were coated with gold. As for the layer of bricks outside the shrine, they laid bricks of gold. Each brick was worth 100,000.

When the people's construction of the shrine was complete enough for enshrining the relics, a discussion took place as to who should be selected president, for a great deal of money was badly needed when enshrining the relic.

Then a country merchant, thinking: "I shall become president," donated money amounting to 10 million to the enshrinement fund. On seeing the generosity of the country merchant, the people dispraised the town merchant, saying: "This town merchant accumulates wealth like white ants. He is not eligible to become chief of this occasion for constructing such a great relic-shrine. But the country merchant has generously donated 10 million and shall become president."

On hearing what the people had said, the town merchant gave in generosity 20 million hoping to become president. [812] "Only I must be president of the enshrinement ceremony," thought the country merchant and he gave away 30 million. In this way the donations made by both parties increased till the town merchant's contribution became 80 million.

But the country merchant had only 90 million at his place. In the residence of the town merchant, however, there were 400 million. Therefore it occurred to the country merchant thus: "If I gave 90 million the merchant from the town would say that he would donate 100. Then as I cannot compete with him the state of my lacking any further wealth will be known to all." He then said: "I will donate this much of money. I shall also take upon myself servitude to the shrine together with my seven sons, seven daughters-in-law and my wife." So saying he brought his family members and dedicated them and himself, sixteen persons in all, to the shrine.

"Acquisition of more funds is possible, that of dedicated human labour is not," said the people, "this country merchant has given up his seven sons and seven daughters-in-law and wife and himself to the shrine. Let him therefore become president of the enshrinement ceremony.” Thus they all unanimously selected the country merchant as president.

In this way the sixteen family-members became slaves to the shrine. But the people agreed to set them free from servitude. The sixteen-member family however took care of the shrine till the end of their lives, and on their death were reborn in a celestial abode.

The sixteen persons enjoyed the blissful life in that abode during the whole the period between the lifetime of Buddha Kassapa and that of our Buddha (Buddhantara-asāṅkhyeyya-kappa). When the time of the Buddha emergence (Buddhuppāda) came as our Buddha Gotama appeared, the merchant’s housewife passed away from the celestial abode and became a merchant’s daughter in Rājagaha. While only a young girl she attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).

The birth of a worldling, who has not discerned the four truths is burdensome, says the commentary. He is likely to be reborn into a lowly family despite the fact that this very life is his last (pacchima-bhavika), for he has not overcome the risk of falling into a lowly state. Therefore the Deva who had been the husband of the merchant’s daughter, on his return to the human world, was reborn in a family of hunters. As soon as she saw the hunter, her former love (taṇhā-pema) revived. That was why the Buddha spoke the following verse (Ja 237):

*Pubbe va sannivāseṇa, paccuppanna-hitena vā,
evaṃ taṃ jāyate pemaṃ, uppalaṃ va yathodake.*

Because of living together in love in the past and also because of benefiting one another at present, for these two reasons, love of two types, craving-love (taṇhā-pema) and friendliness-love (mettā-pema) arose. How? In the same way as lotuses and any other aquatic flowers thrive depending on the two factors of water and mud.

It was only because of her love in the past that she followed the hunter to his house. Their sons, from the celestial abode took conception in the womb of the merchant’s daughter. The daughters-in-law were reborn in various families, and on coming of age, they all went over to the home of the hunter’s family owing to their affection they had had in their past lives.

As the result of their services rendered together to the relic shrine dedicated to Buddha Kassapa the sixteen members of the hunter's family attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) in this Buddha's Dispensation.

Ānanda the Wealthy Merchant

Having distributed the medicinal Dhamma-water of immortality among beings, including the family of the hunter Kukkuṭamitta, while staying at Veḷuvana, Rājagaha, from there the Buddha arrived at Sāvattḥī and stayed at Jetavana. While staying there, he gave a discourse beginning with: Puttā matthi dhanammatthi, "I have children, I have wealth," with reference to Ānanda the wealthy merchant and citizen of Sāvattḥī.

The story in detail is as follows: [813] There was in Sāvattḥī a wealthy merchant, Ānanda by name, whose wealth was worth 400 million, yet who was extremely stingy. The man had his relatives assembled fortnightly and gave advice to his son, Mūlasiri, amidst his kinsmen at three different times, saying thus: "Dear son, do not think that the 400 million is a great deal of wealth. What is in one's hand should not be given to another. Try to gain new wealth. He who spends one coin after another will certainly exhaust his wealth one day. Therefore, we advise (DhpA, PTS 2.26):

Añjanānaṃ khayam disvā, upacikānañ-ca ācayam, madhūnañ-ca samāhāraṃ, paṇḍito gharam-āvase.

Dear son, having observed the disappearance of a collyrium stone due to repeated rubbing, the arising of an anthill due to repeated gathering of earth by white ants, the development of a beehive due to repeated collection of the nectar of flowers by bees, a wise man should live exerting himself to keep his old wealth undiminished and to bring about new wealth.

Later on, the merchant Ānanda died without telling his son Mūlasiri about his five big jars of gold that he had buried, and being greedily attached to his wealth and dirtying himself with the taints of miserliness, upon his death he was conceived in the womb of a outcaste (caṇḍāla) woman in a village of 1,000 householders at the gate of the city of Sāvattḥī. On learning of the merchant's death, King Kosala summoned the son, Mūlasiri, and appointed him as the successor to his father.

The 1,000 outcaste (caṇḍāla) households made their living by working collectively as daily labourers, and from the time of the conception of the miser Ānanda, the former rich man, they no longer had their wages, nor did they have food more than what was enough to live on. The labourers came to the conclusion, saying: “Now we hardly earn a small morsel of rice despite our hard work. There must be somebody evil and unfortunate among us.” So they divided themselves into two groups, and the dividing process went on and on until there remained the isolated household of the miser’s parents. In that situation, the family of Ānanda said: “The ominous one is in our household,” and they expelled Ānanda’s mother.

The mother had much difficulty in obtaining enough food as long as she was carrying the child in her womb, and she gave birth to a son in such a miserable way. The child’s hands, legs, eyes, ears, nose and mouth were all displaced. With his body so deformed, he looked very ugly, like a little earth-bound demon. Despite all this, the mother did not have the heart to dispose of him. In fact, so great was the mother’s love for her child who had developed in her womb, that she brought him up, even with great hardship. On the days when she took him to her work, she got nothing, and on the days she left him behind, she got her daily wage.

Later, when the son became big enough to roam about and look for food by himself, the outcaste mother thrust a small bowl into the boy’s hand and said: “Dear son, on account of you we have suffered much. Now we are no longer able to look after you. In this city of Sāvattthī, there are readily cooked and reserved meals for destitutes, travellers and so on. Make your living by going where the food is and begging for it.” And after saying this, she deserted him.

The boy roamed about the city, going from one house to another, and he arrived at the place where he had lived as Ānanda, the wealthy merchant. As he was endowed with the ability to remember his former births (jātissara-ñāṇa), he boldly entered his own residence. He passed through the first, second and third gates with nobody noticing him or being aware of him. At the fourth gate, however, Mūlasiri’s children saw him and cried out loud in fear.

Then Mūlasiri’s servants beat him, saying: “You, luckless, ill-fated one!” They also took him out of the gate and put him on the garbage heap. At that moment, the Buddha, on his alms round accompanied by Ven. Ānanda, was at the scene.

The Buddha looked at Ven. Ānanda and at his request narrated the past account and the present events of Ānanda, the wealthy merchant. [814]

Ven. Ānanda then summoned Mūlasiri. People also gathered around. The Buddha then addressed Mūlasiri: “Supporter Mūlasiri, do you know this boy?” – “I do not, exalted Buddha.” – “This boy is your father Ānanda, the merchant,” said the Buddha. When Mūlasiri did not believe it, the Buddha asked Ānanda: “Wealthy Ānanda, tell your son about the five big jars of gold you had buried.” Mūlasiri become convinced after he had uncovered the five jars of gold, as mentioned by Ven. Ānanda. The merchant Mūlasiri then took refuge in the Buddha. Desiring to preach to Mūlasiri, the Buddha spoke this verse (Dhp 62):

*Puttā matthi dhanam-matthi, iti bālo vihaññati,
attā hi attano natthi, kuto puttā kuto dhanam.*

I have children, I have wealth, thinking thus the fool is afflicted by craving for children (putta-taṇhā) and craving for wealth (dhana-taṇhā). In reality, however, one is not even one’s own shelter from woes. How can children be one’s shelter? How can wealth be one’s shelter?

A fool, who considers himself to be the owner of his children and wealth, is troubled by craving for both. How? He is troubled by the notion: “My children have died,” or “My children are dying” or “My children will die.” The same happens in the case of wealth. In this way, he suffers in six ways: in three ways regarding children and in three ways regarding wealth. Since he has craving for children, he plans to feed his children by striving in many ways on land or in water, day or night, and thus he is full of woe. Since, he has craving for wealth, he plans to increase his riches by farming or trading, and suffered thereby.

It is impossible for a man, who is suffering, owing to craving for children and craving for wealth to lead himself to safety later on. When death approaches him, he is oppressed by fatal pains (maraṇantika-vedanā) like flames, his joints are broken and his bones separated. He shuts his blinking eyes to visualize his next life and then opens them to see his present life. He is thus miserable on his death-bed; formerly he looked after himself throughout his life, bathing two times a day and feeding three times a day, adorning himself with perfumes and flowers and other ornaments. But now, even as a true friend to himself, he is unable to release himself from misery. At such a later time, when he is so miserably dying, how can his children or his wealth come to his rescue. Indeed they simply have no ability to save him.

34c: The 19th Year (Conversions) – 1157

As for the merchant, who had been reluctant to give somebody something, but who had piled up riches only for his son Mūlasiri, who on his death-bed in his previous life and when he was hungry, ill-treated by others and so miserable in the present life, which of these woes could his beloved children or his accumulated wealth remove? Indeed, neither could do so. What kind of happiness could they bring to him? Indeed, neither could bring happiness. Such is the import of the verse.

By the end of the discourse 84,000 beings realized the four truths and were released. This discourse was therefore beneficial to many.

34d: The 20th Rains Retreat (Sudinna)

In this way, while fulfilling his five great duties without any interruption, while distributing the doctrinal and medicinal cool water of deathlessness among gods and humans, the Buddha departed from Sāvattthī and after travelling in the company of monks, reached Rājagaha in the kingdom of Magadha, and stayed at Veļuvana to keep the twentieth Rains Retreat (Vassa).

The Buddha's Rains Retreat

Of the Buddha's 45 Rains Retreats (Vassa), the first 20, beginning from his Awakening are called not bound (anibaddha) or not settled (aniyata) Rains Retreats because they were spent not at one and the same place but in various towns or villages, one Rains Retreat here, two Rains Retreat there, three still at another place and so on.

They are also referred to as the first period after Awakening (paṭhama-bodhi) or the earlier period after Awakening (purima-bodhi) Rains Retreats because they formed the first or former half of the whole series of Rains Retreats in which gods and men were led to Awakening by the fourfold path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa).

The remaining 25 Rains Retreats are called bound (nibaddha) or settled (niyata) Rains Retreats because they were spent at only one place, in Sāvattthī in the kingdom of Kosala, in either the Jetavana or the Pubbārāma. They are also known as the second period after Awakening (dutiya-bodhi) or later period after Awakening (pacchima-bodhi) Rains Retreats for they formed the second or latter half of the whole series of Rains Retreats in which gods and humans were caused to be Awakened by the fourfold path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa).

Elaboration: For the 20 Rains Retreats of the first period after Awakening, the Buddha's stay was not regular, for he observed Rains Retreat (Vassa) in different towns or villages as he pleased. But from the 21st Rains Retreat he stayed regularly at Jetavana or Pubbārāma, relying upon Sāvattthī as his resort for alms food. This information is from the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) commentary.

A different exposition in the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya), however, is as follows: From the 21st Rains Retreat, the Buddha's use of the two dwellings of Jetavana and Pubbārāma was permanent because the services, rendered by Anāthapiṇḍika, the wealthy merchant, and Visākhā, the female devotee, were great. In fact, the Buddha dwelt constantly at these residences on account of his being grateful to both supporters.

The Buddha journeyed to other places during the months outside the Rains Retreats, but during the Rains Retreats he stayed alternatively at these two monasteries. The Buddha, whose custom was to pass his times thus, spent a night at Jetavana, went on alms round the next morning in the company of monks; entered Sāvathī by the south-gate to collect food and went out by the east-gate to Pubbārāma where he spent the day. After spending the night at Pubbārāma, he went on alms round the next morning in the company of monks, entered Sāvathī by the east-gate to collect food and went out by the south-gate to Jetavana where he spent the day.

Ven. Ānanda Appointed Permanent Attendant

During the 20 years of the first period after Awakening, the Buddha had no permanent attendant to serve him. Sometimes Ven. Nāgasamāla was at his service, taking his bowl and robe and following him wherever he went. Sometimes Ven. Nāgita, sometimes Ven. Upavāṇa, sometimes Ven. Sunakkhatta, a Licchavī Prince, sometimes Ven. Cunda, a brother of Ven. Sāriputta, sometimes Ven. Sāgata, sometimes Ven. Meghiya served him, travelling about with him. They did so but generally not to the Buddha's satisfaction.

One day, while the Buddha was sitting in his prepared Buddha-seat surrounded by monks in the fragrant chamber, he addressed the monks: "Now, monks, I am old. At that time he was 55 years of age. I tell some attendants: "Let us go this way," but they leave me and go the other way, and some attendants put down my bowl and robe on the ground; so now you must consider and select a permanent attendant for me."

The monks were shocked and stirred on hearing this from the Buddha. Then Ven. Sāriputta stood up and saluted the Buddha, saying: "I will serve you, exalted Buddha." But the Buddha rejected Ven. Sāriputta's offer. Following Ven. Sāriputta, apart from Ven. Ānanda, all the other venerables, led by Ven. Moggallāna, made their offer, one after another, saying: "I will be your attendant, venerable sir, I will be your attendant, venerable sir." The Buddha rejected their offers too.

Ven. Ānanda, however, was just sitting there and keeping quiet. When [816] the other monks said: "Friend Ānanda, you too should ask for the post of the master's attendant." Ven. Ānanda replied: "Friends, what kind of a post is it that is secured by begging? Should the Fortunate One want me, he himself will say so."

Then the Buddha said: "Monks, Ānanda is not a type of person who needs to be urged. He will serve me at his own discretion." Then the monks asked him again: "Stand up, Ven. Ānanda, ask the master for the post as his attendant."

Ven. Ānanda rose from his seat and said: "Exalted Buddha: 1) If you do not give me the good robes received by you; 2) if you do not give me the good food collected by you; 3) if you do not give me the privilege to sit together with you in the fragrant chamber; 4) if you do not take me to the places you are invited, then I shall serve you, exalted Buddha."

These four negative boons were begged so that nobody else could disapprovingly say: "With such benefits or gains in view, who would think it is burdensome to serve the master?"

Ven. Ānanda continued: "Exalted Buddha: 1) If you go at my request to the places invited by your male and female devotees; 2) if I have the permission to let each and every visitor pay homage to you promptly; 3) if I have the permission to approach you, to ask you, the moment there arises any doubt in me; 4) if you repeat to me what you have taught in my absence; then I shall serve you, exalted Buddha."

These four positive boons were begged in order to avoid others' criticism who would say that: "In spite of his service rendered day and night to the Fortunate One, poor Ānanda was not favoured by the master even this much," and in order to be able to perform good deeds and fulfil the perfections, so that he would be recognized by Devas and humans as the Treasurer of the Dhamma.

In this way Ven. Ānanda asked for eight boons, four negative and four positive. The Buddha bestowed these eight boons on him. Ven. Ānanda received these eight boons and became the permanent attendant to the Buddha. The fruit of his perfections fulfilled for the 100,000 aeons for that post of permanent attendant was realized on that very day.

From the day of his appointment as the Buddha's attendant, he served the master by giving him hot and cold water, by providing him with three kinds of tooth brush, short, long and medium, by massaging him, by rubbing his back when taking a bath, by sweeping the fragrant chamber and so on. Ven. Ānanda roamed about near the Buddha each day, deciding: “At this hour the Fortunate One must get this thing, this should be done to him.” At night he encircled around the fragrant chamber nine times, holding a big torch to be able to answer the Buddha promptly on being asked by him, and to remove sloth and drowsiness. This is just a brief account of Ven. Ānanda’s service rendered to the Buddha. His other services will be mentioned in chapter 43. [817]

Ven. Sudinna and the First Rules

[This section has been moved here from Chapter 31, as it is more suitable to learn about the laying down of the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) rules at this place, when they started to be laid down.] [731]

Eight years previously, in the village of Kalanda, near the city of Vesālī, there was the merchant Kalanda’s son, who was named Sudinna. Accompanied by many friends, Sudinna the merchant’s son went to Vesālī on some business.

The village was named Kalanda because it abounded in black squirrels (Kalandaka). The Kalanda merchant owned 400 million. He was therefore a man of riches recognized by the king. His son, Sudinna, went to Vesālī to transact business, to collect debts, and to make appointments among other things.

Some scholars said that he was in Vesālī to have fun in the festival of the constellation Kattikā. The Buddha indeed came to Vesālī in the bright fortnight of the month of November (Kattikā). The festivity of Kattikā in Vesālī attracted large crowds of people. For the sake of this festive gathering, Sudinna the merchant’s son also went there at this time.

On seeing the people who went out from Vesālī after breakfast, wearing clean clothes and carrying flowers, perfumes and unguents, to see the Buddha and to listen to his discourse, Sudinna asked them where they were going and was informed of their purpose; then thinking: “I too should go along with them,” he joined the crowd that flocked to hear the Buddha, who, in the midst of the audience composed of four classes of devotees, was delivering a discourse in a voice resembling that of a Brahma. Inspired by the Buddha’s pleasing manner and stirred by his past wholesome deeds (kamma), he thought to himself: “How well it would be if I too could listen to the discourse!” But since the audience was so large, he was unable to get near the Buddha and had to take a suitable seat at the edge of the assembly, paying attention to the Buddha’s talk from there.

While he was thus paying attention to the Buddha's talk on the threefold training of morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā), a thought arose in him: "When I ponder in many ways the Buddha's discourse, I come to the conclusion that it is not easy indeed for a householder to practise such a noble practice of the threefold training which is so pure and perfect like a newly polished conch. How wonderful it would be if I leave household life for monkhood, having shaved my head and beard and donned the dyed robe!"

Thereafter, Sudinna went along with the moving crowd for a short distance, for in the crowd were many of his relatives and friends, who might be in his way and they would forcibly take him away by the arm, saying: "You are the only son of your parents. You must not be given permission to become a monk." Hence his short distance of departure together with the crowd. Then pretending that he had to wash his hands, he turned back and approached the Buddha with these words of request: "Exalted Buddha, when I pondered your discourse in many ways, I came to the conclusion that it was not easy indeed for a householder to practise such a noble practice of the threefold training, which is pure and perfect like a newly polished conch. Exalted Buddha, I wish to enter monkhood, having shaved my head and beard and donned the dyed robe, exalted Buddha, kindly accept me as a monk!"

As the Buddha had denied monkhood to those who were not permitted by their parents since the initiation of Prince Rāhula, the Buddha asked Sudinna, "Have your parents, Sudinna, permitted you to leave the household life for monkhood?" "No, exalted Buddha, they have not yet permitted me to do so," replied Sudinna. Then said the Buddha: "Sudinna, Buddhas do not ordain a man who has not got permission from his parents." – "Exalted Buddha," said Sudinna, "I shall seek permission from my parents."

Then Sudinna, having finished his business in Vesālī, approached his parents, at Kalanda [732] village, with these words: "Dear parents, when I pondered the Buddha's discourse in many ways, I came to the conclusion that it was not easy indeed for a householder to practise such a noble practice of the threefold training, which is pure and perfect like a newly polished conch. I wish to leave the household life for the monkhood, having shaved my head and beard and donned the dyed robe! Please give me permission to do so."

The parents then rejected Sudinna's request, saying: "Our son Sudinna, you are our only son whom we love so dearly. You are the child whom we have brought up and nurtured in happiness. Dear Sudinna, you know no discomforts whatever. Let us be separated from you against our wish only when you die. How can we permit you to leave the household life for monkhood while you are living?”

The son requested as before for the second time. The parents similarly rejected for the second time. He did so for the third time. And they too did reject for the third time.

Knowing then that his parents will not permit me by any means to renounce the household life, and lying down on the bare ground, the very spot on which he made the request, he said: “This place will see either my death or my renunciation.” He refused to eat his meal once, twice, three times; four, five, six and seven times and demonstrated his great meritorious desire by fasting.

Then the parents said to their son: “Dear son Sudinna, you are our only child, whom we love so dearly. You are the one whom we have brought up and nurtured in happiness. Dear Sudinna, you know no discomfort whatever. Only your death will separate us from you against our wish. How can we permit you to leave the household life and take up monkhood while you are alive? Rise, dear Sudinna, eat, drink and have fun. Feel delight in doing good deeds while eating, drinking and having fun. However, we will never give you our permission by any means for your renunciation.” Sudinna kept quiet while they were saying so. He remained silent even when his parents said so a second time and a third time.

Not getting even verbal response from their son though they had appealed to him three times, the parents sent for his friends and urged them saying: “Your friend Sudinna is desirous of becoming a monk. Please prevent him from doing so!” The friends went up to Sudinna and tried to prevent him three times as they had been told by his parents. To the friends as well, Sudinna gave no answer but kept quiet.

Then the friends reflected and discussed among themselves: “If this Sudinna were to die for not getting permission to become a monk, no benefit would accrue from his death. If he were to become a monk his parents could see him at will and so could we. Monkhood is very burdensome. The monk goes on alms round carrying an earthen bowl daily. He sleeps alone and eats a single morning meal. Such a noble practice is so difficult to follow. And Sudinna is a delicate urbanite. By no means can he devote himself to the noble practice that requires one to sleep alone and to eat a single morning meal. He will definitely come back home. Well, we shall ask his parents to permit him.”

Thereafter they approached Sudinna’s parents and spoke to them with some advice: “Dear elders, Sudinna is lying on the bare ground, saying: ‘This place will see either my death or my renunciation.’ If you do not give him permission to renounce the world and enter monkhood, he will die at that very place where he is lying. Suppose you grant him permission for his monkhood, you can have a chance to see him as a monk. After becoming a monk, if he is not happy with ascetic life, where will he go except back to his parents’ house? He will come back to this house of yours. You had better permit Sudinna to go forth and live an ascetic life!”

Then Sudinna’s parents replied: “Dear boys, we grant him our permission for his renunciation and entering upon monkhood,” and the friends went up to Sudinna and said: “Get up, friend Sudinna, permission has been granted to you by your parents!” [733]

So happy and elated with the news that he had been permitted to become a monk, Sudinna got up, dusting his body with his hands, and tried to regain his strength for one or two days; thereafter he approached the Buddha, bowed his head in adoration, sat down at a suitable distance and said: “Exalted Buddha, permission has been granted to me by my parents. May the exalted Buddha make me a monk!”

The Buddha asked a nearby monk who was practising the ascetic practices (dhutaṅga): “Monk, as has been requested by Sudinna, dear son, grant him ordination as a novice and then ordination as a monk!” – “Very well, exalted Buddha,” replied the ascetic monk, and taking Sudinna, as his co-residential (saddhi-vihārika) pupil entrusted by the Buddha, he made him a novice and then a monk.

Soon after becoming a monk, Ven. Sudinna engaged in the following ascetic practices, the means of shaking off the mental defilements: Dwelling in a forest monastery (āraññika-dhutaṅga); eating food obtained by going on alms round (piṇḍapātika-dhutaṅga); putting on robes made of rags (paṃsukūlika-dhutaṅga); and collecting food from houses in sequence (sapadāna-cārika-dhutaṅga). Thus he dwelt in an unknown small village as his resort for food.

Sudinna Returns to his Home

Now in the 20th year after the Buddha's Awakening, the country of Vajjī was short of food. It was hard to live there. There were white bones from the dead everywhere. People had to live by food tickets. It was not easy for monks to get enough food going round with alms bowls in their hands.

Then it occurred to Ven. Sudinna: “Now Vajjī country is short of food. It is hard to live there. There are white bones from the dead everywhere. Lots have to be drawn for food. It was not easy for monks to get enough food by going round with alms bowls in their hands. I have a large number of relatives in the city of Vesālī who are prosperous, who possess plenty of hidden treasures, who are endowed with an abundance of riches, an abundance of gold and silver, an abundance of delightful articles and gems for daily use, and a large quantity of goods and grains for trading and exchange. What if I were to live there, depending on my relatives? On account of me they would make offerings and do things of merit. And material gains will accrue to the monks. I too will not be troubled by food.”

Getting the news that the Kalanda merchant's son, Sudinna, was said to have come to Vesālī, his relatives sent 60 pots of food as an offering to him. Each pot contained food for ten monks. Then, according to his previous plan, he offered the 60 pots to 600 monks, and as for himself, being an observer of eating food obtained by going on alms round, he adjusted his garment, took his bowl and robe and entered the village of Kalanda for food. While going round and stopping in front of the houses, one after another he happened to approach the gate of the house belonging to his father, the Kalanda merchant.

At that moment, a female slave to kinsmen of Sudinna was coming out of the house to throw away barley cakes that had become stale after having been kept overnight, so stale that it was impossible for male slaves, workers and cattle to eat them. Then Sudinna said to her: “Sister, if you are to throw away those cakes, please put them into my bowl!”

While she was putting the stale cakes into Ven. Sudinna's bowl, she could not recognize him as the son of her master, for Sudinna had been away for eight years; but taking note of the features of his hands and feet and also his voice, she went to Sudinna's [734] mother and said: "You know, madam, your son Sudinna has returned!" Sudinna's mother replied: "Woman, if you have told me the truth, I will set you free from slavery!" Meanwhile Ven. Sudinna was leaning against the base of the wall in a dining room in Kalanda and enjoying the stale food with relish.

Some homes of supporters in certain regions had dining rooms built. In these rooms seats were readily arranged. Jars of water for drinking and use were placed; vinegar was also provided. After receiving food, monks sat and ate it in these rooms. If need be, they took offerings which were placed there by supporters. Therefore, "the base of the wall" here means the bottom of the wall of a refectory erected by supporters. Monks never eat, sitting at an unseemly place, unlike destitutes.

When Sudinna's wealthy father came back from work and saw him enjoying the stale food with relish, he went nearer and reproved him, saying: "Dear beloved son Sudinna! It is a pity that you should be eating stale barley cakes! Can you not come home?"

Ven. Sudinna then replied: "I have been to your house, supporter. And I got the stale barley cakes from there!" The father grasped Sudinna's arm and said: "Come, dear Sudinna. Let us go home!" An obedient son having love for his father, Sudinna went along to his father's house and took the prepared seat.

The wealthy father requested him: "Help yourself son!" – "Enough, father," replied Ven. Sudinna: "I have eaten for the day." When the father invited him, saying: "Please accept my offering of food for tomorrow," though he was committed to eating food obtained only by going on alms round (piṇḍapāta-dhutaṅga), Sudinna accepted it by keeping silent, he then rose from his seat and departed, for he thought: "If I reject their single meal, it will be a great distress to my parents and kinsmen."

When the night was over, Ven. Sudinna's mother had the ground plastered with wet cowdung, and two heaps of treasures made, one of gold and the other of silver. The heaps of treasure were so great that a man standing on one side could not see another man standing on the other side, so great and high were the piles of treasures. Having caused them to be covered by mats, and a seat prepared in the middle and screens set up, she then asked Sudinna's ex-wife: "Dear daughter,

34d: The 20th Rains Retreat (Sudinna) – 1167

I would like to ask you to put on the clothes that would please my son Sudinna.”
– “Yes, mother,” replied the ex-wife to Ven. Sudinna’s mother.

When morning came, Ven. Sudinna approached his parent’s house, having adjusted his robe and carrying his bowl and robe, and sat down on the prepared seat between the two heaps of treasure. The father came to Ven. Sudinna and had the heaps uncovered and said: “Dear son Sudinna, this gold and silver is the treasure that has come down from your mother’s side. This much is just for the use of feminine things. This is the cost of powder and flowers. There is yet the treasure from me. The treasures from your grandfather and great grandfather are also kept separately. Dear son, they are available for you to live in luxury and perform meritorious deeds when you leave the monkhood. Come, dear Sudinna, enjoy your wealth and do good works.”

“I cannot become a layman, supporter,” replied Ven. Sudinna, “I am very happy following the noble practice of the threefold training.” His father said as before for the second time, and Ven. Sudinna replied similarly. When the father said for the third time, however, Ven. Sudinna replied differently, saying: “If you, supporter, show no anger, I would like to say something.” Thinking that his son would tell him favourably, the father said delightedly: “Go ahead, son.” Then Ven. Sudinna uttered determinedly to his father, the wealthy merchant: “Father, in that case, have fibre bags made and fill them with gold and silver, take them in cans and drop them in the middle of the Ganges! Because, supporter, on account of the possession of this gold and silver, you will have fear, trembling, gooseflesh, and you will need protection. No possessions means no fear and other forms of [735] trouble. That is what I want to say!”

This caused sadness to the father who wondered: “Why does my son Sudinna have the heart to say so?”

Lured by his Wife

Being unable to lure Ven. Sudinna to return to household life by showing him the riches, his father thought: “There is no fetter for a man like a woman,” and he sent the ex-wife of Sudinna, saying: “I pray you, dear daughter, my son Sudinna loves you. He is fond of you. He may listen to you.” Accordingly, the ex-wife grasped Sudinna’s legs in her arms and said: “You have followed the noble practice, my lord, for the sake of getting celestial maidens. How do they look like?”

34d: The 20th Rains Retreat (Sudinna) – 1168

Explanation: In those days, many princes, sons of Brahmins, and sons of merchants renounced their untold luxuries and became ascetics. Seeing them, those who were ignorant of the benefits of an ascetic life used to ask: “Why do these people become ascetics?” The answers they got from those who pretended to know was: “Because they want to have celestial maidens and dancers.” The questions and answers of these unknowledgeable people became widespread. Acting on that reply, the ex-wife of Ven. Sudinna spoke as mentioned above.

Ven. Sudinna replied: “I do not, sister, practise the noble practice for celestial maidens.” Being prompted thus, his ex-wife thought: “My lord Sudinna has now called me sister. He no longer wants me now. Not wanting me who is his partner in life, and his own wife, he takes me as his own sister, born of the same mother.” The thought brought about grief and caused her to fall down in faintness at that very place.

Then Ven. Sudinna said to his father: “If you are to give food, supporter, do so. Do not trouble us with your display of wealth and women. Enticement with such a display means torment to monks!” Thereafter, the parents personally offered excellent food to Ven. Sudinna until he was satisfied and stopped them.

When the meal was done, the mother of Ven. Sudinna said to him: “Dear son Sudinna, our family is rich. We have a great hidden wealth. There are abundant luxuries and things for daily use. There are many delightful articles and treasures. So are there countless goods and grains for trading and exchange. Come, dear Sudinna, return to lay life and enjoy the riches. And do good works.”

Sudinna rejected his mother’s words by giving the same answer as that given to his father: “I cannot become a layman, mother. I dare not do so. I am very happily engaged in the noble practice of the threefold training.” His mother said as before for the second time and Ven. Sudinna replied the same. On the third time, however, Sudinna’s mother asked for procreative seed by saying: “Dear son Sudinna, our family is rich. We have a great hidden wealth. There are abundant luxuries and things for daily use. There are many delightful articles and treasures. There are countless goods and grains for trading and exchange. Dear Sudinna, in that case, if you find happiness so much in the Buddha’s Dispensation, at least give the seed for procreation. Let not the Licchavī princes take over these possessions of ours because we have no sons to inherit.”

Then Sudinna reflected: “I am the only heir to the wealth of my father and mother. There is nobody else. As long as I do not give the seed they will constantly follow me about seeking to protect their wealth. If they do so, I will not have a chance to devote myself to asceticism and be free of worries. My parents will give up following me only when they get a son as an heir. Then only will I be able to perform my duties as a monk in comfort and happiness.” And he replied: “Mother, I can do something to provide the seed for [736] procreation.” He said this, without knowing that he would be guilty for doing so.

Again, his mother asked: “Where are you staying now, dear Sudinna?” – “In the Great Wood, mother,” so replying, Ven. Sudinna rose from his seat and departed. Then Sudinna’s mother asked her son’s ex-wife: “Dear daughter, let me make a request for getting a son. Tell me when your fertile period is.” – “Very well, madam,” replied Sudinna’s ex-wife.

Before long, Sudinna’s ex-wife was ready for conception, and she informed Sudinna’s mother of the matter. “In that case, dear daughter, dress up in the clothes which used to have appeal for my son,” said the mother. “Very well, madam,” so saying she did as she had been told.

Taking Sudinna’s ex-wife, his mother went to Great Wood and told Sudinna twice as before to leave monkhood and enjoy the riches and do deeds of merit. Sudinna refused to do so by saying, as before, that he could not become a layman and that he dared not do so. He further added that he was happy in pursuing the noble practice of the threefold training. On the third time, however, the mother asked for the seed of procreation. Saying: “This is something I can do,” he caught hold his ex-wife’s arm and together they entered the Great Wood. As it was a time when the first Expulsion (Pārājika) rule had not been laid down yet, he did not see sexual intercourse as an offence. As such, in the forest, he successfully indulged three times in sex with his ex-wife. As a result his ex-wife became pregnant.<sup>226</sup>

Tumultuous Denunciation of Devas and Brahmas

There is no hidden place in the world for a man who commits a wrong-doing. In fact, he who does a wrong-doing is the first to know his wrong-doing. Next, his guardian spirit and the guardian spirits of the forests know it. Then other Devas and Brahmas come to know successively. Therefore, when Sudinna copulated with his ex-wife, the terrestrial spirit living in the entire Great Wood saw the offence and transmitted it by shouting it out so that higher Devas and Brahmas might hear: “Friends, the Saṅgha in the past was indeed free from the thieves of immorality (dussīla)! It was indeed free from the blemishes of immorality (dussīla)! But now the Kalanda merchant’s son, Sudinna, is a thief through immorality (dussīla)! He has caused the blemishes of immorality (dussīla)!”

On hearing the voice of the terrestrial spirits, the celestial spirits, such as the Catumahārajika Devas, the Tāvātimsa Devas, the Yāma Devas, the Tusita Devas, the Nimmānarati Devas, the Paranimitavasavattī Devas, and the Brahmas shouted in the same way successively. Thus, in a moment, the roars of condemnation spread and rose to the world of the Brahmas.

When her pregnancy became mature, Sudinna’s ex-wife gave birth to a son. Then Sudinna’s friends named him, Bījaka, and not otherwise, as it was well known that the baby’s grandmother made the request saying: Bījakaṃ pi dehi, “give us the procreative seed.” Sudinna’s ex-wife also came to be known as Bījaka’s mother (Bījaka-mātā), and Sudinna as Bījaka’s father (Bījaka-pitā).

Seven or eight years later, the son and the mother, Bījaka and Bījaka-mātā, went forth from the household life and joined the Saṅgha, respectively as a monk and a nun. They became Arahats through the help of good teachers and friends.

In this way the monastic life of the son and the mother was of benefit. The father, Ven. Sudinna, was, however, severely tormented by remorse.

In this connection the commentary says: Pitā pana vipphaṇṇārahābhūto-vihāsi, “the father, Ven. Sudinna, however, lived being overcome by great remorse.” It should therefore be assumed that for Ven. Sudinna it was totally impossible to become an Arahata in that life or existence.

It is said in the commentary that the former Sudinna, the Kalanda merchant’s son, while going to listen to the discourse, was: Bhabba kulaputta, “a man of good family who had the possibility of path and fruition.” Though he was a man endowed with merits leading to such higher attainments, a hindrance to the paths and fruitions would occur to him, as in the case of King Ajātasattu, and that hindrance actually occurred, as he was in great torment on account of his evil practice when he had sexual intercourse with his ex-wife, or so the teachers say. [738]

A question may arise here: “Was such a hindrance possible to occur to one, who is endowed with the potential for higher attainments, even in the lifetime of a Buddha?” The answer is: “Yes, it was.” But the hindrance did not derive from the Buddha. In fact, Buddhas are those who endeavour to help others attain the paths and fruitions; they constantly put efforts for the spiritual welfare of others. Therefore no hindrance can come from them to those who are possessed of the merits of their past.

In reality, a hindrance on spiritual progress is due to inadequacy of performance, and association with bad friends. Of these two, inadequacy of performance is of two kinds: the lack of teaching effort which is conducive to the paths and fruitions on the part of the teacher, and the lack of practice conducive to the paths and fruitions on the part of the student who is endowed with the merits of the past.

Of these, inadequacy of performance on the part of the teacher means that on the part of a Buddha’s disciple only, and not on the part of Buddhas. Explanation: in the Discourse to Dhanañjānī (Dhanañjānī-sutta, MN 97) it says that while the Brahmin Dhānañjānī was dying, Ven. Sāriputta taught him the doctrine of the four sublime practices (Brahma-vihāra) that could lead him to the Brahma abode. When the Brahmin died, he was reborn in that very plane of existence. Details should be taken from the discourse. If Ven. Sāriputta, the General of the Dhamma, had known of the latent qualifications of the Brahmin and if he had taught him accordingly, he would have become a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna). But now the teaching was different and the Brahmin’s attainment was short of the noble status. Inadequacy of performance on the part of the teacher thus can cause the danger of failure to reach the paths and fruitions.

An example of inadequacy of performance on the part of the student who has qualifications may be seen in the Discourse to Kandaraka (Kandaraka-sutta, MN 51). According to this discourse, a wandering ascetic, named Kandaraka and an elephant trainer’s son, named Pessa, once went to the Buddha, who taught them the four individuals, the first being one who worries himself (attantapa).

When the Buddha finished just an outline of the discourse, and before he could go on to deal with it in detail, Pessa, the elephant trainer’s son, departed in satisfaction. If he had listened to the discourse in detail, Pessa would have become a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna). As he left after hearing the discourse in brief, he had only two advantages: His becoming faithful to the Saṅgha and a new method of practising the foundations of mindfulness. Details should be taken from the translation of the discourse. Had he waited a little longer to hear the elaborate teaching on the four individuals, he would have reached the first stage on his way to Awakening. His impatience now caused his failure to do so. Inadequacy of performance on the part of the student with qualifications for higher attainments is a cause of his loss.

Hindrance to the paths and fruitions due to association with bad friends may be understood from the following: If King Ajātasattu, an associate of Devadatta and a follower of his advice, had not killed his father, he would have become a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) the day he listened to the Buddha's delivery of the Discourse on the Fruits of the Ascetic Life (Sāmañña-phala-sutta, DN 2). Now that he adhered to the advice of his evil friend and did wrong by murdering his father, he did not become one. Association with a wicked companion creates a hindrance to the paths and fruitions.

Here also it should be taken that Sudinna suffered the same loss because of his company with a bad friend. If he had not followed his parents' counsel and kept away from having sex with his ex-wife, there would not have occurred a sudden stop to his good prospects for attainments, the stop that was brought about by his remorse. The remorse was so great and tormenting that he met with failure in becoming an Arahāt. [739]

Ven. Sudinna's Remorse

At that time a fit of remorse occurred to Ven. Sudinna: "I have failed to make achievements such as absorption (jhāna). My gain of monkhood has been worthless! I have ill-gotten the teaching! The Buddha's Dispensation has not come to me in a good manner! Because I have thus been incapable of practising in perfection, in purity for life, the noble practice of the threefold training after receiving ordination in the Dispensation of the Dhamma and Vinaya taught so well!" So great was his remorse that he became emaciated day by day, and with poor and dry skin, his good appearance deteriorated and his complexion became pale like a withered leaf. His body had sinews that were like a cast net; his distress was hidden in him and his introverted thoughts developed gradually; tormented by his physical and mental unhappiness, he remained in a pensive mood.

34d: The 20th Rains Retreat (Sudinna) – 1173

Then Sudinna’s friends said to him: “Though formerly you were handsome, your sense-faculties were alert, your facial colour was clear, and your complexion was especially clean, now you are emaciated day by day, and with poor and dry skin, your good appearance deteriorates and your complexion becomes pale like a withered leaf. Your body has sinews that are like a cast net; your distress is hidden in you and your introverted thoughts develop gradually; tormented by your physical and mental unhappiness, you remain in pensive mood. Why, friend Sudinna? Are you practising the noble practice of the threefold training with unhappiness in the Buddha’s Dispensation?”

Ven. Sudinna replied as follows: “Friends, not with unhappiness am I practising the noble practice of the threefold training in the Buddha’s Dispensation. There is one wrong deed done by me though. I have committed sexual misconduct with my ex-wife, for which I feel remorseful, thinking: ‘I have failed to make achievements such as absorption (jhāna). My gain of monkhood has been worthless! I have ill-gotten the teaching! The Buddha’s Dispensation has not come to me in a good manner! Because I have thus been incapable of practising in perfection, in purity for life, the noble practice of the threefold training after receiving ordination in the Dispensation of the Dhamma and the Vinaya taught so well!’ ”

Then his friends blamed him by citing a large number of instances: “Friend Sudinna, since you are thus incapable of practising in perfection and purity for life the noble practice of the threefold training after receiving ordination in the Dispensation of the Dhamma and the Vinaya taught so well, you should be remorseful.

Friend Sudinna, did not the master teach us, in various ways, to separate ourselves from lust and not to combine with lust? Did he not teach us to dissociate from sensuality and not to associate with sensuality? Did he not teach us to be detached from craving and wrong view and not to be attached through craving and wrong view?

Friend Sudinna, despite the master’s teaching to separate from lust, you have striven to combine with lust. Despite the master’s teaching to dissociate from sensuality, you have striven to associate with sensuality. Despite the master’s teaching to be detached from craving and wrong view, you have striven to be attached through craving and wrong view.

Friend, did not the master teach us, in various ways, to separate from lust, to give up conceit, to remove hunger or thirst that are moral defilements, to eliminate attachment that is lingering through craving, to cut the source of suffering, to cease craving, to have no passionate desires, to stop craving and to extinguish moral defilements?

Friend, did the master not teach us, in various ways, the removal of sensuality? Did he not teach us the analytical knowledge of perception concerning sensuality? Did he not teach us the elimination of craving that is hunger or thirst for sensuality? Did he not teach us the cutting off of thoughts connected with sensuality? Did he not teach us the cooling of the heat that is sensuality? [740]

Friend, the wrong deed you have done cannot cause the faithless to become faithful nor can it cause the faithful to become more faithful. In fact, friend, the wrong deed of yours will make the faithless remain faithless and will lead to the destruction of the faith of the faithful.” Then they reported the matter to the Buddha.

On account of this incident the Buddha held a meeting of the Saṅgha and asked Ven. Sudinna: “Is it true, Sudinna, that you have committed sexual misconduct with your ex-wife?” When he replied: “Yes, venerable sir,” the Buddha rebuked Sudinna in the following manner: “You foolish man (mogha purisa), who have failed to attain the paths and fruitions, achieving nothing! It is not befitting a monk! It is not the practice of a monk. It is improper. It should not be done! You good for nothing! Why are you incapable of practising in perfection, in purity for life, the noble practice of the threefold training after receiving ordination in the Dispensation the Dhamma and the Vinaya proclaimed so well?

You foolish man, did I not teach you, in various ways, to separate yourself from lust, and not to combine with lust? Did I not teach you to dissociate from sensuality and not to associate with sensuality? Did I not teach you to be detached from craving and wrong view and not to be attached through craving and wrong view. Though I teach you to separate yourself from lust, you have striven to combine with lust! Though I teach you to dissociate from sensuality, you have striven to associate with sensuality! Though I teach you to be detached from craving and wrong view, you have striven to be attached through craving and wrong view.

You foolish man, did I not teach you, in various ways, to be free from lust, not to be intoxicated with conceit, to remove hunger or thirst that is a defilement, to cut off attachment tinged with craving, to eliminate the roots of the round of suffering, to cease craving, to reject desires, to stop craving and to extinguish defilement?

You foolish man, did I not teach you, in various ways, the removal of sensual pleasures? Did I not teach you the analytical knowledge of perception concerning sensual pleasure? Did I not teach you the removal of craving for sensual pleasure? Did I not teach you the cutting off of thoughts concerning sensual pleasure? Did I not teach you the extinguishing of the heat of sensual pleasure?

You foolish man, it is better to put your male organ into the mouth of a highly poisonous, severely poisonous snake! But it is not good to put it into the female organ! You foolish man, it is better to put your male organ into the mouth of a cobra! But it is not good to put it into the female organ! You foolish man, it is better to put your male organ into a heap of embers with glowing and blazing flames that burn all around! But it is not good to put it into the female organ!

Because, foolish man, by putting your male organ into the snake's mouth or into the heap of embers, you will just come to death or you will suffer almost to death. By putting your male organ into the snake's mouth or into the heap of embers, you cannot go to the four suffering states of long suffering, of animals, of departed spirits and the Asuras on destruction of your body. But by doing so with regard to the female organ, foolish man, you may go to those suffering states on destruction of your body!

You foolish man, you have committed sexual intercourse which is not the practice of noble persons, which is the practice of villagers, which is a crude act that ends in washing, which is done only in a secluded place because of its unseemly sight, which is done by a couple of a man and a woman. You foolish man, you are a pioneer in the sense that you engage in unwholesomeness ahead of others!

You foolish man, what you have done now cannot cause the faithless to become [741] faithful; nor can it cause the faithful to become more faithful. In fact, foolish man, the evil deed of yours will make the faithless remain faithless and lead to the destruction of the faith of the faithful.”

Then the Buddha censured Ven. Sudinna in many ways and taught the disadvantages of such unseemly things as difficulty of maintenance of self, difficult of maintenance by others, greediness, discontent, fondness of companions, and indolence. He also taught the advantages of such seemly things as easy maintenance of self, easy maintenance by others, little wants, easy content, decrease in defilements, the shaking off of defilements, assuming a pleasant appearance, the destruction of defilements, and industriousness.

Ten Objectives of the Disciplinary Rules

He also gave the monks a talk appropriate to this incident and addressed them as follows: “Monks, in that case I will lay down disciplinary rules with ten objectives:

1. For the observance by the Saṅgha.
2. For the welfare of the Saṅgha.
3. For suppressing those who violate morality.
4. For the happy life of monastics who cherish morality.
5. For removing suffering in the present life.
6. For removing suffering that may arise in future.
7. For causing the faithless to become faithful.
8. For causing the faithful to become more faithful.
9. For the perpetuation of the Dhamma.
10. For the support of the training.

Monks let it be proclaimed thus: A monk who commits sexual intercourse suffers loss in the Dispensation which amounts to Expulsion (Pārājika).<sup>227</sup> There should no longer be association with moral monastics in performing various monastic acts. Let it thus be proclaimed.” In this manner did the Buddha lay down the first Expulsion rule in the 20th year after the Awakening. [818]

35a: List of Rains Retreats

[This and the next section are moved here from the end of chapter 19, where they interrupted the flow of the story.]

The Buddha had no fixed rain-residence for 20 years during the early period after his Awakening (paṭhama-bodhi), as he went from place to place wherever sentient beings could be saved from the round of suffering. Briefly, this is a list of rains retreats observed by the Buddha:

1. After teaching the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) to the Group-of-Five monastics headed by Ven. Koṇḍañña, together with 180 million Brahmas, at the Deer Park at Isipatana, near Bārāṇasī, the Buddha observed the first Rains Retreat (Vassa) in the Deer Park, going for alms round in Bārāṇasī.
- 2-4. Then the Buddha observed the second to fourth Rains Retreats at Veḷuvana monastery, making Rājagaha his alms resort.
5. The fifth Rains Retreat was observed at a monastery with pinnacles and finials called the Kūṭāgāra Hall in the Great Wood, depending for alms food on Vesālī.
6. The sixth Rains Retreat was spent at the monastery in the Chāya forest in the vicinity of Mount Makula.
7. The seventh Rains Retreat was observed on the emerald throne at the foot of the Coral (Pāricchatta) tree in the celestial realm of Tāvātimsa, teaching the Abhidhamma to his reborn mother.
8. The eighth Rains Retreat was spent in the forest of pigeon peas, a wildlife sanctuary, or the forest governed by a celestial Yakkha, with Saṃsumāragiri with the Bhagga country as his alms food resort.
9. The ninth Rains Retreat was observed at the Ghositārāma monastery where Kosambī was the alms food resort for him.
10. He spent the tenth Rains Retreat in the Pālīyeyaka forest, where the elephant King Pālīyeyaka placed himself at his service.
11. He spent the eleventh Rains Retreat at Nāḷikārāma monastery with the Brahmin village, Nāḷa, serving as his alms food resort.

35a: List of Rains Retreats – 1178

12. He observed the twelfth Rains Retreat near the Margosa (Pucimanda) tree, which was governed by a Yakkha named Nāḷeru, with Verañjā country as his alms resort.
13. With Jantu village, in the Cāliya country, serving as his alms resort, he spent the thirteenth Rains Retreat at the Cāliya mountain monastery.
14. The fourteenth Rains Retreat was spent at the Jetavana monastery with Sāvattḥī, in the country of Kosala, as his alms resort.
15. With Kapilavatthu, in the Sakka country, serving as his alms resort, he spent the fifteenth Rains Retreat at the Nigrodha monastery.
16. He spent the sixteenth Rains Retreat at Aggāḷava shrine, which was a temple for the spirits, with the country of Āḷavī serving as his alms resort.
17. The seventeenth Rains Retreat was spent at the Veḷuvana monastery, where Rājagaha of Magadha became his alms resort. [489].
- 18-19. The Buddha resided at the Cāliya mountain monastery for two Rains Retreats – the eighteenth and nineteenth – with his alms resort located in Jantu village within the Cāliya country.
20. The twentieth Rains Retreat was observed at the Veḷuvana monastery, in Rājagaha of Magadha, which served as his alms resort.

These are the places where the Buddha spent irregular rains-residence during the first 20 years after his Awakening (paṭhama-bodhi).

- 21-44. The Buddha observed regular Rains Retreats from the 21st to the 44th year at Jetavana and Pubbārāma monasteries at Sāvattḥī, in the Kosala country, which served as his alms resort.
45. Then the Buddha spent his last Rains Retreat, the 45th in the village of Veḷuva, in Vesālī country, when on the verge of his Parinibbāna.

Various Works in Myanmar Dealing with the Rains Retreats

Ven. Monywe Zetawun Sayādaw had composed a verse for easy recollection of the places where Buddha Gotama had observed the Rains Retreats, in one of his works entitled the Light on the All-Seeing One (Samanta-cakkhu-dīpanī) (Vol II, p. 374).<sup>228</sup>

The great friend of sentient beings of the three worlds spent two months or 60 days at the place of his Awakening, and then observed Rains Retreats in the places shown below:

1. First Rains Retreat (Vassa) at Bārāṇasī.
- 2-4. Veḷuvana monastery, Rājagaha.
5. Great Wood monastery, donated by the Licchavī princes of Vesālī.
6. Sixth at Mount Makula.
7. Seventh in Tāvatiṃsa.
8. Eighth in the Bhagga country.
9. Ninth at Ghositārāma monastery near Kosambī.
10. Tenth in the Pāḷileyaka Forest of the elephant King Pāḷileyaka.
11. Eleventh in the Brahmin village of Nāḷa.
12. Twelfth at Verañjā.
13. Thirteenth at Cāliya Mountain.
14. Fourteenth at Jetavana monastery, Sāvattihī.
15. Fifteenth at Nigrodha monastery of Kapilavatthu.
16. Sixteenth at Āḷavī.
17. Seventeenth at Veḷuvana monastery, Rājagaha.
- 18-19. Eighteenth and nineteenth at Cāliya Mountain monastery.
20. Twentieth back at Rājagaha.
- 21-44. Thus the Buddha was on the move from place to place for the duration of the first 20 years, which is the first period after Awakening, as regards the second period, from the 21st to the 44th year, he spent 24

Rains Retreats alternately at Pubbārāma and Jetavana monasteries in Sāvattthī.

45. The Buddha spent the last Rains Retreat at the village of Veḷuva when on the verge of his Parinibbāna, making a total of 45 Rains Retreats (Vassa) spent variously at fifteen places in the course of 45 years before crossing over to the other shore at the age of 80. [491]

35b: Stories about Wrong View

Out of the many events that took place during the later period after the Awakening (pacchima-bodhi), the last 25 years of his teaching career, only a few notable ones will be recorded hereafter.

500 Women

Once the Buddha was staying near Pañcasāla village which he made his resort for alms, for he had discerned the past meritorious deeds of the 500 young women of the village, deeds that were potential for their attainment of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga). On a festive day, the women went to the riverside, bathed, dressed and were on their way back to the village.

As Buddha was entering the village for alms food, Māra, the Wicked One, then possessed all the villagers there so as to cause the Buddha to be deprived of food, he did not get even a spoonful of rice. Compelled to leave the village with his bowl as clean as when he entered it, he stood at the village gate. There Māra asked the Buddha: “Monk, have you received any alms food?” When the Buddha replied: “Māra, you have done something so that I received nothing, haven’t you?” Māra said: “In that case, venerable sir, enter the village again for food.”

It was not with honesty that Māra said this. In fact, he did so with an ulterior motive, he would like to possess the villagers again to scoff at the Buddha by clapping his hands in front of him. The Buddha knew Māra’s intention and did not enter the village again out of compassion for him. The Buddha was aware that should Māra hurt me in this manner according to his plan, his head would split into seven pieces.

The moment the Wicked One spoke to the Buddha, the 500 young women arrived at the village gate, showing their respect to the Buddha and they stood at an appropriate place. Māra then asked the Buddha: “Venerable sir, if you have no food will you not suffer hunger greatly?” – “Māra!” said the Buddha, “Even if we have collected no food, I will spend the time in joy (pīti) and bliss (sukha) accompanied by absorption (jhāna) like the Mahā Brahmas, who are residents of the Ābhassara abodes and he uttered the following Dhamma-verse thereafter (Dhp 153):

Susukhaṃ vata jīvāma, verinesu averino, verinesu manussesu, viharāma averino.

Hey wicked Māra! There is not the slightest degree of things that cause worry, such as passion, hatred, etc., in us. We will live long free from suffering and in great happiness. Like the Brahmas of the Ābhassara abode, we shall certainly have bliss as our food by engaging in the absorptions (jhāna) with joy.

At the end of the teaching, the 500 young women were established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).

King Kosala’s Matchless Alms Giving

Once as the Buddha travelled and entered the great Jetavana monastery in the company of 500 monks, King Pasenadi Kosala went to the monastery and invited the Buddha to the next day’s gift for visitors (āgantuka-dāna). He prepared the gifts elaborately and made an announcement: “Let the citizens see my gifts!”

Having come and seen the king’s gifts, the citizens became desirous of competing against the king and invited the Buddha for the following day’s alms giving and made every gift perfect and invited the king, saying: “Let the Great King, our recognized lord (sammuti-deva), come and observe our generosity.”

Having observed the alms giving of the citizens, the king thought to himself: “The people have given gifts that are greater than mine. I will give another alms giving [819] that will excel theirs.” The next day he prepared his gifts more elaborately and invited the people to witness it. The people saw the king’s gifts, and in order not to be outdone by him, they organized for the following day a greater alms giving and sent an invitation to the king. In this way the king could not defeat the citizens, nor the citizens the king.

At the sixth grand offering of alms, the people increased their gifts 100 times, nay, 1,000 times, and decided that their offering should be so perfect that nobody could say that: “Such and such a thing is not included in the gifts of the citizens.”

Seeing the people’s offerings, the king became desperate, thinking: “What is the use of my living if I cannot perform better than the people in the giving of alms?” So he lay down on his couch, thinking of ways and means to outdo his subjects.

Queen Mallikā then went to the king and asked: “Why are you lying down, Great King? Why do your sense faculties look as though you are fading away?” – “Don’t you know, my dear queen?” asked the king in return. “No, I do not, Great King,” replied the queen. The king then related the matter to her.

Queen Mallikā then said to the king: “Do not worry and fret, Great King. Where have you learnt that a monarch ruling over land and water can be defeated by his subjects? I shall try to organize your generosity.”

Having encouraged the king thus, the queen gave her advice as she was desirous of taking over the management of the matchless alms giving (asadisa-dāna) in the following manner: “Have a pavilion, Great King, built with fragrant planks of the Beautiful Sāla<sup>229</sup> tree for the 500 monks in the precincts of the golden palace. The people will stay outside the precincts. Have 500 white umbrellas made; each of 500 elephants will take hold of one umbrella with its trunk, and stand, sheltering each monk with it. Have eight boats made of the best gold. These boats are to be filled with perfumes in the middle of pavilion.

Between each pair of monks will sit a princess grinding scented wood for perfumes. Another princess will hold a round fan and flap it for each pair of monks. Other princesses will convey ground perfumes and put them in the boats. Among these princesses, some will carry branches of blue lotus flowers and stir the perfumes in the boats so that they will be pervaded with the fragrance from the perfumes. Certainly, the people have no princesses, no white umbrellas, no elephants. For these reasons the citizens will be defeated. Do, Great King, as I now have told you.” Replying: “Very well, my dear, you have given me good advice,” the king had everything done according to the queen’s instructions.

While everything was being done accordingly, one tame elephant was yet to be acquired for a monk. Then the king asked: “A tamed elephant is wanted, dear queen. What shall we do?” – “Do you not have 500 elephants?” – “Yes, I have dear. But the rest are all untamed. Like the tornado wind they might turn very wild on seeing monks.” – “I have an idea, Great King, as to where a young wild elephant should be placed to make him hold an umbrella with his trunk.” – “Where is the place?” – “It is close to Ven. Aṅgulimāla,” answered the queen.

The king had all this done, as advised by the queen. The young wild elephant stood there quietly with his tail tucked between its thighs, its ears down, and eyes closed. The people were amazed to see the elephant, saying to themselves: “Even such a wild elephant has now become such a docile and quiet animal!”

Having treated the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha to alms food, the king showed his [820] respect to him and said: “In this pavilion of alms giving, exalted Buddha, I offer to you things suitable for monks (kappiya-bhaṇḍa) as well as things unsuitable for them (akappiya-bhaṇḍa).”

The things that were offered in this matchless gift in a single day cost 140 million. Priceless were the four things offered to the Buddha: 1) The white umbrella; 2) the throne for sitting on; 3) the stand to place the bowl on; and 4) the wooden board to stand on after washing his feet. It was impossible to repeat such a grand offering to the Buddha. Therefore the alms giving performed by King Kosala became famous in the Dispensation as the matchless gift (asadisa-dāna). Indeed, such a matchless gift takes place but once to every Buddha. And that matchless gift which happened just once to our Buddha was organized by the wise lady, Queen Mallikā.

Ministers Juṇha and Kāla

King Pasenadi Kosala had two ministers: Juṇha and Kāla. Between them, Kāla considered: “A loss has indeed occurred to the king’s palace! The treasures amounting to many millions have come to nothing in a single day. Having taken the king’s gifts, these monks will return to their places and abandon themselves to slumber. Oh, the palace has come to ruin in unprecedented proportions!”

On the contrary, Juṇha thought like this: “The king has properly and successfully given alms! True, one who is not established in kingship cannot give such alms. There is no alms giver who does not share his merit with all other beings. I rejoice at the king’s excellent matchless gift and say: Well done! Well done!”

Reflecting thus, the minister Juṇha appreciated and took delight in the gift. When the Buddha had finished partaking of his food, King Pasenadi Kosala made himself ready to hear the discourse by holding a cup ready to pour the water of dedication, the discourse to be given by the Buddha in approval of the king’s gift.

The Buddha reflected as follows: “The king has indeed given at great sacrifice as though he let a great flood roll down wave after wave. Could he succeed in gladdening the hearts of the people or could he not?”

Then he came to know the reactions in the minds of the two ministers and came to know further thus: “If I were to give a detailed discourse that goes well with the king’s gift, the minister Kāḷa’s head will be split into seven pieces but the other minister, Juṅha, will be established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga). Taking pity on Kāḷa, the Buddha delivered only a four line verse (catuppādika) despite such a great alms giving having been performed by the king; then he rose from his seat and left for the monastery.

Ven. Angulimāla’s Courage

On their arrival back at the monastery, the monks asked Ven. Aṅgulamāla: “When you saw the wild elephant holding the umbrella over you, friend, were you not afraid?” Getting the answer in the negative, the monks drew near to the Buddha and complained with doubt: “Ven. Aṅgulimāla, exalted Buddha, professes to be an Arahāt.”

“Monks,” addressed the Buddha, “Aṅgulamāla was not afraid indeed. Ascetics like my dear sons who are highly noble amidst Arahats have no fear.” And the Buddha added the following verse as contained in the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, Dhṃ 422):

*Usabhaṃ pavaraṃ vīraṃ, mahesiṃ vijitāvinam;
anejaṃ nhātakam Buddhaṃ, tam-ahaṃ brūmi brāhmaṇam*

Monks! The Arahāt with the pollutants (āsava) destroyed, who is courageous as he knows no trembling like a bull-king, who possesses noble energy, who has [821] sought and acquired the aggregate of virtues, who has triumphed over the three evils: Māra as deity, māra as moral defilement, and māra as conditioning factors, who has quenched all craving for existences, who has washed away his mental dirt with the clear water of the path and who has realized the four truths, him I declare a Brahmin.

Destinies of the Two Ministers

King Pasenadi Kosala was unhappy and thought to himself as follows: “The Fortunate One has risen from his seat and left without giving me a discourse that would befit the occasion though I have performed a great alms giving (dāna) to the assembly of such greatness. Instead, he has merely uttered a verse. Perhaps, I have not done what is agreeable to him, I must have done what is not agreeable. Perhaps, I have not given suitable things, I must have given unsuitable things. Perhaps the Buddha is averse to me. The alms giving performed by me is known as a matchless gift (asadisa-dāna). The Buddha should have delivered some discourse appropriate to this kind of gift.” Thinking thus he went to the monastery, paid respects to the Buddha and said: “Exalted Buddha, have I not given the right alms giving (dāna), or have I not given things that are good, or have I given things that are not good?”

When the Buddha replied: “Why do you ask me like this, Great King?” The king said: “You delivered no discourse in accord with my matchless gift.” The Buddha replied: “You have given the right things, Great King. Yes, the gift you have given is known as a matchless gift. This kind of gift is given to each Buddha but once. It is not possible to repeat it.”

Then the king asked: “Why then, exalted Buddha, did you not preach to us in accord with the greatness of the gift?” – “Because the audience was not pure.” – “What was the defect of the audience, exalted Buddha?” the Buddha then told the king of the reactions of the two ministers and explained that he had not taught elaborately out of compassion for Kāḷa. The king then asked Kāḷa whether it was true. When Kāḷa answered in the affirmative, the king banished him from the kingdom, saying: “As I, with my family, gave from my own property without taking a coin from you, what trouble did you suffer? Kāḷa, get out! But the wealth I have given you remains yours, I will not take it back. However, you must leave the country on this day!”

Then the king summoned the other minister, Juṇha, and asked him whether it was true that he had reacted favourably, and on receiving a positive answer, the king said to Junha: “Well done, uncle, well done! I admire you, uncle. Take over my retinue and give gifts for seven days the way I have done.”

So saying, the king handed over his kingship to Juṇha for seven days, after which, he addressed the Buddha: “Look at what the fool has done, exalted Buddha. He is the one who stood against my gift being given in such a manner!” “Yes, Great King,” said the Buddha, “the fools are those who do not approve of another’s act of generosity but condemn it and finally land up in a suffering abode. The wise, however, rejoice in other’s gift and finally attain happy states.” And the Buddha uttered the following verse (Dhp 177):

*Na ve kadariyā Deva-lokaṃ vajanti, bālā have nappasaṃsanti dānaṃ,
hīro ca dānaṃ anumodamāno, teneva so hoti sukhī parattha.*

Great King! Indeed those who are hard and stingy do not attain celestial abodes. The fools, who are ignorant of the present world and the future, indeed do not admire gifts and are not happy about it. Only the far-sighted [822] man of wisdom is able to rejoice in gifts. For the very reason of his rejoicing, upon his death, he enjoys divine bliss.

At the end of the teaching, the minister Juṅha became a noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna). Enjoying the king’s favour, he performed charitable acts for seven days in the manner of the king.

When the Buddha spoke the verse beginning with (Dhp 177): Na ve kadariyā Deva-lokaṃ vajanti, “indeed those who are hard and stingy do not attain celestial abodes,” King Pasenadi Kosala was so pleased that he offered the Buddha a double robe made in Sivi country and worth 100,000 pieces of money. Thereafter, he re-entered the city.

The Birth Story about King Sivi

[The following is based on the Birth Story about King Sivi (Sivi-jātaka, Ja 499) and its commentary.]

The next day, at the assembly, the monks talked about the King’s generosity; “Friends, King Kosala was not satisfied even with his matchless gift that he had just given; so, after the Fortunate One had taught the Dhamma, he offered him again the double robe made in Sivi worth 100,000. The king is so insatiable in his thirst for alms giving.”

Then the Buddha came and asked what they were talking about and on hearing what was being discussed, he said: “It is easy, monks, to give away one’s external belongings. The good and wise Bodhisattas of old gave away their wealth daily to the value of 600,000, making it unnecessary for the whole populace of Jambudīpa to work with their ploughs. Yet they were not satisfied with giving such external things (bāhira-dāna). They believed unwaveringly that: ‘He who gives what he is very fond of can enjoy the special benefit which he is so fond of.’ With this belief, they gave away even their eyes to those who came into their presence and asked for them.”

[At the request of the monks, the Buddha related the Birth Story about King Sivi, an event that happened in the past.]

Once upon a time, when the mighty King Sivi reigned in the city of Ariṭṭhapura in the kingdom of Sivi, the Great Being was born as his son. They called his name Prince Sivi. When he grew up, he went to Takkasilā and studied there; then returning, he proved his knowledge to his father the king, and was made viceroy by him. At his father’s death he became king himself, and, forsaking the ways of evil, he kept the ten royal virtues and ruled in righteousness. He caused six alms halls to be built, at the four gates, in the midst of the city, and at his own door. He was munificent in distributing each day 600,000 pieces of money. On the eighth, fourteenth, and fifteenth days he never missed visiting the alms halls to see the distribution made.

Once, on the day of the full moon, the state umbrella had been lifted up early in the morning, and he sat on the royal throne thinking over the gifts he had given. He thought to himself: “Of all outside things there is nothing I have not given; but this kind of giving does not content me. I want to give something which is a part of myself. Well, this day when I go to the alms hall, I vow that if anyone ask for something not from outside me, but name what is a part of myself, if he should mention my very heart, I will cut open my breast with a spear, and as though I were drawing up a water-lily, stalk and all, from a calm lake, I will pull forth my heart dripping with blood-clots and give it him: If he should name the flesh of my body, I will cut the flesh off my body and give it, as though I were gravng with a gravng tool; let him name my blood, I will give him my blood, dropping it in his mouth or filling a bowl with it; or again, if one say, I can’t get my household work done, come and do a slave’s work at my home, then I will leave my royal dress and stand without, proclaiming myself a slave, and slave’s work I will do; should any men demand my eyes, I will tear out my eyes and give them, as one might take out the pith of a palm tree.” Thus he thought within himself:

“If there be any human gift that I have never made, be it my eyes, I’ll give it now, all firm and unafraid.”

35b: Stories about Wrong View– 1189

Then he bathed himself with sixteen pitchers of perfumed water, and adorned himself in all his magnificence, and after a meal of choice food he mounted upon an elephant richly caparisoned and went to the alms hall.

Sakka, perceiving his resolution, thought: “King Sivi has determined to give his eyes to any chance comer who may ask. Will he be able to do it, or no?” He determined to try him; and, in the form of a Brahmin old and blind, he posted himself on a high place, and when the king came to his alms hall he stretched out his hand and stood crying: “Long live the king!” Then the king drove his elephant towards him, and said: “What do you say, Brahmin?” Sakka said to him: “Great King! In all the inhabited world there is no spot where the fame of your munificent heart has not sounded. I am blind, and you have two eyes.” Then he repeated the first verse, asking for an eye:

“To ask an eye the old man comes from far, for I have none; give me one of yours, I pray, then we shall each have one.”

When the Great Being heard this, thought he: “Why that is just what I was thinking in my palace before I came! What a fine chance! My heart’s desire will be fulfilled today; I shall give a gift which no man ever gave yet.” And he recited the second verse:

Sivi:

“Who taught you hither to wend your way, mendicant, and for an eye to pray? The chiefest portion of a man is this, and hard for men to part with, so they say.”

Sakka:

“Sujampati among the gods, the same here among men called Maghavā by name, he taught me hither to wend my way, begging, and for an eye to urge my claim. It is the chiefest gift for which I pray! Give me an eye, do not say me nay! Give me an eye, that chiefest gift of gifts, so hard for men to part with, as they say!”

Sivi:

“The wish that brought thee hither, the wish that did arise within, be that wish fulfilled. Here, Brahmin, take my eyes. One eye you did request of me; behold, I give you two! Go with good sight, in all the people’s view; so be thy wish fulfilled and now come true.”

35b: Stories about Wrong View– 1190

So much the king said. But, thinking it not meet that he should root out his eyes and bestow them there and then, he brought the Brahmin indoors with him, and sitting on the royal throne, sent for a surgeon named Sīvaka. “Take out my eye,” he then said.

Now all the city rang with the news, that the king wished to tear out his eyes and give them to a Brahmin. Then the commander-in-chief, and all the other officials, and those beloved of the king, gathered together from city and harem, and recited three verses, that they might turn the king from his purpose:

“Do not give your eye, my lord; desert us not, king! Give money, pearls and coral give, and many a precious thing: Give thoroughbreds caparisoned, forth be the chariots rolled, king, drive up the elephants all fine with cloth of gold; these give, king! That we may all preserve you safe and sound, your faithful people, with our cars and chariots ranged around.”

Hereupon the king recited three verses:

“The one who, having sworn to give, is then unfaithful found, puts his own neck within a snare low hidden on the ground. The one who, having sworn to give, is then unfaithful found, more sinful is than sin, and he to Yama’s house is bound. Unasked give nothing; neither give the thing he asks not, this therefore which the Brahmin asks, I give it on the spot.”

Then the courtiers asked: “What do you desire in giving your eyes?” repeating a verse:

“Life, beauty, joy, or strength, what is the prize, O King, what motive for your deed supplies? Why should the King of Sivi-land supreme for the next world’s sake thus give up his eyes?”

The king answered them in a verse:

“In giving thus, not glory is my goal, not sons, not wealth, or kingdoms to control. This is the good old way of holy men; of giving gifts enamoured is my mind.”

To the Great Being’s words the courtiers answered nothing; so the Great Being addressed Sīvaka the surgeon in a verse:

35b: Stories about Wrong View– 1191

“A friend and comrade, Sīvaka, art thou: Do as I bid thee – thou hast skill enough – take out my eyes, for this is my desire, and in the beggar’s hands bestow them now.”

But Sīvaka said: “Think, my lord, to give one’s eyes is no light thing.” – “Sīvaka, I have considered; don’t delay, nor talk too much in my presence.” Then he thought: “It is not fitting that a skilful surgeon like me should pierce a king’s eyes with the lancet,” so he pounded a number of simples, rubbed a blue lotus with the powder, and brushed it over the right eye; round rolled the eye, and there was great pain. “Reflect, my king, I can make it all right.” – “Go on, friend, no delay, please.”

Again he rubbed in the powder, and brushed it over the eye: the eye started from the socket, the pain was worse than before. “Reflect, my king, I can still restore it.” – “Be quick with the job!”

A third time he smeared a sharper powder, and applied it; by the drug’s power round went the eye, out it came from the socket, and hung dangling at the end of the tendon. “Reflect, my king, I can yet restore it again.” – “Be quick.”

The pain was extreme, blood was trickling down, the king’s garments were stained with the blood. The king’s women and the courtiers fell at his feet, crying: “My lord, do not sacrifice your eyes!” Loudly they wept and wailed. The king endured the pain, and said: “My friend, be quick.” – “Very well, my lord,” said the physician; and with his left hand grasping the eyeball he took a knife in his right, and severing the tendon, laid the eye in the Bodhisatta’s hand. He, gazing with his left eye at the right and enduring the pain, said: “Brahmin, come here.” When the Brahmin came near, he went on: “The eye of omniscience is dearer than this eye a hundred fold, indeed a thousand fold; there you have my reason for this action,” and he gave it to the Brahmin, who raised it and placed it in his own eye socket. There it remained fixed by his power like a blue lotus in bloom.

When the Bodhisatta with his left eye saw that eye in his head, he cried: “Ah, how good is this, my gift of an eye!” [408] Thrilled, he straightaway with the joy that had arisen within him, gave the other eye also. Sakka placed this also in the place of his own eye, and departed from the king’s palace, and then from the city, with the gaze of the multitude upon him, and went away to the world of gods. The Buddha, explaining this, repeated a verse and a half:

“So Sivi spurred on Sīvaka, and he fulfilled his mind. He drew the king’s eyes out, and to the Brahmin these consigned, and now the Brahmin had the eyes, and now the king was blind.”

In a short while the king’s eyes began to grow; as they grew, and before they reached the top of the holes, a lump of flesh rose up inside like a ball of wool, filling the cavity; they were like a doll’s eyes, but the pain ceased. The Bodhisatta remained in the palace a few days. Then he thought: “What has a blind man to do with ruling? I will hand over my kingdom to the courtiers, and go into my park, and become an ascetic, and live as a recluse.” He summoned his courtiers, and told them what he intended to do: “One man,” said he, “shall be with me, to wash my face, and so forth, and to do all that is proper, and you must fasten a cord to guide me to the retiring places.” Then calling for his charioteer, he bade him prepare the chariot. But the courtiers would not allow him to go in the chariot; they brought him out in a golden litter, and set him down by the lake side, and then, guarding him all around, returned. The king sat in the litter thinking of his gift.

At that moment Sakka’s throne became hot; and pondering he perceived the reason: “I will offer the king a boon,” thought he, “and make his eye well again.” So to that place he came; and not far off from the Bodhisatta, he walked up and down, up and down. To explain this, the Master recited these verses:

“A few days past; the eyes began to heal, and sound to appear. The fostering King of Sivi then sent for his charioteer. Prepare the chariot, charioteer; to me then make it known. I go to park and wood and lake with lilies overgrown. He sat in a litter by the waterside, and here Sujampati, the Lord of the Devas, great Sakka, did appear.”

“Who is that?” cried the Bodhisatta, when he heard the sound of the footsteps. Sakka repeated a verse:

“Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, am I; to visit you I came: Choose a boon, royal sage! whatever your wish you may name.”

The king replied with another verse:

“Wealth, strength, and treasure without end, these I have left behind, Sakka, death and nothing more I want: for I am blind.”

35b: Stories about Wrong View– 1193

Then Sakka said: “Do you ask death, King Sivi, because you wish to die, or because you are blind?” – “Because I am blind, my lord.” – “The gift is not everything in itself, your majesty, it is given with an eye to the future. Yet there is a motive relating to this visible world. Now you were asked for one eye, and gave two; make an act of truth about it.” Then he began a verse:

“Warrior, lord of humankind, declare the thing that’s true. If you the truth declare, your eye shall be restored to you.”

On hearing this, the Bodhisatta replied, “If you wish to give me an eye, Sakka, do not try any other means, but let my eye be restored as a consequence of my gift.” Sakka said: “Though they call me Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, your majesty, yet I cannot give an eye to anyone else; but by the fruit of the gift given by you, and by nothing else, your eye shall be restored to you.” Then the other repeated a verse, maintaining that his gift was well given:

“Whatever sort, whatever kind of suitor shall draw near, whoever comes to ask of me, he to my heart is dear. If my solemn words be true, now let an eye reappear!”

Even as he uttered the words, one of his eyes grew up in the socket. Then he repeated a couple of verses to restore the other:

“A Brahmin came to visit me, one of my eyes to crave. Unto that Brahmin mendicant the pair of them I gave. A greater joy and more delight that action did afford; if these my solemn words be true, be the other eye restored!”

On the instant appeared his second eye. But these eyes of his were neither natural nor divine. An eye given by Sakka as the Brahmin, cannot be natural, we know; on the other hand, a divine eye cannot be produced in anything that is injured. But these eyes are called the eyes of truth absolute and perfect. At the time when they came into existence, the whole royal retinue by Sakka’s power was assembled; and Sakka standing in the midst of the throng, uttered praise in a couple of verses:

“Fostering King of Sivi land, these holy hymns of yours have gained for you as bounty free this pair of eyes divine. Through rock and wall, over hill and dale, whatever bar may be, 100 leagues on every side those eyes of thine shall see.”

35b: Stories about Wrong View– 1194

Having uttered these verses, poised in the air before the multitude, with a last counsel to the Great Being that he should be vigilant, Sakka returned to the world of gods. And the Great Being, surrounded by his retinue, went back in great pomp to the city, and entered the palace called Candaka, the Peacock's Eye. The news that he had got his eyes again spread abroad all through the kingdom of Sivi. All the people gathered together to see him, with gifts in their hands.

“Now all this multitude is come together,” thought the Bodhisatta, “I shall praise my gift that I gave.” He caused a great pavilion to be put up at the palace gate, where he seated himself upon the royal throne, with the white umbrella spread above him. Then the drum was sent beating about the city, to collect all the trade guilds. Then he said: “People of Sivi! Now you have beheld these divine eyes, never eat food without giving something away!” and he repeated four verses, declaring the Dhamma:

“Who, if he's asked to give, would answer no, although it be his best and choicest prize? People of Sivi thronged in concourse, see! Come hither, see the best of gifts, my eyes! Through rock and wall, over hill and dale, whatever bar may be, A hundred leagues on every side these eyes of mine can see. Self-sacrifice in all men mortal living, of all things is most fine. I sacrificed a mortal eye; and giving, received an eye divine. See, people! See, give before you eat, let others have a share. This done with your best will and care, blameless to heaven you shall repair.”

In these four verses he declared the Dhamma; and after that, every fortnight, on the holy day, even every 15th day, he declared the Dhamma in these same verses without cessation to a great gathering of people. Hearing which, the people gave alms and did good deeds, and went to swell the hosts of heaven.

The Birth Story about Burning

[The following is based on the Birth Story about Burning (Āditta-jātaka, Ja 424) and its commentary.]

One day, after King Kosala's matchless alms giving, the monks at the assembly discussed among themselves: “Friends, only with discrimination did King Kosala give the matchless gift to the Saṅgha of noble monks headed by the Fortunate One, as he knows himself that they form the fertile soil for sowing the seeds of meritorious deeds.”

35b: Stories about Wrong View– 1195

The Buddha joined them and having heard what they were talking about, he said: “Monks, it is no wonder that after careful selection, King Kosala has sown the seeds of a matchless alms giving in the supreme field of my Dispensation. Learned and virtuous Bodhisattas of the past also performed great gifts only after discerning who should be the recipients very carefully.”

Then at the request of the monks, the Buddha narrated the Birth Story about Burning (Āditta-jātaka, Ja 424).

[Again in the Great Chronicles instructions were given to look it up in the Birth Stories (Jātaka), as before I include it for completion's sake. The translation is that of H.T. Francis and R.A. Neil, slightly modified to fit in with the conventions used here.]

Once upon a time a King named Bharata reigned at Roruva in the kingdom of Sovīra. He practised the ten royal virtues, won the people by the four elements of popularity, stood to the multitude like father and mother and gave great gifts to the poor, the wayfarers, the beggars, the suitors and the like.

His Chief Queen Samuddavijayā was wise and full of knowledge. One day he looked round his alms hall and thought: “My alms are devoured by worthless greedy people; I don't like this; I should like to give alms to the virtuous Paccekabuddhas who deserve the best of gifts; they live in the Himālaya region; who will bring them here on my invitation and whom shall I send on this errand?”

He spoke to the queen, who said: “King, be not concerned; sending flowers by the force of our giving suitable things, and of our virtue and truthfulness, we will invite the Paccekabuddhas, and when they come we will give them gifts with all things requisite.” The King agreed. He made proclamation by drum that all the townspeople should undertake to keep the precepts; he himself with his household undertook all the duties for the holy days and gave great gifts in charity. He had a gold box full of jasmine flowers brought, came down from his palace and stood in the royal courtyard. There prostrating himself on the ground with the five contacts, he saluted towards the eastern quarter and threw seven handfuls of flowers, with the words: “I salute the saints in the eastern quarter; if there is any merit in us, show compassion on us and receive our alms.”

As there are no Paccekabuddhas in the eastern quarter, they did not come next day. On the second day he paid respects to the southern quarter; but none came from there either. On the third day he paid respects to the western quarter, but none came. On the fourth day he paid respects to the northern quarter, and after paying respects he threw seven handfuls of flowers with the words: “May the Paccekabuddhas who live in the northern district of the Himālaya receive our alms.” The flowers went and fell on 500 Paccekabuddhas in the Nandamūla cave. On reflection they understood that the king had invited them; so they called seven of their number and said: “Sirs, the king invites you; show him favour.”

These Paccekabuddhas came through the air and alighted at the king’s gate. Seeing them the king saluted them with delight, made them come up into the palace, showed them great honour and gave them gifts. After the meal he asked them for next day and so on until the fifth day, feeding them for six days; on the seventh day he made ready a gift with all the requisites, arranged beds and chairs inlaid with gold, and set before the seven Paccekabuddhas sets of three robes and all other things used by holy men. The king and queen formally offered these things to them after their meal, and stood in respectful salutation. To express their thanks the elder of the assembly spoke two verses:

Whatever man can save from flames that burn his dwelling down, not what is left to be consumed, will still remain his own. The world’s on fire, decay and death are there the flame to feed; save what you can by charity, a gift is saved indeed.

Thus expressing thanks the elder admonished the king to be diligent in virtue: then he flew up in the air, straight through the peaked roof of the palace and alighted in the Nandamūla cave; along with him all the requisites that had been given him flew up and alighted in the cave; and the bodies of the king and queen became full of joy. After his departure, the other six also expressed thanks in a verse each:

He who gives to righteous men, strong in holy energy, crosses Yama’s flood, and then gains a dwelling in the sky. Like to war is charity; hosts may flee before a few; give a little piously; bliss hereafter is your due.

Prudent givers please the lord, worthily they spend their toil. Rich the fruit their gifts afford, like a seed in fertile soil. They who never rudely speak, wrong to living things abjure; men may call them timid, weak;
for ’tis fear that keeps them pure.

Lower duties win for man, reborn on earth, a princely fate, middle duties win them heaven, highest win the purest state. Charity is blessed indeed, yet the Dhamma gains a higher meed; ages old and late attest, thus the wise have reached their rest.

So they also went with the requisites given them. The seventh Paccekabuddha in his thanks praised Nibbāna to the king, and admonishing him carefully went to his abode. The king and queen gave gifts all their lives and passed through the path to heaven.

Sirigutta and Garahadinna

In Sāvaththī, there were two friends, the householders Sirigutta and Garahadinna. The former being a follower of the Buddha whereas the latter was a follower of the heretical teachers.

The heretical teachers said constantly to Garahadinna: “Should you not ask your friend Sirigutta thus: ‘Friend, why do you follow the monk Gotama? What will you gain from the monk Gotama?’ Should not you persuade him in such a way as to make him come over to us and offer us something?”

On hearing the words of his teachers again and again, Garahadinna went to his friend and wherever they were standing, sitting, or doing something else, he said to Sirigutta: “Friend, what is the use of the monk Gotama to you? What benefit will accrue to you from your devotion to the monk Gotama? Do you not think you should serve [823] my teachers and give them alms too?”

The householder Sirigutta said nothing and kept silent for many days. But being sick of hearing his friend’s repeated request, he said to Garahadinna one day: “Friend, you come to me constantly and wherever we are standing, sitting or doing something else, you ask me what benefit will accrue to me from my devotion to my master and you also urge me to go over to your teachers and give them alms. But tell me first what things do your teachers know?”

Then Garahadinna replied to his friend Sirigutta: “Oh! What a surprise, sir! Do not speak like this. As for my teachers, there is nothing unknown to them. They know all about the past, the present and the future; all that is done, said and thought, that is, body, verbal and mental actions. They know: ‘This will happen and this will not.’ They know: ‘This should be and this should not.’ They know everything fully!”

Sirigutta Invites the Heretics

Thereupon, Sirigutta asked Garahadinna in order to get his affirmation: “Friend, do you say so?” The latter boldly affirmed: “Yes, I do.” Then the former said: “In that case, friend, you have made a grave mistake by not telling me about this for such a long time. Only today I will know the intellectual power of your teachers. Go, friend, invite your teachers in my name for the meal tomorrow.”

Delighted, the householder Garahadinna went to his teachers, paid his respects and said: “Masters, my friend Sirigutta has invited you to tomorrow’s meal.” The heretical teachers asked: “Did Sirigutta himself do so?” – “Yes, sirs, Sirigutta himself did,” replied Garahadinna in confirmation. Jubilant, the heretical teachers said: “Very well, Garahadinna. With the householder Sirigutta as our devoted follower, what luxury is there that will not be ours?”

Sirigutta’s home was very large. In the compound he had a long huge ditch dug between his two houses and had the ditch filled with excrement. On the two outward edges, tree stumps were set up and fastened with ropes. The forelegs of the couches were placed on the edge of the ditch, and the hind legs on the ropes. This was made with this idea: “When they come, they will take their seats; when they take their seats, they will fall headlong into the ditch.” Then the couches were covered with coverings, the edges of which touched the ground, so that the ditch was hidden.

Several large pots were placed behind the house. The brims of the pots were bound with banana leaves and white pieces of cloth and the empty pots smeared on the outside with gruel, rice, butter, oil, honey, molasses and crumbs of cakes.

The next day the householder Garahadinna went quietly to Sirigutta’s residence early in the morning and asked: “Have you prepared your offerings for the venerable ones?” – “Yes, I have,” replied Sirigutta. “Where are the offerings?” asked Garahadinna. Sirigutta answered, pointing to the pots: “These pots are full of gruel. These full of rice. These full of butter, molasses and cakes. The seats have also been arranged.” Saying: “Very good, friend,” Garahadinna left. On his return, the 500 heretical teachers came to Sirigutta’s place.

Coming out of his house, Sirigutta paid respects with with the hands, knees and forehead touching the ground to the heretical teachers. Raising his folded palms, he stood before them and communicated with them but mentally: “It is said that you masters know everything such as the past, present and future. It has been said so by your attendant and supporter Garahadinna. If you really know everything, please do not go into my residence. There is no gruel for [824] you who have come to my place, nor is there rice, nor any other food. If you do enter my dwelling, I will have you dumped into a ditch full of excrement and I will also have you beaten.”

Having mentally told them thus, Sirigutta signalled to his workers by his facial expression that they, knowing that the teachers were about to take their seats, should remove the coverings from behind just before the teachers sat down so that the coverings might not be soiled with the excrement.

Then Sirigutta invited the teachers, saying: “Please come this way, sirs.” The heretics went between the two houses and were about to take their seats when Sirigutta’s men said: “Wait a moment, sirs. Do not sit yet.” – “Why?” asked the teachers. “You should sit only knowing your manners.” – “What should we do?” “Sirs, you should first stand near your seats, and you should all sit down at the same time.”

These instructions were designed to make the first teacher, who would fall into the ditch, unable to warn the others not to take their seats.

The teachers said: “Very well,” and considering that the instructions should be followed, they all 500 stood near their seats in order. Then the men told them: “Please sit down all together, quickly!” When the teachers were about to sit, the men removed the coverings from the couches. As soon as the teachers sat down, the legs of the couches on the rope slipped, and they fell head-long into the ditch.

Sirigutta closed the house doors and to every teacher who had clambered out of the ditch, and he gave them a good thrashing with his stick, saying: “Why do not you know the events of the past, the future and the present as claimed by your supporter Garahadinna?” After beating them to his satisfaction, he had the doors opened, saying: “This much is enough for them.”

The heretical teachers tried to run away from the house but the plastered ground along the way had been made slippery beforehand and they could not control themselves and fell to the ground. Every one of them who fell down was beaten again and sent away with the word: “This much suffices for you.”

The heretical teachers went to the house of their supporter Garahadinna, crying: “Sirigutta has ruined and humiliated us! He has ruined and humiliated us!”

When the householder Garahadinna saw his teachers ruined and humiliated and reduced to a disaster, he became furious and said: “My friend Sirigutta has let me down! He had the heart to have my teachers beaten and made my teachers miserable, they who form a good field for sowing the seeds of good works and who can bestow all the desired benefits in the Deva realm even on anyone who just stretches his hands to pay respect to them, not to speak of anyone who gives them offerings.” Muttering thus, he went to the court of King Pasenadi Kosala and filed a suit for a fine of 100,000 coins against Sirigutta.

Then King Kosala summoned Sirigutta to the court. Sirigutta came and paid respect to the king and said: “Great King, impose the fine on me only after investigating the matter. Do not do so without an inquiry.” When the king agreed, saying: “Householder I shall fine you only after investigation.” Sirigutta said: “Very well, Great King.” – “Then you, Sirigutta, state your case,” said the king.

Sirigutta reported to the king all that had happened, beginning with the following words: “Great King, my friend Garahadinna, a follower of the heretical teachers, repeatedly asked me everywhere what was the use of following the monk Gotama and what benefit would accrue to me from my devotion to the monk Gotama.”

The king, looking at Garahadinna, asked: “Did you really say so?” When the latter admitted as much, saying: “Yes, Great King,” the king passed the following judgment: “Regarding your teachers, who as ‘Great Buddhas’ are so ignorant of the creation [825] of the dirty ditch, why did you tell Sirigutta, a follower of the Fortunate One, that they knew all the events that took place in the three divisions of time, past, present and future? The fine of 100,000 pieces of money for which you have sued Sirigutta must be paid by you.” So saying, the king imposed the payment of the fine on Garahadinna. His heretical teachers who had come to the court as complainants were beaten and sent away.

Garahadinna’s Revenge

The householder Garahadinna was angry with Sirigutta and did not speak to him for a month afterwards. Then he thought to himself: “For me, it is not nice not to be on speaking terms with him. Indeed, I should ruin his teacher in revenge.” So he went to Sirigutta and broke the ice: “Friend Sirigutta!” – “What is the matter, friend?” replied Sirigutta. Then the former blamed him, saying: “Friend, it is natural for friends and relatives to quarrel and dispute. Why did not you speak to me about anything for a long time, friend? Why are you behaving like this?"

Sirigutta replied calmly: "Friend I did not speak to you because you did not speak to me. There is no other reason." Garahadinna tried to make peace: "Friend, let bygones be bygones. Let us not destroy our mutual friendship." From that time, they became reconciled and moved about again together.

One day, Sirigutta said to his friend, the way the latter had done before: "Friend, what is the use of your teachers for you? What benefit will accrue to you from your devotion to your teacher? Do you not think you should serve my teacher, the Fortunate One, and give alms to the venerable ones?" Garahadinna had been longing for that kind of request, and it was like scratching an itchy part of his body with a fingernail.

So he asked his friend: "Friend Sirigutta, what does your teacher, the monk Gotama know?" Then Sirigutta said: "Friend, do not speak like that. There is nothing that is not known to our teacher, the Fortunate One. He knows all the things of the past, present and future, he comprehends clearly the analysis of the sixteen aspects of a living being's mental processes."

Then Garahadinna said: "Friend, I did not know it earlier. Why have you kept silent about it for such a long time? In that case, friend, you go and invite your teacher, the Fortunate One, for the meal at my place tomorrow. I would like to feed him. Please tell him to accept with 500 monks the food I am going to offer."

So Sirigutta approached the Buddha and said: "Exalted Buddha! My friend Garahadinna has asked me to invite you for an alms giving. He said you should accept, together with 500 monks, his food-offering tomorrow. There is, however, one thing: One day in the past I did something to his heretical teachers; I do not know whether he wants to take vengeance for what I have done to him or if he wants to offer you food with a pure heart. Please reflect upon his invitation and accept it if he is sincere. If not, please do not accept."

When the Buddha reflected on what ulterior motive Garahadinna had, he foresaw that the householder had a large ditch dug between his two houses, had it filled with 80 cartloads of firewood, burnt them with the intention that the Buddha and his monks would fall into the ditch full of embers.

Again when the Buddha contemplated: "Will my visit to his place be beneficial or not," he clearly had a vision as follows: He would stretch his leg into the ditch of fire. At that moment the rough mat covering the ditch would vanish. A large lotus flower, having the size of a chariot wheel or a cart wheel, would appear out of the ditch. He would step onto the centre of the flower and sit there. Likewise his 500 monks would step on to the lotus flowers and take their seats respectively. People would assemble. With two [826] verses, the Buddha would give a blessing talk. By the end of the talk, 84,000 beings would realize the four truths and gain liberation. The two friends, Sirigutta and Garahadinna, would become Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna). Inspired with faith, both of them would give away their properties in honour of the Buddha's Dispensation of eight wonders.

So the Buddha decided to go for the sake of Garahadinna. Having had the vision clearly, the Buddha accepted the invitation by keeping silent. Sirigutta went to Garahadinna's place and told him of the Buddha's acceptance. Saying: "Dear friend, with gladness do honour to the Buddha, the Lord of the Three Worlds," Then Sirigutta went home.

Thinking: "Now is the time to do what should be done to Sirigutta," Garahadinna had a large ditch dug between his two houses, had 80 cart loads of firewood brought there, filled the ditch with the firewood, burnt them to create embers and kept them glowing the whole night. Over the ditch he had placed wooden planks covered with rough mats that were smeared with cowdung. He also had a path made by placing fragile sticks on one side so that when monks tread and broke them, they would fall into the ditch of embers.

At the back of his residence, he placed large pots the way Sirigutta did. The seats were also arranged in the same way. Early in the morning Sirigutta went to Garahadinna's residence and asked: "Friend, have you made your offerings ready?" – "Yes, I have," answered Garahadinna. "Where are those offerings?" – "Come, let us go and see," said Garahadinna and showed Sirigutta the way the latter had done before. "Excellent, friend!" said Sirigutta delightedly.

People had assembled. There usually was a large gathering of people whenever the Buddha was invited by a man of heretical views. Other heretics also came together, thinking and saying: "We are going to witness with our own eyes the downfall of the monk Gotama." Those who possessed right beliefs also attended the assembly, hoping that the Fortunate One would deliver a great discourse today, and that they might have a chance to see the might and glory of the Fortunate One.

35b: Stories about Wrong View– 1203

The next day the Buddha went with 500 monks to the gate of Garahadinna's residence. The householder came out and made obeisance with the hands, knees and forehead touching the ground; standing and raising his joined hands, he said mentally, not by word of mouth: "Venerable sirs, it is said that you know the past, present and future, that you comprehend the analysis of the sixteen aspects of a living being's mental process. That is what your devotee Sirigutta told me. If that is true, do not enter my house. There is really no gruel, no food, nothing for you. In fact, I am going to harm you by making you all fall into a ditch filled with embers."

Expressing his intention mentally thus he took the alms bowl from the Buddha's hand. After saying: "Please come this way," he added: "Venerable sir, you visitors to my place have come here not knowing etiquette." When the Buddha asked: "What should we do?" Garahadinna said: "You should enter the house one by one and it is only after the preceding one has sat down that the next one should follow."

This suggestion was made because if they all went together other monks would see the one who went ahead of them falling into the ditch. Seeing his fall nobody else would proceed. Therefore his idea was to destroy them by letting them one after another fall into the fire.

Saying: "Very well, supporter," the Buddha walked off alone. When Garahadinna came to the fire ditch, he stepped back and told the Buddha to go ahead. As soon as the Buddha stretched his leg over the ditch, the rough mats disappeared. Out of the fire emerged large lotus flowers each having the size of a chariot wheel or a cartwheel. The Buddha walked, stepping on to the centre of each lotus flower, and sat on the Buddha's seat placed there. The 500 monks, too, walked on the centre of one flower to that of another and took their respective seats. [827]

On seeing this extraordinary, unprecedented phenomenon, Garahadinna's body emitted heat and vapour, like that from a hot pan of oil. He hurried to his friend Sirigutta and appealed to him, saying: "Friend Sirigutta, please be my refuge." – "Why did you say so, friend?" asked Sirigutta. Garahadinna replied: "There was no gruel, no food, nothing, in my home for 500 monks. What shall I do?" Sirigutta asked him bluntly: "What have you done, friend?" Garahadinna confessed: "Friend, to speak frankly I had a large ditch full of embers made between the two houses, my intention being to subdue the Buddha and his 500 monks by making them fall into the ditch. Yet, there emerged large lotus flowers out of the ditch. The Buddha and all the monks walked on the flowers and are sitting on the seats. What am I to do now?”

When he made his confession and asked for help, Sirigutta argued, saying: “But have you not personally shown me, saying: ‘These many are large pots. This much is gruel, this much is rice, etc.’?” – “Friend Sirigutta, what I have told you is utterly false.” Garahadinna confessed further: “The pots are empty, containing no gruel, no rice, nothing.” Then Sirigutta said as he had unwavering faith in the Buddha’s power and glory: “Be that as it may, friend. Go home and you will see the gruel and other foods in your pots.”

The Buddha’s Unimaginable Capacity

No sooner had Sirigutta said so, than the pots which were falsely claimed by Garahadinna to be full of gruel became full of gruel, the pots which were falsely claimed by him to be full of rice became full of rice, and the same happened to the other pots. When he went home and was confronted with all the miraculous happenings, his whole body was filled with joy. His mind also became serene.

After serving the Buddha and his monks respectfully with food, Garahadinna wanted the Buddha to give a discourse in appreciation of the offerings so he took the alms bowl from the Buddha who had finished his meal. Desirous of giving such a discourse, the Buddha said: “Because these beings have no eye of wisdom, they are ignorant of the attributes of my disciples and the attributes of my Dispensation. Those who possess no eye of wisdom are known to be blind and those who possess it are known to have eyesight.” Then he spoke the following two verses:

*Yathā saṅkāra-ṭhānasmiṃ, ujjhitasmiṃ mahā-pathe, padumaṃ tattha jāyetha, suci-gandhaṃ manoramaṃ.
Evaṃ saṅkāra-bhūtesu, andha-bhūte puthujjane, atirocati paññāya, Sammā-sambuddha-sāvako.*

Just as a lotus flower of 100 petals, pure, fragrant and delightful to every beholder, originates and arises wonderfully in the garbage dump along the public road, even so among those who should be discarded like garbage, the Buddha’s disciple, a good and glorious person who has destroyed all his defilements, glows with splendour, surpassing by his wisdom all the worldlings who are like the blind as they lack wisdom.

By the end of the discourse, 84,000 people realized the four truths and won liberation. The two friends, Sirigutta and Garahadinna, attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). Inspired by faith, both of them dedicated all their wealth to the cause of the Buddha's Dispensation that was of eight wonders.

After giving an appreciative talk, the Buddha rose and returned to the monastery. At the assembly in the evening, the monks extolled the master, saying: [828] “Wonderful indeed, friends, is the power of the Fortunate One. A series of lotus flowers, each having the size of a chariot wheel or a cartwheel, arose out of the horrible embers.”

The Buddha came to the assembly and asked: “Monks what are you talking about?” – “We are talking about this sort of subject, with reference to your power,” answered the monks. Then the Buddha said: “Monks, it is no wonder that out of the heap of embers arose lotus-flowers for me to walk on, for I have become Perfectly Self-Awakened, Lord of the Three Worlds, omniscient. The lotus flowers emerged on one occasion in the past, when as a Bodhisatta, even though I was still immature.” Then at the request of the monks, the Buddha related in detail the Birth Story about the Embers (Khadiraṅgāra-jātaka, Ja 40).

[Again in the Great Chronicles instructions were given to look it up in the Birth Stories (Jātaka), as before I include it for completion's sake. The translation is that of Robert Chalmers, slightly modified to fit in with the conventions used here.]

The Birth Story about the Embers

Once upon a time when Brahmadata was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life in the family of the lord high treasurer of Benares, and was brought up in the lap of all luxury like a royal prince. By the time he was come to years of discretion, being barely sixteen years old, he had made himself perfect in all accomplishments. At his father's death he filled the office of lord high treasurer, and built six almonries, one at each of the four gates of the city, one in the centre of the city, and one at the gate of his own mansion. Very bountiful was he, and he kept the precepts, and the Observance Day duties.

Now one day at breakfast-time when dainty fare of exquisite taste and variety was being brought in for the Bodhisatta, a Paccakabuddha rising from a seven days' absorption, and noticing that it was time to go his rounds, bethought him that it would be well to visit the treasurer of Benares that morning. So he cleaned his teeth with a tooth-stick made from the betel-vine, washed his mouth with water from lake Anotatta, put on his inner robe as he stood on the tableland of Manosilā, fastened on his belt, donned his double robe; and, equipped with a bowl which he called into being for the purpose, he passed through the air and arrived at the gate of the mansion just as the Bodhisatta's breakfast was taken in.

As soon as the Bodhisatta became aware of his presence there, he rose at once from his seat and looked at the attendant, indicating that a service was required. "What am I to do, my lord?" – "Bring his reverence's bowl," said the Bodhisatta.

At that very instant Māra the wicked rose up in a state of great excitement, saying: "It is seven days since the Paccekabuddha had food given him; if he gets none to-day, he will perish. I will destroy him and stop the treasurer too from giving." And that very instant he went and called into being within the mansion a pit of red-hot embers, 80 cubits deep, filled with Acacia-charcoal, all ablaze and aflame like the great hell of Avīci. When he had created this pit, Māra himself took his stand in mid-air.

When the man who was on his way to fetch the bowl became aware of this, he was terrified and started back. "What makes you start back, my man?" asked the Bodhisatta. "My lord," was the answer, "there's a great pit of red-hot embers blazing and flaming in the middle of the house." And as man after man got to the spot, they were all panic-stricken, and ran away as fast as their legs would carry them.

Thought the Bodhisatta to himself: "Māra, the enthraller, must have been exerting himself to-day to stop me from alms giving. I have yet to learn, however, that I am to be shaken by 100, or by 1,000, Māras. We will see this day whose strength is the stronger, whose might is the mightier, mine or Māra's." So taking in his own hand the bowl which stood ready, he passed out from the house, and, standing on the brink of the fiery pit, looked up to the heavens. Seeing Māra, he said: "Who are you?" – "I am Māra," was the answer.

"Did you call into being this pit of red-hot embers?" – "Yes, I did." [233] – "Why?" – "To stop you from alms giving, and to destroy the life of that Paccekabuddha." – "I will not permit you either to stop me from my alms giving or to destroy the life of the Paccekabuddha. I am going to see to-day whether your strength or mine is the greater." And still standing on the brink of that fiery pit, he cried: "Reverend Paccekabuddha, even though I fall headlong into this pit of red-hot embers, I will not turn back. Only vouchsafe to take the food I bring.” And so saying he repeated this verse:

Far rather will I headlong plunge amain full in this gulf of hell, than stoop to shame! Vouchsafe, sir, at my hands to take this alms!

With these words the Bodhisatta, grasping the bowl of food, strode on with undaunted resolution right on to the surface of the pit of fire. But even as he did so, there rose up to the surface through all the 80 cubits of the pit’s depth a large and peerless lotus-flower, which received the feet of the Bodhisatta! And from it there came a measure of pollen which fell on the head of the Great Being, so that his whole body was as it were sprinkled from head to foot with dust of gold! Standing right in the heart of the lotus, he poured the dainty food into the bowl of the Paccekabuddha.

And when the latter had taken the food and returned thanks, he flung his bowl aloft into the heavens, and right in the sight of all the people he himself rose bodily into the air likewise, and passed away to the Himālayas again, seeming to tread a track formed of clouds fantastically shaped. And Māra, too, defeated and dejected, passed away back to his own abode.

But the Bodhisatta, still standing in the lotus, taught [234] the truth to the people, extolling alms giving and the commandments; after which, girt round by the escorting multitude, he passed into his own mansion once more. And all his life long he did charity and other good works, till in the end he passed away to fare according to his deserts.

The Taming of Nandopananda

This account of Ven. Mahā Moggallāna’s taming of Nandopananda, the Nāga King, is taken from the Exposition of the Super-Powers (Iddhi-niddesa) in the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga), and from the commentary on Mahā Moggallāna’s Verses of the Elder Monks (Theragāthā, Thg 1149-1217).

Once, after hearing the Buddha’s Dhamma talk, the merchant, Anāthapiṇḍika, invited the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, please accept, together with 500 monks, an alms giving at my house tomorrow.” Having the Buddha’s acceptance, the merchant returned home.

35b: Stories about Wrong View– 1208

The Buddha accepted Anāthapiṇḍika’s invitation and passed the rest of the remaining daytime and night-time. At dawn, when he surveyed the 10,000 world-element, the divine Nāga King, Nandopananda, appeared within the view of his intellectual vision.

The Buddha reflected: “The Nāga King has appeared in my vision. Has he done any good works in the past?” and he came to know that: “The Nāga King, having no faith in the Three Treasures, holds wrong views.” Again, when he continued to reflect as to who could free the Nāga from his wrong views, he discerned Ven. Mahā Moggallāna.

At daybreak, the Buddha cleaned himself and addressed Ven. Ānanda: “My dear Ānanda, tell the 500 monks that I shall make a celestial journey to the Tāvatiṃsa Deva abode.”

Particularly, on that day, the divine Nāgas were preparing for the Nāga King’s feast and drunken orgy. Nandopananda was seated on a jewelled divine throne, and had the divine white umbrella held over his head. Surrounded by female dancers of three different categories of age, grown-up, young and those in between, and also by a host of Nāgas, he was viewing divine food and drinks that had been put in gold and silver vessels.

With the 500 monks the Buddha travelled to Tāvatiṃsa, passing above the mansion of Nandopananda and thus making himself visible to the latter. Then an evil thought arose in the Nāga King: “These wicked shaven-headed monks go to Tāvatiṃsa and come out passing over our abode from one higher mansion to another. This time, however, we will not allow these monks who scatter dust over us to move on.” With this evil intention, he rose from his jewelled seat, went to the foot of Mount Meru and after changing his original body, he coiled himself round the mountain in seven folds and concealed the celestial world of Tāvatiṃsa from sight by enveloping it with his hood that lay prone from above.

Then Ven. Raṭṭhapāla asked the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, formerly standing from here, we could see Mount Meru; we could see its surrounding seven mountains; we could see Tāvatiṃsa; we could see the Vejayanta palace; we could see Sakka’s flag hoisted on the Vejayanta Palace. Exalted Buddha, now we cannot see Mount Meru, the seven surrounding mountains, Tāvatiṃsa, the Vejayanta palace and Sakka’s Flag, why is that?”

35b: Stories about Wrong View– 1209

The Buddha replied: “My dear Raṭṭhapāla, this Nāga King Nandopananda is angry with [829] you all, and so after coiling his body round Mount Meru in seven folds, he has covered it with his hood and created darkness.” Ven.

Raṭṭhapāla then said to the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, let me tame the Nāga King,” but the Buddha rejected his request. Thereafter, the venerables Bhaddiya, Rāhula and all others, rose one after another in the wake of Ven. Raṭṭhapāla and made their offer to tame the Nāga King. But the Buddha did not give them his permission.

At last, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna asked for permission to tame the Nāga King and the Buddha granted it to him, saying: “Tame him, my dear Moggallāna.” Having obtained the Buddha’s permission, Ven. Moggallāna changed his body into that of a great Nāga and coiled his body fourteen folds round Nandopananda and covering Nandopananda’s hood with his from above he also pressed the latter tightly against Mount Meru.

The Nāga King emitted powerful vapour. Ven. Mahā Moggallāna emitted even more powerful vapour, saying: “It is not you alone who have vapour; I too have it.” The Nāga King’s vapour could not hurt Ven. Mahā Moggallāna but Ven. Mahā Moggallāna’s could hurt the Nāga.

Then the Nāga emitted blazing flames. Ven. Mahā Moggallāna emitted mightier flames, saying: “It is not that you alone have the flames, I have them too.” The flames emitted by the Nāga could not harm Ven. Mahā Moggallāna but Ven. Mahā Moggallāna’s could harm the Nāga.

The Nāga King, Nandopananda, perceived: “This man is crushing and pressing me against Mount Meru. He is also emitting vapour and blazing flames.” Then he asked Ven. Mahā Moggallāna: “Who are you, sir?” Ven. Mahā Moggallāna replied: “Nanda, I am Ven. Moggallāna.” – “In that case please wear your ascetic garb.” Then Ven. Mahā Moggallāna discarded his Nāga form and assumed his original ascetic form and entered the Nāga’s body by the right ear and came out by the left. Again he entered by the left ear and came out of the right. Similarly, he entered the Nāga by the right nostril and came out by the left and entered by the left nostril and came out by the right.

Then Nandopananda opened his mouth for Ven. Mahā Moggallāna who went inside him and walked from east to west and vice versa. The Buddha warned Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, saying: “My dear son Moggallāna, be very careful. The Nāga King is of great power.”

35b: Stories about Wrong View– 1210

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna replied: “I have successfully developed the four bases of psychic powers (iddhi-pāda) through the five kinds of mastery (vasī-bhāva). I can subjugate hundreds of thousands of divine Nāgas of Nandopananda’s type, let alone his single self, exalted Buddha.”

The Nāga King thought: “I have let Ven. Mahā Moggallāna enter my body through my mouth. Be that as it may. When he comes out I will keep him between my fangs, and eat him, biting him to pieces.” So he said: “Come out sir, do not torment me by pacing about in my belly.” Ven. Mahā Moggallāna came out and stood outside. As soon as he saw Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, the Nāga King, perceiving: “So this is Moggallāna,” snarled fiercely. Ven. Mahā Moggallāna entered upon the fourth absorption (jhāna) and defended himself against the Nāga’s nasal wind, so the wind could not stir even a hair on his body.

Other monks might have the power to perform miracles from the beginning but when the snarling took place, they would not be able to engage in absorption (jhāna) as rapidly as those who were of instant consciousness concerning supernatural powers (kippa-nisanti) like Ven. Moggallāna. That was why no permission was given by the Buddha to the other monks to tame the Nāga King.

Then the Nāga King Nandopananda noted: “I was not able to stir even the body-hair in a pore of the monk’s skin by snarling. This monk is very powerful indeed,” and he tried to escape. Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, having changed his natural shape into that of an enemy of the Nāgas, a Garuḷa, pursued the Nāga with the speed of a bird. Being unable to escape, the Nāga turned himself into a young man and fell in salutation at the feet of Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, saying: “Venerable sir, in you I take refuge.” [830]

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna said: “Nanda, the Fortunate One is coming. Come, let us go to him.” Having tamed the Nāga and freed him from the poison of conceit, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna took him to the master. The Nāga paid his respects to the Buddha and solemnly declared himself a follower. “Venerable sir, I take refuge in you.” The Buddha gave his blessings, saying: “May you be happy both physically and mentally,” and then accompanied by the monks, the Buddha went to the house of the merchant Anāthapiṇḍika.

The merchant asked the Buddha: “Why did you come when the day was so far advanced?” the Buddha said: “There had been a terrible battle of life and death fought between Moggallāna and the Nāga King Nandopananda. That was why I came late.” The wealthy merchant asked: “Who won the battle and who lost it, exalted Buddha?” – “The victory belonged to Moggallāna and the defeat to Nanda.”

Anāthapiṇḍika was so joyous and elated that he said: “Venerable sir, may the exalted Buddha and the monks receive my offering of an alms meal every day for seven days. I will honour Ven. Mahā Moggallāna for seven days.” Then the merchant celebrated the victory of Ven. Mahā Moggallāna by honouring the 500 monks, headed by the Buddha, for a week.

Baka Brahma

The account of the taming of Brahma Baka by the Buddha occurs in the Birth Story about Brahma Baka (Brahma-baka-jātaka, Ja 405), the Birth Story about the Ascetic Kesava (Kesava-jātaka, Ja 346), the Discourse about Brahma Baka (Baka-brahma-sutta, SN 6.4) and the Discourse about the Invitation of Brahmā (Brahma-nimantanika-sutta, MN 49), and their commentaries.

Once, while dwelling at Jetavana in the noble city of Sāvattḥī, the Buddha called the monks and said: “Monks, on one occasion, I was living at the foot of a large Sāla tree in the Subhaga grove near the town of Ukkaṭṭha. Then arose, monks, the following thought in Brahma Baka: ‘The world of Brahmas together with this body is permanent, firm, stable, unique and subject to no change. In this Brahma world, there is no one who is conceived, who grows old, who dies, who falls, who is reborn by way of conception. There is no liberation higher than the Brahma world together with this body.’ Such was the very strong but wrong view of eternalism (sassata-micchā-diṭṭhi) that arose in Brahma Baka.”

Brahma Baka, who held this view, rejected the existence of the higher transcendent states of the second and third absorption (jhāna) planes in the Brahma worlds, the fourth absorption (jhāna) planes in the Brahma worlds, together with the four formless (arūpa) states and the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna, for he belonged only to the first absorption (jhāna) plane.

“Monks, knowing his thought with my mind, I disappeared then from the foot of the Sāla tree in the Subhaga grove, near Ukkaṭṭha and appeared in the first meditation Brahma abode, just as a strong man stretches his bent arm and bends his stretched out arm.

When Brahma Baka saw from afar my approaching, monks, he said: ‘Sir, please come. Sir, you are welcome. Sir, you visit this Brahma abode after a long time. Sir, the Brahma world, together with this body, is permanent, firm, stable, unique and subject to no change. In this Brahma world, there is no one who is conceived, who grows old, who dies, who falls, who is reborn by way of conception. There is no liberation higher than the Brahma world together with this body.’

Monks, when Brahma Baka spoke thus, I said: [831] ‘Friends, Brahma Baka is foolish indeed! He speaks of what is not permanent as permanent, what is not firm, not stable, not unique and subject to change as firm, stable, unique and not subject to change. He says that in this Brahma world there is no one who is conceived, who grows old, who dies, who falls, who is reborn by way of conception, though in this Brahma world there are those who are conceived, who are born, who die, who fall, who are reborn by way of conception. He says that there is no liberation higher than the Brahma world though there clearly are higher forms of liberation in terms of other absorptions such as the second, third and fourth meditation Brahma worlds and the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna.

Monks, Māra the Wicked One then possessed a young Brahma attendant (Brahma-pārisajja) and rebuked me thus: “Monk, do not criticize this Brahma Baka. Monk, do not criticize this Brahma Baka. He is great. He is dominant. He is indomitable. Surely, he sees all. He holds sway over all living beings. He rules the world. He created the world. He is the lord of the world. He determines a living being’s destiny declaring: ‘You shall be a king, you shall be a Brahmin, you shall be a merchant, you shall be a farmer, you shall be a labourer, you shall be a human, you shall be a monk, or, at the least, you shall be a camel or you shall be an ox.’ He is accomplished in absorption (jhāna). He is the father of beings that have arisen and beings that are arising.”

Of the expressions ‘beings that have arisen’ and ‘beings that are arising,’ the latter means ‘beings originating in the eggs or in the wombs.’ From the time they come out from the eggs or the wombs they are known as ‘beings that have arisen.’

In the case of beings originating in moisture (samsedaja), they are called ‘beings that are arising’ at the moment of their rebirth consciousness, and after that moment they are ‘beings that have arisen.’

As for the spontaneous (upapatti) beings they are called ‘beings that are arising’ at the moment of their first bodily posture and after that they are ‘beings that have arisen.’

“Monks! In this world, those ascetics and Brahmins before you, who, like you, condemned and abhorred the earth-element, the water-element, the fire-element, the wind-element as impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and without self (anatta) and who, like you, condemned and abhorred living beings, Devas, Māras and Brahmas, as impermanent, suffering and without self, they all landed in the lower worlds of woes after the dissolution of their bodies at death.

Monks, in this world, those ascetics and Brahmins before you, who admired and cherished the earth-element, the water-element, the fire-element, the wind-element as permanent, firm, stable, imperishable, unbreakable and inexhaustible and who admired and cherished the living beings, Devas, Māras and Brahmas as firm, stable, imperishable, unbreakable and inexhaustible they all landed in the sublime Brahma world after the dissolution of their bodies at death.

Therefore I say unto you, monk, I want to urge you to follow this Brahma's teaching. Do not go against his teaching. Monk, if you go against his teaching, you will be like a man who beats and drives away with a six-foot long stick the glory that has come right to you or like a man who falls over a cliff and does not land on the supporting ground by not coming into contact with it by his hands and legs. This example will do for you. I therefore want to urge you to follow the Brahma's teaching. Do not contradict it. Monk, you see the Brahmas who have assembled, do you not?"

"Thus, Monks, Māra the Wicked One aimed his speech at me and tried to make me a member of Brahma Baka's assembly."

Herein it may be asked: "How did Māra see the Buddha?" While staying in his [832] mansion, Māra enquired frequently: "In which village or market town is the Buddha staying now?" When he enquired on this particular occasion, he came to know that the Buddha was staying in the Subhaga grove near Ukkaṭṭha. When he tried to see where the Buddha had gone, he saw that the Buddha had gone to the Brahma world. So he thought: "I will go and make him give up his desire to preach there before he causes the Brahmas to get out of my dominion." So he followed the Buddha vigilantly and stood anonymously among the Brahmas. Knowing that the Buddha had rebuked Brahma Baka, he emerged as a supporter of the Brahma. Māra could not possess Mahā Brahma and Purohita Brahmas. He therefore possessed the young Brahma attendant.

Monks, when the evil Māra spoke thus through the Brahma attendant, I refuted him as follows: 'Wicked Māra! I know you. Do not think that the monk Gotama does not know you, Wicked One, you are Māra. You are the evil Māra: the Mahā Brahma, the assembly of Brahmas, the Brahma-attendants they all fall into your hand; they are all under your sway.' Wicked Māra, you are wrong in believing thus: 'This monk too may fall into my hand. This monk too may come under my sway.’ In reality, I do not fall into your hand. I do not go under your sway.

Monks, when I had thus spoken to Māra, Brahma Baka said to me: ‘Venerable sir, I speak of what is permanent as permanent. I speak of what is firm, stable, unique and imperishable as firm, stable, unique and imperishable. I say that in the Brahma world there is no one who is conceived, who grows old, who dies, who falls away, who is reborn, because in the Brahma world there is no one who is conceived, who is old, who dies, who falls away, who is reborn. I say that there is no liberation better than the Brahma world with this body because there is no liberation higher than the Brahma world together with this body.’

Monks, in this world, the practice of those ascetics and Brahmins before you was as old as your age. They might have known what liberation is higher than the Brahma world with this body as the liberation higher than the Brahma world with this body. They might have known the liberation no higher than the Brahma world with this body as the liberation that is no higher than the Brahma world with this body.

Monks, therefore I say to you this: ‘You will not find any other liberation higher than the Brahma world with this body.’ If you search for it, this will mean only trouble and suffering for you.

Monks, if you cling to the earth element you will live near me, you will live in my place, you will be my subordinate. If you cling to the water element, the fire element, the wind element, living beings, Devas, Māras and Brahmas, you will live near me, you will live in my place, you will be my subordinate.”

The Buddha replied: “Brahma, I too know this: If I cling to the earth element, I will live near you, I will live in your place, I will be your subordinate. So will I be if I cling to the water element, the fire element, the wind element, living beings, Devas, Māras and Brahmas. I know all this! Brahma, in fact, I know that you are of such great power, of such might, of such great fame and retinue. I know your abilities, too.”

Then Brahma Baka asked the Buddha: “Venerable sir, how do you know that I am of such great power, of such great might, of such great fame and retinue? How do you know my abilities too?” Then the Buddha answered: “Your authority lies in 1,000 universes, in each universe, the sun and the [833] moon move about and shine in all directions.”

35c: More Stories about Wrong View – 1216

A vast circular area in which the sun and the moon wander, illuminating all over the directions, is called a world-element (loka-dhātu), or a spherical universe (cakka-vāḷa).

“All over these universes, numbering 1,000, your Brahma’s authority spreads. You, Brahma Baka, know beings high and low, beings covetous and uncovetous, this and the remaining 999 universes, the rebirth and death of beings in these universes. Brahma Baka, I know that you are of such great power, of such great might, of such great retinue and fame. I know your abilities too.”

The Buddha’s words have not come to an end yet. A note may, however, be inserted here. By saying so, the Buddha tried to subdue the Brahma. What he meant to say was this: “Brahma Baka, your authority spreads only within 1,000 universes. Yet you think highly of yourself: ‘I am a Great Brahma.’ you are only a Brahma who can see 1,000 universes. There are other Brahmas who are superior to you such as those who can see 2,000 universes, who can see 3,000, 4,000, 5,000, 10,000 world-elements and those who can see 100,000 world-element, and they are countless. And yet, like a man who tries to compare his piece of cloth, which is only four cubit long, with another piece of cloth that is far greater in length, like a man who desires to immerse himself in the water which is only ankle-deep, or like a small frog which thinks that the water in a bullock’s footprint is a deep pool, you have a high opinion of yourself, thinking: ‘I am a Great Brahma.’

“Brahma Baka, there is still another world indeed apart from this world of the first absorption (jhāna). You neither know it nor see it. But I know it and see it. Brahma Baka, there is still another world known as the Ābhassara world. Falling from that Ābhassara world, you have landed in this world of the first meditation. Because you have lived in this world of the first meditation you have lost your memory. Therefore you neither know nor see that Ābhassara world. But I know and see it. Brahma Baka, because I know the Ābhassara world which is unknown to you, you are not equal to me in intellect. Why should I be inferior to you? In fact, I am superior to you intellectually.”

The Buddha’s speech has not come to an end yet. Another note may, however, be inserted here. Brahma Baka had fallen from the higher worlds and landed in a lower world. In a past aeon (kappa), devoid of the appearance of a Buddha, Brahma Baka became an ascetic and practised meditation on a device (kaṣiṇa) as a prelude to the attainment of the absorptions (jhāna). When he passed away, without any slip of the meditation, he was reborn in the Vehapphala Brahma world of the fourth absorption, which is of a long lifespan, 500 aeons. Having lived the full life-span there, he desired rebirth in a lower world and developed the third absorption (jhāna) to a high standard. When he passed away from that Vehapphala world, he landed in the Subhakiṇhā Brahma world of the third absorption (jhāna) which has a lifespan of 64 great aeons (mahā-kappa).

If a man commits a number of immediately resultant (anantariya) deeds, such as matricide, patricide, etc., only the severest and heaviest one of them bring about rebirth in the Mahā Avīci state of long suffering; others do not bring it about but contribute to its occurrence. Similarly of the four form absorptions (jhāna) that are developed, only the specially developed one with the four dominant (adhipati) factors brings about rebirth in the form worlds (rūpāvacara) and the remaining form meditations do not result in that rebirth as they themselves have no chance to do so; they merely facilitate the sustenance of that rebirth for its full lifespan.

Having existed in that Subhakiṇhā Brahma abode for the full lifespan of 64 great aeons, Brahma Baka developed in the previous manner the second absorption (jhāna) of the higher standard and when he fell from Subhakiṇhā he landed in the Ābhassara Brahma abode which is on the second meditation plane, lasting for eight great aeons. Having [834] existed there for the full lifespan of eight great aeons, he developed, in the previous manner, the first meditation of the higher standard and when he fell from Ābhassara he landed in the Mahā Brahma abode, which is the first meditation plane, lasting for 64 great aeons in terms of an inferior kind or just one aeon in terms of the immeasurable period (asaṅkhyeyya).

In his present Mahā Brahma abode, however Brahma Baka remembered in the earlier part of his life, his performance of wholesome meditation and the former abode where he had existed. When he had been there for too long, he forgot even those two things and wrongly took to himself the false belief in eternalism. That was why the Buddha said to Brahma Baka: “You have lost your memory. Therefore you neither know, nor do you see that Ābhassara world,” and so on.

The Past Story of Brahma Baka

The following is based mainly on the commentary to the Birth Story about Brahma Baka (Brahma-baka-jātaka, Ja 405).

When the Buddha spoke thus, Brahma Baka thought: “The monk Gotama knows the lifespan of my previous lives, the worlds of my previous rebirths and the good deeds of absorption (jhāna) that I had practised before, I will ask him now about my good deeds in the past.” In response to his question, the Buddha told him about his good deeds. This Brahma Baka in one of his former births was a son of a good family. Seeing the dangers of sense desires he decided: “I will put an end to birth, old age, sickness and death.” Thereafter, he renounced the world and became an ascetic, developing mundane absorptions (jhāna). Having accomplished the absorptions which were the foundation of the super knowledges he built a small leaf-hut near the river Ganges and spent his time enjoying the bliss of the absorptions.

While he was staying thus, a caravan of 500 carts carrying merchants crossed a desert frequently. When they crossed the desert by night the bullocks that were harnessed at the foremost cart lost their way and turned back, thus coming back to the former track that they had taken. The other carts too similarly came back to the former track and this was known to the merchants only at dawn. For the merchants it was the day they needed to have passed through the desert. All their firewood and water had run out. Therefore, thinking that they were now about to lose their lives the people unyoked their bullocks from the carts, tied them to the wheels and went to sleep in the shade of the rear part of the carts.

The absorption-accomplished ascetic, the future Brahma Baka, got out of the leaf-hut early in the morning. While sitting at the hut door, he had a look at the Ganges and saw a great flood overwhelming the whole Ganges as though a huge green stone was rolling down. When he thought: “Are there in this world any beings that are wearied for lack of such sweet water?” he saw the caravan of those merchants suffering in the sandy desert. Wishing them well, he resolved through psychic powers: “May a great volume of water from the Ganges flow towards the merchants in the caravan.”

As soon as his psychic powers occurred, a great volume of water flowed into the desert as though into a drain. The merchants got up because of the sound of the water. On seeing the water they were overjoyed. They bathed, they drank, and they let the cattle drink and they finally arrived at their destination. In order to point out this past good deed of Brahma Baka, the Buddha spoke this verse:

*Yam̐ tvam̐ apāyesi bahū manusse, pipāsīte ghammani samparete,
tam̐ te purāṇam̐ vata-sīla-vattam̐,
suttappabuddho va anussarāmi.*

Brahma by the name of Baka! In the past, when you were an absorption-accomplished ascetic who caused, by your psychic powers, those thirsty people of a caravan, who were tortured by the sun in the desert, to have water to drink and to bath. Like a man waking up, I recollect again and again, by my power of the remembrance of former lives (pubbe-nivāsānussati-ñāṇa), your morality practised in the past.

At a later time, the ascetic, built a leaf-hut on the bank of the Ganges and lived there depending upon a small village for food. Then robbers beat the villagers and robbed them [835] of gold and silver and took with them cattle and people as hostages. The cries of the people and the animals created loud noises. On hearing the noises, the ascetic wondered what it was all about. Knowing that some danger has befallen the villagers, he made a wish: “May these beings not perish while I am seeing them.” Then he engaged himself in absorption (jhāna), the foundation of his psychic powers. Arising from that meditation, he created a large army of four divisions – elephants, horses, chariots, and foot-soldiers – that marched arrow-shooting, trumpet-blowing, drum-beating and threat-shouting.

Seeing the great army, the robbers thought that it was the marching of the king, they discarded their loot and fled. The ascetic resolved: “May the property go back to their respective owners,” and this happened in accordance with the ascetic’s resolve. The people were thus overjoyed. In order to point out also this past good deed of Brahma Baka, the Buddha spoke this verse:

*Yaṃ eṇi-kūlasmi’ janam gahītam, amocayī gayhaka niyyamānam,
tam te purāṇam vata-sīla-vattam,
suttappabuddho va anussarāmi.*

Brahma by the name of Baka! In the past when you were an absorption-accomplished ascetic on the bank of the Ganges, which was also named Eṇikūla because there were many herds of antelopes there, you caused the villagers, who were taken as hostages and whose properties were robbed by thieves, to escape from the robbers’ hands by your creation of an army of four divisions. Like a man waking up, I recollect again and again, by my power of remembering former lives, your morality practised in the past.

Again at a later time, a family living in the upper part of the Ganges and another family living in the lower part held a wedding ceremony, one party giving the bride to the other and making friends together. They joined their boats, forming them like a raft which carried many kinds of food, unguents, flowers, etc, and which floated on the currents of the Ganges waters. The people on the boats had a great feast, dancing and singing. They revelled as though they were moving in a celestial flying mansion.

Then the Nāga King, ruler and resident of the Ganges, saw the people and became angry, thinking: “These people have no regard for me as they are not aware that their riotous merry making would annoy me, the Nāga King of the Ganges. Now I shall make them float into the ocean.” So thinking he assumed an enormous body and split the water into two halves between which he emerged all of a sudden. With his vast hood raised, he made a great hissing sound and stayed there as though he were going to bite the people and put them to death.

On seeing the Nāga King, the people became frightened and cried loudly and feverishly. While sitting in the leaf-hut the ascetic hearing their cries, thought: “Earlier these people were very happy, dancing and singing. Now they are making sounds of fear and grief. What is the matter?” Then he saw the Nāga King and desired for the people’s safety: “May they not perish while I am seeing them.” So he engaged himself in the absorptions, the foundation of his super knowledges, and after assuming the guise of a Garuḷa bird, he was poised to snatch away the Nāga King. Fearing being attacked, the Nāga King withdrew his hood and immersed himself in the water. All the people were thus saved. In order to point out this good deed of Brahma Baka, the Buddha spoke this verse:

*Gaṅgāya sotasmim̃ gahīta-nāvaṃ, luddena nāgena manussa-kappā, amocayi tvaṃ balasā pasayha, [836]
taṃ te purāṇaṃ vata-sīla-vattaṃ,
suttappabuddho va anussarāmi.*

Brahma by the name of Baka! In the past when you were an ascetic you saved the people of two villages, who were going to be destroyed by the fierce Nāga King in the water currents of the Ganges, by your psychic powers known as the power of transformation (vikubbaniddhi) and you thus set them free from the threat of the Nāga King. Like a man waking up, I recollect again and again by my power of remembering former lives, your morality practised in the past.

Still at a later time, Brahma Baka was a noble ascetic known as Kesava. At that time our Bodhisatta was a youthful ascetic by the name of Kappa. Constantly staying near the ascetic Kesava and serving him as a residential pupil (antevāsika), who was always obedient, thinking to do only what was pleasing to his master, who was intelligent and who practised what was beneficial. The ascetic Kesava was unable to move about, to remain still, to eat or drink without the help of his close pupil, the young ascetic Kappa. At one time, he was looked after by the King of Bārāṇasī but he left the king and lived depending on his own pupil, Kappa the ascetic. In order to point out also this past good deed of Brahma Baka, the Buddha spoke this verse:

*Kappo ca te baddha-caro ahoṣi, Sambuddhim-antaṃ vatinaṃ amaññaṃ,
taṃ te purāṇaṃ vata-sīla-vattaṃ,
suttappabuddho va anussarāmi.*

Brahma by the name of Baka! In one of the past existences I was a virtuous ascetic, Kappa by name, who, as your residential pupil, served you, a virtuous ascetic, Kesava by name. At that time you fondly spoke in praise of me, saying I was good, intelligent and that I had practised morality adequately. Like a man waking up, I recollect again and again by my power of remembering former lives, your morality practised in the past.

In this way the Buddha spoke to Brahma Baka, pointing out the latter's good deeds done in his various past existences. While the Buddha was thus talking, Brahma Baka recollected his past lives. All his past deeds gradually manifested to him as though different objects become clear when 1,000 oil lamps are lighted. He was so pleased, having a faithful heart, he spoke the following verse:

Addhā pajānāsi mam-etam-āyuraṃ, aññaṃ-pi jānāsi tathā hi Buddho, tathā hi tāyaṃ jalitānubhāvo, obhāsayāṃ tiṭṭhati Brahma-lokaṃ.

Fortunate One, who has done away with all suffering! Certainly, you know my past lives. You also know all other things worth knowing apart from my lives also. You are therefore an omniscient Buddha. This bright body-light of yours exists, illuminating the whole Brahma abode, outshining the light of hundreds and thousands of suns and moons.

Having related as a parenthesis to the past events of Brahma Baka at his request, the Buddha came back to his original topic, speaking thus: “Brahma Baka, there is also the Subhakiṇhā abode, Vehapphala abode, and Abhibhū abode. You neither know nor see them. I know and see them. I know what you do not, you are not equal to me intellectually. How can I be inferior to you? In fact, I am superior to you intellectually.”

Then in order to prove a step further that Brahma Baka was not his intellectual equal and [837] that he himself was superior to Brahma Baka intellectually, the Buddha continued his speech as follows: “Brahma Baka, with extraordinary intellect I know the earth element that it is by nature impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and selfless (anatta). I know Nibbāna, that is inaccessible to the earth element by its nature; and I do not cling to the earth element with craving (taṇhā), conceit (māna) or wrong view (diṭṭhi). I do not cling to it, as something in which self (atta) lies, or something from which self emerges, I do not cling to it as I, mine, or my self. Brahma Baka, as I know the Nibbāna that is unknown to you, you are not equal to me intellectually. How can I be inferior to you? In fact, I am superior to you intellectually.

Brahma Baka, with extraordinary intellect, I know the water element, the fire element, the wind element, sentient beings, the Devas, Māras, Brahmas, Ābhassara Brahmas, Subhakiṇhā Brahmas, Vehapphala Brahmas, Abhibhū Brahmas, with extraordinary intellect. I know all individuality pertaining to the three planes of existence (te-bhūmaka) that is by nature impermanent, suffering and selfless. I know Nibbāna, that is inaccessible to all individuality by its very nature and I do not cling at all to individuality with craving, conceit and wrong view. I do not cling to it, as something in which self lies or, as something from which self emerges. I do not cling to all to individuality pertaining to the three planes of existences as I, mine, or my self. Brahma Baka, as I know Nibbāna, which is unknown to you, you are not equal to me intellectually. How can I be inferior to you? In fact, I am superior to you intellectually.”

Then Brahma Baka, wishing to charge the Buddha with falsehood, said:
“Venerable sir, if it is true there is something as you say that is inaccessible to all by its very nature, your claim that you know it would come to nothing. Do not let it come to nothing. Your statement would become empty. Do not let it become empty.”

Herein some clarification will be made so that the virtuous readers of the Chronicle may not be confused. The English word all and the Pāḷi sabba are of similar meaning, but here the word sabba is used in the sense of all mundane things, all that has individuality (sakkāya). The complete terminology is sakkāya-sabba or all individuality. It is this sakkāya-sabba, all individuality, that is referred to in the Instruction about Burning (Āditta-pariyāya-sutta, SN 35.235) where: Sabbaṃ ādittaṃ occurs; the Pāḷi sentence means: “All things, monks, are on fire, with lust (rāga), hatred (dosa), etc.”

It cannot be said that supermundane things are burnt by fire, for unwholesome things, such as lust, hatred and delusion are absolutely incapable of taking the supermundane things as their target. They are capable of doing so only in the case of mundane things, individuality (sakkāya) or the factors of clinging to existence (upādānakkhandha); hence, the burning of mundane things by the fires of lust, hatred, etc. Therefore what is supermundane is to be excluded from “all,” whereas what is mundane is to be included therein. Therefore by the word all of the Instruction about Burning is meant sakkāya-sabba or, all individuality.

With reference to the term sabbaññutā-ñāṇa or, all embracing knowledge, or, omniscience, its component sabba includes both the mundane and supermundane, for the Buddha knows the whole range of things, mundane as well as supermundane. Therefore, the word sabba of sabbaññutā-ñāṇa means sabba-sabba, all this, and all that.

By this much the readers of this Chronicle might have understood that in the field of Dhamma literature the use of the word sabba, all is of two kinds: The use of it in the sense of sakkāya-sabba, all individuality, or all mundane things, and the use of it in the sense of sabba-sabba, all this, and all that, with both mundane or supermundane designations. Let us examine now the use of all by the Buddha and Brahma Baka.

When the Buddha asserted that he was intellectually superior to Brahma Baka, he presented 13 points as follows: [838] 1) I know the earth element and you know it too, I know Nibbāna which is inaccessible to the earth element, but you do not; 2) I know the water element and you know it too, I know Nibbāna which is inaccessible to the water element but you do not. In this way the Buddha went on with regard to: 3) the fire element; 4) the wind element; 5) sentient beings; 6) Devas; 7) Māras; 8) Brahmas; 9) Ābhassara Brahmas; 10) Subhakiṇhā Brahmas; 11) Vehapphala Brahmas; 12) Abhibhū Brahmas (Assaññasatta Brahmas); 13) I know all (sakkāya-sabba) and you know it too; I know all (sabba -sabba), including Nibbāna, which is inaccessible to all but you do not.

35c: More Stories about Wrong View – 1224

With regard to the first 12 points, Baka saw no reason to blame the Buddha. As regards the last point, however, he saw something to accuse the Buddha of.

When the Buddha said: “I know all (sakkāya-sabba) and I know Nibbāna which is inaccessible to all (sakkāya-sabba),” he said it as a puzzle. What he meant to say by this was: “Brahma Baka, I know all mundane things (sabba-sakkāya) by my extraordinary intellect that they are, by nature, impermanent, suffering and selfless. Having known this, I also know Nibbāna by my extraordinary insight (vipassanā), which cannot be attained by all (sakkāya) individualities.”

In that speech the statement reading: “I know all by all their nature,” means: “I know by insight (vipassanā) all individuality pertaining to the three planes of existence, and the five aggregates of mundane things in their nature of being impermanent, suffering and selfless.” Here the Buddha said: “I know all by all their nature,” with reference to sakkāya-sabba. “I know Nibbāna which is inaccessible to all by all nature,” means “I know Nibbāna with the path-knowledge, realizing that it is inaccessible to all individuality and the five aggregates of mundane things in their nature of being conditioned (saṅkhata).

Such conditioned material things as the earth element, the wind element, etc., have the nature of hardness, cohesiveness, etc., which are also conditioned, such conditioned mental things as contact, sensation, etc., have the nature of the tangibility, feeling, etc., which are also conditioned. All these conditioned things are absent in Nibbāna which is unconditioned. Only the nature of peace (santi), as opposed to conditioned things is present in unconditioned Nibbāna. This was in view when it was said that Nibbāna is inaccessible to the earth element. Nibbāna is inaccessible to the water element, Nibbāna is inaccessible to all individuality.

By this much, readers of the Chronicle must have understood that what the Buddha meant was as follows: “I know thoroughly all (sabba-sakkāya), or the five aggregates of mundane things and you know them too. I also know Nibbāna which cannot be reached by all individuality, but you do not know it, and that the word “all” in that speech implies the five aggregates of mundane things and that Nibbāna is something which cannot be attained by that “all.”

But as a fault-finding ideologue, Brahma Baka took it wrongly, that by all was meant sabba-sabba, each and everything, mundane or supermundane and designated, for he was totally ignorant of the fact that here mundane all (sakkāya-sabba) was referred to in the Buddha’s speech. This led him to his criticism of the Buddha: “Venerable sir, if the Dhamma is inaccessible to all other things by its nature, your saying that you know what is inaccessible would come to nothing. Do not let it come to nothing. Your statement would become empty. Do not let it become empty.”

The gist of Brahma Baka’s criticism was as follows: In your speech, venerable sir, you claim your knowledge of all, and your knowledge of the Dhamma that is inaccessible to all. The word all of the first statement covers all things. So there can be nothing which is inaccessible to all things. And yet the Buddha insists on his knowledge of what is mentioned in the second statement. His insistence, therefore, will be reduced to nonsense like the flower of the sky, the horn of a rabbit, the hair of a turtle, and the blood of a crab. If what is inaccessible is semantically exclusive of the word all of the first [839] statement, his assertion there cannot be true, for the things known to him are not complete. It will be a lie then.

In this way did Brahma Baka wanted to accuse the Buddha of false speech. In short, the Buddha spoke of all things (sakkāya-sabba), all that is mundane. The Brahma Baka mistook it for all that is either mundane or supermundane (sabba-sabba). Hence his accusation against the Buddha was unjust.

Being a supreme ideologue, 100 times, 1,000 times, nay, 100,000 times greater than Brahma Baka, the Buddha would still proclaim his knowledge of all and the Nibbāna that is inaccessible to all for the Brahma to listen to, in order to refute the Brahma’s charge of falsehood, so he went on to say: “Brahma Baka, there is Nibbāna which is higher than all conditioned things, which is to be known through path-knowledge, fruition-knowledge, reflection-knowledge, which is invisible to the naked eye or which has no resemblance that can be shown as its representative, which is completely devoid of an arising-and-passing nature, which is brighter than all other things or which never knows darkness but ever remains brilliant.” By these words the Buddha boldly affirmed the real existence of Nibbāna that is beyond all individuality on the three planes of existence.

That Nibbāna 1) cannot be reached by the earth element through the nature of earth; 2) cannot be reached by the water element; 3) by the fire element; 4) by the wind element; 5) by sentient beings through their nature; 6) by Devas; 7) Māras, 8) Brahmas, 9) Ābhassara Brahmas, 10) Subhakiṇhā Brahmas; 11) Vehapphala Brahmas; 12) it cannot be reached by Abhibhū Brahmas through their nature; it cannot be reached by all (sakkāya-dhamma) through the nature of them all (sakkāya). By these words the Buddha made clear that he spoke of all, too.

In this way there is the aggregate of all (sakkāya-dhamma) of the three planes of existence which is within the range of knowledge that belongs to persons like you. By that aggregate of all of the three planes of existence through the nature of them all, Nibbāna with the aforesaid four attributes cannot be reached. Thus the Buddha firmly asserted his doctrine.

Miracle Contest

Every aspect of his belief in the eternity of the Brahma world together with the body having been criticized and repudiated, Brahma Baka was at a loss for words. In order to cover his defeat, he gave up arguing for his belief and decided to show his superiority by performing miracles. So he said: “Venerable sir, if that is the case, I will now vanish in your presence. I am going to perform the sort of miracle whereby I become invisible to you. You just watch me.” The Buddha said: “Brahma Baka, you are not able to do so. If you indeed have such a power, then vanish before me now.”

Brahmas have two kinds of body, a natural body and an artificial or created body. The natural body which originates at the time of birth is so subtle that it cannot be seen by other Brahmas. So to make it visible, they take the form of a created gross body.

Therefore when Brahma Baka received consent, he bent his mind on changing his created gross body into the natural, subtle body. The Buddha knew his intention and resolved that his body should remain unchanged in its gross form. So Brahma Baka could not change his body into its natural, subtle form and there was no vanishing of his body.

Unable to change his body, Brahma Baka again tried to create darkness that might envelope his present body. But by means of his supernormal power, the Buddha dispelled [840] the darkness created by the Brahma. So Baka was unable to hide himself.

Being unable to hide by changing his body or by creating darkness, Brahma Baka desperately entered his mansion and hid there. He hid under the wish-fulfilling tree. He squat down furtively. Then hosts of Brahmas burst into laughter and jeered, saying: “This Brahma Baka is now hiding in the mansion. Now he is hiding under the wish-fulfilling tree, squatting furtively. O Brahma Baka what a pity that you think you have hidden yourself.” Being thus jeered at by other Brahmas, Brahma Baka wore a displeased face. Hence it is said in brief in the text: “Monks, though Brahma Baka said: ‘I will hide myself in the presence of the monk Gotama,’ he was unable to do so.”

To the Brahma who was unable to hide himself, the Buddha said: “Brahma Baka, if you cannot hide yourself, I will hide myself in your presence now. I am going to perform a miracle so that you cannot see me.” Then Brahma Baka replied to the Buddha: “Venerable sir, hide yourself in my presence now if you can.”

Then the Buddha first entered upon the fourth absorption (jhāna), the foundation of his resolve; then rising from that meditation, he resolved that the Mahā Brahma, the assembly of Brahmas and the young attendant Brahmas could only hear his voice but not see his body; then he entered upon the fourth absorption (jhāna), the foundation of his psychic power; when he rose from that meditation, a process of psychic power occurred in his mind; as soon as he felt that mental process but once, the Buddha’s body vanished and not a single Brahma could see him. To make them know that he was still with them though he had vanished, the Buddha uttered this verse:

Bhavevāhaṃ bhayaṃ disvā, bhavañ-ca vibhavesinaṃ, bhavaṃ nābhivadim kiñci, nandiñ-ca na upādiyim.

Brahmas who have assembled here! Because I have seen clearly with my eye of wisdom, the dangers of birth, old age, and sickness on the three planes of existence such as the sense worlds (kāma-loka), the form worlds (rūpa-loka) and the formless worlds (arūpa-loka), and the endless arising of beings like Brahma Baka, who have gone astray in their search of Nibbāna that is non-existence, I no longer cling to any existence as permanent, constant, eternal, etc., under the power of craving and wrong view. I am entirely free from craving for existence as I have rooted it out and cut it off four times with the axe-like wisdom of the fourfold path-knowledge.

In this verse, by the word existence (bhava) is indicated the truth of suffering, by craving for existence (bhava-taṇhā) is indicated the truth of the cause of suffering, by non-existence (vibhava) is indicated the truth of the cessation of suffering, by I have no craving for existence (nandiñ ca na upādiyim) is indicated the truth of the path leading to the cessation of suffering.

Thus the Buddha taught the four truths in detail to the Brahmas according to their dispositions and led them to insight (vipassanā) and concluded his teaching with the Arahāt fruition as its apex. At the end of the discourse, the Brahmas, reflectively following the discourse, were steeped in the essence of insight at various stages, some attaining Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala), some Once-returning (Sakadāgāmi-phala), some Non-returning (Anāgāmi-phala) and the rest became Arahats. Then the Brahmas rejoiced, marvelled and extolled the Buddha.

Hence it is said in the text: “Monks, then the Brahma, his followers and attendants were filled with great wonder, saying: ‘Friends, wonderful indeed is the great power and the great might of the monk Gotama! Never have we seen or heard any ascetic or Brahmin who is so powerful and mighty as the monk Gotama, a Sakyan Prince and an ascetic [841] of the Sakyan royal family. Indeed, the monk Gotama can remove the roots of existence, ignorance and craving from all beings who take delight in existence, who take pleasure in existence and who arise in existence.’ ”

Molestation by Māra

Then Māra reflected and came to know in anger thus: “While I am moving about the monk Gotama has taught 10,000 Brahmas and set themselves free from my dominion.” So furious was he that he once again possessed a young attendant Brahma.

Herein, how did Māra know that the 10,000 Brahmas had become noble ones (ariya)? He knew this by inference (nayaggāha or anumāna). He knew that when the Buddha taught to worthy beings, he pointed out the ills of Saṃsāra and the bliss of Nibbāna so that the listening beings would discern Nibbāna; that all his sermons were beneficial and effective like the thunderbolt (vajira) weapon hurled by Sakka; and that Devas and humans who were established in his teaching became invisible in Samsāra.

Having possessed the young Brahma, Māra spoke to the Buddha, disturbing him. This is mentioned in the text in the following manner: “Monks, at that time the wicked Māra possessed a young attendant Brahma and said to me thus: ‘Venerable sir, if you know the four truths analytically thus, if you know them by your omniscience, do not convey this doctrine to your disciples. Do not convey them to recluses and wandering ascetics. Do not preach to your disciples. Do not preach to recluses and wandering ascetics. Have no greed for your disciples. Have no greed for recluses and wandering ascetics.

Monk, there were ascetics and Brahmins who lived before you and who claimed to be Arahats or who claimed to have destroyed the enemy in the form of moral defilements, or who claimed to be Sammāsambuddhas, those who claimed to know all the doctrines by themselves. They conveyed their doctrines to their disciples and recluses and wandering ascetics. They taught to their disciples and recluses and wandering ascetics. They had greed for them and on the dissolution of their bodies at death they landed in the low suffering states.

Monk, there were in this world ascetics and Brahmins who lived before you and who claimed to be Arahats or who claimed to have destroyed the enemy in the form of moral defilements, or who claimed to be Sammāsambuddhas, those who claimed to know all the doctrines by themselves. They did not convey their doctrines to their disciples. They did not preach to their disciples and recluses and wandering ascetics. They had no greed for them and on the dissolution on their bodies at death they landed in the high Brahma worlds.

Therefore, monk, I would like to tell you thus: “Venerable sir, I urge you. Live in comfort, live without any bother. Sir, non-teaching is good. Do not exhort others.” I would like to tell you thus.’

Monks, when Māra the Wicked One said this, I spoke to him as follows: ‘Wicked Māra, I know you. Do not think that I do not know you. You are Māra the Wicked One, you have spoken thus not because you desire my welfare but because you desire my loss. You fear that those who follow my teaching will overcome the three kinds of existence that lie within your domain.

Wicked Māra, ascetics and Brahmins whom you speak of claimed to be Sammāsambuddhas without actually being Sammāsambuddhas. But I truly claim to be Sammāsambuddha, who know all the doctrines myself.

Wicked Māra, whether the Buddha preaches to his disciples or not, he has neither love nor hate; he is endowed with the attributes of being undisturbed (tādi). Why? Wicked Māra, the Buddha has abandoned the pollutants (āsava) that lead [842] to anxiety, rebirth, anguish and suffering, later on causing rebirth, old age and death. He has cut off their latent (anusaya) roots. He has made them like an uprooted palm tree. He has made it impossible for them to arise again. So, for the Buddha, there is absolutely no revival of those pollutants (āsava).

Wicked Māra, as a palm tree cut off at its neck, cannot thrive, so the Buddha has abandoned the pollutants that lead to anxiety, rebirth, anguish and suffering, later on causing rebirth, old age, and death. He has rooted them out. He has made them like an uprooted palm tree. He has made it impossible for them to arise again. So, for the Buddha, there is absolutely no possibility of the resurgence of those pollutants.”

Thus the Buddha taught this discourse to silence Māra and imparted special knowledge to the Brahma. Hence this discourse is called the Discourse about the Invitation of Brahmā (MN 49, Brahma-nimantanika-sutta).

Cūḷa Subhaddā and Ugga

[The following is based on the Dhamma Verses (Dhp 304) and its commentary.]

While the Buddha was residing at Jetavana in the good city of Sāvattihī, he gave a discourse beginning with (Dhp 304): Dūre santo pakāsentī, “though people may stay many leagues away,” in connection with the merchant Anāthapiṇḍika’s daughter, Cūḷa Subhaddā.

The details are as follows: Ugga, who was another merchant, a citizen of Ugga city, was the childhood friend of the merchant, Anāthapiṇḍika. While they were educated by the same teacher, they promised to each other that when they grew up and had children, one who had a daughter should give her in marriage to a son of the other, who wanted her to be his daughter-in-law.

The two friends grew up and became great merchants in their respective cities. One day, the merchant, Ugga, went to the house of Anāthapiṇḍika in Sāvattihī with 500 carts to do business. Anāthapiṇḍika called his daughter, Cūḷa Subhaddā, and assigned a duty to her, saying: “Dear daughter, your would-be father-in-law Ugga the merchant has come. Do all that is necessary for him.”

“Very well,” said Cūḷa Subhaddā and from the day of Ugga’s arrival, she prepared and cooked the food personally for him. She put on flowers, perfumes and unguents, etc. While the merchant was being fed, she got the bath-water ready and after he had taken his bath, she personally supervised all the needful for him, and all was done with respect.

Observing she had the character of a good housewife, the merchant Ugga was pleased with Cūḷa Subhaddā. Then one day, while conversing cordially with Anāthapiṇḍika, he reminded his friend saying: “Friend, when we were young we made such and such a pledge to each other,” and then asked for Cūḷa Subhaddā for his son. But Ugga was a heretic. So Anāthapiṇḍika did not make any decision on his own but reported the matter to the Buddha, who seeing Ugga’s former good deeds that would contribute to his attainment of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga) approved. He then discussed with his wife, Puññālakkhaṇa Devī, and they agreed to his friend’s proposal. He fixed the date and arranged an elaborate wedding ceremony, and when he sent Cūḷa Subhaddā away in marriage, he called his daughter and gave ten pieces of advice which were the same as those given to Visākhā by her father, Dhanañjaya.

My dear daughter, a woman who lives in the house of her parents-in-law:

1. She should not take the fire inside her house outside. That is, she should not tell people in other houses about the faults of her parents-in-law and husband.
2. She should not bring into her house the fire from outside. That is, when the neighbours speak ill of her parents-in-law and husband, she should not report it to them.
3. She should give only those who give back. That is, she should lend only to those who punctually return what they have borrowed from her house.
4. She should not give to those who do not give back. That is, she should not give another loan to those who do not punctually return what they have borrowed from her house. [843]

35c: More Stories about Wrong View – 1232

5. She should give to others whether they give her or not. That is, when poor relatives come to her house, she should give them whether they can afford to give or not.
6. She should sit well. That is, she should stand up first at the sight of her parents-in-law and husband. It is not proper for her to remain sitting when she should stand up.
7. She should eat well. That is, she should not eat before her parents-in-law and husband but she should serve them and eat only after making sure everybody has his or her food.
8. She should sleep well. That is, she should not sleep in her bed before her parents-in-law and husband. She should sleep only after doing her duties towards them.
9. She should serve the fire respectfully. That is, she should regard her parents-in-laws and husband as a great mass of fire or a poisonous serpent Nāga King and look at them respectfully. She should not look at them disrespectfully by casting a side glance or frowning upon them.
10. She should worship the Devas in the house. That is, she should show respect to her parents-in-law and husband, regarding them as the Devas occupying the foremost or the most sacred place in the house.

These were the ten pieces of advice which Anāthapiṇḍika gave to his daughter as did the merchant Dhanañjaya to his daughter Visākhā (see chapter 45b.2). He also sent eight wise men as guarantors along with his daughter with these instructions: “Whenever a problem crops up for my daughter Cūḷa Subhaddā you must solve it lawfully.”

The day of her departure saw him giving alms lavishly to the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha. Then he sent his daughter to the merchant Ugga’s house with great pomp and ceremony as though he exhibited the magnificent fruition of the good deeds which Cūḷa Subhaddā had done in her previous lives.

Arriving at Ugga city, she was welcomed by the merchant’s family and hosts of the citizens. Like Visākhā, she entered the city standing in her chariot, and impressing the people much with her glory and splendour. She accepted the presents sent by the citizens and sent in return gifts appropriate to their distinguished status and thus by virtue of her wisdom she endeared herself to the whole city.

When her heretical father-in-law honoured the naked ascetics (acelaka) on auspicious occasions at his house, he sent for her as he wanted her to come and pay respect to his teachers. But she refused to go to the place where they were being honoured because she was so shy to see the unclothed teachers.

The merchant Ugga sent for her repeatedly but Cūḷa Subhaddā remained adamant in her refusal. So the merchant became angry and ordered her to be turned out of the house. She refused to take such unreasonable treatment. Instead she called in the eight wise men, her guarantors, and stated her case openly. They decided that she had no fault and informed the merchant accordingly.

The merchant told his wife that Cūḷa Subhaddā did not pay respect to his teachers, saying that they had no sense of shame. The merchant's wife wondered what kind of monks were the teachers of her daughter-in-law whom she extolled so excessively. So she summoned Cūḷa Subhaddā and asked her (DhpA, PTS 3.467):

Kīdisā samaṇā tuyhaṃ, bāḷhaṃ kho ne pasāṃsasi, kiṃ-sīlā kiṃ-samācārā, taṃ me akkhāhi pucchitā.

Our daughter-in-law Subhaddā! How are your teachers and monks possessed of noble qualities? You do praise them highly. Those teachers of yours, the monk Gotama and his disciples, what kind of distinction do they have? What kind of good conduct do they show? As you are asked, tell me [844] truthfully about that.

Then Cūḷa Subhaddā, desiring to talk to the wife of the wealthy merchant about the qualities of the Buddha and his disciples, uttered the following verse:

Santindriyā santa-mānasā, santāṃ tesāṃ gatāṃ ʻhitāṃ, okkhitta-cakkhū mitabhāṇī, tādisā samaṇā mama.

Madam, those monks of mine, comprising the Fortunate One and his disciples, in contrast to the fickle and self-indulgent behaviour of your teachers, are mentally serene, being free from the heat of all defilements. Therefore, their walking with their steps like lotus flowers or their standing with their twin golden feet is so calm that the faith of the beholders increases. They have their eyes downcast and never look beyond the length of a yoke. They speak moderately and with what is in accordance with time and place. My teacher, the Fortunate One, and his disciples possess such impressive attributes.

Kāya-kammaṃ suci nesaṃ, vācā-kammaṃ anāvilāṃ, mano-kammaṃ suvisuddhaṃ, tādisā samaṇā mama.

Madam, all the physical behaviour of my teacher, the Fortunate One, and his disciples, is clear of unwholesomeness and pure; their verbal behaviour is serene by nature without the dust and mud of unwholesomeness, all their mental behaviour is free from the stain of evil character. They possess such impressive attributes.

Vimalā saṅkha-muttābhā, suddhā antara-bāhirā, puṇṇā suddhehi dhammehi, tādisā samaṇā mama.

Madam, my teacher, the Fortunate One, and his disciples, are free from moral defilements like a conch-shell or a pearl necklace. They are pure both inside and out, having no dust of fault at all. They are fully endowed with the three kinds of pure training. They possess such impressive attributes.

Lābhena unnato loko, alābhena ca onato, lābhālābhena ekaṭṭhā, tādisā samaṇā mama.

Madam, in the world, people become puffed up with pride when they acquire many things owing to their possession of effort now (payoga-sampatti) and their good deeds in the past. They become depressed when they do not acquire anything owing to their lack of effort now and their evil deeds in the past. But my teacher, the Fortunate One, and his disciples, are not affected by the acquisition, nor by the non-acquisition of things, but remain calm and tranquil. They possess such impressive attributes.

Yasena unnato loko, ayasena ca onato, yasāyasena ekaṭṭhā, [845] tādisā samaṇā mama.

Madam, in this world people became puffed up with pride when they become famous and have many followers owing to their possession of effort now and good deeds in the past. They become depressed when they cease to become famous and have fewer followers owing to their lack of effort now and their evil deeds in the past. But, my teacher, the Fortunate One, and his monastic disciples are not affected by having fame or not having fame and by having only a few followers, but remain calm and tranquil. They possess such impressive attributes.

Pasaṃsāyunnato loko, nindāyāpi ca onato, samā nindā-pasaṃsāsu, tādisā samaṇā mama.

Madam, in this world people become puffed up with pride when they are praised owing to their effort now and good deeds in the past. They are depressed when they are dispraised owing to their lack of effort now and their evil deeds in the past. But my teacher, the Fortunate One, and his monastic disciples are not affected by praise or by dispraise, but remain calm and tranquil. They possess such impressive attributes.

Sukhena unnato loko, dukkhenāpi ca onato, akampā sukha-dukkhesu, tādisā samaṇā mama.

Madam, in this world, people become puffed up with pride when they are affluent owing to their effort now and good deeds in the past. They become depressed when they are poor owing to their lack of effort now and their evil deeds in the past. But my teacher, the Fortunate One, and his monastic disciples, are not affected by affluence, but remain calm and tranquil. They possess such impressive attributes.

Thus, Cūḷa Subhaddā, the wise daughter-in-law, pleased her mother-in-law, by extolling the Fortunate One and his disciples. The merchant's wife asked her whether she would be able to show them her teacher, the Fortunate One and his disciples, and Cūḷa Subhaddā said she could do so. Then her mother-in-law told her to make an arrangement so that they could see her teacher and all.

Having promised thus, Cūḷa Subhaddā prepared a great offering for the Buddha and the Saṅgha, and on the top of the mansion, facing towards the Jetavana monastery, she paid respects to the Buddha and contemplated his attributes. Then honouring the Buddha with sweet smelling flowers, and perfumes, she resolved thus: “Exalted Buddha, I invite the Saṅgha headed by the Fortunate One to an alms giving at my house. May the Fortunate One, the teacher of Devas and humans, know my invitation well through these jasmine flowers which I am now sending.”

After extending her invitation, she threw up eight handfuls of jasmine flowers into the air. Like small butterflies, the flowers travelled in the air and became a flower-canopy above the Buddha, while he was teaching amongst the four assemblies of people in the Jetavana monastery.

At that moment the merchant Anāthapiṇḍika, who had heard the Dhamma, invited the Buddha to his house the next day to his good deeds. The Buddha replied that he had already accepted the invitation to the meal offering by another supporter. The merchant said: “There is no one who has come and invited the exalted Buddha before me. Whose meal-offering have you accepted?” The Buddha replied that he had already been invited by [846] Cūḷa Subhaddā. The merchant said: “But, exalted Buddha, is not my daughter Cūḷa Subhaddā living in Ugga which is 120 leagues away from this city of Sāvattihī?”

The Buddha replied: “You are right, merchant, but good people can manifest as if they were standing before me even though they may be living in a place that is many leagues away.” Then the Buddha uttered the following verse (Dhp 304):

Dūre santo pakāsentī, himavanto va pabbato, asantettha na dissanti, rattiṃ khittā yathā sarā.

Merchant Anāthapiṇḍika, supporter of Jetavana! Though people, pure at heart and doers of good deeds, may stay many leagues away, they manifest themselves to my knowledge as does the Himavanta forest. Though foolish monks and lay persons exist near me, they never manifest themselves in the neighbourhood of my vision like the arrows shot in the darkness of four characteristics: midnight, moonless, in the heart of the forest and under an all cloudy sky.

By the end of the discourse, many people attained the fruition of Sotāpatti.

Knowing that the Buddha had accepted Cūḷa Subhaddā’s invitation, Sakka told Vissakamma to create 500 turreted flying vehicles in which the Buddha and his monks were to be taken to Ugga the next day. The next day, Vissakamma stood at the gate of the Jetavana monastery, after creating 500 flying vehicles. The Buddha took a batch of 500 choice Arahats as his entourage, and they, one seated in each vehicle, travelled by air to Ugga city.

Looking forward with his followers to the Buddha’s arrival, as instructed by his wise daughter-in-law Cūḷa Subhaddā, Ugga saw the Buddha coming with great glory. Overwhelmed by devotion, he welcomed and honoured the Buddha with flowers, scents, etc. After performing the alms giving, he invited the Buddha now and then and repeated his great offering for seven days.

The Buddha taught a Dhamma teaching that was suitable for Ugga. As a result, he and his wife, together with 84,000 beings, realized the four truths and became liberated.

In order to show his appreciation to Cūḷa Subhaddā, the Buddha told Ven. Anuruddha to stay behind in Ugga and he himself and the rest of the Arahats returned to Sāvattthī. From that day onwards the city of Ugga became a great centre of the faith and a city devoted to the Three Treasures.

A Brahmin with Wrong Views

Once, while residing at Jetavana in Sāvattthī, the Buddha taught a discourse beginning with (Dhp 216): Taṇhāya jāyatī soko, “grief arises from craving,” in connection with a certain Brahmin. The story in detail is as follows: One day, a Brahmin, a citizen of Sāvattthī, who held wrong views, was clearing a farm land near the river Aciravatī.

The Buddha came to know that he had performed in the past an act that would contribute to his attainment of the paths and fruitions. The Brahmin saw the Buddha but as he was of wrong views, he did not pay his respects to the Buddha, not even talking to him but keeping silent. The Buddha himself first addressed the Brahmin, [847] saying: “Brahmin what are you doing?” The Brahmin replied: “Gotama, I am clearing the farmland.” With only a few such words on the first day, the Buddha went away.

The next day, too, the Buddha went to the Brahmin and asked him what he was doing. The Brahmin replied that he was ploughing the field. After hearing this reply the Buddha went away.

Again, the next day and the following days, the Buddha asked the Brahmin what he was doing and he replied that he was sowing seeds, planting seedlings, weeding or looking after the field. The Buddha heard the Brahmin’s answers which were appropriate to his work and went away.

In this way, owing to the frequency of the Buddha’s visit, the Brahmin began to like the Buddha. Wanting to make the Buddha his friend he said: “Gotama, you have been visiting me since the day I cleared my farmland. If the farm yields good and abundant crops, I will share them with you. I will not consume them without giving you first. From today you have become my friend.”

Then one day the crop on the Brahmin’s field became ripe and mature and he decided to have them reaped the next day. But, while he was making preparations for the harvesting, heavy rain fell at night and swept away all the crops. So the whole farmland was destroyed and barren like a field with all its crops removed.

Since the very day of his first visit, the Buddha had foreseen that the crops would come to nothing. But, if he started visiting the Brahmin only after the destruction of the crops, his discourse would have fallen on deaf ears. He had, therefore, been visiting the Brahmin from the day when the latter cleared the field, in this way the Buddha hoped to gain the Brahmin’s confidence and that would make him receptive to the discourse to be given on the day when the crops were ruined.

The Brahmin went early to his field and seeing his farmland stark empty, he was overwhelmed with grief. “The monk Gotama has been visiting me since I cleared my field,” he thought, “I have told him that I will give him a share of the crops after harvesting, that I will not consume them all by myself, without giving him and that he has become my friend. Now my desire will remain unfulfilled.” So thinking, he returned home, ate nothing and lay down on his bed.

Then the Buddha went to the Brahmin’s house. When the Brahmin heard of the Buddha’s coming, he told the people in his house to bring his friend inside and to give him a seat. They did according to his instructions. The Buddha sat down and asked where the Brahmin was. They answered that he was lying on his bed in the room. Thereupon, he told them to bring the Brahmin. The Brahmin came and sat at a suitable distance. Then he asked the Brahmin what was wrong with him.

The Brahmin said: “Gotama! You have been visiting me ever since I cleared my farm land. I have promised to share the crops with you when they come out well. But now my desire cannot be fulfilled and I am overwhelmed with anguish. I do not even want to eat my meal.”

Then the Fortunate One asked: “Brahmin! Do you know why grief arises in you?” The Brahmin said: “I do not know, Gotama. But do you know?” The Fortunate

One replied: “Yes, I do. Grief and fear arises from craving.” Then the Buddha taught the following verse (Dhp 216):

Tañhāya jāyatī soko, tañhāya jāyatī bhayaṃ, tañhāya vippamuttassa, natthi soko kuto bhayaṃ.

Brahmin, grief arises from craving. From craving arises fear. There is not the least grief in a person who has become free from craving through [848] becoming an Arahāt. How can fear arise in him since he has repudiated it at the moment of attaining Non-returning (Anāgāmi-magga)?

At the end of the discourse, the Brahmin attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga).

Ven. Candābha

[The following is based on the Dhamma Verses (Dhp 413) and its commentary.]

While dwelling in Jetavana, in Sāvattihī city, the Buddha taught the verse beginning with (Dhp 413): Candaṃ va vimalaṃ suddhaṃ, “the Arahāt is free from the impurity of the five kinds of sensual pleasure,” in connection with Ven. Candābha.

Deed in the Past

The story in detail: Long ago, a trader in Bārāṇasī planned to go to a border country to collect fragrant sandalwood. So he took a lot of garments and ornaments to the border country. There, he camped near the gate of a village and asked the cowherds in the wood: “Boys, is there somebody who works at the foot of the hill?” The cowherds said: “Yes.” He asked again: “What is his name?” When they gave the man’s name, he also asked the names of the man’s wife and children. When they gave their names, he asked further the locality of man’s home. The cowherds gave their answers with honesty.

Acting on the information given by the cowherds, the trader went in a small cart to the house of the forest worker. He stepped down, went into the house and called the housewife by her name. Thinking that the visitor was one of their relatives, the woman quickly came out and gave him a seat. The trader sat down, and mentioning the name of her husband, he asked: “Where is my friend?” She replied: “Sir, your friend has gone to the forest.” Then he asked her about the children, mentioning their names and referring to them as “son” and “daughter.”

35c: More Stories about Wrong View – 1240

He gave her garments and ornaments as presents for her husband and children. The housewife served the trader hospitably with very good food. When her husband returned from the forest, she told him about the guest, how he had inquired about their children by name and how he had given her presents for the whole family. The worker became intimate with the trader and dutifully did all that was necessary for the guest.

Then in the evening the trader sat on the bed and asked the forest worker: “What objects do you find abundantly at the foot of the hill while you are wandering there.” The forester said: “I do not find anything extraordinary other than the trees with red branches that are plentiful.” The trader asked him whether he found such trees abundantly and the forester assured him that the trees abounded. “In that case, please show me those trees.” Then, led by the forester, the trader went into the forest, cut down the red sandalwood trees and came back with 500 cart-loads of sandalwood. He gave the forester his address in Bārāṇasī and said: “I would like you to come to my place. You are always welcome. When you come, I want you to bring only those trees. I want no present other than the trees with red branches.” After speaking warmly out of friendship, the trader returned to Bārāṇasī.

In accordance with the trader’s instruction, the forest worker brought only red sandalwood whenever he went to see the trader. The trader was grateful for his kindness and gave much gold and silver.

On another occasion, after the passing away (Parinibbāna) of the Buddha Kassapa and the construction of a great relic shrine (stūpa), the forester came to his friend, the Bārāṇasī trader, with a lot of sandalwood. The trader had the sandalwood pounded, filled the bowl with it and said to his friend: “Come, friend, let us go to the great shrine before the meal is ready. We will honour the shrine and come back.” So saying he took his friend to the shrine and honoured it with an offering of sandalwood powder. His friend, the forest worker, too honoured the shrine by making the shape of a moon with red sandalwood powder on the bell shape part of the shrine.

This forest worker was the future Ven. Candābha. This above act of honouring [849] was his only good deed in the past that contributed to his attainment of the paths and fruitions.

On his death, the forest worker was reborn in the Deva realm and after passing his time during the whole interval between the two Buddhas, he was reborn in an affluent Brahmin family in Rājagaha in the time of Buddha Gotama. From the navel of the young Brahmin there came out white, brilliant light like that of the full moon. So his parents and relatives named him Candābha, master moonlight.

This emission of the whole bright light like the full moon was the result of his honour done to Buddha Kassapa shrine with a sandalwood powder shaped like the moon.

The Brahmins decided to take the child round and make money by deceiving the people. They made the child sit in a vehicle and wandered about the whole Jambudīpa, boasting that those who stroked the youth's body with their hands would acquire much wealth. Only those who could pay 100 or 1,000 pieces of money were allowed to stroke the child.

In the course of their wanderings, the Brahmins came to Sāvattihī and stayed in a place between the city and the Jetavana monastery. In the morning, fifty million noble, virtuous men gave alms, and in the afternoon, they went to Jetavana with scents, flowers, robes, medicines, etc. to listen to the Dhamma.

Seeing these people, the Brahmin asked them where they were off to. "We are going to hear the Fortunate One's discourse," answered the noble, virtuous men. Then the Brahmin said: "Come friend, what's the use of going to that Fortunate One. There is no power like that of our Candābha. Certainly, those who stroke his body will have such and such benefits. Come and see Candābha."

Candābha Taken to the Monastery

The good people said: "What kind of power does the Brahmin Candābha possess? Our teacher the Fortunate One is the most powerful being in the world." Being unable to give a final decision on the issue by themselves, they at last agreed to go to the monastery and see the powers of the Fortunate One and of the Brahmin. So they went to the monastery taking the Brahmin Candābha.

As soon as the Brahmin came near him, the Buddha resolved to make the moonlight that emitted from the Brahmin's navel disappear. The Brahmin became something like a small crow in a basket of charcoal. When the Brahmin was taken away from the Buddha, the light from his navel reappeared and when he was taken back to the Buddha, the light vanished as before. This occurred three times and Candābha wondered whether the Buddha knew any mantra that could dispel the light and he asked the Buddha accordingly.

The Buddha said: “Yes, I know it.” The Brahmin requested: “In that case please teach me the mantra.” The Buddha replied that he could not teach it to anyone who was not a monk. Then the Brahmin told his companions: “I will become the greatest man in the whole of Jambudīpa after learning this mantra. You wait for me in your lodgings in this city. I will learn the mantra within two or three days after ordination.” Having thus cheered up his friends he went back to the Buddha, asked for ordination and became a monk.

Then the Buddha taught Ven. Candābha contemplation of the 32 parts of the body (dvattiṃsākāra-kammaṭṭhāna). Then Ven. Candābha asked the Buddha what head-hair (kesa), body-hair (loma), etc. meant. The Buddha said: “That contemplation is preliminary (parikamma) to learning the mantra. You should recite it.”

The other Brahmins came occasionally and asked him if he had learnt the mantra. Ven. Candābha answered that he had not and that he was still reciting the preliminary. In this way [850] through the contemplation of the 32 parts of the body, Ven. Candābha developed concentration, then practised insight meditation (vipassanā) and within two or three days he became an Arahāt. When the Brahmins came and inquired about him, he told them clearly and decisively: “Go away! It is now not possible for me to return to the worldly life.”

On hearing his words, other monks reported to the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha! This Ven. Candābha has falsely claimed to be an Arahāt.” The Buddha said: “Monks! Now, my son, the monk Candābha, is an Arahāt with all his pollutants (āsava) extinct. He speaks only the truth.” Then the Buddha uttered the following verse (Dhp 413):

Candaṃ va vimalaṃ suddhaṃ, vippasannaṃ-anāvilāṃ, nandī-bhava-parikkhāṇaṃ, tam-ahaṃ brūmi brāhmaṇaṃ.

Monks! The Arahāt is free from the impurity of the five kinds of sensual pleasure; pure, spotless and clear like the flying mansion of the moon, free from all defilements and craving for the three kinds of existence. Such an Arahāt, I call a true Brahmin, as he really and naturally is.

By the end of the Discourse many people attained Stream-entry fruition and higher levels.

Māra's Temptation

[The following is based on the Dhamma Verses (Dhp 331-333) and their commentary.]

The Buddha taught the discourse beginning with (Dhp 331): Atthamhi jātamhi sukhā sahāyā, “when there is any kind of understanding, friends are a source of happiness” in connection with Māra who came to tempt him to be a king.

The detailed account is as follows: Once the Buddha was dwelling in a small forest hermitage on the slopes of the Himālayas, in Kosala country. At that time, the kings still enforced their rule by oppressing the people. The Buddha saw the people in the countries of tyrants being ill-treated through various kinds of unlawful taxation and punishment. Being moved with pity, the Buddha wondered whether it was possible for one to be a good ruler without killing by oneself or through another person, without bringing about damage or loss of citizen's property by oneself or through another person, and without making one grieve by oneself or through another person.

Māra knew what was passing through the Buddha's mind and he thought: “Now, the monk Gotama is considering the possibility of being a ruler. Perhaps, now he wants to be a king. Kingship is a cause of negligence. If the monk Gotama becomes a king, I will have the opportunity to molest him. I will now go and make the monk Gotama try for kingship.” So thinking, he approached the Fortunate One and said: “Exalted Buddha, let the Glorious One be a king! Let the one who utters good words become a righteous king who does not kill by himself nor through another person, who does not bring about damage or loss of other's property by himself or through another person and who does not make others grieve by himself or through another person.”

Thus Māra lured the Buddha. The Fortunate One said: “Wicked Māra! What do you see in me that makes you speak to me like this?” Māra replied: “Exalted Buddha, you have thoroughly and effectively developed the four foundations of supernormal power (iddhipāda). If your mind is inclined to turn the great Himālayas into gold, it will certainly become solid gold. If you act lawfully as a king, I will support you in all matters that require gold or silver.” Then the Fortunate One uttered the following verse (SN 4.20):

Pabbatassa suvaṇṇassa, jāta-rūpassa kevalo, dvittā va nālam-ekassa, iti vidvā samañcare.

There may be a big mountain that is made up of pure gold unmixed with copper, iron, lead, or other minerals. Let alone such a mountain of gold, [851] even a gold mountain that is twice as high as the Himālayas cannot satisfy the craving of a person. The wise man who understands the nature of craving should steadfastly and diligently practise the ten good deeds in thought, speech and deed.

Yo dukkham-adakkhi yato-nidānaṃ, kāmesu so jantu kathaṃ nameyya, upadhiṃ viditvā saṅgoti loke, tasseva jantu vinayāya sikkhe.

If a man knows clearly that all kinds of suffering have their source in the five kinds of sensual objects, why should he be inclined to see anything good in them? In this world, a man who clearly sees sensuality as a substratum (upadhi) of existence that is bound with greed, hatred, ignorance, conceit and false beliefs, should devote himself to the threefold training in morality, concentration and wisdom in order to overcome sensual desire.

After startling Māra with these verses, the Buddha said: “Wicked Māra, your teaching is one thing while my teaching is another; you teach to strive to enjoy sense objects and sense pleasures while I stress the need for eradicating them. Certainly, by no means is it possible to enter into a doctrinal discussion with you. I teach as follows.” Then the Buddha taught the following verses (Dhp 331-333):

Atthamhi jātamhi sukhā sahāyā, tuṭṭhī sukhā yā itarītarena, puññaṃ sukhaṃ jīvita-saṅkhayamhi, sabbassa dukkhassa sukhaṃ pahānaṃ.

In this world, when there is any kind of understanding, friends are a source of happiness, contentment with whatever is available is the source of happiness, when one is dying, good deeds are a source of happiness. Awakening, which means the total abandoning of the whole round of suffering inherent in the life cycle, is the source of happiness.

Here the cause of happiness is described as happiness in the sense of being the source (phalupatti). The same may be said of the following verses. This verse mentions four causes of happiness.

Sukhā matteyyatā loke, atho petteyyatā sukhā, sukhā sāmāññatā loke, atho brahmaññatā sukhā.

In this world, supporting one's mother is a source of happiness, so is supporting one's father, giving alms respectively to recluses, monks and wandering ascetics is also a source of happiness. Moreover, giving gladly and respectively to the Buddhas, Paccakabuddhas and to noble disciples is a source of happiness.

This verse also shows four sources of happiness.

Sukham yāva jarā-sīlam, sukhā saddhā patiṭṭhitā, sukho paññāya paṭilābho, pāpānaṃ akaraṇaṃ sukham.

The good moral life involving the observance of the five, eight or ten precepts is good and productive of happiness until old age when one's hair turns grey, teeth fall out and the skin becomes wrinkled.

Ruby earring, red garments, etc. are congenial to people only at a certain age. Young [852] people's garments are not congenial to adults and vice versa. An adult wearing the garment of a young man or vice versa will cause criticism and gives one the impression of being crazy. But morality comprising the observance of the five or ten precepts is congenial to young or old people alike in the three phases of life. A morally good person earns the approbation of other people that is pleasant and delightful to him.

Unwaveringly established faith, mundane and supermundane, is a source of happiness. So is the ability to acquire mundane and supermundane wisdom by diligence. Complete abstinence from doing evil deeds is another source of happiness. This verse also shows another set of four sources of happiness. By the end of the discourse, millions of Devas realized the four truths and became liberated.

35d: Ambaṭṭha and His Pupil Pokkharasāti

[The following is based on the Discourse to Ambaṭṭha (Ambaṭṭha-sutta, DN 3) and its commentary.]

One day at dawn the Buddha surveyed the world of living beings and there appeared the Brahmin Pokkharasāti within the range of his omniscience. After further reflection the Buddha saw the former good deeds of the Brahmin that would contribute to his attainment of the Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga). The Buddha also foresaw that: “When I go to the Icchānaṅgala region, the Brahmin teacher Pokkharasāti will send his the young Brahmin Ambaṭṭha to inquire about my major and minor marks. Ambaṭṭha will hold a debate with me, uttering all kinds of foolish words. I must admonish him and dispel the poison of his pride. He will report the matter to his teacher. When his teacher hears his word, he will come to me and examine my marks. I will then teach the Brahmin Pokkharasāti, who will attain Stream-entry (Sotāpatti) at the end of my teaching.”

With this foreknowledge, the Buddha journeyed to Kosala kingdom with 500 monks and on arriving at the Brahmin village of Icchānaṅgala in Kosala, the Buddha dwelt in a huge nearby grove at Icchānaṅgala.

At that time the Brahmin Pokkharasāti was appointed as city administrator by King Pasenadi Kosala, and he administered the populous city of Ukkaṭṭha which abounded in grass, firewood, water, rice and paddy.

The commentary says: When the city was about to be founded its site was marked under the light of torches and firebrands, hence the name of the city, Ukkaṭṭha (it means elevated, besides other meanings).

About the Brahmin Pokkharasāti: In the time of Buddha Kassapa he was a Brahmin well-versed in the three Vedas. After giving alms and hearing the Dhamma, he was reborn in the Deva realm.

When he died in the Deva realm and was reborn in the human abode in the moisture of a Paduma lotus in a big lake near the Himavanta. A recluse, having built a hermitage near the lake, was living there. While standing near the lake, he saw the big lotus bud and thought to himself: “This big lotus bud is much bigger than others. When it blossoms, I will take it.”

The lotus did not blossom even after a week. The recluse became impatient and stepping into the lake, he plucked it. As soon as it was broken from the stalk, the bud opened. Then to his surprise, the recluse found in the flower a baby boy, silvery white and covered with pollen all over his body, like a silver statue with gold dust scattered all over.

The recluse thought: “This child will become a great man. I will look after him from now.” He took the child to the hermitage, raised him and began to teach him the three Vedas when he was seven years old. The boy became a very famous Brahmin teacher who was an authority in the three Vedas. Later on, the Brahmin [853] teacher demonstrated his knowledge to King Kosala. The king, having a high opinion of his knowledge, offered him the post of administrator of Ukkaṭṭha city. He was known as Pokkharasāti because he was conceived in a lotus-flower (pokkhara).

The Brahmin’s body had the colour of a white lotus flower and was splendid like a silver post set up at the gate of a celestial city. His head had the dark blue colour of sapphire. His beard appeared like a dark line drawn on the surface of the moon. The eyes were like a blue lotus flower and the nose was quite clean and round like a silver tube. His palms, soles and lips seemed well tainted with lacquer. The Brahmin’s body was very beautiful. He was fit to be made a king in a place where there was no ruler. Such was the splendour of the Brahmin. Because of his resemblance to a white lotus, he was called Pokkharasāti.

Like the Brahmin Verañja mentioned earlier, Pokkharasāti heard the news about the attributes of the Buddha. He has a residential pupil, named Ambaṭṭha, a young Brahmin who was also well-versed in the three Vedas and various other sacred books, and worthy of being a Brahmin teacher himself, he held Ambaṭṭha in high esteem and ranked him as his peer.

Pokkharasāti told his pupil, Ambaṭṭha, about the reported virtues of the Buddha and said: “Dear son Ambaṭṭha, go to the monk Gotama and enquire whether the reports that are going round are true or not, and whether he is true to his fame or not. The 32 marks of a great man are explicitly mentioned in our Vedas. For a great man who possesses these marks, there are only two possibilities: If he leads a worldly life, he will become a Universal Monarch, the ruler of the four continents; or if he leads an ascetic life, he will become a Buddha. My dear son Ambaṭṭha, I have taught you the Vedas and you have learnt them from me.”

As an intelligent Brahmin, Pokkharasāti thought: “In this world, there are many people like Purāṇa Kassapa and others who go about claiming to be Buddhas, so it is not advisable for me to associate with a teacher merely from hearsay. Certainly, it is hard to dissociate oneself from some person if one has become associated with them. Besides, such an attempt may be harmful to one's welfare, so it is good to send my disciple and find out whether the monk Gotama is a Buddha before I myself go and see him." So Pokkharasāti sent his disciple Ambaṭṭha.

Then having risen and paid respect to his teacher, Ambaṭṭha said: "Very well, master," and went to Icchānaṅgala grove with many other young men in his teacher's chariot that was drawn by a mule. He went as far as the chariot could travel in the grove, then got off the chariot near the gate and entered the monastery on foot. It was then noon.

At that time, several monks who engaged in meditation were walking to and fro on the ground in the open air. Ambaṭṭha went to the monks and said: "Friends, where is the monk Gotama now? We have come to this place to see the monk Gotama."

Then the monks thought to themselves: "This youth Ambaṭṭha is of a well-known family. He is also a pupil of the famous Pokkharasāti. For the Fortunate One, it should not be burdensome to converse with such a son of a good family."

So they said to Ambaṭṭha: "Approach quietly that lodging with the closed doors. Enter the frontage slowly and after coughing, knock at the door. The Fortunate One will open the door for you."

Then Ambaṭṭha went and knocked at the door as instructed by the monks. The Buddha opened the door. Ambaṭṭha entered the building followed by the other young men. They exchanged pleasant words with the Buddha and sat in suitable places.

The Buddha did not get up and open the door by himself. In fact, he stretched his hand, resolving that the door should be opened. Then the door opened by itself, as if it were saying: "Venerable sir! You, who have given alms for millions of aeons (kappa), have not done the kind of deeds (kamma) that would make you open the door [854] with your hands."

This opening of the door by itself, as resolved upon by the Buddha, is expressed by: Vivari Bhagavā dvāram in Pāḷi, which is simply translated as "the Buddha opened the door."

Ambaṭṭha's Behaviour

The young Ambaṭṭha was not impressed by the splendour of the Buddha's body. Bent on threatening him, he unfastened the strip of cloth tied on his chest and let it hang down loose on his neck. Holding the edge of his waist-cloth with one hand, he got onto the promenade and sometimes walked there, sometimes stood, sometimes showed his arm, sometimes showed his chest, sometimes showed his back, sometimes made a rude gesture with his hands, and sometimes made ugly facial expressions such as grimaces, saying: “Gotama! Are you quite well? Do you get your food without any hardship? It is apparently not hard for you to get food. Certainly, all your physical features are robust and very impressive. Wherever you go, people adore you very much as a monk belonging to a royal family or as a Buddha, and give the choicest and most nourishing food. Friends, look at the abode of Gotama! It is like an extraordinary hall. It looks like a celestial mansion. Look at his bed and his pillow! For a man who lives in such a good place, how can it be possible to experience any hardship in leading a monastic life!” Thus Ambaṭṭha spoke only derisive words and ungentlemanly words that would be bitter and painful forever to ordinary people.

Then the Buddha thought: “This young Ambaṭṭha spends his energy irrelevantly like a man who stretches his hand up to grasp Bhavagga, the highest Brahma abode, or like a man who stretches his legs to wander in the Avīci hell or like a man who wants to swim across the great ocean or like a man who wants to climb Mount Meru. I will now talk with him.” So thinking, the Buddha said to Ambaṭṭha: “You speak to me disrespectfully and bitterly in a way that is unacceptable to good people. Do you speak to the aged Brahmin teachers and their teachers in the same way?”

“No, Gotama, I do not speak to them in this way. When a Brahmin wants to speak to a walking teacher, he speaks while walking. If he wants to speak to a standing teacher, he speaks while standing. If he wants to speak to a sitting teacher, he speaks while sitting. If he wants to speak to a teacher who is lying down, he has to speak while lying down.”

Monks Denounced as Low Caste

Herein a Brahmin usually spoke to his teacher only while walking, standing and sitting. But Ambaṭṭha was so arrogant that he mentioned the lying posture.

So the Buddha said: “Ambaṭṭha, a walking Brahmin pupil may speak to a walking Brahmin teacher, a standing Brahmin pupil may speak to a standing Brahmin teacher, a sitting Brahmin teacher may speak to a sitting Brahmin teacher. Such behaviour, all Brahmin teachers approve of. But you speak while lying down to your teacher who is also lying down. In that case, you are indeed like an ox. Is your teacher then an ox and you also an ox?”

Then Ambaṭṭha became very angry and said: “Gotama! With the dark, low-caste, vile and bare-headed monks who sprang from the instep of Brahma, I speak in the same way as I now speak to you.” Thus he disparaged the Buddha using the word low-caste for the first time.

Herein, according to Ambaṭṭha, Brahmins sprang from the mouth of the Brahma, princes from the chest, merchants from the navel, labourers from the knees and monks from the instep. Believing thus, Ambaṭṭha ranked the monks as men of the lowest caste and though he made no reference in his speech, it was intended to insult the Buddha.

Then the Buddha thought: “Since this young Ambaṭṭha came here, he has spoken to me only with conceit motivating his remarks. Like a man who grasps a very poisonous snake by the neck or who embraces a big fire or who holds the trunk of a bull-elephant in a rut, he [855] does not know his capacity. I will now let him know it.”

So the Buddha said: “Ambaṭṭha, you came here for some purpose. You should be mindful of the purpose for which you came here. Without having any real intelligence as yet, you consider yourself already intelligent. There is nothing but lack of intelligence to account for the way you behave and speak to me.”

Here the first statement means: “Your teacher has sent you here not for insulting, but for some other purpose. So now mind the business you are sent for.” After reminding Ambaṭṭha of the etiquette to be observed by visitors, the Buddha made the second statement to snub him.

Resentful and displeased with the Buddha’s reference to his lack of intelligence, Ambaṭṭha decided to censure the Buddha in the presence of his companions and said: “Gotama! The Sakyan princes are arrogant, rough, small-hearted, talkative and if they do not revere, adore, honour or bow down to the Brahmins it is downright improper.” Thus Ambaṭṭha spoke in contempt of the Sakyan princes.

Then the Buddha asked Ambaṭṭha how the Sakyan princes had wronged him. Ambaṭṭha replied: “Gotama, I once went to Kapilavatthu city to do some business for my teacher Pokkharasāti. I visited the Assembly Hall of the Sakyan princes. At that time, many Sakyan kings, who have been anointed as princes, who have not been anointed yet, were tickling one another, laughing uproariously and playing boisterously while seated on a raised platform in the hall. In fact, they seemed to be laughing only at me. Nobody offered me a seat, Gotama! Not to revere, adore, honour or bow down to the Brahmin on the part of low-caste Sakyan princes is downright improper.” Thus Ambaṭṭha denounced the Buddha for the second time using the word, low-caste.

The Sakyan princes sneered at Ambaṭṭha because they know his ancestry. He arrived like one intoxicated with pride, his shoulder-bone bent and one hand holding the edge of his waistcloth that hung loosely down to his feet. They tickled one another, laughed and played boisterously saying: “Look folks! There comes Ambaṭṭha, a descendant of our slave, Kaṇhāyana.” Ambaṭṭha also knew his ancestry and so he considered rightly that the princes were laughing only at him.

Then the Buddha said: “Ambaṭṭha, even a skylark can chirp as much as it likes in her nest. Kapilavatthu is the city of Sakyan princes. You should not have a grudge over such a trivial matter.”

When the Buddha cited the simile of the skylark, Ambaṭṭha thought that the Buddha was free from conceit since he linked his relatives to the skylark and the Brahmins to the goose (hamsa), crane and peacock. So Ambaṭṭha went on to mention the four assemblies of people, saying: “Friend Gotama, there are four assemblies of people: kings, Brahmins, merchants and labourers. Of these four classes, the kings, merchants and labourers are in fact servants of the Brahmins. So, friend Gotama, not revering, adoring, honouring or bowing down to the Brahmins on the part of the low-caste Sakyan princes is downright improper.” Thus Ambaṭṭha belittled the Sakyan princes for the third time with the word, low-caste.

Origin of the Sakyans

As Ambaṭṭha persisted in denouncing the Sakyan princes as low-caste people, the Buddha decided to ask him about his clan. So the Buddha said: “Ambaṭṭha, of what clan are you?” Ambaṭṭha, shouted three times: “Gotama, I am of Kaṇha clan.”

Herein, Ambaṭṭha knew the impurity of the Kaṇha clan superficially. But he did not know the previous life of Kaṇha. Owing to his ignorance he thought that the Buddha could not say anything and he made the above remark because of his [856] arrogance.

Then the Buddha explained to Ambaṭṭha the lineage of Sakyan princes and the origin of the Kaṇha clan: “Ambaṭṭha, if you trace back your genealogy, you will find that the Sakyan princes are the sons of lords and that you are the son of their slave-woman. Ambaṭṭha, the Sakyan princes regard King Okkāka as their grandfather. Long ago King Okkāka had a young queen whom he loved very much. Wishing to give his kingdom to her son, he sent into exile his elder sons called Okkākumha, Karakaṇḍa, Hatthinika and Sinisūra.

Their elder and younger sisters: Piṇḍā, Sappiṇḍā, Ānandā, Vijitā and Vijitasenā, these five princesses also accompanied the princes with the permission of the king.

The exiled princes founded a city in a teak forest near a lake on the fringe of the Himavanta. They married their sisters in order to preserve the purity of their family.

Ambaṭṭha, King Okkāka asked his ministers where his sons lived. They reported to him that the princes had founded a city in the teak forest, near a lake on the Himavanta and that they had married their sisters to preserve the purity of their family.

Ambaṭṭha! King Okkāka exclaimed then: ‘My sons are so able. They are so able!’ in allusion to that exclamation the princes were known as Sakyan, or able ones. King Okkāka was the prototype of the Sakyan princes.

Origin of Kaṇha Clan

Ambaṭṭha, King Okkāka had a slave woman named Disā. She gave birth to a son called Kaṇha. Immediately after his birth, Kaṇha said: ‘Mother, cleanse me! Bathe me! Free me from this impurity! I will be one who can do good to you.’

Ambaṭṭha, just as nowadays, people call a Yakkha a Pisāca, so also in those days people gave the name Kaṇha to Yakkhas. They talked about the slave-woman’s son: ‘This child spoke soon after his birth. So he is a Kaṇha (Yakkha).’ The Kaṇha clansmen were known as Kaṇhāyana after the saying: ‘That Kaṇha was the progenitor of the Kaṇha clan.’ Ambaṭṭha, if you trace back your ancestry, you will find that the Sakyan princes are the sons of the lord, while you are the son of their slave-woman.”

When the Buddha spoke thus, the young men who had come along with Ambaṭṭha, said together: “Gotama! Do not disparage Ambaṭṭha so severely with the word: ‘Son of a slave-woman.’ Ambaṭṭha is well-born, a young man of good family, well-informed, skilful in speaking and wise. He is competent to challenge and refute you in connection with your use of the word: ‘Son of a slave-woman.’ ”

Herein the outcry of these young men was designed merely to absolve themselves of blame before their teacher. In their view, Ambaṭṭha was the top disciple of their teacher. If they did not put in a word for him in his dispute with the Buddha, he would make such a report as would make his teacher displeased with them. So thinking, they supported Ambaṭṭha so as to be free from censure. They secretly wanted him to be snubbed. Indeed because of his arrogance they naturally hated him.

Then the Buddha thought: “If these young men, seated there keep talking loudly, I will not come to the end of my speech. I will silence them and talk only with Ambaṭṭha.” So the Buddha said to them: “Young men! If you believe that because Ambaṭṭha is low born, not of good family, ill-informed, not skilful in speaking and devoid of wisdom, he is not competent to refute the monk Gotama, then leave him alone. It rests only with you to argue with me about the matter. But if you think that Ambaṭṭha is well-born, of good family, well-informed, skilful in speaking and wise and competent to argue [857] with me about this matter, then you keep quiet. Let Ambaṭṭha argue with me.”

Then the young men thought: “Ambaṭṭha dare not raise his head again after it was said about him being the son of a slave-woman. This matter of birth is inscrutable. If the monk Gotama tells someone that he is a slave, who will be able to challenge and contend with the monk Gotama? Let Ambaṭṭha rid himself of the burden that is of his own making.” So wishing to wash their hands of the matter and put the responsibility on Ambaṭṭha, they said to the Buddha evasively: “Friend Gotama! Ambaṭṭha is well-born, of good family, well-informed, skilful in speaking and wise. He is competent to rebut your use of the word about being the son of a slave-woman. We will keep quiet. Let Ambaṭṭha refute you.”

The Buddha now asked Ambaṭṭha: “Ambaṭṭha, here is a reasonable question for you. You will have to answer it although you do not wish to do so. If you do not answer it thoroughly or speak evasively or keep silent or go away, then your head will break into seven pieces on the spot.

Ambaṭṭha, what do you think of the question I now ask? What have you heard from old Brahmin teachers and their predecessors about it? How did the Kaṇha clan originate? Who was the ancestor of the Kaṇha clans?” When the Buddha asked him thus, Ambaṭṭha remained silent.

His silence was the outcome of this thought: “The monk Gotama wants me to admit verbally myself that I am the son of a slave-woman. If I do so, then I will certainly be a son of a slave-woman. If the monk Gotama asks me twice or thrice and I refuse to answer him, he will say nothing and then I will go away.”

For a second time the Buddha asked him: “Ambaṭṭha! What do you think of the question I will now ask? What have you heard from old Brahmin teachers and their predecessors? How did the Kaṇha clansmen originate? Who was their ancestor?” But Ambaṭṭha remained silent.

Then the Buddha said: “Ambaṭṭha, now it is not the time for you to remain silent. If a man refuses to answer a reasonable question which the Buddha asks him thrice, then his head will break into seven pieces on the spot.”

At that moment, Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, came and stood in the air above Ambaṭṭha in the form of a Yakkha with a glowing and blazing iron hammer in his hand, threatening to break Ambaṭṭha’s head into seven pieces on the spot, if he refused to answer the reasonable question which the Buddha asked him thrice. Sakka in the form of a Yakkha was visible only to the Buddha and Ambaṭṭha.

Herein it may be asked why did Sakka come. The answer is he came in order to make Ambaṭṭha discard his false belief, or, in the above section when Brahma Sahampati requested the Buddha to proclaim the Dhamma, Sakka, who was with the Brahma, said: “Venerable sir, you do the teaching, we will make disobedient and defiant people obey you. Let your authority be the Dhamma, ours will be the command.” In accordance with his pledge, Sakka came to scare Ambaṭṭha and force him to answer the Buddha’s question.

With regard to the statement “Sakka, in the form of a Yakkha, was visible only to the Buddha and Ambaṭṭha,” it should be explained that if he were seen by other people as well, those who saw Sakka would have a poor impression of the Buddha. They would say contemptuously that the Buddha showed the Yakkha to Ambaṭṭha because the latter would not accept his doctrine and that the young Brahmin had to speak reluctantly and under duress.

As soon as he saw the Yakkha, Ambaṭṭha’s body sweated profusely. He felt his whole stomach was moving up and down making a terrible sound. He scrutinized his companions [858] but he did not see any sign of fear in them. He thought: “I am the only person threatened by this Yakkha. If I tell them about the Yakkha, they will say: ‘Do you alone have the eyes to see a Yakkha? You did not see a Yakkha before. You see him only when you find yourself at your wit’s end in your dispute with the monk Gotama! Now there is no one other than the monk Gotama for my refuge.’” Thus frightened with his hair standing on end, Ambaṭṭha approached the Buddha, sat at a lower place and said: “What did friend Gotama ask, let friend Gotama ask it again.”

The Buddha then asked him for the last time: “Ambaṭṭha, what do you think of my question? What have you heard from your old teachers and their predecessors? How did the Kaṇha clansmen originate? Who were their ancestors?”

Then Ambaṭṭha made his confession: “Friend Gotama! I have heard what you said from my old Brahmin teachers and their predecessors: Kaṇha clansmen have their origin in Kaṇha, the son of the slave-woman. That Kaṇha was their ancestor.”

Ambaṭṭha’s confession caused an uproar among the other young Brahmins. They shouted: “Friend, it is said that Ambaṭṭha is low born, not of a good family, and the son of the Sakyan princes’ slave-woman. The Sakyan princes are said to be the sons of the masters of Ambaṭṭha. We have misunderstood the monk Gotama and blamed him, whereas in fact, he is a speaker of the truth (Dhamma-vādi).”

Then the Buddha thought: “These young men are humiliating Ambaṭṭha severely with the word: ‘Son of a slave-woman.’ I had better set Ambaṭṭha free from such a humiliation.”

So he said: “Young men! Do not humiliate Ambaṭṭha severely with the word: ‘Son of a slave-woman!’ That Kaṇha was a powerful recluse. He went to the region south of the river Ganges and after having learnt the holy mantras he approached King Okkāka and asked for his daughter, Maddarūpī’s hand in marriage.

King Okkāka said: “This recluse, Kaṇha, is the son of my slave-woman and yet he is asking for my daughter. What kind of a man is he?” Furious and displeased, he bent his bow but he could not shoot the arrow nor could he withdraw it. Then the ministers approached the recluse and begged him to save the king. Kaṇha said that the king would be safe but he threatened that if the king dropped the arrow, the earth in the whole kingdom would be destroyed.

Herein, the recluse Kaṇha went to the region south of the Ganges as a layman and while serving a Brahmin recluse, he obtained from that recluse a mantra for obstructing arrows. Then he donned the robe of a recluse, came to King Okkāka, asked for the latter's daughter and when the irate king bent his bow to kill him, he obstructed the arrow with his spell. The spell had the power only to obstruct the arrow. Kaṇha's reference to the destruction of earth was an empty threat, merely a lie. The same may be said of his other threats.

The ministers again begged him to save the king and the country. He said that the king and the country would be safe but again he lied that if the king dropped the arrow, there would be no rain in the whole kingdom for seven days.

Again the ministers begged him to spare the king and the country and make the rain fall. He said that both the king and the country would be safe and it would rain but he said that if the arrow were directed at the elder son, he would be safe without a hair standing on end. Kaṇha said this only after making the king promise to give his daughter.

Young men, the ministers then reported to King Okkāka. The king directed the [859] arrow at his eldest son and the prince was safe, and free from fear, without a hair standing on end. Then he threatened him with the weapon of the mantra, and King Okkāka became frightened, his hair stood up; and having made Kaṇha wash his head, he released him from slavery, and gave his daughter Maddarūpī.

Young men, do not humiliate Ambaṭṭha severely with the word: 'Son of a slave-woman.' That Kaṇha was a powerful recluse.

The Buddha gave his account of Kaṇha, saying that Ambaṭṭha was somewhat akin to the Sakyan princes on his side and thereby he consoled the young Ambaṭṭha. Like a man on whom water is poured, Ambaṭṭha felt much relieved as his worry about his social status had been washed away. He became conceited, thinking that the Buddha had affirmed his kinship to the royal family, being a noble (khattiya) on his mother's side.

The Nobles

Ambaṭṭha considered himself a member of the ruling class, not knowing that he was not a real prince. So the Buddha decided to disillusion him and in order to explain the meaning of noble (khattiya) he further engaged in the following dialogue with the young man.

“Ambaṭṭha, now what do you think of the question that I will ask you? Suppose in this world a man of a noble family marries a woman of Brahmin family. As a result of their marriage a son is born. Will the son born of that couple receive priority among the Brahmins in regards to seat and water?”

When Ambaṭṭha answered: “Yes, Gotama, he may receive it,” the Buddha said again: “May the Brahmins serve that man at the feast in memory of the dead, the wedding feast, the feast at a sacrificial ceremony and at the feast given to guests?”

When Ambaṭṭha answered: “Yes, Gotama, they may serve him,” the Buddha asked again: “May the Brahmins teach or may they not teach him the Vedas?”

When Ambaṭṭha answered: “Yes, Gotama, they may teach him,” the Buddha asked again: “May the Brahmin forbid or may he not forbid his marriage with a Brahmin woman?”

When Ambaṭṭha answered: “No, Gotama, they may not forbid,” the Buddha, clinching the argument, asked: “May the royal family consecrate him a king?”

“No Gotama,” replied Ambaṭṭha reasonably, “they may not consecrate him because his mother is not a member of a noble (khattiya) family.”

Here, in this section Ambaṭṭha answered that a son of a noble father and a Brahmin mother is not crowned king because of the low birth of the mother, so also is the son born of a Brahmin father and a noble mother because of the low birth of the father. The Buddha made this clear in his further dialogue with Ambaṭṭha.

Buddha: “Ambaṭṭha! What do you think of the question which I will now ask you? Suppose, in this world, a Brahmin marries a Khattiya woman and a son is born of this marriage. May their son receive priority among the Brahmins in respect of seat and water?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes, Gotama, he may.”

Buddha: “May the Brahmins serve him at the feast in memory of the dead?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes, Gotama, they may.”

Buddha: “May they teach him the Vedas or may they not?”

35d: Ambaṭṭha and his pupil Pokkharasāti – 1258

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes, Gotama, they may.”

Buddha: “May they forbid his marriage with a Brahmin woman?”

Ambaṭṭha: “No, Gotama, they may not.”

Buddha: “May the nobles consecrate him king?” [860]

Ambaṭṭha: “No, Gotama, they may not, because the father is not a noble.”

Buddha: “So, Ambaṭṭha, if you compare a man with man or woman with a woman, you will find that the nobles (khattiya) are superior and that the Brahmins are inferior.”

The following is a different dialogue between the Buddha and Ambaṭṭha to show the superiority of the nobles and the inferiority of the Brahmins.

Buddha: “Ambaṭṭha! What do think of the question which I will now ask you? Suppose in this world, a Brahmin is exiled from the country or the city by other Brahmins for a certain offence, with his head shaved and ashes sprinkled over him. May that exiled Brahmin receive priority among the Brahmins in respect of seat and water?”

Ambaṭṭha: “No, Gotama, he may not.”

Buddha: “May the Brahmins serve that exiled Brahmin at the feast in memory of the dead, at the wedding feast, at the sacrificial feast and at the rest given to guests?”

Ambaṭṭha: “No Gotama, they may not.”

Buddha: “May the Brahmins teach or may they not teach the Vedas to that exiled Brahmin?”

Ambaṭṭha: “No, friend Gotama, they may not.”

Buddha: “May the Brahmins forbid the marriage of that exiled Brahmin with a Brahmin woman?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes, friend Gotama, they may.”

Buddha: “Ambaṭṭha, what do you think of the question that I will now ask you? In this world, the nobles exile a noble from the city or the county, with his head shaved and ashes sprinkled over it for some offence. May that man receive priority among the Brahmins in respect of seat and water?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes, Gotama, he may.”

Gotama: “May the Brahmins serve him at the feast in memory of the dead, at the wedding feast, at the sacrificial feast and at the feast given to guests?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes, Gotama, they may.”

Buddha: “May the Brahmins teach or not teach him the Vedas?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes, Gotama, they may.”

Buddha: “May they forbid or not forbid the marriage of that man with a Brahmin woman?”

Ambaṭṭha: “No, Gotama, they may not.”

Buddha: “Ambaṭṭha, nobles may have exiled a noble with his head shaved and ashes sprinkled over him, and exiled him from the country or the city for a certain offence and by such treatment he is very much disgraced. But even when he is very much disgraced, the noble is superior, and the Brahmin is inferior.

Ambaṭṭha, Sanañkumāra Brahma too, utters this verse (SN 6.11):

Khattiyo seṭṭho janetasmim, ye gotta-paṭisārino, vijjā-caraṇa-sampanno, so seṭṭho Deva-mānuse.

Among people who count much on ancestry, the nobles are praiseworthy and superior. Among Devas and humans, one who has knowledge and good conduct is praiseworthy and superior.

Ambaṭṭha, this verse is well-spoken by Sanañkumāra Brahma. It is not ill-spoken: it is relevant to welfare; it is not irrelevant to welfare. I approve of it. Ambaṭṭha, I [860] too, like Sanañkumāra Brahma, uttered this verse:

Among people who count much on ancestry, the nobles are praiseworthy and superior. Among Devas and humans, one who has knowledge and good conduct is praiseworthy and superior.”

Knowledge and Good Conduct Explained

There is the phrase: Vijjā-caraṇa-sampanno, in the verse, which means: “Possessed of knowledge (vijjā) and good conduct (caraṇa).” In the view of Ambaṭṭha, knowledge refers to the three Vedas while good conduct refers to the five moral precepts. Ambaṭṭha thought that if a man who possesses knowledge and good conduct is praiseworthy and superior, that only the Brahmins were praiseworthy and superior people. Wishing to know these two qualities, he asked: “Friend Gotama, what is knowledge and what is good conduct?”

Then the Buddha, desiring to point out the supreme, transcendent knowledge and good conduct, leaving aside the three Vedas and the five precepts that are bound up with the well-known caste system of Brahmanism, said: “Ambaṭṭha, in the matter of possessing supreme transcendent knowledge and good conduct, you should never utter words such as: ‘You are fit for me’ or ‘You are not fit for me,’ words that stem from attachment to birth, attachment to clan and attachment to pride.

Ambaṭṭha, only in a human society with its marriage customs involving the taking or giving of a daughter, should you ever utter words that stem from attachment to birth, clan and pride, words such as: ‘You are fit for me’ or ‘You are not fit for me’.

Ambaṭṭha, those, who cling to words stemming from attachment to birth (jāti-vāda), words stemming from attachment to clan (gotta-vāda), words stemming from attachment to pride (māna-vāda) and words stemming from attachment to marriages that involve the taking or giving of a daughter, are far from possession of the supreme, transcendent knowledge and good conduct.

Ambaṭṭha, one can realize the supreme, transcendent knowledge and good conduct only if one overcomes attachment to birth, attachment to clan, attachment to pride, attachment to marriages that involve the giving or taking of a daughter.”

Then Ambaṭṭha thought: “It has been our belief that we are in possession of knowledge and practice. But just as a violent storm gets rid of husks of grain, the monk Gotama has explained to us the true knowledge and good conduct. The monk Gotama insists and extols only this supreme knowledge and good conduct which we cannot grasp. We should know the knowledge and good conduct which this monk Gotama talks about,” and again he asked the Buddha: “Friend Gotama, what is wisdom and what is practice?”

Then, as in the Discourse on the Fruits of the Ascetic Life (Sāmañña-phala-sutta, DN 2), the Buddha gave a talk on the supreme, transcendent knowledge and good conduct, section by section, beginning with the appearance of the Buddha and ending in the attainment of Awakening.

The Four Paths of Failure

Then the Buddha pointed out to Ambaṭṭha the four paths of failure of knowledge and good conduct. The four paths are:

35d: Ambaṭṭha and his pupil Pokkharasāti – 1261

1. The life of an ascetic, who, being unable to live up to the doctrine for the attainment of knowledge and good conduct, enters the forest and takes to eating fallen fruits.
2. The life of an ascetic, who, being unable to practise even that much, enters the forest and takes to eating roots and fruits.
3. The life of an ascetic, who, being unable to practise even that much, builds a fire-shed near a town or village and worships fire.
4. The life of an ascetic, who, being unable to practise even that much builds a pavilion with an entrance from the four directions at the junctions of the crossroads, for money-making by providing drinking-water to all the people who come from the four quarters.

The Buddha described these four paths of ascetics making the so-called ascetics and Brahmins merely attendants of [862] the monk who possessed the knowledge and good conduct of the Buddha-Dhamma. Ambaṭṭha and his teacher were lacking in such knowledge and good conduct. So they belonged to the four types of degenerate monks and recluses, not to the types of true monks who possessed the two qualifications. The Buddha elicited these facts from Ambaṭṭha through his questions and then criticized him for the first time.

“Ambaṭṭha, you and your teacher lack supreme knowledge and good conduct. Nay, you do not even have the lesser qualities of those whose mode of life is the cause of the destruction of such knowledge and good conduct.

Ambaṭṭha, your teacher, the Brahmin Pokkharasāti, does not even have the lesser qualities leading to such destruction and yet he says impertinently: ‘What kind of people are these low-born, bare-headed and useless monks who sprang from the instep of Brahma? How can it be possible for the Brahmins well-versed in the three Vedas to discuss with them?’ Ambaṭṭha, you note this defect of your Brahmin teacher Pokkharasāti.”

Then the Buddha added: “Ambaṭṭha, your Brahmin teacher, Pokkharasāti, enjoys the privileges granted by King Pasenadi Kosala. Yet the king does not give the Brahmin teacher any opportunity to face him. Also, when he consults the Brahmin Pokkharasāti, he does so from behind a curtain. Ambaṭṭha, why does the king not allow the Brahmin to face him, the Brahmin who is a recipient of provisions lawfully given by him? Think over the reason for this matter.

Ambaṭṭha, note this defect of your Brahmin teacher Pokkharasāti.” This was the second criticism made by the Buddha.

Herein, the Brahmin knew the mantra for deception in one’s presence (summukhā). If, while the king was adorned with a very costly ornament, he stood near the king and recited the mantra, uttering the name of the ornament, the king had to give the ornament without being able to say: ‘I will not give it.’ Then on a festival day, he would say: ‘Bring me my expensive ornament,’ then the attendants would inform him of his having given it to the Brahmin Pokkharasāti. The king asked why he had given it and the ministers said that the Brahmin knew the mantra for immediate deception, that he had tricked the king and taken away his expensive ornament.

Other ministers too, who envied the Brahmin for his close relationship with the king said: “Great King, the Brahmin Pokkharasāti has a kind of leprosy called leucoderma. This kind of leprosy is infectious through physical contact. So do not embrace and fondle the Brahmin as you do now when you see him.” From that time, the king did not allow the Brahmin to face him.

Still in spite of this loss of privilege, the Brahmin Pokkharasāti was a scholar learned in law and statecraft. There was nothing which went wrong if it was done after consultation with him. Therefore, the king sat behind a curtain and consulted the Brahmin who remained outside behind the curtain.

This was known to no one except the king and the Brahmin. The Buddha revealed the secret not to humiliate the Brahmin, but because he knew that such revelation would certainly convince others of his omniscience.

Then the Buddha questioned Ambaṭṭha and made him admit that it was impossible for a commoner or his slave to become a king or a minister just by sitting at a place where the King of Kosala conferred with the ministers and princes and by repeating what they said at such meetings. The Buddha pointed out that likewise it was impossible for Ambaṭṭha or his teacher to become a recluse or a novice recluse just by reciting and teaching the Vedas that were recited and taught by ancient recluses like Aṭṭhaka, Vāmaka and others.

The Buddha again questioned Ambaṭṭha and made him admit that unlike Ambaṭṭha and his teacher, Aṭṭhaka, Vāmaka and others of ancient times did not don good garments, eat good food, move in the company of women, ride good chariots, keep their mansions [863] well-guarded and indulge in sensual pleasures.

Then in conclusion, the Buddha said: “Ambaṭṭha, thus you and your teacher are not recluses or novice recluses. One who has doubts about my being a Buddha should remove that doubt by asking me, I shall dispel his doubt by answering his questions.”

The Buddha said so because there was no likelihood of Ambaṭṭha’s attainment of the paths and fruitions in his present life. The day would only pass away. The young Brahmin had come to examine the major marks possessed by the Buddha. He had now forgotten the object of his visit and so the Buddha decided to remind him of it indirectly.

No one was capable of examining the major marks of a Buddha who was sitting or lying. Examination was possible when he was standing or walking. Also, it was customary for the Buddha to rise and walk when someone came to investigate the marks. For these reasons, the Buddha came out of the monastery and went for a walk. Ambaṭṭha followed the Buddha closely.

Two Hidden Marks

Walking behind the walking Buddha, Ambaṭṭha looked for the 32 major marks of an extraordinary man on the body of the Buddha. He saw clearly 30 of them. He did not, however, see the remaining two great marks: The male genital covered with a sheath and the thin, long and flat tongue. Therefore, he had doubts and was sceptical and indecisive.

Knowing this very well, the Buddha created, by his supernormal power, a man’s genital covered with a sheath, in such way as to make it visible to the young man Ambaṭṭha. Then he stuck out his tongue and passed it to both ears, right and left, thereby revealing its length, passed it into both nostrils, right and left, thereby revealing its tenderness, and covered the whole forehead with the tongue, thereby revealing its width.

Then Ambaṭṭha concluded that the Buddha really possessed those marks and took leave of him, saying: “Well, Gotama, we will go now. We have many things to attend to.” Then the Buddha said: “Ambaṭṭha, you may go if you wish.” Ambaṭṭha got onto his mule-drawn chariot and left.

At that time the Brahmin teacher, Pokkharasāti, had come out of Ukkatṭha city and together with many Brahmins, he was waiting for Ambaṭṭha in his garden.

Ambaṭṭha went to the garden in his chariot as far as he could go and then descending, he walked on foot. Then after paying respect to his teacher, he sat down at a certain place. Then there followed a dialogue between the teacher and Ambaṭṭha:

Pokkharasāti: “Ambaṭṭha have you seen the monk Gotama?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes sir, we have seen the monk Gotama.”

Pokkharasāti: “Ambaṭṭha, is the report about the reputation of the monk Gotama true or false? Does the reputation of Gotama have any basis or does it have no basis?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Sir, the report about Gotama’s reputation is true. The reputation of Gotama has some basis in fact. Gotama really does possess the 32 major marks of a great man and the marks are thoroughly genuine.”

Pokkharasāti: “Ambaṭṭha, did you talk with the monk Gotama about something?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes, sir, I talked with the monk Gotama about something.”

Pokkharasāti: “Ambaṭṭha, what did you talk with the monk Gotama about?”

Thus questioned, Ambaṭṭha reported to his teacher all the conversation that he had with the Buddha. Then the teacher Pokkharasāti said: “Oh! Our young sages and intellectuals are so amazing! Oh! Our experts in the [864] Vedas are so wonderful! With such an assistant like Ambaṭṭha, a man is bound to land in one of the four lower worlds after physical dissolution and death.”

Thus he rebuked Ambaṭṭha, and being angry and displeased, he kicked the young man, making him collapse on the floor. He was angry with Ambaṭṭha but in a moment there also arose in him the desire to go and see the Buddha. As for Ambaṭṭha, the privilege that he formerly had of going together with his teacher in a chariot as a charioteer was forfeited and from that time, he had to go on foot before the chariot.

Pokkharasāti’s Visit to the Buddha

The Brahmin Pokkharasāti was very anxious to meet the Buddha but the other Brahmins told him to put off the visit till the next day as it was already too late to make the visit on that day.

Then having prepared very delicious food, he put the food in the vehicle, had the fire torches hoisted on it and coming out of Ukkaṭṭha city, he went to

35d: Ambaṭṭha and his pupil Pokkharasāti – 1265

Icchānaṅgala grove. He went in the vehicle as far as possible, then stepped down and approached the Buddha on foot. He greeted the Buddha, exchanged polite words and took his seat at a certain place.

Translators have made a special observation that the house in this context could not be in Ukkaṭṭha city, which was too far away, and that it might be Pokkharasāti's house in Icchānaṅgala village or elsewhere.

After taking his seat, the Brahmin Pokkharasāti had the following conversation with the Buddha:

Pokkharasāti: “Gotama did our pupil Ambaṭṭha come to this place?”

Buddha: “Yes, Brahmin, your pupil Ambaṭṭha did come.”

Pokkharasāti: “Friend Gotama, did you talk with Ambaṭṭha about anything?”

Buddha: “Yes Brahmin, I talked with Ambaṭṭha about something.”

Pokkharasāti: “Friend Gotama, what did you talk about with Ambaṭṭha?”

Then the Buddha told the Brahmin Pokkharasāti all about the conversation with Ambaṭṭha. Pokkharasāti apologised to the Buddha, saying: “Friend Gotama, young Ambaṭṭha is a fool. Kindly excuse him.” The Buddha said: “Brahmin, I wish Ambaṭṭha happiness,” thus forgiving the young man.

Then the Brahmin Pokkharasāti looked for the 32 marks of a great man on the body of the Buddha. He saw the 30 major marks, just as Ambaṭṭha did, but not the other two major marks: The male genital covered with a sheath, and the thin and long tongue, so he was doubtful, sceptical and indecisive.

Knowing this full well, the Buddha created, by his supernormal power, the male genital covered with a sheath so as to make it visible to the Brahmin. Then the Buddha stuck out his tongue and passed it over both ears, right and left, thereby revealing its length, passed it over both nostrils, right and left, thereby revealing its tenderness, and covered the whole forehead with the tongue, thereby revealing its width.

Then Brahmin Pokkharasāti became convinced that the Buddha certainly possessed all the 32 major marks of an extraordinary being and said: “Let Ven. Gotama and his monastics accept the meal at my house today for [865] my benefit.” The Buddha accepted the invitation by keeping silent.

35d: Ambaṭṭha and his pupil Pokkharasāti – 1266

Knowing the Buddha's acceptance, when the meal was ready, the Brahmin Pokkharasāti informed him that the meal was ready, that it was time for the Buddha to partake of it. So, at his invitation, the Buddha went to the Brahmin's house with his monks in the morning and they sat on the seats prepared for them.

Then the Brahmin Pokkharasāti and his young pupils undertook the responsibility and personally served the Buddha and the monks respectively with good, delicious food. When the Brahmin knew that the Buddha had finished his meal and put aside the bowl, he took a seat and sat down at a proper place.

The Buddha gave the Brahmin Pokkharasāti a series of Dhamma talks leading to path and fruition, talks on 1) generosity, 2) morality, 3) the attainment of the Deva realm and 4) the noble way leading to the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna. While following these talks, the mind of the Brahmin became stable, flexible, free from hindrances, joyous and clear, then the Buddha taught the four truths that he himself had discovered (sāmuikkamsika) and the Brahmin attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti).

Then the Brahmin Pokkharasāti, who had become a noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna-ariya), said to the master: "Venerable Gotama, your teaching is so delightful, just as an object that has been upside down is turned the right way up, just as a covered object is uncovered, just as a man who has lost his way is shown the right way, just as fire-torches are lighted in the darkness in order that those who have eyesight may see various objects, so also you, venerable Gotama, have clearly taught me the Dhamma in many ways.

Venerable Gotama, with my son, daughter, wife, followers and councillors, I seek refuge in venerable Gotama, in the Dhamma and in the Saṅgha. From today, let venerable Gotama regard me as a layman devoted to the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha for the rest of his life.

Just as venerable Gotama visits the house of other lay devotees in Ukkaṭṭha, so also kindly visit my house. Young men and young women in my house will pay respect to you. They will welcome you. They will offer seats and water to you. At the very least they will be much inspired with faith. The response of these young men and women to your visit will be conducive to their welfare and prosperity for a long time."

Thus having committed himself to the Buddha on the supermundane level, the Brahmin invited the Buddha to his house. The Brahmin Pokkharasāti's commitment to the Buddha differed from that of other lay devotees in that 1) it embraced his sons, daughters, wife, followers, and councillors, and 2) in the last paragraph, he stated the reasons for his commitment. Therefore, in conclusion the Buddha extolled him, saying: “Brahmin, you have spoken well,” and accepted the invitation.

36: King Pukkusāti and Others

[I have moved the section on King Pukkusāti to the top of this chapter, as being the more important story. Material on Devadatta that originally appeared in this chapter is now in the next one, together with King Ajātasattu's story.]

[The following is based on the Discourse on the Analysis of the Elements (Dhātu-vibhaṅga-sutta, MN 140) and its commentary.]

When King Bimbisāra was ruling the city of Rājagaha in the country of Magadha in the Middle Land (Majjhima-desa), the ruler of the city of Takkasilā, on the border of the Middle Land, was King Pukkusāti.

Once, the merchants of Takkasilā went to Rājagaha with goods for sale. They took presents and went to see King Bimbisāra. They offered the presents and stood paying respect to the king, who asked them where they lived and they replied they lived in Takkasilā.

After making further enquiries about the political situation, material welfare and about the city itself, he asked the name of the king. When the merchants replied that their king was Pukkusāti, he asked if their king fulfilled the ten kingly duties. They answered: “Great King, our monarch fulfils the ten duties. He promotes the welfare of the people through the four supporting things (saṅgaha-vatthu) such as crop-sacrifice (sassa-medha), human-sacrifice (purisa-medha), winning over the poor (sammā-pāsa), and endearing speech (vācā-peyya). He acts like the parent of the people and makes them happy as the parent would to the child sleeping in his lap.”

1. Prudence with regard to crops (sassa-medha). In collecting land revenue, only a tenth of the crops harvested is collected. [867]
2. Prudence with regard to men and warriors in service (purisa-medha). Prizes are awarded and provisions were distributed half-yearly.
3. Winning the hearts of the poor (sammā-pāsa). Loans in cash, 1,000 or 2,000, are offered to them without interest for three years.
4. Endearing speech (vācā-peyya). Using friendly terms, such as: “Young man,” “Uncle,” etc., were used when addressing people according to their age.

King Bimbisāra asked yet another question: “How old is your king?” The merchants answered with the age of their king, and it so happened that the two monarchs were of the same age.

Then the king said to the merchants: “Friends, your king is righteous. He is equal to me in age. Would you be able to make your king my friend?” When the answer was in the affirmative, King Bimbisāra exempted the merchants from customs duties, provided them with lodgings and ended the conversation by asking them to see him before their departure from the city.

In accordance with the king’s instructions, the merchants went to see King Bimbisāra on the eve of their departure, and the king said: “Friends, have a pleasant journey on your way home. Ask your king, in my name, about his health and tell him, on my behalf, that I desire friendship with him.”

“Very well,” replied the merchants and they returned to Takkasilā. On arrival there, they stowed away their goods properly, and went to see their king after breakfast. The king asked: “Where have you been, men? I have not seen you for all these days.” The merchants reported the whole matter to their king. Then the king rejoiced, saying: “Excellent, men! Because of you, I have a friend and ally in the Middle Country.”

Later on, the merchants of Rājagaha went to Takkasilā on business. They called on King Pukkusāti with presents. When the king learned that they had come from Rājagaha, the city of his royal friend. He said: “Are you the visitors from Rājagaha, the city of my friend and ally, King Bimbisāra.” The merchants replied in the affirmative.

Afterwards the king asked after his friend’s health and made an announcement with the beat of drums: “From today onwards, all the merchants, who have come to my kingdom from the country of my friend King Bimbisāra, on foot or in carts, shall be provided with houses for lodging and provisions from the royal granary. They shall be exempted from taxes. There shall be no molestation whatsoever to them.” King Bimbisāra did similarly in his kingdom.

Exchanges between the Kings

Then King Bimbisāra sent a message to King Pukkusāti saying: “Friend, precious stones, such as rubies, pearls, etc. are usually produced in border countries. If you ever find various precious stones that make attractive objects and sensational news, please inform me of them.”

36: King Pukkusāti and Others – 1270

King Pukkusāti, on his part, sent a return message reading: “Friend, the Middle Land is a great region. If attractive and sensational precious stones of different kinds appear there, kindly inform me.”

As the days, months and years passed, the two kings remained staunch friends even without seeing each other. While the two kings were thus committed to sharing the news of their potential treasures, a very special thing worthy to be given as a gift occurred to King Pukkusāti first. The king obtained eight pieces of an invaluable, five-coloured muslin. “These are of fine quality,” thought the king, “I shall send them as gifts to my friend King Bimbisāra.” So he had eight cases made of sandalwood, each being the size of a gum-lac ball, turned on a lathe: in each case he put a muslin piece, and by applying gum-lac, he had the cases made [868] into balls. Each ball was then wrapped with a white cloth and put in a box which was wrapped again with another cloth and sealed. “Give it to my friend King Bimbisāra,” the king asked his ministers and sent the boxes to his royal friend. He also sent a message: “I would like my friend to open the box and see the gifts in the company of his ministers and other officials at the centre of the city.”

The ministers went to Rājagaha and presented the gift. On hearing the message, King Bimbisāra ordered his ministers and officials, through his drummers, to assemble. At the city-centre, the king sat on the jewelled throne under a white royal umbrella. Then he removed the seal and the cloth-covers and opened the box. When he untied the package in the box and saw the gum balls, it occurred to him thus: “Oh, my friend King Pukkusāti sent these gum balls as his gifts, for he must have mistaken me for a gambler, a dice-addict.” Thinking thus, he took a ball, rolled it in his hand, guessed its weight and knew definitely that it contained a bundle of muslin.

When the king struck the ball against the foot of the throne, the gum fell off in layers. He opened the fragrant case gently with his fingernails and on seeing the muslin he ordered the other seven cases to be opened. They clearly saw with their eyes that they all contained priceless pieces of muslin. When these were spread and measured, they were found to be of beautiful colours and fine material, each measuring sixteen cubits in length and eight cubits in breath. On seeing the precious treasure of muslin, people clapped their hands and threw up their turbans. They rejoiced, saying: “Our king and his friend, King Pukkusāti, have never seen each other, yet that king has sent such priceless gifts. It is proper to make such a king a friend.”

King Bimbisāra had each muslin piece appraised and found all of them to be of inestimably high value. He had four of them offered to the Buddha and kept the other four in his palace.

Then King Bimbisāra considered thus: “A return gift should excel the gift received. My friend, King Pukkusāti, has sent me a priceless gift. What kind of gift should I send in return to him?”

Herein, it may be asked: “Is there no treasure that is better than the eight pieces of muslin in Rājagaha?” The answer is: It was not that there was none indeed. King Bimbisāra was a great king. Therefore, it could not be that there was nothing better than the eight pieces of muslin. Nevertheless, from the time of his attainment of Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) any worldly treasure had been no more delightful to the king’s heart. Only the Three Treasures, in the form of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha, were delightful.

Therefore, in selecting the most valuable thing as a return gift, the king considered in the following manner: “In this world, treasures (ratana) are of two kinds: the living (saviññāṇaka) and the non-living (aviññāṇaka). Of these two, the non-living, such as gold, silver or any other precious thing, is only to adorn the living. Therefore, the living treasure is more praiseworthy.

Again, the living treasure is of two kinds: the human and the animal. The animal, such as an elephant, horse or any other creature, is only to work for the human. Therefore the human treasure is the more praiseworthy.

Again, the human treasure is of two kinds: the male and the female. The female, even if she be the wife of a Universal Monarch, is to serve the male. Therefore the male treasure is more praiseworthy. Again, the male treasure is of two kinds: the householder (agārika) who strives for his family, and the ascetic (anagārika) who does not strive for his family. The householder, even if he be a Universal Monarch, the top of the former kind, is to pay homage with the hands, knees and forehead touching the ground to the newly ordained novice of today. Therefore the ascetic treasure is more praiseworthy.

Again, the ascetic treasure is of two kinds: the learner (sekkha), a [869] man of lower attainments, and the non-learner (asekkha), an Arahāt. Even if there be 100,000 learners, they are not equal to one non-learner, the Arahāt, in sanctity. Therefore, the non-learner treasure is more praiseworthy.

Again, the non-learner treasure is of two kinds: the Buddha and the disciple. Even if there be 100,000 disciples, they are not equal to one Buddha in sanctity. Therefore, the Buddha treasure is more praiseworthy.

Again, the Buddha treasure is of two kinds: the Independent Buddha (Pacceka-buddha) and the Perfectly Self-Awakened One (Sammā-sambuddha). Even if there be 100,000 of the former type, they are not equal to one Buddha of the latter kind. Therefore, the omniscient Buddha is more praiseworthy.

Indeed, in this world of sentient beings, together with the world of Devas and Brahmas, there is no treasure like an omniscient Buddha. Therefore, I will send that unique treasure to my friend King Pukkusāti.”

So thinking, King Bimbisāra asked the ministers from Takkaṣilā whether they had ever seen the Three Treasures: the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha, in their country. The ministers replied that they had not even heard of them, much less seen them. The king was much pleased because he now had the opportunity to send a present that was not found in Takkaṣilā. Then the king thought: “I can request the Fortunate One to go to Takkaṣilā, the city of my friend King Pukkusāti, for the spiritual uplift of the people. But it is not customary for the Fortunate One to pass the night in border countries. So it is impossible for the Fortunate One to go there.

Suppose I request the Buddha to send Ven. Sāriputta, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna and other great disciples and Arahats. But the fact is, even as soon as I hear of the sojourn of these great venerables in border regions, I should send my people, have them brought here by any means possible and serve their physical needs. So it is not possible for the great venerables to go there. Therefore I will send a message that will serve the same purpose as the visit of the Fortunate One and the great venerables to Takkaṣilā would.”

The king then had a gold sheet made, four cubits in length and half a cubit in breadth, neither too thick nor too thin. On the day he was going to write on the sheet, he washed his head early in the morning, bathed, committed himself to the eight precepts and after his breakfast, he did not adorn himself with flowers or use any perfume. Then taking the vermilion in a gold cup, he closed all the doors of the lower storey and went upstairs and in order to get more light, he opened the lion-figure supported window in the east, and sat in the airy chamber.

The king then wrote on the golden sheet: “There has arisen in this world the master, who is the Worthy One (Arahant), the Perfectly Self-Awakened One (Sammā-sambudha) the possessor of knowledge and good conduct (vijjā-carāṇa-sampanna), the noble wayfarer (Gracious One), the knower of the worlds (loka-vidū), the peerless charioteer and trainer of men (anuttaro-purisa-damma-sārathi), the teacher of men and Devas (satthā-Deva-manussānam), the Awakened One (Buddha), the Fortunate One (Bhagavā).”

Thus the king first wrote some high attributes of the Buddha. Then he described how the Bodhisatta practised the ten perfections (pāramī); how, after his demise in the Tusita realm, he took conception in the womb of his mother; how, at that time, there appeared 32 great signs that seemed to open the whole world freely; about the miracles attending his conception; how he practised asceticism and strove for Awakening; how, sitting on the undefeated (aparājita) throne, he attained omniscience; and how he acquired extraordinary supernormal powers that made the whole world open to him.

Finally, King Bimbisāra wrote that in the living world of Devas and Brahmās there was no jewel other than the Buddha-jewel which possessed such great attributes. The king again described some other attributes of the Buddha in the following verse (Khp 6, Snp 2.1): [870]

*Yaṃ kiñci vittaṃ idha vā huraṃ vā saggesu vā yaṃ ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ na no samaṃ atthi Tathāgatena;
idam-pi Buddhē ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ
etena saccena suvatthi hotu!*

Whatever riches there are, here or hereafter or in the heavens, that excellent treasure is not equal to the Realised One; this excellent treasure is in the Buddha, by virtue of this truth may there be safety!

Then willing to extol the Dhamma-jewel, the king wrote down its six attributes: “The doctrine of the Buddha is well-proclaimed (svākkhāta), leading to results discernible in this very life (sandiṭṭhika), it is instantly beneficial (akālika), it invites beings to come and see (ehi-passika), it is worthy to be embraced (opanayika), and worthy to be experienced by the wise individually (paccattam)

veditabbo viññūhi). The king also mentioned special attributes such as the 37 constituents of Awakening (Bodhi-pakkhiya-dhamma), the four foundations of mindfulness (sati-paṭṭhāna), the four right efforts (sammappadhāna), the four paths to supernormal power (iddhi-pāda), the five faculties (indriya), the five strengths (bala), the seven factors of Awakening (bojjhaṅga) and the eightfold path (maggaṅga).

Then the king described the attributes of the Dhamma partly as follows:

*Yaṃ Buddha-seṭṭho parivaṇṇayā sucim, samādhim-ānantarikañ-ñam-āhu, samādhinā tena samo na vijjati;
idam-pi Dhamme ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,
etena saccena suvatthi hotu!*

That which the great Buddha praised as being pure, the concentration said to have immediate result, no equal to that concentration is found; this excellent treasure is in the Dhamma, by virtue of this truth may there be safety!

Then the king, willing to extol the Saṅgha-jewel, wrote down its nine attributes, of which the first four were: “The disciples of the Buddha possess good conduct (suppaṭipaññatā), upright conduct (uju-paṭipaññatā), conduct leading to Nibbāna (ñāya-paṭipaññatā), conduct leading to their being worthy of veneration (sāmīci-paṭipaññatā); by possessing which they are worthy of offerings brought from afar (āhuneyya), worthy of offerings meant for guests (pāhuneyya), worthy of proper offerings (dakkhiṇeyya), worthy of veneration (añjali-karaṇīya), and are the best field for beings to sow the seeds of good deeds (anuttaraṃ puññakkhettaṃ lokassa).

The king continued with his writing: “Clansmen, who are of good birth and good conduct, hear the words of the Fortunate One and renounce the world to become monks. Some do so, giving up the pleasures of a king, some the pleasures of a crown prince, some the post of a supreme commander, and so on. Having become monks, they lead a noble way of life.” After this foreword, with regard to the noble way of life, the king wrote something about lower morality (cūḷa-sīla), medium morality (majjhima-sīla), higher morality (mahā-sīla), etc., as contained in the Discourse on the Supreme Net (Brahma-jāla-sutta, DN 1). He also wrote, in part, on the restraint of the six senses, cultivation of mindfulness with clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña), contentment with the four requisites of life, the nine kinds of dwellings suitable for meditation, the overcoming of the five hindrances (nīvaraṇa), making preparations with certain devices (kaṣiṇa) for mind-training, the development of absorption (jhāna), the supernormal powers (abhiññā), the 38 kinds of meditation, etc., all leading up to the attainment of Awakening.

After describing in detail the sixteen kinds of mindfulness on breathing (ānāpānassati) meditation, the king glorified the Buddha's Disciples in the Saṅgha:

*Ye puggalā aṭṭha sataṃ pasatthā, cattāri etāni yugāni honti, te dakkhiṇeyyā Gracious Onessa sāvakā, etesu dinnāni mahapphalāni;
idam-pi Saṅghe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,
etena saccena suvatthi hotu!*

Those eight individuals praised by the good, there are these four pairs of persons, those disciples of the Fortunate One are worthy of gifts, those things that have been given to them have great fruit; this excellent treasure is in the Saṅgha, by virtue of this truth may there be safety!

The king then added: “The teaching of the Fortunate One with its threefold training [871] (sikkhā) is beautiful in the beginning, beautiful in the middle and beautiful in the end. It is the teaching that will also certainly lead to liberation from Saṃsāra. Friend Pukkusāti, I would like to urge you to renounce the world and become a monk if you can.”

King Bimbisāra then rolled the gold sheet, wrapped it in a piece of very fine cloth and put it in a sandalwood case; the sandalwood case was then placed in a gold case, the gold case in a silver case, the silver case in a ruby case, the ruby case in a coral case, the coral case in a carbuncle case, the carbuncle case in a spotted ruby (masāra-galla) case, the spotted-ruby case in a crystal case, the crystal case in an ivory case, the ivory case in a ten-jewelled case, the ten-jewelled case in a bamboo-strip case and the bamboo-strip case again in a sandalwood box, then again the sandalwood box was placed in a gold box, silver box, ruby box, coral box, carbuncle box, spotted-ruby box, crystal box, ivory box, the ten jewelled box and a bamboo-strip box successively, one box in the other as before.

Then the bamboo-strip box was put in a sandalwood casket, the sandalwood casket in a gold casket, then in a silver casket, ruby casket, coral casket, carbuncle casket, spotted ruby casket, crystal casket, ivory casket, ten-jewelled casket and lacquer casket successively. Then after having the lacquer casket wrapped up in a piece of fine cloth, and the royal seal stamped, the king ordered his ministers: “Decorate the streets in my domain, each street being eight measures in width, the two portions being two measures in width on either side to be just patched up but the middle portion measuring four measures (usabha)<sup>230</sup> in width is to be decorated with royal accessories.”

Then the king had a seat placed on a fully ornamented royal elephant, had a white umbrella placed over it, had the roads of the capital sprinkled with water and thoroughly swept. Flags, banners, and streamers were to be hoisted. Either side of each road was decorated with plantain trees, water-filled pots, various performers and fragrant flowers. Messengers were sent to the provincial and city governors with instructions saying: “You should honour the royal present when it passes through places under your rule.”

Splendidly adorned with full regalia, and accompanied by his ministers, the king himself set off, carrying the sacred present to the border with great pomp and ceremony amid the boisterous playing of all kinds of music. He privately told his envoy who was in charge of the sacred present: “Men, I want my royal friend to receive it not in the presence of his queens but on the upper terrace of the mansion.”

The king worshipped the sacred present most respectfully, regarding its journey as the visit of the Buddha himself to the border country. Then he returned to Rājagaha city. The provincial and city governors also improved the road in the same way and passed on the sacred present from one place to another.

King Pukkusāti, too, had the road from the border refurbished, had the capital beautifully decorated and received the sacred present magnificently. The sacred present reached Takkasilā surprisingly on an Observance (Uposatha) day. The minister, who brought the present, transmitted to the king the message that King Bimbisāra had given him.

Having heard the message, King Pukkusāti made the necessary arrangements for the comfort of the visitors and took the present himself and went up to the upper terrace of the mansion. He posted guards at the door to prevent anyone from entering the mansion, opened the window, placed the holy present on a high place and took a lower seat for himself. Then he removed the royal seal and the outer covering of cloth and on opening the [872] containers one by one beginning with the lacquer casket he saw the innermost sandalwood casket and rightly concluded: “The way in which the present is packed is different from the way in which earthly treasures are packed. Surely it must be a jewel (ratana) that has appeared in the Middle Land and that deserves our attention.”

Then the king opened the fragrant casket, removed the royal seal and holding the very fine cloth by both edges, he unwrapped it gently and saw the golden scroll. He was struck with wonder at the fine script of the writer: the beautiful, well-shaped letters and lines that made up his handwriting. The king read every letter of the message.

As he read of the attributes of the Buddha, beginning with: “There has arisen the Fortunate One in this world,” he became very ecstatic, with the hair from 99,000 pores standing straight on end. He was unconscious even of his standing or sitting posture. He was deeply gratified when he thought of the opportunity that he had, thanks to his friend King Bimbisāra for the opportunity to hear the message about the Buddha-jewel that was so hard to hear despite the passage of millions of aeons (kappa).

Being unable to read further, King Pukkusāti sat in a contemplative mood till his ecstasy faded away. Then he read the attributes of the Dhamma-jewel beginning with being well-proclaimed (svākkhāta). Again he became ecstatic as before. Having remained in a contemplative mood till his ecstasy faded, he then read the attributes of the Saṅgha beginning with having good conduct (suppaṭipañño) and there arose a great ecstasy in him as before.

King Pukkusāti Ordains

Then the king read the last section in the gold scroll which described the mindfulness of breathing meditation. He engaged in meditation according to the instructions in the scroll and gained the form world (rūpāvacāra) absorption fully. He spent his time enjoying the bliss of meditation without anyone other than a young attendant who was allowed to stay with him. In this way, half a month elapsed.

The people of the city assembled in the courtyard of the palace and clamoured for the appearance of the king, saying: “The king has completely stopped reviewing the troops or seeing the dancers since the day he received the royal present. He has also ceased to give royal decisions. We want the king to show anyone he likes the royal present sent by his friend, King Bimbisāra. It is a tendency of some kings to try to annex a country by alluring the ruler with royal presents. What is our king doing now?”

When the king heard their outcry, he wondered whether he should work for the welfare of the country or follow the teaching of the Buddha. Then he thought: “No mathematician can count the number of lifetimes that I have spent as a ruler of a country. Therefore, I will now only practise the teaching of the Fortunate One.” So thinking, he took the sword that was near the bed, cut off his hair, opened the window and threw down the hair-knot with the ruby-headdress into the midst of the assembly, saying: “Men! Take my hair-knot and let it act as king.”

The people received the hair-knot together with its ornamental ruby headdress and cried, lamenting: “Great king! Are the kings who receive presents from their royal friends all like you?” The beard of King Pukkusāti was two finger-breaths long like that of the Bodhisatta on the eve of his renunciation.

Then the king sent his young attendant to the market to buy two dyed robes and an earthen bowl. Then saying: “I dedicate my monk’s life to the Fortunate Ones who are worthy of honour in this world,” he donned one robe as the lower garment, put on the other as the upper garment and, with the alms bowl hanging over his left shoulder and a staff in one hand, he paced twice or thrice outside the mansion to see whether he looked well and proper as a monk. He was pleased to find that he did. He then opened the main door and stepped down from the mansion.

The dancers and others who were waiting at the three successive doors saw the monk Pukkusāti coming down but they did not recognize the king. They thought that a Paccekabuddha had come to preach to their king. It was only when they got on to the top [873] of the mansion and thoroughly examined the seat of the king that they knew of the king’s departure and they cried all at once, like people in a sinking boat in the middle of the sea.

36: King Pukkusāti and Others – 1279

As soon as the monk Pukkusāti stepped on the ground, all the citizens and soldiers surrounded him and wept bitterly. The ministers said to Pukkusāti: “Great King! The kings in the Middle Land are very crafty. You should go only after sending emissaries and making inquiries to know definitely whether or not the Buddha-jewel has really appeared in the world. For the time being, you should return to the palace.”

But Ven. Pukkusāti went off, saying: “Friends, I have implicit faith in my friend, King Bimbisāra. My friend, King Bimbisāra, has never spoken to me ambiguously. You stay behind.” The ministers and the people, however, persisted in following the king.

Pukkusāti, the man of good family, then made a mark on the ground with his staff and asked the people: “Whose country is this?” They replied: “Great King, it is your country.” Then the monk said: “He who destroys this mark should be punished by the authority of the king.” In the Birth Story about King Mahājanaka (Mahā-Janaka-jātaka, Ja 539), the Queen Sīvali Devī dared not erase the line drawn on the ground by the Bodhisatta, King Mahā Janaka. So rolling on the ground, she artfully made the line disappear and followed the king. The people too followed through the pathway made by the queen. But in the case of the line drawn by King Pukkusāti, the people dared not destroy it and they were left rolling and weeping with their heads turned towards the line.

Pukkusāti the man of good family went off alone without taking even a servant or a slave to offer him a tooth-stick or water for washing his face on the journey. He travelled by himself, mindful of the fact that: “My teacher, the Fortunate One, renounced the world as a Bodhisatta and went off alone to become a monk.” Bent on following the example of the Buddha as far as possible and remembering that the Buddha never used a vehicle, he did not wear even a single-layered slipper or use even an umbrella made of leaves. The people climbed the trees, city-walls, small turrets or scaffolds on the walls or inside of fortifications, etc. and watched their king setting out alone.

Pukkusāti the man of good family thought: “I will have to go on a long journey. I cannot fare to the end of my journey all by myself.” So he followed a caravan. As he had to travel by foot on very rough terrain under the burning sun, the soles of his tender feet cracked with sores and eruptions, causing great pain and suffering. When the caravan set up a tent made up of branches and leaves and took rest, Pukkusāti stepped off the main road and sat at the foot of a tree.

There was no one to massage him or attend to his physical needs. He entered upon the fourth absorption (jhāna) by engaging in breathing meditation, dispelled his weariness and passed the time in the bliss of absorption.

The next morning, he cleaned his body and again followed the caravan. When it was time for his morning meal, the merchants took his alms bowl and offered him food. Sometimes the food was not well-cooked: sometimes too soft, sometimes too rough, being mixed with sand and pebbles, sometimes too salty, and sometimes it had too little salt. The monk did not bother whether the food was soft or hard, rough or tender, salty or lacking salt, but only thought of the place it entered, and ate it as if it were celestial food.

In this way, he came to Sāvattthī, having covered a distance of 192 leagues. Although the caravan passed the Jetavana monastery in the city, it never occurred to him to ask where the Buddha resided. This was due to his reverence for the Buddha and the message of King Bimbisāra.

Throughout his journey, Ven. Pukkusāti concentrated his mind on the Buddha without thinking of anything else. Having arrived near Jetavana with deep reverence for the Buddha, he did not even wonder whether the Buddha lived there or not. The question to ask about the master never occurred to him.

The message of King Bimbisāra said that: “The Fortunate One appears in this world,” and so it led Pukkusāti to believe that the Buddha lived in Rājagaha. So, although he passed [874] by the Jetavana monastery, he did not ask about the residence of the master and continuing his journey, and came to Rājagaha, 45 leagues from Sāvattthī.

On reaching Rājagaha, just after sunset, Pukkusāti found many monasteries and as he concluded from King Bimbisāra’s message that the Buddha was in Rājagaha, he asked the people where the Buddha lived. The people asked him from where he came and on hearing that he came from the north, they said: “Venerable sir, you have come too far. The Fortunate One lives in Sāvattthī, 45 leagues distant from Rājagaha on the way by which you have come.”

The monk thought: “Now, it is too late. I cannot go to the Fortunate One today. I will spend the night here and see the Fortunate One tomorrow.” He asked the people about the place where the ascetics who came to Rājagaha after sunset put up. The people pointed to a potter’s small hut as the rest house for visiting monks. With the permission of the potter, the monk entered the hut and sat there to spend the night.

Meeting with the Buddha

At dawn on that day the Buddha surveyed the world of living beings and on seeing Pukkusāti, the Buddha thought: “This man of good family read the message sent by his friend King Bimbisāra and after completely renouncing his 100-league wide domain of Takkasilā, he became a monk out of reverence for me. Today he will reach Rājagaha after travelling 192 leagues, being 45 leagues beyond Sāvattthī. If I do not go to him, he will pass the night and die hopelessly without attaining the lower three fruitions. If I go to him he will realize the three lower fruitions of the noble path and become liberated. I have developed and practised the perfections for aeons out of compassion for worthy beings. I will now go and see him for his spiritual welfare.”

So early in the morning the Buddha cleaned his body and entered Sāvattthī with the monks on the round for alms. In the afternoon, he left the city, rested for a while in the fragrant chamber and thought: “This man of good family out of reverence for me has done that which is hard for many people to do. Having renounced the 100-league vast domain of Takkasilā, he set out alone without even a servant to give him water for washing his face.” The Buddha thought of this austerity of the monk and without calling Ven. Sāriputta or Ven. Moggallāna or any other disciples, he left Sāvattthī, taking his alms bowl and robes by himself.

The Buddha did not fly in the air or shorten the journey but went on foot as he knew that, out of reverence for him, the monk did not travel by elephant, horse, chariot or on a golden palanquin but went barefooted without even a slipper or a leaf-umbrella.

With a Buddha’s splendour and all the great marks and six bodily-radiance, etc. shrouded like the cloud-covered moon, the Buddha travelled incognito for about six hours during the whole afternoon and covering a distance of 45 leagues, he arrived near the potter’s hut at sunset, just after the monk Pukkusāti had entered the hut. The Buddha arrived with his glory covered in order to enable the monk to have complete rest, knowing that one who is tired and weary cannot absorb the Dhamma.

36: King Pukkusāti and Others – 1282

When the Buddha arrived near the potter's hut, he did not enter it impolitely as the omniscient Buddha, but stood at the entrance and asked for the monk's permission to stay there. Pukkusāti mistook the Buddha for an ordinary monk and gave his permission willingly, saying: "My friend, this hut is quiet. It is not small. You may stay here comfortably as you please."

How could the monk Pukkusāti, who had renounced the 100-league vast kingdom of Takkasilā, be reluctant to share his accommodation in a deserted hut with a fellow-monk? He was not reluctant at all. Yet some vain and foolish monks (mogha-purisa) are very miserly and possessive with regard to their abodes (āvāsa-macchariya) and try to deny accommodation to fellow-monks! [875]

The Buddha, who was very tender and delicate, left the fragrant chamber which was like a celestial mansion and entered the potter's hut which was very filthy and loathsome with ashes, broken pots, grass straws and droppings of chickens and pigs. Here, amidst this collection of garbage, the Buddha made a bed of grass, spread the robe of rags and sat totally unperturbed as though he were in the Perfumed Chamber that was fragrant with celestial scents.

Thus, as the two men of noble (khattiya) families, who were credited with past good deeds, who renounced royal pleasures to become monks, who had golden complexions, who had attained transcendent states, the Buddha and Pukkusāti both sat in the potter's hut, making the hut very splendid, like the crystal cave where the two lion kings dwelt.

The Buddha never thought: "I am very delicate and yet I have travelled strenuously 45 leagues for six hours during the whole afternoon. I will now lie down on my right side to get over my weariness for a moment." Without having any such thought, the Buddha entered upon the fourth absorption (jhāna) of fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti) while sitting there.

Nor did the monk Pukkusāti think of lying down for a moment to overcome his weariness from the bare-footed journey of 192 leagues. He too entered upon the fourth absorption (jhāna) focusing on his breathing while sitting there.

Herein if the object of the Buddha's visit was to teach Pukkusāti then why did he enter upon the fourth absorption (jhāna) instead of teaching the monk? The Buddha did not teach at once because, at that time, the monk was still tired and weary. He would not be able to appreciate the teaching. So the Buddha waited to let his weariness pass away.

Other teachers say that Rājagaha was a populous royal city with the air was ringing with the ten kinds of sound, and the Buddha deferred teaching till midnight when the city would become quiet. This view is not acceptable, for certainly the Buddha could supernaturally dispel even the sound travelling as far as the Brahma world. In other words, he could make that sound inaudible to the monk. In fact, the Buddha waited till the monk had recovery from his weariness.

The Buddha left Sāvattḥī at noon, travelled on foot to Rājagaha which was 45 leagues away, reached the potter's hut at sunset, entered the hut with the permission of the monk and became absorbed in fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti) for six hours. Arising from the absorption (jhāna) at midnight, he opened both eyes, which were endowed with the five kinds of sensitivity, like opening the window of a golden mansion. Then he saw the monk Pukkusāti sitting focused on breathing and absorbed in the fourth absorption (jhāna) like a golden statue, without any movement of the hands, legs or head, grave and imperturbable, like a firmly established door-post. The Buddha thought that the monk's posture was impressive and decided to start the conversation.

Of the four postures, viz., walking, standing, lying down and sitting, the first three lack dignity. The hands, the legs and the head of a walking monk shake. The standing monk's body is stiff. The one lying down is also unpleasant. In fact, only the sitting posture of the monk, who, after having swept his retreat in the afternoon, spread his leather sheet, cleaned his hands and feet, sits cross-legged, is dignified. Ven. Pukkusāti sat cross-legged in the fourth absorption (jhāna) that was focused on breathing practice. This pleased the Buddha.

The Buddha knew that Ven. Pukkusāti became a monk out of reverence for him. Yet, he decided to ask him because if he did not do so, there would be no conversation and no conversation would mean no teaching. So, he started the conversation in order to pave the way for the teaching.

The Buddha asked the monk to whom he dedicated his monastic life, who was his teacher and whose teaching he liked. The monk answered that he dedicated his life to the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha. Again, the Buddha asked him where the Worthy One, the Supremely Awakened One lived. The monk Pukkusāti replied: "My friend, there is a city called Sāvattḥī in the northern [876] country. The Worthy One, the Supremely Awakened One, now lives in that city." When the Buddha asked him whether he had ever seen the Buddha, and if he were to see him now would he recognize him, Ven. Pukkusāti's reply was that he had not seen him and that he would not know him if he were to see him now.

Herein everyone knew the Buddha from his glory. This is not surprising. But it is hard for people to know the Buddha when he went incognito as an ordinary monk on alms round with his glory hidden. So Ven. Pukkusāti answered honestly that he would not know the Buddha. He did not know, even though he stayed in the same hut with the Buddha.

Knowing that the monk's weariness had vanished, the Buddha decided to preach to the one who had dedicated his monk's life to him, the Buddha said: "Monk! I will teach you. Listen to my teaching. Bear it well in mind. I will teach you the Dhamma thoroughly."

Up to that time, the monk Pukkusāti still did not know that his companion was the Buddha.

Pukkusāti had renounced his kingdom after reading the message of his friend King Bimbisāra and had become a monk in the hope of hearing the sweet Dhamma of the Buddha. He had made such a long journey without meeting anyone who would care to teach him. So why should he refuse to welcome respectfully the teaching of his companion? Like a thirsty man, he was very anxious to drink the water of the Dhamma. So he gladly agreed to listen to the teaching respectfully.

Then the Buddha gave the summary or contents of the Discourse giving an Analysis of the Elements (Dhātu-vibhaṅga-sutta, MN 140) as follows: "Monk! A person or a being has six elements, six sense organs, eighteen modes of thought and four kinds of support. He, who exists on these four supports, is free from the current of conceit born of ego-illusion. When such current of conceit is absent in a monk, he is said to be one whose pollutants (āsava) are destroyed.

1. He should be mindful of insight knowledge (vipassanā).
2. He should speak the truth.
3. He should strive to repudiate moral defilements.
4. He should practise the Dhamma only for the extinction of defilements.

After thus stating these fundamentals of the Dhamma, the Buddha explained them one by one in detail.

Pukkusāti Attains Non-Returning

When the Buddha explained the first Dhamma, mindfulness of insight knowledge (vipassanā), the Buddha led the teaching up to the level of an Arahāt and Pukkusāti attained the three lower fruitions on the basis of his good deeds in the past and became a noble one (ariya) and Non-returner (Anāgāmī).

For example, while a king is eating food of various tastes in a golden bowl, he takes such amount of cooked rice as would suit the size of his mouth. When the young prince sitting on his lap shows the desire to eat, the king may put in his mouth the lump of rice that he has taken for his own consumption. The child will eat only such quantity of rice as would be in accord with the size of his mouth. As for the remaining rice, the king may eat it himself or put it back into the golden bowl. In the same way, the Buddha, the lord of the Dhamma, gave a discourse leading up to the level of an Arahāt, a discourse in accordance with his own intellectual powers and on the basis of his former good deeds, and the monk Pukkusāti could consume three fourths of the Dhamma food, that is, the paths and fruitions, and he became a noble Non-returner (Anāgāmī-ariya).

Pukkusāti had no doubt about the Dhamma before he became a Non-returner (Anāgāmi-phala) and when he was following the Buddha's talk on aggregates, sense-organs, elements or mental impressions, etc. But he wondered whether the highly distinguished man who looked like an ordinary man and who was teaching him might be the Buddha because he had heard that the Buddhas made it a practice to go about incognito some times. However, when he attained the fruition of Non-returner (Anāgāmī), he had absolutely no doubt that the teacher was the Buddha.

Before he recognized the Buddha, he had addressed him as: "My friend!" he did not as [877] yet apologize to the Buddha for his mistake because the Buddha was still delivering the discourse according to the series of fundamental teachings, and the monk did not have the opportunity to offer his apology.

Pukkusāti's Request for Ordination

At the end of the discourse there followed a dialogue between the Buddha and the monk Pukkusāti, the latter said: "The Fortunate One, the teacher of Devas and humans, has come here out of great compassion for me! The Buddha who preaches the Good Dhamma has come here out of great compassion for me! The Fortunate One who understands all the Dhamma thoroughly came here out of great compassion for me.” Saying thus joyously, he rose and put his head against the feet of the Buddha, and he added: “Exalted Buddha! Because of my foolishness, I have made a mistake. I thought that I should call you “friend,” (āvuso). I have done so erroneously. Exalted Buddha! Kindly forgive me for the offence against which I should guard myself against in the future.”

Buddha: “Monk! Verily because of your foolishness, you have made a mistake. You thought that I should be called “friend,” and you have called me so erroneously. Monk! I forgive you for the offence because you admit your offence and make amends for it accordingly. Later you must guard yourself against it. Such atonement and such self-restraint contribute to the welfare of those who are committed to my teaching.”

Pukkusāti: “Exalted Buddha, may I receive ordination in your presence.”

Buddha: “Have you got your own bowl and robe?”

Pukkusāti: “No, exalted Buddha, I have not.”

Buddha: “Monk! The Buddhas do not ordain those who do not have an alms bowl and robes.”

Ven. Pukkusāti was very much pleased with the Buddha’s teaching. He expressed his appreciation, rose from his seat, paid respect to the Buddha and went away to search for the alms bowl and robe.

Why did not Pukkusāti receive the alms-bowl and robes that appeared supernormally for the monks whom the Buddha ordained, simply by saying: “Come, monastic!” It is said that he did not receive them because he had never donated the eight requisites to a monk in a previous life. This explanation was not acceptable to the commentator. Certainly, as a man who had given alms and who had great aspirations, he could not be one who had never donated the eight requisites to a monk. In reality the bowls and robes created of supernormal power are meant only for the monks who were in their last existence. Pukkusāti was still subject to rebirth. So he could not have such supernormal requisites.

The Buddha did not seek the bowl and robe for Pukkusāti’s ordination because he had no opportunity to ordain him. The death of Pukkusāti was imminent and he was like a Brahma in the potter’s hut for temporary residence. So the Buddha did not seek the bowl and robe for him.

Pukkusāti went off in search of a bowl and robes just after dawn. Dawn came all at once with the end of the Buddha’s discourse and the emission of the Buddha’s six-coloured body radiance. The Buddha emitted the six-coloured radiance as soon as his teaching was over. The whole hut was brightly illuminated. The six-coloured radiance spread out in groups, as if enveloping all the quarters with gold garments or making all places bright with multi-coloured flowers. The Buddha resolved to become visible to the people of the city and when the people saw the Buddha, they spread the news of his presence in the hut and the matter was reported to King Bimbisāra. [878]

When King Bimbisāra heard the report, he went to the potter’s hut and after paying respects, he asked the Buddha when he had arrived. The Buddha replied that he had arrived at sunset on the previous day. The king again asked about the object of his visit. Then the Buddha said: “Great king, your bosom friend, King Pukkusāti, read your message and after renouncing the world to become a monk, he made the journey out of regard for me, but having travelled 45 leagues beyond Sāvaththī, he entered the potter’s hut and stayed here. For his spiritual welfare I have come here on foot and taught him. Pukkusāti has now attained the fruition of the three lower paths and is a Non-returner (Anāgāmī-ariya).”

On hearing this, the king was surprised and asked the Buddha where his friend King Pukkusāti was. The Buddha replied that he had gone out to get an alms bowl and robes for his ordination. King Bimbisāra immediately rushed out in the direction in which his friend had gone out looking for the alms bowl and robes. Meanwhile the Buddha returned to the fragrant chamber in the Jetavana monastery.

Pukkusāti’s Death and Rebirth in the Brahma World

In his search for an alms bowl and robes, Pukkusāti did not go to his royal friend, King Bimbisāra, or to the merchants who had come from Takkasilā. He considered it unethical for him to search for them here and there, discriminating between the good and the bad like they were fowl. He decided to seek for real rags, not in big cities but in the fords, cemeteries, garbage heaps or narrow streets. So he tried to find torn pieces of cloths in the garbage heap in the back-lanes.

While Pukkusāti was trying to do so, a mentally deranged cow – his enemy in a previous life – rushed towards him and gored him with her horns. Weak and extremely oppressed by hunger, Pukkusāti lost his life as he was hurled into the air. When he fell to the ground, he lay on the garbage heap like a golden statue. After his death he was reborn in the Aviha Brahma abode and before long he became an Arahāt Brahma.

According to the Discourse concerning Ghaṭṭikāra (Ghaṭṭikāra-sutta, SN 1.50) there were seven people who became Arahats soon after their spontaneous (upapatti) rebirth in the Aviha Brahma abode. They were:

1. Upaka.
2. Palagaṇḍa.
3. Pukkusāti.
4. Bhaddiya.
5. Khaṇḍadeva.
6. Bāhuraggi.
7. Siṅgiya.

King Bimbisāra thought: “My friend King Pukkusāti renounced his kingdom merely after reading my message and had made such a long and arduous journey. He has done what is hard for ordinary people to do. I will honour my friend in the way the monks are honoured.” He sent his men to all the environs of the city to search for King Pukkusāti. The men found the king lying dead face down like a golden statue on the garbage heap. So they returned and reported the matter to King Bimbisāra.

King Bimbisāra went there and mourned over his friend, saying: “We did not have the opportunity to honour our great friend while he was alive. Now he has died without anyone to help him.” The king had the corpse carried on a small couch, put in a proper place and not knowing how to honour a dead monk, he sent for the bathers, clothed the body in clean white garments and ornamented like a king.

Then the corpse was placed on a palanquin and honoured with all kinds of music and fragrant flowers, taken to the outskirts of the city and cremated with fragrant fire-wood. The bones were then collected and placed in a shrine (cetiya).

Later on, many monks in Sāvattthī went to see the Buddha. They paid respect to the master and sitting in a proper place they said: “Exalted Buddha, you have briefly taught the Dhamma to Pukkusāti. That man is now dead. What is his destination? What is his future life?”

Then the Buddha replied: “Monks, Pukkusāti was a wise man. He practised insight meditation (vipassanā) that accords with the transcendent Dhamma. He did not give me any [879] trouble on account of the Dhamma. Due to the extinction of the five fetters that lead to the lower sensual worlds, he will be reborn in the Aviha Brahma world and will become an Arahat in that very Suddhāvāsa Brahma world. Aviha is one of its five Pure Abodes (Suddhāvāsa). There is no possibility of his return to the lower sensual worlds from that world.” [866]

The Buddha’s Height

On one occasion, a certain Brahmin citizen of Rājagaha heard that it was impossible to measure the height of the Buddha Gotama. So when the Buddha came into Rājagaha city and made his rounds for alms, he took a 60-cubit long bamboo pole and stood outside the city-gate. When the Buddha drew near the city-gate, he went up to him with the pole. The pole reached up to just below the Buddha’s knee.

The next day, the Brahmin joined two 60-cubit long poles and came again to the Buddha. The joined poles did not stand higher than the waist of the Buddha who asked him what he was doing. The Brahmin replied that he was measuring his height. Then the Buddha said: “Brahmin, even though you may join all the bamboos in the universe, you will not be able to measure my height. Certainly, I have not developed the perfections for four immeasurables and 100,000 aeons to enable somebody to measure my height. I have developed them to the extent that nobody can measure my height. Brahmin, the Buddha is a person who is peerless and immeasurable.” So saying, the Buddha spoke the following verse as contained in the Dhamma Verses (Dhp 196):

Te tādise pūjayato, nibbute akuto bhaye, na sakkā puññaṃ saṅkhātum, imettam-āpi kenaci.

The merit acquired by one who pays homage with faith (saddhā) to those Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas and other noble ones, who have calmed the heat of defilements, who have no source whatsoever from which grief and fear derive, who are endowed with virtues excellent and visible, are incalculable to any one in the three worlds of humans, Devas and Brahmas saying: “This merit is beneficial this much, this merit is profitable this much.”

At the end of the verse, 84,000 beings became noble Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna-ariya), having the opportunity of blissfully enjoying the elixir of Nibbāna.

Rāhu, the Asura Deva King, was 4,800 leagues in height. The distance between his two arms was 1,200 leagues. The thickness of his body was 600 leagues. His palms and his soles were 300 leagues in perimeter. The portion of the finger between two joints was 50 leagues long. The distance between the two eye-brows was 50 leagues. The mouth was 200 leagues long, 300 leagues deep and 300 leagues in circumference. The neck had a girth of 300 leagues. The forehead was 300 leagues. The forehead was 300 leagues in breath and the head 900 leagues.

Rāhu, the Asura King, thought: “I am too tall, I will not be able to look down and see the Fortunate One.” So he did not go to the Buddha. But, one day, he heard words about the greatness of the Buddha and so he went, hoping to see the master by any possible means.

Knowing the Asura Deva King’s mind, the Buddha thought of the posture in which he should be viewed. Then since a person who is standing appears to be tall in spite of his short stature, the Buddha decided to show his body to the Asura King in a lying posture. The Buddha told Ven. Ānanda to put a small couch outside the fragrant chamber and then he lay down on the right side on the couch like a lion king.

Rāhu then went near the Buddha but he had to look up to see the Buddha’s face, just as he had to stretch his neck and look up at the moon in the sky. The Buddha asked him why he had come to see him only after a very long time. The Asura King replied that he had not come because he was under the misapprehension that he would not be able to stoop down far enough to see the exalted Buddha.

Then the Buddha said to him: “Asura King! I have not developed the perfections (pāramī) holding my head down, that is, by relaxing my effort. I have given alms always holding up my head, that is, without relaxing my effort.” On that very day, Rāhu, the Asura King, formally become one who took refuge in the Buddha.

37a: Devadatta

Devadatta Rejected by the Buddha

[Present editor: I have moved this section on Devadatta here from the end of the last chapter.]

The following story of Devadatta, from the time of his ordination to his being swallowed by earth, is condensed as far as possible, although a lengthy account could be given based on many stories about Devadatta in Pāli literature. [925]

Of the six Sakyan princes after their ordination:

1. Ven. Bhaddiya attained the threefold supermundane knowledge and became an Arahāt during the Rains Retreat (Vassa) in that very year.
2. Ven. Anuruddha gained the divine eye (dibbu-cakkhu), and after hearing the Discourse on the Great Thoughts (Mahā-vitakka-sutta, AN 8.30), he became an Arahāt.
3. Ven. Ānanda was established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) after hearing the Discourse about Ānanda (Ānanda-sutta, SN 22.83), containing the simile of the mirror taught by Ven. Puṇṇa Mantāni-putta.
- 4-5. Vens. Bhagu and Kimila later on developed insight (vipassanā) meditation and became Arahats.
6. Devadatta gained mundane psychic powers, remaining a worldling. He never became a noble one (ariya).

At another time while the Buddha was sojourning in Kosambī, he and his many disciples [880] received abundant offerings. People came into the monastery with robes, medicines and other requisites in their hands and asked: “Where is the Fortunate One? Where is Ven. Sāriputta? Where is Ven. Moggallāna? Where is Ven. Mahā Kassapa? Where are Ven. Bhaddiya, Ven. Anuruddha, Ven. Ānanda, Ven. Bhagu or Ven. Kimila?” They were always on the move, looking for the places where the 80 great disciples (mahā-sāvaka) stayed. But there was nobody who bothered to ask about Devadatta’s whereabouts.

Devadatta and Ajātasattu

Then Devadatta thought: “I too became a monk along with Bhaddiya and the others. They are monks of the ruling (khattiya) families; I too am a monk of such a family. But those who brought offerings with them asked for Bhaddiya and the others. As for me, there was not a single person who cared to ask about me even by my name. Whom should I associate with and whom should I make devoted to me so that I have abundant offerings for my own?” He continued to ponder: “King Bimbisāra was established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) together with 110,000 wealthy Brahmins the first time he saw the Buddha. It is not possible to be united with him. Nor is it possible to form an alliance with King Kosala. Prince Ajātasattu, son of King Bimbisāra, however, does not know a person’s virtues or vices as he is still young. I will endear myself to him.”

So thinking he went to Rājagaha and transformed himself into a boy. He adorned himself with four snakes, two on his hands and two on his legs, he also placed a snake on his neck, another one on his head and still another one on his left shoulder; he had the tails of these seven snakes interlocked as a waist band and put it on to decorate himself. Finally he came down from the sky and sat on the lap of Prince Ajātasattu.

The prince was so scared that he asked him who he was. The apparent boy said that he was Devadatta and the prince requested him to show himself as the real Devadatta. Devadatta removed the disguise and stood before the prince in his original physical form, dressed in the monk’s robe and with an alms bowl in his hand. Very much impressed by this magic, Prince Ajātasattu became Devadatta’s devoted follower. He regularly went with 500 chariots every morning and evening to see his teacher. He also sent 500 pots of food, each pot containing food enough for ten monks.

His ego having become inflated because of the abundant offerings that he received, Devadatta conceived the evil desire to make himself the Buddha and lead the Saṅgha. As soon as this desire arose in him, Devadatta lost his supernormal powers based on mundane absorption (jhāna).

Kakudha Brahma

At that time, a lay disciple of Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, a Koliyan Prince named Kakudha became a Brahma after his death. Kakudha Brahma came to Ven. Mahā Moggallāna with his body three miles long and reported how, being puffed up with self-conceit, Devadatta conceived the evil desire to make himself the Buddha and lead the Saṅgha, and how he immediately lost his supernormal powers. After making this report, Kakudha Brahma vanished on the spot.

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna went to the Buddha and informed him of what Kakudha Brahma had told him. The Buddha asked him whether he had verified the Brahma's report by means of his psychic powers of knowing another person's mind. When Ven. Moggallāna replied that he had, the Buddha said:

“Moggallāna! Keep this matter to yourself! Now that man Devadatta who is empty of the path and its fruition will show himself in his true colours.” Then the Buddha gave a talk on the five kinds of bogus teachers:

1. The teacher who claims to have pure morality without having it.
2. The teacher who claims to have pure livelihood without having it.
3. The teacher who claims to have pure teaching without having it.
4. The teacher who claims to have pure speech without having it.
5. The teacher who claims to have pure intellectual vision without having it.

Their respective disciples know all [881] about these five kinds of teachers. But they do not tell their lay followers about their respective teachers because if they do so, their teachers, who have been receiving the four requisites from the laity, will be displeased. So they say nothing and connive at the deception of their teachers, believing that by their deeds they will one day reveal their true colour by themselves. The disciples have to protect only such teachers and such teachers crave for the protection of their disciples. As for the Buddha, he really has pure morality and so he claims it. He really has pure livelihood, pure teaching, pure speech and pure intellectual vision and so he claims to have all these pure assets. For this reason, there is no need for his disciples to protect him in respect of morality, livelihood, teaching, speech and intellectual vision nor does he in the least want such protection.

The Buddha's Sermon about Devadatta's Gains

Then the Buddha left Kosambī city and arrived at Rājagaha where he resided in the Veḷuvana monastery. There, many monks reported to him that Prince Ajātasattu went to Devadatta with 500 chariots in the morning and in the evening, and that he sent 500 pots of cooked food every day. Then the master said: “Monks, do not set great store by the gains of Devadatta. As long as Prince Ajātasattu goes to Devadatta with 500 chariots every morning and evening and sends 500 pots of food daily, it certainly indicates a decline of his good deeds. But their increase is not to be expected. Monks, for example, if the bile of a bear is cut and put in the nose of a wild dog, the animal will become angry and even more violent. Likewise, so long as Prince Ajātasattu goes to Devadatta with 500 chariots every morning and sends 500 pots of food everyday, it certainly indicates Devadatta’s decline in doing good deeds. His doing of more and more good deeds is not to be expected, and he spoke this verse (SN 6.12):.

Phalaṃ ve kadalim̐ hanti, phalaṃ veḷum̐ phalaṃ naḷam̐, sakkāro kāpurisaṃ hanti, gabbho assatarim̐ yathā.

Monks, just as the banana fruit kills the banana plant, the bamboo fruit kills the bamboo plant, the reed fruit kills the reed plant, and the calf in the womb kills the mare mule; so also gains kill a man of corrupt and evil disposition.

“Monks, Devadatta’s reputation for gains will lead to his self-destruction. In the same way, Devadatta’s reputation for gains will lead to his self-destruction.”

Devadatta’s First Grudge against the Buddha

Then one day as the Buddha sat amidst a large assembly, teaching to the king and the people, Devadatta rose and covered his left shoulder with his upper robe as a sign of respect, he raised up his joined hands in adoration towards the Buddha and said: “Exalted Buddha, now you are old, far advanced in age and on the threshold of the last stage of life. Venerable sir! Let the exalted Buddha now live in peace without bothering about anything. Let him hand over the Saṅgha to me. I will lead and look after the Saṅgha.”

The Buddha said: “Devadatta! That is not proper. Do not wish to look after and lead the Saṅgha.” For the second time Devadatta made the same request and the Buddha rejected it. [882] When Devadatta made the request for the third time, the master said: “Devadatta! I would not hand over charge of the Saṅgha even to Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Moggallāna, then why should I hand it over to you, you evil one, you eater of spittle?”

The words of the Buddha rankled Devadatta. “The Buddha rebuked me in the presence of the king and the people with the word: “Eater of spittle (kheḷāsaka),” one who consumes the four impure, eater of spittle-like requisites! He exalts only Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Moggallāna.” So thinking, he was angry and displeased and after paying respects to the Buddha, he went away.

Then the Buddha made the monks pass a resolution against Devadatta in Rājagaha city. It was an act called a declaration (pakāsanīya-kamma) passed with an announcement (ñatti-dutiya) carried out by the assembly of monks after taking the proceeding proclamation (kamma-vācā) at which the motion is put once and followed by the declaration of the Saṅgha’s decision. Then Ven. Sāriputta was nominated by vote to be the person entrusted with the task of making the resolution public in Rājagaha. In accordance with the Buddha’s word of command, the Saṅgha nominated Ven. Sāriputta, and he made the resolution against Devadatta well-known in the city.

On hearing this resolution, those who lacked faith and wisdom blamed the monks, saying: “These monks, these sons of the Sakyan Prince, Buddha, are jealous. They are jealous of Devadatta’s gains!” But those who had faith and wisdom said: “It could not be an evil act on the part of the master to have the facts about Devadatta made public in Rājagaha.”

Herein, a declaration (pakāsanīya-kamma) is an act of the Saṅgha to be performed according to the Discipline (Vinaya). It shows clearly that the acts and sayings of the monk, against whom the Saṅgha have passed the resolution, have nothing to do with the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha and that he acts and says so only on his own authority and of his own free will.

The resolution against Devadatta is somewhat like this: “Formerly Devadatta’s behaviour was of one kind, but now it is quite different. What he does by bodily action or says by word of mouth is not to be identified with the Buddha, the Dhamma or the Saṅgha. It is to be identified only with Devadatta.” The resolution containing words to this effect was passed by the Saṅgha after taking votes.

Then in accordance with the instructions of the Buddha, the Saṅgha formally nominated Ven. Sāriputta again by vote to be the person who was to declare Devadatta an unwelcome or unrepresentative person (persona non grata) publicly in Rājagaha. So accompanied by many monks, Ven. Sāriputta went into the city and made public the dissociation of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha from Devadatta by saying: “Formerly Devadatta’s behaviour was of one kind, now it is quite different. What he does bodily or verbally should not be identified with the Buddha, the Dhamma or the Saṅgha. It should be identified only with Devadatta.”

These in brief are the noteworthy points about the declaration (pakāsanīya-kamma).

Prince Ajātasattu

After he has been declared a monk whose acts and words were disavowed by the Saṅgha, Devadatta thought: “Now the monk Gotama has repudiated me, I will do what is harmful to his welfare.” So he went to Prince Ajātasattu and said: “Prince, people in ancient times lived long but nowadays people are short-lived. There is the possibility of your death even as a prince, so you must kill your father now and become king. I also will kill the Buddha and become the Buddha.”

Prince Ajātasattu thought: “Ven. Devadatta is a powerful person. He says so perhaps because he has a reason for saying so.” So he tied a dagger to his thigh; shaking with fear, he hurried into the palace in broad daylight. The ministers who guarded the king seized and searched the prince. When they found the dagger tied to his thigh, they asked him what he wanted to do. The prince said that he wanted to kill his father. The ministers again asked him at whose instigation he tried to kill the king. The prince admitted that Devadatta had incited him. [883]

Then some ministers held the view that the prince and Devadatta and all the monks should be killed. Some contended that the monks should not be killed as they did no wrong and that only the prince and Devadatta should be killed. Still the rest of the ministers maintained that the prince and Devadatta should not be killed nor should the monks be killed, that the matter should be reported to the king and action taken according to the king’s instructions.

Then the ministers took the prince to the king and informed him of the prince’s attempt to kill him. The king asked them about their views and the ministers stated their three different views. The king said: “How can the Fortunate One or the Dhamma or the Saṅgha be guilty of any offence? They are certainly not guilty. Has not the Fortunate One already declared that Devadatta’s present behaviour is quite different from his former behaviour and has not he publicly disavowed the acts and sayings of Devadatta?” Then the king dismissed the ministers in the first group, demoted the second group of ministers and promoted those in the third group.

Then the king asked his son why he wished to kill him. The prince said that he wanted to become king. King Bimbisāra then said: “Prince, if you want to be a king, then this kingdom is yours,” and he handed over his kingdom there on the spot to Prince Ajātasattu.

As his wish was now fulfilled, Prince Ajātasattu was delighted and he told Devadatta about it. But to incite enmity in the Prince Devadatta he said: “Like a man who covers his drum and hides a fox inside it, you think that you have achieved your object. After two or three days, your father will have a second thought about your impudence and make himself king again.”

The prince asked his teacher what he should do. Devadatta cruelly advised him to kill his father. The prince said that he was not desirable to kill his father with any weapon since he was of royal blood. Devadatta again gave devilish advice that in that case the prince should starve his father to death.

Ajātasattu’s Act of Parricide

King Ajātasattu ordered his father King Bimbisāra to be imprisoned in a very hot and humid iron cage. He did not allow any one except his mother to see the king.

Then Queen Vedehī put some food in a golden bowl and took it into the iron cage. The king ate the food and sustained his life. King Ajātasattu asked how his father managed to keep himself alive and when he heard what his mother was doing, he ordered the ministers not to allow her to enter the cage with food again.

Then the queen hid the food in a knot of her hair and entered the cage. The King ate the food and stayed alive. When King Ajātasattu heard this, he forbade the queen to go into the cage with her hair knotted.

Then the queen put the food in her golden footwear and entered the cage. The king subsisted on the food brought by the queen in her footwear. When Ajātasattu learnt how his father was staying alive, he forbade his mother to visit the king in her footwear.

From that time on, Queen Vedehī bathed herself with fragrant water, coated her body with food made of oil, honey, molasses and butter, and putting on her double robe, she entered the iron cage. The king licked her body and in this way he kept himself alive. When the wicked Ajātasattu heard the news, he imperiously ordered the ministers not to allow his mother to enter the cage under any circumstances.

Thus forbidden to go inside the cage, the queen stood near the door of the cage and cried: “Great King! You, yourself, did not allow this wicked son Ajātasattu to be killed when he was young. You, yourself, raised your own potential enemy. Now, this is the last time that I will see you. From now on, I will not have the opportunity to see you. Forgive me if [884] I have done anything wrong.” Thus muttering and weeping, she went back to her residence.

From that time on, the king had no food to eat. Walking to and fro, he stayed alive only by means of the bliss of the Stream-entry fruition (Sotāpatti-phala) that he had attained. His mind being thus always absorbed in that fruition, the king’s body became very splendid.

The wicked Ajātasattu asked his men how his father managed to survive. His men said that the king kept himself alive by walking to and fro and that he had become more splendid than ever before in his physical appearance. Then King Ajātasattu decided to put an end to the walking exercise of his father and told the barbers to gash the soles of his father’s feet, smear them with oil and salt and broil them before red-hot embers.

When he saw the barbers, King Bimbisāra thought that someone had certainly brought his son to his senses, and that the barbers had come to shave his beard. The barbers approached the king and stood there paying their respects to him. The king asked them about the object of their visit, and they informed him of their purpose. Then the king told them to do according to the desire of their master. The barbers requested the king to sit and, after paying respects to him, they said: “Great King! We have to carry out the order of King Ajātasattu. Do not be angry with us. What we have to do is most inappropriate to a good king like you.” Then holding firmly the soles of his feet with their left hands and sharp razors with their right hands, they gashed the soles, smeared and rubbed them with oil and salt and then broiled them before the red-hot embers.

According to the commentaries in a previous life the king walked on a relic shrine (stūpa) platform with his footwear on and trod on a mat with his unclean feet. The suffering that he now underwent was the lingering effect of that unwholesome act in the past.

King Bimbisāra had to endure excruciating pain. Without harbouring any ill-will, he contemplated the wonderful attributes of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha. Then withering away like a flower dumped on the shrine platform, he became an attendant of Vessavaṇa Deva King in the Catumahārājika realm, and the supreme commander of the Yakkhas having the name Janavasabha.

Herein he was called Janavasabha because as King Bimbisāra he was a noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna-ariya) and the chief of 110,000 Brahmin merchants. Jana- indicates the 110,000 Brahmin merchants, and -vasabha means the chief.

Why did he become a low-class commander in the Catumahārājika realm although he was a great noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna-ariya) before he died? The answer was given by the Yakkha Janavasabha himself.

According to his answer, he passed through seven lifetimes as king on earth after his demise in Catumahārājā realm and seven lifetimes in Catumahārājā after his demise on earth. Now as a noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna-ariya) and by virtue of his many good deeds in respect of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha, he could have attained a higher realm. But because he had spent seven lifetimes successively in the Catumahārājā world, his attachment to life (bhava-nikanti) in that realm was powerful and because of that powerful attachment he ended up in the Catumahārājā realm. This was the confessions of the Yakkha Janavasabha in the Discourse concerning Janavasabha (Janavasabha-sutta, DN 18). His confessions in verse read as follows:

Ito satta tato satta, saṃsārāni catuddasa, nivāsam-abhijānāmi, yattha me vusitaṃ pure.

Here I had seven lives, and there I had seven lives, that is fourteen dwelling places in Saṃsāra that I know of, where I dwelt formerly.

The Remorse of Ajātasattu

On the very day of King Bimbisāra's death, the wife of the foolish King Ajātasattu gave birth to a son, later called Udāyabhadda. So the two messages, one reporting the birth of a son from the chief of the palace and the other reporting the death of the king's father, [885] Bimbisāra, came to the palace at the same time.

The ministers considered it advisable to submit first the report of the birth of a son and they did so accordingly. As soon as he read the report there arose in him an intense love for his son that excited his whole body and made him ecstatic to the marrow. At the same time he became aware of his gratitude to his father, thinking that at the time of his birth his father might have also experienced intense love for his son.

King Ajātasattu then ordered his ministers to release his father at once. But the ministers said that it was impossible and submitted the report of the death of King Bimbisāra. On hearing the news, King Ajātasattu wept bitterly, went to his mother and asked her whether there arose intense love in his father at the time of his birth.

Queen Vedeheī replied: “You foolish son! What do you say? During your childhood you had a whitlow on your finger. The royal nurses were unable to make you stop crying. In the end they took you to your father who was seated in the court of law. Your father kept your finger in his mouth that was afflicted with the whitlow and due to the warmth of his mouth, the tumour erupted there. Out of great love for you, your father did not spit out the pus mixed with putrid blood lest you should wake up and he swallowed it instead. Your father loved you so very much.” The Queen thus told him at length how his father was greatly attached to him. King Ajātasattu wept bitterly and performed the funeral of his father.

Assassins Sent by Devadatta

Then Devadatta went to King Ajātasattu and asked him to despatch men who would kill the Buddha. The king sent the assassins to Devadatta telling them to follow the instructions of his teacher. Devadatta told the first man: “Man, you go to the place where the monk Gotama is now living. You kill Gotama and come back by this way.”

Then he told a couple of men to kill the first man and come back by another way. Then the third batch of four men was instructed to kill the two men and return by another way. A fourth batch of eight men was instructed to kill the four men and come back by another way. Then still another sixteen men were told to kill the eight men and return by another way.

The various killers were hired so who had ordered the killing of the Buddha would never be known.

Armed with a sword and a shield and a bow and a quiver of arrows, the first man went to the Buddha and stood with his body near him, trembling with fear and agitation.

Seeing him, the Buddha said: “Man, come here. Have no fear.” The man got over his fear and put his sword and shield as well as his bow and arrows in a suitable place. Then having approached the Buddha, he bowed his head at the feet of the Buddha and confessed and apologized for his offence. The Buddha forgave him and gave a series of talks on generosity, morality and other good deeds that lead to the attainment of the paths and fruitions. As a result the assassin became a noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna-ariya) and at the same time he sought supermundane refuge in the Three Treasures. Then the Buddha dismissed the assassin telling him not to go by the way instructed by Devadatta but to go by another way.

The two assassins of the second batch waited for the first assassin for a long time. Then going in the opposite direction they saw the Buddha seated at the foot of a tree. They went up to the Buddha, paid respects and sat at a proper place. The Buddha gave them a series of Dhamma talks and explained the four truths and established them in the fruition of Stream-entry. Like the first assassin, they too became noble Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna-ariya) and thereby took supermundane refuge in the Three Treasures. [886]

Again, the Buddha dismissed these assassins, telling them to go by another way. Then the four assassins of the third batch, then the eight assassins of the fourth batch, the sixteen assassins of the fifth batch waited for the eight assassins for a long time and going in the opposite direction, they saw the Buddha as did those who went before them. They paid respects to the Buddha and sat at a proper place. The Buddha gave them a Dhamma talk on the four truths and established them in the fruition of Stream-entry. After they had gained supermundane refuge in the Three Treasures, the Buddha dismissed the men, telling them to go back by another way.

Then the first assassin approached Devadatta and said: “Sir, I cannot kill the exalted Buddha. He is so very powerful.” Devadatta said: “Enough then! Do not kill the monk Gotama. I will kill him myself.”

After having helped the assassins to gain Stream-entry, the Buddha was one day walking to and fro in the shadow of the Gijjhakūṭa Hill. Then Devadatta climbed the hill and rolled down a large rock with the intention of killing him. As it rolled down, two promontories appeared automatically and blocked the rock. A slither of the rock flew off and caused blood to flow on the foot of the Buddha.

The Buddha looked up and said to Devadatta: “You foolish man, you can now make no spiritual progress! You have caused my blood to flow with ill-will and murderous intent. You have done much evil.”

Then the Buddha said to the monks: “Monks, Devadatta has done this first heinous act having immediate result upon death (anantariya-kamma) because he spilled my blood with ill-will and murderous intent.”

The monks carried the Buddha to the monastery in Maddakucchi Park. There the Buddha expressed his desire to go to the monastery in Jīvaka’s Mango Grove and told the monks to take him there. Accordingly, the monks took him there.

On hearing the news, the great physician Jīvaka went to the Buddha and applied a highly potent medicine to the wound. Having bandaged the wound, he told the Buddha to keep the bandage intact until his return from his visit to a patient in the city. After calling on the patient and doing the needful for him, the physician came back but did not reach the city before the gate was closed.

Then the physician Jīvaka thought: “I have applied a powerful medicine to the foot of the exalted Buddha and bandaged the wound treating him like an ordinary patient. I have made a grave mistake. This is the time to untie the bandage. If the bandage is not untied, he will suffer intense pain the whole night.” So thinking, Jīvaka was very worried. At that moment, the Buddha called Ānanda and said: “Ānanda, the physician Jīvaka came back after dark and could not reach the city gate before it was closed. He is worried because now is the time to untie the bandage. Untie the bandage immediately.” Ven. Ānanda removed the bandage and the wound was gone, like bark detached from a tree.

As soon as the city-gate was opened, Jīvaka hurried to the Buddha even before dawn and asked him whether he suffered any pain. The Buddha said: “Jīvaka, I have overcome all pain since I gained Supreme Awakening under the Bodhi tree,” and then he taught the following verse (Dhp 90):

Gataddhino visokassa, vip̐pamuttassa sabbadhi, sabba-ganthappahīnassa, pariḷāho na vijjati.

Jīvaka! There is absolutely no sorrow, no suffering in the Arahāt who has been liberated from Saṃsāra, who has gone to the other shore of Saṃsāra, who is free from all grief, who has no attachment whatsoever to all things including the body, etc., the one who has removed all his fetters. [887]

Suffering (pariḷāho) is of two kinds, viz., physical (kāyika) and mental (cetasika) suffering. Physical suffering is due to cold, heat, etc., which occurs in the Arahāt, and so he is not free from physical suffering. The physician Jīvaka had this in mind when he asked the question. But as lord of the Dhamma, the Buddha was supremely skilful in teaching, and he answered that the Arahāt who possessed the above-mentioned attributes had no suffering, meaning mental suffering. Jīvaka asked whether the Buddha had any suffering and the Buddha said that he had none.

By the end of the discourse, many living beings gained the Stream-entry and so forth.

Many monks, who heard the report about Devadatta's attempt to kill the Buddha, surrounded the residence of the Buddha in one ring after another. They recited the scriptures loudly and walked up and down to guard, protect and ensure the security of the Buddha.

On hearing their recitation and the noise of their movement the Buddha asked Ven. Ānanda, in spite of his knowledge, and when he told him about the vigilant monks, he summoned the monks and said:

Aṭṭhānam-etam, bhikkhave, anavakāso, yaṃ parūpakkamena Tathāgataṃ jīvitaṃ voropeyya. Anupakkamena, bhikkhave, Tathāgatā parinibbāyanti.

Monks, it is wholly impossible for anyone to kill the Buddha. He added that it was impossible for any one to kill a Buddha and that Buddhas always attained Nibbāna, and could not be killed beforehand.

Then the Buddha said to them, as he did to Ven. Mahā Moggallāna on one occasion, that there are five kinds of teachers in the world, that only these kinds of teachers need the protection of their disciples, that, as for the Buddha, he truly claimed pure morality, pure livelihood, pure teaching, pure speech and pure intellectual vision as he had all these virtues and therefore, he did not need the protection of his disciples. Finally the Buddha said to the monks: “Monks, go back to your own abode. The Buddhas are not beings whose security depends on other people's protection.”

Nālāgiri the Elephant

The story of the sending of Nālāgiri occurs in the Section on the Chapter about Schism in the Saṅgha (Saṅgha-bhedakakkhandhaka, Vin Cv 7), and the exposition of the Short Birth Story about the Golden Goose (Cūlahamsa-jātaka, Ja 533). Here the latter is the basis for the following story.

Due to the treatment given by the physician Jīvaka, the Buddha recovered his fitness and as before, he went about in the glory of a great Buddha, surrounded by monks. On seeing the Buddha, Devadatta thought: “It is impossible for any men to approach and kill the monk Gotama when he sees him in the glow of his physical body at its zenith. But King Ajātasattu’s elephant, Nālāgiri, is vicious, wild and homicidal. He does not know any good thing about the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha. Only that wild Nālāgiri can kill the monk Gotama.” So he went to the king and told him about his plan.

King Ajātasattu agreed to his plan. He summoned the mahout and ordered him to intoxicate Nālāgiri the elephant and send him out the next morning along the same way the Buddha was taking. King Ajātasattu had it announced by the beat of drum in the city that all citizens should do their business early the next morning and avoid going about in the streets as Nālāgiri [888] would be intoxicated and would be sent into the city.

Devadatta also left the palace, went to the elephant-shed and told the mahouts: “Men, we are the king’s teachers who can have the king’s servants promoted or demoted in their work. If you want to be promoted, then give the elephant sixteen pots of very potent liquor early in the morning and when the monk Gotama comes into the city, incite and enrage the animal with goads and spears. Let the elephant break open the shed, rush in the direction of the monk Gotama and kill him.” The mahouts agreed to follow his instructions.

The news spread throughout the whole city. The Buddha’s lay devotees who adored the Three Treasures approached the Buddha and said: “Exalted Buddha, in collaboration with the king, Devadatta will send the wild elephant, Nālāgiri, tomorrow along the same way by which you are coming. Do not come into the city for alms tomorrow but stay here in Veḷuvana monastery. We will offer meals to you and the monks in the monastery.”

The Buddha did not say that he would not go into the city for alms. But he decided to teach the wild elephant the next day, perform the miracle (pāṭihāriya) of the teaching, subdue the heretics, and without going about for alms in Rājagaha, return to Veḷuvana with monks from the city.

Pāṭihāriya means “the removal of evil deeds.” There are three ways of removal: 1) Removal by teaching (anusāsāni-pāṭihāriya); 2) removal by performance of a miracle such as the creation of different forms (iddhi-pāṭihāriya); and 3) removal by knowing the listener’s mental state (ādesanā-pāṭihāriya).

The Buddha knew that the lay followers in Rājagaha would bring many pots and bowls of food and that he could have his meal in the monastery. For this reason the Buddha accepted the invitation of the laymen. Knowing very well the acceptance of their invitation by the Buddha, the laymen decided to bring and offer food at the monastery and went away.

The Buddha taught the monks in the first watch of the night and answered the questions of Devas and Brahmas in the second watch. The third watch was divided into three periods. In the first period, the Buddha lay down on his right side like a lion-king. In the second, he was absorbed in the Arahat fruition. In the third, he was filled with infinite compassion, and after arising from that state, he surveyed the worthy beings, and saw Nāḷāgiri. The Buddha saw clearly that when he taught the elephant, 840,000 beings would realize the four truths and become liberated. So, after cleaning his body at dawn, he called Ven. Ānanda and said: “Ānanda, tell all the monks who live in the eighteen monasteries around Rājagaha to come with me into the city.”

Ven. Ānanda acted according to the instructions of the Buddha. All the monks assembled in the Veḷuvana monastery. The Buddha entered Rājagaha surrounded by many monks.

Then the mahouts carried out the instructions of King Ajātasattu and Devadatta. There was a very large gathering of people. At the meeting those who had faith in the Buddha said: “Today, there will be a battle between the two bull elephants, the Buddha and Nāḷāgiri. We will witness clearly the admonition of the animal bull, Nāḷāgiri, by the Buddha bull.” So saying they climbed the turreted and unturreted mansions, house roofs, etc., to wait and see the battle.

But as for the heretics, who had no faith in the Buddha, they said: “This Nāḷāgiri elephant [889] is vicious, violent and homicidal. He does not know anything good about the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha. Today he will destroy the bright, yellow and golden body of the monk Gotama and terminate his life. Today we will clearly see the end of our enemy.” So saying, they climbed the turreted and non-turreted mansions, house roofs, etc. and waited there.

When Nāḷāgiri the elephant saw the Buddha coming, it rushed towards the Buddha like a moving mountain with its trunk raised, his ears and tails set upright, scaring the people, destroying the houses and crushing the carts to pieces.

When the monks saw the elephant rushing, they said to the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, the wild, vicious and homicidal Nāḷāgiri is coming this way. This animal does not know anything good about the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha. We want the exalted Buddha, the Gracious One, to step aside and keep off the way along which the elephant is coming.” Then the Buddha said: “Monks! Have no fear! I can tame Nāḷāgiri.”

Then Ven. Sāriputta said: “Exalted Buddha, it is the duty of the eldest son to attend to any matter that concerns his father. Let me tame the elephant.” But the Buddha turned down his request, saying: “Sāriputta, the power of the Buddha is one thing and the power of the disciples is a different matter. You need not take any trouble for me.” Most of the 80 great disciples made the same request but the Buddha did not give his consent.

Then, because of his great love for the Buddha, Ven. Ānanda could no longer restrain himself. He came forward and stood in front of the master, bent on sacrificing his life for him and allowing himself to be the first trampled to death by the elephant. The Buddha said: “Keep back, Ānanda. Do not come and stand in front of me.” Ven. Ānanda replied: “Exalted Buddha, this elephant is vicious, wild and homicidal. It is like the fire that destroys the world. Let it come to you after first trampling me to death.” The Buddha dissuaded Ven. Ānanda three times but the latter persisted in standing before him. Finally, he had to remove him by his psychic power and put him back amongst the monks.

At that moment, a child’s mother saw the elephant and fearful of death, she fled, abandoning the child from her bosom on the ground between the Buddha and the elephant. Nāḷāgiri pursued the woman but being unable to overtake her, it turned back and approached the child. The Buddha focused his loving-kindness specifically (odissaka-mettā) on the elephant and in a very sweet voice of a Brahma-king, he said: “Nāḷāgiri, they served you sixteen pots of liquor and made you drunk not to catch any other being, but verily to kill me. So do not go about harassing pedestrians. Come straight to where I am.” In this way the master invited the elephant.

On hearing the sweet words of the Buddha, the wild Nāḷāgiri opened both his eyes and saw the glorious body of the Buddha. He was shocked, and owing to the power of the Buddha, he became sober and dropping his trunk and flapping his ears, he went up to him and crouched at his feet.

Then the Buddha said: “Nāḷāgiri, you are an animal and I am a Buddha. From now on, do not be vicious, violent and homicidal. Try to cultivate loving-kindness towards all living beings.” The Buddha stretched his right hand, and stroking the forehead of the elephant, he spoke the following two verses (Ja 533):

*Mā kuñjara nāgam-āsado, dukkhañ-hi kuñjara nāgam-āsado, [890]
na hi Nāga-hatassa kuñjara sugati, hoti ito paraṃ yato.*

O, Elephant Nāḷāgiri! Do not approach with murderous intent, with the desire to kill the Buddha who has never done any evil. To approach the Buddha with murderous intent is an evil that will lead to suffering. There is absolutely no possibility of good rebirth in the Deva or human worlds after the death of anyone who wants to hurt or kill the Buddha.

*Mā ca mado mā ca pamādo, na hi pamattā sugatiṃ vajanti te,
tvañ-ñeva tathā karissasi, yena tvaṃ Sugatiṃ gamissasi.*

O, Elephant Nāḷāgiri! Do not be conceited. Do not be unmindful of the ten good deeds. Those, who are unmindful of the ten good deeds, do not have good rebirth in Deva and human worlds. You will have to do such good deeds as will ensure good rebirth.

The elephant Nāḷāgiri was overwhelmed with ecstasy. If he had not been an elephant, he would have attained the fruition of Stream-entry on the spot.

On seeing this miracle, the people gave a resounding ovation. They clapped their hands and joyously threw various ornaments over the elephant as their rewards. The ornaments covered nearly the whole body of the elephant and from that time he came to be known as Dhanapāla. At the time when Dhanapāla was tamed by the Buddha, 84,000 beings had the opportunity to sample the Dhamma, the elixir of the deathless.

The Buddha established the elephant in the five precepts. The elephant gently collected the dust at the master's feet, scattered it over his head and stepped back on its knees. He stepped at the last place within sight of the Buddha and after paying respects entered the elephant-shed. From that time he became a docile, good tempered and very tame elephant and did not harm any being for the rest of his life.

Having his wish fulfilled, the Buddha resolved that the ornaments that had accumulated be returned to their owners. He thought: "Today, I have performed a great miracle and so it is not advisable for me to go about in the city for food." Having thus subdued the heretics, he left Rājagaha city and returned to the Veḷuvana monastery, surrounded by monks like a triumphant king back from the battlefield. The citizens went to the monastery with much food and offered alms lavishly. They sang the following song joyously (Cv, PTS 2.196):

Daṇḍeneke damayanti, aṅkusehi kasāhi ca, adaṇḍena asatthena, nāgo danto mahesinā.

Some animal trainers train elephants, horses and cattle by beating them violently with iron spikes, sticks, spears, goads, hooks and canes. As for the Buddha, he tamed the elephant Nālāgiri without using any destructive weapon and removed his violent temper through loving-kindness.

Decline of Devadatta

Devadatta's attempt on the life of the Buddha caused a big outcry among the people. They loudly blamed King Ajātasattu, saying: "It was Devadatta who caused the death of our King Bimbisāra. It was Devadatta who sent the assassins. It was he who rolled down the rock; and now he has sent the elephant Nālāgiri to kill the master. Yet such an evil man is appointed teacher by King Ajātasattu who goes about with him."

When King Ajātasattu heard the people's reproach, he ordered the withdrawal of his regular offer of 500 pots of food to Devadatta and he stopped going to see his former teacher. The citizens, too, ceased to offer any food to Devadatta who visited their houses for alms. [891]

His gains having dwindled day by day, Devadatta decided to do something dramatic and spectacular for his living. He went to the Buddha and said: "Exalted Buddha, I beg you to lay down the following rules for the monks:

37a: Devadatta – 1310

1. All monks should live in a forest hermitage for life. A monk, who lives in a monastery near a village, should be guilty of an offence.
2. All monks should eat only the food that they obtain by going on the alms round. A monk, who accepts the food which the laymen have offered after invitation, should be guilty of an offence.
3. All monks should wear only robes made of rags. A monk, who accepts robes offered by laymen, should be guilty of an offence.
4. All monks should dwell at the feet of trees. A monk, who goes to a monastery with a roof, should be guilty of an offence.
5. All monks should avoid eating meat and fish. A monk who eats meat or fish, should be guilty of an offence.

Then the Buddha said: “Devadatta, your demands are not proper or reasonable.

1. Let the monk live in a forest hermitage or in the monastery near a village according to his desire.
2. Let the monk eat the food that he gets by going on alms round or by accepting the food offered by laymen after invitation.
3. Let the monk wear robes made of rags, or robes offered by laymen according to his desire.
4. Devadatta, I have permitted the monks to dwell at the foot of trees for eight months only, but not during the Rainy Season.
5. I have permitted the monks to eat meat or fish provided they do not see or hear or have any suspicion about any creature being killed for their food.

Herein when Devadatta made the five demands, the Buddha knew instantly that his object was to create a schism in the Saṅgha. As concessions to these demands would be a hindrance to spiritual progress, the Buddha considered them unreasonable and said that a monk might live in forest hermitage if he wanted to, and so on. In this connection, a good monk should know the wish of the Buddha as well as what is proper for him.

According to the Buddha, there are four kinds of monks: The forest-dwelling monk who will gain the paths and fruitions by virtue of his great physical and intellectual strength; the monk who cannot live in the forest because of his physical weakness and who can make spiritual progress only if he practises the Dhamma in the village monastery; the monk who will make spiritual progress either in the forest hermitage or in the village monastery by virtue of his physical strength and forbearance; and the monk who at most understands the words (pada-parama) who will make no spiritual progress in spite of his effort either in the forest or the village monastery.

The Buddha wants only the monk of the first kind to live in a forest hermitage. The hermitage is a proper abode for him and following his example, his disciples will want to live in the forests. The Buddha wants the second type to live in a village monastery.

According to the Buddha, the monk of the third type should live only in a forest hermitage. The forest hermitage is good for him and following his example, his disciples will want to live there.

As for the monk who will not make much spiritual progress in this life (pada-parama), the Buddha wants him to live in a forest hermitage. Practice of austerities (dhutaṅga) and meditation in the forest hermitage will contribute to his attainment of the paths and fruitions in his next life and he will be a living example for his disciples. [892]

Thus, when the Buddha says is let a monk live in a monastery near a village according to his desire, he means a monk who cannot live in the forest because of his physical weakness and who will achieve his spiritual goal only if he practises the Dhamma in a village monastery. This concession also enables other monks to live in the village monastery.

If the Buddha accepted Devadatta's demands, it would rule out the possibility of spiritual progress for two kinds of monks: One who is physically weak and the monk who lived in the forest when he was young but who cannot live there in his old age owing to a decline in health and so has to live in the village monastery to achieve his spiritual goal. For these reasons the Buddha rejected Devadatta's demands.

Schism

Devadatta was delighted when the Buddha refused to comply with his five demands. Together with his followers, Kokālika, Kaṭamodaka Tissaka, the son of Queen Khaṇḍā, and Samuddadatta, he rose, paid respects to the Buddha, and went away.

The monk Kokālika, Queen Khaṇḍā's son Kaṭamodaka Tissaka and the monk Samuddadatta were Devadatta's close and trusted disciples.

Then Devadatta went to Rājagaha with his followers and propagated their doctrine. They told the people that the Buddha had rejected what they regarded as their reasonable demands for five rules that would contribute to non-attachment, etc. and that they, on their part, would live in accordance with those five rules.

People who lacked faith and intelligence extolled Devadatta and blamed the Buddha. Those who had faith and intelligence criticized Devadatta for trying to create a schism in the Saṅgha and undermine the authority of the Buddha. The monks, who heard the people's words, also criticized Devadatta and reported to the Buddha.

Then the Buddha called a meeting of the Saṅgha in connection with the matter reported by the monks and in the presence of all monks, he asked: "Devadatta, is it true that you are trying to create a schism in the Saṅgha and destroy its authority?" Devadatta replied: "Yes, venerable sir!"

Then the Buddha said: "Devadatta, what you are doing is not proper. Do not wish to see dissension in the Saṅgha. One who causes a schism in the Saṅgha bears a very grave responsibility. One who causes a schism in a united Saṅgha commits an evil that will last one whole aeon (kappa). He will also suffer in hell for all that time.

Devadatta, one who restores unity to a disunited Saṅgha commits a good deed and enjoys life in the Deva realm for one whole aeon. Devadatta, what you are doing is not proper. Do not wish to see dissension in the Saṅgha. One who causes a schism in the Saṅgha bears a very grave responsibility."

Although the Buddha thus admonished him, Devadatta did not give up his attempt and carried out the preliminary plan for the schism. The next day, he decided to perform the Observance Day (Uposatha) service and acts of the Saṅgha (Saṅgha-kamma) separately. In the morning, he approached Ven. Ānanda who came into Rājagaha for alms, and he said: "Dear Ānanda, from today I will perform the Observance Day service and acts of Saṅgha without the Buddha and his monks."

When Ven. Ānanda reported the matter to the Buddha, he breathed forth the following verse (Ud 5.8):

Sukaram sādhanā sādhanū, sādhanū pāpena dukkaram, pāpam pāpena sukaram, pāpam-ariyehi dukkaram.

It is easy for a good man to do a good deed, it is hard for an evil man to do a good deed, it is easy for an evil man to do an evil deed, [893] it is hard for a good man to do an evil deed.

Then on that Observance Day, Devadatta rose from his seat in the assembly of monks and said that the monk Gotama had rejected his demand for five rules that would lead to non-attachment, and so on, but that he would abide by the five rules and that those who liked the rules should vote for them. The votes were taken and the 500 young monks of Vajji country who lived in Vesālī and who were ignorant of the Vinaya teaching voted for the rules as they thought that the rules represented the Dhamma, Vinaya and the sayings of the Buddha. Devadatta took the 500 monks and went to Gayāsīsa.

Sending the Two Chief Disciples

Then Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, the two chief disciples, went to the Buddha and Ven. Sāriputta informed him of Devadatta's schismatic defection and his departure for Gayāsīsa with 500 monks. The Buddha reproached them for having no compassion for the young monks and urged them to go and save the monks from spiritual ruin. The two elders promised to do so and after paying respect to the Buddha they left for Gayāsīsa.

Then a monk came and stood crying near the Buddha. The Buddha asked him why he was crying. The monk said that the two chief disciples of his, Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Moggallāna, had gone to Devadatta, presumably because they preferred Devadatta's teaching. Then the Buddha said: "Monk, there is absolutely no reason why Sāriputta and Moggallāna should like Devadatta's teaching. In fact, they have gone there in order to enlighten the 500 young monks who have become Devadatta's followers."

At that time, Devadatta was seated teaching in the midst of many of his followers. When he saw from afar the two elders coming, he said to the young monks: "Monks look over there! I have proclaimed my doctrine very well. Even the monk Gotama's chief disciples, Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Moggallāna prefer my teaching, and they are now coming over to join me."

Then the monk Kokālika, one of the leaders of his sect, warned Devadatta: "Friend Devadatta, do not associate with Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Moggallāna.

They have evil desires and they follow their evil desires.” But Devadatta said: “Friend, you should not say like this. Their coming here is good for us because it is motivated by their appreciation of my teaching.”

When the two Venerables came near, Devadatta said: “Come, Ven. Sāriputta, sit here,” and offered to share his seat with him. But Ven. Sāriputta refused to accept his offer and took his seat in a suitable place, as did Ven. Moggallāna.

Having taught the monks the whole night, Devadatta said to Ven. Sāriputta: “Friend Sāriputta, the monks are free from sloth and torpor. You carry on with your talk on the Dhamma. My neck is stiff and cramped. Let me stretch my back.” Here he imitated the Buddha in the way he urged Ven. Sāriputta to take over the teaching.

Ven. Sāriputta agreed. After spreading his big fourfold double robe, Devadatta lay down on his right side. As he was tired, unmindful and devoid of intelligence, he instantly fell asleep.

Then Ven. Sāriputta taught the 500 young monks first by making them aware of their own mental states (ādesanā-pāṭihāriya). This was followed by his pointing out the things that they should avoid and the things that they should practise (anusāsāni-pāṭihāriya). Ven. Mahā Moggallāna taught them first by performing miracles (iddhi-pāṭihāriya) and then telling them what to avoid and what to follow. Therefore the 500 young monks gained the fruition of Stream-entry right then and there and became noble Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna-ariya).

After the 500 young monks had become noble Stream-enterers, Ven. Sāriputta told them that he and Ven. Moggallāna would return to the Buddha and that those who liked his teaching might go along with them. All the monks [894] followed them and, travelling through the air by their psychic power, they reached Veḷuvana.

After the two chief disciples had gone away with the 500 young monks, Kokālika, a teacher of the sect, woke Devadatta up by hitting his chest with his knee and saying: “Get up, Devadatta! Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Moggallāna have taken away the young monks. Have I not told you that you should not associate with them, that they have evil desires and that they follow their evil desires?” Then Devadatta vomited hot blood on the spot.

Birth Stories concerning Devadatta

When the monks living in the Veḷuvana monastery saw Ven. Sāriputta returning with the 500 monks, they said to the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, when Ven. Sāriputta left for Gayāsīsa, he had only Ven. Mahā Moggallāna as his companion. Now on his return from there he has so many followers and is indeed glorious.”

The Buddha said: “Monks, it is not only now that Sāriputta is glorious. When he came back to me as an animal in a previous life he was also glorious.” and he recounted the Birth Story about the Deer named Lakkhaṇa (Lakkhaṇa-miga-jātaka, Ja 11).

Again, when the monks reported that Devadatta imitated the Buddha by trying to preach like an exalted Buddha with the two chief disciples on the right and left side, the Buddha said: “Monks, it is not only now; also a long time ago Devadatta tried to imitate me but it was in vain.” Then the Buddha told them the Birth Story about the Hero Crow Vīrika (Vīrika-jātaka, Ja 204).

On the following days, too, the Buddha narrated the Birth Story about the Woodpecker Kandagalaka (Kanda-galaka-jātaka, Ja 210) in connection with Devadatta.

Again the Birth Story about the Quick Bird and a Lion (Sakuṇa-jātaka, Ja 308) was recounted in connection with Devadatta’s ingratitude.

Then in connection with Devadatta’s attempt to kill the Buddha, he told the Birth Story about the Antelope (Kuruṅga-miga-jātaka, Ja 21) and others.

Then one day the monks were talking about Devadatta’s downfall in respect to the offerings he received from the laity and in respect of his spiritual life when the Buddha said: “Monks, it is not only now that Devadatta had his downfall. He had it also long ago,” and he narrated the Birth Story about Falling Both Ways (Ubhato-bhaṭṭha-jātaka, Ja 139), etc.

Here is a short list of Birth Stories (Jātaka) which the Buddha recounted in connection with Devadatta:

Book of the Ones:

the Birth Story about the Merchant from Seri (Serivāṇi-jātaka, Ja 3)

the Birth Story about the Deer named Lakkhaṇa (Lakkhaṇa-jātaka, Ja 11) the Birth Story about the Thieving Parrot Sattigumba (Satti-gumba-jātaka, Ja 503)

the Birth Story about Prince Somanassa (Somanassa-jātaka, Ja 505).

The Last Days of Devadatta

Thus while residing in Rājagaha, the Buddha recounted many Birth Stories (Jātaka) concerning Devadatta and then he went to Sāvathī where he dwelt in the Jetavana monastery.

Having been ill for nine months, Devadatta had the desire to see the Buddha at the last moment. So he told his disciples to take him to the Buddha. But his disciples said: “You went about as the enemy of the Buddha when you were healthy. So we dare not take you to him now.” Then Devadatta said: “My disciples, do not ruin me. As a matter of fact, it was only I who bore grudge against the Buddha. He did not have the slightest grudge against me.” There is this verse in Milindapañha (Mil PTS 410):

Vadhake Devadattamhi, core Aṅgulimālake, Dhanapāle Rāhule ca, sabbattha sama-mānaso.

My cousin brother, the Buddha, had good-will towards his brother-in-law Devadatta who was bent on killing him, towards Aṅgulimāla the robber who adorned himself with 1,000 fingers, towards Nāḷāgiri the wild elephant, later called Dhanapāla, towards his own son, Rāhula and towards all living beings equally.

“Take me now to my brother, the exalted Buddha.” Thus Devadatta again and again entreated them to let him see the Buddha. Then his disciples laid him on a couch and carried him to Sāvathī where the Buddha was staying. When the monks heard the news that Devadatta was coming, they reported to the Buddha. The Buddha said: “Devadatta would not be able to see me in the present existence, under any circumstances, though I may remain here.” The monks were nonplussed and they did not know what to make of the Buddha’s saying. Therefore, again and again they informed him of Devadatta’s arrival at such and such a place. But he still insisted that whatever Devadatta did: “By no means will he see me.”

But, from time to time, the monks reported the progress of Devadatta’s journey saying that he was now one league away from Sāvathī. That he was now only a mile away and that he was close upon the pond near the Jetavana monastery. Finally the Buddha said: “Devadatta will not see me even though he may get into the Jetavana monastery.”

Devadatta Swallowed by the Earth

The disciples bearing Devadatta laid down the couch on the bank of the pond near the Jetavana monastery and stepped into the pond to bathe. Devadatta sat up on the couch putting his two feet on the ground. Then his feet sank into the earth irresistibly. Down he went, the parts of his body sinking one after another, the ankle, the kneecap, the waist, the chest, and the neck, and the earth had gorged him up to the jaw-bones when he uttered the following verse (Mil PTS 111):

*Imehi aṭṭhīhi tam-aggā-puggalaṃ, devātidevaṃ nara-damma-sārathim, samanta-cakkhum sata-puñña-lakkhaṇaṃ, [896]
pāṇehi Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ upemi.*

I, Devadatta, on my death-bed seek refuge in the Fortunate One with these bones and this lingering life-force. With intelligent, noble, joyous mind motivated by the three noble root-conditions I seek refuge in the omniscient Buddha, the supreme one in the world, the all-seeing teacher who can discipline all worthy beings and who possesses the 32 splendid marks of a great man by virtue of his countless good deeds.

It was because of the Buddha’s fore-knowledge of Devadatta’s repentance that the Buddha ordained him. Even if he had not been a monk, he would certainly have committed the same heinous crime as a layman and later on he would not have been able to do the good deed that would contribute to his liberation from Saṃsāra.

The Buddha knew that after ordination Devadatta would do the two most evil deeds: Causing the spilling of the Buddha’s blood and creating schism in the Saṅgha and that later on he would do a good deed making for his release from Saṃsāra. So the Buddha ordained him. Indeed, because of this good deed, Devadatta will be a Paccekabuddha by the name of Aṭṭhissara, after 100,000 aeons.

After uttering the verse, Devadatta entered the earth and landed in the relentless Avīci hell. It seemed as if he was to suffer relentlessly in the hell because he had wronged the Buddha. In the great Avīci hell, 100 leagues in width, Devadatta’s body was 100 leagues in height. His head was inside an iron pan up to his two ears. The two legs were inside the red-hot iron bottom up to the ankles. He was roasted standing and facing east. An iron stake with the thickness of a palm tree protruding from the west side of the hell-pot pierced right through the middle of Devadatta's back, came out from the front breast and went into the east side of the hell-pot. Another iron stake came out of the south side of the hell-pot, passed through Devadatta's right side, came out from the left side and went into the north side of the hell-pot. Still another iron stake came from the iron pan, pierced right through the top of the head, came out of the bottom and went into the iron floor under the hell-pot. In this way Devadatta was roasted relentlessly in the great Avīci hell.

In the Avīci hell: 1) The denizens are jammed in without any space; 2) the hell fires are continuous and cover the whole realm, leaving no space; and 3) the inhabitants have no respite to their suffering. They have to suffer all the time. Thus, because there is no vacant space among the inhabitants, or no cessation as regards the hell fires or suffering, the hell is called the great relentless Avīci hell.

Narration of Birth Stories after Devadatta's Death

After Devadatta was thus swallowed up by the earth, the topic of conversation among the monks was Devadatta's inability to see the Buddha although he had travelled laboriously 45 leagues for this purpose. The Buddha said that Devadatta was swallowed by the earth also in one of his former lives and told the story of the elephant Sīlava.

When the Bodhisatta was the elephant Sīlava, he put a man who had lost his way on his back and took him to a safe place. Yet the man came back thrice to cut his tusks, and when he went back with the last portion of the tusks he was swallowed up by the earth as soon as he went out of sight of the Bodhisatta. This man, a hunter, named Mittadubbhi became Devadatta (Ja 51).

Then again the Buddha recounted the Birth Story about the One who Spoke of Forbearance (Khantivādī-jātaka, Ja 313) to show how King Kalābu, Devadatta at that time, was gorged by the earth when he wronged the Bodhisatta, recluse Khantivādī.

The Buddha also told the Short Birth Story about Prince Dhammapāla (Cūḷa-dhammapāla-jātaka, Ja 358) in which, as King Mahāpatāpa, Devadatta was swallowed by the earth for having wronged his own son, Cūḷa Dhammapāla, who was the Bodhisatta. [897]

After the death of Devadatta people were overjoyed. They set up all kinds of flags and banana plants, etc, and placed pots full of water and celebrated their riddance of Devadatta. When this was reported to the Buddha by the monks, he said that in ancient times, too, the death of Devadatta delighted many people. To illustrate his saying, the Buddha recited the Birth Story about the Unjust King Mahāpiṅgala (Mahā-piṅgala-jātaka, Ja 240) in which people rejoiced at the death of the evil King Piṅgala in Bārāṇasī.

The monks asked the Buddha about the afterlife of Devadatta. The Buddha said that he had landed in Avīci hell. The monks said: “Exalted Buddha, Devadatta had to suffer much in the present life and now at the end of this life also he has landed in a world of much suffering.”

Then the Buddha said: “Yes, monks, that is true. All beings whether monks or laymen who are unmindful in respect of good deeds have to suffer in the present life and the afterlife.” And the Buddha uttered the following verse (Dhp 17):

*Idha tappati pecca tappati, pāpa-kārī ubhayattha tappati,
pāpaṃ me katanti tappati, bhiyyo tappati duggatim gato.*

Monks, the man who does evil has to suffer because of the effect of his evil act. He has to suffer both in the present life and the afterlife. Stricken by his conscience: “I have done an evil deed,” he has to grieve in the present life. When he lands in the lower, evil world after his death, he has to grieve extremely because of the effect of his deed.

By the end of the discourse many beings became noble Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna-ariya), and higher, and the discourse was beneficial to many people. [898]

37b: Ajātasattu

[The following is based on the Discourse on the Fruits of the Ascetic Life (Sāmañña-phala-sutta, DN 2) and its commentary.]

Birth of the Prince

When the Prince Ajātasattu was conceived in the womb of Vedehī, the Chief Queen of King Bimbisāra, the queen strongly desired to drink the blood of the king's right arm. It was hard to fulfil and she considered it inadvisable to tell anyone about it. She dared not express it openly and as a result she became lean, pale and haggard in her physical appearance. Seeing this change in the queen, the king asked what was wrong with her. The queen at first refused to answer but the king pressed for an explanation and at last she revealed the craving that had made her so unhappy.

The king was overwhelmed with love and said: "You silly queen! Why should you think it is hard to satisfy your desire?" Thus reproving her for her reticence, the king sent for a physician and after having his arm cut with a small golden knife, he had the blood taken in a gold cup, mixed it with water and made the queen drink it.

When the soothsayers heard the news, they predicted that the child in the queen's womb would become the enemy of the king, and that he would kill his father. On hearing their prediction, the queen was worried. She did not wish to bear the potential murderer of the king. So she went to the garden to carry out an abortion, but her attempt was unsuccessful. In spite of her repeated attempts, she could not get rid of her pregnancy. Later on the garden was named Maddakucchi, the garden where abortion was performed.

King Bimbisāra inquired why the queen often went to the garden and when he learnt what she was doing, he said: "We do not know as yet whether the child in your womb is a boy or a girl. Do not try to kill the child because, if you do so, our good reputation will be severely damaged all over Jambudīpa for our cruelty to our own child." He deterred the queen from killing her child and kept her under surveillance. The queen then decided to kill the child after its birth.

When the child was born, the guards took him to a safe place. He was called Ajātasattu because he was the enemy of his father, King Bimbisāra, even before his birth. Ajāta means "before birth," and sattu means "an enemy."

The prince grew up and when he was shown to the queen, she became deeply attached to him, and lost all desire to kill him. King Bimbisāra later appointed the prince as heir-apparent.

The subsequent association of Ajātasattu with his evil friend Devadatta and his killing of his father to become king have been described above in the section on Devadatta.

From the day he ordered his father to be killed, King Ajātasattu was unable to sleep. As soon as he shut his eyes, he felt like he was being pierced by hundreds of spears and he had dream-like hallucinations about his destiny that kept him shaking and muttering.

This shows that those who have done much evil see signs of their impending descent into the lower worlds not only on their death-bed but long before the end of their lives.

The guards asked the king what ailed him but he said there was nothing. These nightmarish hallucinations plagued the king and made him reluctant to go to sleep. So every night he gave audience for a long time to keep himself awake.

King Ajātasattu adored the evil Devadatta who was a thorn in the side of the Fortunate One and so he gave alms lavishly to Devadatta and built for him a monastery in Gayāsīsa, and at the instigation of his teacher he killed his father who was a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna). In this way, he ruled out the possibility of doing any good deed leading to the Stream-entry (Sotāpatti) path for himself and ruined himself most disastrously.

Ajātasattu Decision to Visit the Buddha

On hearing that Devadatta was swallowed by the earth, King Ajātasattu was afraid, lest he should share the fate of his former teacher. He could not indulge in royal pleasures, nor [899] could he sleep peacefully. He became tremulous, restless and jittery, like a young elephant pricked with a sharp iron stake, he had visions of the earth cracking, the flames from the Avīci hell flaming up, the earth threatening to swallow him up, and the custodians of hell making him lie on his back on the red-hot iron floor and poking him with iron stakes. So, trembling like a beaten fowl, King Ajātasattu could not find any support even for a moment nor could he stand firm and steady. He wanted to see the Buddha, pay respects and ask about his problem but because of the enormity of his evil deed, he dared not go to the Buddha.

Then, when the festival of the constellation Kattikā was held in Rājagaha on the full moon night in the month of November (Kattikā), the whole city was decorated like a celestial city, and brightly illuminated with fire torches and flames. While seated amidst his ministers on the golden throne in the audience hall, King Ajātasattu saw the physician Jīvaka and thought: “I will take Jīvaka as my guide and go to the Buddha. But I should not admit frankly that I dare not go to the Fortunate One, and I will tell Jīvaka to take me there. Tactfully, I will extol the beauty of the night and then ask the ministers which real noble ascetic or Brahmin can inspire us with faith and devotion. When the ministers hear my words, they will glorify their respective teachers and the physician Jīvaka will glorify his teacher, the Fortunate One. Then I will go and see the Fortunate One with Jīvaka as my guide.”

After planning this strategy, King Ajātasattu said: “Ministers, tonight is so delightful, being free from snow, mist, cloud, Asurinda, and smoke, the five things that disturb the beauty of the moon-lit night, or pollute the air; ministers, tonight is so beautiful, being free from the five elements; ministers, tonight is so lovely to look at, being free from the five disturbing elements; ministers, tonight our minds are calm and serene because the night is free from the five disturbing elements; ministers, tonight should be very memorable since it is free from the five disturbing elements.”

Having thus extolled the full moon night, the king added: “Which ascetic or Brahmin should we see tonight, who can inspire us with faith and devotion?” By saying this, the king gave a hint to the physician Jīvaka. The king had committed a heinous crime by killing his father, a great patron of the Buddha and a noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna-ariya) at that time, and he had done another by supporting Devadatta who did many things harmful to the Buddha. So he dared not go to the Buddha by himself. He knew that for the fulfilment of his desire to see the Buddha he must rely on Jīvaka who had built a monastery for the Buddha and who served the Buddha’s medical needs.

Jīvaka did not fail to take his cue from the king. In fact, he knew it, but because the assembly included many followers of the six heretical teachers, Jīvaka thought: “As followers of ignorant teachers, they themselves are ignorant, and they do not understand the rules to be observed at a meeting. If I start describing the noble attributes of the Fortunate One, they will rise one by one and extol their teachers and then I will never come to the description of the Fortunate One's noble attributes. As the teachings of their six heretical teachers do not have substance or anything worthy of note, the king will not be pleased with what they say and he will ask me directly. Then I will tell the king without any distraction about the noble attributes of the Fortunate One and take him to the Buddha.” Thus thinking deeply, Jīvaka said nothing despite the king's hint and sat silently.

The ministers, who were the disciples of the six heretical teachers, thought: “Today the king extolled the beauty of the night of the November full moon. He really must have the desire to see one of the ascetics or Brahmins, to ask questions and hear his discourse. The king will greatly honour the teacher whom he adores and whose discourse he hears. It augurs well for the minister whose teacher becomes the king's teacher,” so each of them became bent on extolling his own teacher and leading the king to him. With this intention the ministers who were disciples of Pūraṇa Kassapa, Makkhali Gosāla, Ajita Kesakambala, Pakudha [900] Kaccāyana, Sañjaya Belaṭṭhaputta and Nigaṇṭha Nāputta extolled their respective teachers.

King Ajātasattu had seen the heretical teachers before. When he first saw them, their physical appearance did not impress him in the least. On the contrary, he was much disappointed. Now, when he heard the words of his ministers, he felt like a man who sees a very sour and acid fruit brought and put in his hand when, in fact, he wishes to eat a golden coloured, sweet, delicious, ripe mango. He longed to hear the sweet Dhamma concerning the absorptions (jhāna), super knowledges (abhiññā), the three characteristics of existence (tilakkhaṇa), etc., and so when in addition to his disappointment with the heretical teachers' physical appearance he heard their followers praising them, he became much dispirited and said nothing.

Although he was displeased with their speech, King Ajātasattu thought: “If I show my anger and have these ministers seized by the neck and turned out of the palace hall, other people will not have the courage to say anything, fearing that the king treats in the same way every one who speaks.” So, although he did not like their words, the king did not reproach them but remained silent.

King Ajātasattu thought: “Only the ministers whom I do not wish to listen to are talking. Physician Jīvaka, who I wish to hear, is silent like the Garuḷa bird that has swallowed the brain of a Nāga. I am so unfortunate!” Then he had an afterthought: “Jīvaka is a disciple, an attendant of the Fortunate One. So he is quiet and lives in silence like a disciplined ascetic. He will not speak if I do not ask him. So I must act like a man, who, when trampled by an elephant, has to clasp the animal's foot."

So thinking, the king said directly: "Friend Jīvaka, why are you keeping silence? These ministers never tire of glorifying their teachers. Do you not have a teacher like these ministers have? Do you have no teacher because you are a commoner without any official post or privileges granted by my father? Or do you have no teacher because of lack of faith?"

Thus the king asked Jīvaka directly, about the reason for his silence. Jīvaka thought: "The king wants me to speak of the attributes of my teacher. Now is not the time for me to remain silent. But it is not proper for me to describe the noble attributes of the Buddha just as these ministers extol their teachers in a posture of reverence to the king."

So Jīvaka rose, bowed most respectfully in the direction of the teacher's residence in Jīvaka's mango grove, raised his joined hands above his head and said: "Great King! Do not think that I am the devotee of just a so-called, self-styled ascetic (samaṇa) of doubtful characteristics. Certainly, at the time of my teacher's conception in his mother's womb, at the time of his birth, at the time of his renunciation, his becoming a Buddha, and his teaching of the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka), the 10,000 world-element shook and quivered. In this and that place, the Fortunate One performed the miracle of fire and water. In this and that place, he came down to earth from the realm of Tāvātimsa. I will tell you about the Fortunate One's noble attributes to the best of my ability. Listen to me attentively."

With this preamble, Jīvaka went on to give an account of the Buddha: "Great King, Deva among the people! My teacher, the possessor of such attributes as Arahāt and Sammā-sambuddha now lives with 1,250 monks in the mango grove monastery that we have donated to him.

Our teacher, the Fortunate One, is a Arahāt because he possesses the attributes of morality (sīla-guṇa), mental concentration (samādhi-guṇa), wisdom (paññā-guṇa), liberation (vimutti-guṇa) and knowledge and insight into liberation (vimutti-ñāṇa-dassana-guṇa) that make him worthy of special honour by humans, Devas and Brahmas. He is a Fortunate One (Bhagavā) because he possesses the sixfold glory. Such good reputation of our teacher, the Fortunate

One has spread beyond the highest abode of the universe known as Bhavagga in the formless (arūpa) worlds. [901] I want you, Great King, to see our teacher, the Fortunate One. If you see our teacher, your mind will certainly become calm and serene.”

Even as he heard the noble attributes of the Buddha, King Ajātasattu was overwhelmed with the five kinds of ecstasy. So, he wished to see the Buddha instantly and knowing that there was no one except Jīvaka who could arrange transport for his visit to the Buddha at that time, he told Jīvaka to go and prepare the elephant transport.

Herein, there are various kinds of transport, such as horses, chariots, etc., but the elephant transport is the best of all transports. King Ajātasattu decided that he should go to the supreme Buddha by means of the supreme transport. Horses and chariots are noisy, making sounds that are audible in the distance. But the elephant makes no noise although it may not go quickly. The king considered it advisable to go to the quiet and calm Buddha by means of quiet and calm elephants. So he told Jīvaka to harness the elephants.

Then physician Jīvaka had 500 female elephants and the state elephant adorned with all trappings. The king did not tell him explicitly to prepare the female elephants for transport. But being intelligent, he got the female elephants ready with all equipment. In doing so, he was motivated by the reflection: “The king wants to go and see the Fortunate One tonight. But kings have many enemies. If anything untoward happens to the king on the way, people will blame me and say that I lead the king out of the palace at an untimely hour of the night, heedlessly taking advantage of his compliance with my wish. Moreover, they will also blame the Fortunate One, saying that the Fortunate One preaches, taking advantage of his influence over people without regard for proper time. Therefore, I will make my plan so that the Fortunate One and I may be above reproach and the king may be well-protected.”

Again he thought: “Men are never in fear of women. So I will make the king go happily, surrounded by women.” After having 500 female elephants adorned with full trappings, he had the 500 female courtiers dressed as men and instructed them to accompany the king, each armed with swords and spears.

Still another thought occurred to Jīvaka: “On account of his heinous crime of parricide, there is no special good deed for this King Ajātasattu that will contribute to the attainment of the paths and fruitions in his present life. It is customary with the Buddhas to preach only when they see someone credited with extraordinarily good deeds, which may serve as a support of spiritual progress (upanissaya-paccaya). Now, I will assemble the people. Then the Buddha will preach the Dhamma in view of the former good deeds of someone in the assembly, the good deed essential to his spiritual uplift. The discourse will benefit many people.” Instantly, he sent a message to every part of the city, announcing also by the beat of drum, the king’s plan to visit the Buddha and hear the Dhamma, and that people are to go along with the king for his security according to their official position.

Then the people thought: “It is said that our king will go and see the Buddha. What kind of Dhamma will he preach? What can we profit by making merry in this planetary festival? We will go to the monastery where the Buddha is going to preach to the king.” Then all of them waited for the king on the road with fragrant flowers in their hands.

After having done all the necessary things, Jīvaka told the king that the elephants were ready and that it rested with him to choose the time for his journey.

Ajātasattu’s Visit to the Buddha

Then King Ajātasattu mounted the royal elephant and with a female courtier dressed as a man and seated on each of the 500 female elephants, and with fire-torches lighted, he set out from Rājagaha with great royal pomp and splendour and went to Jīvaka’s mango grove, which was then the residence of the Buddha.

Herein, “Great royal pomp and splendour,” may be explained as follows:
[902] King Ajātasattu was the ruler of two countries, Aṅga and Magadha, each 300 leagues in width. He was a great monarch and although no arrangements were made in advance for his visit to the Buddha, as arranged by Jīvaka, 500 female courtiers came out instantly dressed as men, with swords suspended from their shoulders and with ruby-handled spears in their hands.

Moreover 16,000 female dancers also accompanied the king. Behind those dancers, their attendant elderly women went along on foot. Behind the elderly women were the eunuchs who guarded the palace; behind the eunuchs were 60,000 ministers exquisitely attired in various garments and walking on foot.

37b: Ajātasattu – 1329

Also walking on foot behind the ministers were about 90,000 provincial princes, adorned with various ornaments and fully armed like young men possessed of magical powers (Vijjā-dhara). Behind the princes were 10,000 Brahmins, who, having bathed, smeared themselves with unguent and adorned themselves with golden flowers, wore expensive waist garments and donned expensive double robes covering the left shoulder. Raising their right hands and chanting: “May the Great King overcome all dangers!” they went on foot.

Behind the Brahmins were the musicians; behind them were the royal archers; behind them was the elephant-brigade; behind them was a big cavalry; behind the cavalry was the chariot-division; behind the chariot-division was the infantry and behind the infantry were the members of eighteen assemblies dressed and adorned with various ornaments befitting their official position.

Thus, as instructed by Jīvaka, the troops, ministers, etc. were deployed in such a way that the arrow shot from the end of the procession could not reach the king. As for him, he walked close by the king, very vigilant to save the king’s life promptly in case of emergency.

The fire-torches were so numerous that they could not be counted by hundreds or thousands. With such royal pomp and splendour the king went to the residence of the Buddha.

King Ajātasattu came out of the city, but as he approached the mango grove he became scared. He trembled with great fear and his hair stood on end. He was much frightened because the silence in the monastery raised doubts in him about Jīvaka’s intent. As a matter of fact, Jīvaka had told him before that he would have to approach the Buddha quietly. So the king had banned music, and the musicians had only held their musical instruments during their journey, they had not spoken loudly and they all had travelled without talking and only showing signs with their hands when necessary.

Now in the grove, not even the sneezing of a monk was to be heard, and kings usually delighted only in places where there was sound. King Ajātasattu became weary and sick of the deep silence and suspicious of Jīvaka. He thought: “This Jīvaka says that there are 1,250 monks in his grove. But I don’t hear even anyone even sneezing in this place. Jīvaka may not be speaking the truth. Perhaps, he has deceived me and taken me out of the city. Perhaps, he wants to seize me and usurp my throne with the help of the army. Certainly, Jīvaka is strong enough to match the strength of five elephants. He is also hanging about me and there is no armed attendant near me. Oh! It is all over with me!”

Thus scared, King Ajātasattu was unable even to mask his fear with his royal demeanour and he clearly expressed his fear to Jīvaka by asking: “Jīvaka! You are not deceiving me are you? You are not handing me over to my enemies, are you? Why is it that among so many monks numbering 1,250, there is no sneezing, no coughing and no talking?” [903]

Then physician Jīvaka said: “Great King, be not afraid. I do not deceive you. I will not hand you over to your enemies. Great King, go ahead. Within the circular hall there are oil lamps burning brightly.”

Herein Jīvaka thought: “The king does not know that I never take life. If I do not console him, he will come to ruin here.” So he consoled the king to allay his fear effectively by telling him twice not to be afraid and assuring him that he was not being deceived. Then to make his assurance more weighty he told the king twice to go forward and said the oil lamps were burning brightly in the hall. The implication of this last remark was that the illumination in the hall left no doubt about the presence of good people and the absence of insurgents and robbers who always went about in the dark. Jīvaka’s speech was then deeply meaningful indeed.

Ajātasattu’s Questions on the Monastic Life

Then King Ajātasattu went by elephant as far as possible and at the gate of the monastery he dismounted. As soon as he put his feet on the ground, the power and glory of the Buddha pervaded his whole body. He sweated so profusely that he was nearly forced to change his garments. He remembered his parricide and became overwhelmed with fear. So he dared not go directly to the Buddha. Instead, he took Jīvaka’s hands and like a visitor looking around the monastery, he complimented Jīvaka, saying: “You have built this building wonderfully!” When they came to the entrance of the circular meeting-hall, the king asked Jīvaka where the Buddha was: In fact, it was customary with kings to affect ignorance and ask in spite of their knowledge.

Then Jīvaka thought: “The king is like a man who stands on earth and asks where the earth is; like a man who looks up to the sky and asks where the sun and the moon are; like a man who stands at the foot of Mount Meru and asks where Mount Meru is. I will now show him the Buddha.” So Jīvaka raised his joined hands towards the Buddha and said: “Great King, that person seated before the monks, leaning against the middle pillar and facing east is the Fortunate One.”

Then King Ajātasattu approached the Buddha and paid his respects. Standing aside, he looked again and again at the monks who were serene and dignified like a very clear lake, silent without any coughing or sneezing, their eyes calmly fixed on the Buddha without casting a single glance at the gorgeous gathering of the king and his people. The king marvelled and exclaimed: “The monks are so serene. May my son, Prince Udāyibhadda, have such serenity!”

Herein King Ajātasattu’s exclamation should not give one the impression that he wanted his son to lead a monastic life and become serene. In fact, at the sight of the monks, he became clear in his consciousness and remembered his son. Naturally, getting an object that is hard to come by or seeing something marvellous reminds one of one’s beloved relatives or friends. The king uttered the above words because he remembered his son, and not because he wanted to have his son ordained.

In another sense, his exclamation was due to his worry about his son and his desire for the prince’s serenity. For he thought: “The day will come when my son, seeing that I am still young, asks me where his grandfather is. If he comes to know somehow or other that his grandfather was killed by his father, he will also get it into his head to kill me and become king.”

In spite of his worry about his son and his desire to make the prince serene, the king was in fact destined to be killed by his own son. In the lineage of King Ajātasattu there were five cases of parricide: 1) Prince Ajātasattu killed his father, King Bimbisāra; 2) Prince Udāyi killed his father, King Ajātasattu; 3) Prince Mahāmuṇḍika killed his father, King Udāyi; 4) Prince Anuruddha killed his father [904] Mahāmuṇḍika; and 5) Prince Nāgadāsa killed his father, King Anuruddha. Then the people of the country unanimously resolved to have nothing to do with these kings who disgraced their lineage and they made away with King Nāgadāsa, and appointed a new family to reign.

Before the king made his exclamation, the Buddha had divined the thought of King Ajātasattu as he stood in silence before him. The Buddha knew that the king dared not speak to him, that he remembered his son as he looked again and again at the monks and that unless he broke the ice, he would not have the courage to say anything. So deciding to speak first, the Buddha said just after the king’s exclamation: “King! Your mind is now with your beloved one.”

Then King Ajātasattu thought: “Oh! Marvellous indeed is the greatness of the Fortunate One! There is no one equal to me in having wronged the Fortunate One. I killed my father, his greatest supporter who was a noble one (ariya); and a supporter of the Buddha. Not only that, misguided by Devadatta, I sent assassins to kill the Buddha. Perhaps Devadatta thought he had my support when he rolled the rock from the Gijjhakūṭa down the hill when trying to kill the Buddha. I have done so much evil and yet now the Buddha has started a conversation with me. The Buddha indeed firmly possesses the unshakeable (tādi) attributes in terms of five characteristics. Therefore, we will never ignore the Fortunate One and never seek refuge or a teacher elsewhere again.”

The five unshakeable (tādi) characteristics are: 1) Equanimity without any love or hatred in the vicissitudes (loka-dhamma) whether desirable (iṭṭha) or undesirable (aniṭṭha) of life; 2) repudiation of defilements; 3) having crossed over the current of Samsāra; 4) freedom from lust, hatred, etc.; 5) possession of morality, faith, etc. which makes him worthy of being pointed out as a man of moral integrity, faith, etc. The Great Exposition (Mahā-niddesa, PTS 1.114) has an elaboration.

Alternatively: 1) The ability to have desirable perception (iṭṭha-saññā) at will, in regard to undesirable (aniṭṭha) beings or phenomena; 2) the ability to have undesirable perception (aniṭṭha-saññā) at will, with regard to desirable (iṭṭha) beings and phenomena; 3) the ability to have desirable perception at will, in regard to both desirable and undesirable beings and phenomena; 4) the ability to have undesirable perception at will, in regard to both desirable and undesirable beings and phenomena; and 5) the ability to have equanimity at will, in respect of both the pleasant and undesirable beings and phenomena. These five noble powers (ariyiddha) are the five unshakeable (tādi) characteristics.

So thinking, he was much delighted and in response to the Buddha’s remark, he said: “Exalted Buddha, I love my son, Prince Udāyibhadda, dearly. May my son, Prince Udāyibhadda, have the same serenity that the monks now have.”

King Ajātasattu reflected: “If after paying respect to the Fortunate One, I go to the monks, here and there, and pay respect to them, I will have turned my back to the Fortunate One and that will mean a lack of reverence to him on my part. Certainly, a man who, after paying respects to the king, goes to the crown prince and pays respect, show lack of respect for the king.” So after paying his respects to the Buddha, the king bowed to the monks with both hands raised from the place where he was standing and sat down at a proper place.

Then King Ajātasattu said: “Exalted Buddha, if you permit me to ask, I would like to ask you a few questions about a certain thing.”

The Buddha said: “Great King, you may ask me about anything you like,” thereby extending to the king the invitation of the omniscient Buddhas.

An invitation for questions is of two kinds: The invitation by omniscient Buddhas and the invitation by their disciples. When someone wants to ask an omniscient Buddha about something, the Buddha [905] says confidently and without any reservation: “Ask me about anything you like. I will answer all your questions thoroughly.” This kind of invitation is made only by Buddhas and the intellectually mature Bodhisattas. As for their disciples, they do not say: “Ask me about anything,” but they say with reservation: “I will answer your question if I can, only after I have heard it.”

On being thus invited by the Buddha in the manner of omniscient Buddhas, King Ajātasattu became much delighted and enthusiastic and he asked the following questions: “Exalted Buddha, there are many skilled occupations and craftsmen. They belong to warriors riding elephants, warriors riding horses, warriors riding chariots, archers, flag-bearers, military strategists, commandos who slip behind the lines of the opposing army and cut off the enemies’ heads, princes distinguished in fighting, daredevils who make speedy attacks on the enemy, warriors who are valiant like bull-elephants, very brave warriors, warriors clad in armour, trustworthy servants, cooks, barbers, bath attendants, butlers, flower stringers, laundry workers, weavers, makers of reed mat walls, potters, arithmeticians, and those who count by their fingers; besides these, there are many other similar craftsmen. These people live long, profiting by their skills. By means of their skills they make themselves, their parents, their wives and children and their friends comfortable and vigorous. Moreover, they give alms to monks and Brahmins so as to be reborn in the Deva realm in the afterlife. Exalted Buddha, can one point out the benefits of a monastic life like those of skilled occupations, benefits which one can realize by himself in the present life?”

Then the Buddha thought: “In this place are many princes and ministers who are the followers of heretical teachers, those who are outside the pale of my teaching. If I give my discourse in two parts, showing the impurity of their teachers' doctrines in the first part (kaṇha-pakkha) and the purity of my doctrine in the second part (sukka-pakkha), these people will blame me, saying that I talk only about the doctrinal conflicts and controversies of the monks from the time of the arrival of their king who has come here with great effort to listen to the Dhamma. As a result, they will not hear the Dhamma respectfully. If the king himself talks about the doctrine of the heretics, the people will not blame me. They will let me say what I like. In fact, people naturally follow the king (issarānuvattako hi loko). Now I will make it the king's responsibility to describe the teaching of the heretics." Then the Buddha asked the king if he remembered having put the question to any other ascetics and Brahmins.

The king said that he did and the Buddha asked him how they had answered the question and urged him to state their answers if he did not mind it. The king said: "Sir! I do not mind doing so in a place where the Fortunate One or a man like the Fortunate One is sitting."

What is implicit here in the king's reply is this: It is troublesome or hard to tell a pretentious person to be wise about anything because he is apt to criticize every sentence and every word. The real wise man, however, extols the speech that he hears if it is flawless and he corrects the language, sentences and words if there are flaws in the speech. The Buddha has no peer in the world in respect of real wisdom. Hence the king's reply as mentioned above.

Thus urged by the Buddha to recount the answers given by the heretical teachers, the king told him how he once approached the six heretical teachers: Pūraṇa Kassapa, Makkhali Gosāla, Ajita Kesakambala, Pakudha Kaccāyana, Sañjaya Belaṭṭhiputta and Nigaṇṭha Nāṭaputta and asked them about the advantages of being an ascetic in the present life. The six teachers described only their respective doctrines like a man who, being asked about a mango tree, describes a jack fruit tree, or vice versa. The answers were at variance with the question but although the king was disappointed with the heretical teachers, he considered it inadvisable for a king like him to rebuke such religious persons as monks and Brahmins in his country. So he neither accepted nor rejected their sayings. Nor did he show his displeasure by word of mouth. Instead, he got up and went back without taking note of [906] their words and now he asked the Buddha about the present advantages of a monastic life.

Then the Buddha gave an elaborate talk on the advantages of monkhood in the present life. For example: 1) A man-slave was honoured by the king after his ordination; 2) a farmer who paid taxes to the king was honoured by the latter after he became a monk; 3) to show the higher advantages of monkhood, the Buddha referred to the life of a man of either low or high caste who had heard his teaching, inspired with faith, who became a monk and practiced the lower morality, the medium morality and the higher morality. Then he guarded his senses, developed his mindfulness, was easily contented, rejected the hindrances and gained the first absorption (jhāna); 4) the second meditation; 5) the third meditation; and 6) the fourth meditation. Still making further progress, he attained insight knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa), psychic powers (manomayiddhi-ñāṇa), supernormal powers (iddhi-vidhā-ñāṇa), the divine-ear (dibba-sota-ñāṇa), penetrative knowledge of the mind of others (ceto-pariyāya-ñāṇa), remembrance of former existences (pubbe-nivāsānussati-ñāṇa), knowledge of the dying and reappearance of other beings (cutupapāta-ñāṇa) and extinction of all mental intoxicants (āsavakkhaya-ñāṇa) or the knowledge of the Arahata path (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) (7-14). Thus, the monk gained as the present advantages of his life the eight kinds of progressively higher, extraordinary knowledge up to Awakening.

[For a full understanding of the teaching given on that occasion please read the Discourse itself in full.]

Ajātasattu Goes for Refuge

When the Buddha described in detail the present advantages of the ascetic life with becoming an Arahata as its apex, King Ajātasattu followed the whole talk attentively, expressing his appreciation verbally from time to time. He thought: “In the past, I did not ask many ascetics and Brahmins about these matters and like a man who pounds husks of grain, I have never received anything substantial. Marvellous indeed is the greatness of the exalted Buddha! He has answered these questions, enlightening me very much as if with the brilliance of 1,000 oil-lamps. For a long time, ignorance has deceived me, making me blind to the greatness and power of the Fortunate One.”

Overwhelmed with ecstasy arising from the contemplation of the Buddha’s attributes, the king clearly showed his faith in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha in the following words: “Venerable sir, very delightful indeed is the teaching! Just as in the world what has been upside down is set right, just as what has been covered is uncovered, just as a man who has lost his way is shown the right way, just as torches are lighted in order that those who have eyesight may see various visual forms in the darkness, so also, you have in many ways made the Dhamma very clear to me, venerable sir! I seek refuge in the Fortunate One, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha. Let the Fortunate One regard me, from today, as a lay devotee who has gone for refuge (saraṇa-gamana) for life.

Venerable sir! I am overwhelmed with guilt stemming from foolishness, confusion and ignorance. For the sake of kingly pleasures, I have killed my father, a great monarch who practised justice and ruled righteously. Let the Fortunate One forgive me for the offence, regarding it as an offence that will make me mindful and vigilant in future.”

Thus the king sought refuge in the Buddha, Dhamma and Saṅgha and apologized for his offence. Then the Buddha said: “King! You are indeed overwhelmed with guilt arising from your foolishness, confusion and ignorance. You have killed your father, the great monarch who practised justice and ruled righteously. But we forgive you that offence because you admit it and make amends for it. If a man admits his offence, atones for it accordingly and guards himself against it in future, then such atonement and self-restraint means spiritual progress under the my teaching.”

Then King Ajātasattu said: “Very well, venerable sir! We will now go. We have many things to do.” The Buddha replied: “King! You may go as you wish.” The king accepted the Buddha’s teaching [907] with much pleasure, extolled it with delight, rose from his seat, paid his respects and went away.

Note on Going for Refuge

Herein a note on going for refuge (saraṇa-gamana) will be included here.

There are seven points regarding going for refuge:

1. Refuge.
2. Going for refuge.
3. Person established in refuge.
4. Forms of refuge.
5. Fruit of refuge.
6. Contamination of refuge.

7. Destruction of refuge.

1. Refuge (saraṇa). The Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha are the threefold refuge (saraṇa) because those who seek its protection, overcome their fear, alarm, physical and mental suffering and various miseries in the lower worlds after death. In other words, the Buddha helps beings overcome various perils by contributing to their welfare and averting their misfortunes. So does the Dhamma by making beings free from hardships of life and consoling them. And so does the Saṅgha by making them gain a great benefit even from a few good acts. Hence the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha constitute the real threefold refuge that ensures that beings have freedom from all suffering.

2. Going for refuge (saraṇa-gamana). This consists of great wholesome consciousness (mahā-kusala-citta) that makes one inclined towards the Three Treasures by removing defiling and unwholesome mental states through devotion and veneration to the Three Treasures, great consciousness of action (mahā-kiriya-citta) regarding the Arahats, and path consciousness (magga-citta) regarding the noble ones established in the path (maggatṭha-ariya). All these forms of consciousness are called going for refuge (saraṇa-gamana). Conviction that refuge in the Three Treasures is the real factor that eliminates fear and suffering by means of such consciousness is going for refuge. This is the definition.

3. Person established in refuge. A person who has the consciousness described above is one who is established in the threefold refuge. Thus we should first understand the three aspects: 1) Refuge; 2) going for refuge; and 3) the person established in going for refuge.

4. Forms of refuge. It is of two forms: Supermundane and mundane. Supramundane going for refuge is implicit by way of fulfilment of the function in a single thought-moment when the noble ones (ariya) realize the four truths and attain the paths, thereby overcoming all defilements and focusing their minds on Nibbāna.

By this is meant the supermundane going for refuge (saraṇa-gamana) is path-consciousness, path-consciousness is focused on Nibbāna, and this means uprooting the defilements that make the going for refuge impure. So, although the path-consciousness arises from the focus not on the Three Treasures but on Nibbāna, the fulfilment of its function involves the recognition of the Three Treasures as the real refuge. In other words, at the moment of path-consciousness, one is also possessed of the supermundane going for refuge.

For example, it is said that one knows the four truths at the moment of path-consciousness. Having Nibbāna as its object, the path-consciousness is concerned only with the truth about the end of suffering. But it also roots out ignorance that makes us blind to the four truths. Thus although the noble one (ariya) focuses his mind only on Nibbāna, he becomes aware of the three other truths that do not directly concern Nibbāna: the truths about suffering, the cause of suffering and the way to [908] the cessation of suffering.

The mundane going for refuge arises in an ordinary person (puthujjana) when he contemplates the attributes of the Buddha, the Dhamma and Saṅgha in the effort to remove the defilements (upakkilesa) that defile the going for refuge. Basically this going for refuge means faith in the Buddha, Dhamma and Saṅgha or right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) based on faith or a mental factor of wisdom (paññā-cetasika). As one of the ten meritorious actions (puñña-kiriya), it is called straightening one's views (diṭṭhi-uju-kamma).

Here faith too is termed going for refuge and so is the faith and wisdom combined. Mundane consciousness, with regard to the threefold refuge, is of two kinds: Intelligent consciousness (ñāṇa-sampayutta-saraṇa-gamana) and unintelligent consciousness (ñāṇa-vippayutta-saraṇa-gamana). The former is the consciousness of children who recite the refuge-formula at the advice of their parents. Here it is only a matter of faith (saddhā-cetasika). The intelligent going for refuge is based on the knowledge of the noble characteristics of the Three Treasures and here faith and wisdom are jointly mentioned as going for refuge because they are easily felt. The actual going for refuge, however, is the consciousness that is led by faith and wisdom. Again, the mundane going for refuge is of four kinds:

1. Going for refuge by giving up oneself to the Three Treasures (atta-sanniyyātana-saraṇa-gamana).
2. Going for refuge by finding one's support in the Three Treasures (tapparāyaṇa-saraṇa-gamana).
3. Going for refuge by becoming a pupil of the Three Treasures (sisso-bhāvūpagamana-saraṇa-gamana).

4. Going for refuge by showing great reverence to the Three Treasures (paṇipāta-saraṇa-gamana).

Of these four:

1. Giving oneself up to the Three Treasures involves a declaration as follows: “From today onwards I give myself up to the Buddha; I give myself up to the Dhamma; I give myself up to the Saṅgha.”
2. Finding one’s support in the Three Treasures involves supplication as follows: “From today onwards kindly recognize me as one who finds support in the Buddha, in the Dhamma and in the Saṅgha.”
3. Becoming a pupil of the Three Treasures involves supplication as follows: “From today onwards, kindly recognize me as a residential pupil (antevāsika) of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha.”

In the Birth Story about King Mahājanaka (Mahā-janaka-jātaka, Ja 539), the Bodhisatta pointed out a lifeless mango tree bearing fruit and another mango tree bearing no fruit as his teachers because they instructed him for his welfare. Therefore, one speaks of the Dhamma as one’s teacher and speaks of oneself as its pupil.

4. Showing great reverence to the Three Treasures involves supplication as follows: “From today onwards kindly recognize me as one who worships, welcomes, raises one’s hands in adoration and venerates only the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha.”

One who adopts any of these four modes of seeking refuge is one who fulfils one’s going for refuge.

Alternatively:

1. A declaration, uttering: “I give myself up to the Buddha, to the Dhamma, and to the Saṅgha,” or “I offer my life to the Three Treasures,” or “I have offered my body to the Three Treasures,” or “I have offered my life to the Three Treasures,” or “I am aware of my approach to the Buddha as my refuge till the end of my life, to the Dhamma, and to the Saṅgha,” or “The Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha are my refuge,” all these utterances of declaration constitute going for refuge by giving up oneself to the Three Treasures. [909]
2. The going for refuge that is marked by the desire to seek protection and shelter in the Three Treasures, as in the case of the Yakkha Āḷāvaka, the Deva kings, Hemavata and Sātāgiri. This is termed going for refuge by finding one's support in the Three Treasures.

3. In the story of Pippali, a youth who later became well-known as Ven. Mahā Kassapa, he donned the robe by himself and set out from his Brahmin village of Mahātittha to visit the Buddha. On his way, he saw the Buddha at the foot of the banyan tree called Bāhuputtaka between Rājagaha and Nālanda. The Buddha was waiting for him from a distance of three miles. As soon as Pippali saw the Buddha, he decided that: “This noble ascetic must be the teacher (satthā) of Devas and humans, the good wayfarer (Gracious One) who has really attained Nibbāna through excellent practice, and the Perfectly Self-Awakened One (Sammā-sambuddha) who has rightly penetrated the right doctrines by himself. Then he took refuge in the Buddha by uttering: “If I am to see the teacher of Devas and humans, I will see only you. If I am to see the good wayfarer, I will see only you. If I am to see the Perfectly Self-Awakened One, I will see only you. I will see no other person with my eye of wisdom as my teacher, good wayfarer and as the Perfectly Self-Awakened One.” His utterances indeed amounted to going for refuge by becoming a pupil of the Three Treasures.

4. In the Discourse concerning Brahmāyu (Brahmāyu-sutta, MN 91), after the Buddha had answered the eight questions put to him by the Brahmin Brahmāyu, the latter was much impressed and so after rising, he bowed his head to the feet of the Buddha. He also sucked the Buddha's feet with his mouth and massaged them vigorously, saying: “Gotama! I am the Brahmin Brahmāyu,” and thus mentioning his name. This gesture of the Brahmin Brahmāyu showing deep reverence for the Three Treasures is going for refuge by showing great reverence to the Three Treasures.

In short, there is no uniform gesture for the four kinds of going for refuge. There are many kinds of bodily and verbal actions by which one can show reverence for the Three Treasures. The commentary distinguished between four kinds of going for refuge (saraṇa-gamana) and explained the four kinds of reverences.

Reverence may be of four kinds, reverence for relatives, reverence from fear, reverence for the teacher, and reverence for one who, as one of the Three Treasures or refuges, is worthy of excellent offerings. The going for refuge necessarily presupposes the fourth kind of reverence. It has nothing to do with the others.

Indeed reverence with faith is essential to going for refuge. This consciousness erodes only when there is reverence for the bogus Buddha, bogus Dhamma and bogus Saṅgha in place of three genuine Treasures.

1. So a Sakyan or a Koliyan Prince has no going for refuge if he reveres the Buddha, regarding the Buddha as a senior member of their family.
2. Neither is it going for refuge, if a man reveres the Buddha out of fear that as a powerful teacher honoured by kings, the Buddha might do harm to him if he showed no respect.
3. A man may remember having learnt some craft from the Buddha when he was still a Bodhisatta and now he reveres the Buddha, regarding him as his former teacher. Another man may have heard the Buddha's discourse on, say, the apportionment of one's wealth, i.e., a wise person should spend one fourth of his income on enjoying life, two fourths to be invested in business, and the remaining fourth to be saved for an emergency, see the Discourse on Taking Up (Ādiya-sutta, AN 5.41). So he looks up to the Buddha as his teacher and reveres him for the advice with regard to his material welfare. Neither of these two men's reverence has anything to do with going for refuge.
4. But a certain man reveres the Buddha, believing that he was the real Treasure, the real [910] refuge, worthy of alms given as foundations for welfare hereafter. Only this man has a true going for refuge.

For a layman or a laywoman who seeks refuge in the Buddha, recognizing the Buddha as a being worthy of excellent offering (agga-dakkhiṇeyya-puggala), his or her going for refuge is not adversely affected even though he reveres a relative of an alien, heretical Saṅgha, to say nothing of revering a non-heretical monk or a layman in his family. So also a layman or a laywoman who has sought refuge in the Buddha will not have his or her vow damaged by revering the king out of fear. The same is true in the case of a layman paying respect to a heretic who happens to be his former teacher.

5. Fruit of refuge. The chief immediate benefits of supermundane going for refuge are the four fruitions of the path gained by the noble ones (ariya). The subsequent benefit is extinction of the round of births and deaths in Saṃsāra. In other words, it is the total extinction of the illusions of permanence, pleasantness and substantiality as regards the impermanent, unpleasant and insubstantial psychophysical phenomena, etc., which are the benefits of mundane going for refuge.

6. Contamination of refuge. Mundane going for refuge gets debased owing to ignorance, doubt and misconceptions about the noble attributes of the Three Treasures. It is not bright, vast and great. The supermundane going for refuge is free from corruption. It is always clean and pure.

7. Destruction of refuge. Supramundane going for refuge can never be destroyed. The noble one (ariya) who is established in it does not point out as his or her teacher anyone other than the three refuges even in the next life. It is only the mundane going for refuge that tends to come to destruction. Its destruction is of two kinds: disastrous destruction and non-disastrous destruction. The destruction is disastrous when one reveres and seeks refuge in other heretical teachers in one of the ways described above, thereby giving rise to craving, wrong belief, etc. When the destruction follows death, it is not disastrous because it does not involve doing any evil.

The vow taken by Buddhists nowadays as regards taking refuge in the Buddha, Dhamma and Saṅgha is mundane. Like the observance of the moral precepts, its duration is not fixed and it ends only with death. This end is not disastrous because it does not involve craving, wrong belief and other unwholesome states of consciousness.

Note on the Lay Devotee

Some brief notes on the lay devotee (upāsaka) may be mentioned as follows:

1. Definition of a lay devotee.
2. Function of a lay devotee.
3. Morality of a lay devotee.
4. Livelihood a lay devotee.
5. Failure of a lay devotee.
6. Success of a lay devotee.

These six aspects should be understood.

1. Definition of a lay devotee. A lay devotee is he who seeks refuge in the Three Treasures, irrespective of his birth, high or low.

2. Function of a lay devotee. His function is to follow the Three Treasures: the Buddha, the Dhamma and Saṅgha. He follows the Three Treasures; therefore he is a lay devotee (upāsati ti upāsako), a devotee of the Three Treasures. [911]

3. Morality of a lay devotee. His morality is the observance of the five moral precepts.

4. Livelihood of a lay devotee. His livelihood excludes the five kinds of wrong trades: 1) Trade in weapons; 2) trade in human beings; 3) trade in meat and fish; 4) trade in alcohol; and 5) trade in poison. Avoiding these five wrong trades, he earns his living righteously by tending cattle, buying and selling goods and farming.

5. Failure of a lay devotee. His failure lies in the destruction of his observance of the five precepts and right livelihood. If his observance of the precept is impaired, or if he earns his living by taking up one of the five wrong trades, his life as a lay devotee is ruined. Moreover, there are five things that make his life rough, nasty and disgusting: 1) Lack of faith; 2) lack of morality; 3) performance of and indulgence in worldly rites and rituals with regard to what has been seen, heard or experienced as conceived by the foolish and the ignorant; 4) disbelief in the law of productive deeds (kamma) and belief in rituals; and 5) performance of good deeds to the Saṅgha of the Buddha only after seeking recipients in the sects of the heretics. These five deeds lead a lay devotee to failure.

6. Success of a lay devotee. His success consists in the fulfilment of his morality and right livelihood. He is a lay devotee as long as his morality and right livelihood remain intact. Besides, if he maintains the following five practices, he is said to be successful as a lay devotee. The five practices are: 1) Faith that makes one a lay devotee comparable to a jewel, a lay devotee comparable to a paduma lotus, and a lay devotee comparable to a punḍarika lotus; 2) unimpaired morality; 3) non-indulgence in earthly rituals; 4) belief in one's own productive deeds, good and bad; and 5) performance of good deeds to the Saṅgha before seeking recipients in the systems of the heretics. These five lead a lay devotee to his success.

King Ajātasattu's Loss and Gain

Not long after King Ajātasattu's departure the Buddha addressed the monks: "Monks, the king has destroyed his own position. Monks, if King Ajātasattu had not killed his father, King Bimbisāra, the righteous monarch, who ruled his kingdom lawfully, the Stream-entry path would have occurred to him on the spot and he would have become a noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna-ariya).”

The Buddha added: “Monks, if he had not put his father to death, he would have attained the Stream-entry path while seated here as he heard this Discourse on the Fruits of the Ascetic Life (Sāmañña-phala-sutta, DN 2). But now, on account of his association with his wicked friend, his potentiality to attain that path has been injured. Nevertheless, since he has taken refuge in the Three Treasures and since his refuge, which is my threefold teaching, is supreme, he may be compared to a man who, after having been sentenced to death for murder, escapes the death penalty by getting good support and by giving just a handful of flowers as a small fine. Although he ought to suffer in the Avīci hell for his heinous crime of parricide, he will suffer only in the Lohakumbhī hell after his death, for he has the good support in my teaching. He will land in that hell and remain there for 30,000 years and come up and stay on the surface for 30,000 years. Then, after 60,000 years, he will be released from Lohakumbhī.

Herein Ajātasattu’s gain is mentioned according to the commentary. One may ask: “Had he benefited from his hearing of the Discourse on the Fruits of the Ascetic Life (Sāmañña-phala-sutta)?” The answer is: Yes, he had, and the benefit is enormous. From the moment of his parricide he had known no sleep, by day or by night, for there appeared to him [912] signs of his suffering in his rebirth. After listening to the sweet and soothing the Discourse on the Fruits of the Ascetic Life he slept well whether by day or by night. And he lavishly honoured the Three Treasures.

No other worldling had faith (pothujjanika-saddhā) that was equal to Ajātasattu’s. Sound sleep, merit accrued from his honour done to the Three Treasures, possession of the unique faith of a worldling, etc. were his gain that was realised in his present life. The benefits after life would be his attainment of Parinibbāna after becoming a Paccekabuddha, by the name of Vijitāvī.

Note on Ajātasattu’s Awakening

If it is true that King Ajātasattu could have gained the Stream-entry path-knowledge instantly but for his parricide, how can he become a Paccekabuddha and attain Parinibbāna? If it is true that he will become a Paccekabuddha and attain Parinibbāna, how could he have gained the state of a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna)?

The Awakening of a Paccekabuddha consists in the fulfilment of five things: 1) A human life (manussatta); 2) being a male (liṅga-sampatti); 3) discernment leading to freedom from the pollutants (vigatāsava-dassana); 4) principal service (adhikāra); and 5) aspiration (chandatā).

The Awakening of a disciple requires only two factors: 1) Principal service (adhikāra) and 2) aspiration (chandatā). As regards the duration of time for their fulfilment of the perfections (pāramī), it takes two immeasurable periods (asaṅkhyeyya) and 100,000 aeons for the Awakening of a Paccekabuddha, one immeasurable period and 100,000 aeons for that of a disciple. In realising the four truths, the former has no teacher while the latter has.

Are not the two kinds of Awakening basically different from each other? The answer is that they cannot be different. For Ajātasattu will fulfil whatever is necessary for the attainment of Awakening as a Paccekabuddha, only after suffering for 60,000 years in the Lohakumbhī hell. Indeed those who seek Awakening as a disciple will gain it as Paccekabuddhas, if circumstances are not favourable for them to become disciples, but they must have resolved to gain release as Paccekabuddhas.

This is the answer given by the first school of teachers. According to them, although the king had the potential for gaining release as a disciple, he could not do so in the present life because of his association with his evil friend, Devadatta, which made circumstances unfavourable and damaged the prospects for his attainment of the path of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga). But later on he will fulfil everything that will contribute to his becoming a Paccekabuddha and he will gain release.

But according to other teachers, Ajātasattu had resolved to gain only the Awakening as a Paccekabuddha. But in the absence of any definite prediction of a Buddha, even those who have performed the deeds necessary for becoming a Paccekabuddha cannot gain maturity of their Awakening in their capacity as Paccekabuddhas; instead they will attain Awakening as disciples in the presence of a Buddha. Hence the Buddha said: “Monks, if he had not put his father to death, he would have attained Stream-entry path while being seated here as he heard this Discourse on the Fruits of the Ascetic Life.”

Of the three kinds of future personages: the Bodhisatta, the future Paccekabuddha and the future disciple, only the Bodhisatta is free from the five deeds with immediate result (pañcānantariya-kamma); the other two future ones are not. Though Devadatta had been assured that he would become a Paccekabuddha, because of his grudge that he had long harboured, he committed two deeds with immediate result (ānantariya-kamma) by creating schism (Saṅgha-bhedaka-kamma) and causing a Buddha's blood to flow (lohituppādaka-kamma) which were very serious crimes. Taking these into consideration, it may be understood that future Paccekabuddhas and future disciples are not so invulnerable. It may also be understood therefore that King Ajātasattu missed his opportunity to gain Stream-entry knowledge in the present life because of his parricide and that he will later on become a Paccekabuddha by the name of Vijitāvī in accordance with the law of Paccekabuddha Awakening (Pacceka-buddha-bodhi-niyāma). This is the view of the other teachers. You can choose between these two views what you think is more reasonable. These notes are based on the sub-commentary. [913]

38a: The Buddha's Parents in a Previous Existence

[The following is based on the Birth Story about the City of Sāketa (Sāketa-jātaka, Ja 68) and its commentary.]

The Brahmin Couple

On one occasion, after residing in Sāvattḥī for the Rains Retreat, the Buddha set out on a journey, taking into consideration the opportunities that would be provided by it, such as promoting his health, prescribing fresh rules of conduct for the Saṅgha, taming through dialogues and discourses those who deserved to be tamed, and discoursing on his own birth stories (jātaka) wherever the situation was appropriate. Travelling in stages, the Buddha arrived at Sāketa at evening and entered the Añjana forest for the night's stay.

On hearing the news of the arrival of the Buddha, the townsfolk of Sāketa thought that it was not proper to go and visit him at night. They waited till the next morning, then, taking flowers, perfumes and other offerings with them, they approached the Buddha, made their obeisance, and exchanging courteous words of greeting with him, remained there till it was time for him to go on the daily alms round.

When it was time to go on alms round the Buddha, in the company of the monastics, entered Sāketa. At that time, a wealthy Brahmin of Sāketa was leaving the town when he saw the Buddha near the town's gate. On seeing him, the Brahmin felt an intense filial love for him and weeping with joy and uttering: "My son, I have not seen you for such a long time," he drew near to him.

Even while the Brahmin was drawing near him, the Buddha said to the monastics: "Monastics, let the Brahmin of Sāketa alone; let him do as he pleases." And as a mother cow would treat her own calf, the Brahmin viewed the Buddha at close range from the front, from the back, and from the left side and from the right side, then embracing him, he said: "Oh, my son! My son! So long have I not seen you! So long have you been away!"

It may be noted here that if the Brahmin were to be restrained from these outpourings of affection, he would not be able to contain the intense feeling and would probably have died of heart-break.

The Brahmin of Sāketa said to the Buddha: "Venerable sir, I am able to offer food to the Fortunate One and the company of monastics. May the Fortunate

38a: The Buddha's Parents in a Previous Existence – 1348

One, out of compassion, do me the favour of accepting the offering.” The Buddha indicated his consent by remaining silent. The Brahmin led the way to his place holding the Buddha's alms bowl in his hands. He sent word to his wife at home to say: “My son is coming! Spread out a suitable place for his stay.” The wife did as she was told by her husband and stood all agog to receive the Buddha. As she saw the Buddha nearing her house, she went to him, and saying: “My son, it is a long time that I have not seen you,” and she fondled the Buddha's feet and wept with joy. She requested the Buddha to proceed to her home where the Brahmin couple respectfully offered food to the Buddha and his company of monastics. After he had finished his meal, the Brahmin took the alms bowl and washed it himself.

The Buddha then discoursed to the Brahmin couple in a way fitting to them and at the end of the discourse they became noble (ariya) Stream-enterers. They requested the Buddha: “May the Fortunate One and his company of monastics, during their sojourn at Sāketa, receive offering of alms food only at our home.” The Buddha replied: “Brahmin couple, it is not the custom for Buddhas to have a permanent place to receive alms food as you request.” Thereupon, the Brahmin couple requested the Buddha: “In that case, venerable sir, may the Fortunate One and his company of monastics go for alms elsewhere but take the meals at our home only, and go back to the monastery after giving us a talk on the Dhamma.” To this request the Buddha consented as a special favour.

From that time forward, the Brahmin came to be called by the people: “The Buddha's father,” and the wife of the Brahmin: “The Buddha's mother.” The clan of Brahmin Sāketa also earned the name of: “The Buddha's clan.”

Thereupon, Ven. Ānanda asked the Buddha: “Venerable sir, I know your [915] parentage through Queen Mahā Māyā Devī and King Suddhodana, and yet why is it that the Brahmin of Sāketa and his wife are called the Buddha's parents?” And the Buddha explained: “Ānanda, this Brahmin couple were my parents in the past 500 existences; besides, they have been my elder uncle and aunt for 500 existences; they have also been my younger uncle and aunt for 500 existences. The Brahmin couple call me their son due to the extraordinary affection that has existed in the past.” The Buddha then uttered this verse (Ja 68):

Pubbeva sannivāsena, paccuppanna-hitena vā, evam taṃ jāyate pemaṃ, uppalamā va yathodake.

Due to having lived together in previous existences and having done some beneficial things for each other, there arises love between two persons. It is like the case of the water lily or any other water plant that grows in the marsh where mud and water jointly cause its arising.

The Buddha spent his days in Sāketa for as many persons as there were in that town that deserved to gain Awakening. Then he proceeded on his way to Sāvattthī. The Brahmin couple further sought guidance from the monastics from whom they got appropriate instructions and in due course attained the three higher paths after which they realized Nibbāna without any substrata of existence remaining (anupādisesa-parinibbāna).

When the Brahmin couple passed away, the Brahmin community of Sāketa assembled together with the common objective of paying due respects to one of their members. Similarly, the Stream-enterers, the Once-returners and the Non-returners, all noble ones (ariya) who had been associates in the practice of the path with the Brahmin couple, assembled together with the common objective of paying their respects to one of their members. Those two groups of people placed the remains of the Brahmin couple on a bier with gabled roofs, and amidst floral tributes and sprinkling of perfumes about the bier, they carried it out of the town.

The Buddha in his daily routine viewed the sentient world with his Buddha-eye consisting of knowledge that discerns the natural bent and latent proclivities of individuals (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa) and knowledge of the maturity and immaturity of the faculties of beings (indriya-paro-pariyatti-ñāṇa) for that day and came to know about the passing away, in total cessation, of the Brahmin couple; and seeing that his presence and teaching at the funeral of the deceased ones would lead to the Awakening of the multitudes attending the funeral, he left Sāvattthī for the cemetery at Sāketa, carrying his alms bowl and double robe himself.

On seeing the Buddha, the people said: “The Fortunate One has come to attend to the funeral of his father and mother,” and paid their obeisance to him. The townsfolk brought the bier to the cemetery in reverential ceremony. They asked the Buddha: “Venerable sir, what is the proper way to venerate the Brahmin couple who had been noble (ariya) lay disciples?”

38a: The Buddha's Parents in a Previous Existence – 1350

The Buddha replied in the following verse, revealing the fact that the deceased couple had become Arahats and that they deserved the veneration that was due to Arahats (Dhp 225):

Ahiṃsakā ye munayo, niccaṃ kāyena saṃvutā, te yanti accutaṃ ṭhānaṃ, yattha gantvā na socare.

The Arahats who do not harm others are always restrained in their physical, verbal and mental actions. Having gone to Nibbāna through path-knowledge, they are free from sorrow. They have realized the four paths and fruitions and attained the deathless Nibbāna. [916]

The commentary to the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada) says that at the end of that verse a great number of people attained Stream-entry and even higher stages of path-knowledge.

After uttering the above verse the Buddha delivered the Discourse on Ageing (Jarā-sutta, Snp 4.6) that he knew would benefit the audience at that time. By the end of the discourse, 84,000 beings perceived the four truths and became noble ones.

38b: The Destruction of the Sakyans

[The following is based on the Dhamma Verses (Dhp 47) and its commentary.]

The Story of Viṭaṭūbha

Prince Pasenadi, son of King Mahā Kosala of Sāvattihī, Prince Mahā Licchavī, son of King Licchavī of Vesālī, and Prince Bandhula, son of King Malla of Kusinārā were on their way to Takkasilā to get their education under a famous teacher there, and met at a rest house outside the city. They introduced themselves, learned one another's names, parentage and clan, and also the purpose of their journey, and they became friends. After having completed their education under the guidance of a great teacher in due time, they bid farewell to the teacher and left Takkasilā together and returned to their respective homes.

Of these three princes, Prince Pasenadi demonstrated his prowess and skill before his royal father, King Mahā Kosala, who was so pleased with his son's capabilities that he anointed him king and so the prince became King Pasenadi of Kosala.

Prince Mahāli of the Licchavīs also demonstrated his prowess and skill before the Licchavīs so arduously that both of his eyes went blind. The Licchavī princes felt very sorry at the fate of their teacher Prince Mahāli and conferred among themselves to afford suitable status to him without abandoning him. They unanimously resolved to name him as lord of a certain toll gate which had a yearly revenue of 100,000 pieces of silver. Prince Mahāli lived on the revenues collected at the toll gate and took charge of educating and training the 500 Licchavī princes.

When Prince Bandhula demonstrated his prowess and skill before the Mallas he was tricked by someone; an iron rod was secretly concealed inside one of the bamboos which he was to cut with his sword. There were 60 bundles of 60 bamboos each standing before him. His royal father commanded: "Now son, cut these bamboos with your sword," by way of testing the prince's might. Prince Bandhula leapt up to a height of 80 cubits and cut down the 60 bundles of bamboos one by one. At the last bundle he noticed a strange frictional noise from inside the bamboo which had the concealed iron rod inside.

Discovering the nature of the dirty trick played upon him, he threw away his sword and wailed: “Oh, there was not a single one out of this big crowd of my kinsmen and friends who would, out of kind regard for me, warn me of this trick. Had I been forewarned, I could very well have cut that iron rod too without letting it betray its presence there by its noise.” Then he said to his royal parents: “I shall kill all the Malla princes and make myself king.” To this the parents replied: “Dear son, it is a time-honoured tradition with us Mallas to rule by turns. We do not approve of your idea.” On being repeatedly refused approval, Prince Bandhula became frustrated and said: “Then I will go and live with my friend King Pasenadi of Kosala,” and he went to Sāvattthī.

When King Pasenadi of Kosala learned of the arrival of his friend Prince Bandhula, he went out to greet him and escorted him into the city with much pomp and honour. King Pasenadi of Kosala made Bandhula his commander-in-chief and Bandhula sent for his royal parents and let them live in Sāvattthī. This is an account of the three princes: Prince Pasenadi, Prince Mahāli of the Licchavīs, and Prince Bandhula of the Mallas.

King Pasenadi of Kosala

One day, King Pasenadi of Kosala was standing on an upper floor of his multi-gabled palace, looking towards the high road in the city when he saw thousands of monastics going to the houses of Anāthapiṇḍika, the rich man; Cūḷa Anāthapiṇḍika, the rich man; Visākhā, the supporter of the Pupphārāma monastery; and Suppavāsā, the rich man’s wife, to [917] collect alms food. He asked his men where these monastics were going and they reported to him that 2,000 monastics daily collected their alms food: daily food, ticket food,<sup>231</sup> or sick-monastic’s food at the house of Anāthapiṇḍika; and 500 each at the houses of Cūḷa Anāthapiṇḍika, Visākhā and Suppavāsā. The King was impressed. He also wanted to be a regular supporter of alms food to the Saṅgha. He went to the Jetavana monastery and invited the Buddha and 1,000 monastics to the palace and offered food for seven days where he personally served the food. On the seventh day, he said to the Buddha: “Venerable sir, may the Fortunate One and 500 monastics come to the palace to receive our food offerings every day.” The Buddha replied: “Great King, it is not the custom of Buddhas to receive alms food from the same supporter every day. People like to see the Buddha visit their home too.”

“In that case, venerable sir, may the Fortunate One let one regular monastic, together with 500 other monastics, come to the palace for daily alms food offering.” The Buddha assigned Ven. Ānanda to head 500 monastics to go to the palace for the daily alms food.

The King attended to the offering of food to the monastics personally for seven days without assigning these duties to anyone. On the eighth day, he was preoccupied with state affairs and forgot to offer alms food to the Saṅgha.

As it was not the custom in the royal palace to carry out anything without orders, the attendants just provided seats to the monastics but no offering of food took place for lack of orders. Many of the monastics were disappointed and left, after saying: “We cannot remain here.” On the next day also, the King forgot to feed the Saṅgha and many of the monastics left the palace. On the third day also, the same thing happened and all the monastics left and only Ven. Ānanda remained.

Noble ones endowed with great past merits take things with wise circumspection. They foster the lay supporters’ faith in the teaching. There are certain disciples of the Buddha beginning with Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Mahā Moggallāna who were two chief disciples; Ven. Khemā and Ven. Uppalavaṇṇā who were the two chief female disciples; Citta, the rich man, and Prince Hatthaka Āḷavaka who were two foremost lay disciples; and Nandamātā, wife of the rich man of Veḷukaṅṭhakī; and lady Khujjuttarā who were two foremost female lay disciples who were acclaimed by the Buddha as foremost in their own right, and were endowed with the ten perfections (pāramī) to a certain extent and were, therefore, noble persons of great past merit, blessed with their previous aspirations. Ven. Ānanda also had fulfilled the ten perfections over 100,000 aeons (kappa) and was a noble one of great past merit, blessed with previous aspirations. He was circumspect by nature. So, being desirous of fostering the faith of the supporters, he alone remained in the palace for the daily food-offerings.

The palace officials prepared a suitable place and made food offerings to the sole monastic, Ven. Ānanda. King Pasenadi of Kosala came to the palace after every other monastic had left the palace. On seeing the food for the Saṅgha left untouched, the King asked: “Have the revered ones not come?” and the officials replied that only Ven. Ānanda came. The King was angry because he felt that the monastics had let such a big amount of food go to waste. He went to see the Buddha and complained: “Venerable sir, I had prepared food offerings for 500 monastics but only Ven. Ānanda came. All the food remains untouched. How is it, venerable sir, that those monastics have such disregard for our invitation to the palace?”

Thereupon, the Buddha did not say anything against the monastics but said: “Great King, these monastic disciples are not very well acquainted with you. Probably that is why they did not go to your palace.” On that occasion, the Buddha presented a discourse to the monastics, the Discourse about Families (Kula-sutta, AN 9.17), setting out nine reasons for monastics that make it not proper to go to the lay supporters, and nine reasons that make it proper to go to the lay supporters. [918]

The Discourse about Families

“Monastics, homes of lay supporters who come under these nine conditions should not be visited by monastics, if they have never been there, or if they happen to be there already, they should not stay there. Now, these are the nine improper conditions:

1. If the lay supporters do not respectfully welcome you.
2. If they do not make obeisance respectfully to the monastics.
3. If they do not respectfully offer proper seats.
4. If they hide from monastics their property worth offering to monastics.
5. If they offer only a little whereas they possess much.
6. If they offer inferior things whereas they have superior things.
7. If they do not offer things respectfully but do so disrespectfully.
8. If they do not come near the monastics to listen to the teaching.
9. If they do not listen to a monastic’s discourse respectfully.

Monastics, homes of lay supporters who are of the above nine improper conditions should not be visited by monastics, if they have never been there; and if a monastic happens to be at such a home already, he should not stay there.

38b: The Destruction of the Sakyans – 1355

Monastics, homes of lay supporters who come under nine conditions ought to be visited by monastics if they have never been there, and if they happen to be there already, they should stay there. Now, these are the nine proper conditions:

1. If the lay supporters welcome you respectfully.
2. If they make obeisance respectfully to the monastics.
3. If they respectfully offer proper seats.
4. If they do not make any secret of their property worth offering.
5. If they have much to offer they offer much.
6. If they have superior things to offer they offer them.
7. If they offer things respectfully.
8. If they come near the monastics to listen to the teaching.
9. If they listen to a monastic's discourse respectfully.

Monastics, lay supporters who have the above nine proper conditions should be visited by monastics if they have never been there and if a monastic happens to be at such a house, he should stay there.

Great King, those monastics left you probably because they are not on intimate terms with you. Wise ones of the past are known to have gone to their intimate ones in times of serious illness, near unto death, although they were respectfully looked after by people not intimate to them.” On being requested by King Pasenadi of Kosala to tell that story, the Buddha related to him the Birth Story about the Ascetic Kesava (Kesava-jātaka, Ja 346).

This story was also referred to when Brahma Baka was tamed by the Buddha and was mentioned earlier. See chapter 35, the section on Baka Brahma.

After hearing the Buddha's discourse, King Pasenadi of Kosala saw the need to become intimate with the Saṅgha and thought of some way to fulfil this aim. He struck on the idea of marrying one of the Sakyan princesses. “If I were to raise a Sakyan Princess to the status of Chief Queen,” he thought, “the Fortunate One would become my relation and his disciples would consider me as an intimate.” Thereupon, he sent an ultimatum to the Sakyan princes demanding the hand of a Sakyan princess in marriage to him. When the royal messengers charged with the mission asked: “Which princess, the daughter of which Sakyan prince, did his majesty specify?” The King said: “Any Sakyan princess would do, provided her ancestry is ascertained by you.” [919]

At the city of Kapilavatthu, the Sakyans held a council to answer the ultimatum. They did not like to go to war with their rival kingdom, for if they refused to comply with King Pasenadi’s demand their kingdom would certainly be invaded. Since the Kosala were a different clan from the Sakyans, they could not give in marriage anyone of their own kin to a non-Sakyan. It was Prince Mahānāma the Sakyan who conceived a way out of the dilemma. “I have a very beautiful girl born of one of my slaves named Nāgamuṇḍā; the girl is called Vāsabhā Khattiyā. Let us give her away.” They agreed. A formal reply was then given to the delegation from Kosala: “We shall comply.” – “The daughter of which Sakyan Prince are you going to give?” – “It is the daughter of Mahānāma, the Sakyan Prince, cousin of Buddha Gotama, son of Amitodāna. Vāsabhā Khattiyā is the name of the princess.”

The delegation returned to Sāvattthī with the favourable news. King Pasenadi of Kosala was pleased and said: “Go and bring the Sakyan Princess without delay. But mark this: kings as a rule are crafty. A slave’s daughter might be posed as a princess. So you must ascertain her genuineness by watching her at table, make sure she eats together with her Sakyan father.”

The delegation went again to Kapilavatthu and announced: “Our King of Kosala will accept only a princess who eats together with you Sakyans.” – “Very well, friends,” said Mahānāma the Sakyan. When it was meal time, Vāsabhā Khattiyā, fully attired and adorned as a princess, was brought to the dining table where Mahānāma the Sakyan was sitting, and there it was made to appear that the two ate together. The delegation was satisfied with what they saw and returned to Sāvattthī with the girl.

This neat trick was carried out thus: When the Sakyans were confronted with the dining test required by King Pasenadi of Kosala, the Sakyans were quite at a loss about what to do. But Mahānāma reassured them with the instruction that after the bogus princess was being seated at Mahānāma’s dining table, and the prince was just about to put his first morsel into the mouth, an intervention was to be made with an urgent message which must be seen by him forthwith. The plan got the approval of the Sakyans and was carried out accordingly. Thus was the delegation from Sāvattthī taken in by the trick.

38b: The Destruction of the Sakyans – 1357

Back at their capital, the delegation reported to the king what they had witnessed. King Pasenadi of Kosala was delighted. After the customary anointing ceremony he made Vāsabhā Khattiyā, the Chief Queen, and she was waited on by 500 court ladies. Not long afterwards, the Chief Queen, who became very dear to the king, gave birth to a son with golden complexion.

When it was time for the young prince to be named, the Kosalan King sent a royal message to the royal grandfather Mahānāma, the Sakyan, informing him of the birth of a son and asking him to suggest a suitable name for the princeling. It so happened that the messenger who took the royal message to the Sakyan court was slightly hard of hearing. After reading the Kosalan King's message, Mahānāma remarked: "Vāsabhā Khattiyā was previously a girl of great personal influence. And now after giving birth to a son she is going to be a favourite (vallabhā) of the Kosalan King!" Now, the joyous expression favourite, i.e., an intimate darling, vallabhā in the local dialect, sounded as viṭaṭūbha to the Kosalan messenger who took that word as the name to be given to the Kosalan Prince. He reported to King Pasenadi of Kosala: "Viṭaṭūbha is the name, your majesty, that the royal grandfather suggests for the princeling." The King mused: "Possibly, Viṭaṭūbha is a clan name of yore with us," and he named his son Viṭaṭūbha. Then with a view to pleasing the Buddha, the King made Viṭaṭūbha, commander in-chief, even in his tender age.

Viṭaṭūbha was brought up as a prince in all regal style. When he was seven years old, he came to notice how other princes were receiving dolls and other children got presents from their maternal grandparents and so he asked his mother, Chief Queen Vāsabhā Khattiyā: "Mother, other princes get children's presents, such as dolls and the like, from their [920] maternal grandparents. But I have received none from my maternal grandparents. Why is it? Have you no parents?" The mother replied: "Dear son, the Sakyans are your maternal grandparents. But they live far away from us. That is why they cannot send you any gifts."

When Viṭaṭūbha was sixteen, he said to his mother: "Mother, I would like to see my maternal grandparent's palace." And the mother discouraged him with the words: "Dear son, it is not advisable for you to do that. After all, what use is there in your seeing your maternal grandparent's palace?" But Prince Viṭaṭūbha was insistent and after many repeated requests, the mother could do nothing but yield to his wish.

38b: The Destruction of the Sakyans – 1358

Viṭaṭūbha informed his father, the king, of his intended journey and left Sāvattḥī, leading a big army. Chief Queen Vāsabhā Khattiyā had in the meantime sent a secret message to the Sakyans asking them to keep up appearances when Viṭaṭūbha arrived so that the whole conspiracy would not in any way be betrayed. This message gave the timely opportunity for the younger Sakyans, i.e., who were junior to Viṭaṭūbha to leave the city and remain in the remote country during his visit because they could not make obeisance to Viṭaṭūbha as would be normally expected. Those Sakyans, who were to receive Viṭaṭūbha, met him on arrival at Kapilavatthu, at the royal rest house.

There Viṭaṭūbha was introduced to his maternal grandfather and maternal uncles to whom he had to make obeisance. Having done his turn of paying respects, he saw no one paying him respects. “Why is there no Sakyans to pay respects to me?” he asked. The Sakyans then said: “Dear son, your younger cousins have gone on a visit to the country.” Then they entertained Viṭaṭūbha lavishly.

After staying two or three days in Kapilavatthu, Viṭaṭūbha left the city with his big army. When every visitor had gone, a slave girl came to cleanse with diluted milk the seat where Viṭaṭūbha had sat at the royal rest house, all the while cursing: “Fie! Profaned is this place, profaned by Viṭaṭūbha, the son of the slave girl Vāsabhā Khattiyā.” These words were overheard by one of Viṭaṭūbha’s men who had come back to the place to fetch his arms that he had forgotten to take away with him. He asked how far the girl’s curse was true and was told that Vāsabhā Khattiyā was the child born of Mahānāma the Sakyans and his slave girl Nāgamuṇḍā. The Kosala soldier related this news to his comrades and it soon became the talk of the town that the Chief Queen Vāsabhā Khattiyā was a daughter of a slave girl.

When Viṭaṭūbha learned this news, he was quick to understand the situation. “Well, let the Sakyans cleanse my seat with diluted milk now, when I become king, I will wash my seat with the blood from the Sakyans’ throats!” he said to himself, bearing an ominous grudge against the Sakyans.

After arriving back at the capital, the king’s ministers reported the news to the king. King Pasenadi of Kosala was very angry with the Sakyans. “This presenting a slave girl for my queen is preposterous; it is an insult against my honour!” he roared and withdrew all the rank and status accorded to his Chief

Queen and commander-in-chief, allowing them only the rank and status of slaves.

Two or three days later, the Buddha paid a visit to the royal palace of King Pasenadi of Kosala where he sat on the specially arranged seat. The king made his obeisance to the Buddha and said to him: “Venerable sir, the kinsmen of the Fortunate One have deceived me. They have sent me a slave girl’s daughter, saying that she was a princess. I have discovered this and have therefore downgraded both mother, Vāsabhā Khattiyā, and son, Viṭaṭūbha, to the rank and status of slaves.”

The Buddha said: “Great King, the Sakyans have done a wrong thing, they ought to have given you a princess as befitting your lineage. However, Great King, I wish you to consider this: Vāsabhā Khattiyā was a daughter of Mahānāma the Sakyans; and moreover she has been anointed as Chief Queen by you who are of royal blood. Viṭaṭūbha is of your own blood. What does maternal lineage matter? It is paternal lineage that counts. This important fact was recognized by wise people of past and therefore, a firewood-gatherer, a poor peasant girl, was made the Chief Queen, and the boy born of this Chief Queen of humble origin became King Kaṭṭhavāhana of Bārāṇasī, a city with an area of twelve leagues.” [921]

When King Pasenadi of Kosala had heard the story of Kaṭṭhavāhana, he was satisfied with the dictum that only paternal lineage is of real significance. Accordingly he reinstated the Chief Queen and the commander-in-chief to their previous ranks and status.

[To avoid repetition this story will be told later under Ven. Mogharāja’s story in chapter 43.41.]

Bandhula and His Wife Mallikā

The commander-in-chief of King Pasenadi of Kosala was Bandhula, a Malla Prince. His wife Mallikā was the daughter of King Malla of Kusinārā. Even after some years of wedlock, the couple did not beget any offspring. Bandhula therefore sent Mallikā to her father’s home. Mallikā thought that it would be well if she visited the Buddha before leaving Sāvattihī. So, she went to the Jetavana monastery and made obeisance to the Buddha. On being asked where she was going, Mallikā told the Buddha how she was being sent home to her father because she failed to produce any children. Thereupon, the Buddha said: “In that case there is no need for you to go home to your father. You should go back to the home of the commander-in-chief.” Mallikā was very happy with these words and, making her obeisance to the Buddha, she went back to her husband. Bandhula asked her why she had come back. She told him what the Buddha had said to her. Bandhula pondered: “The Fortunate One is far-sighted. He must have fore-knowledge about Mallikā’s probable pregnancy.” And so he let her stay with him.

38b: The Destruction of the Sakyans – 1360

Not long afterwards, Mallikā became pregnant. She had an intense craving as is often the case with pregnant women. She told her husband about it. She wanted to bathe in the auspicious royal lake where the Licchavīs usually were anointed king and she also wanted to drink its water. Bandhula said: “Very well,” and putting her on his chariot and, taking his great bow that needed 1,000 men to harness it, they left Sāvattihī and entered Vesālī from the city gate assigned to Mahā Licchavī for the enjoyment of tolls collected at that gate. Mahā Licchavī’s house was just close by.

Mahā Licchavī recognized the sound of Bandhula’s chariot thumping on the threshold of the city gate. He had great foreboding: “Disaster is afoot today for the Licchavīs,” and he warned them. The auspicious royal lake was very heavily guarded, inside as well as outside. It was covered with iron netting so that even birds could not gain entry to it.

Bandhula, the commander-in-chief, alighted from his chariot, drove away the guards with his cane and cut open the iron netting with his scimitar. He and his wife entered the lake, bathed there and, coolly putting her in the chariot, headed home by the same route that he had come.

The guards reported the matter to the Vajjī princes. Infuriated, the Vajjis mounted on 500 chariots and gave chase. When the chase was reported to Mahā Licchavī, he called out: “Young Licchavī princes, don’t do that! Bandhula, the commander-in-chief will destroy you.” To that the princes replied: “Sir, we cannot stand it. We must catch him!”

Mahā Licchavī had known the might of his schoolmate, Bandhula, and warned the Vajjī princes thus: “Well, princes, if you must give chase, when you see Bandhula’s chariot depressed down to the wheel hub, turn back from wherever you saw it. If you don’t turn back, but still pursue him, do turn back when you hear a great roaring sound. If you don’t turn back, but still pursue him, you will see holes at the front of each of your chariots. Turn back wherever you see these holes, don’t go any further.”

The Licchavī's ignored the advice and proceeded in hot pursuit. When Mallikā saw they were being pursued, she told Bandhula what she saw. "Well, watch well. When all the 500 chariots are seen as one, when they all are in a straight line, do tell me!" he said. Mallikā informed her husband when the pursuing chariots were seen as a single line. Then Bandhula, the commander-in-chief, gave the reins of the horse to her saying: "You hold them!" Then he stood in the chariot and drew his great bow that needed 1,000 strong men to draw it. At that moment, the chariot sank to the level of the wheel [922] hub. The Licchavīs saw this but did not heed Mahā Licchavī's warning and drove on. Bandhula, as the commander-in-chief, after proceeding a while, pulled at the bow string producing a thunderous sound. The Licchavīs heard it but did not heed Mahā Licchavī's warning and did not turn back. Then Bandhula sent an arrow which pierced through all the 500 pursuing chariots, it passed through the chest of the Licchavī princes and struck the ground.

The Licchavī princes were still unaware that they had been shot and cried: "Hey, Bandhula, stop!" all the while still following Bandhula. Then Bandhula, the commander-in-chief, halted a while and said: "All of you Licchavīs are dead men. I need not fight with dead men!" – "But we do not look like dead men, do we?" – "Then take off the mail armour from the last Licchavī Prince."

When they did as they were told, the lifeless body of the rearmost Licchavī Prince dropped to the floor of the chariot. Then Bandhula told them to drive home and prepare for the funeral of all of them. "Before taking off your mail armour, you may say your last word to your wives," he added. The Licchavīs did as they were told. All of them perished.

Bandhula the commander-in-chief drove back home with his wife Mallikā. She bore him twin sons sixteen times so that the couple had 32 robust sons, all brave and strong. They had their training completed in all the arts when they were allotted 1,000 men each as their followers. Whenever Bandhula, the commander-in-chief, appeared in court, he and his 32 sons, together with 32,000 strong warriors would fill the whole courtyard.

Bandhula is Murdered

One day, there arose an uproar at the court of justice complaining that a miscarriage of justice had taken place. The matter was reported to Bandhula, the commander-in-chief, who then went to the court of justice, heard the case afresh, and passed judgment, declaring who the rightful owner was. The people joined in their loud approval of the righteous judgment.

38b: The Destruction of the Sakyans – 1362

King Pasenadi of Kosala heard the sound and asked what it was. On being told about it, the king was very pleased and placed him in charge of the court of justice; the former justices were all removed from service. Bandhula thus got an additional duty as judge which he discharged with uprightness.

The disgraced judges, being deprived of their usual bribes, plotted against Bandhula, the commander-in-chief. They conspired to make false allegations that Bandhula was aspiring to the throne. The king believed the words of the disgraced judges. He was greatly ill at ease. He wanted to do away with Bandhula but since Bandhula was a popular figure he dared not put Bandhula to death in the city. So he invented a wicked ploy. He had his trusted men stage an uprising at the border regions. Bandhula, the commander-in-chief, and his 32 sons were ordered to put down the fake uprising, and to bring back the insurgents. The king sent along his chosen generals with Bandhula, with orders to murder Bandhula and all his sons.

When Bandhula got to the so-called area of unrest, the king's men inserted themselves as insurgents fled. Bandhula carried out measures to turn the remote region into flourishing settlements, and returned to the city. When they were a good distance away from the city, the captains, who were sent along with them, beheaded Bandhula and his 32 sons.

Mallikā's Story

On that day, Mallikā, the wife of the commander-in-chief, was preparing to offer a meal to the two chief disciples, Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Mahā Moggallāna together with 500 monastics at her home. Early that morning, she had received a message that her husband Bandhula, the commander-in-chief, and her 32 sons had been beheaded. She kept the news to herself, having slipped the note containing the message inside her jacket. While she was attending on the two chief disciples at table, her maids, after having offered rice, were bringing ghee to the table, when they accidentally broke the vessel containing ghee. The two chief disciples witnessed this. Ven. Sāriputta asked Mallikā: “What has the nature of breaking up, has broken up. Don't let it prey on [923] your mind.” Thereupon, Mallikā produced the grim message from inside her jacket and said: “Venerable sir, they sent me this message to tell me that my 32 sons, together with their father, have been beheaded. Even that news I did not allow to prey on my mind; how would this pot of ghee prey on my mind?”

38b: The Destruction of the Sakyans – 1363

Ven. Sāriputta gave a discourse beginning with the verse (Salla-sutta, Snp. 3.8): Animittam-anaññātaṃ maccānaṃ idha jīvitam, “unsignalled and unknown here is the life of mortals.” Then he rose from his seat and returned to the Jetavana monastery.

When the offering of food to the Saṅgha was finished Mallikā sent for her 32 daughters-in-law and said: “Dear daughters-in-law, your husbands, though faultless, have suffered the consequence of their past deeds. Do not be oppressed by sorrow, grief and lamentation. Also do not bear malice against the king.” These words were overheard by the king’s secret agents who reported to the king that Bandhula and his sons were free of guilt. The king was remorseful. He went to Mallikā’s house and apologized to Mallikā and her 32 daughters-in-law. Then he asked Mallikā to name any boon she would like.

Mallikā said: “Great King, let the boon be considered as having been granted to me.” After the king had returned, she offered special alms food to the Saṅgha for the benefit of her dear departed ones. Then she took her bath and went to see the king. She bowed before the king and said: “Great King, you have granted me leave to name a boon. I have no other wish than your permission to allow me and my 32 daughters-in-law to return to our respective parents.” The king gave his assent gladly. Mallikā sent home her 32 daughters-in-law to their respective parents’ homes and she herself returned to hers.

Mallikā lived in her parents’ home in Kusinārā for a long time. Later, when the Buddha passed away and she learned that his remains were being carried to Kusinārā by the Mallas, she got the idea to honour the Buddha by adorning the Buddha’s body with the famous Great Creeper (Mahā-latā) gown which she had not worn since the death of her husband. She took it out from its place, cleaned it with perfumed water and awaited the arrival of the Buddha’s remains.

The Great Creeper gown was a very rare piece of adornment which only three persons had the good fortune to possess. According to the commentary on the Long Discourse about the Emancipation (Mahā-parinibbāna-sutta, DN 16), that was: Visākhā; Mallikā, wife of Bandhula, the commander-in-chief; and the daughter of a rich man of Bārāṇasī, Devadāniyā the thief; according to the commentary on the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, DhP 53) it was possessed only by these three ladies in the whole human world.

When the remains of the Buddha were being carried past her house, she requested the carriers of the bier: “Please! Please wait a moment,” and she respectfully encased the Buddha’s body in the Great Creeper gown which covered the body neatly from head to sole. The golden-hued body of the Buddha, clothed in the great gown, wrought with the seven kinds of gems made a gorgeous spectacle.

Mallikā’s mind was filled with delight in seeing the magnificence of the Buddha’s body. Her conviction in the Three Treasures soared. She made this wish: “Exalted Buddha! May I, in my faring on in this journey in Samsāra, be always perfect in my personal appearance even without the need to embellish myself.”

After she passed away, Mallikā was reborn as a celestial being in the Tāvātimsa Realm. On account of her wish she was endowed with unrivalled beauty. She had a dress magnificently finished with the seven kinds of gems and also a mansion of like description see the commentary to Mallikā’s Heavenly Mansion (Mallikā-vimāna, Vv. 658-663).

The Passing of King Pasenadi

King Pasenadi of Kosala let the nephew of Bandhula, named Dīghakārāyana, succeed him as commander-in-chief. This token of his high regard for Bandhula did not, however, appease the nephew who kept awaiting his opportunity to revenge the death of his innocent [924] uncle.

The king was never happy again after the assassination of the innocent Bandhula. A feeling of guilt possessed him, so much so that he did not find pleasure in his kingly luxuries. At that time, the Buddha was sojourning at the market town of Medāḷupa, in the province of the Sakyans. The King of Kosala, wishing to see the Buddha, put up a rustic tent built of branches of trees in the vicinity of the Buddha’s monastery and stayed there. Leaving the regal paraphernalia with the commander-in-chief Dīghakārāyana there he entered the Buddha’s chamber alone.

The reason for the king’s leaving his regal paraphernalia with Dīghakārāyana were: 1) He considered it improper to look ostentatious in the presence of the Buddha; and 2) he intended to have a private dialogue with the Buddha which he believed would gladden him. When the regal paraphernalia was sent to the palace, it was understood by the royal attendants that they did not need to wait on the king in the meantime and that they should return to the palace.

As the Kosalan King went alone to the Buddha's monastery, Dīghakārāyana felt uneasy with the thought: "This king had previously had private conference with Gotama the recluse," after which my uncle Bandhula and his 32 sons were assassinated; now he is again in conference with Gotama the recluse. What might this mean? Might I be the target this time?"

As soon as the king had entered the Buddha's chamber, Dīghakārāyana, the commander-in-chief, took the regal paraphernalia to Viṭaṭūbha, cajoled and coerced Viṭaṭūbha to accept kingship then and there. Then he left a charger, a scimitar and a royal maid for Pasenadi of Kosala with a note saying: "Do not come after us if you wish to stay alive!" After that he took Prince Viṭaṭūbha to the palace in Sāvattthī as the new king with the white umbrella held above him.

When the Kosalan King came out of the monastery after having cordial conversation with the Buddha, he saw none of his army, so he asked his maid, who told him what she heard and saw. Thereupon, he headed for Rājagaha to muster help from his royal nephew, King Ajātasattu with the object of deposing Viṭaṭūbha the usurper. On his way, he had to make do with a meal of broken rice and to drink unfiltered water. As he was of a delicate constitution, that food proved indigestible for him. It was late in the evening when he got to the city of Rājagaha. The city gates were already closed. So he had to spend the night at a rest house outside the city, intending to see his nephew King Ajātasattu the next morning.

That night, the Kosalan King suffered from indigestion due to the upset condition of his phlegm, bile and wind. He could answer the call of nature only two or three times before he became totally exhausted. He slept on the bosom of the young maid who was his sole company. He died at dawn the next day.

At the time of death, the Kosalan King was 80 years of age, the same age the Buddha was when he passed away, see the Discourse on Shrines to the Dhamma (Dhamma-cetiya-sutta, MN 89).

When the young maid found that the king had passed away, she wailed loudly: "My Lord, the Kosalan King, who had ruled over the two provinces of Kāśi and Kosala, had died uncared for outside the city in this rest house where the homeless make it their home.” On hearing her lamentation people came to know about the death of the Kosalan King. They reported it to King Ajātasattu who came out and saw his dead uncle. He arranged for a fitting funeral with much ceremony. Then he mustered his troops by the beat of the gong, intending to capture Viṭaṭūbha.

The ministers of King Ajātasattu pleaded at his feet, saying: “Great King, if your royal uncle, the Kosalan King, were alive, your visit to Sāvattḥī would be proper. But now that Viṭaṭūbha, your younger cousin, is on the throne, and he had also a right through kinship to the throne, your expedition is not advisable.” Ajātasattu accepted the ministers’ advice.

King Viṭaṭūbha Remembers his Grudge

King Viṭaṭūbha, after ascending the throne at Sāvattḥī, remembered his grudge against the Sakyans. He left the city at the head of a big army to make war against and destroy the Sakyans. Early in the morning, the Buddha viewed the world of beings with his Buddha-eye [925] and saw that danger was imminent for his kinsmen the Sakyans. He thought it right and proper to protect them. So after going on alms round, he took a rest in his scented chamber in a noble resting posture like a lion, lying on his right side. In the evening he went to Kapilavatthu by his psychic power and reappeared sitting at the foot of a tree with bare branches in the vicinity of the city of Kapilavatthu.

Not far away from that tree there was a shady banyan tree near the boundary between Kapilavatthu and Viṭaṭūbha’s country. When Viṭaṭūbha saw the Buddha, he made obeisance to him and said: “Venerable sir, how is it that the Fortunate One is sitting underneath this skeleton of a tree when it is still hot? May you come and sit underneath a shady banyan tree which is near our boundary.” The Buddha replied: “Great King, so be it. Shelter provided by kinsman is cool enough.” Viṭaṭūbha was not slow to take the hint. He surmised rightly that the Buddha was there to give his benign protection to his kinsmen. So he withdrew his forces after respectfully making obeisance to him. The Buddha reappeared in the Jetavana monastery by his psychic power.

But Viṭaṭūbha did not forget the insult he had suffered at the hands of the Sakyans. He took out another expedition against the Sakyan city. On this occasion too the Buddha was there and he was obliged to withdraw. For the third time he led a mighty force towards the Sakyan territory, only to meet with the Buddha before he could start operations and again he had to withdraw.

When King Viṭaṭūbha set out for the fourth time the Buddha saw that the time for the evil misdeeds of the Sakyans was taking effect and so he did not intervene. The past misdeeds of the Sakyans consisted in spreading poison in a stream on a certain day in their previous existence.

Viṭaṭūbha came with a big army intent on destroying the Sakyans. The Buddha's kinsmen, on the other hand, were averse to taking life, they would rather give up their own life than destroy life. They knew that they were past masters in archery, so they thought of frightening away the enemy by their feats in archery. They put on mail armour and came out pretending to join battle. They sent arrows into the enemy which did not hit anyone but passed through their shields or through holes in their ear lobes which had been pierced while young for wearing earrings.

When Viṭaṭūbha saw the arrows, he thought that the Sakyans were shooting them in earnest. "They say the Sakyans don't destroy life," he said, "but now they are trying to kill us with their arrows!" One of his men said: "Lord, inspect your forces and you will know." – "The arrows come in the direction of our men." – "But there is no one hit on this side, Great King, would your majesty make a count of your men," replied the man boldly. The king ordered to make a count and found that no one had fallen.

Viṭaṭūbha withdrew his forces a little and ordered his men: "Men, slay all those who say they are Sakyans. But spare my grandfather Mahānāma and those who are together with him. Thereupon Viṭaṭūbha's forces made a dash for the kill. The Sakyans did not see anything to hold on to. Some of them stood holding on to tufts of grass while others stood holding on to clusters of reed. When asked by the enemy: "Are you not Sakyans?" these Sakyans did not and could not utter a lie, those Sakyans holding on to the grass replied: "These are not Sāka (teak trees), but only grass," and those Sakyans holding on to the reeds replied: "These are not Sāka (teak trees), but only reed." Those Sakyans and Mahānāma together with the Sakyans that remained together with him were spared. Those who held onto the grass later came to be known as Grass Sakyans, and those who held onto the reeds as Reed Sakyans. All other Sakyans were put to the sword, not even infants were allowed to live. Viṭaṭūbha then cleansed his seat with the enemy's blood drawn from their throats. Thus was the Sakyan clan exterminated by Viṭaṭūbha.

Mahānāma the Sakyan was captured alive. On his way to Viṭaṭūbha's country, when it was time for the morning meal, they dismounted and the table was laid; Viṭaṭūbha informed [926] Mahānāma to join him. Persons of royal blood as a rule never share a meal with sons of a slave. Mahānāma therefore, noticing a pond nearby, said: "Grandson, I need to wash up before I eat." – "Then, grandfather, take a bath," replied Viṭaṭūbha.

Mahānāma knew that if he refused to eat with Viṭaṭūbha, he would be put to the sword. "It were better to take my own life," he reflected. So he untied his coil of hair, made a knot at the end of his hair which was spread out, and putting both his big toes together inside the hair, he dived into the water. Mahānāma was possessed of such merit that his presence underneath the water caused warmth in the realm of the Nāgas. The King of the Nāgas looked for the strange phenomenon that was warming his abode and on seeing the plight of Mahānāma, he appeared before him and letting him sit on his hood, carried him down to the realm of the Nāgas where Mahānāma survived for twelve years.

Viṭaṭūbha Meets His Fate

King Viṭaṭūbha was left waiting for the return of his royal grandfather. "He should be back any time," he kept on saying to himself. When he had waited rather too long, he thought: "Something is wrong," and he had his men wade into the water, dive into it, and search around the pond. As it was already dark, he sent his men all around to search any possible nook and corner with oil lamps. When he had left no stone unturned, he gave up the search at that locality, assuming his grandfather must have fled from him, he and his army left the place.

He arrived at the river Aciravatī at nightfall and it was too late to enter the city. So he and his army had to camp on the river bank for the night. Some of his men lay on the sandbank to rest while others lay on higher ground. Among the first group there were some who had not committed evil deeds in the past; among the second group there were some who had done evil deeds in the past. It so happened that to both groups, swarms of white ants made their stay impossible. They were driven to seek fresh quarter for the night. Those who had done no bad actions in the past, who were lying on the sand bank, therefore found it necessary to move to high ground; those who had done bad actions in the past, who were lying on high ground, found it necessary to move to the sand bank.

After the people had made these shifting of locations, there arose black rain clouds and all of a sudden there was a deluge that caused the Aciravatī to burst its banks. Viṭaṭūbha and his army were carried away in the floods down to the ocean where they were devoured by fishes and turtles.

The Past Evil Actions of the Sakyans

The massacre of the Sakyans became a subject of lively talk among the people. “Men,” they would say, “the massacre of the Sakyans was absolutely uncalled for, and the brutality they suffered – even their small children not being spared – is most improper.” This sort of popular opinion came to the ear of the Buddha, who said: “Monastics, the Sakyans met with a seemingly undeserved fate in their present existence. However, if their present fate is considered against their past evil action, they met the kind of death appropriate to the cause thereof.” The monastics requested the Buddha to relate the nature of their past evil action. And the Buddha briefly related to them, how in a certain existence in the past, they had united themselves in one mind and spread poison into a stream causing mass destruction of fish in it.

Again, the following day, at the assembly of monastics for hearing the teaching, the monastics were discussing the fate of Viṭaṭūbha: “Friends, Viṭaṭūbha together with his company, after slaying such a great number of the Sakyans, became victims of fishes and turtles in the ocean even before achieving his ambition.” When the Buddha came to the assembly and asked the monastics: “Monastics, what was that you were talking about when I came?” They told the Buddha about their subject of discussion. Then the Buddha said: “Monastics, just as all the villagers in a sleeping village are swept away by a great flood, so also, even before their ambitions in life are fulfilled, all living beings who are forgetful and sleeping have their lives cut short and are carried away by death to the ocean of the four lower worlds.” Then the Buddha uttered this verse (Dhp 48): [927]

Pupphāni heva pacinantam, byāsatta-manasam naram;
Atittañ-ñeva kāmesu, antako kurute vasam.

Monastics, like one who gathers the choicest flowers, a person, who hankers after sense-pleasures, craving for what he has not got and clinging to what he has got, is carried away by death and to the ocean of the four lower worlds, just as a whole village that are soundly asleep are swept away to the ocean by a great flood.

By the end of the discourse many beings attained the fruitions such as Stream-entry. This discourse is therefore a very beneficial discourse for all.

The Two Mallikās Differentiated

The following is based on the commentary on the Birth Story about the Portion of Gruel (Kummāsa-piṇḍa-jātaka, Ja 415).

There were at the time of the Buddha two Mallikās in Sāvattihī, one was Mallikā, wife of Bandhula, the commander-in-chief; the other was Mallikā, Queen of the Kosalan King. The former was a Mallan Princess of Kusinārā about whom we have mentioned earlier. We shall now describe Queen Mallikā in a brief way.

This future queen was daughter of a flower seller in the city of Sāvattihī. She was a maiden of great beauty, with a large store of great past merits. One day, when she was sixteen, she went flower-gathering in the company of other girls, carrying three barley cakes in a flower basket.

As the group of girls were leaving the city, they met the Buddha, surrounded by a wondrous aura of six hues, in the company of many monastics, who was entering the city. Mallikā was deeply moved by the glory of the Buddha and in a state of devotional faith she offered her three barley cakes to the Buddha. The Buddha accepted the alms in the alms bowl which was donated by the four great guardians of the four quarters.

Mallikā paid her obeisance at the feet of the Buddha, with her mind filled with delightful satisfaction (pīti), derived from reflection on the attributes of the Buddha and stood at a suitable distance. The Buddha looked at her and gave a smile. Ven. Ānanda asked the Buddha the reason for his smile. “Ānanda,” said the Buddha, “on account of her offering of these three barley cakes with the volition of the first impulsion this young girl will become the Chief Queen of the Kosalan King this very day.”

Mallikā was overjoyed to hear the words of the Buddha and went to the Park with her companions. It was the day when the King of Kosala fought a battle with his nephew Ajātasattu and was defeated. He escaped on horseback and on hearing the singing of Mallikā, he turned towards the park, being attracted by the girl's voice. Where all the other girls fled with fear at the sight of the king, Mallikā, who was destined to become queen felt no fear. Instead, she came forward and took the reins of the king's charger in her hand.

Still sitting on horseback, he asked the girl whether she was married or not. On learning that she was unmarried, he dismounted and as he was tired from the heat of the sun and the wind, he took a rest on Mallikā's bosom. After having rested, he took the girl on horseback and entered the city accompanied by his army. He had the girl escorted to her parents' home. That evening, he sent the royal carriage to Mallikā's house for the use of Chief Queen, and she was brought to the palace with pomp and ceremony. Then placing her on a ceremonial seat wrought with precious gems, she was anointed Chief Queen. From that day, Mallikā became the beloved Chief Queen.

Thus the two Mallikās should be known: Mallikā the Kosala Queen was the daughter of a [928] flower-seller; Mallikā, the wife of Bandhula, the commander-in-chief, was the daughter of one of the Malla princes. [929]

39a: The Discourse about Āṭānāṭiya

[The following is based on the Discourse about Āṭānāṭiya (Āṭānāṭiya-sutta, DN 32) and its commentary.]

The Four Great Kings

At one time, the Buddha was staying in the monastery on the Gijjakūṭa Hill near Rājagaha. During that time the Four Great Kings of the four quarters: Dharaṭṭha, Virūḷaka, Virūpakka and Kuvera held a conference at the celestial city of Āṭānāṭiya, the abode of Kuvera. After they had carefully arranged for the defences of Tāvatiṃsa, the abode of Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, against the Asuras, at the four directions, by employing hordes of Yakkhas, Gandhabbas, Kumbhaṇḍas, and Nāgas, they composed verses called the Āṭānāṭiya Safeguard (Āṭānāṭiya-paritta, aka as Āṭānāṭiya-sutta, DN 32) on the subject of the seven Buddhas preceding Buddha Gotama. “Whosoever disregards and goes against the authority of the Buddhas’ doctrine and the authority of our commandments shall be meted out specific punishments,” they proclaimed. They also placed at the four quarters a large number of Yakkhas, Gandhabbas, Kumbhaṇḍas, and Nāgas for their own protection. Around midnight, they went to the Buddha in resplendent appearance, their personal radiance flooding the entire Gijjakūṭa Hill. After having approached the Buddha, and paying respects to him, they sat at a suitable distance.

It was unusual for Devas to sit in the Buddhas’ presence, they usually remained standing. But here they were sitting, out of reverence for the Āṭānāṭiya Safeguard.

The company of Yakkhas who came with the Four Great Kings behaved in different ways in the presence of the Buddha; some of them made obeisance to him and sat in a suitable place; some exchanged words of felicitations and sat in a suitable place; some raised their joined palms in his direction and sat in a suitable place; some declared their names and lineage and sat in a suitable place; some sat down while remaining silent.

At that assembly of Devas, Vessavaṇa addressed the Buddha in these words: “Venerable sir, among the very powerful Yakkhas, some have pious faith in the Fortunate One while others have not. It is the same with Yakkhas of middling powers and those of small powers. Venerable sir, most Yakkhas do not have reverence for the Fortunate One because the Fortunate One preaches restraint from killing, stealing, unlawful sexual conduct, lying and taking intoxicants, whereas Yakkhas generally do not refrain from killing, stealing, unlawful sexual conduct, lying and taking intoxicants. For these Yakkhas who lack morality the five moral precepts is anathema.

Venerable sir, there are many monastic disciples of the Fortunate One who dwell in monasteries in remote places. These remote places are permanent residences of very powerful Yakkhas, who do not show reverence to the Fortunate One. To win their confidence, to serve as a protection for the male monastic disciples, female monastic disciples, male lay disciples and female lay disciples of the Fortunate One, to let them be free from the harassment of Yakkhas; and for a peaceful, carefree life in all the four bodily postures for everyone, may the Fortunate One teach the Āṭānāṭiya Safeguard (Āṭānāṭiya-paritta) to the disciples.”

Herein, Vessavaṇa acted as spokesmen for the Four Great Kings because he was well acquainted with the Buddha and was also an accomplished speaker.

The Buddha accepted Vessavaṇa’s proposition by remaining silent. Seeing that the Buddha approved his suggestion, Vessavaṇa recited the Āṭānāṭiya Safeguard thus:<sup>232</sup>

*“Vipassissa ca namatthu, cakkhu-mantassa sirīmato.
Sikhissa pi ca namatthu, sabba-bhūtānukampino.*

“May you revere Vipassī, the glorious visionary, may you revere Sikhī, who has pity on all beings.

Vessabhussa ca namatthu, nhātakassa tapassino, namatthu Kakusandhassa, Māra-senāpamaddino.

May you revere Vessabhū, the austere one, cleansed of corruptions, may you revere Kakusandha, who has crushed Māra’s army.

Koṇāgamanassa namatthu, Brāhmaṇassa vusīmato, Kassapassa ca namatthu, vippamuttassa sabbadhi.

May you revere Koṇāgamana, the accomplished Brahmin, may you revere Kassapa, who is free in every respect.

There are the sounds of parrot and mynah, and birds who have young mens' faces, and Kuvera's lotus pond is ever attractive, all of the time.

Ito sā uttarā disā, iti naṃ ācikkhatī jano, yaṃ disaṃ abhipāleti, Mahā-rājā yasassi so.

From here that is the northerly direction, so the people declare, that direction is watched over by a resplendent Great King,

Yakkhānañ-ca adhipati, Kuvero iti nāmaso, ramaṭī naccagītehi, Yakkheheva purakkhato.

He is the master of the Yakkhas, Kuvera, such is his name, he delights in song and dance, he is honoured by Yakkhas, Puttā pi tassa bahavo, eka-nāmā ti me sutāṃ, asīti dasa eko ca, Inda-nāmā mahabbalā.

He also has a great many sons, all of one name, so I have heard, they are 80 and ten and one, Inda by name, ones of great strength.

39a: The Discourse about Āṭānāṭiya – 1380

Te cāpi Buddhaṃ disvāna, Buddhaṃ ādicca-bandhunaṃ, dūrato va namassanti, mahantaṃ vīta-sāradaṃ:

They, having seen the Awakened One, the Buddha, kinsman of the sun, from afar, do reverence him, who is great and fully mature:

Namo te purisā-jañña, namo te purisuttama, kusalena samekkhasi, amanussā pi taṃ vandanti, sutaṃ netāṃ abhiṅhaso, tasmā evaṃ vademase.

Reverence to you, excellent one! Reverence to you, supreme one! You have looked on us with goodness, the non-human beings worship you, we have heard this repeatedly, therefore we should speak like this:

“Jinaṃ vandatha Gotamaṃ, jinaṃ vandāma Gotamaṃ, vijjā-caraṇa-sampannaṃ, Buddhaṃ vandāma Gotamaṃ!”

“You should worship the victor Gotama, we should worship the victor Gotama, who has understanding and good conduct, we should worship the Buddha Gotama!”

Then Vessavaṇa said: “Venerable sir, this is the Āṭānāṭiya Safeguard (Āṭānāṭiya-paritta) which is to be used as a protection for male monastic disciples, female monastic disciples, male lay disciples, female lay disciples, to let them be free from the harassment of Yakkhas, and for a peaceful, carefree life in all the four bodily postures for everyone. Venerable sir, if a Yakkha, or a Gandhabba, or a Kumbhaṇḍa, or a Nāga were to possess with intention to harass any one of the male monastic disciples, or female monastic disciples, or male lay disciples, or female lay disciples who has learnt this Safeguard well, that Yakkha will not enjoy the respect and reverence in the village or town which is my prerogative. Venerable sir, that Yakkha cannot have a mansion of his own or get my permission to reside permanently in my city called Āḷakamandā.”

After mentioning to the Buddha, the disqualification that surrounds a recalcitrant Yakkha, Gandhabba, etc., Vessavaṇa went on to say that just as there were recalcitrant men who defied the authority of the king, there were also recalcitrant Yakkhas who did not obey the authority of the Four Great Kings and that, in case those recalcitrant Yakkhas were to possess and harass the four classes of the Buddha’s disciples, male monastic disciples, female monastic disciples, male lay disciples and female lay disciples, 38 Deva generals, such as Inda, Soma, Varuṇa, would be invoked and reported to, describing details. After that, Vessavaṇa bid the Buddha farewell in these words: “Venerable sir, we have many affairs to attend to, we shall go now.” The Buddha said: “Great guardian kings, you know the time to go.”

Then the Four Great Kings rose from their seats, made obeisance to the Buddha and vanished from there. The company of Yakkhas, who arrived together with the Four Great Kings, bade farewell to the Buddha in different ways as on their arrival, some rose to make obeisance to the Buddha and vanished from there; some exchanged memorable words of felicitation and vanished from there; some raised joined palms in the direction of the Buddha and vanished from there and some just vanished without saying anything.

On the next morning, the Buddha related to the monastics the story of the visit of the Four Great Kings and recited the Āṭānāṭiya Safeguard. Then he said: “Monastics, learn the Āṭānāṭiya Safeguard; study it again and again, commit it to memory. Monastics the Āṭānāṭiya Safeguard is beneficial to all. It will serve as [933] a protection for male monastic disciples, female monastic disciples, male lay disciples, female lay disciples; it will enable them to free themselves from harassment by Yakkhas, and to lead a peaceful, carefree life in all the bodily postures.”

Ritual for the Recitation

The reciter of the Āṭānāṭiya Safeguard (Āṭānāṭiya-paritta) must have a thorough knowledge of the Safeguard, both in word and meaning. He must be able to enunciate every word correctly. Should there occur any flaw in enunciating it or any deficiency in reciting it, the efficacy of the Safeguard will not be as great as it should be. Its efficacy depends on the overall efficiency in the reciting.

If the reciter has any selfish motive for personal gain in the learning and reciting the Safeguard, the objective of the Safeguard, will not be achieved. The reciter should be primarily motivated by a desire to gain liberation from the round of rebirths, and recite the Safeguard in an attitude of good will to all.

In driving out a Yakkha that has possessed a person, the Discourse on Friendliness Meditation (Metta-sutta, Khp 9, Snp 1.8), the Discourse through the Top of a Banner (Dhajagga-sutta, SN 11:3), the Discourse about the Treasures (Ratana-sutta, Khp 6, Snp 2:1) should be tried first. Only if the reciting of those discourses for even whole days fail, should the Āṭānāṭiya Safeguard (Āṭānāṭiya-paritta) be recited.

39a: The Discourse about Āṭānāṭiya – 1382

Some teachers advise that the reciting monastic should abstain from cakes made from dough, fish, meat and non-vegetarian foods, nor should he dwell at a cemetery. The reason is that Yakkhas are fond of those kinds of food, and like to frequent cemeteries so that they could get better opportunity to possess men.

The place where the Safeguard is to be recited should be plastered with fresh cowdung. A clean seat should be spread for the reciter, who should see to his personal cleanliness.

The monastic who is to recite the Safeguard should be brought to the assigned place at the house of the victim, surrounded by an armed guard. The recital should not be made in an open space. It must be made in a fully enclosed room, well guarded with armed men. The reciter should have an attitude of good will to all, including the recalcitrant Yakkha. The diffusion of loving-kindness (mettā) is the internal security for the reciter, while an armed guard is the external security. These precautions are necessary for a trouble-free recital.

First of all, the victim must be established in the five precepts. Only after being established in the five precepts, should the Safeguard be recited for his protection. These measures should put an end to the harassment by Yakkhas.

If the Yakkha does not release the victim at the end of the recital, the victim should be carried to the monastery and laid on the relic shrine (stūpa) precincts. An offering, at the place where the victim is lying, should be made to the Buddha together with offerings of lights. The shrine precincts must then be swept clean. Auspicious verses of the Discourse on the Blessings (Maṅgala-sutta, Khp 5, Snp 2.4) should then be recited as a preliminary measure. Then a loud proclamation should be made calling upon all monastics residing within the monastic area to assemble on the shrine precincts.

There should be a certain tree in a grove in the vicinity of the monastery where a guardian tree Deva is traditionally said to reside. A person should be sent to that tree to act as official messenger from the congregation of monastics, where he should say: “Yakkhas, your presence is wanted by the Saṅgha.” The Yakkhas who reside in that area, including the Yakkha who has possessed the victim, cannot neglect the formal invitation because they do not dare to disregard the authority of the Buddha and the Four Great Kings.

39a: The Discourse about Āṭānāṭiya – 1383

Then the victim must be asked: “Who are you?” Addressing the victim here is addressing the Yakkha that has possessed him. When the Yakkha reveals his name, the monastics should say: “Friend so-and-so, we share our merit in our offerings of flowers, seats, and alms food to the Buddha. The Saṅgha have recited auspicious verses for your benefit; these verses are the friendly gift of the Saṅgha to you. Now, out of respect for the Saṅgha, release this victim.”

The recalcitrant Yakkha should respond to the request of the monastic congregation, made in loving-kindness. If he does not respond, then an invocation should be made to the 38 [934] Deva generals, such as Inda, Soma, Varuṇa, etc. and they should be told in these terms: “Deva generals, as you know, this Yakkha has disregarded our request made in loving-kindness. So we have to use the authority of the Buddha.” Having let the Deva generals know the necessity of resorting to the Āṭānāṭiya Safeguard (Āṭānāṭiya-paritta) in those terms, a recitation of the Safeguard should be made. This is the procedure where the victim is a lay person.

In the case of a monastic being possessed by a Yakkha, the place for the congregation of monastics should be cleaned; a loud proclamation about the convening of the monastic congregation made, sharing of merit made to the recalcitrant Yakkha, for the offerings of flowers, etc., to the Buddha and a genial request made to him to withdraw. Only when the Yakkha remains unresponsive should the Āṭānāṭiya Safeguard be recited. This is the procedure for monastic victims.

39b: Sakka's Questions

Introduction

[The following is based on the Discourse about Sakka's Questions (Sakka-pañha-sutta, DN 21) and its commentary.]

At one time, the Buddha was residing at the Indasāla Cave where the Indian Ash tree stood on the slope of the Vedyaka hill, north of Ambasaṇḍa Brahmin village, which lay to the east of the city of Rājagaha, in the province of Magadha.

The Brahmin village was known as Ambasaṇḍa because it was situated by the side of a Mango Grove. The Vedyaka hill got its name from a grove of gracefully straight and round trees like columns of sapphire growing around the hill. Indasāla Cave got its name from the Indian Ash tree (Indasāla) that stood at its entrance. It was originally a natural stone cave which was later embellished with engravings.

Signs of Imminent Death Appear to Sakka

As the Buddha was staying at the Indasāla Cave on the slope of the Vedyaka hill near Rājagaha, there appeared to Sakka the five signs that proclaim the approaching death of a Deva; Sakka knew these signs well and said to himself: "Alas, my lifespan has ended." These five are:

1. The flowers adorning his person withered.
2. His dress becomes soiled.
3. His armpits sweat.
4. His personal appearance declines.
5. Listlessness sets in.

When the five signs of imminent death appear to Devas, those with little merit in store are gravely concerned about their next existence. Those Devas with vast stores of merit remember their previous good deeds of giving, observing moral precepts and achieving concentration, and being assured of a good destination in the higher Deva realms, remain unperturbed.

As for Sakka, he was fearful and despondent, for he would now lose all the greatness of a Sakka: the Tāvātimsa Realm, which is 10,000 leagues wide; the Vejayanta palatial mansion that is 1,000 leagues tall; the Sudhammā Assembly Hall, 300 leagues wide, for listening to the Dhamma; the coral tree (paricchattaka) which is 100 leagues high; the Paṇḍukambala stab of emerald, which is 60 leagues long, 50 leagues wide and 15 leagues high; 25 million celestial dancers; his follower Devas who are denizens of Catumahārājika realm and Tāvatiṃsa Realm; and the celestial parks known as Nandana Park, Cittalatā Park, Missaka Park, Phāsuka Park.

Then Sakka pondered: “Is there any ascetic or brahmin outside the Buddha’s teaching who can allay my worries and fears of death and help perpetuate my lordship of Devas?” He saw none. He continued pondering and he thought of the Buddha: “The Buddha can allay fears and worries that oppress hundreds of thousands of Sakkas like myself.” Thus he had a strong desire to see the Buddha.

“Where is the Fortunate One residing just now?” he considered. He saw that the Buddha was residing at the Indasāla Cave. He then said to his companions, the Tāvatiṃsa Devas: “Friends, the Fortunate One is residing at the Indasāla Cave where the Indian Ash tree stands on the slope of the Vedyaka hill near Rājagaha. Friends, it were well if we go there to see the Fortunate One.” The Tāvatiṃsa Devas said: “Very well, Lord.”

Herein, the time and circumstances of Sakka’s seeing the Buddha may be noted. A [935] few days ago, Sakka had paid a visit to the Buddha at the Jetavana monastery, in the company of his close attendants such as Mātali, but without a big retinue. At that time the Buddha saw that Sakka was not yet ripe for Awakening and that after two or three days’ time he would become obsessed with death after seeing signs of the end of his life coming near, and then he would visit him in the company of Devas from both the Catumahārājika and Tāvatiṃsa Realms to ask fourteen questions and that, at the end of the question concerning equanimity, he would attain Stream-entry along with 80,000 Devas of Catumahārājika and Tāvatiṃsa Realms. Seeing this situation, the Buddha dwelled in the absorption (jhāna) on the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala) so that Sakka did not get an opportunity to meet with him on that day.

On his part, Sakka was thinking: “About three days back the Fortunate One did not give me audience because I went to see him alone. Perhaps, I am not endowed with sufficing conditions of ripened merit to gain Awakening. It is customary for the Fortunate One to go to the end of the 10,000 world-element to preach the doctrine if there is someone who has sufficing conditions for Awakening. This time, if I go to the Fortunate One along with a company of followers, there must be at least one of them who is endowed with sufficing conditions and the Fortunate One will discourse to him. In that way, I shall have my opportunity to hear the discourse which will set my troubled mind at ease.” That was why he called the Tāvatiṃsa Devas to accompany him.

Then Sakka, on second thoughts, considered that it would not be wise for him to go straight to the Buddha in the company of Devas from Catumahārājika and Tāvatiṃsa. “It would look somewhat lacking in grace on my part. This Deva Pañcasikha is well acquainted with the Fortunate One, being used to rendering personal service to the Fortunate One. He has the privilege of seeing the Fortunate One and asking questions freely. It would be well if I were to send him first to inform of my coming to the Fortunate One and obtain his permission, then only I will put my questions to the Fortunate One.”

Accordingly, he said to Pañcasikha: “Pañcasikha, the Fortunate One is now residing at Indasāla Cave on the slope of the Vedyaka hill near Rājagaha. It would be well if we approach the Fortunate One there.”

“Very well, Lord,” said Pañcasikha. Then taking his lute known as Beluvapaṇḍu, and strumming it in an accompaniment to a song, thereby letting the other Devas know that Sakka was about to go somewhere, he stood by the side of Sakka.

At the musical signal of Pañcasikha, the Tāvatiṃsa Devas got ready to go. Then just as soon as a strong man was to flex his bent arm, or bend his spread-out arm, they suddenly appeared on the Vedyaka hill lying to the north of Ambasaṇḍa Brahmin village, eastwards from Rājagaha in the province of Magadha.

At that time, the Vedyaka hill and Ambasaṇḍa Brahmin village were aglow with celestial lights. People living in that area were in awe with wonder at the extraordinary glowing of lights. “Today the Vedyaka hill seems aflame! There are so many glowing lights on the Vedyaka hill and above the Ambasaṇḍa Brahmin village! What is going on?” People were talking in great wonder, with goose flesh forming on their skin.

It should be noted that the visit to the Buddha by Sakka and company was rather too early. Although they were there after nightfall, it was even before children had gone to bed. It was the custom of Devas and Brahmas to visit the Buddha around midnight. But at this time Sakka was so uneasy at the thought of death so he made the visit in the first watch of the night.

Then Sakka said to Pañcasikha: “Pañcasikha, Buddhas generally dwell in absorption (jhāna). If it is the time when the Fortunate One is dwelling in absorption, it is not a proper time for a person like me who is not free of greed, hatred and delusion. Go now and ask permission of the Fortunate One for me to see him. Having got permission, we shall approach the Fortunate One.”

“Very well, Lord,” said Pañcasikha. Then carrying the Beluvapaṇḍu lute in his left arm, he drew near to the Indasāla Cave. He took up his position not too close to the Buddha and [936] not too far away, just a suitable distance away from where the Buddha could hear his music.

Pañcasikha's Songs

From that appropriate position Deva Pañcasikha played his lute, singing songs on the subjects of the Buddha, the Dhamma, the Saṅgha, the Arahat, and of sensual pleasures.

The word-for-word renderings in the original Myanmar, beautiful and learned, are penned by the Sibhani Sayadaw who presided over the Fifth Buddhist Council in Mandalay. He was awarded Narindābhisiri Saddhammadhaja Mahā Dhammarājādhirājaguru and Narindābhisiri Saddhammajotipāladhaja Mahā Dhammarājādhirājaguru title by King Mindon and Narindhābhidhaja-atulādhipati siri-pavara Mahā Dhammarājādhirājaguru title by King Thipaw. The Sayadaw wrote the Burmese meaning of the songs in his treatise: Kavi-maṇḍana-medanī. Only the gist of each song is given here in English prose.

Vande te pitaraṃ bhadde, Timbaruṃ sūriya-vacchase, yena jātāsi kalyāṇī, ānanda-jananī mama.

My noble lady of glowing complexion like the radiant sun offspring of lord Timbaru! You are as fair as fair can be, possessing the five qualities of feminine beauty, the source of my delight. Out of my fondness for you, I worship your father Timbaru.

*Vāto va sedataṃ kanto, pānīyaṃ va pipāsato,
Aṅgīrasi piyāmesi, Dhammo arahatā-m-iva.
Āturrasveva bhesajjaṃ, bhojanaṃ va jighacchato,
Parinibbāpaya maṃ bhadde, jalantam-iva vārinā.*

My lady with glowing complexion! Just as a man who sweats welcomes a cool breeze; just as a thirsty man welcomes drinking water; just as the Arahat welcomes the Dhamma; just as one afflicted by malady welcomes medicine, just as one famished welcomes food, so also I, the Deva with five knots, adore you. Just as water quells the blaze, my noble lady! Let your smile quell the fire of passion in me!

Sītodakaṃ pokkharāṇiṃ, yuttaṃ kiñjakkhareṇunā, nāgo ghammābhitatto va, ogāhe te thanūdaraṃ.

Just as a tusker oppressed by heat wishes to descend into the cool waters of a lily pond, so also I would fain descend into your soft bosom.

Accaṅkuso va nāgo va, jitaṃ me tuttomaram, kāraṇaṃ nappajānāmi, sammatto lakkhaṇūruyā.

My noble lady! Just as a tusker in musk, defying the pike that checks him, is blinded by passion, I too, am infatuated with your graceful thighs. [937]

Tayi gedhita-cittosmi, cittaṃ vipariṇāmitaṃ, paṭigantuṃ na sakkomi, vaṅkaghasto va ambujo.

My lady of radiant complexion! How I wish to possess you! Just as a fish that has swallowed the hook is unable to cast it out, so also my fervour for you is irreversible, how my mind flutters!

Vāmūru saja maṃ bhadde, saja maṃ mandalocane, palissaja maṃ kalyāṇi, etaṃ me abhipatthitaṃ.

My lady with lovely thighs! May you, my beloved, embrace me gently. You are perfection personified! How I yearn for your tender embrace!

Appako vata me santo, kāmo vellita-kesiyā, aneka-bhāvo samuppādi, arahanteva dakkhiṇā.

Previously, I had known little sensual desire. But since I have set my eyes on you, the possessor of long hair bent at the tips, sensual desire has risen by leaps and bounds in me, just as the fervent enthusiasm that arises in one who makes offerings to an Arahāt.

Yaṃ me atthi kataṃ puññaṃ, arahantesu tādisu, taṃ me sabbaṅga-kalyāṇi, tayā saddhiṃ vipaccataṃ.

Maiden blessed with the five feminine charms! In me there is past merit on account of serving Arahats, the stable ones. May that merit now result in my nuptial tie with you.

*Yaṃ me atthi kataṃ puññaṃ, asmim pathavi-maṇḍale,
taṃ me sabbaṅga-kalyāṇi, tayā saddhiṃ vipaccataṃ.*

Maiden blessed with the five feminine charms! In me there is past merit, such as alms offerings, done upon the entire expanse of this great earth. May that merit result in my nuptial tie with you.

Sakya-putto va jhānena, ekodi nipako sato, amataṃ muni jigīsāno, tam-ahaṃ sūriya-vacchase.

The sage, son of the Sakya clan, born of King Suddhodana and Queen Mahā Māyā, who delights in meditation and who resorts to seclusion, who is wise and mindful, desires the deathless Nibbāna, my lady of radiant complexion! Likewise I desire you. [938]

Yathā pi muni nandeyya, patvā sambodhim-uttamaṃ, evaṃ nandeyyaṃ kalyāṇi, missībhāvaṃ gato tayā.

O embodiment of elegance! The sage, having attained supremely perfect wisdom through the seven purities, delights in his Awakening. So also, it would delight me greatly, if I were to be joined with you.

Sakko ce me varaṃ dajjā, Tāvatiṃsānam-issaro, tāhaṃ bhadde vareyyāhe, evaṃ kāmo daḷho mama.

My beloved! If Sakka, lord of Tāvatiṃsa, were to grant me a boon of my choice, I would opt for you, rather than for lordship of Devas. My noble Lady! So firm is my fondness for you.

Sālaṃ va na ciraṃ phullaṃ, pitaraṃ te sumedhase, vandamāno namassāmi, yassā setādisī pajā.

My lady of great intelligence! Like the sudden blooming forth of the coral tree you came into existence, as the illustrious daughter of lord Timbaru, whom I worship on account of you.

At the end of Pañcasikha's songs, the Buddha praised him: "Pañcasikha, your lute is in perfect harmony with your singing, neither the lute nor the singing dominate or are rivals to each other."

The Buddha praised Pañcasikha not because he enjoyed the music, but for some other purpose. For he, being an Arahat, was neutral towards all pleasurable or painful sensations because he was possessed of equanimity in six ways, as shown in the Discourse concerning Koṭṭhika (Koṭṭhika-sutta, SN 22.133). Yet he openly praises Pañcasikha to let him know that he approves of the Deva's action. If he did not give express approval, Pañcasikha might have withdrawn wrongly thinking that he was not welcome. In which case Sakka would not have the opportunity to put his questions, and to hear the Buddha's answers to him that would lead to the Awakening of both Sakka and his company.

After praising Pañcasikha, the Buddha asked him: "Pañcasikha, when did you compose these verses on the Buddha, the Dhamma, the Saṅgha, the Arahāt and sensual pleasures?"

Pañcasikha replied: "Venerable sir, at one time the Fortunate One was staying at the foot of the Ajapāla banyan tree, near the bank of the River Nerañjarā, in the Uruvelā forest in the eighth week after the Buddha's Awakening. Venerable sir, during that time I fell in love with Sūriyavacchasā, daughter of lord Timbaru. She, on her part, was in love with Sikhaṇḍī, son of Mātali, Sakka's charioteer. Venerable sir, when I saw that I was going to lose Sūriyavacchasā, I went to the mansion of lord Timbaru and played my Beluvapaṇḍu lute, singing these verses on the Buddha, the Dhamma, the Saṅgha, the Arahāt, and sensual pleasures." Venerable sir, on my playing the lute and singing those verses, Sūriyavacchasā said to me: 'Lord, I had never seen the Fortunate One myself, but while I was dancing at the gathering of the Tāvātimsa Devas at the Assembly Hall for listening to Dhamma, I had heard of the Fortunate One. Today, you are singing in praise of the Fortunate One, and so you get your opportunity of meeting me.' Venerable sir, since that day [939] I never got the opportunity to see her again."

Sakka Enters the Buddha's Presence

Sakka was glad that Pañcasikha was conversing cordially with the Buddha and said to him: "Pañcasikha, go and say to the Fortunate One on my behalf: 'Sakka, lord of Devas, and his ministers with their retinues make obeisance with their heads at the feet of the Fortunate One.' " – "Very well, lord," said Pañcasikha, and having approached the Buddha, he repeated it to him.

Thereupon, the Buddha said: "Very well, Pañcasikha, may Sakka, his ministers and their retinues be well. Indeed, may all beings – human beings, Devas, Asuras, Nāgas, Gandhabbas – be well."

This is the customary mode of response of the Buddha to the arrival of mighty Devas.

When the Buddha had said that, Sakka entered the Indasāla Cave and made obeisance to him and stood at a suitable distance. Pañcasikha and other Tāvātimsa Devas also followed Sakka into the cave, made their obeisance to the Buddha and stood at a suitable distance.

39b: Sakka's Questions – 1391

The Indasāla cave was not big enough to accommodate this crowd. However, at that time, the cave became not only spacious enough for the big crowd but its floor, which was normally uneven was then even; the darkness inside also gave way to the dazzling lights of the Devas, but the lights were not as magnificent as the Buddha's aura which surrounded him to a range of 80 cubits, so the Devas' lights were outshone by the Buddha's radiance.

Then the Buddha said to Sakka: "Wonderful indeed Sakka, unprecedented it is Sakka, that Sakka of the Kosiya clan finds time to come here amidst his multifarious duties."

Sakka said: "Venerable sir, I have been intending to see the Fortunate One for a long time but various matters concerning the Tāvatiṃsa Devas held me back."

In this context: "Various matters concerning the Tāvatiṃsa Devas," may be explained here. Sakka as lord of Devas, has to act as judge or arbiter in disputes between Tāvatiṃsa Devas. Devas are born as full grown adults, as male or female in the bosom of Deva parents. Their spouses also appear on the bed simultaneously. Female attendants to those spouses of Devas appear surrounding the bed. Slaves also appear inside the mansion. For this kind of clear-cut case no disputes arise as to ownership. Devas that appear at the boundary between two mansions form a bone of contention regarding the question of who owns these Devas. Disputes arise on that account, which are referred to Sakka for a decision.

Sakka would then adjudge ownership of those Devas that appear nearer to one of the disputant's mansions. Where the distance of the appearance of a certain Deva is the same, the Deva that was born facing either of the disputants' mansions is declared by Sakka as belonging to that mansion. If that Deva was born without facing any of the two mansions then the case has to be concluded by declaring that neither side wins the dispute, and that the Deva in question belongs to Sakka. This is the nature of Sakka's duty in matters concerning Tāvatiṃsa Devas. Besides those duties, the normal life of Devas in the enjoyment of sensual pleasures could also take up much of Sakka's time.

Then Sakka continued: "Venerable sir, on another occasion, about three days ago, the Fortunate One was staying at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvaththī, in the chamber built of celestial wood, donated by King Pasenadi of Kosala. I had gone there in the hope of paying my respects to the Fortunate One but at that time the Fortunate One was dwelling in meditation. Bhūjatī, Queen of Vessavaṇa, the great guardian king, was standing in worship by the Fortunate One at that time. I said to her: “Sister, say to the Fortunate One on my behalf: ‘Venerable sir, Sakka, lord of Devas, and his ministers with their retinues make obeisance with their heads at the feet of the Fortunate One.’ To this, Bhūjatī replied to me: ‘Lord Sakka, this is not the time to see the Fortunate One; he is in solitary seclusion.’ Then I said to her: [940] ‘Sister, in that case, when he rises from fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti), say to him, on my behalf: “Venerable sir, Sakka, lord of Devas, and his ministers with their retinues make obeisance with their heads at the feet of the Fortunate One.”’ How is it, venerable sir, did Bhūjatī report to you my message and do you recall it?”

The Buddha said: “Sakka, lord of Devas, that Devakaññā did report to me your message and I do recall it. As a matter of fact, I rose from the absorption in the meditation of fruition simultaneously with the sound of the rolling of your chariots wheels.”

There were four principal mansions where the Buddha resided in the Jetavana monastic compound, namely: 1) Karerimaṇḍalamāla, with the magnificent array of musk rose trees at its entrance and whose boughs and branches intertwined with one another, provided a pleasant cool shelter as if an arbor had been put up; 2) Kosamba cottage, with the great Ceylon oak tree whose foliage provided shelter at its entrance; 3) the monastic building built of scented wood known as the Gandhakuṭi; and 4) the monastic building built of celestial wood, called Salaḷāgāra monastery. Each of them cost 100,000 pieces of silver. The Salaḷāgāra monastery was donated by King Pasenadi of Kosala; the other three were donated by Anāthapiṇḍika.

Prior to the discourse on Sakka's questions, when the Buddha was residing in the Salaḷāgāra monastery, Sakka had paid a visit to the monastery but as his faculties were not fully ripe yet, the Buddha did not receive him, so he continued to dwell in fruition absorption for a predetermined duration.

Bhūjatī was a Queen of Vessavaṇa, the Great King. She was a Once-returned, a noble one (ariya) at the second stage of Awakening, and so did not find Deva pleasures agreeable to her. She spent her time in paying respects to the Buddha with her joined palms raised above her head.

Sakka returned home after leaving his message with Bhūjatī, after paying his respects toward the Buddha in Salaḷāgāra monastery. As he drove away skywards, the wheels of his chariot filled the whole Jetavana monastery compound with a strange musical sound as though the five kinds of musical instruments were playing. At that very moment, the Buddha rose from dwelling in fruition attainment. That being so, the Buddha's first sense cognition thought was the sound of the chariot. However, it must be noted that the Buddha did not rise from meditation absorption due to that sound; it was the predetermined time for arising.

Sakka continued: "Venerable sir, I have learnt from those Tāvatiṃsa Devas, who were there previous to me, that during the time of the appearance of Buddhas, who are Arahat and Perfectly Self-Awakened, the number of Asuras decline and the number of Devas swell. Venerable sir, I have personally observed this fact that when the Buddha, who is Arahat and Perfectly Self-Awakened, appeared in the world, the number of Asuras declined and the number of Devas swelled.

Gopaka

Venerable sir, in this city of Sāvaththī, there was once a Sakyan Princess named Gopikā, who had faith in the Three Treasures and who was in the habit of observing the five precepts. She disliked being a female and conducted herself well with a view to being reborn as a male. She was reborn in the Tāvatiṃsa Realm as my son. He is known as Deva Gopaka in Tāvatiṃsa Realm.

Venerable sir, three monastics, on the other hand, practised the noble practice under the Buddha but, at their death, they were reborn as Gandhabbas, Devas inferior to Tāvatiṃsa Devas. These Gandhabbas enjoy sensual pleasures fully and they come to the gathering of Devas in the Assembly Hall to entertain the Tāvatiṃsa Devas with their music.

To them [941] Deva Gopaka said: "Revered sirs, with how much attention did you listen the Fortunate One's teachings? As for me, I was a mere woman in my former human existence, who could only observe the five precepts, but being greatly dissatisfied with being a woman, I conducted myself well with a view to becoming a male at the next rebirth, with the result that I am now reborn as a son of Sakka, lord of Devas. In this Tāvatiṃsa Realm I am known as Deva Gopaka. As for you, revered Sirs, you were monastics who practised the noble path under the Buddha, and yet you are now reborn as Gandhabbas, and are inferior to Tāvatiṃsa Devas. That seems to be a very unsatisfactory matter to me."

39b: Sakka's Questions – 1394

On hearing these words of rebuke which sounded as a warning to the three Gandhabbas, two of them gained mindfulness that set them up at the first absorption (jhāna) there and then, and they were subsequently reborn in the Brahmāpurohita realm. The third one continued enjoying himself in the sensuous sphere.”

In this story of Deva Gopaka, the destination of the three former monastics is remarkable. Although they had conducted themselves well as monastics, they were reborn as Gandhabbas, and were called Devas who had been ascetics in their former existence. This was because they had in the past been Gandhabbas for many existences so that they had in them a liking for that existence (bhava-nikanti). Gandhabba Devas belong to one of the realms of the Four Great Kings.

When Gopaka met the three ascetic Devas, he reflected on what previous merit they were endowed with as they had such attractive appearances. He saw that they had been monastics in their previous existence. Then he reflected whether they had been established in morality, and saw that they had indeed been established in morality. He further reflected whether they had further merit and saw that they had attained absorption (jhāna). He again reflected where these monastics lived and saw that they were the monastics who went to then Sakyan lady Gopikā's house for daily alms food.

He reviewed their case thus: “Persons established in morality can wish for any of the six Deva realms. These monastics do not have rebirth in the higher Deva realms. Further, persons who have attained absorption usually are reborn in the Brahma realms. These monastics do not get reborn in the Brahma realms. As for me, I followed their instruction and am now born as Sakka's own son. These monastics who are reborn as inferior Devas as Gandhabbas are the struck-to-the-bone (aṭṭhi-vedha) type of persons who need goading to the extreme.” That was why he said the words of rebuke: “Revered sirs, with how much attention did you listen the Fortunate One's teachings?”

Struck-to-the-bone (aṭṭhi-vedha) persons who need goading to the extreme is a reference to the Discourse about the Goad (Patoda-sutta, AN 4.113), where four types of trained horses and four types of trained men are described.

Four Types of Trained Horses

1. The horse that responds just by seeing the shadow of the goad (chāya-diṭṭha).
2. The horse that responds only when struck on the hair (loma-vedha).
3. The horse that responds only when his skin is pierced (camma-vedha).
4. The horse that responds only when he feels the pain deep in the bones (aṭṭhi-vedha).

The Four Types of Trained Men

1. On hearing that so and so in such and such place is suffering from illness, or has died, he gains religious urgency (saṃvega), and he strives to gain insight and path-knowledge (chāya-diṭṭha).
2. On witnessing someone suffering from illness or dying in his presence, he gains religious urgency, [942] and he strives to gain insight and path-knowledge (loma-vedha).
3. On witnessing one of his own family suffering from illness or dying in his presence, he gains religious urgency, and he strives to gain insight and path-knowledge (camma-vedha).
4. Only on meeting with some serious illness himself does he gain religious urgency, and only then he strives to gain insight and path-knowledge (aṭṭhi-vedha).

Deva Gopaka placed those three monastics in the fourth category above and therefore considered that they needed goading to the extreme. In Sakka's story, two of them gained mindfulness that set them up at the first absorption there and then, and they were reborn in the Brahmāpurohita realm. This needs some explanation. On hearing the words of Gopaka, two out of the three ascetic Devas thought: "Normally, we ought to be rewarded for our service in entertaining them, but now, instead of any rewards, we are being scolded right from the start, like salt sprinkled onto a hotplate. How is this?" Reflecting on their past existence, they saw vividly that they had been monastics, that they had pure morality, that they had attained absorption, and that they used to go to Gopikā, the Sakyan lady's residence, for daily alms food.

They reflected on their situation thus: “Persons who are established in morality can wish for any of the six Deva realms. Persons who have attained absorption (jhāna) usually are reborn in the Brahma realms. Yet we have not been able to get rebirth in the higher Deva realms or in the Brahma realms. The young lady, who followed our instructions, is now reborn in a higher Deva realm. Although we were monastics and practised the noble path under the Fortunate One, we are reborn as Gandhabbas, which are an inferior class of Devas. This is due to our liking for Gandhabba existence where we had been repeatedly reborn before. That is the reason why this Deva Gopaka is speaking words of rebuke.” Then two of them took these words to heart and regained mindfulness of the first absorption (jhāna) and, based on that concentration, they contemplated on the impermanence, suffering and non-self nature of mind and matter, conditioned by causes, and attained Non-returner (Anāgāmi-phala) there and then.

A Non-returner (Anāgāmi-puggala) has a class of supermundane consciousness that does not fit well with the five aggregates pertaining to the Gandhabba existence of the sensuous sphere; that class of consciousness is superior to that of the sense sphere existence. Hence as soon as the path of Non-returner (Anāgāmi-magga) was attained, these two noble Devas passed away from the Deva existence and were reborn in the Brahmāpurohita realm, the middle plane of the three fine-material realms, because they had attained the first absorption (jhāna) which is the medium class of meditation. Although it is said that they were reborn in the Brahmāpurohita realm, their bodies did not appear in that Brahma realm. They remained in Tāvātimsa Realm at the Assembly Hall for the discussion of the Dhamma in the form of Brahmāpurohita Brahmas instead of in Gandhabba forms.

The third Gandhabba was unable to give up his clinging to the Gandhabba existence and so remained in his present existence as a Catumahārājikā Deva.

After Sakka, lord of the Devas, had related in prose to the Buddha the story of Deva Gopaka, he further spoke in fifteen verses on the same subject. Then in three more verses, he sang in praise of the Buddha's attributes, the teaching of the Buddha, and the purpose of his visit which was to attain the supermundane paths and fruitions like that attained by those two Brahmas. He then concluded his last three verses with a request that if the Buddha would permit him to put certain questions and hear the Buddha's answers on them. The last of Sakka's eighteen verses is as follows:

Tassa Dhammassa pattiyā, āgatamhāsi mārisa, katāvakāsā Bhagavatā, pañham pucchemu mārisā. [943]

Venerable sir, you who are free from all forms of suffering (dukkha), we have come here for the benefit of gaining the supermundane Dhamma that those two Brahmas gained. Venerable sir, who is free from all forms of suffering, if the Fortunate One would, out of compassion, permit us, we would ask some questions.

Then the Buddha reflected: “This Sakka has long been virtuous. Whatever question he might like to ask, it will be of benefit to him. He is not going to ask unbeneficial questions. If I answer his questions he will understand readily.”

Magha and His 33 Friends

The commentary to DN 21 elaborates on the passage: “This Sakka has long been virtuous,” by relating the past existence of Sakka, when he had lived a virtuous life as Magha, a young man in the village of Macala, in the province of Magadha. That was at a time before the advent of the Buddha.

Early one morning, Magha went to an open space in the village, where the villagers met to discuss community affairs, to tidy the ground. Another man found the ground inviting and spent his time there. Magha was glad that his effort was useful to others. So he selected a spacious place in the centre of the village, swept it clean, spread it with clean sand and, in the cold season, he collected faggots and made small fires there. The villagers, young and old, gathered there to warm themselves by the fireside.

One day, Magha thought about the ease and comfort enjoyed by the king, his ministers and officials in the city. He also thought about the Moon Deva and the Sun Deva up in the skies. What previous actions had they done so that these great people on earth and the great Devas in the sky enjoy such ease and comfort? Surely they must have done purely meritorious deeds that have led to their present state. Reasoning correctly thus, he decided to go on doing purely meritorious deeds in the footsteps of those great persons.

He woke up early in the morning, took his breakfast of rice gruel, and taking the necessary tools and implements, he went to the crossroads where the four main roads met. He removed rocks that stood in the way, cut down trees that were growing too close by the roadside to allow free carriage way, and levelled the roadway. He set up a rest house at the road junction, dug a rectangular pond, built bridges and spent the whole day earning merit and retired only at sunset.

Seeing Magha's daily routine, a villager asked him: "Friend Magha, you leave the village early in the morning and come back only late in the evening. What have you been doing?"

"Friend," said Magha, "I am doing purely meritorious deeds, I am paving the way to the Deva realm."

"What do you mean by purely meritorious deeds?"

"Don't you know what are purely meritorious deeds?"

"No, I don't."

"Haven't you seen the glorious state of the king, the king's ministers and officials when you visit the city?"

"Yes, I did."

"Well, the king and those great people enjoy their elite status because in the past they have done purely meritorious deeds. I am doing the sort of work that leads to a similar state. Have you not heard of the Moon Deva and the Sun Deva?"

"Yes, I have."

"I am paving the way to the Deva realm."

"Friend Magha, are you doing these works all by yourself? Are you the only person fit for this sort of work? Could not other people also do it?"

"Friend, there is nothing that forbids anyone to do it."

"In that case, friend Magha, let me know when you go to the countryside tomorrow." [944]

The next day Magha had a partner in his good works. In due course he had by his side 33 strong youths who volunteered on his projects. This team of Magha and 33 youths had a common mind in seeking merit. They went about together mending roads, digging tanks, building rest houses and bridges. They executed their projects with might and main, generally finishing a particular work within the same day.

The Village Chief Plans Magha's Ruin

The chief of Macala village was a rogue. He found Magha's social undertakings unacceptable because he himself sold liquor in the village and when there occurred fighting and quarrels, he increased his income through fines collected as penalty. His trade was dwindling when youths did not visit his place for drinks but went out on social projects. Therefore, he tried to use his official position to cause the ruin of Magha and his comrades. He misinformed the king that a band of people had been causing trouble in his village. When asked by the king what lineage those criminals belonged to, the chief of Macala said: "Great King, they come from good families." – "How come men of good families turn bad? Why did you keep the news till now?" – "Great King, I was afraid that they might turn on me. May your majesty pardon me for this!"

The king believed the chief's words and ordered the arrest of the so-called criminals, despatching a contingent of his men with him. Magha and his party, after returning from their work and having had their evening meal, were discussing the next day's plan for meritorious deeds in the village centre when the chief surrounded them, placed them under arrest by the king's orders' and they were taken to the king.

The wives of those youths heard the news of their arrest and said: "That serves them right. These men of ours have been giving lame excuses for shirking their household duties and spending their time in the countryside everyday."

When Magha and his party were presented to the king, without investigating them, he passed the order that the band be trampled to death by the royal elephant. As they were taken to the place of execution, Magha said to his comrades: "Friends, will you listen to my words?" – "Dear Magha, we are in this plight through listening to your words! Nevertheless, we shall continue to do so. What is your advice?" – "Friends, death comes to all wayfarers in this Samsāra. Now, are you robbers as alleged by the village chief?" – "Certainly not," they replied.

"Friends, asseveration of the truth is the only reliance for all people in the world. So, declare the truth like this: 'If we are robbers as alleged by the chief, let the elephant trample on us; if we are not robbers, let the elephant not trample on us.' "

The 33 youths made their asseveration as instructed. The royal elephant, far from trampling on them, dared not even come near them but trumpeted in fear and ran away. The mahout goaded the elephant with the spike and other sharp points to come back to the site but to no avail.

When the situation was reported to the king, he ordered: "In that case, conceal the criminals under matting and let the elephant trample over them." The king's men did as ordered but this time the royal elephant showed even greater fright, trumpeted doubly loud and ran away.

The King Rewards Magha and Company

When the king learned the miraculous news he summoned the chief of Macala village [945] and asked: "Is it true that the royal elephant refused to trample these men?"

"That is true, your majesty. This is because their leader Magha knows a mantra that frightens elephants."

Thereupon the king sent for Magha and asked: "Is it true that you know a mantra that frightens elephants?"

Magha replied: "Your majesty, I know no such mantra. What my associates and I did was to make a solemn declaration: 'If we are robbers and enemies of the king let the elephant trample on us, if we are not, let the elephant not harm us.' " Then the king asked: "What sort of activities did you engage yourselves in?"

"Your majesty, we repair roads, build rest houses for travellers at road junctions, dig tanks and build bridges, or repair old bridges. We go to various places to carry out this kind of undertaking." – "Why do you think the village chief reported falsely against you?" – "Your majesty, the chief used to enjoy a good income from selling liquor when the youth of the village were forgetful and wanted to enjoy themselves. But since we engaged ourselves in useful works and are not forgetful as before, the chief lost his usual income. That was the reason for his reporting against us."

Then the king said: "Magha, the royal elephant, though a mere animal, understands your good qualities whereas I, even though a human being, did not understand them. From now on, you be the chief of Macala village. I present you with my royal elephant. Let the slanderer, that old chief, be your slave.

From now on, do meritorious deeds on my behalf too.” And he lavished the group with rich rewards.

On their happy journey home they rode the elephant by turns. Magha said to his friends: “Friends, meritorious deeds are generally aimed at future existence. But here we are reaping the merit of our good deeds, even in the present, like the brown lily growing in the water. Let us do good deeds with still greater zeal.”

Then he said further: “What sort of meritorious work shall we do now?” And all agreed, after discussion, that they would build a big rest house at the road junction as a permanent shelter for travellers coming that way. “But let us make it a point that our wives have no share whatever in our good deeds. They have been unkind to us. They failed to understand us. Instead of thinking about our release, they even showed delight at our misfortune.”

The 34 youths, headed by Magha, each gave a morsel of rice and a bunch of grass a day to feed the elephant which was sufficient for the animal. As the group cut down trees for timber, the elephant dragged them and placed them on the work site. The group began in earnest, shaping the timber for the construction of a big rest house.

Magha's Four Wives

Magha had four wives by the names of Sūjā, Sudhammā, Cittā and Nandā. Of these four, Sudhammā asked the chief carpenter the reason why Magha and his party were spending the whole day in the forest. The chief carpenter told her about the rest house construction project. Sudhammā requested him to arrange for her contribution in the project but he told her that Magha and his party had decided against contributions of any kind from their wives. Thereupon, Sudhammā bribed the chief carpenter with eight pieces of silver to make sure she could contribute to the project.

The chief carpenter agreed. He went to the village centre and loudly proclaimed to Magha and his party that it was time to start work for the day. When he was sure that everyone in the party was on his way to the forest, he said: “Boys, you go ahead. I have some business that is keeping me back.” He went in another direction and chose a tree fit for making a ridge-pole. He sent it to Sudhammā and said: “Keep this until I send someone for it.”

The construction project progressed from stage to stage: Collection of timber, site [946] clearing, foundation-work, structural frame and scaffolding were all ready and in place, except the rafters. At that juncture, the chief carpenter announced that to fix the rafters he needed a ridge-pole but that he didn't have a piece of timber of a special kind for the purpose. The working party blamed the man for his forgetfulness and asked him where to find one at this belated stage. "Let us try and inquire at our kinsmen's places," said the chief carpenter. Magha and his party went into the village asking whether anyone had got some suitable piece of timber for making a ridge-pole.

Sudhammā said she had got one. The party of workers asked the price for it, but she said: "I don't want any price, but let it be my contribution." Magha scoffed at the idea. "Come men, let's go," he said, "this woman must not be allowed to contribute. We will get one from the forest." So saying, they left the village.

Back at the work site, the chief carpenter, sitting on the scaffolding for fixing the ridge-pole, asked: "Where's the timber for the ridge pole?" Magha and his friends explained the situation. The chief carpenter then looked up to the sky and said: "Young men, today is a very auspicious day; another equally auspicious day will not be around at least for another year. You have collected all the timber in this structure with so much trouble. If we were to leave it unroofed, it will rot as it is. Let Sudhammā have her contribution and share the result of the merit in the Deva realm. Please get the timber for the ridge-pole from her house."

In the meantime, Sudhammā had an inscription made that read: "This is the Sudhammā Rest House," carved on the lower surface of the ridge-pole which was wrapped up with a piece of new cloth. Magha's men then came back and said: "Sudhammā, please bring the ridge-pole. Let things take their course. We shall now share the merit with you." Sudhammā, in handing over the ridge-pole, warned them: "Don't take off the cloth-wrapping until eight or sixteen rafters have been fixed to the ridge-pole!"

The builders obeyed her warning. They removed the cloth-wrapping on the ridge-pole only after it had been put in place, needing only to be nailed down. Then an observant villager, looking up the building, noticed the inscription. "What is written there?" A literate villager read it out to them: "It reads: 'This is the Sudhammā Rest House.'"

At that, Magha and company protested loudly: "Remove that ridge-pole, men! We, who have laboured all along, have got none of our names on this building, whereas, Sudhammā, by putting in a piece of timber a cubit long got her name for the whole rest house.” But even while they were protesting, the chief carpenter nailed down all the fixtures at the ridge-pole, thus putting the finishing work.

The builders later on marked out three portions on the floor space of the big rest house: one for the king and his officers, one for the common people and one for the sick.

There were 33 flooring boards used in the building of the rest house, each assigned to one of Magha's men. The elephant was given the instructions by Magha that whenever a guest arrived and sat on the board assigned to one of the 33 co-builders, the elephant was to take the guest to the house of that co-builder where the guest would get every care and attention. These instructions were satisfactorily followed by the elephant so that every guest who came to the rest house got food, lodging and massage services at the co-builders' house for the day.

Contributions by Magha's Family: 1) Magha had a coral tree planted not far away from the rest house. Beneath the tree, he laid a big stone slab; 2) Nandā, one of Magha's wives, dug a big tank not far away from the rest house; 3) Cittā, another wife of Magha, created a garden in the vicinity; 4) Sūjā, the senior-most wife of Magha, was not interested in works of merit. She spent much of her time in front of the mirror, tending to herself in order to look beautiful. Magha said to her: “Now Sūjā and Sudhammā had the opportunity to contribute their mite in the building of the rest house; Nandā has a tank to her credit; and Cittā has created a garden. But you have done no meritorious deeds. Please do some good deed for the benefit of others. Sūjā replied: “My [947] lord, for whom did you perform these good deeds? Are your good deeds not mine also?” She was not interested. She went on her way, being concerned only about her beauty.

Magha lived a full lifespan and at the death of that existence he was reborn in the Tāvātimsa Realm as Sakka, lord of Devas. His 33 friends, at their death, were also reborn in Tāvātimsa Realm as Sakka's close assistants.

Of the four wives of Magha, Sudhammā, Cittā and Nandā, at their death, were reborn as the three queens of Sakka. The senior-most wife of Magha, Sūjā, who did not listen to Magha's advice, but spent her time embellishing herself, at her death was reborn as a paddy bird in a ravine.

Sakka's Grand State

Sakka's Vejayanta palace was 700 leagues high; the flag post on the top of it is 300 leagues high. As the result of planting the coral tree when he was Magha, the celestial coral tree, 300 leagues in diameter of foliage, with a trunk of fifteen leagues girth, and a height of 100 leagues, arose in Tāvatiṃsa Realm. For his former deed of laying a stone slab for the use of the public, there arose his majestic Paṇḍukambala rock throne of emerald colour which was 60 leagues in length, 50 leagues in width and 15 leagues in height.

Having previously donated timber for the construction of the rest house, the Sudhammā Assembly Hall, where the discussion of the Dhamma took place, arose in the Tāvatiṃsa Realm, much to the fame and honour of Queen Sudhammā.

Likewise, for her former donation for the public use of a tank, Nandā tank arose in the Tāvatiṃsa Realm, much to the credit of Queen Nandā; and for her donation for public use of a garden, Cittalatā Park, 60 leagues wide, appeared in Tāvatiṃsa Realm to perpetuate the name and fame of Queen Cittā.

Sakka sat at the Sudhammā Assembly Hall on a golden throne one league long, with a white umbrella three leagues wide held above him, surrounded by 33 assistants or celestial chieftains and three Deva queens, while 25 million celestial dancers kept Sakka and his queens entertained. His following comprised Devas of Catumahārājika and Tāvatiṃsa Realms.

Sūjā's Story

Magha was glad that his three former wives in the human existence were now Deva queens but where had Sūjā been reborn? He reviewed the destiny of his former wife and saw that she was a paddy bird in a ravine. "Alas! This girl disregarded my words and is now having an ignoble existence," Sakka said to himself, and he went to the place where Sūjā the paddy bird lived.

Sūjā recognized Sakka as Magha of her previous existence and she held down her face in despondency. "You foolish girl!" he scolded her, "you spent all your time preening yourself. And now you are afraid to look up to me. Sudhammā, Nandā, and Cittā are now Deva queens. Come with me and see our happy state." So saying, he took her to Tāvatiṃsa Realm where she was put in the Nandā Park. He then resumed his seat on the golden throne at the Vejayantā Palace.

The Deva dancers asked Sakka: “Where have you been just now, Lord?” Sakka was reluctant to answer. But when pressed further by them, he told them the truth. He said that Sūjā, having been reborn a paddy bird in a ravine, had been brought back with him and that she was now staying at the Nandā Park.

The Deva dancers, who had been servants at Sūjā's household in their past existence, went to the Nandā Park to see their former mistress. They poked fun at her funny appearance: “Look at Sūjā's beak, it's like a spike for hunting crabs!” Poor Sūjā was deeply hurt when [948] those girls, who had been her household servants in the human world and whom she had treated with disdain, were now so scornful of her. She entreated Sakka to send her back to her own place: “What use is there for me with these palaces glittering with gold and gems? This Nandā Park has no attraction for me. All beings feel at home only where they are born. Send me back to the ravine. That is where I belong.”

Sakka complied with her wish. Before leaving her at the ravine he asked: “Now, will you listen to my word?” And Sūjā replied: “Yes, I will, my Lord.” – “Then take upon yourself to observe the five precepts. Observe them well without the slightest flaw. I will then make you chief of those Devakaññā in two or three days.”

Sūjā, the paddy bird, was observing the five precepts when, two or three days later, Sakka came to test her virtue. He took the form of a fish and floated spine downwards in front of Sūjā in a stream. Thinking that it was a dead fish, Sūjā seized it by the head when its tail fluttered. Sūjā said: “Oh, it's a live fish!” and let it go. Then Sakka standing in the sky, cried out: “Good! Good! You observe the five precepts well. For this virtuous conduct, I shall make you chief of the Devakaññā two or three days hence.”

Sūjā, as a paddy bird, lived a lifespan of 500 years. Since she would not eat live fish, she was mostly starving during that time. Although she was failing in her health due to starvation, she never breached the five precepts. At her death, she was reborn as the daughter of a potter in the city of Bārāṇasī.

Sakka reviewed the fate of Sūjā, the paddy bird, and seeing that she was now a potter's daughter, he thought of helping her in life as it was not appropriate for him to take her to Tāvatiṃsa Realm straight from the potter's house. So he turned himself into an old man selling golden cucumbers. He was not however selling them for any amount of money: “I will sell them only to those who have morality,” he said to the would-be buyers, who said: “Old man, we do not know what is meant by morality. Name your price for these.” But the old man insisted: “They will go only to those who observe morality.” The villagers said among themselves: “Let’s go, men, this old man is mad!” And so they left.

The potter’s daughter asked them: “You went to buy cucumbers. Where are the cucumbers?” – “Dear girl, that cucumber vendor is mad. He says he will sell his cucumbers only to those who observe morality. Perhaps he has got daughters who were fed on morality. But, as for us, we do not even know what morality means.”

On hearing this strange news, Sūjā rightly surmised that these golden cucumbers must have been meant for her only, so she went to the old man and said: “Father, give me the cucumbers.” – “My little girl, do you observe morality?” – “Yes, father, I observe morality well, without a flaw.” – “These solid gold cucumbers are for you then,” said the old man who was Sakka in disguise. After leaving the whole cart of golden cucumbers in front of the potter’s house, he returned to Tāvatiṃsa.

The potter’s daughter observed the five precepts throughout her life and, on her death, she was reborn as the daughter of the Asura Vepacitti. Thanks to the observance of morality in her two previous existences as a paddy bird and as a potter’s daughter, she possessed great beauty and charm. Asura Vepacitti planned to marry his daughter to a suitable husband, and called an assembly of Asuras.

Sakka reviewed the destiny of Sūjā again. He saw that Sūjā was now born as an Asura and that her marriage was being planned. “Now is my chance to get Sūjā.” He thought, and setting his mind on eloping with her, he went to the assembly of Asuras in the guise of an Asura. As he sat in the midst of the Asuras no one noticed the stranger. [949]

Asura Vepacitti handed his daughter a garland saying: “Choose the bridegroom by throwing this garland above the head of anyone you fancy.” Sūjā looked around and, on seeing Sakka in the guise of an Asura, she was inflamed with love, a love that had bound the two in many previous existences. “This is my bridegroom, my husband,” she declared, throwing the garland above Sakka’s head.

Thereupon, seizing Sūjā's arm firmly, Sakka went up into the sky. Then only the Asuras know that it was Sakka and raised a cry: "Friends, hold him! Hold this old Sakka! He is our enemy. We will never give up Sūjā to this old Sakka."

Asura Vepacitti asked his followers: "Who is it that has taken away my daughter?" – "My Lord, it is that old Sakka!" Then he said to his followers: "This Sakka is the most powerful person besides myself, so make way."

Sakka succeeded in his amorous venture. He made Sūjā chief of the 25 million celestial dancers in Tāvatiṃsa. Thereafter, Sūjā said to her husband: "My Lord, I have no relatives here in Tāvatiṃsa. So take me wherever you go." Sakka conceded to this wish.

The First Question on Envy and Stinginess

The Buddha had known the virtue of Sakka since the latter's previous existence as Magha, the young man of Macala village. That was why he bethought himself: "Whatever question Sakka might like to ask, it will be of benefit to him; he is not going to ask unbeneficial questions. If I answer his questions, he will understand readily." Then the Buddha replied to Sakka in verse:

Puccha Vāsava maṃ pañham, yaṃ kiñci manasicchasi, tassa tasseva pañhassa, ahaṃ antaṃ karomi te.

Vāsava, lord of Devas, whatever question you may like to ask, put it to me. I, the teacher of the three worlds, will clear any doubts and uncertainties concerning your questions.

Having obtained the Buddha's express consent, Sakka asked in verse his first question thus:

Venerable sir, all beings, whether Deva or human, Asura, Nāga, or Gandhabba, have an earnest desire to be free from enmity, danger, enemies, sorrow and anger. However, they live in enmity and danger amidst enemies, sorrow and anger. What is the factor that fetters them thus?

To that question the Buddha answered as follows:

Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, all beings, whether Deva or human, Asura, Nāga, or Gandhabba, have an earnest desire to be free from enmity, danger, enemies, sorrow and anger. However, they live in enmity and danger amidst enemies, sorrow and anger. This is due to envy (issā) and stinginess (macchariya).

Envy and Stinginess

Here envy (issā) means begrudging other's well-being and status.

1. It has the character of feeling displeased with another's gain, whether already acquired or about to acquire. When the sign or character of the displeasure in someone who begrudges another [950] person's gain is noticed, the fact of the arising of envy in that person should be known through the knowledge of Abhidhamma, the ultimate truth about mental phenomena.
2. Envy has the function of dissatisfaction with others prosperity. It is the function of envy to feel distressed to get annoyed, when someone sees or hears of another's gain.
3. Envy is manifest to the insight of the yogi, as turning away from others' well-being. To the yogi, who has insight into mental phenomena, the result of envy is manifested as the turning away in disgust from the success and well-being of others. Of the four kinds of manifestation, this is the manifestation of result.
4. The proximate cause of envy is other people's well-being or status. Envy arises due to another person's prosperity. If one has no occasion to see or hear of another person's wealth, there is no cause for envy to arise.

The character of envy that reveals itself as begrudging others well-being and status should be explained regarding both lay persons and monastics. To wit, someone may have acquired through his own effort and qualities, in any form of enterprise, valuable things, such as vehicles or horses or cattle or precious stones.

Another person, with envy in him, may find it an eyesore to see that successful man prosper. He is very displeased with the other man's good fortune. "When will this fellow meet his downfall? How I wish he would become a pauper!" Such evil thoughts occupy the envious person. And if the successful man does meet with bad fortune, the envious one rejoices to see it.

An envious monastic sees another monastic surrounded by fame and followers on account of the latter's learnedness and efforts such as teaching the doctrine. The one with envy is all the time thinking about the decline of the successful monastic. If the latter does sink in popularity, the former is pleased. In this manner, the character of envy should be known as begrudging other's well-being and feeling displeased with other's gains.

It is in the nature of envy to feel irritated by some gain that someone is enjoying as a matter of fact. Even the likelihood of someone meeting with some good fortune cannot be tolerated by envy. Envy longs for another person's failure and downfall.

Stinginess, Miserliness or Meanness

Stinginess (macchhariya) is also called meanness. It is a mean attitude concerning one's own possessions.

1. It is characterized by a secretiveness about one's gains or status already enjoyed or about to enjoy. One oppressed by stinginess, an evil state of mind, is secretive about his success.
2. Stinginess functions as a reluctant attitude about one's own good fortune; the reluctance is the attitude that no one should enjoy similar fortune. One oppressed by stinginess is loath to share his gains or status with someone else. This meanness is the function of stinginess.
3. Stinginess is manifested as unwillingness to share one's gain or status with any other person. If perforce when there is occasion to share it, the stingy person feels very strongly against it. Or put it in another way, if it comes to sharing his property with someone or making any donation to someone, he would part with a very tiny portion of it reluctantly.
4. The proximate cause of stinginess is one's own possession or rights.

To a wise one with insight, stinginess is manifested as meanness about one's property or rights. This is the natural manifestation. Considered from another angle, stinginess manifests itself in anger when one is forced to part with one's property or rights. This is manifestation by way of function, how the manifestation works itself out. Or yet viewed in another way, [951] it manifests itself as parting with only an insignificant part of one's possession under unavoidable circumstances, i.e., giving away merely a trifle which does not amount to a really meaningful gift. This is the manifestation as result.

Five Kinds of Stinginess or Meanness

1. Stinginess or meanness about living place: monastery, dwelling place, park, day resort, night camp, etc. (āvāsa-macchariya).
2. Stinginess or meanness about one's circle of friends or relatives, i.e., unwillingness to see one's or one's relatives' friends on friendly terms with others (kula-macchariya).
3. Stinginess or meanness to share any form of gain with another (lābha-macchariya).
4. Stinginess or meanness in being painful to see others look as attractive in appearance as oneself or gain as fair a reputation as oneself (vaṇṇa-macchariya).
5. Stinginess or meanness to share doctrinal knowledge with others (Dhamma-macchariya).

1. "Living place," may mean any living space for monastics, whether the whole monastic complex or a room or space allotted for residing in by day or by night. A monastic, who has a specific place to dwell, lives in comfort as a monastic and enjoys the four monastic requisites of food, robes, lodging, medicines. A stingy or mean monastic cannot agree to the idea of sharing his living place with some other monastic who fulfils his monastic obligations, big or small. If that other monastic happens to get a chance of living there, the stingy one is wishing that the newcomer leave soon. This attitude or state of mind is called stinginess or meanness about living quarters.

However, if the co-resident of a living place is quarrelsome, the unwillingness to share with him is not counted as stinginess.

2. Stinginess about one's friends or followers. The relatives and lay supporters of a monastic form the subject of stinginess or meanness here. A stingy monastic wants to monopolise them. He does not wish any of them going to the monastery of another monastic or let them have any relationship between them and another monastic.

However, if the other monastic is of an immoral type (dussīla), the unwillingness to see that happen does not amount to stinginess. As immoral monastic is likely to debase his lay supporters; so the unwillingness to have relations with one's own relatives and lay supporters is proper. It is stinginess only when that other monastic is a virtuous one.

3. Any form of gain includes the four monastic requisites, which are robes, alms food, dwellings and medicines. When, on seeing a virtuous monastic receiving the four requisites, a monastic harbours such thoughts as: "May that one be deprived of these gains," this is stinginess or meanness about gain.

However, where the unwillingness to see another monastic receive the four requisites is justifiable, there is no evil of stinginess or meanness. It is justifiable where that other monastic is in the habit of misusing the four requisites, thus destroying the faith of the supporters, or if that monastic does not make proper use of them but hoards them without giving them away in time so that they turn unusable, having gone stale or gone to rot.

4. Beauty refers to personal appearance or attributes. Meanness regarding beauty means displeasure at another person's good looks or attributes in the sense that no one must have the same good looks or the same good attributes as oneself. The mean monastic hates to discuss about other's personal attractiveness or good name concerning morality, practice of austerity, or practice of Dhamma.

5. Dhamma is of two kinds: learning the canon (pariyatta-dhamma) and [952] attainment of the noble path culminating in paths, fruitions and Nibbāna (paṭivedha-dhamma). The latter is the property of noble ones (ariya) who are never stingy or mean about their insight knowledge. In fact they are desirous of sharing it with all beings: humans, Devas and Brahmas. They wish all beings to acquire the noble path they have gained for themselves. Therefore the expression stinginess about Dhamma can mean only stinginess or meanness about learning (pariyatta-dhamma). Here the meanness lies in not wanting other people to know what one has acquired by learning the difficult and obscure passages in the Pāḷi text and its commentaries. One wishes to remain the sole authority in the matter of learning.

However, the unwillingness to share the book knowledge may be justified on two counts: 1) Where the learner's integrity is doubtful while the purity of the Dhamma needs to be safeguarded; 2) where the value of the Dhamma is carefully considered and the type of person needs to be saved in his own interest.

These two exceptions need to be understood properly.

39b: Sakka's Questions – 1412

1. In the first case, there are some persons in the world who are fickle-minded and change from one faith to another, from ascetic and Brahmin to a heretical ascetic. If such an unreliable monastic were to be taught the canon, he might distort the subtle teachings of the canon to suit his own purpose. He might misinterpret the meanings of scriptural terms such as meritoriousness and demeritoriousness. He might put the Buddha's teachings into the mouth of some heretic and claim that they were what the heretic teacher said. There would be confusion. Therefore keeping the canon from those unreliable monastics so as to preserve the purity of the Dhamma is justified.
2. In the second case, where the learner monastic is of the type of person who is likely to claim Awakening even though not yet an Arahant, that would be for his ruination. Keeping the canon from such an unreliable monastic is also justifiable. It is in his own interest that the profound Dhamma is not imparted to him, so that the non-sharing of learning in such cases is not stinginess or meanness.

Stinginess exists in the case of a teacher where he is afraid that his pupil might outshine him, or excel him in the interpretation of the Dhamma, and so withholds the learning.

Evil Consequences of Stinginess

1. One who acts with stinginess in dwelling (āvāsa-macchāriya) is reborn as a demon or hungry spirit, and due to the meanness about his living quarters, he is destined to carry the filth of that dwelling place on his head wherever he goes.
2. One who is stingy about relatives and followers (kula-macchāriya) feels painful to see his relatives and lay supporters making offerings to other monastics. The greater the degree of stinginess, the greater the pain there is. In extreme cases, thinking his relatives and lay supporters have turned away from him, the stingy monastic suffers heart-burn to such an extent that he may vomit blood, or his entrails may come out.
3. Stinginess about monastic requisites (lābha-macchāriya), whether in respect of those of the Saṅgha or of a sect of the Saṅgha, not sharing them with fellow monastics, leads to rebirth as a demon or a hungry spirit or as a python.

39b: Sakka's Questions – 1413

4. Stinginess about personal appearance or attributes (vaṇṇa-macchariya), that makes one self-admiring and deprecating of others, leads to ugliness in appearance in future existences.
5. Stinginess regarding one's learning (pariyatti-dhamma-macchariya), keeping one's knowledge to oneself, leads to rebirth as a [953] dullard, an ignoramus, a stupid person.

Or, explained in another way:

1. One who acts with stinginess in dwelling (āvāsa-macchariya) leads to rebirth in the Niraya hell where the stingy one is baked on hot iron sheets. This is because he had prevented others from enjoying the peace and comfort of the living quarters.
2. One who is stingy about relatives and followers (kula-macchariya) results in a dearth of good fortune in future existences. This is the result of denying others their rights, or receiving offerings at the homes of the lay supporters.
3. Stinginess about monastic requisites (lābha-macchariya) leads to rebirth in the Niraya hell where the stingy one wallows in human excreta. This Niraya is particularly nauseating. This kind of result follows the stingy one because he had deprived others of the pleasure of the enjoyment concerning the monastic requisites.
4. Stinginess about personal appearance or attributes (vaṇṇa-macchariya) results in a complete lack of presentable appearance and good attributes in future existences. A detestable appearance and an abominable reputation is what he inherits for his past meanness. Whatever good he might do, goes unnoticed by anyone like arrows shot in the dark night.
5. Stinginess regarding one's learning (pariyatti-dhamma-macchariya) sends the monastic down to the hell of hot ashes.

Envy

Envy arises from consideration of other people's property. Stinginess arises from consideration of one's own property. Since the object of thought differs, envy and stinginess cannot arise together.

In the world enmity, punishment and antagonism between persons arise due to envy and stinginess which are two evil fetters. These fetters are eliminated only by Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga). Unless envy and stinginess have been eliminated by Stream-entry knowledge, people's wish for freedom from enmity and so on will never be fulfilled; they will live miserably surrounded by enmity and so on. This is the explanation to the Buddha's answer to the first question. Why is it that all beings live in enmity and danger amidst enemies, sorrow and anger although they have an earnest desire to be free from them?

On hearing the Buddha's answer Sakka was delighted and said: "Venerable sir, that indeed is so. Fortunate One, that indeed is so. Having learnt the Fortunate One's answer, all my doubts are cleared, all uncertainties have left me."

The Second Question on Envy and Stinginess

After receiving with delight the Buddha's answer, Sakka put his next question thus: "Venerable sir, what is the cause of envy and stinginess? What is their origin? What is their genesis? What is their source? When what factor is present, do envy and stinginess arise? When what factor is not present, do envy and stinginess not arise?"

To this question the Buddha replied as follows: "Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, envy and stinginess have objects, like living beings or conditioned formations that one likes and objects that one dislikes as their cause, as their origin, as their genesis, as their source. When objects that one likes and objects that one dislikes are present, envy and stinginess arise. When objects of like and dislike are not present, envy and stinginess do not arise."

Herein, a living being or conditioned formation that one wants to possess is an object of one's liking, irrespective of its intrinsic nature of disagreeableness. This is because defilements delude the mind into liking something that is of a disagreeable nature. A living being or conditioned formation belonging [954] to another person is an object of one's dislike even though it is a good thing. This is because for one who looks at it in anger, with a biased mind, that good thing appears hateful.

Stinginess arises on account of objects that one likes. Envy arises on account of objects that one dislikes. In another mode of explanation, both envy and stinginess arise out of likes and dislikes. This will be elucidated as follows: For a monastic, a co-resident pupil or some living thing of his fancy may be there as an object of his liking. For a lay person, there are his children and his possessions, such as elephants, horses or cattle, which are objects of his liking. When the monastic or the lay person is away from them, even for a short time, he feels uneasy. When the monastic or the lay person sees someone else having similar objects, there arises in that monastic or lay person envy against the other person. If some other person were to come and ask that monastic or lay person to loan him that favourite pupil of the monastic, or the children or elephant or horse of the lay person, for some purpose, even for a short time, the monastic or lay person would refuse, saying: "I cannot loan him to you. He will get tired or feel bored." In this manner, there arises both envy and stinginess on account of some object of one's liking.

Again, for monastics, there are monastic requisites, such as alms bowl or robes, which are objects that he likes. For lay persons, there are various possessions, such as clothing and ornaments, which are objects that he or she likes. When that monastic or lay person sees someone else having similar objects of that other person's liking, that monastic or lay person has an evil thought: "Oh it would be well if that person did not have those agreeable things!" This is envy. If someone were to ask that monastic or lay person to loan, for a short time, that property of his fancy, the monastic or lay person would refuse, saying: "Ah! That is not possible. I value that thing so much that I very seldom use it myself." This is how an object of one's liking gives rise to stinginess.

Furthermore, whether for a monastic or a lay person, there are persons or things such as a wayward pupil or child, or an inferior article in his or her possession. Although those persons and things are actually not likeable persons or things, yet, due to the deluding nature of defilements, these very persons and things become objects of their liking. That monastic or lay person feels satisfaction about those persons or things. "Who else can have such valuable assets?" they think. Thus entertaining thoughts of self-admiration on account of greed (lobha) for these possessions, envy, the evil desire to deny others of those kinds of possessions, arises. This is envy that springs from self-esteem and that arises due to the likelihood or possibility of other persons coming into possession of the kind of things one possesses.

In another way: As in the aforesaid case where one entertains thoughts of self-admiration on account of greed for their possessions of no intrinsic worth, one wishes: “May that person not have those things!” Thus envy arises. This is envy that springs from what other people already possess.

This latter explanation is not given in detail since it has already been shown in the commentary. The former explanation is made in an inferential way which is suitably modified to be in line with the sub-commentary thereto, and the sub-commentary to the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA). If someone came and asked for a loan of these persons or things of one's liking even for a short time, the owner is not willing to part with them. This is how persons or things that ought not to be cherished can also become a source of envy and stinginess.

The Third Question on Like and Dislike

Sakka received with delight the Buddha's answer and asked the next question: “Venerable sir, what is the cause of like and dislike? What is their origin? What is their genesis? What is their source? When what factor is present, do [955] like and dislike arise? When what factor is not present, do like and dislike not arise?”

And the Buddha answered thus: “Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, like and dislike have greedy craving (chanda-taṇhā) as their cause, as their origin, as their genesis, as their source. When greedy craving is present, like and dislike arise. When greedy craving is not present, like and dislike do not arise.”

Herein, chanda is synonymous with desires or wishes. Chanda is used in two ways: wishing to see, hear, smell, taste, touch or to know, and craving for sense objects. The former is a wholesome factor called desire to do (kattu-kamyatā chanda) which has the mental concomitant desire (chanda), a wish to do. The latter is craving (taṇhā) which has the mental concomitant greed (lobha), hankering after various sense objects. What is meant here is the latter type, greedy craving (lobha-taṇhā-chanda).

Five Kinds of Craving

1. Craving developed while seeking objects of sense pleasure (pariyesana-chanda).
2. Craving developed while acquiring objects of sense pleasure (paṭilābha-chanda).
3. Craving developed while enjoying objects of sense pleasure (paribhoga-chanda).

4. Craving developed while storing and securing sense pleasures (sannidhi-chanda).
5. Craving developed while bestowing rewards or gifts (visajjana-chanda), i.e., giving out one's property with expectation of reciprocal gain, as the bestowing of salaries and awards by rulers upon their men in the belief that these men will render them service by attending upon them and safeguarding them.

Greedy craving causes likes or dislikes. When one gets what one craves for, one likes and has a fondness for the thing acquired. When one fails to get what one craves for, one hates that object of one's craving, and dislike arises in him.

The Fourth Question on Greedy Craving

After listening with delight to the Buddha's answer, Sakka put his next question thus: "Venerable sir, what is the cause of greedy craving (chanda-taṇhā)? What is its origin? What is its genesis? What is its source? When what factor is present, does craving arise? When what factor is not present, does craving not arise?"

The Buddha gave the answer: "Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, greedy craving has deliberation (vinicchaya-takka) as its cause, as its origin, as its genesis, as its source. When there is deliberation (vinicchaya-takka), greedy craving arises. When there is no deliberation, greedy craving does not arise."

In this matter, thinking (vitakka) is not mere thinking about something in general. It is making up the mind about something after due deliberation (vinicchaya-vitakka). In making up the mind, the Buddha has pointed out the decision may be made in two ways: 1) A decision that is influenced by kinds of craving (taṇhā-vinicchaya) and 2) judgment made through the 62 wrong views (diṭṭhi-vinicchaya).

A decision influenced by craving cannot come to a judgment as to good or bad, agreeable [956] or disagreeable. That is because, as the saying goes, one man's food is another man's poison. For example, an earth-worm is a delicacy for certain rulers of the remote regions whereas it is nauseous to those of the middle region or kingdoms. Venison is a delicacy for rulers of the middle region whereas it is disagreeable to those of the remote regions. Decisions influenced by craving are not correct decisions. After having acquired something, whether it relates to a visible object, a sound, an odour, a taste, a tangible object, one considers how much will go to others and how much will be kept for oneself.

This manner of making a decision is the function of deliberation (vinicchaya-vitakka).

Where one makes up one's mind about something that has been acquired after deliberating on it, and becomes attached to whatever is decided on by oneself, craving arises in respect of that object. That is the explanation of the Buddha's answer that deliberation is the cause of greedy craving.

The Fifth Question on Deliberation

Having learnt with great satisfaction the Buddha's answers, Sakka put another question thus: "Venerable sir, what is the cause of deliberation (vinicchaya-vitakka)? What is its origin? What is its genesis? What is its source? When what factor is present, does deliberation take place? When, what factor is not present, does deliberation not take place?"

And the Buddha replied: "Sakka, Lord of the Devas, deliberation has illusory perceptions (saññā) associated with proliferation (papañca-dhamma), which tends to prolong Saṃsāra, as their cause, as their origin, as their genesis, as their source. When there are illusory perceptions, deliberation takes place. When there are no illusory perceptions, deliberation does not take place."

There are 3 types of craving: Craving for sense pleasure, craving for becoming, craving for non-becoming; or, alternatively, craving for sense pleasure, craving for form and craving for the formless.<sup>233</sup> As each type of craving arises with respect to six objects of sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, mind, it expands to 18 types. Again as each of them is concerned with 3 moments of past, present and future, it becomes  $18 \times 3 = 54$  in number, which, when considered for both internal and external aspects, multiplies to 108.

Herein, there are three kinds of illusion that tend to proliferate in the mind, they are, craving (taṇhā), conceit (māna) and wrong views (diṭṭhi). They are called proliferations (papañca-dhamma), because they tend to prolong the round of rebirth, and one who is under their spell, is called one who is attached to the world, who is egoistic, who is deluded. In other words, these three factors are hindrances that make one conceited and forgetful. In our present context, the illusion of craving is meant. There are six kinds or categories of illusory perceptions (saññā), according to the six sense objects, viz., perceptions about visible objects (rūpa-saññā), perceptions about sounds (sadda-saññā), perceptions about odours (gandha-saññā), etc. Deliberation or reason is developed based on those illusory perceptions.

The Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Questions on Meditation

Then having learnt with much delight the Buddha's answer, Sakka asked further: [957] "Venerable sir, by what practice does a monastic destroy the proliferating perceptions (sañña-papañca), and get to Nibbāna where all perceptions cease?"

Contemplation of Sensations

1. Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, I declare that mentally agreeable sensations (somanassa-vedanā) are of two types: that which should be resorted to, and that which should not be resorted to.
2. Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, I declare that mentally disagreeable sensations (domanassa-vedanā) also are of two types: that which should be resorted to and that which should not be resorted to.
3. Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, I declare that mentally neutral sensations (upekkhā-vedanā) are of two types: that which should be resorted to, and that which should not be resorted to.

1. Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, I have said earlier: 'I declare that mentally agreeable sensations are of two types: that which should be resorted to, and that which should not be resorted to.' The reason for this statement is this: If you understand that in resorting to a certain pleasant sensation, demeritoriousness increases and meritoriousness decreases, you should not resort to that pleasant sensation. Mentally agreeable sensations that tend to increase demeritoriousness and decrease meritoriousness should not be resorted to. The same should be understood to apply to the two other kinds of sensation.

Of the two types of mentally agreeable sensation, if you understand that in resorting to a certain pleasant sensation, demeritoriousness decreases and meritoriousness increases, you should resort to that mentally agreeable sensation. Mentally agreeable sensations that tend to decrease demeritoriousness and increase meritoriousness should be resorted to. The same should be understood to apply to the two other kinds of sensation.

Of the type of mentally agreeable sensations that should be resorted to, there is one that arises together with initial application of the mind and with sustained application of the mind (savitakka-savicāra-somanassa); and there is also the one that arises without initial application of the mind and without sustained application of the mind (avitakka-avicāra-somanassa). Of these two the one without sustained application of the mind (avitakka-avicāra-somanassa) is superior.

Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, it is for this reason that I have said: 'I declare that mentally agreeable sensations are of two types: that which should be resorted to, and that which should not be resorted to.'

2. Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, I have said earlier: 'I declare that mentally disagreeable sensations (domanassa-vedanā) are of two types: that which should be resorted to and that which should not be resorted to.' The reason for this statement is this: If you understand that in resorting to a certain mentally disagreeable sensation, demeritoriousness increases and meritoriousness decreases, you should not resort to that unpleasant sensation.

Of those two types of mentally disagreeable sensations, if you understand that in resorting to a certain unpleasant sensation, demeritoriousness decreases and meritoriousness increases, you should resort to that unpleasant sensation.

Of the types of mentally disagreeable sensations that should be resorted to, there is the one that arises together with initial application of the mind and with sustained application of the mind (savitakka-savicāra-domanassa); and there is one that arises without initial application of the mind and without sustained application of [958] the mind (avitakka-avicāra-domanassa). Of these two, the one without initial application of the mind and without sustained application of [958] the mind is superior.

Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, it is for this reason that I have said: 'I declare that there are two types of mentally disagreeable sensations that which should be resorted to, and that which should not be resorted to.'

3. Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, I have said earlier: 'I declare that mentally neutral sensations (upekkhā-vedanā) are of two types: that which should be resorted to, and that which should not be resorted to.' The reason for this statement is this: If you understand that in resorting to a certain mentally neutral sensation, demeritoriousness increases and meritoriousness decreases, you should not resort to that mentally neutral sensation.

Of those two types of mentally neutral sensations, if you understand that in resorting to a certain mentally neutral sensation, demeritoriousness increases and meritoriousness decreases, you should not resort to that neutral sensation.

Of those two types of mentally neutral sensation, if you understand that in resorting to a certain mentally neutral sensation, demeritoriousness decreases and meritoriousness increases, you should resort to that neutral sensation.

Of the type of mentally neutral sensations that should be resorted to, there is one that arises with initial application of the mind and with sustained application of the mind (savitakka-savicāra-upekkhā); and there is also one that arises without initial application of the mind and without sustained application of the mind (avitakka-avicāra-upekkhā). Of these two, the one that arises without initial application of the mind and without sustained application of the mind is superior.

Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, it is for this reason that I have said: 'I declare that mentally neutral sensations are of two types: that which should be resorted to, and that which should not be resorted to.'

Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, a monastic, who practises thus, is one who works for the extinction of proliferating perceptions, the group of perceptions associated with the proliferation factor (papañca) that leads to Nibbāna where all perceptions cease."

When the Buddha answered thus giving an analytical exposition of meditation of sensation, Sakka was delighted and said, expressing his approval: "Venerable sir, that indeed is so. Fortunate One, that indeed is so. Having learnt the Fortunate One's answer, I am rid of all doubts about this question, all uncertainties have left me."

In this connection, the commentary discusses, as follows, some interesting points on the subtleties of the Dhamma.

In the present question, Sakka asks the Buddha about the practice that leads to Nibbāna in a subjective manner. The Buddha answers in an objective way about the three kinds of sensation, that is, the method of insight-development through contemplation of agreeable (somanassa-vedanā), disagreeable (domanassa-vedanā) and neutral sensations (upekkhā-vedanā). Since the Buddha's answer consists of contemplation of three sensations, the commentary speaks of three questions: Questions about agreeable sensations (somanassa-pañhā), questions about disagreeable sensations (domanassa-pañhā), and questions about neutral sensations (upekkhā-pañhā), one on each of the three sensations.

The question asked by Sakka was: “By what practice does a monastic work towards Nibbāna?” The Buddha does not give a straight answer, such as: “In this way, a monastic practices the way leading to Nibbāna.” Instead he replied: “Sakka, agreeable sensations are of two types: that which should be resorted to, and that which should not be resorted to.” This might strike as incongruent to those not conversant with the Buddha's various methods of teaching.

The commentary elucidates this problem in the following way: [959] In this sixth question of Sakka, is the Buddha's answer relevant to Sakka's question, one might ask? The answer: Yes, it is.

And the explanation is this: Sakka asks subjectively about a practice towards attaining Nibbāna. It is a personal question. The Buddha gives the answer to suit the temperament of Sakka for working towards Nibbāna. The answer revolves around contemplation of the mind, which is suited to Sakka's mental make-up. The Buddha opens up the subject of meditation of mental phenomena with contemplation on the three kinds of sensations. Therefore, the answer is a relevant answer.

To expand this: For Devas, the mind is a more appropriate subject for contemplation than the body. Amongst the mental aggregates, sensations are the most vivid to perceive. The physical composition of Devas is more subtle than that of human beings. Being a result of superior deeds (kamma), their digestive capacity is also remarkably greater than that of human beings so that very rich Deva nutriment can easily be digested. This means a need for regular feeding. When a Deva misses a meal, he feels the pangs of hunger very acutely. In fact, it can lead to dissolution of the body like a lump of butter placed on a heated slab.

This shows that, to a Deva, the truth of painful sensation (dukkha-vedanā) is very easy to perceive. Similarly, pleasant sensation is due to superior kinds of Deva; pleasures that may be indulged in to greater and greater degree are also easy to perceive. This also holds true for neutral sensation (upekkhā-vedanā) which is peaceful and wholesome. That is why the Buddha chooses the contemplation of the three kinds of sensations, agreeable sensations, disagreeable sensations and neutral sensations as a suitable practice for Sakka.

This will be elaborated further: There is meditation for insight (vipassanā) into the physical aspect of one's body and meditation for insight (vipassanā) into the mental aspect of one's body. Of these two main methods, the Buddha prescribes the former to those who have the capacity to perceive physical phenomena. It may be taught briefly or in an elaborate way. Usually, the essential nature of the four primary elements is taught in detail as the meditation subject (catu-dhātu-vavatthāna-kammaṭṭhāna) on physical phenomena. To those who have the innate capacity to perceive mental phenomena, a suitable subject on mental phenomena is taught. In such a case, the physical basis of the mind has to be contemplated first before proceeding to the contemplation of mental phenomena. In the case of Sakka too, this was the procedure: physical phenomena was first touched upon briefly. However, in the recorded text of the teaching that preliminary aspect is not specified and the discourse on mental phenomena alone is recorded.

With Devas, mental phenomena are better perceived. So the three kinds of sensation are taught first. When mental phenomena is contemplated at the outset, there are three approaches:

1. Through contact (phassa).
2. Through sensation (vedanā).
3. Through mind (citta).

The three approaches are adopted only at the initial stage of meditation. Once the nature of mental phenomena is grasped and when the impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and unsubstantiality (anatta) of mental phenomena is contemplated upon, all mental phenomena are comprehended. To explain this further:

1. With some yogis, after contemplation of the body has been mastered in a brief manner or in an elaborate manner, contact (phassa), which is a mental phenomenon, falls on the physical phenomena that is under contemplation and becomes evident.
2. With some yogis, the sensation experienced in respect of the physical phenomena, which is under contemplation, becomes evident.

3. With some yogis, the consciousness which cognizes the physical phenomenon under contemplation, becomes evident. In these three ways, the interrelationship between mind and body comes to be understood by the yogi. [960]

Comprehending Contact

1. Contact, sensation, perception, volition, and consciousness are a group of five key mental concomitants that arise together. In the discussion on the three types of yogis, the one who vividly perceives contact (phassa) between mind and matter does not comprehend contact alone. Rather, he comes to realize the sensation (vedanā), which experiences the contact, is also there; that perception (saññā), which perceives the object of contemplation, is also there; that volition (cetanā), which brings into play all associated mental factors, is also there; that consciousness (viññāṇa), which cognizes the object of contemplation, is also there. Thus the five closely related mental factors headed by contact are comprehended.

2. The yogi, who perceives sensation, does not comprehend sensation alone. Rather, he comes to realize that, along with the arising of that sensation, there arises contact between the mind and the physical phenomena under contemplation; he also realizes that there also arises perception which perceives it; that there also arises volition which motivates the associated mental factors; and that there also arises consciousness which cognizes the object of contemplation. Thus the five mental factors headed by contact are comprehended.

3. The yogi, who perceives consciousness, does not comprehend consciousness alone. Rather, he understands that besides the consciousness, there also arises contact whereby the mind meets the object of contemplation; that there also arises sensation which experiences the contact; that there also arises perception which perceives the object; and that there also arises volition that motivates the associated mental factors. Thus the five mental factors headed by contact are comprehended.

Having comprehended contact and its four associated mental factors (phassa-pañcamaka), the yogi contemplates on what is the basis of their arising. Then he discerns that the five mental factors have the corporeal body as their basis. The body, in the ultimate sense, is the corporeality that has arisen, made up of the primary four elements (bhūta-rūpa) and secondary elements (upādāya-rūpa). Thus, the truth that contact and its associating four mental factors arise dependent on the body is understood. The basis, where the mental factors arise, is seen in its reality as physical phenomena or matter (rūpa); and that the five associated factors headed by contact is mental phenomena or mind (nāma); and that there is just mind and matter (nāma-rūpa) and nothing else. Between the two interrelated phenomena, matter comprises the aggregate of corporeality; mind comprises the four mental aggregates. Thus, there are just the five aggregates (khandha). Indeed, there is no aggregate apart from mind and matter; there is no mind or matter apart from the five aggregates.

The yogi then contemplates: “What is the cause of the arising of the five aggregates?” He understands fundamentally and truly that the five aggregates arise due to ignorance (avijjā), craving (taṇhā) and deeds (kamma). Thus, he understands that the continued phenomenon of the five aggregates is the effect of this cause: Ignorance, craving and deeds, and that apart from cause and effect there is nothing that can truly be called a person or a being, and that all are aggregates of conditioned phenomena. Thus, having comprehended that mind and matter arise from a cause, the yogi continually contemplates on the impermanence, suffering, and non-self (anicca, dukkha, anatta) of mind and matter, thereby gaining insight into the mind-matter complex stage by stage. This effort and its rewards indicate strong insight (balava-vipassanā).

The yogi, who has advanced to this high level of insight, becomes very eager to attain the paths and fruitions. He strives for the development of insight, encouraging himself with the thought: “I am going to achieve the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna even today.” When four appropriate factors: weather, associates, food, and discourse that are conducive to his Awakening are present together, he attains path-knowledge. And even at one sitting of meditation, the culmination of insight development may be realized and he becomes an Arahāt.

In the above manner, the Buddha has already shown how a yogi, to whom contact is [961] comprehended, or sensation is comprehended, or consciousness is comprehended, may gain Awakening through proper insight development.

In the Discourse about Sakka's Questions the Buddha discourses on contemplation of mental phenomena, concentrating on sensation (vedanā) as the meditation subject appropriate for Sakka. This is so because Devas, including Sakka, will not find either contact (phassa) or consciousness (viññāṇa) as comprehensible as sensation (vedanā). Therefore, sensation is an appropriate subject of meditation for Devas for gaining insight into mental phenomena.

To explain this further: The arising of pleasant sensation (sukha-vedanā) and unpleasant sensation (dukkha-vedanā) is very evident. When pleasant sensation arises, the whole body is permeated with it. One gets excited. There is a feeling of ease, as if being fed with butter refined 100 times over, or being applied on the skin with oil refined 100 times over, or relieving heat by taking a bath with cool clear water contained in 1,000 pots. It causes the person who experiences it to exclaim: “Oh! This is pleasant, really pleasant!”

When unpleasant or painful sensation arises also, it pervades the whole body causing great agitation and discomfort. It is as though lumps of red hot iron were inserted into the body, or as though molten iron were poured down over one's body, or as though a bundle of burning faggots were thrown into a forest of dried trees and grass. It causes the person experiencing it to groan painfully: “Oh! This is painful, really painful!” Thus, the arising of pleasant sensation and unpleasant sensation is quite evident.

This is not the case with neutral sensation (upekkhā-vedanā), which is not so evident. It is as though hidden by darkness. In the absence of any pleasant sensation or painful sensation, the yogi can only use his reason to understand the neutral sensation which is neither-pleasant-nor-unpleasant. It is like a hunter chasing a deer, making a reasoned guess where the deer's hoof prints appear at one end of a slab of rock as ascending it, and appear at the other end while descending therefrom, and coming to the conclusion that the deer must have walked across the rock. Where pleasant sensation has been clearly noted in the yogi's awareness, and later unpleasant sensation also has been clearly noted, the yogi can, by applying his reason, judge that during the moments when two kinds of sensation are not felt, there has arisen in him a neutral sensation that is neither-pleasant-nor-unpleasant. In this way the yogi comprehends neutral sensation (upekkhā-vedanā).

Thus, the Buddha first taught Sakka contemplation of physical phenomena and then proceeded to the subject of the three sensations as a method of contemplating mental phenomena. This method, whereby a discourse on the contemplation of physical phenomena is followed by a discourse on the three sensations as a meditation subject, is a common method used by the Buddha to suit the hearer in each situation. It can be found, besides the present discourse to Sakka, in many other discourses, including: The Long Discourse about Steadfast Mindfulness (Mahā-sati-paṭṭhāna-sutta, DN 22), the Discourse about the Ways of Attending to Mindfulness (Sati-paṭṭhāna-sutta, MN 10), the Short Discourse on the Destruction of Craving (Cūḷa-taṇhā-saṅkhaya-sutta, MN 37), the Long Discourse on the Destruction of Craving (Mahā-taṇhā-saṅkhaya-sutta, MN 38), the Short Discourse giving an Elaboration (Cūḷa-vedalla-sutta, MN 44), the Long Discourse giving an Elaboration (Mahā-vedalla-sutta, MN 43), the Discourse to Raṭṭhapāla (Raṭṭhapāla-sutta, MN 82), the Discourse to Māgaṇḍiya (Māgaṇḍiya-sutta, MN 75), the Discourse giving an Analysis of the Elements (Dhātu-vibhaṅga-sutta, MN 140), the Discourse on what is Conducive to the Imperturbable (Āneñja-sappāya-sutta, MN 106) and the whole of the Thematic Discourses about Feeling (Vedanā-saṃyutta, SN 36).

The commentary says: “In the Discourse about Sakka's Questions (Sakka-pañha-sutta), meditation on the physical phenomena, being simply an object of sensation, is not expressly mentioned. Probably this is why it is not on record in the Pāḷi text.” This statement is rather terse and obscure. Its purport will, therefore, be brought out here: The commentary means: “The Fortunate One taught Sakka and other Devas contemplation of physical phenomena first and then proceeded with contemplation of mental phenomena through the three sensations which was the way they could understand the Dhamma, considering their capacity to comprehend.” This statement might be challenged by certain persons pointing out the fact that there is no mention in the text that the Buddha taught contemplation of physical phenomena to Sakka. The answer lies in the fact that Devas are highly perceptible to mental phenomena, and among all mental phenomena, sensation is best understood by them. It is the Buddha's method in teaching those with a strong capacity to understand mental phenomena, to make a preliminary [962] discourse on physical phenomena just to provide a grounding for understanding mental phenomena, on which latter subject he would dwell at length. In the present case, Sakka and his company had a strong capacity to understand mental phenomena and so the Buddha mentioned physical phenomena simply as an object of sensation, showing them what constitutes physical phenomena. And having stated it in a most brief manner, the Buddha taught the three kinds of sensation in an elaborate manner. Therefore, it must be noted that physical phenomena forms just a preliminary subject as object of sensation, and hence this is not recorded in the text. This is the purport of the terse commentarial statement referred to above.

[An elaborate section of the meditation of feelings has been removed to the Further Explanations as it breaks the flow of the text too much.]

The Story of the Elder Mahāsīva

Monastics should also practice the meditation of sensations, or feelings, but if, even after very rigorous practice, a monastic still does not attain the Arahāt fruition, despondency sets in his mind. He reflects: “Alas, I am still not one of those who are invited to assemble at the yearly congregation where the Invitation of the Pure (Visuddhi-pavāraṇā) is performed.” He feels very sad like the monastic elder Mahāsīva of Gāmantapabbhāra, and tears may flow down his face.

In Śrī Laṅkā, there once lived a monastic elder named Mahāsīva who had eighteen groups or sets of monastics learning at his feet. Thirty thousand of his pupils had become Arahats under his tutorship. One of the 30,000 Arahats thought to himself: “I have acquired infinite qualities in terms of morality, and so on. How about the qualities attained by my teacher Mahāsīva?” And he knew that his teacher was still a worldlying. He reflected thus: “Alas, our teacher Mahāsīva has been the support of others, but is not the support for himself. I will now admonish our teacher.” So thinking, he travelled through psychic power in the air, descended near the elder's monastery, and went to Mahāsīva, who was sitting in a secluded place. He made obeisance to the teacher and sat down at a suitable distance.

The teacher said to this pupil: “Observer of the ascetic practice of eating from one bowl only, what calls you here?”

This is a term of endearment used by elders of the past to monastics who practise insight-meditation.

The pupil said: “Venerable sir, I come to learn from you a discourse of appreciation (anumodanā) for use at an offering ceremony.” [966]

“It is not possible to learn it here, friend.”

“May I learn it at the place where you usually stop and consider the direction you should make for the day's alms gathering?”

“Other monastics will be putting their questions to me there.”

“May I learn it on the alms round?”

“There too, other monastics will be putting their questions.”

“May I learn it where the venerable elder robes himself fully with the upper robe, or while rearranging the robes for going into the village, or where the alms bowl is made ready for alms gathering, or at the place of taking the gruel meal at the rest house after the alms round?”

“At those places, monastic elders will be asking questions to clear up their doubts concerning the commentarial literature.”

“May I ask you on your return from the alms round?”

“Then also other monastics will be asking questions.”

“May I ask on the way from the village to the monastery?”

“Then also other monastics will be asking questions.”

“May I ask after your meal at the monastery? Or at the place of seclusion when the venerable elder washes his feet? Or at the time the venerable elder washes his face?”

“At those times, also other monastics usually ask questions, friend. From this time till the next day's dawn, there are monastics coming to me endlessly without a moment's break, friend.”

“May I then ask at the time the venerable elder is cleaning his teeth and washing his face?”

“Impossible friend, other monastics will be asking their questions.”

“May I ask when the venerable elder enters the monastery and sits there?”

“Then also, there will be other monastics asking questions.”

“Venerable sir, as a matter of fact, there should be a moment to spare when the venerable elder sits in meditation in the monastery after having washed his face, during the moments of shifting the sitting posture for three or four times. From what the venerable elder says, would there be no time to die too? Venerable sir, you are like the leaning board providing others support, but not being one's own support. My real purpose in coming to you is not to learn a discourse from you.” So saying, he disappeared.

Mahāsīva Retires into the Forest

Ven. Mahāsīva then saw the real purpose of that monastic's visit: “This monastic does not want to learn the teaching. He came here to admonish me. But this is not the time for me to go out into seclusion in the forest. I must wait till morning,” he said to himself. He made ready to leave with his bowl and robes which he kept handy. He taught the whole day and the first and middle watches of the night. When, in the third watch of the night, one of the pupils was leaving, he slipped out together with him, letting everyone think he was one of the pupils. Other pupils awaiting the next class thought that the teacher was out to answer the call of nature. The student monastic who went out together also took the teacher for a co-student.

Ven. Mahāsīva was confident that the Arahāt fruition should not take more than a few days to attain, and he would come back from forest seclusion after becoming an Arahāt. So he did not bid farewell to his pupils when he left the monastery on the thirteenth day of Visākha, and went to a cave known as Gāmantapabbhāra, a cave which was in the vicinity of a village. By the full moon day, he had not become an Arahāt. “I thought I could attain the Arahāt fruition in a few days,” he thought, “but the Rains Retreat (Vassa) period has arrived. I will spend the Rains Retreat (Vassa) here and will accomplish my task by the end of the Rains Retreat (Vassa), by the Invitation day (Pavāraṇā).” So, regarding three months as though it were three days, he went into ardent practice. But at the end of the [967] three months he was still unable to attain the Arahāt fruition. Mahāsīva reflected: “I had come here hoping to attain the Arahāt fruition in three days, but three months have passed without my attaining it. My fellow monastics have joined the Saṅgha congregation of Arahats now.” He felt miserable and tears streamed down his face.

Then he pondered: “Perhaps I have been indulgent: I have alternated the four bodily postures: lying, sitting, standing and walking, in my meditation work. I will now renounce the lying posture and will not wash my feet until I attain the Arahāt fruition.” So he put away his cot in a corner and resumed meditation. Another Rains Retreat (Vassa) passed by, and no Awakening was at hand. Each Rains Retreat (Vassa) ended not with Awakening but with tears, tears of noble desire unfulfilled. In this way, 29 years marked by 29 assemblies of the Arahats at the end of each Rains Retreat went by.

Young boys from the village noticed the ruptures that had developed on both of the Mahāsīva's feet and they tried their best to patch them up with thorns. Then they joked among themselves: “Oh, how I envy those ruptured feet.”

A Devakaññā Comes to the Rescue

On the full moon day, in the month of the October (Assayuja), in the thirtieth year of his ardent practice, Mahāsīva sat leaning against a board and took stock of the situation. “I have been trying for 30 years, and the Arahāt fruition is still beyond my reach. Clearly, Awakening is not for me in this life. How I miss the opportunity of attending to the congregation of Arahats together with my fellow monastics.” An unpleasant sensation (domanassa-vedanā) overwhelmed him. Tears came rolling down his face.

At the time, a Devakaññā stood before him sobbing. The monastic elder asked: “Who is there weeping?”

“I am a Devakaññā, venerable sir.”

“Why do you weep like this?”

“Venerable sir, I think weeping is the way to attainment of path and fruition and I am weeping following your example in the hope of attaining one path and fruition or two.”

At this, the old monastic's pride was rudely shaken. He said to himself: “Now, Mahāsīva, you have made yourself the laughing-stock of a young Devakaññā. Does it become you?” A strong feeling of spiritual urgency (samvega) overtook him. He redoubled his endeavour and soon became an Arahāt along with the four discriminative knowledges (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa).

Now that he felt relaxed mentally, he thought of stretching himself awhile. He cleaned up his cot, filled his water pots, and sat at the head of the walkway, reminding himself of the need to wash his feet that he had neglected for these 30 years.

Sakka Washes Mahāsīva's Feet

Ven. Mahāsīva's pupils remembered their teacher in the thirtieth year of his departure and saw by their special powers that he had become an Arahāt. Knowing what had crossed in the teacher's mind, they said: “It is ridiculous to let our teacher trouble himself to wash his own feet while pupils like ourselves are living.” Thinking thus, all 30,000 Arahāt-pupils travelled in the direction of the cave where Ven. Mahāsīva was sitting, all of them vying with one another to get the opportunity of washing their teacher's feet.

Ven. Mahāsīva however insisted that he must do the job, which he had neglected for 30 years himself. At that juncture, Sakka thought to himself: “The monastic elder is insisting on washing his feet himself, refusing to have them washed by his 30,000 Arahats pupils. It is absurd that the revered one should bother to wash his own feet while a lay supporter like myself is living. I will go there and do the job.” He took his Queen Sūjā with him and appeared at the scene. Putting his queen in front, he announced to the 30,000 Arahats monks: “Make way, venerable sirs, a woman is coming.” He then made obeisance to Ven. Mahāsīva and sat squatting before him, and said: “Venerable sir, let me wash [968] your feet.”

“Sakka of the Kosiya clan, I have left my feet unwashed for 30 full years. Human bodies smell bad by nature. The smell is so pungent that even for a Deva staying 100 leagues away from a human body, its smell is as obnoxious as a carrion tied around his neck. So leave the washing to me.”

Sakka replied: “Venerable sir, as for us the natural smell of the human body is obscured by the fragrance of your morality, which rises beyond the sense sphere Deva realms (kāmāvacara) and reaches the topmost realm of the Brahmās. Venerable sir, there is no fragrance that surpasses the fragrance of morality. Your morality has compelled us to render personal service to you.” Then Sakka took firm hold of the elder's ankle with his left hand and washed his soles with his right hand till they glowed like the soft soles of a child. After doing this personal service to the elder, Sakka made obeisance to him and returned to his celestial abode.

In this way, a yogi, who finds himself unable to become an Arahata, feels, as in the case of Ven. Mahāsīva: “Ah, how I miss the opportunity of holding congregation with fellow monastics who are Arahats.” He becomes despondent suffering disagreeable sensations (domanassa-vedanā). When he attains meditation or insight knowledge or path and fruition as the outcome of, or caused by, that unpleasant feeling which he considers either as associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, or not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind. Such attainment is called, figuratively, unpleasant sensation with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, or unpleasant sensation without initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind. It should be noted that the Buddha termed these attainments as figures of speech, taken from the point of view of result or that of cause.

Thus, according to the yogi's view of the unpleasant sensation, either as associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, or as not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, when in due course the unpleasant sensation leads to meditation or insight knowledge, or the paths and fruitions, these attainments are called, figuratively, unpleasant sensation with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, or unpleasant sensation without initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind.

In this context, where a monastic contemplates the meditation, whether neighbourhood absorption (upacāra-jhāna) or the first absorption (paṭhama-jhāna), called unpleasant sensation with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind (savitakka-savicāra), as impermanent, suffering and unsubstantial, he considers: "Where does this unpleasant sensation originate?" He comes to understand that it has its origin in the body as its base. From this understanding, he progresses, stage by stage, to Awakening.

If there is another monastic who contemplates the second absorption (dutiya-jhāna), the third absorption (tatiya-jhāna), etc. which are called unpleasant sensation which is not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind (avitakka-avicāra), as impermanent, suffering and unsubstantial, by stages he becomes an Arahāt.

In the above two cases, both have unpleasant sensation as the object of insight meditation but the unpleasant sensation, which is not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, is superior to the unpleasant sensation which is associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind. Regarding the insight knowledge gained from the meditation also, the former is superior to the latter. Regarding the fruition of the final path-knowledge (Arahatta-phala) also, the former is superior. That is why the Buddha says that, of the two types of unpleasant sensation, the one that is not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind is superior. These are points to note concerning unpleasant sensation (domanassa-vedanā). [969]

3. The neutral sensation (upekkhā) which tends to increase demeritoriousness and decrease meritoriousness, and is therefore not to be resorted to, means home-dependent neutral sensations (geha-sita-upekkhā). It means strong attachment to sense-pleasures. When some agreeable object arises at the six doors: the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind, one is unable to overcome the defilements and falls prey to that sense object just as a fly is caught by a piece of jaggery. One who relishes sense-pleasures is imprisoned by them.

Repeated resort to home-dependent neutral sensations tends to increase demeritoriousness and decrease meritoriousness. That is why the Buddha said that home-dependent neutral sensations should not be resorted to.

The neutral sensation which tends to decrease demeritoriousness and increase meritoriousness, and should, therefore, be resorted to, means neutral sensations that depend on renunciation (nekkhamma-sita-upekkhā). It is a neutral attitude to both agreeable and disagreeable objects arising at the six sense spheres: the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. Agreeable sense objects are not attached to. Disagreeable objects do not cause anger or vexation. Neither-agreeable-nor-disagreeable sense objects do not cause delusion (moha) due to having an unbalanced attitude. The yogi contemplates all the six sense objects as impermanent, suffering, and subject to change and thus discerns all of them as they really are. This neutral attitude is a form of neutral sensation which arises with wisdom in the mental process of the yogi. In other words, this evenness of attitude is also called indifferent feeling or specific neutrality (tatra-majjhataṭṭā). It means having a detached attitude to both agreeable and disagreeable sense objects. Neutral feeling (vedanupekkhā) and having a balanced attitude, or specific neutrality (tatra-majjhataṭṭā), are taken as neutral (upekkhā).

That being so, resorting to the six kinds of neutral sensation inclined to renunciation, six neutral sensations that rely on renunciation, at all times, i.e., from the time of becoming a monastic, throughout all the stages of monastic practice beginning with the practice of the ten reflections (anussati), till the attainment of meditation, up to the fourth absorption (jhāna), decreases demeritoriousness and increases meritoriousness. Therefore the Buddha said neutral sensations that rely on renunciation should be resorted to.

Of the two types of neutral sensations that rely on renunciation: the one associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind (savitakka-savicāra-upekkhā), the neutral sensation that arises at all times, from the time of becoming a monastic throughout all the stages of insight-development through various contemplations, up till the attainment of the first absorption (paṭhama-jhāna) and the one not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind (avitakka-avicāra-upekkhā), at the attainment of the second absorption (dutiya-jhāna), the first one is superior to the second.

The above passage compares the Arahat fruition attained by two monastics, in two ways of monastic practice:

The first monastic, in contemplating a neutral sensation associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, considers: “On what does this neutral sensation depend?” And he comes to the right understanding that it arises dependent on the body. From that understanding, he proceeds to gain insight knowledge, stage by stage, until he becomes an Arahat.

The second monastic, contemplating the neutral sensation not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind that arises at the second, the third, and the fourth absorptions (jhāna) gains insight knowledge, stage by stage, until he becomes an Arahat.

Of those two monastics, the neutral sensation that serves as the object of meditation of the second monastic, being not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, is superior to the neutral sensation that serves as the object of meditation of the first monastic which is associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind. Regarding the thoughts that arise in the two monastics during their meditation, the thoughts that arise in the second monastic, being not associated [970] with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, are superior to the thoughts of the first monastic which are associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind. Regarding the attainment of the Arahat fruition won through contemplation of the neutral sensation, the attainment of the second monastic, being not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, is superior to that of the first monastic which is associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind.

Sakka Established in Stream-Entry

Having discoursed on pleasant sensation, unpleasant sensation and neutral sensation that lead to Awakening, the Buddha concluded the teaching with these words: “Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, a monastic, who practises thus, is one who works out the extinction of proliferating perceptions associated with craving (taṇhā), conceit (māna) and wrong view (diṭṭhi) that prolongs the suffering in Saṃsāra leading to Nibbāna where all perceptions cease.” At that moment, Sakka attained the fruition of Stream-entry.

The benevolent desire of the Buddhas is the noblest intention to bestow the highest blessing, the superior or exalted mind, never of inferior or lower type. Wherever the Buddhas make a discourse to an individual or to a congregation, they always show the way to becoming an Arahāt. Amongst the hearers, some attain Stream-entry, some become Once-returners, some become Non-returners, and some become Arahats, according to the sufficing condition, or, the ripeness of their past merit.

To bring in a simile here: The Buddha is like the royal father, the hearers of his teaching are like the princelings. The father makes morsels of food in the size that he usually takes, and feeds them into the mouths of the princelings. The princelings take in as much food, only of what as their mouths can receive. Similarly, the Buddha disseminates the Dhamma in the highest level of becoming an Arahāt, then from amongst the hearers some attain the first fruition, some the second, some the third, and some the fourth, according to their capacity for understanding.

Sakka Is Reborn as Sakka a Second Time

After attaining Stream-entry, Sakka passed away in the presence of the Buddha and was reborn as Sakka for a second time.

There is an important point to note in this connection: When a Deva passes away no corpse remains as is the case with a human being. The body ceases to exist and disappears just like a flame disappears. Whereas, when a human being dies, the corporeality born of productive deeds (kammaja-rūpa) disappears first. Seventeen thought-moments after the disappearance of corporeality born of productive deeds, mind-born corporeality (cittaja-rūpa) disappears. Within a few moments, nutriment-born corporeality (āhāraja-rūpa) disappears since no external nutriment sustains it. Temperature-born corporeality (utuja-rūpa) however stays on for a long time, taking its own process. With Devas it is totally different. This is so because Devas have a type of rebirth quite different from human beings. They are born instantly as adults. When their corporeality born of productive deeds dissolves, the remaining kinds of corporeality, i.e., mind-born, temperature-born, and nutriment-born corporeality, all these dissolve simultaneously. The result is that there are no physical remains when a Deva passes away. The body vanishes there and then.

The difference in the fact of the presence of the human dead body and the absence of the Deva dead body at their passing away is a matter that requires some basic understanding<sup>234</sup> of the arising of the aggregates of a human being and those of a Deva at the [971] moment of conception.

At the moment of conception or rebirth (paṭisandhi) of a human being, three corporeality units (kalāpa), each a mere speck of an atom, come into being: the body decad (kāya-dasaka-kalāpa), the sex decad (bhāva-dasaka-kalāpa) and the base decad (vatthu-dasaka-kalāpa). The corporeality born of productive deeds and the mind-born corporeality, temperature-born corporeality and nutriment-born corporeality arise at the due moment. Whenever these four types of corporeality advance to the stage of static moment (thiti-khaṇa), each unit of the element of heat (tejo-dhātu) inherent in those corporeal units continuously produces temperature-born corporeality, resulting in a multiplication of temperature-born clusters (utuja kalāpa) and the growth of the human body.

This continuous increment of the temperature-born corporeality has the effect of constituting most of the bulk of the human body so much so it is virtually the owner of the house of the human body, turning the three other types of corporeality: kamma-born, mind-born, and nutriment-born corporeality into mere guests at the house. This is the nature of corporeality in human beings as well as all other womb-born beings. When they die, the corporeality born of productive deeds, the mind-born corporeality and the nutriment-born corporeality in them vanish away, like guests in the house leaving the body; but temperature-born corporeality, which is like the owner of the house, remains for a comparatively long time.

In the case of Devas, corporeality born of productive deeds, arising at the moment of instant rebirth, constitutes the whole of the Deva body which is three miles long, and is like the owner of the house while the three other types of corporeality: Mind-born, temperature-born, and nutriment-born corporeality are like guests at the house, sharing space within the Deva body.

Therefore, Devas and Brahmas, who are reborn instantly as adults, do not leave behind any remains of their body at death. The three types of corporeality other than corporeality born of productive deeds, like guests who cannot stay on in the house when the house is no more, vanish when the corporeality born of productive deeds dissolves at death. This is a profound matter. It is intelligible only to those who have a grounding in the phenomenal processes of mind and matter.

Since Sakka passed away and was reborn as Sakka even while listening to the discourse, no one among his celestial company knew that it was not the same Sakka. Only Sakka himself knew it, besides him the Buddha knew it by his all-knowing wisdom.

The Ninth, Tenth and Eleventh Questions on Restraint

Sakka now thought: “The Fortunate One has made it very clear to me about pleasant sensation, unpleasant sensation and neutral sensation just as clear butter oil has been extracted out of a lump of butter. But path and fruition evidently is the result for which there must be a cause by way of appropriate practice. Certainly, the supermundane paths and fruitions cannot be had merely by asking, like a bird soaring up the sky. There must be a practice that leads to the supermundane. I shall now ask the Fortunate One the preliminary practice whereby the Arahant fruition is attained.”

So he asked the Buddha: “Venerable sir, in which way does a monastic practise the morality of restraint according to the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha-saṃvara-sīla)?”

On being asked thus, the Buddha replied: “Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, there are two kinds of bodily conduct: That which should be adopted, and that which should not be adopted. There are two kinds of verbal conduct: That which should be [972] adopted, and that which should not be adopted. There are two kinds of quests: That which should be taken up, and that which should not be taken up.

Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, I have said: 'There are two kinds of bodily conduct: That which should be adopted, and that which should not be adopted.' The reason for my saying so is this: If you understand that in adopting a certain mode of bodily conduct demeritoriousness increases and meritoriousness decreases, you should not adopt such a mode of bodily conduct.

Bodily conduct that tends to increase demeritoriousness and decrease meritoriousness should not be adopted. The same interpretation should be made in respect of the next two statements.

Of the two kinds of bodily conduct, if you understand that in adopting a certain mode of bodily conduct demeritoriousness decreases and meritoriousness increases you should adopt such a mode of bodily conduct.

Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, that is the reason why I said: 'There are two kinds of bodily conduct: That which should be adopted, and that which should not be adopted.'

Bodily conduct that tends to decrease demeritoriousness and increase meritoriousness should be adopted. The same meaning should be taken in respect of the next two statements.

Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, I have said: 'There are two kinds of verbal conduct: That which should be adopted, and that which should not be adopted.' The reason for my saying so is this: If you understand that in adopting a certain mode of verbal conduct, demeritoriousness increases and meritoriousness decreases, you should not adopt such a mode of verbal conduct.

Of those two kinds of verbal conduct, if you understand that in adopting a certain mode of verbal conduct, demeritoriousness decreases and meritoriousness increases, you should adopt such a mode of verbal conduct.

Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, that is the reason why I said: 'Sakka, there are two kinds of verbal conduct: That which should be adopted, and that which should not be adopted.'

Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, I have said: 'Sakka, there are two kinds of quests: That which should be taken up, and that which should not be taken up.' The reason for my saying so is this: If you understand that in taking up a certain quest, demeritoriousness increases and meritoriousness decreases, you should not take up such a quest.

Of those two kinds of quests, if you understand that in taking up a certain quest, demeritoriousness decreases and meritoriousness increases, you should take up such a quest.

Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, that is the reason why I said: 'Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, there are two kinds of quests: That which should be taken up, and that which should not be taken up.'

Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, a monastic who practises thus is one who practises the morality of restraint according to the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha-saṃvara-sīla)."

When the Buddha answered thus, Sakka was delighted and said, expressing approval: "Venerable sir, that indeed is so. O Fortunate One, that indeed is so. Having learnt the Fortunate One's answer, I am free of all doubts about this question, all uncertainties have left me."

In question six, seven, and eight, Sakka asked about the practice that leads to Nibbāna through the cessation of proliferating perceptions, and the Buddha replied with a discourse on the three kinds of sensation that are the fundamentals of the practice leading to Nibbāna. He distinguished between sensation that should be resorted to and sensation that should not be resorted to. Of those two types of sensation, the sensation that should not be resorted to is not the practice leading to Nibbāna; only the sensation that should be resorted to is the practice that leads to Nibbāna.

Yet why does the Buddha discuss about the sensation that does not lead to Nibbāna? This is a likely question to be asked by one who does not see the Buddha's purpose. However, the Buddha knows the disposition of Sakka such that if Sakka understands the need for abandoning the sensation that should not be resorted to, recognising it as a defiling factor, then he would be prepared to cultivate the sensation that should be resorted to, recognizing it as a cleansing factor. Thus, the discussing of both [973] types of sensation is conducive to Sakka's understanding. The Buddha's method helped Sakka to adopt the proper practice.

In the present question on the morality of restraint according to the Rules, the mode of bodily conduct that should not be adopted, the mode of verbal conduct that should not be adopted, and the kind of quest that should not be taken up, do not in themselves constitute the morality of restraint according to the Rules. Yet, only if one is able to abandon them, can one fulfil the practice of bodily conduct that should be adopted, verbal conduct that should be adopted, and the kind of quest that should be taken up because all of them are factors that cleanse the mind. That is why the three defiling factors are discussed along with the three cleansing factors in pairs. This method, the Buddha knows, suits the disposition of Sakka in taking upon himself the proper practice.

Only when factors that ought not to be resorted to are made clear, do factors that ought to be resorted to become a mode of practice. This is the reason for the Buddha's discussion of the pairs of useless and useful factors in the present set of questions on the morality of restraint according to the Rules, just as in the previous set of questions on sensation.

In the present set of answers, only bodily conduct that should be adopted, verbal conduct that should be adopted, and the kind of quest that should be taken up, constitute the morality of restraint according to the Rules. The bodily conduct, the verbal conduct, and the quest that should not be resorted to are defiling factors, and they must first be seen as such by Sakka.

Regarding the kind of quest that should be taken up, it may be spoken of in connection with the course of action (kamma-patha) or in connection with the prescribed form of training precept.

1. The bodily conduct that should not be resorted to are the three evil bodily actions: killing, stealing and sexual misconduct. This is speaking in terms of courses of action. Physically committing the breach at the body-door of the moral precepts laid down by the Buddha constitutes bodily conduct that should not be adopted. This is speaking in terms of precept. Bodily conduct that should be adopted are: refraining from killing, refraining from stealing and refraining from sexual misconduct. This is speaking in terms of courses of action. Physically restraining at the body-door from transgressing the moral precepts laid down by the Buddha constitutes bodily conduct that should be adopted. This is speaking in terms of precept. The same distinction should be understood in respect of verbal conduct.
2. Verbally committing one of the four evil verbal actions, such as false speech, divisive, harsh and frivolous speech is verbal conduct that should not be adopted. Refraining from transgressing the four evil verbal actions in one's speech is verbal action that should be adopted.

3. Quest (pariyesana) involves physical and verbal actions. It is covered by bodily conduct and verbal conduct, except that in defining the eight precepts with right livelihood as the eighth (ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla),<sup>235</sup> the specific term quest needs to be mentioned because these eight precepts involve actions at the body-door and verbal-door, and not without effort. Quest is essentially the effort needed in making the quest.
4. Quest is of two kinds, ignoble and noble. The two kinds of quest are described in the Discourse on the Heap of Snares (Pāsarāsi-sutta, MN 26), which is also known as the Discourse on the Noble Quest (Ariya-pariyesana-sutta). The gist of the teaching is this: Where someone, who himself is subject to birth, ageing, death and destruction, seeks things animate, such as a wife, children, servants, cattle, poultry, etc., and inanimate, such as gold and silver, etc., which are also subject to birth, ageing and death, or, arising, decay and dissolution, this amounts to an ignoble quest (anariya-pariyesana), the quest that should not be taken up. If someone who is himself subject to birth, ageing and death, sees the fault in seeking things animate or inanimate, and seeks the deathless Nibbāna where no rebirth occurs, this is called a noble quest (ariya-pariyesana), and this is the quest that should be [974] taken up.
5. Explained in another way: There are five ways of seeking gains that are not proper for monastics, namely: 1) By scheming, such as creating a favourable or highly admirable impression of oneself with the lay supporters; 2) by flattering or extolling the lay supporters; 3) by hinting at a suitable occasion for making offerings; 4) by belittling the lay supporters for their alleged close-fistedness; and 5) by pursuing gain with gain by making gifts to lay supporters with the expectation of receiving offerings from them in return.

<sup>235</sup> Refraining from killing living creatures, taking what has not been given, sexual misconduct, false speech, divisive speech, harsh speech, frivolous speech and wrong livelihood.

There are also six places which a monastic should not resort to:

1. A spinster's house.
2. A hermaphrodite's house.
3. A liquor seller's house.
4. A prostitute's house.
5. A widow's or divorcee's house.
6. A monastery of female monastics.

Not resorting to the five ways of seeking gains mentioned above, the six places described above, and the 21 ways that are not allowable quests (anesanā), all these make up the kinds of quests that should not be taken up (anariya-pariyesana). Refraining from all these improper kinds of quest, and living on the food collected at the daily alms round, is a righteous way of seeking gains which constitutes a noble quest (ariya-pariyesana).

Where a certain bodily conduct is not to be resorted to, if it is an act of killing, the conduct is improper right from the beginning, such as the procuring of lethal weapons or poison, or any effort connected with it. In the case of bodily conduct that should be resorted to, all the actions connected with it are proper right from the beginning. If one is unable to perform a deed that should be resorted to, at least the intention should be made, for that intention may be carried through if circumstances permit, bringing it to a successful conclusion.

1. Bodily conduct that can cause a schism in the Saṅgha, like Devadatta's conduct, is improper conduct that should not be resorted to. Paying devotion to the Three Treasures twice or thrice a day, like the habit of Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, is conduct that should be resorted to.
2. Verbal conduct, such as giving orders to kill someone, like that of Devadatta sending marksmen on a mission of assassination, is conduct that should not be resorted to. Extolling the virtues of the Three Treasures, like the habit of Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, is verbal conduct that should be resorted to.

3. Ignoble quest, such as that of Devadatta, is quest that should not be taken up. Noble quest, such as that of Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, is a quest that should be taken up.

Whereas Sakka puts only one question concerning morality of restraint according to the Rules, the Buddha's answer is threefold: bodily conduct, verbal conduct and quest; the commentary speaks of it as three questions.

The Buddha's concluding statement. "A monastic who practises thus ..." purports to say that the monastic who refrains from bodily conduct, verbal conduct and quest that ought not be resorted to, and who takes up bodily conduct, verbal conduct and quest that should be taken up, is one who practises the supreme monastic practice of morality, incumbent on a monastic, which constitutes the necessary conditions that precedes the Arahāt fruition.

The Twelfth Question on Restraint of the Faculties

After receiving the Buddha's discourse with delight, Sakka put the next question: "Venerable sir, how does a monastic practise so as to keep his faculties well guarded?"

The Buddha answered as follows: "Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, there are two kinds of visible objects cognizable by the [975] eye, those that should be resorted to, and those that should not be resorted to. There are two kinds of sound cognizable by the ear ... two kinds of odour cognizable by the nose ... two kinds of taste cognizable by the tongue ... two kinds of tangible objects cognizable by the body ... two kinds of mental object made up of mind and matter cognizable by the mind, those that should be resorted to, and those that should not be resorted to."

When the Buddha had made this brief exposition, Sakka said to him: "Venerable sir, what the Fortunate One has said in brief, I understand the meaning at length as follows: Venerable sir, if a certain visible object, cognizable by the eye, tends to increase demeritoriousness and decrease meritoriousness, that visible object should not be resorted to. If, on the other hand, a certain visible object cognizable by the eye, tends to decrease demeritoriousness and increase meritoriousness, that visible object should be resorted to.

Venerable sir, if a certain sound cognizable by the ear ... a certain odour cognizable by the nose ... a certain taste cognizable by the tongue ... a certain tangible object cognizable by the body ... a certain thought about mind or matter, cognizable by the mind, tends to increase demeritoriousness and decreases meritoriousness, that thought should not be resorted to. If, on the other hand, a certain thought about mind or matter tends to decrease demeritoriousness and increase meritoriousness, that thought should be resorted to. Venerable sir, being able to understand the meaning in detail of what the Fortunate One has said briefly, I am now rid of all doubts; there is no uncertainty in me.”

Sakka had benefitted from the previous discourses of the Buddha on the three kinds of sensation and on the three kinds of what is to be resorted to and what should not be resorted to. When the present brief answer from the Buddha was given, he had the right understanding based on the Buddha's previous preachings and accordingly began to address the Buddha about his understanding.

The Buddha remained silent, allowing Sakka to go ahead with what he had to say about the meaning of the brief statements. It was not the custom of the Buddha to allow such a thing, if the hearer of a discourse is not competent enough to state how he understands it, or to allow a competent hearer, if he is not willing to come forward with an explanation of what he understands of it. Here Sakka was competent as well as willing, hence the Buddha's permission.

Now to elaborate on the various sense objects as to their worthiness or unworthiness:

1. If a certain visible object tends to arouse defilements such as attachment (rāga), in the mind of a monastic who sees it, that visible object is an unworthy one, and he should not look at it. If a certain visible object arouses in him a sense of repulsiveness, a perception of repulsiveness (asubha-saññā), or strengthens the conviction in him of the truth of the Dhamma, in the teaching, or arouses the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā), then that visible object is a worthy one, and he should look at it.
2. If a certain song, beautifully composed, that is heard by a monastic tends to arouse defilements such as attachment (rāga) in him, that sound is an unworthy one, and he should not listen to it. If, on the other hand, a certain song, even coming from a potter's girl, enables the monastic, who hears it, to reflect on the law of cause and effect and

[976] strengthens his conviction in the truth of the Dhamma, tending to disenchantment with sentient existence and thoughts of renunciation, then that sound is a worthy one, and he should listen to it.

3. If a certain odour tends to arouse defilements such as attachment (rāga) in the mind of a monastic who smells it, that odour is an unworthy one, and he should not smell it. If a certain odour causes the monastic who smells it, to gain a perception of loathsomeness of the body, that odour is a worthy one, and he should smell it.
4. If a certain taste tends to arouse defilements such as attachment (rāga) in the mind of a monastic who tastes it, that taste is an unworthy one, and he should not taste it. If a certain taste causes the monastic, who tastes it, to gain a perception of loathsomeness (āhāre paṭikūla-saññā) of the food swallowed or if it sustains him to gain the noble truth, like in the case of the novice Sīva, the nephew of Ven. Mahā Sīva, who became an Arahat while taking his meal, then that taste is worthy one, and he should eat it.

In this connection, we have looked for the name of novice Sīva in the sub-commentary and in the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) but do not find it. In the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga), there is, however, the story of novice Bhāgineyya Saṅgharakkhita who became an Arahat while taking his meal.

5. If a certain tangible object tends to arouse defilements such as attachment (rāga) in the mind of a monastic who touches it, that tangible object is an unworthy one, and he should not touch it. If a certain tangible object, which is proper for a monastic, causes the monastic still training himself to attain the Arahat fruition through exhaustion of the pollutants (āsava) completely, like in the case of Ven. Sāriputta, and so on, or is conducive to zeal, or serves as a good model for future monastics, then that tangible object should be resorted to.

It is noteworthy in this connection that many monastics during the Buddha's time denied themselves the luxury of lying down; for instance, Ven. Sāriputta never lay down on a bed for 30 whole years; Ven. Mahā Moggallāna for as many years; Ven. Mahā Kassapa for 120 years; Ven. Bākula for 80 years; Ven. Anuruddha for 50 years; Ven. Bhaddiya for 30 years; Ven. Soṇa for 18 years; Ven. Ānanda for 15 years; Ven. Raṭṭhapāla for 12 years; Ven. Rāhula for 12 years; and Ven. Nālaka, who practised moral perfection (moneyya) for as long as he lived.

6. If a certain Dhamma object about mind or matter tends to arouse defilements such as attachment (rāga) in the mind of a monastic who thinks about that object; or tends to arouse covetousness in him, that thought is an unworthy one, and he should not entertain such a thought. If a certain thought promotes kind feelings towards others, such as: “May all beings be well, be free from trouble, etc.,” as in the case of the three elders whose story is told below, that thought is a worthy one, and he should nurture such a thought, such a Dhamma object.

The Three Monastic Elders

Once, three elders made a vow among themselves on the eve of the Rains Retreat period not to indulge in demeritorious thoughts such as sensuous thoughts during the three month Rains Retreat (Vassa) period and decided to stay in a certain monastery for their Rains Retreat.

At the end of the Rains Retreat, on the Saṅgha assembly day, on the full moon of October (Assayuja), the Saṅgha elder who was the most senior of the three elders, put this question to the youngest of the three elders: “How far did you allow your mind to wander during the three months of the Rains Retreat?” To which, he replied: “Venerable sir, during these three months, I did not allow my mind to wander beyond the precincts of the monastery.” The monastic’s admission implied that his mind wandered sometimes within the monastery precincts, which may mean that he thought of visible objects that came into the monastery precincts, but since there were no female visitors, his mind had had no occasion to have unbridled thoughts. [977]

The Saṅgha elder then asked the second elder: “Friend, how far did you allow your mind to wander during the three months of the Rains Retreat?” To which the second elder replied: “Venerable sir, during these three months, I did not allow my mind to wander beyond my room.”

Then the two junior elders asked of the Saṅgha elder: “Venerable sir, how far did you allow your mind to wander during the three months of the Rains Retreat?” To which, the Saṅgha elder answered: “Friends, during these three months, I did not allow my mind to wander outside of my body.” That indeed was true, the Saṅgha elder did not do anything physically, verbally or mentally, without being mindful, without having first reflected on the action that he was about to undertake, so that there was no moment left for his thought to wander forth outside the body. The two junior elders said to the senior-most elder: “Venerable sir, you are wonderful!” The type of thought that occurred to these three elders is of the worthy type; a monastic may well entertain such thoughts.

The Thirteenth Question on the Various Elements

Thus having received the Buddha's discourse with delight, Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, further asked his next question: “Venerable sir, do all ascetics and Brahmins have the same teaching, the same practice, the same view, and the same ultimate goal?”

To this, the Buddha replied: “Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, not all the ascetics and Brahmins have the same teaching, the same practice, the same view, and the same goal.”

Herein, Sakka puts this question because he has known, prior to his becoming a noble one (ariya), that the so-called ascetics and Brahmins have diverse teaching, practices, views and goals which he now understands as vain. He wants to know the reasons why there are such a diversity of teachings, practices, views and goals among them.

Sakka further asked: “Venerable sir, what is the reason for the diversity of teachings, practices, views, and goals among the ascetics and Brahmins?”

And the Buddha replied: “Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, beings in this sentient world are of various dispositions. Whatever attracts their fancy, these beings hold on to it, firmly believing it to be the only truth, and rejecting all other views as vain. That is why all the ascetics and Brahmins have no common teaching, no common practice, no common view, and no common goal.”

Individual dispositions differ among persons. When one wants to go, another wants to stand; when one wants to stand, another wants to lie down. It is difficult to find two individuals of the same disposition. If dispositions differ among one another, regarding even postures, how could views, practices and teachings be the same among them? The Buddha points out this diversity as the reason for the differences in teachings, practices, views and goals among ascetics and Brahmins.

The Fourteenth Question on the Final Crossing Over

Further, Sakka asked this question to the Buddha: [978] “Venerable sir, do all ascetics and Brahmins attain the indestructible Nibbāna, where they can find refuge, and where all bonds are overcome? Do all of them practise the noble (ariya) path which is the right practice for the attainment of the indestructible? Do they have the indestructible as the final goal?”

Sakka's question is about Nibbāna as the ultimate reality, and about whether holders of diverse views take up the practice of the noble path to attain Nibbāna.

The Buddha answered: “Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, not all ascetics and Brahmins attain the indestructible Nibbāna, where they can find refuge and where all bonds are overcome. Not all of them practise the noble path which is the right practice for the attainment of Nibbāna; nor have the indestructible as their final goal.”

Since individual dispositions differ among the so-called ascetics and Brahmins, their teachings, practices, views and goals differ. Therefore, how could they attain Nibbāna, the ultimate reality, as their common goal? The Buddha makes this clear in his reply that only those who practise the noble path can attain Nibbāna.

Sakka then put his last question thus: “Venerable sir, what is the reason that not all ascetics and Brahmins attain the indestructible Nibbāna, where they can find refuge, and where all bonds are overcome? Why is it that they do not practise the noble path which is the right practice for the attainment of the indestructible? Why is it that not all of them have the indestructible as their final goal?”

And the Fortunate One replied: “Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, those monastics who are free from defilements through the noble path which causes the extinction of craving attain the indestructible Nibbāna where they find refuge and where all bonds are overcome. They are the ones who practise the noble path which is the right practice to attain Nibbāna, the indestructible. They have the indestructible Nibbāna as their final goal. Not all ascetics and Brahmins attain the indestructible Nibbāna where they find refuge and where all bonds are overcome, because not all of them practise the noble path which is the right path to attain the indestructible Nibbāna. Not all of them have the indestructible Nibbāna as their final goal.”

39b: Sakka's Questions – 1450

Thus took place a verbal exchange between the noblest of noble ones (ariya) and Sakka, a noble one (ariya), on the subject of Nibbāna, the ultimate reality. They spoke the language of the noble ones which is as magnificent as a fully blossomed Sāla tree. For us worldlings, that language and its meanings are not comprehensible because our field of knowledge does not go beyond the sense faculties. In other words, our range of perception is limited to our senses only. The point the Buddha makes here is that only Arahats, who have been liberated from defilements through the path that destroys craving, attain Nibbāna, the ultimate reality. Not all ascetics and Brahmins attain Nibbāna. The Buddha's teaching has Nibbāna, the ultimate reality, as its culmination. Hence, when the question of Nibbāna has been dealt with fully, there is an end of all questions.

On hearing the Buddha's reply, Sakka was delighted and said: "Venerable sir, that indeed is so. O Fortunate One, that indeed is so. Having learnt the Fortunate One's answer, I am free of all doubts about this question. I have no uncertainties now!" [979]

After receiving the Buddha's discourse with much delight, Sakka, the Lord of the Devas said to him: "Venerable sir, craving is a disease, an open sore, a dart or thorn. Craving attracts all beings back into endless existences, thereby sending them now to high planes of existence and then to low planes of existence.

Venerable sir, whatever question I did not have the opportunity to ask of the so-called ascetics and Brahmins outside this teaching, the Fortunate One has given me the answer. The Fortunate One has by this answer cleared all the darts of doubt that had long been troubling me."

The Buddha then asked Sakka: "Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, do you remember having put these questions to other ascetics and Brahmins?"

"Yes, I do, venerable sir."

"What were their answers? If it is not too much trouble, may I know?"

"When the Fortunate One, or someone as great as the Fortunate One, sits before me, there is no trouble for me to answer."

"Very well, then Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, let us hear what you have to say."

"Venerable sir, I have put these questions to those ascetics and Brahmins whom I took for forest dwellers. They were not only unable to answer my questions but even asked me who I was that I could ask such profound questions. I said I was Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, and then they were interested and asked me what merit I had acquired to become Sakka. I told them the seven meritorious deeds, as I had learned them, that lead to becoming Sakka. Then they were greatly pleased, saying: 'We have seen Sakka in person, and we have also got Sakka's answer to our questions!' Indeed, venerable sir, those ascetics and Brahmins were merely my pupils. I had never been their pupil.

Venerable sir, I am now a noble (ariya) disciple of the Fortunate One, a Stream-enterer, who is forever safe against the four miserable existences of the downfall (apāya) and whose fortunate destiny is thus assured, and who is on the way to the three higher paths."

The Satisfaction of Sakka

Then the Buddha asked Sakka whether he had previously experienced such delightful satisfaction of this nature. Sakka replied: "Yes, venerable sir, I remember having experienced such delightful satisfaction of this nature previously."

"What kind of delightful satisfaction do you remember having experienced before?"

"Venerable sir, in the past, there took place a great battle between the Devas of Tāvātimsa and those of the Asuras. The Tāvātimsa Devas were the victors. Then, as victor, I was very glad to reflect on the fact that the Tāvātimsa Devas would now have the special privilege of enjoying both their own food pertaining to the Tāvātimsa Realm as well as the food pertaining to the Asura realm. However, venerable sir, my delightful satisfaction, then, was pleasure bolstered up with armed might. It was not helpful for disenchantment with the wheel of existence, for destroying desire, for cessation of the round of rebirth, for abandoning attachment, for special apperception, for an understanding of the four truths, for the realization of Nibbāna.

Venerable sir, the delightful satisfaction that I now have, on hearing the Fortunate One's discourse, is of a superior kind that does not need bolstering up with armed might. It is indeed conducive to disenchantment with the wheel of existence, to destroying desire, to cessation of the round of rebirth, to abandoning attachment, to special apperception, to an understanding of the four truths, to the realization of Nibbāna." [980]

Then the Buddha asked: “Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, what benefits do you see in your present status so that you speak of its great delight?”

“Venerable sir, I see six great benefits in my present noble state and that is why I extol it so much. The six are:

Idheva tiṭṭha-mānassa, Deva-bhūtaṃ me sato, puna-r-āyu ca me laddho, evaṃ jānāhi mārisa.

Venerable one, who is free from suffering, even while I have been listening to your discourse in this Indasāla Cave, I have been reborn as Sakka, by the name of Maghava, and will live 36 million years, by human reckoning, in the Tāvatiṃsa Realm. May the venerable one, who is free from suffering, take note of it. Venerable sir, this is the first benefit that is behind my extolling my noble state.

Cutāhaṃ diviyā kāyā, āyuraṃ hitvā amānusaṃ, amūḷho gabbhaṃ-essāmi, yattha me ramatī mano.

Venerable one, who is free from suffering, when I die from the Deva existence and have relinquished the 36 million years' life, by human reckoning, of Tāvatiṃsa Deva existence, I shall, without any bewilderment at death, be reborn in the human world in a high class or clan of my own preference, venerable sir, this is the second benefit that is behind my extolling my noble state.

When a noble one (ariya) passes away and takes another rebirth, he is never in a bewildered state. Mindful and with clear comprehension, he passes away from one existence to another, which is always in a fortunate destination. If reborn in the human world, he always belongs to the royal warrior caste or Brahmin caste. Sakka has a desire for such noble birth when he reappears as a human being.

Svāhaṃ amūḷha-paññaṃ, vihaṃ Sāsane rato, ñāyena viharissāmi, sampajāno paṭissato.

Venerable one, who is free from suffering, taking delight in the teaching of the Perfectly Awakened One, enjoying physical health I will dwell in mindfulness and clear comprehension befitting a noble one. Venerable sir, this is the third benefit that is behind my extolling my noble state.

Ñāyena me carato ca, Sambodhi ce bhavissati, aññatā viharissāmi, sveva anto bhavissati.

Venerable one, who is free from suffering, in me who thus dwells in the noble practice of a noble one, if Once-returning (Sakadāgāmi-magga) arises, then, to gain still higher path-knowledge of the Non-returner (Anāgāmi-magga) and the Arahāt path (Arahatta-magga), I shall dwell in still further practice of the path. When Once-returning (Sakadāgāmi-magga) is attained that will be my last human existence. Venerable sir, this is the fourth benefit that lies behind my extolling my noble state.

Cutāhaṃ mānusā kāyā, āyurū hitvāna mānusarū, puna devo bhavissāmi, Deva-lokamhi uttamo.

Venerable one, who is free from suffering, when I pass away from human existence and leave behind the human body, relinquishing the human life, I shall be reborn in the Tāvātimsa Deva [981] realm as the Lord of Devas. Venerable sir, this is the fifth benefit that lies behind my extolling my noble state.

Te paṇṭita-tarā devā, Akaniṭṭhā yasassino, antime vatta-mānamhi, so nivāso bhavissati.

Venerable one, free from suffering, those Devas, the noble Brahmas of the Akaniṭṭhā realm, the topmost of the planes of existence, are superior in all respects, such as lifespan and knowledge, to all other Devas and Brahmas. They have a big following. When I have my last existence, I shall be reborn in that Akaniṭṭhā Brahma realm. Venerable sir, this is the sixth benefit that lies behind my noble state.

The six benefits that Sakka enjoys on hearing the discourse in the Indasāla Cave are:

1. Attaining Stream-entry at Indasāla cave; passing away and instant rebirth, also at Indasāla cave, as Sakka again.
2. On passing away from that Sakka existence, rebirth in a noble lineage in the human world in a non-bewildered state, his path to final Awakening as an Arahāt being limited to seven existences only.
3. Continued practice of the path in his future existences without bewilderment.
4. Attaining Once-returning (Sakadāgāmi-magga) in a human existence which will be his last human existence.
5. On passing away from that last human existence, being destined to become Sakka for the third time.

39b: Sakka's Questions – 1454

6. Attaining Non-returning (Anāgāmi-magga) as Sakka, and being reborn in progressively higher existences in the five Pure Brahma realms namely: Aviha realm, Atappa realm, Sudassa realm, Sudassī realm, Akaniṭṭhā realm; and to become an Arahāt in the Akaniṭṭhā realm.

The sixth benefit, which is to result in rebirth in the five Brahma realms should be noted here particularly for the immense durations of sublime existence in the pure abodes: As a Non-returner (Anāgāmi-puggala), Sakka will enjoy the ecstasy of a pure Brahma in the Aviha realm for 1,000 aeons (mahā-kappa); passing away from that realm, he will be reborn in the Atappa realm for 2,000 aeons; then in the Sudassa realm for 4,000 aeons; then in the Sudassī realm for 8,000 aeons; and finally, in the Akaniṭṭhā realm for 16,000 aeons. Thus he will enjoy a total of 31,000 aeons of ecstasy in a Brahma existence.

In the matter of the kind of extraordinarily prolonged existence full of ecstasy there are only three that are outstanding as noble (ariya) disciples under Buddha Gotama's teaching: Sakka, Anāthapiṇḍika and Visākhā. They enjoy a similar lifespan.

Sakka concluded with these words: "Venerable sir, it is because I see these six benefits that I extol the delightful satisfaction of my attainment."

Then Sakka repeated his former experience with the forest-dwelling ascetics and Brahmins who failed to answer his questions, but how he had to teach them the seven modes of conduct leading one to become a Sakka. Then he sang in praise of the Buddha in the following verses:

Taṅhā-sallassa hantāraṃ, Buddhaṃ appaṭipuggalaṃ, ahaṃ vande Mahā-vīraṃ, Buddham-ādicca-bandhunaṃ.

To the Buddha, the unrivalled one, knower of the four truths, kinsman of the sun, having Gotama clan as common lineage, or, in another sense, being father of the sun in the propagation of the supermundane, the one possessed of great endeavour, who has destroyed all the darts of craving, the Perfectly Awakened One, I make my obeisance with raised [982] palms.

Yaṃ karomasi brahmuno, samaṃ devehi mārisa, Tad-ajja tuyhaṃ kassāma, handa sāmāṃ karoma te.

Venerable one, who is free from suffering, formerly we paid our tribute to Brahma, as with other Devas; but from today onwards, we shall give our offerings to you. Now, we pay our obeisance to you!

Tvam-eva asi Sambuddho, tuvaṃ Satthā anuttaro, Sadevakasmiṃ lokasmiṃ, natthi te paṭipuggalo.

Venerable one, who is free from suffering, you alone are the Perfectly Awakened One, teacher of Devas and humans. There is none to equal you, in personal glory or in the embodiment of the Dhamma in all the worlds of sentient beings including the world of Devas.

After singing in praise of the Buddha in those three verses, Sakka said to Pañcasikha: “Pañcasikha, through your good offices, we have the privilege of seeing the Arahāt, the Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddha. I am greatly indebted to you for this. I appoint you to your father's office as chief of the Gandhabbas. You will be the next chief of the Gandhabbas. I also betroth you to Sūriyavachasā, the maiden of exquisite features whom you deeply yearn for.”

Sakka's Joyous Utterance

After that, Sakka was so glad that he slapped the good earth as though a person were to slap his friend's arm in intimate affection and uttered these words of joyous expression thrice:

Namo tassa Bhagavato Arahato Sammā-sambuddhassa

Homage to the Fortunate One, the Worthy One, the Perfectly Self-Awakened

In this connection, Sakka slapped the good earth because he attained the supermundane, while he remained on the earth and also because this great earth has produced such a marvellous personage as the Buddha, so that he had a profound regard for the good earth.

After listening to the Buddha's answers, Sakka acquired the eye of the Dhamma, being able to dispel certain defilements and thereby understand that: “Whatever is in the nature of arising, that has the nature of perishing.” He thus attained Stream-entry, as also did the 80,000 Devas who were in his company then.

This discourse, being a series of answers to questions given by Sakka, is known as Sakka's Questions. [983]

40a: The Last Days 1, In Magadha

As we have said earlier on, the Buddha spent the first 20 Rains Retreats (Vassa) at various places, and taught the noble doctrine that led to the liberation of the multitudes and spent the latter 24 Rains Retreat in Sāvattthī only. After the end of the Rains Retreat, he set out on journeys of three kinds and tamed those worthy of taming. The number of discourses and dialogues are as varied as they are wide so that they cannot be treated fully within the confines of this work.

Just as a drop or two of sea water would suffice to understand that the sea is salty, so also in this book, only a few examples from the discourses can be given that should give the reader a fair idea of the richness of the doctrine. Scholars, who wish to gain further knowledge from the Buddha's extensive teachings, are advised to read from the translations of the canon, with the help of the commentaries and sub-commentaries. We shall henceforth confine our narrative to the events and discourses that belong to the period extending from around the 44th Rains Retreat onwards which was the period close to his realization of Parinibbāna.

At one time, when the Buddha had completed his 44th Rains Retreat the Buddha of illustrious attributes was staying at the mountain abode, up on Gijjakuṭa Hill, near Rājagaha.

The place name Gijjakuṭa means Vulture Peak and was probably derived from the shape of the peak, or from the fact that it was the roosting place of vultures.

King Ajātasattu and the Vajjians

At that time, King Ajātasattu of Rājagaha was keen on invading Vesālī, the country of the Licchavīs. "I will exterminate them however powerful and mighty they may be, play havoc with them, cause their ruin," he kept saying, being a haughty monarch, as he was.

The reason for his deep-seated hatred of the Licchavīs could be traced to some unhappy incidents: Rājagaha and Vesālī were two flourishing cities on either side of the river Ganges which flowed east, with Rājagaha on the southern side and Vesālī on the northern side. There was a caravan station known as Paṭṭanagāma, the present-day Patna, which was around that place. With Paṭṭanagāma in the middle, the region extending about half a league came under the domain of King Ajātasattu while the region of the same extent towards the other side of that region came under the domain of the Licchavīs.

There were rich deposits of precious materials on the hillside near Paṭṭanagama. As King Ajātasattu learnt about the treasures and was making plans to go there, the Licchavīs reached there first and took away all the treasures. When King Ajātasattu arrived and learnt that the Licchavīs had taken them, he went back home in great fury.

In the following year too, the Licchavīs were ahead of King Ajātasattu in getting there and enjoyed the find. King Ajātasattu's anger knew no bounds. He was obsessed with the thought of exterminating, destroying and ruining the mighty Licchavīs. In all his four bodily postures he cursed them aloud. He even went so far as giving orders to his men to plan an expedition.

On second thoughts, however, he restrained his action. “War is disastrous for both sides. There is no clash of arms that does not result in loss of life and property. By taking wise counsel, I may avoid harsh consequences. There is no one in the world greater in wisdom than the Buddha. Just now the Buddha is staying near my city, on a mountain abode at Gijjakuṭa Hill. I shall send a minister to him and seek his advice about my [984] proposed expedition. If my plan is of any benefit to me, he will remain silent; if it is against my own good, he would say: “What good is it for the king to go on such an expedition?”

Reflecting thus, he said to the Brahmin Vassakāra, his chief minister: “Here, Brahmin, go to the Fortunate One. Pay homage at his feet and convey my message. Enquire after his health whether the Fortunate One is free from any affliction and disease, whether he is well and fit and at ease. Say to the Fortunate One: ‘Venerable sir, King Ajātasattu of Magadha, son of Queen Vedehī, pays homage at your feet. He enquires after the Fortunate One's health, whether the Fortunate One is free from affliction and disease, whether the Fortunate One is well and fit and at ease.’ Then say to him: ‘Venerable sir, the king wishes to make war against the Vajjī princes, the Licchavīs of Vesālī, and is making declarations that he will exterminate the Vajjī princes, however powerful and mighty they might be, and that he will play havoc with them and cause their ruin.’ And then carefully note what the Fortunate One says and report it back to me. The Fortunate One never speaks falsely.”

“Very well, your majesty,” said the Brahmin Vassakāra and he went to the Gijjakuṭa Hill amidst a splendid formation of carriages. Once there, he descended from the carriage, and approached the Buddha, and after exchanging greetings and concluding courteous words of felicitation, sat at a suitable distance. Then he said to the Buddha: “Revered Gotama, King Ajātasattu of Magadha, son of Queen Vedehī, pays homage at your feet. He enquires after your health, whether you are free from affliction and disease, whether you are well and fit, and whether you are well and at ease. Revered Gotama, King Ajātasattu wishes to make war against the Vajjī princes, the Licchavīs of Vesālī, and is making declarations that he will exterminate the Vajjī princes, play havoc with them, and cause their ruin.”

At that time, Ven. Ānanda was at the back of the Buddha, fanning him.

In this connection it may be pointed out that the Buddhas, by virtue of their infinite merit, do not feel too cold nor too hot. Ānanda’s fanning the Buddha was merely an act of veneration.

Seven Factors of Growth and Non-Decline for Kings

The First Factor of Growth and Non-Decline

When the Buddha had heard the Brahmin’s words he did not say anything to him but entered into a dialogue with Ven. Ānanda, saying: “Ānanda, do the Vajjian princes hold meetings frequently? Do they have meetings many times? What have you heard?” – “Venerable sir, I have heard that the Vajjian princes hold meetings frequently, and that they have meetings many times.” – “Ānanda, so long as the Vajjī princes assemble frequently and have many meetings, they are bound to prosper; there is no reason for their decline.”

“Frequent meetings,” means three or more meetings every day. “They have meetings many times,” means never skipping a day without a meeting.

The advantages of frequent meetings is that fresh information is always forthcoming from the eight directions. If up-to-date information is not forthcoming, unrest at remote places and border areas might go unnoticed at the capital; so also breach of law and order in the country might not be duly reported. If no prompt action is taken against lawless elements this will be taken as laxity on the part of those in authority and the law and order situation will deteriorate. This is a sure way of decline for rulers.

If, on the other hand, frequent meetings are held, up-to-date information from all over the country can reach the capital and prompt action can be taken whenever necessary. The bad people will then know that they do not stand any chance against this sort of efficient administration and will disperse. This is a sure way of prosperity for rulers. [985]

The Second Factor of Growth and Non-Divide

“Ānanda, do the Vajjian princes assemble in harmony and do they disperse in harmony? Do they act in harmony in discharging their duties in the affairs of the Vajjian country? What have you heard?” – “Venerable sir, I have heard that the Vajjian princes assemble in harmony and disperse in harmony, and that they act in harmony in discharging their duties in the affairs of the Vajjian country.” – “Ānanda, so long as the Vajjian princes assemble and disperse in harmony and act in harmony in discharging their duties in the affairs of the Vajjian country, they are bound to prosper; there is no reason for their decline.”

“To assemble in harmony,” means never appearing late at the appointed hour of meeting on any excuse. When the time for the meeting is announced by gong or by bell, all turn up in time, leaving aside whatever activities they may be engaged in. If one happens to be taking his meal, he must leave the table at once in the middle of his meal; if one happens to be dressing himself, he must attend the meeting even though not fully dressed yet.

“To disperse in harmony,” means leaving the meeting chamber all at the same time after the meeting has concluded. If some have left the meeting chamber and others were to remain, the ones who have gone might harbour suspicion against those who remain, with the uneasy thought that they stay behind to make important decisions behind their back. This sort of suspicious speculation is poisonous for the ruler’s mind.

In another sense: “To disperse in harmony,” means to be keen to undertake what is to be undertaken, as the follow up action consequent to the deliberations and decisions at the meeting. For example, if a rebellion needs to be quelled and someone is to take charge, everyone is eager to shoulder the responsibility.

“Harmony in discharging duties,” means rendering every possible assistance to one another. For example, if one of the members is found to be falling short of his duty, the others would send their sons or brothers to render help. Where a visitor needs to be entertained, the responsibility is not shirked but all join in the task. In meeting their individual social obligations too, whether for happy occasions or sad occasions, all the members act as one whole family.

The Third Factor of Growth and Non-Decline

“Ānanda, do Vajjian princes abstain from enacting ordinances that have not been enacted previously, and do they abstain from revoking what has been enacted previously, and do they follow the time-honoured Vajjian traditions and practices? What have you heard?” – “Venerable sir, I have heard that the Vajjian princes abstain from enacting ordinances that have not been enacted previously, and that they follow the time-honoured Vajjian traditions and practices.” – “Ānanda, so long as the Vajjian princes abstain from enacting ordinances that have not been enacted previously, and abstain from revoking what has been enacted previously, and follow the time-honoured Vajjian traditions and practices, they are bound to prosper; there is no reason for their decline.”

“Enacting ordinances,” means imposing taxes and fines. Not imposing fresh taxes and fines that were not done before, and not revoking traditional taxes and fines is an important principle for rulers. Whenever fresh taxes and fines are enacted the people naturally resent it. They may even feel that they are fleeced and in that case they may leave the country in disgust and turn to robbery and crime in remote places, or some of the discontented may join gangs of bandits, cause strife in out of the way areas.

Revoking traditional taxes and fines will result in loss of revenue. This will render the [986] rulers unable to meet state expenditures. The armed forces and civil servants will have reductions in their remuneration. This will lower their efficiency and the standards of their services will fall, affecting the might of the army.

“Following Vajjian traditions and practices,” means acting in accordance with the traditional code of justice. For instance, execution of accused persons without trial is a flagrant disregard of tradition and practice.

If the time-honoured Vajjian traditions and practices are disregarded and people are executed without trial, relatives of the victims of injustice will bear grudges against the rulers. They may go to remote places and resort to crime themselves or may join gangs of bandits and roam the country. These are causes of decline for rulers.

In a country where the ordinances enacted are the same ones that have been traditionally enacted, the people will accept them without murmur. They will feel happy about their obligations and go about their normal activities such as agriculture and trading.

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji – 1461

Where rulers do not revoke traditional taxes and fines their revenues in kind and in money are flowing in every day. The armed forces and civil servants enjoy their usual remuneration as they are properly provided for and made happy. Their services remain as trustworthy and dependable as in the olden days.

In the Vajjian system of justice, there were stages of careful scrutiny in the administration of criminal justice. When a man was brought before the authorities and was accused of theft, he was not put into custody but was properly examined. If there was no proof of theft, he was allowed to go. If someone was suspected of a crime, he was handed to the officials of the justice department where he was given a proper hearing, and if found not guilty, he was released. If the judges suspected him of the crime, he was referred to a panel of learned persons who were well versed in social ethics. If the panel of learned persons found him not guilty he was released. If they considered him not free of fault, he was then referred to a review board of eight jurors who belonged to the eight categories of families with an honourable tradition and who were free from the four kinds of improper official conduct. If the review board found him not guilty, he was released, but if he was not free from blame, he was committed to the king through the commander-in chief and the heir-apparent. If the king found him not guilty, he was released. If he was not free from blame, the traditional criminal code was read in his presence. The code contained specific descriptions of acts of crimes with specific punishments attached to them. The king ascertained the nature of the crime the man had committed that answered the description in the list of crimes in the code, and the prescribed punishment was meted out to him.

The observance of the Vajjian tradition described above was very reassuring to the people. When one of their kith and kin was punished for a crime the people did not blame the Vajjian princes. They knew the king had dispensed justice and that the fault lay with the perpetrator only. Being satisfied that they had full protection of the law, they went about their normal business honestly. This adherence to the time-honoured system of justice is thus a factor of progress for rulers.

The Fourth Factor of Growth and Non-Degradation

“Ānanda, do Vajjian princes treat their elders with courteous regard, deference, esteem and veneration, and do they consider that the advice of elderly people is worth listening to? What have you heard?” – “Venerable sir, I have heard that the Vajjian princes do treat their elders with regard, deference, esteem and reverence, and that they consider the advice of elderly people is worth listening to.” – “Ānanda, so long as the Vajjian princes treat their elders with regard, deference, esteem, and veneration, and consider that the advice of elderly people is worth listening to, they are bound to prosper; there is no reason for their decline.”

The terms: “Regard, deference, esteem and veneration,” all denote a deep sense of respect, indebtedness, genuine affection and humility. “To listen to their advice,” means to seek their counsel twice or thrice every day.

If young princes do not have a sense of respect for their elders and do not go to them for advice, they will be ignored by the elders, and lacking proper guidance, they will tend to [987] indulge themselves in sensual pleasures and forget their princely duties, thus leading to their ruin.

Where princes hold their elders in esteem, the latter will advise them on state craft, pointing out the traditional practices. In military strategy, they have practical experience so that in a given situation they can give sound guidance, such as how to advance, and how to retreat. Drawing on the rich experience and mature wisdom of their elders, the princes can thus carry on their proud tradition, perpetuating their national glory.

The Fifth Factor of Growth and Non-Decline

“Ānanda, do the Vajjian princes refrain from carrying away by force women and girls, and keeping them? What have you heard?” – “Venerable sir, I have heard that the Vajjian princes do not carry away by force women and girls, and keep them.” – “Ānanda, so long as the Vajjian princes refrain from carrying away by force women and girls, and keeping them, they are bound to prosper, there is no reason for their decline.”

Herein, where the rulers forcibly take any woman or girl without consent, the people will be very angry. “They have taken away a mother from our house!” “They have taken away our girl whom we have nurtured with such great devotion!” “They have kept them at the palace!” People will complain. They will leave the country, go to the remote regions and become criminals themselves, or they may join gangs of bandits and roam the country. This is a cause of decline for rulers.

Where the rulers do not forcibly take away women and girls and keep them, the people are free from molestation and anxiety and they go about their usual business. They contribute to the wealth of the rulers. So, restraint of rulers is a factor for their progress.

The Sixth Factor of Growth and Non-Decline

“Ānanda, do the Vajjian princes hold in respect, reverence, honour and veneration their traditional shrines within and without the city? Do they see to it that appropriate offerings and oblations are made at those shrines as of yore, without remiss? What have you heard?” – “Venerable sir, I have heard that the Vajjian princes hold in respect, reverence, honour, and veneration their traditional shrines within and without the city. They see to it that appropriate offerings and oblations are made at those shrines as of yore, without remiss.” – “Ānanda, so long as the Vajjian princes hold in respect, reverence, honour, and veneration their traditional shrines within and without the city, and see to it that appropriate offerings and oblations are made at those shrines as of yore, without remiss, they are bound to prosper; there is no reason for their decline.”

Where the rulers do not venerate the traditional shrines whether inside or outside of the city and are remiss in making the customary offerings and oblations that are due to them, the guardian spirits do not afford them protection. Although the guardian spirits are not able to cause fresh misfortune to the people, they can aggravate the existing misfortune such as a worsening in coughs and headaches. In times of war, they do not join forces against the enemy. Thus the rulers stand to meet with decline.

Where rulers do not neglect the customary offerings and oblations that are due to guardian spirits at the traditional shrines, the latter give them protection. Although the guardian spirits are not able to bring fresh fortunes to the people, they can attenuate the existing misfortune such as causing immediate relief in coughs and headaches. In times of war, they join forces with the local combatants. They may cause delusion in the enemy, thinking that the local army is twice or thrice its actual numbers; or they may show up terrifying sights before the enemy. Keeping the traditional guardian spirits in a good mood through customary offerings and oblations is therefore a factor of prosperity for rulers. [988]

The Seventh Factor of Growth and Non-Decline

“Ānanda, do the Vajjian princes see to it that Arahats are given suitable protection and security so that those Arahats who have not yet visited the Vajjian country may go, and so that those Arahats who have already arrived may live in the Vajjian country in a genial atmosphere? What have you heard?” – “Venerable sir, I have heard that the Vajjian princes make careful provisions for the protection of and security for Arahats so that those Arahats who have not yet visited the Vajjian country may go, and so that those Arahats who have already arrived may live in the Vajjian country in a genial atmosphere.” – “Ānanda, so long as the Vajjian princes see to it that Arahats are given suitable protection and security so that those Arahats who have not yet visited the Vajjian country may go, and so that those Arahats, who have already arrived may live in the Vajjian country in a genial atmosphere, they are bound to prosper; there is no reason for their decline.”

In this matter: “Protection,” means necessary measures to ensure safety and “security,” means safeguarding the peaceful and friendly atmosphere. For noble persons, their protection and security need not be provided using a powerful armed guard. What is needed is to make sure that annoyance is not caused to these noble ones by such improper ways as felling of trees near their monastery, hunting or fishing in the vicinity. Careful provisions for the protection and security are intended to guarantee a genial atmosphere for Arahats. They reflect the friendly attitude of the Vajjian princes towards the noble ones.

Where the rulers of a country do not have a friendly attitude towards Arahats who have not yet visited their country, it is due to their lack of faith in the Three Treasures. In that case when monastics visit their country they would not welcome them, would not go to them and pay homage, would not converse with them cordially, would not ask questions concerning the doctrine, would not listen to their discourse, would not make offerings to them, would not hear the joyous remarks of the recipient monastics, and would not arrange for their stay. They earn the reputation that such and such a ruler has no faith in the Three Treasures as when monastics visited their country, they would not welcome them ... would not arrange for their stay. Due to this ill-repute, monastics do not travel near the city gate of such a ruler, and if they cannot avoid using the road that passes by the city of that ruler, they would not enter the city. And thus there is no arrival of Arahats, who have not yet visited that city.

If those monastics, who have already visited that city, do not find a genial atmosphere, the monastics will feel that they have visited a wrong place. “Who would live in such an unfriendly city where the rulers are so disrespectful?” they would say, and leave the place. Where a place is shunned by monastics due to non-arrival of monastics and departure of monastics who have already visited there, the place becomes devoid of monastics. Where monastics do not stay guardian spirits do not stay either.

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji – 1465

Where guardian spirits do not stay demons have the run of the place. Where the demons thrive strange diseases that are not known previously are caused by them. Opportunity for earning merit on account of seeing virtuous persons, seeking answers to doctrinal points, etc., is lost. This state of affairs is a cause of decline for rulers.

The happy consequences of caring for the virtuous may be understood on the basis of the above unhappy consequences arising out of a lack of such care.

Then the Buddha said to the Brahmin Vassakāra, chief minister of Magadha: “Brahmin, on one occasion I taught the Vajjian princes these seven principles of progress while I was staying at the Sārandada shrine in Vesālī. Brahmin, so long as these seven factors of growth and non-decline remain with the Vajjian princes, and so long as the Vajjian princes carefully abide by these seven principles, they are bound to prosper; there is no reason for their decline.”

Then the Brahmin Vassakāra replied to the Buddha: “Revered Gotama, careful abidance to just one of those factors of growth would ensure the prosperity of the Vajjian princes, allowing no cause whatsoever for their decline. How much more so, if they carefully abide [989] by all the seven factors! Revered Gotama, it is not likely that King Ajātasattu will conquer the Vajjian country simply by making war upon it unless he can successfully seduce the Vajji princes or sow seeds of dissension among them. O revered Gotama, we shall go now. We have many affairs to attend to.” – “Brahmin, you know the time to go.” Then the Brahmin Vassakāra, being greatly pleased with the Buddha’s words, expressed his delight, rose from his seat and departed.

The Sārandada shrine was a pre-Buddhist shrine set up to propitiate a Yakkha of that name. With the advent of the Buddha, a monastery was built on the site, hence the monastery was known as Sārandada shrine.

The Brahmin’s suggestion of seduction was meant to resort to acts of friendliness towards the enemy with lavish presents and messages of goodwill and amity. When the enemy was led into thinking that Ajātasattu was a real friend and remained unprepared for war, then only the chief minister would advise the king to attack.

His second idea of sowing seeds of dissension also was another strategy to weaken the enemy. Both of these ideas flowed out of the Buddha’s seven factors of growth. It might be asked: “Did the Fortunate One know that the Brahmin Vassakāra would benefit from the discourse?”

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji – 1466

The answer is, “Yes.” – “Then why did the Fortunate One make the discourse?” He made the discourse out of compassion for the Vajjian princes.

To elaborate: The Buddha knew with his supreme wisdom that if he did not give the discourse to the Brahmin, King Ajātasattu would invade the Licchavī country, capture the Licchavī princes and destroy them in two or three days time. By giving the discourse, King Ajātasattu would first use the strategy of sowing dissension among the Licchavī princes and move to destroy them only after three years.

Three more years of survival would provide the Licchavīs opportunities for more meritorious deeds that would establish them in good stead. Hence the discourse was given out of great compassion by the Buddha.

The Fall of Vesālī

When Brahmin Vassakāra returned from the Buddha and got back to the palace King Ajātasattu asked him: “Brahmin, what did the Fortunate One say?” – “Your majesty, according to Buddha Gotama, the Vajjians cannot be captured unless through deceit or through causing disunity amongst them.” – “If we employ deceit, we shall have to suffer losses in our armed forces. We had better try to cause disunity amongst them. But Brahmin, how should we go about it?”

“In that case, hold a meeting at the palace and announce your intention to make war with the Vajjians. Then I shall pretend to disapprove of the idea and leave the council chamber. At that, you should feign anger with me and blame me openly. Thereafter, I shall send gifts to the Vajjians in open daylight which you should promptly find out and confiscate. Then branding me as a traitor, you should, instead of inflicting physical punishment, appear to choose to disgrace me, shave my head and expel me from the city. Then I shall speak out defiant words to the effect that: ‘I know the defence system of your city; I will lead the Vajjians to destroy the city walls and ransack the city.’ At those impertinent words from me you should show great anger and order my immediate departure.” King Ajātasattu carried out Vassakāra’s scheme in detail. [990]

The Licchavī princes learnt that Vassakāra had left Rājagaha. But they had fear of him as he was known as a crooked person. “Let him not cross the Ganges to our shore,” they protested strongly. However, some of the Licchavīs said: “Vassakāra is in his plight because he spoke in our defence.” So the Licchavīs allowed the Brahmin to cross the Ganges.

Brahmin Vassakāra came to the Licchavī princes and on being asked the reason for his banishment he told them what had taken place at the Rājagaha court. The Licchavīs were sympathetic with Vassakāra. They thought he was treated too severely for such a small offence. “What was your official status at the Rājagaha court?” They asked of Vassakāra. “I was the Minister of Justice.”

“Then you can have that post at our court,” the Licchavīs told him. Vassakāra proved himself a very competent judge. The Licchavīs then learned the princely arts from him.

When Brahmin Vassakāra had established himself as the royal teacher, he started to put his scheme into effect. He would call up a Licchavī Prince in private and ask some trifling thing such as: “Do youths under your royal highness do cultivating?” – “Yes, they do,” would be the natural answer. “Do they yoke a pair of oxen?” – “Yes, they do.”

The dialogue did not go further. The two parted. But when one of the Licchavīs who saw the private discussion asked the Licchavī who had conversed with Vassakāra about the subject of their discussion, and was told the truth, the inquirer naturally could not believe it. “There must be something that he is keeping to himself,” he thought. A wedge had been thus placed between the two princes.

On another day, Brahmin Vassakāra took another Licchavī Prince into private and asked: “Your Royal Highness what did you have for breakfast today?” And that was all. When some other Licchavī princes asked about the meeting and was told the truth it struck them as unbelievable. Another wedge had been laid at another place.

On another occasion, Brahmin Vassakāra asked another Licchavī Prince in private: “Your Royal Highness is said to be in straitened circumstances, is that true?” – “Who told you so?” asked the prince. “Prince so and so told me.” And so ill-will between two innocent Licchavī princes was created.

Yet on another occasion, Brahmin Vassakāra said to another Licchavī Prince in private: “Your Royal Highness is called a coward by someone.” – “Who dares call me a coward?” asked the prince. “Prince so and so did.” Thus enmity arose between two innocent Licchavī princes.

After three years of insidious scheming, Brahmin Vassakāra brought the Licchavī princes to such a state that no two princes had faith in the other. Then to test the effectiveness of his scheme, he had a public proclamation made by the beat of the gong, for an assembly of the Licchavī princes. Each bearing a grudge against another, none of the princes was prepared to work together in unison as before. “Let the well-to-do princes attend; we are the wretched ones,” some would say, or “Let brave men go; we are but cowards.” And on these diverse grounds of disunity, the assembly did not take place.

Brahmin Vassakāra then sent a secret message to King Ajātasattu that it was the time to attack Vesālī. Ajātasattu gave the war cry by the beat of the gong and marched out of Rājagaha. [991]

The ruling princes of Vesālī heard the news. “We will not let them cross the Ganges!” they declared and an assembly was called, but nursing old grudges, no one attended. “Let the brave ones go,” etc., they would say in derision.

When Ajātasattu’s forces had crossed the Gangā, the ruling princes of Vesālī declared: “We will not let them enter our city. We will close our city gates and stand firm. Come! Let’s set our defences now!” They shouted and tried to convene an assembly. Yet there was no response.

Ajātasattu’s army met no resistance whatsoever from Vesālī whose city gates remained open. They massacred all the Licchavī princes and returned to Rājagaha as conquerors.

The events leading to the fall of Vesālī and its utter destruction took place during the three years, beginning with the year of the passing away of the Buddha and two years after that. The story is reproduced here as described in the commentary in this connection. May the reader, the virtuous follower of the Buddha, visualize in his imagination the scene of Brahmin Vassakāra learning from the Buddha the seven factors of growth and non-decline for rulers at the mountain abode of the Buddha atop mount Gijjhakūṭa, and his departure in all satisfaction from there.

Seven Factors of Non-Decline for the Monastics

The First Set of Seven Factors of Non-Decline

Even when the Buddha was giving a discourse on the seven factors of growth for rulers to Brahmin Vassakāra, he had in mind making a similar discourse for the guidance of monastics, in the interest of the prolongation of his teaching, which will be conducive to release from the round of existences, and realization of Nibbāna and hence are more beneficial than the seven factors of growth for rulers which are merely mundane principles.

Accordingly, soon after the Brahmin Vassakāra had left, the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Go, Ānanda, and let all the monastics living around Rājagaha gather in the Assembly Hall.”

“Very well, venerable sir,” said Ven. Ānanda and arranged for a full gathering of monastics. He sent monastics endowed with special powers to inform those monastics who dwelled at some distance from Rājagaha, and went personally to those monastics who were living near by. When the monastics had gathered in the Assembly Hall, Ven. Ānanda approached the Buddha, made obeisance to him, and standing at a suitable distance, said to him: “Venerable sir, the community of monastics is assembled. It is time for the Fortunate One to go, as and when he wishes.”

Then the Buddha went to the Assembly Hall and, taking the seat prepared for him, addressed the monastics thus: “Monastics, I shall expound to you the seven factors of non-decline. Listen and pay attention to what I am going to say in detail.” – “Very well, venerable sir,” the monastics responded, and the Buddha gave this discourse:

1. Monastics, so long as the monastics hold frequent meetings and have many meetings, they are bound to make progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
2. Monastics, so long as the monastics assemble and disperse in harmony, and attend to the affairs of the Saṅgha in harmony, they are bound to make progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
3. Monastics, so long as the monastics do not prescribe rules that had not been prescribed by the Buddha, and observe well the training rules (Vinaya) prescribed by the Buddha, they are bound to make progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
4. Monastics, so long as the monastics show respect, deference, esteem, and [992] veneration towards the elders, who are of long standing and are senior in the monastic life, who have acquired the position of leadership among the Saṅgha, and consider that the advice of those elders is worth listening to, they are bound to make progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji – 1470

5. Monastics, so long as the monastics do not yield to the power, to the influence of craving (taṇhā), which arises in them and which leads to rebirth, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
6. Monastics, so long as the monastics are willing to go into seclusion in remote forest dwellings, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
7. Monastics, so long as the monastics remain established in mindfulness themselves so that those co-practitioners of the monastic practice who cherish morality and who have not yet come might come, and those of similar nature who have already come might live in peace and comfort, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.

Monastics, so long as these seven factors of non-decline remain with the monastics, and so long as the monastics live by them, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.”

The above seven factors are called the first set of seven factors of non-decline of monastics.

1. Of these seven the first factor of assembling often is essentially the same as the first principle of progress taught the Vajjians. Unless monastics meet together often they cannot get to know what is going on at various monasteries. For instance, a certain monastic boundary hall (sīma) in a certain monastery may be flawed for having mixed boundaries so that valid Saṅgha functions cannot be held in them, or that certain monastics at a certain monastery are practising medicine, or acting as messengers for lay persons, or taxing the patience of their lay supporters by too many requests; or are pursuing gain with gain, etc. When the laxity of monastic conduct is not taken note of by the Saṅgha, evil monastics may take undue advantage of it, and multiply their numbers with adverse consequences for the teaching.

By the Saṅgha frequently meeting in assembly and promptly, a faulty monastic boundary hall (sīma) can be put right by Saṅgha acts so that it can function according to the Vinaya. When evil monastics have formed a community of their own, noble monastics who have attained paths and fruitions can be despatched to teach them the ways and practices of the noble ones (ariya-vamsa- dhamma); evil monastics can be chastised by sending monastics adept at the Discipline. In such cases, evil monastics will know that the Saṅgha is vigilant and that they cannot thrive. Thus the progress for the monastics in the threefold training is assured.

2. “Monastics assembling in harmony,” means promptly responding to a call for the Saṅgha congregation to carry out any Saṅgha business such as clearing the relic shrine (stūpa) precincts or doing repair work to the shrines, or making vows or imparting instructions under the Discipline. On no account should the signal for the gathering of the monastics be treated lightly. All personal engagements, such as stitching robes, or baking an alms bowl, or repairing the monastery, should be dropped for the moment to attend the assembly. This attitude of always giving priority to the business of the Saṅgha assembly assures harmony in monastic assemblies.

“Dispersing in harmony,” means to rise from the meeting all at once and to break up without exception. If some monastics were to stay on, those who have left the Assembly Hall might harbour suspicions against those staying behind. They might think: “Those monastics have real business to discuss between themselves only,” and misunderstandings may [993] arise.

“Dispersing in harmony,” may also mean rising up together eagerly to take responsibility to carry out the resolutions made at the assembly such as participation in Saṅgha acts concerning monastic boundary halls (sīma) or volunteering for chastising an errant monastic.

“Attending to the affairs of the Saṅgha in harmony,” means a readiness, on the part of every monastic, to live as a community, never being selfish. For instance, if a guest monastic arrives, he should be given a warm welcome instead of being directed to another monastery, or making undue inquiries about his identity. This is particularly important in respect of a sick monastic needing shelter and attention. Finding monastic requisites, such as alms bowl, robes, medicine for the needy is also an act of harmonious discharge of a monastic’s obligations. Where there is a dearth of learned monastics at a certain place and there is the danger of the Pāḷi text or the correct meaning thereof going to extinction, the monastics of that place should find a competent monastic to teach the text and interpret the meaning thereof, and he should be looked after properly, by way of the four monastic requisites.

3. In the third factor of non-decline, prescribing a monastic undertaking which is not in accordance with the doctrine amounts to prescribing something that had not been prescribed by the Buddha. An example of such an undertaking: There is a certain provision in the Discipline called a Sitting-Blanket (Nisīdana-santhata) rule or an Old Blanket (Purāṇa-santhata) rule in the Pārājika Pāḷi (PTS 3.232). When the Buddha was staying in Sāvattihī at the Jetavana monastery, he said to the monastics: “Monastics, I wish to remain in seclusion for three months. No monastic shall come to me except the one who brings my meals.” The monastics then made an undertaking among themselves that any monastic who went to the Buddha, other than the one bringing food for him, should be liable to a confession (pācittiya) offence, and breach of this offence should be conveyed to the Saṅgha. Now this is overdoing the Buddha’s orders. These monastics had no right to classify a breach of the Buddha’s words on that particular occasion as one of a confession (pācittiya) offence, nor any right to declare by their own undertaking the breach a cause for confession. Such an undertaking is against the Dhamma-Vinaya, and amounts to prescribing something which the Buddha had not prescribed.

Disregarding what the Buddha prescribed is best illustrated by the case of the Vajjiputtaka monastics of Vesālī when they tried to introduce ten unlawful rules of their liking, in flagrant disobedience to the Buddha’s Vinaya rules. That event took place on the hundredth year of the Buddha’s passing away see the Council of the Seven Hundred (Satta-satikakkhandhaka, Vin Kandh 22).

During the time of the Buddha, there were monastics Assaji and Punabbasuka who intentionally infringed minor rules of the discipline. However trifling the offence might be, non-observance of what the Buddha prescribed is still a non-observance.

In the story of an Old Blanket (Purāṇa-santhata), the Arahāt Upasena, the brother of Ven. Sāriputta, refrained from making a novel undertaking a monastic rule of conduct. This is a case of not prescribing rules that had not been prescribed by the Buddha.

Ven. Yasa, who headed the Second Council, taught the Dhamma-Vinaya to the monastics. This is an instance of not disregarding the training rules prescribed by the Buddha.

On the eve of the First Council, a lively discussion took place among the Saṅgha whether minor offences should be dropped from the code of Vinaya because the Buddha, when his passing away was near, gave this option to the Saṅgha after he was gone. Ven. Kassapa, as head of the First Council, made a formal proposal at the Saṅgha congregation to uphold all minor offences as prescribed by the Buddha. This is a case of observing well the training rules prescribed by the Buddha.

4. With reference to this factor of non-decline, elders would give spiritual guidance only to those monastics who are courteous and reverential [994] towards them and who approach them twice or thrice every day. To those who willingly seek guidance by showing their admiration, the elders would impart practical wisdom handed down from generations of teachers and essential points in the doctrine that are fit to be taught only to sincere and devoted pupils. If the monastics do not show due respect and regard to the elders, they will be deprived of the five benefits such as morality, and the seven properties of the noble ones (ariya), and so stand to have a great loss and decline.

Those monastics who are courteous and reverential towards the elders and approach them twice or thrice every day, gain knowledge from them in many ways. They get practical instructions in insight meditation, such as: “You should go forward thus, being mindful and with clear comprehension, you should go backward thus; you should look straight ahead thus; you should look sideways thus; you should bend the arm thus; you should stretch out the folded arm thus; you should carry the double robe and alms bowl thus, etc.”

The elders would impart to them practical wisdom, which was handed down from generations of teachers, and the essential points in the doctrine, which were worthy to only sincere and devoted pupils. They would teach them the thirteen ascetic practices and warn them against the pitfalls in doctrinal controversy by explaining to them the moot points contained in the ten Points of Controversy (Kathā-vatthu). Thus, being established as good pupils of worthy teachers, these monastics will gain the five benefits such as morality, fulfilling the task of Awakening, the fruit of becoming a monastic.

5. As regards the fifth factor of non-decline, a monastic who goes about from village to village, town to town, always at the heels of their supporters for the sake of acquiring the four monastic requisites, is one who yields to the power of craving. One who yields to craving is on the decline in the benefits of monastic practice such as morality. One who does not yield to craving progresses spiritually, beginning with morality.

6. As regards the sixth factor of non-decline, a remote forest dwelling is a place away from human settlements, but not necessarily in a forest. One must be willing to dwell in seclusion in such a place. In a monastery close to a town or village, when a monastic rises from absorption (jhāna), he hears human voices, male, female or children's voices which spoil his concentration.

At a forest abode, one wakes up in the morning to the sounds of animals and birds, which makes for peace and contentment and creates a delightful satisfaction (pīti) and by wisely reflecting on that delightful satisfaction, one can attain the Arahāt fruition. Thus the Buddha speaks in praise of a monastic sleeping at a remote forest dwelling even more than a monastic in meditation absorption living near a town or a village. This is because he sees the potential to become an Arahāt in the forest-dwelling monastic. That is why he says that as long as monastics are willing to dwell in seclusion in a forest abode, they are bound to progress spiritually and that there is no reason for their decline.

7. Regarding the seventh factor of non-decline, resident monastics who do not welcome co-practitioners of the monastic practice who cherish morality, are those who lack faith in the Three Treasures. This type of monastic would not greet guest monastics on arrival, would not offer a seat, nor would fan them to cool them and would not do any act normally expected of a host monastic. A monastery, where such monastics live, earns the reputation it deserves, that such and such a monastery is a place where monastics lacking in faith in the Three Treasures live, that it is unfriendly to guest monastics, and inhospitable. That reputation keeps away guest monastics from entering that monastery even though they may happen to be passing by it. Therefore, virtuous monastics who have not been there, will never go there. Those virtuous monastics, who have not been there, not knowing the inhospitable nature of the monastery, will soon find out that the place is not the right [995] one for them to stay long, and will go away in disgust. In this way that monastery will become a place where other virtuous monastics do not care to settle down. The result is that the resident monastics of that monastery will lack any opportunity of seeing virtuous ones who can share with them the doctrine which could dispel doubts in them, teach them the training precepts, and preach to them the excellent doctrine. These resident monastics will then hear no new discourse, nor will they try to retain through constant recitation whatever they have learnt. Thus the benefits of the monastic life such as morality will dwindle day by day.

Resident monastics, who wish to see guest monastics arrive at their monastery, are those that have faith in the Three Treasures, so they would cordially greet those virtuous monastics who visit them, would offer lodging, and ask them to join them on the alms round. They get an opportunity to learn the doctrine from the guest monastics and have their doubts dispelled. They can hear discourses on the excellent doctrine. The monastery resided in by this type of monastic earns a good reputation as a place where monastics with faith in the Three Treasures live, as a hospitable place that honours virtuous guest monastics. That reputation attracts virtuous monastics to it. When they arrive, the resident monastics do whatever acts of hospitality are due. They would pay respects to the visiting monastics who are senior to them, or would sit on their own seats around the visiting monastics who are junior to them, and then ask whether the visitor plans to stay or to move on to another place. If the visitor says he intends moving on, the resident monastics would invite him to stay on, pointing out that the place is a suitable one for them and that alms gathering would also be no problem for him. If the visitor agrees to stay on, then the resident monastics get the privilege of learning the Discipline, if the visitor is proficient in the Vinaya; or learning the Doctrine (Suttanta), if the visitor is proficient in the discourses. Abiding by the instructions given by the virtuous visitors, the resident monastics become Arahats with the four discriminative knowledges (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa). As for the virtuous guest monastics, they say gladly: “When we first came here, we thought of staying only a few days but since the resident monastics make our stay pleasant, we shall stay here for ten or twelve years.” Thus the benefits of the monastic life such as morality increase.

The Second Set of Seven Factors of Non-Decline

Further, the Buddha said to the monastics: “Monastics, I shall expound to you another set of seven factors of non-decline. Listen and pay good attention. I shall explain in detail.” – “Very well, venerable sir,” the monastics responded. And the Buddha said this:

1. Monastics, so long as the monastics do not delight in and concern themselves with mundane activities or transactions they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji – 1476

2. Monastics, so long as the monastics do not delight in and seek enjoyment in idle talk they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
3. Monastics, so long as the monastics do not delight in and seek enjoyment in slothfulness, and are not fond of sleeping, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
4. Monastics, so long as the monastics do not seek enjoyment in the company of associates, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
5. Monastics, so long as the monastics do not have any evil desire to make pretentious claims to attainment or to virtue, and do not yield to such evil desire, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
6. Monastics, so long as the monastics do not associate with evil friends or evil [996] companions, and are not favourably disposed towards evil companionship, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
7. Monastics, so long as the monastics after comprehending the truth in a small way do not stop halfway, before attaining Awakening, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.

Monastics, so long as these seven factors of non-decline remain with the monastics, and so long as the monastics live by them, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.”

1. Of those seven factors, the first factor: “Mundane activities,” means assigning a robe for use, stitching robes, reinforcing the layers of a robe, making a needle-container, stitching a sling for the alms bowl, stitching the girdle, stitching a water-strainer, making a circular stand for the alms bowl, making a potsherd for scraping the feet, or making a broom, etc.

Some monastics devote all their time to these matters. This, pointed out as the first factor, is not proper. A monastic should apportion his time for such matters, but he should have time for learning, studying, cleaning the relic shrine (stūpa) precinct, etc., as well as to allow some time for meditation. A monastic who uses his time judiciously is not one who enjoys worldly affairs.

2. “Idle talk,” means speaking fondly about women or about men, and any other flippant speech that is not conducive to the paths and fruitions. A monastic, who indulges in such petty talk all the time, is one who seeks enjoyment in idle talk. A monastic, who discourses on the doctrine by day and by night, who answers doctrinal questions, is called: “A reticent monastic, one who is disciplined in speech.”

The Buddha has said: Sannipatitānaṃ vo bhikkhave dvayaṃ karaṇīyaṃ dhammī vā kathā ariyo vā tuṅhī-bhāvo, “for you, monastics, there are only two things to do when you meet one another: talk about the doctrine, or remain silent in deep contemplation.”

3. A monastic, who is given to sloth and torpor even while going, sitting or lying down, is one who seeks enjoyment in slothfulness and is fond of sleeping. A monastic, who might have a cat-nap due to earnest effort at monastic practice that tires his body, is not one who is slothful or is fond of sleeping.

4. A monastic, who feels uneasy in being alone but is fond of company of one or more to talk to, is one who seeks enjoyment in company. A monastic, who delights in being alone in all the four bodily postures and who is perfectly at ease while alone, is not one who is fond of company.

5. A monastic, lacking morality, may claim morality; such a monastic is called one who has an evil desire. A monastic, who does not have pretention to morality, is not one who has an evil desire.

6. A friend is one whom one loves; a companion is one who lives, goes or eats together with oneself.

7. A monastic who does not rest contented with purity of morality, or attainment of insight knowledge, or attainment of absorption (jhāna), or attainment of Stream-entry, or attainment of Once-returning, or attainment of Non-returner, but relentlessly strives to become an Arahāt is one who is bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for his decline.

The Third Set of Seven Factors of Non-Decline

Further, the Buddha said to the monastics: “Monastics, I shall expound to you another set of [997] seven factors of non-decline. Listen and pay good attention. I shall explain it in detail.” – “Very well Sir,” the monastics responded and the Buddha said this:

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji – 1478

1. Monastics, so long as the monastics are instilled with confidence or faith grounded on conviction, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
2. Monastics, so long as the monastics have a conscience about wrong doing (hiri) they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
3. Monastics, so long as the monastics have concern about wrong doing (ottappa), they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
4. Monastics, so long as the monastics have vast learning, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
5. Monastics, so long as the monastics are diligent, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
6. Monastics, so long as the monastics are established in mindfulness, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
7. Monastics, so long as the monastics are endowed with insight wisdom (vipassanā-paññā), they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.

Monastics, so long as these seven factors of non-decline remain with the monastics, and so long as the monastics live by them, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.”

1. Of these seven factors, the first factor of non-decline is conviction or faith (saddhā). It is of 4 kinds:

1. Faith in the not yet attained (agamanīya-saddhā) refers to the strength of conviction that arises in a Bodhisatta due to the noble striving after perfection in ten ways (pārami), charity (cāga) and good conduct (cariyā), without external prompting, which puts unshakable faith in anything that deserves faith.
2. Faith based on attainment (adhigama-saddhā) refers to the unassailably firm conviction of a noble one (ariya) in the four noble truths due to having penetrative knowledge of the path.

3. Clear faith (pasāda-saddhā) refers to the depth of conviction in the Three Treasures such as that of Mahākappina. When he heard the words: “Buddha, Dhamma, Saṅgha,” he had a deep faith in the noble qualities of the Buddha such as: “The Buddha has analytical knowledge of all things,” and so on, and this faith arose in him without being tutored by others about the attributes of the Buddha, the Dhamma, or Saṅgha.
4. Trusting faith (okappana-saddhā) refers to conviction after considered judgment regarding the Buddha, Dhamma, Saṅgha when others make mention about them. After well considered judgment, the holder of this kind of faith has unshakable conviction in the Three Treasures like that of a noble one (ariya) who has realized the truth.

In the present context about the first factor of non-decline, clear faith and trusting faith are meant.

2-3. In the second and third things that prevent decline, the distinction between conscience (hiri) and concern (ottapa) should be understood by means of this analogy: Let us say, there are two balls of iron, the first is cool but is smeared with human excreta, the second is just a red hot iron ball. A wise man would not touch the first iron ball lest he would pollute his hand, and he would not touch the second one lest his hand would get burnt. Likewise, a wise [998] person abhors wrong doing because he detests it for its shameful quality; his sense of conscience to do wrong doing is called conscience (hiri). He is concerned about wrong doing because he is full of apprehension about the consequences, both here and in the hereafter; his concern about doing wrong doing is called concern (ottappa).

4. In the fourth thing that prevents decline: “A person of vast learning” means one who is well read in the Pāḷi texts and doctrine (pariyatti), and one who has penetrative knowledge of the truth, that is, one who has gained supermundane knowledge (paṭivedha). In the present context the first meaning should be taken.

Of the type of persons well-read in the canon, there are these four kinds:

1. A monastic who needs no guidance in the interpretation of the canon.
2. A monastic who is fit to head a monastery.
3. A monastic who can give advice and instructions to female monastics.

4. A monastic who, like Ven. Ānanda, is conversant with the whole of the canon and can explain and discourse on any point in them.

In the context regarding the fourth thing that prevents decline, this fourth kind of learned person is meant. Only such a person can become established in the good practice (paṭipatti), the good penetration (paṭivedha-saddhamma), because being well read is the foundation for both of them.

5. In the fifth thing that prevents decline, the diligent person fulfils two aspects of diligence, physical and mental. “Physical diligence,” refers to a loner who shuns company and cultivates, in all the bodily postures, the eight subjects on which diligence should be built. “Mental diligence” refers to a yogi who distances himself from the six sense objects and dwells in the eight stages of absorption (jhāna), and who, in other moments, in all the bodily postures, allows no defilements to enter his mind which is constantly vigilant. So long as monastics are diligent both physically and mentally, they are bound to prosper; there is no possibility for them to decline.

6. In the sixth thing that prevents decline: “Established in mindfulness,” means persons who have such power of awareness as being able to remember all deeds or words that they had done or spoken long ago, as in the case of Ven. Mahā Gatimbhaya Abhaya, Ven. Dīghabhāṇaka Abhaya, and Ven. Tipiṭaka Cūḷābhaya.

Ven. Mahā Gatimbaya Abhaya was a precocious child. At the traditional ceremony for feeding him with the auspicious milk rice, on the fifth day after he was born, he made the sound: “Shoo! Shoo!” to scare away the crow that tried to poke its head into the rice-bowl. When he grew up and later became an elderly monastic, his pupils asked him: “Venerable sir, what earliest physical or verbal action of yours do you remember?” he related the event of his shooing away the crow when he was just five days old.

When Ven. Dīghabhāṇaka Abhaya was just nine days old, his mother, in trying to kiss him, bent down over his face, and her big hairdo adorned with lots of Spanish jasmine buds came loose, letting handfuls of the flower buds drop on his bare chest. He remembered how that dropping of buds caused him pain. When asked by his pupils about his earliest memories, he recounted this event that he experienced as a nine-day old child.

When Ven. Tipiṭaka Cūḷābhaya was asked about his power of memory, this great elder said: “Friends, there are four gates to the city of Anurādhapura.

After the closing of three of these gates, when only the fourth gate was allowed to be used by the people, I would ask the name of each person going out in the morning. When they re-entered the city by the same gate in the evening, I could call up all of their names.”

7. In the seventh thing that prevents decline: “Insight,” means the comprehension of the rising and dissolution of the five aggregates (udayabbaya-paññā). In another sense, mindfulness or awareness mentioned as the sixth thing that prevents decline and insight mentioned in the seventh refer to right mindfulness and insight which are the foundation of insight development, that is, having awareness and perception while meditating. [999]

The Fourth Set of Seven Factors of Non-Decline

The Buddha then continued with the further seven factors of non-decline thus:

1. Monastics, so long as the monastics cultivate mindfulness (sati), a factor of Awakening, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
2. Monastics, so long as the monastics cultivate investigative knowledge of phenomena (dhamma-vicaya), a factor of Awakening, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
3. Monastics, so long as the monastics cultivate effort (virīya), a factor of Awakening, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
4. Monastics, so long as the monastics cultivate delightful satisfaction (pīti), a factor of Awakening, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
5. Monastics, so long as the monastics cultivate serenity (passaddhi), a factor of Awakening, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
6. Monastics, so long as the monastics cultivate concentration (samādhi), a factor of Awakening, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.

7. Monastics, so long as the monastics cultivate equanimity (upekkhā), a factor of Awakening, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.

Monastics, so long as these seven factors of non-decline remain with the monastics, and so long as the monastics live by them, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.”

In these seven factors of Awakening which should be cultivated by monastics for progress, the Buddha teaches insight development pertaining to the paths and fruitions both at the mundane and supermundane levels.

The Fifth Set of Seven Factors of Non-Decline

The Buddha then continued with the further seven factors of non-decline thus:

1. Monastics, so long as the monastics cultivate the perception of impermanence (anicca), they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
2. Monastics, so long as the monastics cultivate the perception of non-self (anatta), they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
3. Monastics, so long as the monastics cultivate the perception of the foulness or impurity of the body (asubha), they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
4. Monastics, so long as the monastics cultivate the perception of the danegrs in the aggregates (ādīnava), they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
5. Monastics, so long as the monastics cultivate the perception of abandoning (pahāna), they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
6. Monastics, so long as the monastics cultivate the perception of detachment from passion (virāga), they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no [1000] reason for their decline.
7. Monastics, so long as the monastics cultivate the perception of cessation (nirodha), they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.

Monastics, so long as these seven factors of non-decline remain with the monastics, and so long as the monastics live by them, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.”

Herein, the perception of impermanence means perception that arises with concentrated reflection on the impermanence of mind and body. The perception of non-self should be understood likewise. Insight into the impermanent nature of conditioned phenomena that pertains to the three spheres of existence is insight wisdom (vipassanā-paññā), the perception of that knowledge is worth cultivating since it is perception associated with knowledge. It should be noted that the word perception essentially means knowledge. The same method of the Buddha’s teaching should be understood regarding perception of non-self, etc. Of the above seven factors, the first five are mundane; the last two are both mundane and supermundane.

The Six Factors of Non-Decline

Further, the Buddha said to the monastics: “Monastics, I shall expound to you six factors of non-decline. Listen and pay good attention. I shall explain it in detail.” – “Very well Sir,” responded the monastics. The Buddha said this:

1. Monastics, so long as the monastics show by their bodily action their kind regards towards fellow-practitioners of the pure life, both openly and in private, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
2. Monastics, so long as the monastics show by their speech their kind regards towards fellow-practitioners of the pure life, openly and in private, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
3. Monastics, so long as the monastics keep an attitude of kind regards towards fellow-practitioners of the pure life, openly and in private, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
4. Monastics, so long as the monastics share with virtuous fellow-practitioners of the pure life whatever they receive righteously, such as the four monastic requisites, and least of all, the alms food collected in their alms bowl, without enjoying it alone, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.

5. Monastics, so long as the monastics, both openly and in private, remain in observance of the same moral precepts (sīla) which lead to liberation from bondage to craving (taṇhā), which are extolled by the wise, which are not subject to misconception, which make for concentration, and which are unbroken, intact, unblemished, unspotted, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.
6. Monastics, so long as the monastics, both openly and in private, remain in noble knowledge which leads to Nibbāna and which leads one guided by it to the end of the unalloyed suffering (dukkha) of sentient existence, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.

Monastics, so long as these six factors remain with the monastics, and so long as the monastics live by them, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.”

Thus the Buddha taught the assembly of monastics five sets of seven factors of [1001] non-decline and one set of six factors of non-decline.

Regarding factors 1-3 above: “Showing kind regards by one’s physical action,” means doing any deed with loving-kindness. “Showing kind regards by one’s speech,” means speech uttered with loving-kindness. “Keeping a kind attitude towards others,” means thinking kind thoughts towards them.

In this text, although the Buddha taught that a monastic’s deeds, words and thoughts are to be expressions of loving-kindness towards fellow monastics, the same principle should govern all actions of lay persons too. The Buddha addressed the monastics here simply because in the four kinds of assembly the assembly of monastics is the noblest.

Thus, a deed of a monastic’s loving-kindness may consist in doing personal service to fellow monastics. In the case of a lay person, going to worship at a shrine or at Bodhi tree, or going to the monastery to invite the Saṅgha to an offering ceremony, warmly greeting the monastics on their alms round, offering a suitable seat, seeing the monastic off on his religious mission, etc, are deeds of loving-kindness.

A verbal action of a monastic’s loving-kindness may be expressed in terms of teaching the Discipline, showing the methods of meditation, teaching the doctrine, teaching the canon as the most important action. With lay persons, stimulating and organizing one's friends to do meritorious deeds, such as going to a relic shrine (stūpa) or to the Bodhi tree to pay respects, going to hear a discourse on the Dhamma, or to offer flowers or lights at the shrines; urging them to abide by the ten moral actions; or to offer ticket alms food or to offer robes for the Rains Retreat (Vassa) period, or to donate the four monastic requisites to the Saṅgha; and then having invited the Saṅgha for the offering, to organize and urge friends to prepare the food, to lay the seats, to provide drinking water, to greet the Saṅgha, to conduct them to the seats prepared for them, and above all, to remind them to have the right attitude in serving the Saṅgha. All these verbal activities spring from loving-kindness.

A mental action of a monastic's loving-kindness takes the form of diffusing goodwill, after having made the morning's ablutions, seated at a secluded place, and wishing all monastics in the monastery well, that they all be free from trouble and ill-will. On the part of lay persons they should diffuse a similar spirit of good will to all the Saṅgha, thinking: "May the Saṅgha be well, may they be free from trouble and ill-will." Such an attitude constitutes mental action springing from loving-kindness.

Overt Action and Action in Private

1. Deeds. Examples of overt action: Helping in the stitching of robes of fellow monastics, whether senior or junior to oneself, the younger monastics washing the feet of elders or doing other personal services, such as fanning, respecting him, etc.

Example of action in private: Looking after the personal property of fellow monastics, whether senior or junior to oneself, which have not been properly looked after by the owner, and in doing so, doing it without having any disrespectful opinion about the lack of care on the part of the owner, but doing it as if it were one's own property that needs looking after.

2. Words. Example of overt verbal action: Addressing another monastic in reverential terms. e.g., Venerable Elder Tissa. Example of verbal action in private: in inquiring after a certain elder, asking: "Where is our Ven. Elder Deva?" or "Where is our Ven. Elder Tissa? When is he expected here?"

3. Thoughts. [1002] Example of overt mental action: When one looks at a fellow monastic with endearing eyes in a clearly pleased expression this is the outcome of the loving-kindness in the mind of the one looking; it reflects his thoughts, the facial expression itself is bodily action springing from loving-kindness. Example of mental action in private; wishing Ven. Elder Deva or Tissa, to be well and happy, etc., is mental action in private, due to loving-kindness.

Regarding the fourth factor of non-decline above: “To enjoy something alone,” means either not sharing something as an article that is obtained, or not sharing something with a certain person or persons. In the first case, the extent one is prepared to share something is an instance of enjoying something alone in respect of an article. In the second case, one has in mind: “I shall share it with monastic so and so; but I shall not share it with monastic so and so,” this is an instance of enjoying something alone in respect of person.

In this fourth factor, a monastic who regards any item received as an offering to the Saṅgha as common property of all virtuous monastics co-resident with him, considers thus: “This alms food is of great value morally; I shall not give it to lay persons since that would amount to pursuing gain with gain. I shall not enjoy it alone first. I shall offer it to the Saṅgha. If anything is left after all the Saṅgha have partaken of it, I shall then eat it. For this food has been obtained with the intention of becoming the common property of the Saṅgha.” Accordingly he first announces the meal time for all the Saṅgha by the striking of the gong. This noble practice under the Buddha’s teaching is called memorable practice.

Fraternal Living

The Noble Practice of Fraternal Living

What kind of monastic is competent or qualified to take up this fraternal practice (sāraṇīya)? An immoral monastic is not in a position to take up fraternal practice. Only a monastic endowed with morality can take up this practice. The reason is that virtuous monastics cannot receive offerings from a monastic of immoral conduct. They will always refuse it.

Only a monastic with impeccable morality is qualified to take up the fraternal practice. Once taken up; the practice must be fulfilled without a break, flawlessly. The details of the practice are given below.

Where a monastic gives discriminately the alms food to his mother, or father, or preceptor, or any such person, he is sharing it with someone whom he is bound to offer. But his sharing is not fraternal practice: it is merely removing an impediment (paḷibodha), by fulfilling an obligation, as it is termed in the teaching. That indeed is so. Fraternal practice is of a superior nobler way of sharing which is suitable only for a monastic who is free from impediments, obstructions and personal obligations.

A practitioner of fraternal practice may give, in fulfilment of his practice, the share of his alms food to a sick monastic, or to a monastic tending a sick monastic, or a guest monastic, or a way-faring monastic or to a newly admitted monastic who has not learnt the proper way to robe himself or to hold his alms bowl. After giving the alms food to these types of monastics, if any alms food is left, he offers it to the monastics beginning from the most senior of the elders who should be allowed to partake of it as much as they like, and not in a small quantity only.

If the food runs out and if there is time to collect alms food for the day, he may go on another round of alms gathering and then continue the distribution of whatever food he has collected. If there is any food left after the distribution, he eats it. If none is left and if there is no time to go on another round of alms gathering, he stays without any food for that day and his sole sustenance then is the delightful satisfaction (pīti) derived from the successful undertaking of the fraternal practice.

Note that although the text mentions sharing with virtuous fellow monastics, a practitioner of the fraternal practice may deny his alms food to an immoral [1003] monastic, or he may, out of pity, give it to him, in which latter case it is not by way of fulfilling the practice.

In actual practice, the practitioner of fraternal practice will find it not too difficult, if it is to be undertaken in the company of monastics who are skilful in this practice, but will find it rather difficult if in the company of monastics who are not so skilled.

The reason is as follows: Where the associate monastics are skilful in fraternal practice, those who have collected alms food themselves do not partake of the practitioner's food, considering the trouble that would otherwise cause to the practitioner. Other monastics who do not get alms food elsewhere would partake of the food just to satisfy their need. Thus, no unnecessary burden is placed on the practitioner. Where the associate monastics do not know how stringent the fraternal practice is, those monastics who have got alms somewhere else would, under the influence of greed, also partake of the food offered by the practitioner. Other monastics who do not get alms food elsewhere would take more than what they actually need. In such a situation the practitioner has to make repeated rounds of alms collection within the time proper to do so, and has, more often than not, to go without food as all his collection having been distributed to others.

This self-assigned task of feeding one's associates must be pursued for twelve years without break so that it can be called a success. A full twelve years self-denial regarding daily sustenance is the unique character of this practice.

If, supposing on the last day of the twelve years, there should occur the slightest vexation in the mind of the practitioner, then he fails. For instance, if the practitioner went away to bathe, leaving his alms bowl containing alms food gathered by him, and if it was seen by a senior monastic and its contents distributed according to seniority and nothing were left in it, the practitioner must be able to take it in the proper attitude. Otherwise, if he had the slightest indignant attitude towards his associates for leaving nothing for him, his twelve-year long practice goes to waste. If he is still willing, he has to start it all over again for twelve more years. In this respect, the rule is as stringent as in the case of the probationary service period of probation after belonging to an outside sect (titthiya-parivāsa); once broken, a fresh period must be undertaken by the incumbent.

If the practitioner, under the same circumstances, instead of being vexed, feels joy to know that his fellow monastics have partaken of all his food, his practice is then accomplished. It is a success.

The benefits of fulfilling the fraternal practice are:

1. The primary benefit in fulfilling the fraternal practice is the abandoning of envy (issā) and stinginess (macchariya) through his prolonged cultivation of overcoming these defilements.
2. His charitableness, having been established, he is adored by everyone.
3. Since a strong desire to act in generosity has the benign effect of bountiful fruit, in the present existence, the practitioner is blessed with the four requisites all the time.
4. The twelve-year long practice of offering food to virtuous fellow monastics out of his alms bowl has the effect of rendering his alms bowl an inexhaustible source of alms food. He can give as much as he wishes out of it without depleting it.

5. As the result of giving priority to the most senior elders in his act of generosity for such a long period every day, whenever the common acquisitions of offerings are divided, the best things go to him.
6. As the result of the gladdening effect, he had produced in others through his act of self-denial in offering food in them, and so, whenever famine visits, Devas are ready to help him.

Stories Related to the Fraternal Practice

1. Ven. Tissa feeds 50 wayfaring monastics. Ven. Tissa was a forest dweller who lived in the forest abode known as Senavana. His place for the alms gathering was a village named Mahāgiri. A group of 50 venerables, who [1004] were on a pilgrimage to the Nāgadīpa Shrine, went on the alms round in Mahāgiri village but they collected none. As they were leaving the village, they met Ven. Tissa, the local resident monastic, who was entering the village for alms food. Tissa asked the 50 venerables whether they had got alms food. The venerables did not give a straight answer but merely replied: “Friend, we have been on the alms round there.” Tissa knew that the venerables had got no alms food and so he said to them: “May the venerable ones wait here till I come back.” The venerables then said to him: “None of us 50 monastics got alms food there. How could you alone get it?” – “Venerable sir,” Tissa replied, “resident monastics can manage somehow; though not possessing great power, they know where alms food can be collected.” The 50 venerables remained waiting there.

As Ven. Tissa entered Mahāgiri village, the very first house was ready with alms food, the lady of the house had milk rice prepared to offer to him. As soon as Tissa called in front of her house, she poured the milk rice into his alms bowl to the full. Tissa returned to the group of venerables and respectfully offered the alms-food, addressing the most senior monastic, he said: “May the venerable ones accept my offering.” The elder looked surprised. “Fifty of us have been in that village and none of us have collected any alms food whatsoever. This monastic has got milk rice in no time. How could it happen like this?” These thoughts, though not spoken out loud, were reflected in their expressions. Ven. Tissa then said to them: “Venerable sirs, this alms food is righteously obtained. Do not have any misgivings about it.” The 50 venerables partook of the rice meal to their satisfaction. After they had finished, Ven. Tissa ate the leftovers to his satisfaction too.

After Ven. Tissa had finished his meal, the venerables asked: “Friend, when did you gain penetrative knowledge of the supermundane?”

To this he replied: “Venerable sirs, I have not attained the supermundane.”

“In that case, are you endowed with absorption (jhāna)?”

“No, venerable sirs.”

“How, friend, could you easily get milk rice where 50 of us failed to get even a morsel. Is that not a miraculous feat?”

Ven. Tissa was obliged to admit his attainment to dispel doubts in those monastics. Since the attainment of fraternal practice is not a supermundane Dhamma (uttari-manussa-dhamma), he considered it proper to admit to it: “Venerable sirs, I have fulfilled the fraternal practice. Since I had done that, I could provide food for even 100,000 fellow monastics out of my alms bowl.” – “Virtuous One! Excellent it is! Excellent it is! This miraculous feat is befitting a virtuous one like yourself.”

This is an instance of the alms bowl that has virtually become an inexhaustible source of food; the fourth benefit of fraternal practice. This story also proves the second benefit of being adored by everyone, and the third benefit of being blessed with the four requisites all the time. The commentary picks up this story to exemplify the fourth benefit which is the most significant here.

2. Ven. Tissa at the national offerings ceremony. In ancient Śrī Laṅkā, there was the Giribhanda Mahāpūjā, an annual festival of offerings held on Mount Cetiya which was a grand national occasion. When Ven. Tissa arrived there, he inquired from fellow monastics what was the most significant item of offering that year. Being told that two finest fabrics intended for robe-making were the most significant item, Ven. Tissa said: “Those two pieces will come to my lot.” This was overheard by an official who reported to the king: “Your Excellency, there is a junior monastic who says that the two fine fabrics will come to his lot.” The king said: “That is what he imagines. But those fabrics are worthy of elders only.” And he thought of making the offering of the fabrics to the elders. [1005]

When the procession of monastics arrived for the offering ceremony, the king himself headed the offerings. The two choicest fabrics were placed foremost, ready to hand. But they did not reach the king's hand, when he was presenting the gifts to the elders. Only other items reached his hand. When Ven. Tissa came along, the two pieces of fabrics strangely reached the king's hand. The king offered them to Tissa. He also signalled by his facial expression to the official who reported to him about the fabrics to ask Ven. Tissa to sit there a while.

After the procession had passed by, the king asked Ven. Tissa: "Venerable sir, when did you become endowed with this special apperception?" Ven. Tissa did not want to give even a faint suggestion of him of having attained the paths and fruitions and so he simply replied: "Great King, I have not attained the supermundane." – "But venerable sir, you had said even before the gift-making that the two fabrics would come to you." – "That is true, O king, that was because since I had successfully completed the fraternal practice, whenever common property of gifts are distributed among the Saṅgha the choicest items always come to me." – "Venerable sir! Excellent it is! Excellent it is! This miraculous happening becomes you well."

After respectfully paying obeisance to Ven. Tissa, the king went back to the palace. This is an example of the fifth benefit.

3. The elder nun Nāgā. At one time, ancient Śrī Laṅkā underwent troubled times due to an insurgency headed by one Tissa, a Brahmin. At a village known as Bhārata where the elder nun Nāgā resided, the whole village fled for fear of insurgents, without letting it be known to the elder. Early in the morning the elder nun Nāgā noticed the strange silence of the village and said to her pupils: "Bhārata village is strangely silent. Go and enquire what's the matter." The younger female monastics went into the village and having seen that no one was left, reported it to their teacher.

The elder nun Nāgā said to her pupils: "Do not be alarmed or upset by the flight of the whole village. You go on as usual with your studying the texts, the commentaries and meditation. When the time came for the alms round, she robed herself and went to the great banyan tree near the village gate, leading her eleven disciples. The guardian spirit of the banyan tree came down and offered the twelve female monastics sufficient alms food. He then said to them: "Venerable ones, do not move away to another place. Always come to this banyan tree for your alms food."

Now, the elder nun Nāgā had a younger brother, a monastic by the name of Nāga. He assessed the situation and decided that Śrī Laṅkā was no safe place and that he could not find sustenance here. So he left the monastery accompanied by eleven disciples meaning to cross the sea to the mainland. Before leaving Śrī Lānkā he went to bid farewell to his elder sister Nāgā. Learning of their arrival at Bhārata village, the elder nun Nāgā went to see them and was told by monastic Nāga of his plan to cross over to the mainland. The elder nun Nāgā then said to him: “Would the venerable ones stay at the monastery for tonight, and proceed the next day.” The twelve venerables accepted the invitation.

The elder nun Nāgā collected the alms food in the morning as usual from the banyan tree. She offered the food to Ven. Nāga and his disciples. “Venerable elder, is this alms food properly gotten?” Ven. Nāga asked his elder sister and then remained silent. “Brother, this alms-food is righteously obtained. Do not have any doubts about this.” But Ven. Nāga was still doubtful: “Ven. sister is it properly obtained?”

Thereupon, the elder nun Nāgā took the alms bowl and threw it upwards where it remained for a while. Ven. Nāga said: “Even if the alms bowl stays aloft at seven palm trees high, it is still the alms food collected by a nun, is it not venerable sister?” Then he [1006] continued: “This disturbance and danger is not to last forever. After the famine has passed I, who speak in praise of the contented nature of the noble ones (ariya) with the four requisites, will be asking myself: ‘O virtuous one, trained in the ascetic practice regarding food, you have survived the scourge of Tissa the Brahmin by eating the alms food of a nun.’ I shall not be able to bear such criticism of myself. I must go now, you remain in mindfulness, elder sisters.”

The guardian spirit of the banyan tree was watching. If Ven. Nāga partook of the elder nun Nāgā’s alms food, he would say nothing to the monastic; but if the monastic were to refuse it, he would intervene, and ask him to drop the idea of going away. When he saw that the monastic refused the alms food, he descended from his abode in the tree and asked Ven. Nāga to hand over the alms bowl, and inviting him and his company to the foot of the banyan tree, offered them the meal on prepared seats. After the meal, he got an undertaking from Ven. Nāga not to go abroad. And from that day onwards the guardian spirit of the banyan tree offered meals daily to twelve female monastics and twelve male monastics for seven years. This is an example of the sixth benefit.

In this story the elder nun Nāgā was unaffected by famine, thanks to her fulfilment of the fraternal practice whereas Ven. Nāga was helped by the guardian spirit on account of his morality.

Regarding the fifth factor of non-decline: “Morality that is unbroken, intact, unchequered and unspotted,” is explained thus: For monastics, there are seven groups of breaches of morality in brief outline. Of the list of precepts to be observed, if the first precept or the last precept is broken, it is called “broken” like in a piece of cloth whose edges are frayed; if the precepts in the middle are broken, it is no more intact, just as in a piece of cloth that has holes in the middle part; if two or three precepts in a series are broken, it is chequered, like a cow whose skin is of different colours either on her back or underneath; if there is a breach of precepts at alternate places, it is spotted, like a cow with spots. Morality to be unbroken, intact, unchequered, and unspotted must be such that no manner of breach of the above four ways occurs anywhere in the observance of the monastic precepts.

Morality that is flawless in those above four ways is a sufficing condition for the paths and fruitions. One who is endowed with it is free from the bonds of craving and is therefore a truly happy person. Since it is very pure, it is extolled by the Buddha and noble ones (ariya). Since that morality is not conceived as a means of glorious future existences, such as a Deva of any specific name or unspecified name, it is not a misconception due to craving for existence; or not wrongly conceived as something permanent or eternal, a misconception due to wrong view; it is said to be not subject to misconception. Further, since none of the four deviations (vipatti) can be connected to this kind of morality, it is said to be not subject to misconception. Since it provides sufficient precondition for the attainment of access concentration (upacāra-samādhi) and absorption concentration (appanā-samādhi), it is also called morality conducive to concentration. Since the four purities in morality (catu-pārisudhi-sīla) of worldlings cannot, in reality, be equal between one person and another, the fifth factor here is meant as the morality of the path, the supermundane morality which is the same for all noble ones (ariya). In the sixth factor also, right view as the path factor is meant. These six factors of non-decline are taught by the Buddha also as the six memorable (sāraṇīya) factors (Saṅgīti-sutta, DN 33, Sāraṇīya-sutta, AN 6.11-12).

During the sojourn at the Gijjhakūṭa hill in Rājagaha, as his passing away was drawing near, only one year and three months hence, whenever the Buddha discoursed to the monastics, the following theme occurred repeatedly: “Such is morality (sīla); such is concentration (samādhi); such is wisdom (paññā). Concentration that is developed through morality is highly efficacious and [1007] productive. Wisdom that is developed through concentration is highly efficacious and productive. The mind that is developed through wisdom is thoroughly liberated without any remnant from the moral taints or pervasive defilements or pollutants (āsava), namely the pollutant of sense-desire (kammāsava), the pollutant of craving for continued existence (bhavāsava), and the pollutant of ignorance of the four noble truths (avijjāsava).”

Morality, Concentration and Wisdom

Then the Buddha, after staying at Rājagaha for as long as he wished, said to Ven. Ānanda: “Come, Ānanda, let us go to the Ambalaṭṭhikā Mango Grove.” – “Very well, sir,” Ven. Ānanda replied.

The Buddha addressed Ven. Ānanda from among the many monastics surrounding him because Ven. Ānanda was always in close attendance.

Having expressed his assent to the Buddha, Ven. Ānanda signalled to the monastics: “Friends, make ready with your alms bowl and double robe. The Fortunate One intends to go to the Ambalaṭṭhikā garden.”

Then the Buddha, accompanied by many monastics, went to the Ambalaṭṭhikā garden where he stayed at the King’s rest house. While there also, considering his approaching death, the Buddha discoursed to the monastics on the same theme: “Such is morality (sīla); such is concentration (samādhi); such is wisdom (paññā). Concentration that is developed through morality is highly efficacious and productive. Wisdom that is developed through concentration is highly efficacious and productive. The mind that is developed through wisdom is thoroughly liberated without any remnant from the moral taints or pollutants (āsava), namely the pollutant of sense-desire (kammāsava), the pollutant of craving for continued existence (bhavāsava), and the pollutant of ignorance of the four noble truths (avijjāsava).”

Herein, in the passage: “Such is morality, such is concentration, such is wisdom,” morality (sīla) refers to mundane morality, that is, the four kinds of monastic precepts (catu-pārisuddhi-sīla); concentration means mundane concentration at the threshold of perfect concentration (upacāra-samādhi) and perfect concentration (appanā-samādhi) itself. Wisdom means mundane insight wisdom (vipassanā-paññā). All these three factors are the necessary conditions for path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa).

“Concentration developed through morality,” means supermundane concentration pertaining to path and fruition, path concentration and fruition concentration. Concentration of path is highly efficacious because it leads to the fruition of the noble one’s knowledge (ariya-phala). Fruition itself means direct result. It is also highly productive because it has the advantage (ānisaṃsa) of liberation or pacification. Advantage here means the indirect result or consequence. The same interpretation should be understood for similar statements that follow. Concentration of fruition produces the direct result of abandoning the burning defilements through tranquillity (paṭippassaddhi-pahāna), and gives the indirect result or consequence of the peace of cessation or extinction of defilements.

“Wisdom developed through concentration,” means supermundane knowledge of the paths (magga-ñāṇa) and fruitions (phala-ñāṇa). Its direct result and indirect result or consequence should be construed as in the case of concentration.

“The mind developed through wisdom,” here, wisdom means mundane insight (vipassanā-paññā) and wisdom associated with absorption (jhāna); mind here means supermundane consciousness of path and fruition. Path consciousness completely eradicates defilements as abandoning by cutting off (samuccheda-pahāna). Fruition-consciousness thoroughly liberates one from the moral taints by abandoning through tranquillity (paṭipassaddhi-pahāna). [1008]

Then the Buddha, after staying at the Ambalaṭṭhikā garden for as long as he wished, said to Ven. Ānanda: “Come, Ānanda, let us go to the town of Nāḷanda.” – “Very well, sir,” Ven. Ānanda assented, and called upon the monastics to accompany the Buddha.

Ven. Sāriputta’s Brave Utterance

Then the Buddha, accompanied by many monastics, went to the town of Nāḷanda and stayed at the Mango Grove of Pāvārika, the rich man. At that time, Ven. Sāriputta approached the Buddha, and after paying respects to him, entered into a stirring and remarkable dialogue with him.

Ven. Sāriputta: “Venerable sir, as regards Perfect Awakening, I am convinced that there has never been nor is there, nor will there be any ascetic or Brahmin who can excel the Fortunate One.”

Buddha: “You say solemnly and with certitude, like the brave sound of a lion’s roar, that as regards Perfect Awakening, you are convinced that there has never been nor is there, nor will there be any ascetic or Brahmin who can excel the Fortunate One. How is it Sāriputta, do you know definitely in your mind the minds of those Arahāt, Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddhas of the past so that you can assert such was their practice of morality (sīla), such was their practice of concentration (samādhi), such was their wisdom (paññā), such was their manner of abiding in the sustained attainment of cessation, such was their emancipation?”

“I have no such knowledge, venerable sir.”

“How is it then, Sāriputta, do you know definitely in your mind, the minds of those Arahāt, Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddhas of the future, so that you can assert such will be their practice of morality, such will be their practice of concentration, such will be their wisdom, such will be their manner of abiding in the sustained attainment of cessation, such will be their emancipation?”

“I have no such knowledge, venerable sir.”

“How is it, Sāriputta, do you know definitely in your mind, the mind of myself, the present Buddha, the Arahāt, the Perfectly Self-Awakened, so that you can assert such is the practice of morality of the Fortunate One, such is the strength of the concentration of the Fortunate One, such is the wisdom of the Fortunate One, such is the manner of the Fortunate One’s abiding in the sustained attainment of cessation, such is the emancipation of the Fortunate One?”

“I have no such knowledge, venerable sir.”

“Sāriputta, if you do not have the faculty of reading another person’s mind (ceto-pariyāya-ñāṇa), by which you can know definitely the minds of the Arahāt, the Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddhas of the past, the future and the present, how can you say solemnly and with certitude, and sounding like a lion’s roar, that as regards Perfect Self-Awakening, you are convinced that there has never been, nor will there be any ascetics or Brahmins who can excel the Fortunate One?”

“Venerable sir, I do not have the faculty of reading another person’s mind by which I can know definitely the minds of the Arahāt, the Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddhas of the past, the future and the present. But I do have the knowledge by inference from personal experience (Dhammanvaya-ñāṇa).

Venerable sir, if I may give an example, let us say that there is a remote border town with its solid walls built on a firm foundation which has only one arched gateway, and that there is a gate-keeper who is wise, prudent and intelligent, who would keep out strangers and would admit only persons known to him. When he makes his rounds along the roadway that encircles the town, he sees no breaks, no holes in [1009] the walls, not even one that would allow a cat to pass through it. Then he will come to the conclusion rightly that all big creatures that enter or leave the town do so only by that single gateway.

In the same way, venerable sir, I am possessed of the knowledge by inference from personal experience. Venerable sir, thus I know that all the Arahāt, the Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddhas, who had arisen in the past, had abandoned the five hindrances (nīvaraṇa) that defile the mind and weaken the intellect had well established their minds in the four methods of steadfast mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna), had correctly cultivated the seven factors of Awakening (bojjhaṅgam) and will attain Supreme Perfect Self-Awakening.”

Perfect Self-Awakening (Sammā-sambodhi-ñāṇa), is a term encompassing the path-knowledge of an Arahāt (magga-ñāṇa) and omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa), which pertain to the Buddhas only.

“Venerable sir, thus I know that all the Arahāt, the Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddhas who will arise in the future will abandon the five hindrances that defile the mind and weaken the intellect; will well establish their minds in the four methods of steadfast mindfulness, will correctly cultivate the seven factors of Awakening and will attain Supreme Perfect Self-Awakening.

Venerable sir, thus I know that the Arahāt, the Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddha also, who has arisen in the world, has abandoned the five hindrances; has well established his mind in the four methods of steadfast mindfulness; has correctly cultivated the seven factors of Awakening, and has attained Supreme Perfect Self-Awakening.

Venerable sir, all these conclusions I make are due to the knowledge by inference from personal experience which I am possessed of.”

This was the stirring and remarkable dialogue that took place between Ven. Sāriputta and the Buddha.

During the sojourn at the Mango Grove of Pāvārika the rich man in the town of Nāḷanda, also considering his approaching death, the Buddha discoursed to the monastics on the same theme: “Such is morality; such is concentration; such is wisdom. Concentration that is developed through morality is highly efficacious and productive. Wisdom that is developed through concentration is highly efficacious and productive. The mind that is developed through wisdom is thoroughly liberated without any remnant from the moral taints or pervasive pollutants (āsava), namely the pollutant of sense-desire (kāmāsava), the pollutant of craving for continued existence (bhavāsava), and the pollutant of ignorance of the four noble truths (avijjāsava).”

The Buddha’s Discourse on Morality

Then after staying at the town of Nāḷanda for as long as he wished, the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Come, Ānanda, let us go to Pāṭali village.” – “Very well, venerable sir,” said Ven. Ānanda, and he called upon the monastics to accompany the Buddha. Then the Buddha, accompanied by many monastics, went to Pāṭali village.

When the lay devotees of Pāṭali village heard that the Buddha had arrived at their village, they were very glad, for they had the great good fortune of having to receive the Buddha even without asking for it. They had just finished building a guest-house. They thought how appropriate it would be if their first guest was the Buddha himself. “We shall request the Fortunate One to accept our offering of the guest-house and we will listen to the Fortunate One’s words of appreciation of our good deed.” They approached the Buddha, made obeisance to him, and sat at a suitable distance. Then they said to him: “May it please the Fortunate One to accept our new guest-house as his living quarters during his sojourn.” The [1010] Buddha showed his consent by remaining silent.

Having received the Buddha’s consent, the lay devotees of Pāṭali village rose from their seats, made obeisance to him and went to their guest-house. They made it ready for use by furnishing it with floor coverings throughout, arranging separate seats, filling the big water pots and lighting the lamps. They arranged with the mothers to feed their infants early that evening and to put them to bed. Then they went back to the Buddha, made obeisance to him, and stood on one side. They said to him: “Venerable sir, at the guest house, the floor has been covered throughout with floor-coverings, separate seats have been arranged, big water pots have been filled and lamps have been lit. May the Fortunate One proceed there when he wishes to.”

The new guest-house was built by the villagers at the centre of the village. The main purpose in building it was to house visiting officials of the Licchavīs and the Magadhans who often came and stayed at Pāṭali village, which was a border village. It was essential for the village because they had to surrender their houses to the visiting officials for their temporary lodging for a month or so on each occasion. The new guest-house would now ease the situation. It was well arranged for the use of visiting officials with living quarters as well as strong rooms for the upkeep of treasures. At the time of the Buddha’s visit to the village it had just been completed. At first the villagers thought that the Buddha might prefer to dwell in the forest and so they did not make it ready to receive him. Only when the Buddha consented to put up there, did the villagers prepare things to make it ready for his stay.

Then the Buddha, at evening time, arranged his robes, and taking his alms bowl and double robe, proceeded to the guest-house accompanied by the monastics. After washing his feet, he entered the guest-house where he sat against the middle post, facing east. The monastics also washed their feet and entered the guest-house, and sat against the west wall, facing east, with the Buddha in front of them. The lay devotees of Pāṭali village also washed their feet and entered the guest-house, and sat against the east wall facing west, with the Buddha in front of them. Then the Buddha discoursed on the five disadvantages (ādīnava) befalling an immoral person and the five advantages that bless a person of virtue.

Five Disadvantages for an Immoral Man

“Householders, five disadvantages descend on an immoral person who lacks morality. What are the five?

1. Householders, in this world, the immoral person who lacks moral virtue, suffers great loss in fortune through heedlessness. This is the first disadvantage befalling an immoral person who lacks morality.

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji – 1500

2. Householders, furthermore, the ill-repute of an immoral person who lacks moral virtue, spreads far and wide. This is the second disadvantage befalling an immoral person who lacks morality.
3. Householders, furthermore, an immoral person who lacks moral virtue in the midst of any class of society, whether among the ruling class, or the recluses or the Brahmin class, or the wealthy, looks diffident and uneasy. This is the third disadvantage befalling an immoral person who lacks morality.
4. Householders, further more, an immoral person who lacks moral virtue, dies in a bewildered (sammūḷha) state. This is the fourth disadvantage befalling an immoral person who lacks morality.
5. Householders, furthermore, an immoral person who lacks moral virtue, after death and dissolution of the body is destined to fall into the miserable existences of hell (Niraya). This is the fifth disadvantage befalling an immoral person who lacks morality. [1011]

Householders these are the five disadvantages befalling an immoral person through lack of morality.”

Five Advantages for a Virtuous Person

“Householders, five advantages bless a virtuous person for his being virtuous. What are the five?

1. Householders, in this world, a virtuous person who possesses moral virtue acquires great wealth through being heedful. This is the first advantage that waits on a virtuous person for his being virtuous.
2. Householders, furthermore, the good reputation of a virtuous person who possesses moral virtue spreads far and wide. This is the second advantage that waits on a virtuous person for his being virtuous.
3. Householders, furthermore, a virtuous person who possesses moral virtue in the midst of any class of society whether among the ruling class, or the recluses, or the Brahmin class, or the wealthy, can hold up his head and look anyone in the eye. This is the third advantage that waits on a virtuous person for his being virtuous.

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji – 1501

4. Householders, furthermore, a virtuous person who possesses moral virtue dies without any bewilderment. This is the fourth advantage that waits on a virtuous person for his being virtuous.
5. Householders, furthermore, a virtuous person, who possesses moral virtue after death and dissolution of the body is destined to the fortunate existences of the heavenly worlds (deva-loka). This is fifth advantage that waits on a virtuous person for his being virtuous.

Householders, these are the five advantages that wait on a virtuous person for his being virtuous.”

Although this discourse was addressed to lay persons it also applies to monastics.

1. With a lay person, lack of moral virtue may lead to committing evil deeds such as killing. As he indulges in evil, he tends to forget his usual means of livelihood, such as cultivation or trading, thereby incurring great losses of property. Worse still, his evil deed might be illegal under the law proclaimed by the king such as killing of animals, and he is liable to criminal punishment. If he steals, he also commits a crime equally liable to punishment. Thus, his lack of moral virtue can bring him great losses of property.

Similarly, a monastic lacking morality, being heedless, loses virtue, loses the good doctrine, the word of the Buddha, loses absorption (jhāna), and loses the seven noble properties of noble ones (ariya). The seven noble properties of the noble ones (satta-ariya-dhanāni) are:

1. Faith in the Three Treasures and productive deeds (saddhā-dhana).
2. Wealth of morality (sīla-dhana).
3. Wealth of conscience about wrong doing (hiri-dhana).
4. Wealth of concern about wrong doing (ottappa-dhana).
5. Wealth of vast knowledge (suta-dhana).
6. Wealth of charity (cāga-dhana).
7. Wealth of wisdom through path and fruition attainments (paññā-dhana).

2. An immoral man earns a bad repute so that he is written off as an outcaste, useless for this world and hopeless for future worlds. “This man is so stingy that he would not even take part in offering alms food by drawing lots,” this is the kind of name he builds up for himself. All the four kinds of assemblies see him in that light only.

Similarly, in the case of a monastic who lacks moral virtue, ill repute follows that monastic who is loose in monastic morality, does not take up serious learning of the good doctrine, makes a living by the practice of medicine, or similar methods of livelihood abhorred by the Buddha, and his behaviour is marked by six kinds of disrespect, which spreads among the four kinds of assemblies. [1012]

3. An immoral lay person is always pricked by a guilty conscience for the misdeeds he has done. Therefore, he does not dare to face the crowd. “Someone there might recognize me,” he fears, “and I might be apprehended and sent to the authorities.” That is why, in any of the four kinds of assemblies, he holds his face down and his shoulders stooping, and uneasily keeps on scratching the earth with a stick. He keeps his mouth shut as far as possible.

Likewise, an immoral monastic feels uneasy to face an assembly which might have knowledge of his misdeeds, in which case he might have to face punishment under the Vinaya process such as expulsion. Therefore, he goes into the assembly with great misgivings and speaks little. Some immoral monastic, however, might put up a bold face and might wander around in the Saṅgha, but in his heart he is feeling miserable only.

4. An immoral person, whether lay or monastic, may put up pretences while living but, on his death bed, his evil deeds appear before him in their respective sense spheres. He feebly opens his eyes to see the present world, and then closes his eyes to see his oncoming world where he finds no solace whatever. His imminent destination, the four worlds of the downfall (apāya), becomes vividly clear to him. He feels great pangs of conscience as if thrust by 100 spears on his head. “Help me! Help me!” he screams in desperation and then breathes his last. This is what the Buddha means by saying he dies in a state of bewilderment.

5. The fifth disadvantage befalling an immoral person needs no explanation.

The advantages that wait on a virtuous person may be known as the opposite of the above five disadvantages befalling an immoral person.

The Buddha then went on late into the night instructing the lay devotees of Pāṭali village on other topics including the happy consequences of their donation of the guest-house, thereby pointing out the benefits of the doctrine, exhorting them to set themselves up in the practice thereof, and gladdening them in the practice. Then he sent them away, saying: “Householders, the night is far advanced, you may leave when you wish.”

“Very well, venerable sir,” the devotees of Pāṭali village said in assent, and paying respects to him, departed respectfully. Then not long after their departure, the Buddha retired in seclusion.

“The Buddha retired in seclusion,” should be understood as referring to a separate part of the guest house screened off for privacy. A cot had been placed there for the Buddha, and he considered that the devotees would earn much merit if he were to use the guest house in all the four bodily postures. Therefore, he lay on the cot on his right side and rested.

The Founding of Pāṭaliputta

At that time, two Brahmins, Sunidha and Vassakāra, chief ministers of Magadha kingdom, were building a fortified city at the site of Pāṭali village to keep out the Vajjī princes. During that period, many Devas in groups of 1,000 each, were occupying plots of land in Pāṭali village.

In the location where the Devas of great power were occupying the officials responsible for the building of the city were inclined to build houses for princes and the king’s ministers of great power. In the location where the Devas of medium power were occupying, there, the officials responsible for the building of the city were inclined to build houses for princes and king’s ministers of medium power. And in the location where the Devas of lesser power were occupying, there, the officials responsible for the building of the city were inclined to build houses for princes and king’s ministers of lesser power.

Herein, among the city builders there were officials learned in the science of building sites. They knew, by their specialised knowledge, the status of the proposed building sites down to a depth of 30 cubits as to which area is occupied by powerful serpents or Nāgas, which, by Yakkhas, or which, by Bhūtas; or where a slab of rock is lying underneath, or where an old tree stump is hidden. Accordingly, those learned ones took the necessary measures by reciting [1013] mantras or by blessing, so that they were able to proceed smoothly as if they were building the city in consultation with Devas.

Another explanation: The officials responsible for the building of the city were possessed by the Devas who occupied various locations and these

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji – 1504

Devas would leave their bodies after the four corners of the building site have been marked out. Prospective human occupants, who were endowed with confidence in the Three Treasures, were possessed by the Deva occupants of the sites who were equally endowed with confidence in the Three Treasures. Prospective human occupants who lacked confidence in the Three Treasures were possessed by the Deva occupants of the sites who lacked confidence in the Three Treasures. The reason is this: The Devas, who were endowed with confidence in the Three Treasures, influenced the mind of the prospective human occupants who had confidence in the Three Treasures, trusting that the new occupants would invite the Saṅgha to their newly built house and hear discourses on auspicious occasions and that the Devas would get the opportunity to see the virtuous monastics and hear the Dhamma. They also expected the new occupants to share their merit from offerings made to the Saṅgha.

The Buddha saw with his divine eye (dibba-cakkhu) how the Devas in groups of 1,000 each were occupying plots of land at Pāṭali village. Then he woke up at dawn and asked Ven. Ānanda: “Who are those building a city at the site of Pāṭali village?”

Ven. Ānanda replied: “Venerable sir, the Brahmins Sunidha and Vassakāra, chief ministers of Magadha kingdom, are building a fortified city to keep out the Vajjī princes.”

“Ānanda, the chief ministers are building the fortified city as though they were acting in consultation with the Devas of the Tāvātimsa Realm. Ānanda, I have seen with my divine eye how the Devas, in groups of 1,000 each, were occupying plots of land at Pāṭali village.

Ānanda, in the locations where the Devas of great power are occupying, there, the officials responsible for the building of the city are inclined to build houses for princes and king’s ministers of great power. In the locations where the Devas of medium power are occupying, there the officials responsible for the building of the city are inclined to build houses for princes and king’s ministers of medium power. In the locations where the Devas of lesser power are occupying, there the officials responsible for the building of the city are inclined to build houses for princes and king’s ministers of lesser power. Ānanda, three catastrophes will bring about the downfall of the city of Pāṭaliputta. They are fire, floods, and internal dissension.”

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji – 1505

Thus the Buddha was predicting that a part of Pāṭaliputta would be destroyed by fire, a part of it would be washed away by the river Ganges, and a part of it would be destroyed by internal dissension.

After saying this, the Buddha went to the river Ganges to wash his face and awaited the time to go on alms round.

Then Sunidha and Vassakāra remembered that since their King Ajātasattu was a lay supporter of the ascetic Gotama, it would only be proper if they were to invite the Buddha to an offering of a meal, because they would be seeing him in the village of Pāṭali. Further, they considered it a wise thing to request the ascetic Gotama, to bless their city-building project with auspicious words, for then the black devils would be driven away from the city site. So both went to the Buddha and stood at a suitable distance. After exchanging memorable words of felicitation, they said to him: “May it please the revered Gotama and the company of monastics to accept our offering of food for today.” The Buddha, by his silence signified his acceptance.

Then the Magadhan chief ministers, Sunidha and Vassakāra, knowing that the Buddha had accepted their invitation, went to the place where they were putting up, and having prepared the choicest food and delicacies, informed the Buddha by messengers who said: “Revered Gotama, it is time to proceed. The food offering is ready.”

Then in the morning, the Buddha rearranged his robes, and taking his alms bowl and [1014] double robe, went in the company of the monastics to the place where the two Magadhan chief ministers were being housed, and sat at the place prepared for him. Sunidha and Vassakāra attended to the Buddha and the monastics, offering the choicest food and delicacies with their own hands till they signified they had had enough, causing them to stop. When the Buddha had finished his meal and had removed his hand from his alms bowl, Sunidha and Vassakāra took low seats and sat at a suitable distance.

To Sunidha and Vassakāra, who were thus seated, the Buddha expressed his pleasure and appreciation by three verses in Pāli:

Yasmim padese kappeti, vāsam paṇḍita-jātiyo, sīlavantettha bhojetvā, saññate brahmacārayo.

Brahmins, when the wise man makes offerings of food to those possessed of virtue, self-control and purity of life at the place where he has made his home, he should share the merit of his offering with the Devas who are the guardians of that place.

Yā tattha devatā āsum, tāsam dakkhiṇam-ādise, tā pūjitā pūjayanti, mānitā mānayanti nam.

If the Devas are honoured thus, they will give protection to him, as their way of honouring him in return. If they are revered thus, they help him out of trouble, as their way of revering him in return.

Tato nam anukampanti, mātā puttam va orasam, devatānukampito poso, sadā bhadrāni passatī.

The wise man comes under the protection of the Devas who safeguard him, just as a mother safeguards her own son. That person is blessed with auspiciousness at all times.

After expressing his pleasure and appreciation in these verses to the Magadhan chief ministers, Sunidha and Vassakāra, the Buddha rose from his seat and left.

Then Sunidha and Vassakāra followed the Buddha all along the route, thinking: “We shall call the gateway, by which the revered Gotama leaves today, the Gotama Gateway, and the landing place, by which the revered Gotama crosses the Ganges, the Gotama Landing Place.”

The gateway by which the Buddha left that day came to be known as the Gotama Gateway. Then the Buddha went to the river Ganges. At that time the river was full to the brim so that a crow on the bank might easily drink from it.

Then in the instant it might take a strong man to stretch out his bent arm or bend in his out stretched arm, the Buddha vanished from this side of the Ganges and reappeared on the other shore together with the company of monastics.

The Buddha saw the people who wanted to cross from one shore to the other, some of whom were looking for boats, some for log rafts, and some were making bamboo rafts. Then he, understanding the matter, uttered these joyous words in exultation:

“The noble ones (ariya) have crossed the deep and wide river of craving (taṇhā) by building the bridge of the noble path, upon having overcome the quagmire of moral defilement. As for the multitudes, they have to build rafts just to cross this insignificant river, the Ganges. However, the noble ones (ariya) who have crossed the river of craving by means of the noble path of eight constituents have no need to make rafts.”

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji

The Four Noble Truths

Then the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Come Ānanda, let us go to Koṭi village.” – “Very well, venerable sir,” Ven. Ānanda said, and then called the monastics. The Buddha, accompanied by a company of monastics, went to Koṭi village and dwelt there.

The village was called Koṭi because it was the place where the pinnacle from which King Mahāpanāda fell.

During that time, the Buddha discoursed to the monastics on the four noble truths thus: “Monastics, it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of the four noble truths that I, as well as yourselves, have had to fare along the lengthy course of the round of existences in Saṃsāra, never stopping, but ever repeating, from one existence to the next. What are the four truths that are not understood?”

1. Monastics, it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of the noble truth of suffering (dukkha-ariya-sacca) that I, as well as yourselves, have had to fare along the lengthy course of the round of existences, never [1015] stopping, but ever changing, from one existence to the next repeatedly.
2. Monastics, it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of the noble truth of the origin of suffering (samudaya-ariya-sacca) that I, as well as yourselves, have had to fare along the lengthy course of the round of existences, never stopping, but ever changing, from one existence to the next repeatedly.
3. Monastics, it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of the noble truth of the cessation of suffering (nirodha-ariya-sacca) that I, as well as yourselves, have had to fare along the lengthy course of the round of existences, never stopping, but ever changing, from one existence to the next repeatedly.
4. Monastics, it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of the noble truth of the path to the cessation of suffering (magga-ariya-sacca) that I, as well as yourselves, have had to fare along the lengthy course of the round of existences, never stopping, but ever changing, from one existence to the next repeatedly.

Monastics, now I have properly understood the noble truth of suffering, I have penetrative knowledge of it; I have properly understood the noble truth of the origin of suffering, I have penetrative knowledge of it; I have properly understood the noble truth of the cessation of suffering, I have penetrative knowledge of it; I have properly understood the noble truth of the path to the cessation of suffering, I have penetrative knowledge of it. Craving for existence (bhava-taṇhā) has been completely uprooted, leaving no trace of it. The craving for existence in me, which is like a rope that drags one to renewed existence, has become extinct. Now, for me there will be no more rebirths.”

“Proper understanding,” means insight knowledge conforming to, and preceding path and fruition. It is mundane knowledge, and is called understanding (anubodhi).

“Penetrative knowledge,” means penetrative knowledge of the paths and fruitions itself that destroys the defilements. It is called penetration (paṭivedha).

After the Buddha had spoken the above words, he further said this in verses:

*Catunnaṃ ariya-saccānaṃ, yathā-bhūtaṃ adassanā, saṃsitāṃ dīgham-addhānaṃ, tāsu tāsveva jātisu.
Tāni etāni diṭṭhāni, bhava-netti samūhatā, ucchinnaṃ mūlaṃ dukkhassa, natthi dāni punabbhavo.*

Passing from this existence to that, faring through the long course of Saṃsāra, is necessitated by a lack of understanding of the four noble truths as they really are. I have fully understood those four noble truths. Craving for existence, that rope which drags one to rebirth, has been cut off completely. The root of suffering (dukkha) has been thus eradicated. For me there will be no more rebirths.

While the Buddha was staying at that Koṭi village also, considering his approaching death, he discoursed to the monastics on the same theme: “Such is morality (sīla); such is concentration (samādhi) such is wisdom (paññā). Concentration that is developed through morality is highly efficacious and productive. Wisdom that is developed through concentration is highly efficacious and productive. The mind that is developed through wisdom is thoroughly liberated without any remnant from the moral taints or pollutants (āsava), namely the pollutant of sense-desire (kammāsava), the pollutant of craving for continued existence (bhavāsava) and the pollutant of ignorance of the four noble truths (avijjāsava).”

The Mirror of Wisdom

Then, after staying at Koṭi village for as long as he wished, the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Come, Ānanda, let us go to Nātika village.” – “Very well, sir,” said Ven. Ānanda, and he called the monastics for the journey. The Buddha went to Nātika village accompanied by many monastics and stayed in a brick building.

Herein, Nātika was a twin village founded by two cousin brothers [1016] who sited it near a reservoir. Thus the village got its name, the village of relatives (ñātika). In the Pāḷi word the ñ became corrupted into n, and hence the name Nātika. In that twin village there was a brick monastery which was the place of the Buddha’s sojourn.

During that time Ven. Ānanda approached the Buddha and asked these questions: “Venerable sir, in Nātika village, a monastic by the name of Sāḷha has passed away. What is his destination? What is his next existence?”

Venerable sir, in this same Nātika village, a nun named Nandā has passed away. What is her destination? What is her next existence?”

Venerable sir, in this same Nātika village, a devotee named Sudatta has passed away. What is his destination? What is his next existence?”

Venerable sir, in this same Nātika village, a devotee named Sujātā has passed away. What is her destination? What is her next existence?”

Venerable sir, in this same Nātika village, a devotee named Kukkuṭa ... Kāḷimba ... Nikaṭa ... Kaṭissaha ... Tuṭṭha ... Santuṭṭha ... Bhaddha ... a devotee named Subhadda has passed away. What is his destination? What is his next existence?”

To these questions the Buddha answered them, one by one thus: “Ānanda, due to the extinction of the pollutants (āsava), Sāḷha the monastic had realized in this very life emancipation of mind (Arahatta-phala-samādhi) and emancipation through wisdom (Arahatta-phala-paññā) and he died an Arahāt.

Ānanda, through the eradication of the five fetters that lead to rebirth in the sensuous sphere, the lower planes of existence, Nandā the female monastic has been reborn spontaneously in the Brahma realm. She died a Non-returner (Anāgāmi), with no possibility of returning from that Brahma existence and will realize Parinibbāna there.

Ānanda, through the eradication of the three fetters: wrong view of the five aggregates as a self (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), uncertainty and doubts (vicikicchā) and belief in religious practices outside of the noble path (sīlabbata-parāmāsa), and through the lessening of passion (rāga), hatred (dosa) and delusion (moha), Sudatta the devotee was a Once-returner (Sakadāgāmi). He will make an end of suffering (dukkha) after being reborn in the human world only once.

Ānanda, through the eradication of the three fetters: the wrong view of the five aggregates as a self, uncertainty, and belief in religious practices outside of the noble path, Sujātā the female devotee, was a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna), who is not liable to fall into the four lower worlds of the downfall (apāya), destined for the fortunate existences, and is firmly set on the path of spiritual progress marked by the three higher paths.

Ānanda, the devotee named Kukkuṭa ... Kāḷimba ... Nikaṭa ... Kaṭissaha ... The devotee named Tuṭṭha ... Santutta ... Bhaddha ... the devotee named Subhadda, through the eradication of the five fetters that lead to rebirth in the sensuous sphere, the lower planes of existence, has been reborn spontaneously in the Brahma realm. He died a Non-returner (Anāgāmi), with no possibility of returning from that Brahma existence and will realize Parinibbāna there.

Ānanda over 50 devotees from Nātika village who have died were Non-returners (Anāgāmi) by virtue of having eradicated the five fetters that lead to rebirth in the sensuous sphere, the lower planes of existence, destined for [1017] spontaneous rebirth in the Brahma realm, with no possibility of returning from that Brahma existence and they will realize Parinibbāna there.

Ānanda over 90 devotees of Nātika village who have died were Once-returners (Sakadāgāmi), who had eradicated the three fetters: Wrong view of the five aggregates as a self (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), uncertainty and doubts (vicikicchā), belief in religious practices outside of the noble path (sīlabbata-parāmāsa), and have lessened passion (rāga), hatred (dosa) and delusion (moha). They will make an end of suffering (dukkha) after being reborn in the human world only once.

Ānanda, over 500 devotees from Nātika village, who have died, were Stream-enterers through the eradication of the three fetters. They are not liable to fall into the lower worlds of the downfall (apāya), and were destined for fortunate existences, and are bound to attain the three higher paths.

Ānanda, this ability to tell about the destination of people is something which anyone endowed with knowledge of the Dhamma can have in respect of himself. It is not a mysterious art that belongs only to the Realised One. Ānanda, if the Realised One were to be approached and asked as to the destination of every person who has died, it would be quite bothersome for him.

As such, Ānanda, a noble (ariya) disciple, who possesses the mirror of wisdom can, if he wishes to, say of himself: “I shall never be reborn in the realm of continuous suffering in Niraya, nor in the animal world, nor in the realm of wretched spirits burning with thirst and hunger (peta), nor in any of the four lower worlds of the downfall (apāya), I am certain to be reborn only in the fortunate existences. I am bound to attain the three higher paths.” I shall expound this discourse on the mirror of wisdom. Ānanda, what is this mirror of wisdom?

1. Ānanda, in this teaching, the noble (ariya) disciple has unshakable confidence in the Fortunate One, being convinced that the Fortunate One is worthy of homage (Araham); he is Perfectly Self-Awakened (Sammā-sambuddha); he is possessed of perfect knowledge and good conduct (vijjā-caraṇa-sampanna); he speaks only what is beneficial and true (Gracious One); he knows all the three worlds (loka-vidū); he is incomparable in taming those who deserve to be tamed (anuttara-purisa-damma-sāratthi); he is the Awakened One, knowing and teaching the four noble truths (Buddha); and he is the Fortunate One (Bhagavā).
2. The noble (ariya) disciple has unshakable confidence in the Dhamma, being convinced that the Dhamma expounded by the Fortunate One is well expounded (svākkhāta); its truths are personally apperceivable (sandiṭṭhika); its practice yields fruit immediately (akālika); it can stand investigation (ehipassika); it is worthy of being perpetually borne in mind (opaneyyika); and it can be seen, realized and enjoyed by the wise, each according to his own capacity (paccattam veditabbo viññūhi).
3. The noble (ariya) disciple has unshakable confidence in the Saṅgha, being convinced that the Saṅgha are endowed with the right practice

(supaṭipanna), having the threefold training in morality, concentration and wisdom; they are endowed with straightforward uprightness (uju-paṭipanna); they are endowed with righteous conduct (ñāya-paṭipanna), and they are endowed with conduct which inspires awe and respect (sāmāci-paṭipanna). Thus conducting themselves well in these four ways, serving as four grounds for their worthiness, the Saṅgha, comprising eight individual types of four pairs is worthy of offerings, even those brought from afar; worthy of offerings specially prepared for guests; worthy of offerings made for the sake of acquiring great merit, worthy of receiving obeisance; they are the incomparably fertile soil for all to sow the seed of merit, thus they are worthy in these five ways. [1018]

4. The noble (ariya) disciple is endowed with the moral precepts (sīla) which tend to liberation from bondage to craving, which are extolled by the wise, which are not subject to misconception, which make for concentration, and which are unbroken, intact, unchequered, and unspotted, and which are cherished by the noble ones (ariya).

Ānanda, a noble (ariya) disciple who is endowed with the above four factors of the mirror of wisdom can, if he so desires, say of himself: I shall never be reborn in the realm of continuous suffering called Niraya; or in the animal world, or in the realm of wretched spirits burning with thirst and hunger (petā) or in any of the four lower worlds of the downfall (apāya); I am certain to be reborn only in the fortunate existences. I am bound to attain the three higher paths. This discourse is called The Mirror of Wisdom.”

While at the brick monastery at Nātika village as well, the Buddha, considering his approaching death, discoursed to the monastics on the same theme: “Such is morality (sīla); such is concentration (samādhi), such is wisdom (paññā). Concentration that is developed through morality is highly efficacious and productive. Wisdom that is developed through concentration is highly efficacious and productive. The mind that is developed through wisdom is thoroughly liberated without any remnant from the pollutants (āsava), namely the taint of sense-desire (kammāsava), the taint of craving for continued existence (bhavāsava), and the taint of ignorance of the four noble truths (avijjāsava).”

The Courtesan Ambapālī

Then after staying at Nātika village for as long as he wished, the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Come, Ānanda, let us go to Vesālī.” – “Very well venerable sir,” said Ven. Ānanda, and called upon the monastics for the journey. The Buddha, accompanied by many monastics, went to Vesālī and stayed at courtesan Ambapālī’s Mango Grove.

At that time, 500 of the monastics in the Buddha’s company were young men who had joined the Saṅgha recently and were weak in diligence. They would soon be seeing Ambapālī who would be coming to greet the Buddha. In order that the young monastics might not lose mindfulness on setting their eyes on the charming courtesan the Buddha prepared their minds by giving a discourse thus:

“Monastics, a monastic should dwell in mindfulness and clear comprehension. This is my exhortation to you. Monastics, how should a monastic remain mindful? Monastics, in this teaching, a monastic keeps his mind on the body with diligence, comprehension and mindfulness, steadfast by contemplating it as body, so as to keep away sense-desires and distress that would otherwise arise in him. He keeps his mind on feelings with diligence, comprehension and mindfulness, steadfastly contemplating it as feeling, so as to keep away sense-desires and distress that would otherwise arise in him. He keeps his mind on the mind steadfastly contemplating it as mind, so as to keep away sense-desires and distress that would otherwise arise in him. He keeps his mind on mind-objects (dhamma) steadfastly contemplating them as mind-objects so as to keep away sense-desire and distress that would otherwise arise in him. Monastics, this is how a monastic remains mindful.

Monastics, how does a monastic exercise clear comprehension? Monastics, in this teaching, a monastic exercises clear comprehension in moving forward or back; in looking straight ahead or sideways; in bending or stretching out; in wearing the double robe, or in carrying the alms bowl and robes; in eating, drinking, chewing, savouring food; in defecating and urinating; in walking, standing, sitting, falling asleep, waking, speaking, or in remaining silent.

Monastics, this is how a monastic should exercise clear comprehension.

Monastics, a monastic should dwell in mindfulness and clear comprehension.

This is my exhortation to you.” [1019]

When Ambapālī the courtesan heard the news that the Buddha had arrived at Vesālī and was staying at her Mango Grove, she had the most excellent carriages harnessed for the great occasion to visit the Buddha, and mounting on the carriage and accompanied by other excellent vehicles, she left the city of Vesālī for her Mango Grove. After riding in the carriage for as far as it could properly go, she dismounted and approached the Buddha on foot. She made obeisance to him and sat in a suitable place.

To Ambapālī the courtesan who was seated at a suitable distance the Buddha pointed out the benefits of the doctrine, exhorted her to set herself up in the practice of the Dhamma, and gladdened her in the practice. After the Buddha had pointed out to her the benefits of the doctrine, exhorted her to gladden her in the practice, Ambapālī the courtesan said to the Buddha: “Venerable sir, may it please the Fortunate One to accept my offering of food for tomorrow, together with the company of monastics.” The Buddha accepted the invitation by way of his silence. Then, Ambapālī, knowing that the Buddha had accepted her invitation, rose from her place, made obeisance to him, and left respectfully.

The Licchavī Princes

When the Licchavī princes of Vesālī heard that the Buddha had arrived at Vesālī and was staying at the Mango Grove of Ambapālī, they ordered the most excellent carriages harnessed, and mounting these vehicles, they left the city, accompanied by other excellent carriages, which were kept in reserve.

Some of the Licchavī princes were garbed in dark blue uniform and, wearing dark blue ornaments, they took on a dark blue appearance. Some of them were garbed in yellow uniform, and wearing yellow ornaments, they took on a yellow appearance. Some of them were garbed in red uniform, and, wearing red ornaments, they took on a red appearance. Some of them were garbed in white uniform, and wearing white ornaments, they took on a white appearance.

Not only were the dark blue uniformed princes wearing dark blue ornaments, they painted themselves in unguents of dark blue colour. Furthermore, the chariots they rode in were also finished in dark blue, studded with dark blue gems, and harnessed by horses with embellishments of the same colour; even the whips and the flags fitted to the chariot were also of the same colour. The same applies to the remaining colour groups among the Licchavī princes.

Then Ambapālī, the courtesan let her carriage bump against the carriages of the young Licchavī princes, axle against axle, wheel against wheel and yoke against yoke. Thereupon, the Licchavī princes said to Ambapālī the courtesan: “Look, you Ambapālī, why do you let your carriage bump against the carriage of young Licchavī princes, axle against axle, wheel against wheel and yoke against yoke?”

“Princes! It is because I have invited the Fortunate One together with his company of monastics to a meal offering tomorrow.”

“Now then, Ambapālī, give us the privilege to offer this meal to the Fortunate One in exchange for 100,000!”

“Princes, even if you were to give me Vesālī together with its fief territories, I would not give up the privilege to offer this meal.”

At those brave words of Ambapālī, the Licchavī princes, fluttering their fingers in admiration, exclaimed: “Oh men, we have been outdone by this young woman! We have been outdone by this young woman!”

Then the Licchavī princes rode on to Ambapālī Mango Grove. The Buddha saw the splendid sight of the Licchavī princes trooped in various colours, and said to the monastics: “Monastics, let those monastics who have never seen the Tāvatiṃsa Devas [1020] look at the array of Licchavīs; let them look at them carefully; let them feast their eyes on the Licchavīs, as if the Licchavī groupings were the Tāvatiṃsa Devas.”

In this context, the Buddha said to the monastics: “Let them feast their eyes on the Licchavīs as if the Licchavī groupings were the Tāvatiṃsa Devas,” not in the sense of regarding the splendid sight as something to be cherished. It is said here to impress the monastics about human glory that is comparable to the glory of celestial beings. It is a way of inspiring some of the monastics as in the usual pattern of discourses, beginning with the benefits of giving (dāna-kathā), the benefits of observance of morality (sīla-kathā), including the fortunate existences in Deva realms (sagga-kathā) and culminating in the faults of sensual pleasures (kāmānaṃ ādīnavā kathā).

And yet the question remains: “Why does the Fortunate One urge the monastics to look at the Licchavīs, which might lead some monastics in the audience to think that sight is something good, something to be cherished?” In many of the Buddha’s discourses, the usual instruction is not to regard sense objects such as visual objects, as something beautiful (subha). “But how is it that here the same instruction is not given?”

The answer is this: the Buddha says so in the interest of the monastics. Here is the explanation. Some of the monastics, among the audience were not diligent in monastic practice. The Buddha wishes to show them that monastic practice can lead to the sort of human glory possessed by the Licchavīs. Compare this with the Buddha’s method of arousing the initial interest of Nanda in monastic practice by taking him to the Deva realms and showing the glory of Devas (Ud 3.2).

Further, the Licchavīs would in due course furnish a concrete example of the impermanence of things. For these Licchavīs, so high in their present state, comparable even to Tāvatisa Devas, are bound to meet their ruin in the hands of King Ajātasattu. The monastics, who remember the greatness of the Licchavīs, will soon have occasion to see their downfall. Then these monastics will gain insight readily into the impermanence of sentient beings, leading to Awakening with the four discriminative knowledges (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa). This is the second and more important reason for the Buddha’s urging the monastics to have a close look at the Licchavī princes.

Then the Licchavī princes rode in their carriages as far as their vehicles could go and then they alighted and walked towards the Buddha. They made obeisance to the Buddha and sat at a suitable distance. To the Licchavī princes thus seated, the Buddha pointed out the benefits of the Dhamma, exhorted them to set themselves up in the practice of the Dhamma, and gladdened them in the practice. After he had pointed out to them the benefits of the Dhamma, exhorted them to get established in the practice of the Dhamma, and gladdened them in the practice, the Licchavī princes said to him: “Venerable sir, may it please the Fortunate One to accept our offering of food for tomorrow together with the company of monastics.” Then the Buddha said to them: “Licchavī princes, I have already accepted the offering of food for tomorrow by Ambapālī the courtesan.” Thereupon the Licchavī princes, fluttering their fingers in admiration, exclaimed: “Oh men, we have been outdone by the young woman! We have been outdone by the young woman!”

Then the Licchavī princes expressed their appreciation and delight at the Buddha’s discourse, rose from their seats, made obeisance to him and left respectfully.

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji – 1518

In this connection, it might be asked: “Since the Licchavī princes knew from Ambapālī that she had invited the Fortunate One and his company of monastics to the next day’s meal, why did they make the invitation to the Fortunate One?” The answer is: Because the Licchavīs did not believe Ambapālī’s word; and because they set a high value on the lay supporters’ obligations.

More explanations on this: The Licchavī princes did not take Ambapālī’s words at face value because they [1021] regarded her as a fallen woman; and secondly, it is customary for lay supporters to invite the Saṅgha to a food offering when they are going home after listening to a discourse.

Ambapālī Donates Her Mango Grove

Then, after the night had passed, Ambapālī, having had the choicest food and delicacies prepared in her Mango Grove, informed the Buddha by messengers who said: “Venerable sir, it is time to proceed. The food offering is ready.” Then in the morning, the Buddha arranged his robes, and taking his alms bowl and double robe, went to the house of Ambapālī, accompanied by his company of monastics, and sat at the place prepared for him.

In this context, Ambapālī’s house should be understood to mean the pleasure park of hers in the Mango Grove, and not her permanent residence in the city of Vesālī. This fact is clearly indicated by her words to the Buddha which say: “I give this grove in donation to the Buddha.” The Chapter about Medicines (Bhesajjakkhandhaka, Vin Mv 6) is also specific about this; it says: “Ambapālī the courtesan offered food to the Fortunate One and his company of monastics at her pleasure park in her grove, and donated her Mango Grove to the Saṅgha headed by the Fortunate One.”

Ambapālī attended on the monastics headed by the Buddha respectfully offering the choicest food and delicacies with her own hands. After the meal, she sat at a suitable distance and said to the Buddha: “Venerable sir, I give this pleasure park (ārāma) in donation to the Saṅgha headed by the Fortunate One.” The Buddha accepted the donation and after giving a discourse on the Dhamma to Ambapālī, he rose and departed.

While the Buddha was sojourning at the Mango Grove of Ambapālī in Vesālī, there too he repeatedly expounded the importance of morality, concentration and wisdom, the threefold monastic training.

The Buddha's Last Rains Retreat

Then the Buddha, after staying at Ambapālī's Mango Grove for as long as he wished, told Ven. Ānanda his wish to go to Veḷuva village in the vicinity of Vesālī and he proceeded there accompanied by a big company of monastics. During his stay at Veḷuva village the Buddha said to the monastics: “Monastics, enter upon the Rains Retreat (Vassa) in the vicinity of Vesālī at the monasteries of your friends and acquaintances. As for me, I am going to pass the Rains Retreat in this Veḷuva village.”

“Very well, venerable sir,” the monastics replied, and they entered into the Rains Retreat at the monasteries of friends and acquaintances in the vicinity of Vesālī. The Buddha himself entered the Rains Retreat at Veḷuva village.

The Buddha told the monastics to dwell during the Rains Retreat period in the various monasteries in the neighbourhood of Vesālī because Veḷuva village was too small to provide daily alms food to a great number of monastics whereas the many monasteries around Vesālī could collect alms food without difficulty.

The reason for the Buddha's orders to the monastics to stay not far away from Vesālī was that he knew that he would enter Parinibbāna in the next ten months, so if the monastics were allowed to go and dwell at far away places, some of them might not be able to pay their last respects to him when he passed away, and they would feel very sorry for the lack of any hint from him about his oncoming demise. By staying around Vesālī, they could get the opportunity of listening to his discourses, eight times a month. So it was out of compassion for the monastics that the Buddha limited the area of Rains Retreat (Vassa) dwelling for the monastics to the neighbourhood of Vesālī. [1022]

A Severe Illness

After the Buddha had entered into the Rains Retreat (Vassa) period at Veḷuva village he was afflicted with a very severe illness that caused excessive pain near unto death. He bore the pain and neutralised it by remaining mindful with clear comprehension, having insight knowledge that reflected on the impermanence, suffering, and unsubstantiality of sensation. It now occurred to him: “It would not be proper for me to pass away in the attainment of Nibbāna without letting the attendant monastics know, without taking leave of the Saṅgha. It would be well for me to keep off this ailment by insight meditation (vipassanā-bhāvanā), the precursor to fruition-knowledge, and then by abiding in the life-maintaining and sustaining absorption in fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti).”

Accordingly, the Buddha kept off the ailment through insight meditation and by abiding in the life-maintaining fruition-attainment. Then the Buddha’s illness faded.

The continuous process of psycho-physical phenomena kept going by the force of productive deeds (kamma) is called life-maintaining effort (jīvita-saṅkhāra). The prolonging of this process of psycho-physical phenomena through fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti) is also called life-maintaining effort (jīvita-saṅkhāra). This life-maintaining process or effort is also the life-sustaining process (āyu-saṅkhāra).

The Arahāt fruition (phala-samāpatti) of the Buddha is of three kinds: The fruition attainment immediately following path attainment, the fruition attainment that can be resorted to, and life-maintaining attainment (āyu-saṅkhāra). Of those three:

1. The three impulsion thoughts that arise immediately consequent to the Buddha’s Arahāt path (Arahatta-magga) thought process the path-impulsion thoughts having the character to fructify immediately (akālika), are called fruition-attainment immediately following path attainment (maggānantara-phala-samāpatti).
2. The sustained absorption that the Buddha may at any time later enter at will is called fruition attainment that can be resorted to (vaḷañjana-phala-samāpatti). This is the enjoyment of the peace of Nibbāna. The Buddha entered into this kind of absorption at any possible odd moments, even while the audience expressing appreciation by saying: Sādhu, sādhu, sādhu, during a discourse.
3. The insight meditation entered into by the Buddha at Veḷuva village as the preliminary effort to enter into the absorption of fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti) is the same as the contemplation that the Bodhisatta had practised on the threshold of Awakening under the Mahā Bodhi tree. It consists in contemplating the three characteristics of physical and mental phenomena. Having first established himself in this insight-meditation, the Buddha made a solemn wish that he be free from any ailment for ten months up to the full moon of May (Vesākha). After that he entered upon fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti). This absorption of fruition-attainment had the desired effect of quelling the severe illness and the freedom from all disease for ten whole months. Therefore this third type of fruition-attainment is called the life-maintaining attainment.

Details of the method of insight-meditation preceding this fruition-attainment called the material (rūpa-sattaka) and immaterial septad (nāma-sattaka) may be gathered from The Path of Purification (Visuddhimagga, Chapter XX).

Of the above three kinds of fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti), the first two, the fruition attainment immediately following path attainment, and the fruition attainment that can be resorted to are referred to as temporary (khaṇika) fruition-attainments (phala-samāpatti) in the commentaries and sub-commentaries while the third is called life process (jīvita-saṅkhāra) fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti).

The distinction between the temporary (khaṇika) fruition-attainments and life process fruition-attainment should be noted. The temporary fruition-attainments are preceded by the ordinary mode of entering into insight-meditation, whereas life process fruition-attainment is preceded by a higher mode of insight-meditation called the immaterial septad (nāma-sattaka), which requires greater effort. These two types of insight meditation have, therefore, different effects on the fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti) that immediately follow them. The former can put off ailment only while the absorption lasts, just like a stone falling on a moss covered surface of water can clear away the moss while the impact of the stone lasts, but will let the moss gather together on the spot later. The latter can put off ailment for a desired period, here for ten months, just like when a strong man were to descend into the lake, clear away the moss from the desired area so that the moss is kept away for some considerable time.

The Buddha came out of his monastery soon after his recovery, and sat in the shade of the monastery on the seat prepared for him. Then Ven. Ānanda approached him, [1023] paid his obeisance and, having sat at a suitable distance, said: “Venerable sir, I see the Fortunate One now at ease. I find the Fortunate One now in good health. But, venerable sir, although I now see the Fortunate One like this, when the Fortunate One was ill, I felt heavy and stiff in my body. I could hardly distinguish between the directions. I became befuddled, unable to comprehend things such as the methods of steadfast mindfulness. However, I got a little comfort from the thought that the Fortunate One would not pass away so long as he had not left any instructions concerning the Saṅgha.”

Thereupon the Buddha explained his position regarding the Saṅgha thus: “Ānanda, what more could the Saṅgha expect from me? For I have taught them without discrimination with an inner circle of disciples or an outer circle of disciples. Ānanda, in the matter of the teaching, I do not keep back anything as if it were some secret held in the closed fist of a mean teacher. Ānanda, if someone should desire that he alone should have sole control over the Saṅgha, or that the Saṅgha should rely on him alone, then it would be for such a person to leave any instructions concerning the Saṅgha. But Ānanda, I have no desire that I alone should have sole control over the Saṅgha, or that the Saṅgha should rely on me alone. Since I have no such desire, why should I leave any instruction concerning the Saṅgha?

Ānanda, I am now grown old, far gone in years, and have arrived at the last stage of life. I am turning 80 years of age. And just as an old worn-out cart is kept going only by additional efforts and care so my body is kept going by the additional effort of the life-maintaining fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti). Ānanda, it is only when the Realised One remains abiding in the Arahat fruition-attainment, unconcerned with material objects through the cessation of some mundane sensations, and through ceasing to attend to any signs of conditioned phenomena, that the Realised One’s body is at greater ease.

Therefore, Ānanda, let yourselves be your own refuge; let yourselves, and not anyone else, be your refuge. Let the Dhamma be your firm ground, and let the Dhamma, and not anything else, be your refuge. Ānanda, how does a monastic make himself his own refuge, make himself and not anyone else, his refuge? How does he make the Dhamma his firm ground, and make the Dhamma, and not anything else, his refuge?

Ānanda, in this teaching, a monastic keeps his mind on the body with diligence, comprehension and mindfulness, steadfastly contemplating it as body, so as to keep away sense desires and distress that would otherwise arise in him. He keeps his mind on sensation with diligence, comprehension, and mindfulness, steadfastly contemplating it as sensation, so as to keep away sense desires and distress that would otherwise arise in him. He keeps his mind on the mind, so as to keep away sense desires and distress that would otherwise arise in him. He keeps his mind steadfastly contemplating it as mind, so as to keep away sense desires and distress that would otherwise arise in him. He keeps his mind on mind objects (dhamma), steadfastly contemplating them as mind objects so as to keep away sense desires and distress that would otherwise arise in him. Ānanda, thus a monastic makes himself his own mainstay, makes himself, and not anyone else, his refuge. Thus he makes the Dhamma his firm ground, and makes the Dhamma, and not anything else, his refuge.

Ānanda, those monastics who, either now or after I have passed away, make themselves their own refuge, make themselves, and not anyone else, their refuge; who make the Dhamma their firm ground, and make the Dhamma, and not anything else, their refuge, all such monastics are sure to attain to the highest state, to become Arahats, among all the monastics who cherish the threefold training.”

Thus did the Buddha conclude the discourse culminating in the highest attainment of the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala). [1024]

The Demise of the Two Chief Disciples

After spending the last Rains Retreat (Vassa) period at Veḷuva village, the Buddha left the village for Sāvattthī. Travelling by stages, he arrived at Sāvattthī and he stayed in the Jetavana monastery. It was about the eighth day of the lunar month of November (Kattikā).

On that day, Ven. Sāriputta, knowing that he had just seven days more to live, bade farewell to the Buddha and took a seven-day journey to his native village, Nālaka village in the province of Rājagaha. There in the brick house where he was born, Ven. Sāriputta passed away and entered Parinibbāna on the full moon day of November (Kattikā).

After the funeral rites were finished, Ven. Cunda, younger brother of Ven. Sāriputta, took Ven. Sāriputta’s alms bowl, robes, etc., together with the remains to Sāvattthī. These relics were enshrined under the Buddha’s instruction at Sāvattthī. Thereafter, the Buddha went to Rājagaha. When he was in Rājagaha, on the day of the new moon in November, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna entered Parinibbāna. The relics of Ven. Mahā Moggallāna were enshrined under the Buddha’s instructions at Rājagaha.

Details of these important events will be described in chapter 43 on the Saṅgha.

After that, the Buddha proceeded on his journey and, travelling by stages, arrived at Ukkacelā. There, at the landing place on the river Ganges, he gave a Discourse at Ukkacelā concerning the demise of the two chief disciples, (Ukkacela-sutta, SN 47.14).

Then, in the morning, he went into Vesālī on his alms round, and after his meal, leaving the eating place, he said to Ven. Ānanda: “Ānanda, bring the sitting mat, let us go to the Cāpāla shrine to spend the day there.”

“Very well, venerable sir,” said Ānanda, and taking a leather sheet seat, followed closely behind the Buddha.

The Buddha Hints about His Passing

Then the Buddha approached the Cāpāla shrine and sat on the seat spread out for him. Ven. Ānanda paid respects to him, and seated himself at a suitable distance. Then the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda by way of clear hints: “Ānanda, whosoever has cultivated, practised, used as a vehicle, taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the four bases of psychic power (iddhi-pāda) could, if he so wished, live for the maximum lifespan or even beyond the maximum lifespan. Ānanda, the Realised One has cultivated, practised, used as a vehicle, taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the four bases of psychic power. Therefore, Ānanda, the Realised One could, if he so wished, live for the maximum lifespan.”

Although the Buddha thus gave clear hints, Ven. Ānanda failed to grasp them. And so it did not occur to him to entreat the Buddha in these terms: “May the Fortunate One, for the welfare of mankind, for the benefit, well-being and happiness of Devas and humans, out of compassion for the world, live for the maximum lifespan! May the one who speaks only what is true and beneficial live for the maximum lifespan!” Ven. Ānanda’s mind was like that of one possessed by Māra.

In this connection: The Udena shrine (cetiya) was a temple built on the site where the Yakkha Udena was traditionally propitiated. The other shrines at Vesālī likewise were traditional places of worship in respect of traditional deities. Regarding the term aeon (kappa) in this context: Kappam vā tiṭṭheyya kappāvasesam vā, is unanimously taken to mean lifespan (āyu-kappa) by the commentators and sub-commentators. [1025]

Only Ven. Mahāsīva took a different interpretation. According to him: “The Buddhas never make claims about their powers without some good cause. That being so, the Fortunate One could repeatedly resort to entering into the absorption of fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti) and go on prolonging his life by ten-month periods up to the end of the present aeon which is marked by five Buddhas. Yet the Buddha did not choose to do so. Why not? The Buddha probably had thought thus: human beings with corporeality born of productive deeds are subject to decay. The Buddhas do not wish to present themselves with their decrepit bodies which naturally show after the four-fifths of the lifespan has passed. That is why it is customary for all Buddhas to pass away when they have attained four-fifths of the lifespan, when their physical appearance is still firm and inspiring for the devotees.

There is also another practical consideration: if a Buddha were to survive most of his great disciples and were surrounded by youthful monastics, the people would say: “Oh! What sort of disciples the Buddha has!” Thus, Ven. Mahāsīva maintained the practical considerations that Buddhas take into account in not exercising their power of living till the end of the aeon. However, Ven. Mahāsīva’s views were not accepted by the commentators, who take lifespan as the meaning of āyu-kappa on the authority of the commentary on the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya).

The view of Ven. Mahāsīva was also rejected by the sub-commentary on the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya), where it says: “Ven. Mahāsīva’s view contains a statement that human beings are subject to decay, which implies that decay cannot be postponed by psychic power. In that case, it also implies that death cannot be prevented by psychic power. Therefore, the argument is inherently unsound. Only the view taken by the commentary should be taken as the sound view, and not that of Ven. Mahāsīva.”

In this matter, Ven. Mahāsīva would appear to take only one point as primary consideration, and that is, that a Bodhisatta’s resultant-kamma, in his last existence, has the power to prolong life for an infinite period. And that view coupled with the authority of the Pāḷi text that the life-maintaining fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti) of Buddhas can postpone fatal ailment, leads Ven. Mahāsīva to claim that if the Buddha so wishes, he might live on throughout the end of the present aeon.

Even though the resultant-kamma of a Bodhisatta in his last existence is supposed to prolong life for an infinite period, that infinite period can be literally true only if the prevailing lifespan is also an infinite period, but if the prevailing lifespan is 100 years, that so-called infinite period can last just 100 years. That is so because the power of productive deeds (kamma) has its effect limited by the extent of the prevailing times, physical basis of the person, effort taken, and the plane of existence. That is why the miscellaneous teaching (pakiṇṇaka-desanā) of the ancient commentary takes the meaning of āyu-kappa as the prevailing lifespan. This view has also been maintained by the new commentators, such as Ven. Buddhaghosa, Ven. Dhammapāla, etc.

As regards the expression: “Possessed by Māra,” the twelve kinds of distortions (vipallāsa) should be noted.

1. Impermanence (anicca) is held as permanence (nicca) through the illusion of perception; the illusion of thought; and through the illusion of views.
2. Pain (dukkha) is held as pleasure (sukha) through the illusion of perception; the illusion of thought; and the illusion of views.
3. Non-self (anatta) is held as self (atta) through the illusion of perception; the illusion of thought; and the illusion of views.
4. Loathsomeness (asubha) is held as lovely (subha) through the illusion of perception; the illusion of thought; and the illusion of views. [1026]

One who is free from all these illusions, and we can take Ven. Mahā Moggallāna as an example, cannot fall victim to Māra’s influence mentally, a worldly who has not rid of any of these illusions or a noble one (ariya) who has overcome some of these illusions but still has some remaining in him is liable to be possessed by Māra.

Ven. Ānanda still had these four illusions: The illusion of perception and the illusion of thought that made pain appear as pleasure; the illusion of perception and the illusion of thought that made the loathsome appear as lovely. Hence, he was targeted by Māra.

The way Māra possesses his victim is by frightening him out of his wits, either by creating a dreadful vision or a dreadful sound. When the victim is thus frightened, he loses consciousness, leaving his mouth agape. Māra then would insert his hand through the open mouth and take hold of the heart exerting pressure on it. The victim lies in a senseless state totally possessed by Māra.

In the case of Ven. Ānanda, Māra could not insert his hand through the mouth and oppress the heart. He merely presented some dreadful sense object before Ven. Ānanda, under the influence of which Ven. Ānanda could not think of the significance of the Buddha’s intimation.

For a second time the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda ... and for a third time the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Ānanda, pleasant is the city of Vesālī. And pleasant are the shrines of Udena, Gotamaka, Sattamba, Bahuputta, Sāranda and Cāpāla. Ānanda, whosoever has cultivated, practised, used as a vehicle, taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the four bases of psychic power (iddhi-pāda) could, if he so wished, live for the maximum lifespan or even beyond the maximum lifespan. Ānanda, the Realised One has cultivated, practised, used as a vehicle, taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the four bases of psychic power. Therefore, Ānanda, the Realised One could, if he so wished, live for the maximum lifespan.” Thus the Fortunate One gave clear hints.

Although the Buddha thus gave clear hints, Ven. Ānanda failed to grasp them. And so it did not occur to him to entreat the Buddha in these terms: “May the Fortunate One, for the welfare of mankind, for the benefit, well-being and happiness of Devas and humans, out of compassion for the world, live for the maximum lifespan! May the Fortunate One live for the maximum lifespan!” Ven. Ānanda’s mind was like that of one possessed by Māra.

Herein, it might be asked: “Why did the Fortunate One, knowing well that Ven. Ānanda was being possessed by Māra, repeat his words of intimation three times?”

The answer is this: The Buddha foresaw that later, when Māra had released Ven. Ānanda, he would then regain his senses. Ven. Ānanda would then entreat him to live the whole of the lifespan. In that event, he would have reason to blame Ven. Ānanda for his failure to make the request at the proper time and that this blaming would have the effect of attenuating Ven. Ānanda’s grief.

Then the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Go now, Ānanda. Now you know the time to go.” – “Very well, venerable sir,” said Ven. Ānanda, then arising from his seat, he made obeisance to the Buddha and went to sit at the foot of a tree, not far away from him.

Māra’s Request

Soon after Ven. Ānanda had left the Buddha’s presence, Māra, the Wicked One, approached him and, standing at a certain place, addressed him thus: “Venerable sir, let the Fortunate One realize Parinibbāna now, let the Fortunate One pass away! Venerable sir, it is time now for the Fortunate One to pass away. [1027]

Venerable sir, the Fortunate One had said this to me: ‘Wicked One, I shall not pass away so long as my disciples, the male monastics, are not yet well versed in the doctrine, not yet well disciplined in the threefold training, not yet sure of the righteousness of their conduct, not yet possessed of wide knowledge, not yet able to memorize the teaching, not yet able to practise according to the teaching leading to the supermundane, not yet able to take up the proper practice, not yet settled in their practice; not yet able to expound, to set forth, to show, to establish, to elucidate, to analyse, or to make evident their teacher’s doctrine that they have learnt; so long as they are not yet able to thoroughly refute on righteous grounds such other doctrines as may arise, and expound the wonderful teaching.’

Venerable sir, now that the Fortunate One’s disciples, the monastics, are well versed in the doctrine, are well disciplined in the threefold training, are sure of the righteousness of their conduct, are possessed of wide knowledge, are able to memorize the teaching, are able to practise according to the teaching leading to the supermundane, are able to take up the proper practice, are settled in their practice; are able to expound, to set forth, to show, to establish, to elucidate, to analyse, or to make evident their teacher’s doctrine that they have learnt; now they are able to thoroughly refute on righteous grounds such other doctrines as may arise, and expound the wonderful teaching. Venerable sir, let the Fortunate One realize Parinibbāna now, let the Fortunate One pass away! Venerable sir, it is time now for the Fortunate One to pass away.

Venerable sir, the Fortunate One had said this to me: ‘Wicked One, I shall not pass away so long as my female monastics ... my male lay-disciples ... my female lay-disciples are not yet well versed in the doctrine, not yet well disciplined in the threefold training, not yet sure of the righteousness of their conduct, not yet possessed of wide knowledge, not yet able to memorize the teaching, not yet able to practise according to the teaching leading to the supermundane, not yet able to take up the proper practice, not yet settled in their practice; not yet able to expound, to set forth, to show, to establish, to elucidate, to analyse, or to make evident their teacher’s doctrine that they have learnt; so long as they are not yet able to thoroughly refute on righteous grounds such other doctrines as may arise, and expound the wonderful teaching.’

Venerable sir, now that the Fortunate One’s female lay disciples are well versed in the doctrine, are well disciplined in the threefold training, are sure of the righteousness of their conduct, are possessed of wide knowledge, are able to memorize the teaching, are able to practise according to the teaching leading to the supermundane, are able to take up the proper practice, are settled in their practice; are able to expound, to set forth, to show, to establish, to elucidate, to analyse, or to make evident their teacher's doctrine that they have learnt; now they are able to thoroughly refute on righteous grounds such other doctrines as may arise, and expound the wonderful teaching. Venerable sir, let the Fortunate One realize Parinibbāna now, let the Fortunate One pass away! Venerable sir, it is time now for the Fortunate One to pass away.

Venerable sir, the Fortunate One had said to me thus: 'Wicked One, I shall not pass away so long as this teaching of mine, which is the practice of purity, is not yet sufficiently established among the disciples, not yet prosperous, widespread, or has not reached the multitudes, and become renowned, to the extent that it can be thoroughly made known by wise Devas and humans.'

Venerable sir, now that the Fortunate One's teaching, which is the practice of purity, is sufficiently established among the disciples, is now prosperous, widespread, has reached the multitudes, and is renowned to the extent that it can be thoroughly [1028] made known by wise Devas and humans. Venerable sir, let the Fortunate One realize Parinibbāna now, let the Fortunate One pass away! Venerable sir, it is time now for the Fortunate One to pass away."

This was the third time Māra requested the Buddha to pass away. The first time was during the eight weeks of Buddha's sojourn in the vicinity of the Bodhi tree, after he had attained Perfect Self-Awakening. At that time he said to the Buddha: "Venerable sir, as the result of your fulfilling the perfections with the aim at Buddhahood, you have now become the Buddha. You have attained Perfect Self-Awakening. What benefit would be there from your wandering from town to town, village to village, teaching your doctrine for the welfare of the world of living beings? Venerable sir, let the Fortunate One realize Parinibbāna now ..."

The second time Māra, having seen that the Buddha had assented to Brahma Sahampati's request to preach the doctrine, approached him, when he was sitting beneath the Goat-herder's Banyan Tree where he stayed for the seventh week after Awakening. Māra was feeling miserable at the prospect of his domain getting lost to the Buddha whose doctrine would lead the multitudes to the deathless. So, in spite of the Buddha's promise to Brahma Sahampati, he decided to try to change the mind of the Buddha in an attempt to prevent the Buddha's propagating the Dhamma by making a second request to pass away, in words similar to the first request.

At that time the Buddha replied to Māra that so long as his monastics, female monastics, male lay disciples and female lay disciples were not well versed in the doctrine, not yet well disciplined in the threefold training, not yet sure of the righteousness of their conduct, not yet possessed of wide knowledge, not yet able to memorize the teaching, not yet able to practise according to the teaching leading to the supermundane, not yet able to take up the proper practice, not yet settled in their practice; not yet able to expound, to set forth, to show, to establish, to elucidate, to analyse, or to make evident their teacher's doctrine that they have learnt; so long as they are not yet able to thoroughly refute on righteous grounds such other doctrines as may arise, and expound the wonderful teaching, he would not pass away. Māra in his third request, therefore, referred to the reasons the Buddha gave on that second request.

On being requested thus, the Buddha said to Māra the Wicked One: "Wicked One, don't you worry; the Parinibbāna of the Realised One will not be long in coming. Three months hence the Realised One will realize Parinibbāna."

The Buddha Renounces the Life-Process

Then the Buddha, while at Cāpāla shrine, decided mindfully and with deliberation to give up the life-maintaining mental process at the end of three months, and not to resume the absorption of fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti). On the Buddha's making that resolution, the great earth quaked with a hair-raising and goose-flesh causing vehemence.

Then the Buddha, perceiving this phenomenal occurrence, uttered a joyous utterance in verse.

*Tulam-atulañ-ca sambhavaṃ, bhava-saṅkhāram-avassaji muni,
ajjhata-rato samāhito,
abhindi kavacam-ivatta-sambhavaṃ.*

The great sage, having weighed the infinite Nibbāna against the ephemeral nature of sentient existence, has cast off by the noble path the resultant-producing volitions that cause fresh existence. With delight in insight-meditation, reflecting on the three characteristics of the five aggregates, and with complete calm of mind, he has destroyed the tenacious defilements that enwrap him like a tight coat of chain-mail.

The meaning of the verse is further expanded: [1029] The Buddha gained the four noble paths paths after cultivating meditation for calm and insight-meditation. As a brave warrior at the battlefield would cut loose, with his sharp sword, the tight coat of chain mail that he is wearing, so also the Buddha has completely destroyed the defilements with the four path-knowledges. Just as when the tap-roots of a tree are cut off, the fruit-producing potential of the tree is terminated the moment the defilements are destroyed, the potential for rebirth that has been cumulating from the beginningless Saṃsāra was terminated in the mental makeup of the Buddha.

In the statement: “The Fortunate One decided mindfully and with deliberation to give up the life-maintaining mental process,” mindfully means the Buddha’s mind dwelled at all moments on the four foundations of steadfast mindfulness: body, sensations, mind and mind objects. Reflecting wisely on these four foundations, he recalled how he had borne the burden of the five aggregates over such a long, weary journey of Saṃsāra, and that he was now free from the burden; and that to enable him to cast aside this burden, he had for over four immeasurable periods (asaṅkhyeyya) and 100,000 aeons fulfilled the perfections, the prerequisites for the noble path. Now that he was established in the path which he had long aspired after, he was able to dwell on the four foundations of mindfulness, having had penetrative insight into the loathsomeness, suffering, impermanence and non-self of conditioned phenomena.

“With deliberation,” means the Buddha pondered on the benefits he had brought for himself and for others. For his own benefit, he had obtained his goal of Buddhahood at the foot of the Bodhi tree. As for the benefit for others he had, by his teaching the Dhamma, caused the multitudes to gain liberation from the round of suffering (dukkha). He would be bringing an end to that mission in the next three months, on the full moon of May (Vesākha). These thoughts which the Buddha considered led to the decision, by means of his Buddha-knowledge, to give up the life-maintaining mental process.

In the expression: “To give up the life-maintaining mental process (āyusaṅkhāra),” it is a term capable of two meanings, the interaction of mind and matter kept going by the process that sustains life, conditioned by productive deeds (kamma), is one meaning. The formless fruition-attainment (ārūpa-loka-phala-samāpatti) that acts as a condition for prolonging life is the other meaning.

“To give up the life-maintaining mental process,” means the Buddha, was resolving that he would not re-enter into the fruition-attainment (phala-samāpatti) after three months; he would do so only up to the full moon of May (Vesākha). By that resolution, the Buddha, in effect, renounced the condition for prolonging his life beyond three months.

When the Buddha thus renounced the life-maintaining mental process, the great earth quaked in six different ways: 1) Swaying from east to west; 2) swaying from west to east; 3) swaying from south to north; 4) swaying from north to south; 5) heaving upwards; and 6) lunging downwards. This phenomenon occurred throughout the 10,000 world-element, causing people terror, with gooseflesh appearing on their skin and the body-hairs standing up.

When the Buddha had relinquished the life-maintaining mental process, he felt delightful satisfaction with the thought that the burden of the body, which he had been carrying over the long course of Samsāra, was now to be laid aside in the next three months. Since the joy at this happy prospect was so intense that it could not be contained it found expression in the joyous utterance of the above verse.

The fact that the verse was the outcome of great joy makes it evident that in relinquishing the life-maintaining mental process, the Buddha was not yielding to Māra out of fear. If it were so, how could such a joyous utterance come about? Only the happy prospect, foreseen by the Buddha-knowledge, that three months [1030] hence he would be laying down the burden of the five aggregates and making an end of all suffering (dukkha), brought forth that joyous utterance concerning his relinquishment.

Then Ven. Ānanda bethought himself: “Wonderful it is! Unprecedented it is! This hair-raising earthquake is monstrous indeed! It is really stupendous! How rolling thunders echoed and re-echoed! What is the cause of great earthquakes? What conditions them?” He approached the Buddha, made his obeisance to him, and sitting at a suitable distance, addressed the Buddha thus: “Wonderful it is! Unprecedented it is! This hair-raising earthquake is monstrous indeed! It is really stupendous! How rolling thunders echoed and re-echoed! Venerable sir, what is the cause of such great earthquakes? What conditions them?”

Eight Causes of Earthquakes

And the Buddha said: “Ānanda, there are eight causes of, or conditions leading to, great earthquakes. They are:

1. This great earth is supported by water, the water by air, the air by space. When very strong winds blow, the water is shaken. When the water is shaken, the earth is shaken. This is the first cause of, or the first condition leading to, great earthquakes.
2. Further, Ānanda, an ascetic or Brahmin who has great mental power, and who is accomplished in the supernormal powers of the mind, or a Deva of great power, by developing intense concentration on the limited image of the earth element and on the boundless image of the water-element can cause the earth to shake strongly, to sway violently, and to convulse. This is the second cause of, or the second condition leading to, great earthquakes.
3. Further, Ānanda, on the occasion of a Bodhisatta passing away in the Tusita realm and descending into the mother’s womb, mindfully and with clear comprehension, this great earth shakes, quakes strongly, sways violently, and is convulsed. This is the third cause of, or the third condition leading to, great earthquakes.
4. Further, Ānanda, on the occasion of a Bodhisatta being born, mindfully and with clear comprehension, this great earth shakes, quakes strongly, sways violently, and is convulsed. This is the fourth cause of, or the fourth condition leading to, great earthquakes.
5. Further, Ānanda, on the occasion of a Buddha attaining supremely Perfect Awakening, this great earth shakes, quakes strongly, sways violently, and is convulsed. This is the fifth cause of, or the fifth condition leading to, great earthquakes.
6. Further, Ānanda, on the occasion of a Buddha expounding the Supreme Dhamma on the four noble truths, the first discourse known as the Discourse setting the Dhamma Wheel Turning (Dhammacakkappavattana-sutta, SN 56.11), the great earth shakes, quakes strongly, sways violently, and is convulsed. This is the sixth cause of, or the sixth condition leading to, great earthquakes.

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji – 1534

7. Further, Ānanda, on the occasion of a Buddha relinquishing mindfully and with deliberation, the life-maintaining mental process, this great earth shakes, quakes strongly, sways violently and is convulsed. This is the seventh cause of, or the seventh condition leading to, great earthquakes.
8. Further, Ānanda, on the occasion of a Buddha passing away leaving no remainder of the five aggregates and enters upon Parinibbāna, realizing the ultimate peace, this great earth shakes, quakes strongly, sways violently, and is convulsed. This is the eighth cause of, or the eighth condition leading to, great earthquakes.

Ānanda, these are the eight causes of, or the eight conditions leading to great earthquakes.”

Some elaboration on the above eight factors:

1. Earthquakes occur due to the unstable conditions of the elements of the cosmos. The great earth is supported by a mass of air which is 960,000 leagues thick. Above that mass of air, there is a mass of water which is 480,000 leagues thick. Above that mass of water lies the great earth which is 240,000 leagues thick. The lower half of the thickness, 120,000 leagues, of the earth is granite while the upper half of [1031] the same thickness is earth.

When the elements become unstable and powerful winds blow across the surface of the normal mass of air, the mass of air is temporarily displaced so that its support of the mass of water is withdrawn. The mass of water then drops abruptly, leading to a sudden drop of the mass of the great earth. When the extraordinarily strong winds become calm again, the mass of air returns to its normal level, resumes its function of supporting the mass of water, and rises up again. This leads to the rising up of the great earth. Thus, strong winds that blow due to unstable conditions of the elements are the causes of earthquakes. This phenomena is present all the time, occurring occasionally. This sudden falling and rising of the earth is not noticed because of the thickness of the great earth.

2. Earthquakes due to powerful persons: Persons possessed of psychic power can cause earthquakes by means of that power. The method they employ is by entering into absorption (jhāna), with water as the object of concentration and thereby causing the upheaval of the great earth. They cause the earthquake for some noble purpose, just as Ven. Mahā Moggallāna caused the Vejayanta pinnacled mansion of Sakka to shake for the purpose of arousing spiritual urgency in others; and novice Saṅgharakkhita also did the same thing to inquire after something.

Novice Saṅgharakkhita

Novice Saṅgharakkhita, the nephew of Ven. Mahānāga, was a remarkable novice who became an Arahat even while his head was being shaved at the time of entering into the Saṅgha. He reflected whether there had appeared before, any monastic who could cause the Vejayanta mansion of Sakka to shake, and seeing none, he attempted to do it. But he could not do it. Seeing his attempt fail, the Devakaññā who belonged to the group of dancers at Sakka’s palace ridiculed him. “Son, you are too young to try to do such a thing; this Vejayanta mansion is too strong for you,” they said to him.

Novice Saṅgharakkhita bethought himself: “I am being ridiculed by these Devakaññā because I lack proper instruction from a teacher.” And so, he considered where his preceptor Ven. Sāmuḍḍika Mahānāga could be found, and knowing that the latter was spending the day in a cave underneath the great ocean, he went there and stood in worshipful posture before the elder.

“So you failed to shake the Vejayanta mansion because you joined battle even before you had learned how to fight,” said the elder.

“Venerable sir, I have not received any instructions from an able teacher,” the novice said.

“Son, if such a person of psychic power as yourself cannot shake the Vejayanta mansion, who else could? Now then, you have seen some dried piece of cowdung floating along the surface of water, haven’t you? And remember, son, how the pancake maker retrieves her pancake from the frying pan by tearing off its edges first. Mark this example.” These were the elliptical words from the teacher. “That is instruction enough, venerable sir,” the novice said.

Then he made the wish: “Let the Vejayanta mansion be surrounded by water.” And the novice went to where the Vejayanta mansion stood. On seeing him return, the Devakaññā remarked: “Here he comes again, not satisfied with his disgrace. Yes, he is here again!”

When Sakka heard them, he said to them: “Do not ridicule my son. He has received instruction from an able teacher. He will shake the mansion now.” Novice Saṅgharakkhita then touched the outside beam of the Vejayanta mansion with his big toe. The mansion swayed in all the four directions, sideways as well as back and forth. Thereupon the Devakaññā cried: “Son, please stop! Leave the great mansion alone!”

Novice Saṅgharakkhita then let the Vejayanta mansion stand in its place, and standing above it, uttered the following three verses in ecstatic joy (DA PTS 2.560):

*Ajjevāhaṃ pabbajito, ajja pattāsavakkhayaṃ,
ajja kampemi pāsādaṃ, aho Buddhassuḷāratā.
Ajjevāhaṃ pabbajito, ajja pattāsavakkhayaṃ,
ajja kampemi pāsādaṃ, aho Dhammassuḷāratā.
Ajjevāhaṃ pabbajito, ajja pattāsavakkhayaṃ,
ajja kampemi pāsādaṃ, aho Saṅghassuḷāratā.*

Just today I have become a monastic. I have today become an Arahat even as my [1032] head was being shaved. And today, I have been able to shake Sakka’s mansion, having received instruction from my teacher. Excellent and marvellous indeed is the Buddha, the Perfectly Self-Awakened One. Excellent and marvellous indeed is the Dhamma, that truly leads to emancipation. Excellent and marvellous indeed is the Saṅgha, the noble ones (ariya)!

3. The third cause, the conception of a Buddha to be, and the fourth cause, the birth of a Buddha to be, are due to the superb merit of the Bodhisatta.

5. The fifth cause, the occasion of Awakening, is due to the power of the penetrative knowledge of the Buddha.

6. The sixth cause, the occasion of delivering the first discourse, is due to the power of the knowledge consisting in the power of exposition of the Buddha. On this great occasion, the guardian spirit of the great earth, showing his appreciation is figuratively said to be applauding by the great earth, according to the commentary.

7. The seventh cause is due to the power of the Buddha-knowledge in relinquishing the life-maintaining mental process, out of weariness with sentient existence which is conditioned. On this great occasion, the guardian spirit of the earth sympathized with the Buddha in the matter of decay and death which is incumbent on everyone, not excepting the Buddha, and showed his sympathy by the great earthquake.

8. The eighth cause is due to the power of the Buddha's knowledge that makes the Buddha very happy with the delightful satisfaction in having accomplished his mission that had taken him four immeasurable periods (asankhyeyya) and 100,000 aeons (kappa) for attainment of perfect peace (anupādisesa-nibbāna). As for the guardian spirit of the earth, it was an occasion for grief and lamentation. The great earthquake then is an expression of his grief and lamentation.

Eight Categories of Assemblies

When the Buddha discoursed on the eight causes of great earthquakes, Ven. Ānanda, being of great wisdom, rightly concluded that the Buddha had relinquished the life-maintaining mental process that very day. The fact is Ven. Ānanda's appraisal of the situation was known to the Buddha but he did not allow Ven. Ānanda to disrupt the discourse, and continued with other topics, such as the eight categories of assemblies, the eight means of mind mastery, and the eight liberations.

There are certain commentators who explain this action on the part of the Buddha, as his strategy of alleviating the sorrow that would arise in Ven. Ānanda, if the fact of the relinquishing of the life-maintaining mental process were to be allowed to come to the surface. The fresh topics that the Buddha takes up without interrupting are thus meant to occupy Ven. Ānanda's mind with matters other than the Buddha's oncoming passing.

“Ānanda,” said the Buddha, “there are eight categories of assemblies. There are: the assembly of nobles, the assembly of Brahmins, the assembly of householders, the assembly of monastics, the assembly of the Devas of the realm of the Four Great Kings, the assembly of the Tāvatiṃsa Devas, the assembly of the Devas led by Māra, the assembly of Brahmas.

Ānanda, I remember having attended hundreds of assemblies of nobles. In those assemblies, I sat together with them, conversed with them, and had discussions with them. While I was among them, my appearance was like their appearance and my voice was like their voice. In my discourses to them, I pointed out to them the benefits of the doctrine, exhorted them to be established in the practice of the Dhamma, and gladdened them in the practice. While I was thus discoursing to them, they did not know me. They wondered: ‘Who is this one discoursing? Is he a Deva or a man?’ After I, by my discourse, had pointed out to them the benefits of the Dhamma, and gladdened them in the practice, I vanished from there. When I vanished too, they still did not know me; and wondered: ‘Who was [1032] that who has vanished now? Was he a Deva or a man?’

Ānanda, I remember having attended hundreds of assemblies of Brahmins ... householders ... monastics ... Devas of the realm of the Four Great Kings ... Tāvatiṃsa Devas ... Devas led by Māra ... When I vanished too, they still did not know me; and wondered: ‘Who was [1032] that who has vanished now? Was he a Deva or a man?’ Ānanda, these are the categories of assemblies.”

Some examples of the great many assemblies of nobles are: The first meeting with King Bimbisāra after the Buddha had attained Awakening; the Buddha’s first visit to Kapilavatthu and meeting with his kinsmen; the Buddha’s meeting with Licchavī princes as told in Sunakkhatta’s story; and Saccaka’s story. Such meetings with nobles took place also in other world-elements, it should be presumed.

“My appearance was like their appearance,” means not the colour of the skin, but the form, for nobles had various colours of skin, some white, some black, some dark tan. As regards the form, the Buddha did not assume any particular guise, but retained his own self. Only the onlookers, the nobles, regarded them as one of them.

“My voice was like their voice” means the language that the Buddha used in speaking at the particular assembly. Regarding the voice itself, the Buddha had a voice like that of the lord of Brahmas, a voice replete with eight marvellous qualities. When the Buddha happened to be seated on a throne, the audience would think that their king was speaking in a sweet voice. Only after he had finished the discourse and left the assembly, then the audience could see their real king and they were left wondering: “Who was there sitting on the throne, who talked to us in Māgadhī on the Dhamma in such a sweet voice, and who is gone now? Was he a Deva or was he a man?” They did not know that it was the Buddha.

It might be asked: “Why did the Buddha discourse on the Dhamma to those who did not recognize him? What benefit did he see there?” The answer is: The Buddha taught them to prepare the ground for their Awakening later.

Here’s the explanation: Although those hearers of the Dhamma did not recognize the Buddha and did not take a real interest in the Dhamma, since the Dhamma is replete with the excellent qualities such as being well-delivered (svākkhāto), hearing it will serve as a necessary condition for Awakening in the future to gain the paths and fruitions.

As regards the great many assemblies of Brahmins, we have examples in the Buddha’s encounters with Soṇadanta, Kūṭadanta, and so on. Similar assemblies of Brahmins in the other [1034] world-elements can also be presumed to have taken place.

It might be asked: “What benefit did the Fortunate One see in discoursing on the eight categories of assemblies?” The answer is: The Buddha discoursed on the eight categories of assemblies to illustrate the fact that he was fearless.

Here’s the explanation: After describing the eight categories of assemblies, the Buddha continued: “Ānanda, in going amongst those eight assemblies, the Realised One had no fear. That being so, how could anyone say that the Realised One was afraid of Māra who came to him alone? Ānanda, in relinquishing the life-maintaining mental process, the Realised One did so fearlessly, with mindfulness and clear comprehension.”

These words are contained in the Miscellaneous Teaching on the Dhamma (Pakiṇṇaka-dhamma-desanā) which was not recited at the Great Council but was quoted by the commentaries.

Eight Ways of Mastery of the Mind

Then the Buddha continued his discourse without break thus: “Ānanda, there are eight ways of mind mastery (abhibhāyatana-jhāna), and overcoming the opposite phenomena and sense objects, that is, the hindrances that mar clear mental vision. These are:

1. Someone with an excellent mental capacity or intelligence, after having gained concentration at the preliminary or preparatory level on the colour of certain parts of his own body, concentrates his mind on small external forms of his choice (kaṣiṇa), which may be either unblemished or blemished. His mind gets fixed on these forms, gains mastery over them and he thus dwells in absorption (appanā-jhāna). After emerging from that absorption, he is aware that he knows and sees these forms. This is the first mind mastery (abhibhāyatana-jhāna).
2. Some other person with an excellent mental capacity or intelligence, after having gained the preliminary concentration on the colour of certain parts of his own body, concentrates his mind on big external forms (kaṣiṇa), which may be either unblemished or blemished. His mind gets fixed on these big objects, gains mastery over them, and he thus dwells in absorption. After emerging from that absorption, he is aware that he knows and sees these forms. This is the second mind mastery.
3. Some other person with an excellent mental capacity or intelligence, without taking the colour of any part of his body as an object of preliminary concentration, concentrates on small external objects (kaṣiṇa), which may be either unblemished or blemished, as objects of preliminary concentration. His mind duly gets fixed on these small forms (kaṣiṇa), gains mastery over them, and he thus dwells in absorption. After emerging from that absorption, he is aware that he knows and sees these forms. This is the third mind mastery.
4. Some other person with an excellent mental capacity or intelligence, without taking the colour of his body as an object of preliminary concentration, concentrates on big external forms (kaṣiṇa), which may be either unblemished or blemished, as objects of preliminary concentration. His mind duly gets fixed on these big forms, gains mastery over them, and he thus dwells in absorption. After emerging from that absorption, he is aware that he knows and sees these forms. This is the fourth mind mastery.

6. Some other person with an excellent mental capacity or intelligence, without taking the colour of his body as an [1035] object of preliminary concentration, concentrates on external forms (kaṣiṇa) that are yellow, with a yellow colour, yellow hue, or like Bārāṇasī fabric with a smooth finish on both sides, which is yellow and has a yellow colour, yellow hue. He concentrates on these external forms that are yellow, with a yellow colour, yellow hue, as objects of preliminary concentration. His mind duly gets fixed on them, gains mastery over them, and he thus dwells in absorption. After emerging from that absorption, he is aware that he knows and sees these forms. This is the sixth mind mastery.
7. Some other person with an excellent mental capacity or intelligence, without taking the colour of his body as an object of preliminary concentration, concentrates on external forms (kaṣiṇa) that are red, with a red colour, red hue, like a flower of the Noon Flower tree (bandhu-jīvaka) which is red, with a red colour, red hue, or like Bārāṇasī fabric with a smooth finish on both sides, which is red and has a red colour, red hue. He concentrates on these external forms that are red, with a red colour, red hue, as objects of preliminary concentration. His mind duly gets fixed on them, gains mastery over them, and he thus dwells in absorption. After emerging from that absorption, he is aware that he knows and sees these forms. This is the seventh mind mastery.
8. Some other person with an excellent mental capacity or intelligence, without taking the colour of his body as an object of preliminary concentration, concentrates on external forms (kaṣiṇa) that are white, with a white colour, white hue, like the morning star which is white, with a white colour, white hue, or like Bārāṇasī fabric with a smooth finish on both sides which is white and has a white colour, white hue. He concentrates on these external forms that are white, with a white colour, white hue, as objects of preliminary concentration. His mind duly gets fixed on them, gains mastery over them, and he thus dwells in absorption. After emerging from that absorption, he is aware that he knows and sees these forms. This is the eighth mind mastery.

Mind mastery (abhibhāyatana-jhāna): Abhibhū, means overcoming opposite external states such as hindrances; and is a state of ecstatic bliss (jhāna). It is the meditation that is possible for those with very sharp intellect who can achieve concentration quickly and thereby overcome all hindrances, and who are able to deal with either a small object or a big object of meditation, and gain mastery over it without difficulty.

To achieve mind mastery (abhibhāyatana-jhāna), a yogi may begin the preliminary or preparatory concentration by taking an internal form, such as concentrating on a certain part of his own body or an external form.

If he begins with an internal form he may choose any one of the four colours, dark blue, yellow, red or white, that consist in the various parts of his own body. For example, if he concentrates on the dark blue colour, he may concentrate on either his hair, or bile, or the pupil of the eye and impress his mind with the dark blue colour, thinking: “Dark blue, dark blue.” If he concentrates on the yellow colour, he may concentrate on either the fat, the skin, the top of the hand, or the top of the foot, or the yellowish surface of the eye-ball and impress his mind with the yellow colour, thinking: “Yellow, yellow.” If he concentrates on the red colour, he may concentrate on either the flesh, the blood, the tongue, or the reddish surface of the eye-ball and impress his mind with the red colour, thinking: “Red, red.” If he concentrates on the white colour, he may concentrate on either the bone, the teeth, the finger nails, toe nails, or the whitish surface of the eye-ball, and impress his mind with the white colour, thinking: “White, white.”

Internal forms can help set up only the preliminary concentration (parikamma), and not the full concentration (appanā-bhāvanā). The after-image or reflex image that the yogi obtains after achieving the preliminary concentration is sometimes not sufficiently clear. To get the necessary unblemished reflex image (paṭibhāga-nimitta), the yogi has to shift his object of meditation from an internal form to an external form. Then only can he get the desired sign or reflex image that can upgrade his concentration till he attains access concentration (upacāra) and full concentration (appanā) by stages. [1036]

The yogi, who begins the preliminary concentration by taking an external form as an object of meditation, can fulfil all the three stages of concentration: the preliminary stage (parikamma-bhāvanā), the threshold stage (upacāra-bhāvanā) and the absorption stage (appanā-bhāvanā).

The objects of concentration may either be small or large. For the yogi who can achieve mind mastery (abhibhāyatana-jhāna) is of very keen intellect so that he does not find any difficulty on account of the size of the object of concentration. It is like that of a person of good appetite who can eat a small amount or a big amount without difficulty. Whether the object of concentration is small or big, the yogi of this calibre achieves access concentration quickly and then immediately attains absorption (appanā-jhāna), thus overcoming all opposing mental states such as hindrances.

Regarding the first four of the eight mind masteries, a small form as object of concentration is suitable for yogis who are ruminative in nature (vitakka-carita). A big form, as object of concentration, is suitable for yogis who have a bewildered nature (moha-carita). An external form of good colour is suitable for yogis who are irritable by nature (dosa-carita). An external form of bad colour is suitable for yogis who have a strong inclination towards sensuous desire (rāga-carita).

These mind masteries were taught by the Buddha out of his own experience. As a matter of fact, he had practised them innumerable times. To some people outside the Buddha's teaching, an indefinite object can be quite daunting to be taken as a proper object of concentration, for an indefinite object may be as vast as the entire physical setting of the world of living things. As for the Buddha the extent of the object of concentration is infinite. Nothing whatever can therefore daunt the Buddha's mind. In discoursing on the eight mind masteries to Ven. Ānanda, the Buddha intended to let Ven. Ānanda understand the fearless nature of the Buddha.

“Ānanda,” the Buddha continued, “the Realised One, who has dwelt in the eight mind masteries of such a nature and has emerged from them, has no fear or dread at all. That being so, how could anyone say that the Realised One was afraid of Māra who came to him alone? Ānanda, in relinquishing the life-maintaining mental process, the Realised One did so fearlessly, with mindfulness and clear comprehension.”

These words occur in the Miscellaneous Teaching on the Dhamma (Pakiṇṇaka-dhamma-desanā) which was not recited at the Great Council but was quoted by the commentaries.

The Eight Stages of Release

Then the Buddha without any pause continued to the next subject, on the eight stages of release (vimokkha), in his discourse to Ven. Ānanda thus: “Ānanda, there are eight stages of release (vimokkha). These are:

1. Having attained absorption (jhāna) by contemplating on one’s own body, the yogi contemplates external forms as meditation objects (kaṣiṇa). This is the first release.
2. Not taking any internal object, without contemplating on one’s own body, the yogi contemplates external forms as meditation objects (kaṣiṇa). This the second release.
3. The yogi contemplates the brightness and clarity (subha) of the object of contemplation. This is the third release.
4. Having completely transcended all forms of perception to corporeality (rūpa-saññā), all forms of consciousness arising out of contact between sense and sense object (paṭigha-saññā), having disappeared and completely disregarding all other forms of multifarious consciousness (nānatta-saññā), the yogi, contemplating infinite space, achieves concentration on that object of contemplation, and dwells in the sphere of endless space (ākāśānañcāyatana-jhāna). This is the fourth release.
5. Having clearly advanced beyond the absorption on endless space, the yogi, contemplating that consciousness is infinite, achieves concentration on that object of contemplation, and dwells in the sphere of endless consciousness (viññāṇañcāyatana-jhāna). This is the fifth release.

6. Having clearly advanced beyond the absorption on endless consciousness, the yogi, [1037] contemplating that nothing is there, achieves concentration on that object of contemplation, and dwells in the sphere of nothingness (ākāṅkṣāñāyatana-jhāna). This is the sixth release.
7. Having clearly advanced beyond the absorption on nothingness, the yogi, contemplating the subtle consciousness, achieves concentration on it, and dwells in the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception (nevasaññā-nāsaññāyatana-jhāna). This is the seventh release.
8. Having clearly advanced beyond the absorption of neither-perception-nor-non-perception, the yogi achieves and dwells in sustained attainment of cessation in which all forms of consciousness and sensation cease. This is the eighth release.

Ānanda, these are the eight stages of release.”

Release (vimokkha) means a total freedom from hindrances and opposing mental states that shroud the mind, a cultured state of ecstatic bliss which may be likened to the peaceful repose of a child on his father’s chest. This freedom or release lasts as long as the absorption (jhāna) lasts. Release also means unity of mind and object of meditation unhampered by any other thought.

Of those eight releases the first three are the absorption (jhāna) of the fine material sphere (rūpāvacara-jhāna).

Of these three, the first release, the meditation on the fine material sphere, is achieved by concentrating on internal as well as external objects. The second, the absorption of the fine material sphere, is achieved by concentrating on external objects. The third is achieved by concentrating on material objects (kaṣiṇa) of very clear and pure colour, namely: dark blue, yellow, red and white. While the yogi is dwelling in this third stage of meditation, he does not have such a thought as: “This is exquisite,” and yet since his mind is fixed on exquisite objects, it appears as if he is entertaining such a thought. Hence the text describes it: “He is concentrating on what is exquisite.”

The four successive releases: the fourth, the fifth, the sixth, and the seventh, refer to the four meditations (jhāna) on the formless realms (arūpa-jhāna). These four formless realms are called releases because they are entirely free from perceptions of corporeality, and also because the yogi's mind is in complete unity with the object of meditation, unhampered by any other thought.

The eighth release refers to the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti.) It is called release because while one dwells in the attainment of cessation, all mental phenomena cease, beginning with perception and sensation, that is, the mental process is suspended altogether, and along with it, mind-born corporeality also ceases, so that one is totally free from being in a conditioned state. This cessation of the four mental aggregates and mind-born corporeality lasts during the attainment of cessation.

For those persons who find pleasure in the suffering round of rebirth and are satisfied with their sentient existence in the three spheres, release is a dreadful idea. As for the Buddha, it was a very pleasant thing to dwell on release. He has no fear to experience release. The Buddha discoursed on the eight stages of release to let Ven. Ānanda understand the fearless nature of the Buddha.

“Ānanda,” the Buddha continued, “the Realised One who has dwelt in the eight stages of release and has emerged from them, has no fear or dread at all. That being so, how could anyone say that the Realised One was afraid of Māra who came to him alone? Ānanda, in relinquishing the life-maintaining mental process, the Realised One did so fearlessly, with mindfulness and clear comprehension.”

These also are the Buddha's words to Ven. Ānanda, as contained in the Miscellaneous Teaching on the Dhamma (Pakiṇṇaka-dhamma-desanā).

The Relinquishing of the Life-Process

Having discoursed on the eight stages of release, the Buddha continued his discourse without letting Ven. Ānanda say anything: [1038] “Ānanda, on one occasion, in the eighth week after the Awakening, I was staying at the foot of the Goatherd's Banyan tree, near the bank of the River Nerañjarā, in Uruveḷa forest. At that time Māra the Wicked One approached me and standing at a certain place, said this to me: ‘Let the Fortunate One realize Parinibbāna now, let the Fortunate One pass away! Venerable sir, it is time now for the Fortunate One to pass away.’

Ānanda, when this was said, I replied to Māra the Wicked One thus: ‘Wicked One, I shall not pass away so long as my disciples, the male monastics, are not yet well versed in the doctrine, not yet well disciplined in the threefold training, not yet sure of themselves in the righteousness of their conduct, not yet possessed of wide knowledge, not yet able to memorize the teaching, not yet able to practise according to the teaching leading to the supermundane, not yet able to take up the proper practice, not yet settled in their practice; not yet able to expound, to set forth, to show, to establish, to elucidate, to analyse, or to make evident the teacher's doctrine that they have learnt; so long as they are not yet able to thoroughly refute on righteous grounds other doctrines as may arise, and expound the wonderful teaching.

Wicked One, so long as my female monastics ... my lay male disciples ... Wicked One, so long as my female lay-disciples are not yet well versed in the doctrine, not yet well disciplined in the threefold training, not yet sure of themselves in the righteousness of their conduct, not yet possessed of wide knowledge, not yet able to memorize the teaching, not yet able to practise according to the teaching leading to the supermundane, not yet able to take up the proper practice, not yet settled in their practice; not yet able to expound, to set forth, to show, to establish, to elucidate, to analyse, or to make evident the teacher's doctrine that they have learnt; so long as they are not yet able to thoroughly refute on righteous grounds other doctrines as may arise, and expound the wonderful teaching. Wicked One, I shall not pass away so long as this teaching of mine, which is the practice of purity, is not yet sufficiently developed among the disciples, not yet prosperous, widespread, having reached the multitudes, and become renowned, to the extent that it can be thoroughly made known by wise Devas and humans.'

Ānanda, Māra the Wicked One just now came to me at the Cāpāla Shrine, and standing at a suitable distance, again addressed me thus: 'Venerable sir, let the Fortunate One realize Parinibbāna now, let the Fortunate One pass away! Venerable sir, it is time now for the Fortunate One to pass away. Venerable sir, the Fortunate One has said this to me: "Wicked One, I shall not pass away so long as my disciples, the male monastics, are not yet well versed in the doctrine, not yet well disciplined in the threefold training, not yet sure of themselves in the righteousness of their conduct, not yet possessed of wide knowledge, not yet able to memorize the teaching, not yet able to practise according to the teaching leading to the supermundane, not yet able to take up the proper practice, not yet settled in their practice; not yet able to expound, to set forth, to show, to establish, to elucidate, to analyse, or to make evident the teacher's doctrine that they have learnt; so long as they are not yet able to thoroughly refute on righteous grounds other doctrines as may arise, and expound the wonderful teaching.

Wicked One, so long as my disciples, the female monastics ... my lay male disciples ... Wicked One, so long as my disciples, the female lay-disciples are not yet well versed in the doctrine, not yet well disciplined in the threefold training, not yet sure of themselves in the righteousness of their conduct, not yet possessed of wide knowledge, not yet able to memorize the teaching, not yet able to practise according to the teaching leading to the supermundane, not yet able to take up the proper practice, not yet settled in their practice; not yet able to expound, to set forth, to show, to establish, to elucidate, to analyse, or to make evident the teacher's doctrine that they have learnt; so long as they are not yet able to thoroughly refute on righteous grounds other doctrines as may arise, and expound the wonderful teaching. Wicked One, I shall not pass away so long as this teaching of mine, which is the practice of purity, is not yet sufficiently developed among the disciples, not yet prosperous, widespread, having reached the multitudes, and become renowned, to the extent that it can be thoroughly made known by wise Devas and humans.”

Venerable sir, now that the Fortunate One's teaching, which is the practice of purity, is sufficiently established among the disciples, is now prosperous, widespread, has reached the multitudes, and is renowned, to the extent that it [1039] can be thoroughly made known by wise Devas and humans. Venerable sir, let the Fortunate One realize Parinibbāna now, let the Fortunate One pass away! Venerable sir, it is now time for the Fortunate One to pass away.’

Ānanda, on being requested thus, I said to Māra: ‘Wicked One, don't you worry: the Parinibbāna of the Realised One will not be long in coming, three months hence the Realised One will realize Parinibbāna.’ Ānanda, today at the Cāpāla shrine, the Realised One has decided, mindfully and with deliberation, to give up the life-maintaining mental process three months from now.” Thus the Buddha related the whole story about the relinquishing of the life-maintaining mental process.

Ven. Ānanda Entreats the Buddha

When the Buddha said this, Ven. Ānanda entreated him thus: “Venerable sir, may the Fortunate One, for the welfare of mankind, for the benefit, well-being and happiness of Devas and humans, out of compassion for the world, live for the maximum lifespan! May the Fortunate One live for the maximum lifespan!”

Thereupon the Buddha said: “Enough, Ānanda, do not implore the Realised One now. The time for such entreaty is past.” For a second time Ven. Ānanda repeated his entreaty and the Buddha rejected it in the same words. When for a third time he repeated his entreaty the Buddha said to him: “Do you have faith in the Awakening knowledge (Bodhi-ñāṇa) of the Realised One?”

“Yes, I do, venerable sir.”

“Why, then, in spite of your belief, do you persist in entreating me thrice?”

“Venerable sir, I have been told by the Fortunate One himself thus: ‘Ānanda, whoever has cultivated, practised, used as a medium, taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the four bases of psychic power (iddhi-pāda) could, if he so wished, live for the maximum lifespan or even beyond the maximum lifespan. Ānanda, the Realised One has cultivated, practised, used as a medium, taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the four bases of psychic power. Therefore, Ānanda, the Realised One could, if he so wished, live for the maximum lifespan or even beyond the maximum lifespan.’

Venerable sir, it is on account of those words of the Fortunate One that I make the appeal thrice.”

“Do you believe that, Ānanda?”

“Yes, venerable sir, I do.”

“Ānanda, although the Realised One thus gave clear hints, you failed to grasp them. It never occurred to you to entreat the Fortunate One: ‘May the Fortunate One, for the welfare of mankind, for the benefit, well-being and happiness of Devas and humans, out of compassion for the world, live for the maximum lifespan! May the Fortunate One live for the maximum lifespan!’ Therefore, Ānanda, this failure to entreat me then is your doing, your own omission. Ānanda, if you had entreated me then, the Realised One might have refused the entreaty twice but might have acceded to it on the third time. Therefore, Ānanda, this failure to entreat me then is your own doing, your own omission.

Similar Instances of Omission

Ānanda, on one occasion, I was staying on the mountain abode on the Gijjhakūṭa hill [1040] in Rājagaha. At that time I said to you: ‘Ānanda, pleasant is the city of Rājagaha. Ānanda, pleasant is the Gijjhakūṭa hill. Ānanda, whosoever has cultivated, practised, used as a vehicle, taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the four bases of psychic power (iddhi-pāda), could, if he so wished, live for the maximum lifespan or even beyond the maximum lifespan. Ānanda, the Realised One has cultivated, practised, used as a vehicle, taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the four bases of psychic power. Therefore, Ānanda, the Realised One could, if he so wished, live for the maximum lifespan or even beyond the maximum lifespan.’

Ānanda, although the Realised One thus gave clear hints, you failed to grasp them. It never occurred to you to entreat the Fortunate One: ‘May the Fortunate One, for the welfare of mankind, for the benefit, well-being and happiness of Devas and men, out of compassion for the world, live for the maximum lifespan! May the Fortunate One live for the maximum lifespan!’ Ānanda, if you had entreated me then, the Realised One might have refused the entreaty twice but might have acceded to it on the third time. Therefore, this failure to entreat me then is your own doing, your own omission.

Ānanda, on one occasion I was dwelling at the foot of the Gotama Banyan tree in Rājagaha ... I was dwelling at the Corapapāta cliff near Rājagaha ... I was dwelling in the Sattapaṇṇi cave on the side of Vebhāra mountain near Rājagaha ... I was at Kāḷasilā at the side of the Isigili mountain near Rājagaha ... at the Ebony Grove in the Sappasoṇḍika mountain range near Rājagaha ... at the Tapodārāma monastery in Rājagaha ... at Veḷuvana Kalandakanivāpa ... at the Mango Grove of Jīvaka ... at the Migadāya Wood in Maddakucchi near Rājagaha ... Ānanda, while I was dwelling at those places, too, I said to you: ‘Ānanda, Rājagaha is pleasant ... Gotama banyan tree is pleasant ... Corapapāta cliff is pleasant ... Sattapaṇṇi cave is pleasant ... Kāḷasilā at the side of Isigili mountain is pleasant ... the Ebony Grove in the Sappasoṇḍika mountain range is pleasant ... Tapodārāma monastery is pleasant ... Veḷuvana Kalandakanivāpa is pleasant ... the Mango Grove of Jīvaka is pleasant ... the Migadāya Wood in Maddakucchi is pleasant. Ānanda, whoever has cultivated, practised, used as a vehicle, taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the four bases of psychic power could, if he so wished, live for the maximum lifespan or even beyond the maximum lifespan. Ānanda, the Realised One has cultivated, practised, used as a vehicle, taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the four bases of psychic power.

Therefore, Ānanda, the Realised One could, if he so wished, live for the maximum lifespan or even beyond the maximum lifespan.’

Ānanda, although the Realised One thus gave clear hints, you failed to grasp them. It never occurred to you to entreat the Fortunate One: ‘May the Fortunate One, for the welfare of mankind, for the benefit, well-being and happiness of Devas and men, out of compassion for the world, live for the maximum lifespan! May the Fortunate One live for the maximum lifespan!’ Ānanda, if you had entreated me then, the Realised One might have refused the entreaty twice but might have acceded to it on the third time. Therefore, Ānanda, this failure to entreat me then is your own doing, your own omission.

Ānanda, on one occasion, while I was living at the Udena Shrine in Vesālī, there too, I said to you: ‘Ānanda, Vesālī is pleasant. The Udena shrine is pleasant. Ānanda, [1041] whoever has cultivated, practised, used as a vehicle, taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the four bases of psychic power could, if he so wished, live for the maximum lifespan or even beyond the maximum lifespan. Ānanda, the Realised One has cultivated, practised, used as a vehicle, taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the four bases of psychic power. Therefore, Ānanda, the Realised One could, if he so wished, live for the maximum lifespan or even beyond the maximum lifespan.’

Ānanda, although the Realised One thus gave clear hints, you failed to grasp them. It never occurred to you to entreat the Fortunate One: ‘May the Fortunate One, for the welfare of mankind, for the benefit, well-being and happiness of Devas and humans, out of compassion for the world, live for the maximum lifespan! May the Fortunate One live for the maximum lifespan!’ Ānanda, if you had entreated me then, the Realised One might have refused the entreaty twice but might have acceded to it on the third time. Therefore, Ānanda, this failure to entreat the Fortunate One then is your own doing, your own omission.

Ānanda, on one occasion, while I was staying at the Gotama Shrine in this very city of Vesālī ... at the Sattamba shrine in this very city of Vesālī ... at the Bahuputta shrine in this very city of Vesālī ... at the Sārandada shrine in this very city of Vesālī ... Ānanda, today, at the Cāpāla shrine, the Realised One has just said to you: ‘Ānanda, Vesālī is pleasant, the Cāpāla shrine is pleasant. Ānanda, whosoever has cultivated, practised, used as a vehicle, taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the four bases of psychic power could, if he so wished, live for the maximum lifespan or even beyond the maximum lifespan. Ānanda the Realised One has cultivated, practised, used as a vehicle, taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the four bases of psychic power. Therefore, Ānanda, the Realised One could, if he so wished, live for the maximum lifespan or even beyond the maximum lifespan.’

Ānanda, although the Realised One thus gave clear hints, you failed to grasp them. It never occurred to you to entreat the Fortunate One: ‘May the Fortunate One, for the welfare of mankind, for the benefit, well-being and happiness of Devas and humans, out of compassion for the world, live for the maximum lifespan! May the Fortunate One live for the maximum lifespan!’ Ānanda, if you had entreated me then, the Realised One might have refused the entreaty twice but might have acceded to it on the third time. Therefore, Ānanda, this failure to entreat the Fortunate One then is your own doing, your own omission.”

The Buddha related the fifteen previous instances of Ven. Ānanda’s failure to entreat him to continue to live. That latest occasion, the sixteenth, took place at the Cāpāla shrine. All these cases of omission were pointed out by the Buddha to attenuate the sorrow Ven. Ānanda was feeling at that time. Of course, Ven. Ānanda’s failure on all these various occasions was due to Māra’s mischief.

“Ānanda, have I not previously told you that it is in the very nature of things that we must part with those most near and dear to us somehow, even while we are living, or when death divides us, or when we are of different planes of existence? Ānanda, in this matter, how could one expect anything that has the nature of arising, of appearing, of being conditioned, and of dissolution, not to disintegrate? It is not possible for anyone to wish so.

Ānanda, the Realised One has discarded, thrown up, given up, abandoned, thrown away, and relinquished the life-maintaining mental process. And the Realised One has spoken out in no uncertain terms that the Parinibbāna of the Realised One will not be long in coming, that three months hence the Realised One will realize Parinibbāna. There is no possibility of the Realised One, for the sake of living, could go back on his word.

Come, Ānanda, let us [1042] go to the Pinnacled Hall at the Great Wood.” – “Very well, venerable sir,” said Ven. Ānanda.

37 Factors on the Side of Awakening

Then the Buddha, accompanied by Ven. Ānanda, went to the Pinnacled Hall at the Great Wood. There, he said to him: “Ānanda, go and summon all the monastics living in Vesālī to come and assemble in the Assembly Hall.” Ven. Ānanda caused all the monastics living in Vesālī to gather in the Assembly Hall. Then he went to the Buddha, made obeisance to him, and standing in a certain place, reported: “Venerable sir, the monastics are assembled. May the Fortunate One go to them as and when he wishes.”

Then the Buddha went to the Assembly Hall, took his seat prepared for him, and addressed the monastics as follows: “Monastics, the doctrines which I have perceived through path-insight and which I have expounded to you should be mastered, resorted to, cultivated, put to constant practice. If you master, resort to, cultivate and constantly practise these doctrines, this teaching, which is the practice of purity, will endure long and perpetuate itself, thus making for the welfare of mankind, the preservation of the world, the benefit, well-being and happiness of Devas and humans.

These doctrines are:

1. The four methods of steadfast mindfulness (sati-paṭṭhāna).
2. The four supreme efforts (sammapadāna).
3. The four bases of psychic power (iddhi-pāda).
4. The five faculties (indriya).
5. The five powers (bala).
6. The seven factors of awakening (bojjhaṅga).
7. The noble eightfold path (ariya-magga).

Monastics, these 37 doctrines constituents of Awakening, which I have perceived through path-insight and expounded to you, should be mastered, resorted to, cultivated, and put into constant practice. If you master, resort to, cultivate and constantly practise these doctrines, this teaching, which is the practice of purity, will endure long and perpetuate itself, thus making for the welfare of mankind, the preservation of the world, the benefit, well-being and happiness of Devas and humans.”

Then the Buddha further said to the monastics: “Now, look monastics, I exhort you: Decay is inherent in all compounded things, physical or mental. With mindfulness and diligence strive towards the goal of liberation. The Parinibbāna of the Realised One will take place before long; three months hence the Realised One will realize Parinibbāna.”

Having said this, the Buddha further spoke these words in verse:

“My age is now quite ripe having, turned eighty. Only a little just three months of my life remains. I shall have to depart, leaving you behind. I have made a refuge of myself.

Monastics, never be forgetful, be possessed of mindfulness, be pure in morality. Keep your mind collected, think right, and guard your mind ever closely against defilements.

Monastics, in this teaching of the Doctrine and Discipline he who remains holding fast to the good doctrine will be able to get rid of the cycle of rebirths and make an end of all suffering (dukkha.)” [1043]

Farewell to Vesālī

Then the Buddha, rearranging his robes in the morning, took his alms bowl and double robe and entered the city of Vesālī for the alms round. After the alms round, after having had his meal, he left the place of his meal. On leaving the place, he turned around and looked back towards Vesālī, like a tusker looking back. Then he said to Ven. Ānanda, “Ānanda, this will be the last time the Realised One looks on Vesālī. Come, Ānanda, let us go to Bhaṇḍa village.” – “Very well, venerable sir,” said Ven. Ānanda.

In this matter, the statement about the Buddha: “Turning around to look back,” needs some comment. The Buddha’s anatomy is unique among human beings. Ordinary people have bones joined together by touching at the ends. Paccekabuddhas have bones joined by hooks formed at the end of each bone. The Buddha’s bone structure is a set of chain-links. With the exception of the arms, which consist of twelve big joints and fingers and toes with smaller joints, all other bones are joined as chain-links. That is why the Buddha is endowed with the physical might equal to the strength of 10,000 million tuskers or that of 100,000 million men of ordinary strength.

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji – 1555

The bone structure being of chain-links, the Buddha's neck cannot turn back by itself alone. Therefore, when the Buddha wants to look back, he has to turn back the whole body, just as an elephant does.

Although it was the Buddha's intention to turn around to look back, due to the intervention of the guardian spirit of the great earth, that act was not actually carried out, for the great earth, as if unable to bear the sight of the Supreme Being turning around, rotated itself so that the Buddha stood with his person facing Vesālī. The great earth intervened as if it were saying: "Great Lord, your fulfilling of the perfections has been unique. So why should there be the need for the Fortunate One to trouble himself to turn around physically just to look back as with other ordinary people?" In any case, the expression that: "The Fortunate One turned around to look back like a tusker," was used with reference to the Buddha's intention to do so.

It might be asked: "Why was Vesālī alone mentioned as the place the Fortunate One has his last look at, and not other places, such as Sāvattthī, Rājagaha, Nāḷanda, Pāṭali village, Koṭi village and Nātika village where he had made his last visit? Did the Fortunate One not look back on those places as well?"

The answer is no. If the Buddha were to look back on these various places, the uniqueness of the occasion would be lost.

There is also another reason: Vesālī was a doomed city. It was going to be destroyed after three years from the Buddha's last visit there. The Buddha saw that if he made a turning around to look back like a noble tusker at Vesālī, that place would be commemorated by the Licchavī princes as: "The Noble Tusker's Turning-Around Shrine" which would bring great benefits to them for a long time. That was the object of the Buddha's decision to turn around to look back on Vesālī.

The Four Principles

Then the Buddha, accompanied by his large company of monastics, visited Bhaṇḍu village and took up his residence there. During his sojourn there he discoursed to the monastics as follows: "Monastics, it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of four principles that I, as well as yourselves, have had to fare along the long course of the round of existences (Saṃsāra), going through from existence to existence. And the four principles are as follows:

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji – 1556

1. Monastics, it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of the noble morality, the virtue of the noble one (ariya-sīla) that [1044] I, as well as yourselves, have had to fare along the long course of the round of existences, going through from existence to existence.
2. Monastics, it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of the noble concentration (ariya-samādhi) ...
3. Monastics, it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of the noble wisdom (ariya-paññā) ...
4. Monastics, it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of the noble liberation (ariya-vimutti) that I, as well as yourselves, have had to fare along the long course of the round of existences, going through existence to existence.

Monastics, I have properly understood and gained penetrative knowledge of the noble morality; I have properly understood and gained penetrative knowledge of the noble concentration ... of the noble wisdom ... of the noble liberation. Craving for existence has been completely eradicated so that craving which drags one to renewed existence is extinct in me. Now there will be no more rebirth.”

Then the Buddha further said to the monastics in verse:

“Monastics, Buddha Gotama, of vast following, has correctly known these principles of supreme morality, concentration, wisdom and liberation. Having gained penetrative knowledge of them through path-insight, he has out of compassion expounded them to the monastics.

The teacher of Devas and humans, endowed with the fivefold eye of wisdom, who has quelled all the fires of the defilements, has made an end of all suffering (dukkha) in himself as well as in his Arahat disciples.”

During his sojourn at Bhaṇḍu village the Buddha, considering his approaching death, discoursed to the monastics of the repeated theme as follows: “Such is morality, such is concentration, such is wisdom. Concentration developed through morality is efficacious and productive. Wisdom developed through concentration is efficacious and productive. The mind that is developed through wisdom is thoroughly liberated from the moral taints: the taint of sense-desire, the taint of craving for continued existence, and the taint of ignorance of the four noble truths.”

The Four Great Authorities

Then after staying at Bhaṇḍu village for as long as he wished, the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Come, Ānanda, let us go to Hatthi village, to Amba village, to Jamba village, and thence to the town of Bhoga.”

“Very well, venerable sir,” said Ven. Ānanda, and the Buddha, accompanied by a large following of monastics, arrived at the town of Bhoga, where he dwelled at the Ānanda shrine. During his sojourn there, the Buddha discoursed to the monastics on the four great authorities, which are the principles to assess the doctrines that are being taught by persons of high esteem:

1. “Monastics, in this teaching, if a monastic should say thus: ‘Friends, I have heard this exposition from the mouth of the Fortunate One, such and such is the Discourses (Dhamma); such and such is the Discipline (Vinaya); such and such is the teaching of the Buddha.’

Monastics, the words of that monastic should not be readily accepted or readily rejected. The words and phrases stated by him and attributed to the Buddha should be carefully noted. They should be collated with the Discourses and compared with the Discipline.

If, on collation with the Discourses and comparison with the Discipline, the words and phrases, as stated by the monastic, do not agree with the Discourses or are not in line with the Discipline, then it must be concluded that: “This certainly is not what the Fortunate One said. It is something wrongly learnt by the monastic.’ And concluding thus, monastics, those words should be rejected and ignored. [1045]

If, on the other hand, the words and phrases, as stated by the monastic, on being collated with the Discourses and compared with the Discipline, are found to agree with the Discourses and are in line with the Discipline, then it must be concluded that: ‘This certainly is what the Fortunate One said. It is something correctly learnt by the monastic.’ Monastics, remember well this first principle regarding assertions attributed to a great authority.

2. And then, monastics, in the teaching, if a monastic should say thus: ‘Here is such and such monastery where the community of monastics has an elder in charge. I have heard this exposition from that particular community of monastics: such and such is the Discourses (Dhamma); such and such is the Discipline (Vinaya); such and such is the teaching of the Buddha.’

Monastics, the words of that monastic should not be readily accepted or readily rejected. The words and phrases stated by him and attributed to the Saṅgha of a certain monastery should be carefully noted. They should be collated with the Discourses, and compared with the Discipline.

If, on collation with the Discourses and comparison with the Discipline, the words and phrases, as stated by the monastic, do not agree with the Discourses or are not in line with the Discipline, then it must be concluded that: ‘This certainly is not what the Fortunate One said. It is something wrongly learnt by the monastic.’ And concluding thus, monastics, those words should be rejected and ignored.

If, on the other hand, the words and phrases as stated by the monastic, on being collated with the Discourses and compared with the Discipline, are found to agree with the Discourses and are in line with the Discipline, then it must be concluded that: ‘This certainly is what the Fortunate One said, it is something correctly learnt by the monastic.’ Monastics, remember this second principle regarding assertions attributed to a great authority.

3. And then, monastics, in the teaching, if a monastic should say thus: ‘There is such and such monastery where many elders of wide learning who have memorized the Pāḷi text, who abide by the Doctrine and the Discipline, and who are thoroughly versed in the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha), I have heard this exposition from these elders themselves: such and such is the Discourses (Dhamma); such and such is the Discipline (Vinaya); such and such is the teaching of the Buddha.’

Monastics, the words of that monastic should not be readily accepted or readily rejected. The words and phrases stated by him and attributed to the elders should be carefully noted. They should be collated with the Discourses and compared with the Discipline.

If, on collation with the Discourses and comparison with the Discipline, the words and phrases, as stated by the monastics, do not agree with the Discourses or are not in line with the Discipline, then it must be concluded that: ‘This certainly is not what the Fortunate One said. It is something wrongly learnt by the monastic.’ And concluding thus, monastics, these words should be rejected and ignored.

If, on the other hand, the words and phrases as stated by the monastic, on being collated with the Discourses and compared with the Discipline, are found to agree with the Discourses and are in line with the Discipline, then it must be concluded that: ‘This certainly is what the Fortunate One said. It is something correctly learnt by the monastic.’ Monastics, remember well this third principle regarding assertions attributed to a great authority.

4. And then, monastics, in this teaching, if a monastic should say thus: ‘There is a certain elder of wide learning who has memorized the Pāḷi texts, who abides by the Doctrine and the Discipline, and who is thoroughly versed in the Monastic Rules. I have heard this exposition from that monastic himself: such and such is the Discourses (Dhamma); such and such is the Discipline (Vinaya); such and such is the teaching of the Buddha.’

Monastics, the words of that monastic should not be readily accepted or readily rejected. [1046] The words and phrases stated by him and attributed to the learned elder should be carefully noted. They should be collated with the Discourses and compared with the Discipline.

If, on collation with the Discourses and comparison with the Discipline, the words and phrases, as stated by the monastics, do not agree with the Discourses or are not in line with the Discipline, then it must be concluded that: ‘This certainly is not what the Fortunate One said. It is something wrongly learnt by the monastic.’ And concluding thus, monastics, these words should be rejected and ignored.

If, on the other hand, the words and phrases, as stated by the monastic, are in line with the Discourses and with the Discipline, then it must be concluded that: ‘This certainly is what the Fortunate One said. It is something correctly learned by the monastic.’ Monastics, remember well this fourth principle regarding assertions attributed to a great authority. Monastics, remember well these four principles regarding assertions attributed to the great authorities.”

Miscellaneous Points on the Four Great Authorities

On this subject of the four great authorities, the commentary draws the attention of the reader to miscellaneous points touching on it. A brief note follows. Herein:

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji – 1560

1. There are the four directive principles concerning the four great authorities in the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya).
2. Four directive principles on the subject as taught in the Great Division (Vin Mahā-vagga).
3. Four types of answers corresponding to four types of questions called the four answers (vyākaraṇa).
4. The four Disciplines (Vinaya).
5. The three Great Councils.
6. The four great authorities as taught in the discourses. These are what has been described above.
7. The four great authorities as taught in the Discipline (Vin Mahā-vagga, 6).

Four directive principles are laid down by the Buddha regarding what sort of medicinal preparation is proper for monastics:

1. Monastics, a certain drug is not specifically mentioned by me as improper for use by monastics, yet if it tends towards impropriety and rules out any possibility of propriety, in the light of the Vinaya rules, then consider it as being improper for use.
2. Monastics, a certain drug is not specifically mentioned by me as improper for use by monastics, and if, in the light of the Vinaya rules, it tends towards propriety and rules out any possibility of its impropriety, then consider it as being proper for use.
3. Monastics, a certain drug is not specifically mentioned by me as proper for use by monastics, and if it tends towards impropriety and rules out any possibility of propriety in the light of the Vinaya rules, then consider it as being improper of use.
4. Monastics, a certain drug is not specifically mentioned by me as proper for use by monastics, and if it tends towards impropriety and rules out any possibility of propriety in the light of the Vinaya rules, then consider it as being improper of use by monastics, and if it tends towards propriety and rules out any possibility of its impropriety in the light of the Vinaya rules, then consider it as being proper for use.

There are four types of answers to match the four types of questions: [1047]

1. A straight question is answered by a categorical statement, e.g. if the question is: “Is the eye impermanent?” the appropriate answer is: “Yes, the eye is impermanent.”
2. A question requiring an analysis to answer, e.g. “Is the eye the only thing that is impermanent?” The answer needs an analysis: “The eye is not the only thing that is impermanent: the ear also is impermanent; the tongue also is impermanent; etc.”
3. A question to be replaced by question, e.g. “Is the ear to be regarded as being the same as the eye? Is the eye to be regarded as being the same as the ear?” The appropriate reply is: “In what sense is this question put?” Then if the inquirer says: “In the sense of seeing: is the ear capable of seeing as the eye is?” The answer then is: “No, it is not.” If again, the inquirer says: “In respect of its impermanence: is the ear the same as the eye is?” The answer then is: “Yes, it is.”
4. The type of question that is ignored, e.g. to believers in self (atta), there is life (jīva), body (sarīra), which are mere names but which do not exist in the ultimate sense. Therefore if the question is: “Is life the same as the body?” the proper answer is silence because one understands that the Buddha himself ignores such a question. The question is of the nature of talking about the son of a barren woman, which is absurd.

The four guides (vinaya).

1. Doctrine (sutta) here means the Three Baskets (Tipiṭaka).
2. What is in line with Doctrine (suttānuloma) means the four great authorities (mahāpadesa) described in the Vinaya and the four great authorities described in the Discourses.
3. The words of the teachers (ācariya-vāda) means the miscellaneous expositions in elucidation of the doctrines of the Buddha that were made even during his lifetime at different places. Since they explain the Pāli texts, they were also called commentaries (aṭṭhakathā). At the great Councils, the elders recited the Pāli first and at the end of it, they prescribed the respective commentaries to each division of the texts as the regular syllabus for elucidation. These learned sayings which were miscellaneous discourses as well as commentaries, being written by learned teachers, come to be known also as The words of the teachers (ācariya-vāda).

These learned observations or treatises, which are referred to by three different names, which are The words of the teachers (ācariya-vāda), commentaries (aṭṭhakathā), miscellaneous teachings (pakiṇṇakadesanā), were carried by Ven. Mahinda to Śrī Laṅkā. The Śrī Laṅkā elders translated them into Sinhalese to ensure for the Sinhalese monastics the tradition against doctrines that might be introduced by other sects later. Ven. Mahā Buddhaghosa studied the Sinhalese commentaries (aṭṭhakathā), the root miscellanany (mūla-pakiṇṇaka), cleared up repetitive statements and condensed them wherever suitable, classified them under suitable headings which were appropriate to the Baskets, elucidating them wherever necessary, and thereby produced a new commentary in Māgadhī, adding the traditional views held by the elders (ācariya-vāda) which came to be called “own views’ (attano mati), wherever necessary. Thus, the words of the teachers (ācariya-vāda), the third of the four guides, for practical purposes as used today, refers to this new commentary.

4. Own views (attano mati) means considered opinions held by elders after following the principles contained in the Doctrine, what is in line with Doctrine and the words of the teachers. Own views (attano mati) is also known as the traditional views held by the elders (ācariya-vāda). Thus these four guides which are the Doctrine, what is in line with Doctrine, the words of the teachers and own views should be noted.

The three great Buddhist councils.

1. The first great council of 500 Arahats headed by Ven. Mahā Kassapa.
2. The second great council of 7,000 Arahats headed by Ven. Mahā Yasa.
3. The third great council of 1,000 Arahats headed by Ven. Mahā Moggaliputta.

These are the three great official Buddhist Councils. [1048] First, remember the four great authorities as taught in the Discourses, the four great authorities as taught in the Vinaya, the four types of questions and answers, the four guides and the three great official councils.

Then apply them to practical problems thus:

1. If a monastic says: “This is the doctrine, this is the Vinaya, this is the Buddha’s teaching,” citing the authority of the Buddha, or of the Saṅgha, or of a number of elders, or a certain elder. To decide the veracity of his statement, apply the test of the four great authorities as taught in the Discourses: only if the statement accords with these four great authorities, the statement should be taken as true. Otherwise it must be regarded as mere hearsay, a case of irresponsible talk.
2. Where a certain problem arises as to whether a certain thing is proper for a monastic or not, the test is the four great authorities as taught in the Great Division (Vin Mahā-vagga). The commentary on the Great Division should be consulted for detailed information on the subject. If, on examining the subject of controversy or doubt in the light of the four great authorities taught in the Basket of Discipline (Vinaya-piṭaka), it tends to agree with the rules, it should be accepted as being proper; otherwise it should be considered as being improper.
3. If a question on the doctrine arises, as illustrated above, the answer should be appropriate to the type of question taught as the four types of questions.
4. Of the four guides, if the assertion by someone is part of the Discourses (Sutta-piṭaka), as contained in the Three Baskets (Tipiṭaka) approved at the councils, the statement should not be rejected, for rejection of the Discourses amounts to the rejection of the Buddha himself. If the assertion is what is in line with Doctrine (suttānuloma) statement, it should be collated with the Discourses, or with the Three Baskets. If it agrees with the Discourses, it should be accepted otherwise it should be rejected. As regards the traditional views held by the elders (ācariya-vāda) or the miscellaneous exposition, there is the possibility of the commentary not conforming to the Three Baskets due to slackness. Therefore, the traditional views held by the elders should be collated with the Three Baskets. Only if it agrees with the Baskets should it then be accepted; otherwise it should be rejected as something carelessly said. Own views (attano mati), or own opinion, is the weakest of authorities. It is to be accepted only if it accords with the Three Baskets.

40b: The Last Days 2, In Vajji – 1564

5. If someone quotes a passage as being part of the Pāḷi which had been approved by the Councils, it must conform to the texts approved at the three great councils. If it is not part of the Pāḷi text approved at the three great councils, it is to be regarded as spurious.

While the Buddha was staying at the Ānanda shrine, in the town of Bhoga also, being mindful of his approaching passing, he exhorted the monastics, where there was occasion to do so, in the following words:

“Such is morality; such is concentration; such is wisdom. Concentration developed through morality is efficacious and productive. Wisdom developed through concentration is efficacious and productive. The mind that is developed through wisdom is thoroughly liberated from the moral pollutants: the pollutant of sense desire, the pollutant of craving for continued existence, and the pollutant of ignorance of the four noble truths.”

40c: The Last Days 3, In Malla

Cunda, the Goldsmith's Son

Then after staying at the town of Bhoga for as long as he wished, the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Come, Ānanda, let us go to Pāvā.” – “Very well, venerable sir,” said Ven. Ānanda. And the Buddha, accompanied by his large following of monastics, went to Pāvā where he dwelled in the Mango Grove monastery donated by Cunda, the goldsmith's son.

Cunda, the goldsmith's son, was a very rich man. From his earlier meeting with [1049] the Buddha, he had benefited from his discourse and become a Stream-enterer. He built a big monastery in his Mango Grove and donated it to the Buddha. This was the last time the Buddha resided at the monastery.

When Cunda, the goldsmith's son, heard the news that the Buddha had arrived and was staying at his Mango Grove monastery, he approached him, made obeisance to him, and sat in a suitable place. The Buddha pointed out to Cunda, the benefits of the doctrine, exhorted him to set himself up in the practice of the Dhamma, and gladdened him in the practice. After listening to his discourse, Cunda said to the Buddha: “Venerable sir, may it please the Fortunate One to accept my offering of food for tomorrow together with the company of monastics.” The Buddha signified his acceptance by remaining silent.

Cunda, knowing that the Buddha had accepted his request, rose from his seat, paid respects to him and left respectfully. The next day, he had choice foods of hard and soft kinds prepared at his home, including tender pork (sūkara maddava), meat of a wild pig that was neither too old nor too young. “Venerable sir, it is time to proceed. The food-offering is ready,” he announced to the Buddha.

Herein, the Pāli word for tender pork (sūkara maddava), is interpreted by some teachers as soft rice boiled with fine-tasting cow's milk, while others also say that it means a special food prepared with some delicious and highly nutritive concoction called an elixir (rasāyana). They say that Cunda had this special meal prepared for the Buddha in the belief that it would not cause the passing away of the Buddha.

Then in the morning, the Buddha, taking his alms bowl and robes, went to the house of Cunda, accompanied by the monastics, and sat on the seat prepared for him. Being thus seated, the Buddha said to Cunda, the goldsmith's son: "Cunda, you may serve me the tender pork prepared by you; and you may serve the other food prepared by you to the company of monastics."

"Very well, venerable sir," answered Cunda, and accordingly served the personally prepared tender pork to the Buddha, and the other personally prepared food to the Saṅgha.

After finishing the meal, the Buddha said to Cunda: "Cunda, bury the remaining tender pork in a pit. I see no one else, besides me, in all the celestial world of Devas, Māras and Brahmas, or in this human world of ascetics and Brahmins, rulers and men who, should he perchance to eat it, could digest it properly." This the Buddha declared categorically.

"Very well, venerable sir," said Cunda and accordingly buried the remaining tender pork in a pit. Then he approached the Buddha, made obeisance to him, and sat in a suitable place. And the Buddha taught Cunda a discourse on the doctrine. Then the Buddha rose from his seat and departed.

Thereafter, subsequent to the meal offered by Cunda, the Buddha became afflicted with a severe illness, an acute form of dysentery with discharge of blood, causing great pain near unto death but he bore the pain with mindfulness and clear comprehension, without perturbation. Then he said to Ānanda: "Come, Ānanda, let us go to Kusinārā." "Very well, venerable sir," said Ven. Ānanda.

It should be noted here that the dysentery came upon the Buddha not on account of Cunda's food offering. It is meant here that the affliction came merely subsequent to the meal but not because of it. As a matter of fact, Cunda's specially prepared meal strengthened the Buddha. If not for Cunda's highly nourishing food, the Buddha would not be able to withstand the onslaught of the severe illness. Thanks to Cunda's tender pork meal, the Buddha found the strength to journey to Kusinārā on foot.

Drinking Water

Then the Buddha left the road and went to the foot of a tree. There, he said to Ven. Ānanda: "Ānanda, fold my double robe fourfold and place it on the ground. Ānanda, I am weary. I shall sit down for a while."

"Very well, venerable sir," Ven. Ānanda assented, and he placed on the ground the double robe folded fourfold. The Buddha sat on the seat thus prepared and said: “Ānanda, go and get some drinking water. Ānanda, I am thirsty. I want to have a drink of water.” Ven. Ānanda said: “Venerable sir, 500 carts have just now crossed the stream. The shallow water is disturbed and is turbid. Venerable sir, the river Kakudhā is not far off. There the water is clear, sweet, cool and free from muddiness. The river bank is also pleasant and inviting. The Fortunate One may take his drink of water at the river Kakudhā and also may cool his limbs there.”

“Ānanda, go and get some drinking water. Ānanda, I am thirsty. I want to have a drink of water.” Ven. Ānanda again said: “Venerable sir, 500 carts have just crossed the stream. The shallow water is disturbed and is turbid. Venerable sir, the river Kakudhā is not far off. There the water is clear, sweet, cool and free from muddiness. The river bank is also pleasant and inviting. The Fortunate One may take his drink of water at the river Kakudhā, and also may cool his limbs there.”

“Ānanda, go and get some drinking water. Ānanda, I am thirsty. I want to have a drink of water.” After being commanded thrice by the Buddha, Ven. Ānanda assented: “Very well, venerable sir,” and taking the alms bowl, went to the little stream. Then the shallow water which was turbid after having been disturbed by the caravan, became mysteriously clear, pure and free from muddiness. Thereupon, Ven. Ānanda thought to himself: “Wonderful indeed, and marvellous indeed, is the great power of the Realised One! This shallow stream which was turbid due to the crossing of the caravan is, on my arrival, flowing clear, pure and free from muddiness.”

With these thoughts of wonderment, Ven. Ānanda took the drinking water in the alms bowl, went back to the Buddha, and said: “Wonderful indeed, venerable sir, marvellous indeed, venerable sir, is the great power of the Realised One! That shallow stream which was turbid due to the crossing of the caravan just now, on my arrival there, was flowing clear, pure and free from muddiness. Now let the Fortunate One drink the water. Let the Fortunate One drink the water.” And the Buddha drank the water.

The Twelve Debts of the Buddha<sup>236</sup>

In this connection it would seem appropriate to mention briefly the twelve counts of recompense which might be considered as twelve debts the Buddha had to meet in Saṃsāra:

1. The first recompense: In his former existence, the Bodhisatta was a drunkard named Munāli. He accosted a Paccekabuddha named Surabhi with a wild accusation: “This man is an immoral person who indulges in sense pleasures in private.” For that evil verbal action, he was reborn in the realm of continuous suffering in Niraya. And in the last existence as the Buddha, he was publicly accused by Sundarī, the wandering female ascetic, as being luscious and having had an affair with her.
2. The second recompense: In a former existence, the Bodhisatta was a disciple, named Nanda, to a Paccekabuddha named Sabbābhibhū. He accused his teacher of being a person of loose character. [1051] On account of that evil verbal action, he had to suffer for 100,000 years in the Niraya realm. When he was reborn as a human being, many times he was unjustly accused of wrongdoing. In the last existence as the Buddha, he was publicly accused by Ciñcā Māṇavikā<sup>237</sup> as a wanton person who had caused her pregnancy.
3. The third recompense: The Bodhisatta was once a learned Brahmin teacher, who was well versed in the three Vedas, and a person of great esteem. While he was teaching the Vedas in the Great Wood to 500 pupils, they saw, in the sky, a holy recluse named Bhīma coming to the forest by means of psychic powers. Instead of being inspired, the Bodhisatta told his 500 pupils that the recluse was a sensuous hypocrite. The pupils, believed in what the teacher had said, spread the teacher’s view of the holy recluse while the recluse was going alms collecting. These 500 pupils were reborn as monastic disciples of the Buddha. Due to their slander against Bhīma, as the 500 pupils of the Brahmin teacher in their former life, they were falsely accused of murdering Sundarī, the wandering female ascetic, who was actually the victim of the ascetics. It should be noted that an accusation against the disciples of the Buddha amounted to an accusation against the Buddha himself.

4. The fourth recompense: In a previous existence, the Bodhisatta murdered his half brother on account of covetousness. He threw the younger brother into a ravine and then crushed him with a boulder. For that evil deed, the Buddha, in his last existence, became the victim of Devadatta's plot against his life. But, since a Buddha is not liable to get killed, he suffered from being cut by a rock splinter, which was as a result of a huge boulder being dropped from the hillside by Devadatta. His big toe was internally bruised by the rock splinter.
5. The fifth recompense: In one of his former existences, the Bodhisatta was a scamp and when he met a Paccekabuddha on the way, he gave vent to frolicsome tendencies and threw stones at the Paccekabuddha. For that evil deed, the Buddha once came under attack by a band of archers sent by Devadatta who meant to kill him.
6. The sixth recompense: When the Bodhisatta was a mahout, he threatened a Paccekabuddha, who was on his alms collection, with his elephant, as if to trample on him. On account of that misdeed, the Buddha was once threatened with a drunken elephant named Nāḷāgiri in Rājagaha which was sent by Devadatta to trample on him.
7. The seventh recompense: In one of his former existences, the Bodhisatta was a monarch. Out of kingly conceit, he executed a prisoner personally, without considering the consequences, by piercing him with a spear. That evil deed brought him down to the realm of continuous suffering for a great many years. In his last existence, the Buddha had to undergo treatment on his big toe being cut open by Jīvaka, the celebrated physician, to heal it when it was hit by a splinter caused by Devadatta's wicked scheme.
8. The eighth recompense: In a former existence, the Bodhisatta was born into a fisherman's family. He used to take delight in witnessing his relatives hurting and killing the fish, although he did not do the killing himself. As the result of that evil thought, in his last existence as the Buddha, he often suffered from headaches. As for his relatives of that existence, they were reborn as Sakyans who were massacred by Viṭaṭūbha. [1052]

9. The ninth recompense: When the Bodhisatta was born as a human being during the time of Buddha Phussa’s teaching, he railed the male monastic disciples of the Buddha saying: “You may eat only barley, but not rice.” That vituperation had the consequence that in his last existence, the Buddha had to live on barley meal for the whole of the Rains Retreat (Vassa) period at the Verañjā Brahmin village where he stayed at the invitation of Brahmin Verañja.
10. The tenth recompense: Once the Bodhisatta was born as a professional boxer, and one time he broke the back of his combatant. As a consequence of that evil deed, the Buddha, in his last existence, often suffered from back-ache.
11. The eleventh recompense: When the Bodhisatta was a physician in one of his former existences he purposely administered a drug causing loose bowels to a rich man’s son who grudged him his fee. On account of that evil deed, the Buddha, in his last existence, was afflicted with severe dysentery with discharge of blood, prior to his passing away.
12. The twelfth recompense: The Bodhisatta was once born as a Brahmin named Jotipāla. He made blasphemous remarks about Buddha Kassapa saying: “How is it possible that this shaveling is Perfectly Awakened? Perfect Awakening is a most rare thing.” That blasphemy had the consequence of delaying Awakening for him. Other Bodhisattas attained Awakening in a matter of days or months, whereas Gotama, the Bodhisatta, had to go through six painful years in his quest for the truth.

These twelve consequences of the past blunders of the Bodhisatta were related by the Buddha himself in the Connection with Previous Deeds in the Traditions about the Buddha (Pubba-kamma-pilotika-buddha-apādāna, Ap 39.10).

Pukkusa, the Malla Prince

While the Buddha was sitting at the foot of the tree after having a drink of water, Pukkusa, a Malla Prince, who was a disciple of Āḷāra Kālāma, was on his journey from Kusinārā to Pāvā. Seeing the Buddha sitting at the foot of a tree, Pukkusa of the Mallas approached him, made obeisance to him, and sat in a suitable place.

Then he addressed the Buddha: “Wonderful it is, venerable sir, marvellous it is, venerable sir, how the recluses remain in their tranquil state! Venerable sir, as it happened in the past, Āḷāra Kālāma, while on a journey, left the road and sat down at the foot of a tree by the roadside to spend the day. At that time, 500 carts passed by, very close to him.

Venerable sir, a man who was following behind the 500 carts went towards Āḷāra Kālāma and asked: ‘Sir, did you see 500 carts pass by?’

Āḷāra said: ‘Friend, I did not see them.’

‘Sir, how is it then? Did you hear the noise of those carts?’

‘Friend, I did not hear the noise either.’

‘Sir, how is it then? Were you asleep then?’

‘Friend, I was not asleep either.’

‘Sir, how is it then? Were you quite conscious then?’

‘Yes, friend, I was quite conscious.’

‘Sir, you say you did not see nor hear the 500 carts that passed very close by you even though you were conscious and awake. Yet your double robe [1053] is covered all over with dust, isn’t it?’

‘It is so, friend.’

Venerable sir, after having that dialogue with Āḷāra Kālāma that man thought thus: ‘Wonderful it is, marvellous it is, that the recluses remain in their tranquil state! This recluse Āḷāra, although conscious and awake, did not see nor hear the 500 carts that passed close by him!’ And saying how deeply he revered Āḷāra Kālāma, he went away.”

Thereupon the Buddha said to Pukkusa of the Mallas: “Pukkusa, what do you think of this? Someone, though conscious and awake, does not see nor hear the 500 carts that pass close by him. Another person, though conscious and awake, does not see nor hear a downpour of rain with rumbling thunder, lightning and crashing thunderbolts close by him. Now, of these two cases, which is the more difficult to achieve? Which is the more unlikely to happen?”

40c: The Last Days 3, In Malla – 1572

“Venerable sir,” replied Pukkusa, “to remain unseeing and unhearing of the passing of carts close by oneself, be it 500, 600, 700, 800, 900, 1,000, or even 100,000 carts, cannot be called difficult compared to the other case. Indeed, it is much more difficult to remain unseeing and unhearing the downpour of rain with rumbling thunder, lightning and crashing thunderbolts close by. It is more unlikely to happen.”

Then the Buddha said: “Pukkusa, at one time, I was living in a straw hut at the town of Āluma. During that time, there was a downpour of rain with rumbling thunder, lightning and crushing of thunderbolts. A thunderbolt struck near my hut killing four oxen and two cultivators who were brothers.

Then, Pukkusa, a large number of people came out from the town to see the place where the four oxen and two cultivators were killed. By that time, I had come out of the straw hut and was walking up and down in the open near the hut. A man from that crowd drew near me, and after paying respects to me, stood at a suitable distance. I asked that man: ‘Friend, why are there many people gathered?’

‘Venerable sir, four oxen and two cultivators were struck by a thunderbolt and killed while it rained heavily with rumbling thunder and lightning. These people have come to see the damage. But, venerable sir, where were you at that time?’

‘Friend, I have been here all the while.’

‘Venerable sir, how is it, then? Did you see what happened?’

‘Friend, I did not see it.’

‘Venerable sir, how is it then? Did you here that sound?’

‘Friend, I did not hear the sound either.’

‘Venerable sir, how is it then? Were you asleep?’

‘Friend, I was not asleep either.’

‘Venerable sir, how is it then? Were you conscious?’

‘Yes, friend, I was conscious.’

‘Venerable sir, is it that, though conscious and awake, you neither saw nor heard the heavy rain, rumbling thunder, lightning and crashing thunderbolts?’

‘That is so, friend.’

Pukkusa, at the end of the dialogue, the man thought: ‘Wonderful it is, marvellous it is that recluses or monastics remain in their tranquil state! The Fortunate One here, though conscious and awake, did not see nor hear the heavy rain, rumbling thunder, lightning and crashing thunderbolts!’ And saying how deeply he [1054] revered me, he made obeisance to me and went away.”

A Special Gift to the Buddha

After the Buddha had said these words, Pukkusa of the Mallas said to him: “Venerable sir, whatever high esteem I had for Āḷāra Kālāma, I now throw it away as if I would throw away rubbish in a strong wind, or let go as if I would cast some worthless thing down the rushing stream.

Venerable sir, excellent is the Dhamma! Venerable sir, excellent is the Dhamma! It is as if, venerable sir, that which has been turned over has been turned up, or as if that which has been hidden is revealed, or as if a lost traveller was told the way, or as if a lamp was lit in a dark place so that those with eyes may see visible objects, even so the Fortunate One has shown the Dhamma to me in various ways. Venerable sir, I take refuge in the Buddha, I take refuge in the Dhamma, I take refuge in the Saṅgha! May the Fortunate One regard me as a lay disciple, one who has taken refuge in the Three Treasures, from this day to the end of life.”

Then Pukkusa called a man and said to him: “Man, go and bring me the pair of fine golden-hued pieces of cloth that are reserved for ceremonial occasions.” And when the pair of lengths of fine golden-hued cloth were brought, Pukkusa, the Malla Prince, offered them to the Buddha, saying: “Venerable sir, may the Fortunate One, out of compassion for me, accept this pair of fine ceremonial lengths of cloth.” The Buddha said: “In that case, Pukkusa, present one to me and one to Ānanda.” And so Pukkusa presented one piece to the Buddha and the other piece to Ven. Ānanda.

In this connection, one might ask: “Did Ven. Ānanda accept Pukkusa’s gift?” And the answer is, yes he did. Then the inquirer might point out the previous agreement by Ven. Ānanda not to receive offerings originally made to the Buddha, which was the agreement to receive only four kinds of gifts and to refuse four kinds of gifts, made by him when he became the personal attendant to the Buddha.

The gift was accepted in this case as an exception was for these three reasons: Ven. Ānanda had, by this time, fulfilled his task as the Buddha’s personal attendant supremely well. This fact of his receiving the gift would stop others who might otherwise say that Ven. Ānanda had not served the Buddha well. So the Buddha did not favour him with any gift after 25 years of personal service. Ven. Ānanda understood that the Buddha let Pukkusa enjoy the benefit of making the gift to the Saṅgha, for giving to Ven. Ānanda amounted to giving to the Saṅgha. The Buddha also knew that Ven. Ānanda would not use the cloth himself but, instead, would present it to him.

40c: The Last Days 3, In Malla – 1574

Then the Buddha pointed out to Pukkusa the benefits of the doctrine, exhorted him to set himself up in the practice of the Dhamma, and gladdened him in the practice. After thus pointing out the benefits of the Dhamma, being exhorted to set himself up in the practice of the Dhamma, and being gladdened in the practice, Pukkusa rose from his seat and after paying respects to the Buddha, departed respectfully.

Not long after Pukkusa was gone, Ven. Ānanda placed the pair of fine golden-hued robes on the body of the Buddha. Once they were placed on the person of the Buddha, the pair of robes appeared to lose their splendour against the natural splendour of the Buddha's person. Ven. Ānanda was awestruck. He exclaimed what he saw. Thereupon the Buddha explained to him thus: "Ānanda, what you say is true. Ānanda, what you say is true. There are two occasions when the natural colour of the Realised One becomes exceedingly clear and his complexion exceedingly bright.

These two occasions are: The night, Ānanda, when the Realised One attains Supreme Perfect Self-Awakening, and the night in which he passes away leaving no trace of the five aggregates, and realizes Complete Nibbāna. [1055] Ānanda, these are the two occasions on which the natural colour of the Realised One's person becomes exceedingly clear and his complexion exceedingly bright.

Ānanda, today, in the last watch of the night, in the Sāla grove of the Malla princes where the road to Kusinārā turns, between the twin Sāla trees, the Realised One's realization of Parinibbāna will take place."

Then the Buddha said: "Come, Ānanda, let us go to the river Kakudhā."

"Very well, venerable sir," said Ven. Ānanda in assent.

Then the Buddha proceeded to the river Kakudhā accompanied by a large number of monastics. He entered the river, bathed in it, and drank its water. Back again on the river bank, he went to the mango grove by the river. Ven.

Ānanda was then at the river bank drying the loin cloth in which the Buddha bathed. There, he said to Ven. Cunda: “Cunda, fold my double robe fourfold and place it on the ground. I am weary. I need to lie down.”

Ven. Cunda assented respectfully, and placed the folded double robe on the ground and the Buddha lay down on his right side in a noble posture, with his left foot above the right foot, placed slightly beyond it, with mindfulness and clear comprehension, and keeping in mind the time of arising. Ven. Cunda kept watch there, seated nearby.

The Merits of the Two Meals

When Ven. Ānanda returned to the Buddha, he made the following special remarks about the last meal: “Ānanda, it may happen that someone may cause unhappiness to Cunda, the goldsmith’s son, by saying: ‘Friend Cunda, the Fortunate One passed away after he had eaten his last meal provided by you. How unfortunate, what a loss to you.’

Should such a thing happen, Cunda should be solaced thus: ‘Honourable Cunda, the Fortunate One passed away after he had eaten his last meal provided by you. How fortunate, what a good gain for you. Honourable Cunda these are the words I heard from the mouth of the Fortunate One himself: “There are two offerings of food that surpass all other food offerings in their benefit, and whose merits compare well as between the two of them. The two offerings are: The food offered to the Realised One, after eating which the Realised One attains Supreme Perfect Self-Awakening, and the food offered to the Realised One, after eating which the Realised One passes away leaving no trace of the five aggregates, and realizes Complete Nibbāna. These two offerings of food surpass all other food offerings in their benefit, and whose merits compare well as between the two of them.” These are the words I heard from the mouth of the Fortunate One himself.’

That being so, the honourable Cunda, the goldsmith’s son has in store for him: The merit that will ensure him long life, the merit that will ensure him good looks, the merit that will ensure him well-being and happiness, the merit that will ensure him large following, the merit that leads to the Deva realm, and the merit that ensures him pre-eminence. Thus should Cunda the goldsmith’s son be solaced.”

Then the Buddha, comprehending the matter, uttered this exalted verse on the spur of the moment (udāna):

“In one who gives, merit grows. In one who is self-controlled, enmity cannot gather. One who has insight wisdom abandons evil. One who is endowed with generosity, morality, concentration and wisdom, having destroyed attachment, hatred and delusion, attains peace.”

Herein the equal merit in Sujātā’s milk rice at the Bodhi tree and Cunda’s tender pork might be a matter of controversy. One might ask: “At the time the Fortunate One ate Sujātā’s milk rice, he had not destroyed [1056] attachment, hatred and delusion whereas at the time he ate Cunda’s food-offering, he was free from attachment, hatred and delusion. Thus the state of purity was not equal, how could the merit in the offering be equal?”

The answer is this: the equal factors in both are:

1. Both the meals lead to Parinibbāna.
2. Both enable the Buddha to dwell in the attainment of absorption (jhāna).
3. Both led to the same mode of contemplation, by the two supporters.

Now to expand this:

1. After eating Sujātā’s milk rice, the Buddha extinguished the defilements and become a Buddha which is the Parinibbāna of the defilements (kilesa), the realization of Nibbāna with the five aggregates remaining.

After eating Cunda’s tender pork, the Buddha extinguished the re-arising of the five aggregates, which is the Parinibbāna of the aggregates (khandha), the realization of Nibbāna with no aggregates remaining.

Thanks to Sujātā’s milk rice, there arose in the Buddha’s physical system superior corporeality (paṇīta-rūpa). This gave strength to the mental system so that the Dhamma body, comprising the arising of insight, the arising of path, and the arising of fruition, was able to destroy the defilements without difficulty, thus leading to the Parinibbāna of the defilements.

Cunda’s food-offering, likewise provided proper sustenance to the Buddha and enabled him to renounce the five aggregates without difficulty, thus leading to the Parinibbāna of the aggregates.

2. On the day of the Awakening, the Buddha, after eating the milk rice offered by Sujātā, had the strength to dwell in the attainment of concentration comprising 24,000 billion absorptions which was to become his daily routine (devasika-vaḷaṅjana-samāpatti). After eating Cunda’s food offering, the Buddha was, in spite of his severe dysentery, also able to keep up the daily routine of dwelling in the attainment of concentration comprising 24,000 billion absorptions.

3. Sujātā offered her milk rice to the Bodhisatta thinking him to be the guardian spirit of the great tree, later to be called the Mahā Bodhi tree. But when she knew that it was the Buddha to whom she made her offering and that he become a Buddha after having her meal of milk rice and that the Buddha got sustenance for 49 days from her food-offering, she was intensely happy. “What a great fortune for me, what a great gain to me!” She contemplated repeatedly, thus increasing her meritorious thoughts of delightful satisfaction and joy. Similarly, when Cunda learnt that his food-offering was the Buddha’s last meal, after which, he realized Nibbāna with no aggregates remaining, he was overjoyed. “What a great fortune for me, what a great gain to me!” he contemplated repeatedly, in this way increasing his meritorious thoughts of delightful satisfaction and joy.

The 2.4 Million Billion Sustained Absorptions

As discussed in the sub-commentary to the Collection of the Thematic Discourses (Saṃyutta-nikāya) on the Discourse about the Emancipation (Parinibbāna-sutta, SN 6.15), according to some teachers (keci): The Buddha in his daily routine dwelled in the absorptions of great compassion (mahā-karuṇā) numbering 12,000 billion times, and the Arahāt fruition (Arahatta-phala) absorptions numbering the same; thus dwelling in a total of 24,000 billion absorptions known as the attainments resorted to daily (devasika-vaḷaṅjana-samāpatti).

Another explanation: With the Buddhas, the return to the life-continuum thought-moment (bhavaṅga-citta) is very swift. Entering into and dwelling in a certain type of absorption as from one to another is an accomplished feat. To enter into absorption and to emerge from absorption, the Buddha needs just two or three thought-moments. That being so, it is routine for the Buddha to dwell in the five types of fine-material absorptions and the four types of non-material absorptions, the measureless attainments (appamaññā-samāpatti), the cessation attainment (nirodha-samāpatti) and [1057] the Arahāt fruition attainment (Arahatta-phala-samāpatti), thus making a daily total of twelve types of attainment (samāpatti). One 1,000 billion times for each of these twelve attainments were entered into every morning, and the same number of absorptions repeated every afternoon, thus a daily routine of 24,000 billion absorptions took place every day. This is according to some teachers.

According to other (apare) teachers it was customary for the Buddha to dwell in the cessation attainment (nirodha-samāpatti) every day. Entering into the cessation attainment is to be preceded by insight meditation. With the Buddhas, the subject of contemplation to develop insight-meditation leading to the cessation attainment is dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda).<sup>238</sup> This meditation procedure involves contemplating the twelve factors of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) in the forward order beginning from ignorance (avijjā), each for 1,000 billion times. Thus 12,000 billion times are devoted to the twelve factors of dependent origination or dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda). Then contemplating the same twelve factors in the reverse order involves another 12,000 billion times. The entering into the cessation attainment, with dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) as the subject of contemplation, is therefore 12,000 billion times each for the forward and the reverse order of dependent origination, thereby taking up 24,000 billion times. This is what other teachers say.

Since the 24,000 billion times are devoted daily to the absorptions by the Buddha, what significance is there about these absorptions on the day of Awakening and on the day of passing away? The significance, as pointed out in the sub-commentary on the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya), is that on these particular days the absorptions are built up on a more rigorous mental discipline that requires contemplating the seven aspects of physical phenomena (rūpa-sattaka) and seven aspects of mental phenomena (nāma-sattaka) in the preliminary insight-meditation.

Kusinārā as the Buddha’s Last Repose

Then the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Come, Ānanda, let us go to the Sāla grove of the Malla princes where the road bends to Kusinārā town, on yonder bank of the river Hiraññavatī.”

“Very well, venerable sir,” Ven. Ānanda assented. Then the Buddha, accompanied by a large body of monastics, reached at last the Sāla grove of the Malla princes where the road bends to Kusinārā town on the further bank of the river Hiraññavatī. There, he said to Ven. Ānanda: “Ānanda, lay the couch with its head to the north between the twin Sāla trees. Ānanda, I am weary, and wish to lie down.”

“Very well, venerable sir,” said Ven. Ānanda, and laid the couch with its head to the north between the twin Sāla trees, and the Buddha lay down on his right side in a noble posture, with his left foot above the right foot, placed slightly beyond it, with mindfulness and clear comprehension.

On this journey from Pāvā to Kusinārā, a very large body of monastic disciples, almost beyond count, had gathered around the Buddha because from the time of the news of his imminent passing away had gone out of the small village of Veḷuva, all monastics living at various places, who had come to the Buddha, did not disperse.

In the Sāla grove of the Malla princes where the couch for the Buddha was laid, there were two fine rows of Sāla trees at the north, where the head of the couch was placed, and at the south. Amidst these two rows, there was a pair of Sāla trees at the opposite ends of the couch whose roots, branches and foliage were intertwined so that they were referred to as the twin Sāla trees. There was a couch used by the Malla princes in the Sāla grove and it was the couch that the Buddha commanded Ānanda to be laid for him, and which was duly complied with. [1058]

“Ānanda, I am weary, and wish to lie down.” The significance of these words may be considered in the light of the Buddha’s natural physical might, which was equal to the strength of 10 billion of ordinary elephants, equivalent to that of ten Chaddanta white elephants, or that of 100 billion average men. All that marvellous might drained down with the dysentery, like the water poured down into a funnel filter, after the Buddha had eaten Cunda's food. The distance from Pāvā to Kusinārā was a mere three miles, or half of a league,<sup>239</sup> yet the Buddha had to make 25 pauses on his journey. At the end of the last leg of his journey, on entering the Sāla grove at sunset, he was overwhelmed by the ailments. Hence, his admission of uneasiness and need to lie down was an ominous signal to the world that he was as good as dead.

Here one might be tempted to ask: "Why did the Buddha take as much trouble to get to Kusinārā? Were not other places fit to be his last repose?" The answer is there was no place which was actually unfit for that great occasion. But there were three reasons for the Buddha in choosing this insignificant town of Kusinārā as the place of his last repose. He saw the following three eventualities and considered:

1. "If I were to pass away at any place other than Kusinārā, there would be no occasion for the Discourse about Mahā Sudassana (Mahā-sudassana-sutta, DN 17). This long discourse took two recitals (bhāṇavāra) at the council and revealed that even as a human being, when the Buddha was a Bodhisatta, one could enjoy divine glory on earth, it would find a fitting setting only at Kusinārā. The discourse would kindle the interest of the hearers to do good deeds.
2. If I were to pass away at some place other than Kusinārā, Subhadda, the wandering ascetic, would get no opportunity of meeting me. In which case it would be an utter loss for him. For he was fit to be awakened only by a Buddha and not by a Buddha's disciple. That ascetic Subhadda would be there at Kusinārā, and would put intelligent questions, and at the end of the answers to his questions, he would embrace the doctrine, learn the method of practice for developing insight, and would become the last Arahat during my lifetime.
3. If I were to pass away elsewhere, there would be bloodshed over the scramble for the relics of the Realised One. In Kusinārā, Brahmin Doṇa would be able to prevent such a catastrophe and the distribution of the relics would be effected peacefully.

<sup>239</sup> A league is variously taken as seven and half to twelve and half miles.

These were the three reasons why the Buddha took so much trouble to get to Kusinārā.

As the Buddha lay there on the couch, the twin Sāla trees burst forth into full bloom, though it was not the flowering season, and in adoration of the Buddha, rained down blossoms, continuously scattering them over his body.

Also, celestial Mandārava flowers fell from the sky, continuously scattering themselves over the body of the Buddha, signifying the adoration of the Buddha by the celestial beings; also celestial sandalwood powder fell from the sky, continuously scattering itself over the body of the Buddha, signifying the adoration of the Buddha by the celestial beings; and celestial music wafted in the sky, celestial melodies resounded in the air above, in adoration of the Buddha.

Then the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Ānanda, the twin Sāla trees burst forth into full bloom though it is not the flowering season, and in adoration of the Realised One, rain fell, continuously scattering them over the body of the Realised One.

Also, celestial Mandārava flowers fall from the sky, continuously scattering themselves over the body of the Realised One, signifying the adoration of the [1059] Realised One by the celestial beings; also celestial sandalwood powder falls from the sky, continuously scattering itself over the body of the Realised One, signifying the adoration of the Realised One by the celestial beings; and, celestial music wafts in the sky, celestial melodies resound in the air above, in adoration of the Realised One.

Ānanda, all these forms of adoration cannot be called sufficient acts of honour, esteem, reverence, adoration or worship of the Realised One. Ānanda, the male monastic or female monastic, or the male lay disciple, or the female lay disciple, who practices according to the doctrine leading to the supermundane, who conducts himself correctly in the practice, and who leads a righteous life, by such a follower of the Realised One only is the Realised One best honoured, esteemed, revered, adored, and worshipped.

Accordingly, Ānanda, train yourselves diligently with a firm resolve to practice according to the doctrine leading to the supermundane; conduct yourselves correctly in the practice, and lead a righteous life.”

40c: The Last Days 3, In Malla – 1582

Herein, the Sāla trees raining down their blossoms should be understood as acts of adoration by the guardian spirits of those trees by shaking the branches.

“Mandārava flowers bloom in the Nandā Lake in the Tāvatiṃsa Realm.” The leaf of the plant is about the size of an umbrella, and the pollen collects in each flower is as much as a basketful. Not only Mandārava flowers, but also other celestial flowers, such as the coral flower and other celestial flowers, were strewn down by the Devas who dwell around the regions at the walls of the Cakkavāḷa, Tāvatiṃsa and Brahma realms so that there was a continuous sprinkling of celestial flowers.

Likewise, “celestial sandalwood” here should be understood to represent various other kinds of scented wood not only from the Deva realm but from the realms of Nāgas, Garuḷas, and other foreign lands of the human world, as well as all kinds of exotic natural scents in various forms, such as gold dust, silver powders, minerals, rocks, etc. In short, all the sentient worlds, celestial as well as terrestrial, joined in sprinkling scented dust of all descriptions continuously onto the reclining Buddha at Kusinārā.

“Celestial music,” also represents a universal symphony played by musicians of all the sentient worlds extending throughout the 10,000 world-element, including Devas, Nāgas, Garuḷas and human beings that sounded in the sky of the world-element.

“Celestial melodies resounded in the air above.” Behind the statement lies a touching story. It concerns Varuṇa and Vāruṇā Devas who have exceedingly long lifespans. These Devas, on learning that the Deva who was the Bodhisatta was going to be reborn in the human world, started making a garland for presentation to the Bodhisatta on the day of his conception. Before they had finished making the garland they heard the news that the Bodhisatta was conceived in the human mother’s womb. So when other Devas asked them for whom the garland was being made, they said: “Our garland is not finished yet, so it has to be presented to the Bodhisatta on the day he is born.”

Again, when they learnt that the Bodhisatta was already born, the garland-making Devas said: “Well, we will present it to the Bodhisatta on the day of his renunciation.” When, after 29 years of life in the human world, the Bodhisatta renounced the world, the garland-makers heard the news and said: “We will present it to the Buddha on his day of Awakening.” Then after six years of the Bodhisatta's great struggle and the news of his Awakening reached the garland-making Devas, they said: "We will present it to the Fortunate One on the day of the first discourse." After 49 days dwelling in absorption at seven different places, when the first discourse was delivered at the Deer Park, the garland-making Devas [1060] said: "Well, we will present it to the Fortunate One on the day the Fortunate One displays the twin miracle." When the news that the twin miracle had taken place reached the garland-makers, they thought of offering the garland when, after three months, the Buddha had descended from the Tāvatiṃsa Realm. And when the news of the Buddha's descent from the Tāvatiṃsa Realm was received also, they thought of offering the garland on the day the Buddha relinquished his life-maintaining thought-process. But by that day the garland was still not finished, and so they said: "The garland is still not finished; we will honour the Fortunate One with it on the day of his passing away."

Now that the latest news of the Buddha lying on his deathbed reached the garland-makers and that at the third watch of that very night the Buddha would be passing away, the Varuṇa Devas and Vāruṇā Devas exclaimed, quite bewildered: "How is that? Just today the Bodhisatta is known to be conceived in his mother's womb; just today he is born; just today he has renounced earth and home; just today the Fortunate One has attained Awakening; just today he has delivered his first discourse; just today he has displayed the twin miracle; just today he has descended from the Tāvatiṃsa Realm; just today he has relinquished the life-maintaining thought-process, and just today he is about to pass away! Should he not have tarried till breakfast time the next day? It is just too soon, too early, for such a great personage who has fulfilled the ten perfections supremely and has become a Buddha to pass away now."

Thus murmuring mournfully, the Varuṇa Devas and the Vāruṇā Devas came before the Buddha bringing with them the great garland, still unfinished, together with more flowers to go into its making. But they could not find any place in this world-element amidst the celestial crowds who had already gathered so that they were obliged to recede to the edge of the world-element, and had to keep the great garland hanging in the air above. Then those Devas ran about the rim of the world-element holding onto another's hands or embracing one another, all the while contemplating the noble attributes of the Three Treasures, and singing devotional songs on the 32 marks of the great man, the six-hued aura of the Buddha, the ten perfections, the 550 existences of the Bodhisatta, and the fourteen knowledges of the Buddha; and singing the refrain at the end of each song: “The Fortunate One with such great following and fame! The Fortunate One with such great following and fame!” All these beautiful melodies were coming from these great Devas so that celestial music resounded in the air above.

Even while the Buddha was lying there, on the couch, he saw the great gathering of Devas and Brahmas which filled the entire world-element, from the earth’s surface to the brim of this world-element and from its brim to the Brahma world. On seeing the zeal with which they were honouring the Buddha, the Buddha said the above words to Ven. Ānanda. After mentioning the marvellous modes of worshipping the Buddha by the celestial beings of the 10,000 world-element, the Buddha pointed out that the material offerings (āmisā-pūjā) were not sufficient in themselves as the best way of doing honour to the Buddha, but that only by learning and practising the doctrine is the best honour done to the Buddha. In saying these words the Buddha also implied that since the very beginning when, having been endowed with the eight factors required of a full-fledged Bodhisatta as the ascetic Sumedha, he had aspired to Buddhahood at the feet of Buddha Dīpaṅkara, lying face downward in the mud, offering himself to be used by the Buddha and his company of 400,000 Arahats, all his fulfilling of the perfections over four immeasurable periods (asaṅkhyeyya) and 100,000 aeons, were not for the purpose of being honoured by the celestial world with these flowers, perfumes and music, but was solely for the purpose of being honoured by his disciples following his teaching, which is the best way of doing honour to him.

Herein, it might be asked: “It is usual for the Fortunate One to extol the offerings of an insignificant object such as a sesame flower, unless the offering is made with a consciousness of the Buddha’s attributes, then the benefit accruing from the offering would be infinite. Yet in this case of the Varuṇa Devas and Vāruṇā Devas why did the Fortunate One not welcome their offering of the great garland?”

The answer is that the Buddha had in mind the true interest of the vast multitudes, and also [1061] the perpetuation of the teaching. Here is the explanation: The doctrine lays down the threefold training of morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā). If offering of material things were allowed too freely, then, in future, the disciples of the Buddha might neglect the practice of concentration and wisdom, they would neglect the practice of insight meditation; the male monastic disciples would preach the merits of offerings of flowers and fragrant things and offering other material things only. Offering of material things cannot maintain the teaching consisting essentially of the threefold training even for one breakfast period. Indeed, thousands of splendid monasteries or thousands of splendid relic shrines (stūpa) cannot maintain the teaching. These material donations merely lead only to mundane welfare.

It is the right practice of the Dhamma that truly counts as honouring the Buddha. The Buddha desires for honouring him by practising the Dhamma (Dhamma-pūjā). For, by right practice alone can the teaching be perpetuated. That was the reason why the Buddha extolled the practice of the Dhamma.<sup>240</sup>

The practice leading to the four paths, four fruitions and Nibbāna, the ninefold supermundane Dhamma, is the highest mode of honouring the Buddha. This practice, in accordance with Dhamma (Dhammānudhamma-paṭipatta), begins with refuge in the Three Treasures and culminates in the highest development that marks the change of the worldling into the lineage of the noble ones (gotrabhū), the state of mental maturity, which is, so to speak, on the threshold of path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa).

A monastic who indulges in the six kinds of disrespect (agāra), disobeys the rules of monastic conduct, and lives an improper life using the four requisites, which are acquired unlawfully and not according to the rules of Vinaya, is one who does not practice in accordance with the Dhamma. The monastic, who meticulously obeys every rule prescribed of monastic conduct, is one who practises in accordance with the Dhamma. These observations apply equally to female monastics.

As for lay disciples, he who is in the habit of breaking the five precepts, such as killing, which is also known as ‘the five animosities’ because non-observance of these precepts are inimical to one’s own true interest; and who indulges in the ten courses of evil action, is called one who does not practise according to the Dhamma. The lay disciple, who is well established in the Three Treasures, who observes the five precepts, the ten precepts, who keeps fasting-day precepts on four fasting days and the four days prior to them, who is in the habit of generously giving offerings of fragrant flowers to the Three Treasures, looking after his parents, and ministering to the needs of men of virtue, is called a lay disciple who practises in accordance with the Dhamma. These observations apply equally to female lay disciples.

Honouring the Buddha by honouring the Dhamma (Dhammānudhamma-paṭipatta) is also called spiritual worship (pūjā). This kind of doing honour to the Buddha alone contributes to the perpetuation of the teaching. So long as the four categories of the Buddha's disciples, i.e., male monastics, female monastics, lay male-disciples and lay female-disciples, are doing honour in this way the teaching will shine forth like the full moon in the clear sky.

Ven. Upavāṇa

At that time, Ven. Upavāṇa was standing in front of the Buddha, fanning him. Then the Buddha said to Upavāṇa: “Move away, monastic, do not stand in front of me.” Ven. Upavāṇa obeyed without delay, dropped the palm-leaf fan there, and stood at a suitable distance.

Thereupon it occurred to Ven. Ānanda thus: “This Ven. Upavāṇa had for a long time during the first 20 years after the Fortunate One's Awakening been a close attendant to the Fortunate One, and yet at this period of his passing away the Fortunate One caused him to move aside, saying: ‘Move away monastic, do not stand in front of me.’ What might be the reason for the Fortunate One in doing so?”

Therefore he asked the Buddha: [1062] “Venerable sir, Ven. Upavāṇa had for a long time been a close attendant on the Fortunate One, and yet at this period of the Fortunate One's passing away, the Fortunate One caused him to move aside with the words: ‘Move away monastic, do not stand in front of me.’ What is the reason for the Fortunate One in doing so?”

Then the Buddha, wishing to clear away from Ānanda's mind any idea of Ven. Upavāṇa being at fault and to make it clear that Ven. Upavāṇa was not at fault, explained to him thus: “Ānanda, with the exception of the Asaññasatta Brahmās and Brahmās of the formless realm, most of the Devas and Brahmās of the ten world-elements are gathered here at Kusinārā to see the Realised One. There is not, within twelve leagues in and around this Sāla grove, a single space about the breath of a tail hair of a mountain goat that remains unoccupied by powerful Devas.

Ānanda, the Devas are murmuring against Upavāṇa thus: ‘We have come from afar to see the Realised One. It is only rarely that the Arahāt, Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddhas arise in the world. And tonight, in the third watch of the night, the Realised One is due to pass away. This powerful monastic standing in front of the Fortunate One is obstructing our view. Alas! We are going to miss the chance of seeing the Realised One at his last hour.’ This is the reason why I had asked monastic Upavāṇa to step aside.”

A note of explanation: Within the space close to the Buddha, Devas and Brahmas in their subtle corporeality in groups of ten each, occupied units of space which were a tail hair in breath. Beyond those groups of Devas are Brahmas, there were groups of Devas and Brahmas in groups of 20, each occupying a space of the same breath. And beyond those groups were similar arrangements of space occupancy with groups of 30, 40, 50 and 60 Devas and Brahmas. Even though tightly spaced, there was no Deva or Brahma who got in the way of another either bodily or in their costumes; no one needed to ask another to clear the way for him or for her.

Upavāṇa was a person of extra large size, about the size of an elephant calf. Moreover, he was wearing dust-rag robes (pamsukūlika), which added to his bulk. So he was making an obstruction by standing in front of the Buddha, a genuine cause of complaint on the part of the Devas and Brahmas. It might be asked: “Did the Devas and Brahmas not have power to see through the monastic?” The answer is: “No, they did not have.” For although Devas and Brahmas can see through a worldling, they cannot see through an Arahāt. Ven. Upavāṇa was not only an Arahāt but a person of unique powers so that people could not come too close to him.

The cause and condition for the extraordinary powers of Ven. Upavāṇa even amongst the Arahats was that he had been a guardian spirit at the shrine set up in honour of Buddha Kassapa.

Ninety-one aeons before the advent of Buddha Gotama, Buddha Vipassī passed away leaving behind a single relic, a mass of golden hue. It is customary for the Buddhas, who appear during the human lifespan of thousands of years, to leave behind a single relic at their passing away, which is enshrined by the people. The people of those times built a shrine to house the relic. The shrine was of a league high, with golden coloured bricks measuring one cubit by half a cubit, two fingers’ breath thick. For cement they used crystal stone powder used for eye lotion mixed in sesame oil.

In the construction of the shrine, the Devas belonging to the terrestrial abodes raised a further league above the shrine built by human beings, which was further raised another league by the Devas of the celestial abodes. Above that height, the Uṅhavalāhakā Devas, the Abbhavalāhakā Devas, the Devas of the Catumahārājika realm and the Devas of the Tāvātimsa Realm added a league respectively to the structure so that altogether the shrine, in commemoration of Buddha Vipassī, that encased a single Buddha-relic, was seven leagues in height. [1063]

When people came to that shrine to make offerings of flowers and other things, the guardian spirit of the shrine took over the offerings and placed them suitably before the shrine even in the presence of the supporters.

At that time, in his previous existence, the elder Upavāṇa was born as a wealthy Brahmin. He went to the shrine to make an offering of a golden-hued piece of cloth, for a robe for the Buddha. The guardian spirit placed the cloth beautifully at the shrine which pleased the Brahmin supporter greatly and who uttered his wish that in future he be reborn as a guardian spirit to a Buddha-shrine of this kind. At his death, he was reborn in the Deva realm.

During the time the future Upavāṇa was being reborn, in turns, in the Deva realms and the human world, Buddha Kassapa had appeared in the world. When Buddha Kassapa passed away, the prevailing human lifespan being 20,000 years, only a single Buddha-relic remained. This relic was treasured in a shrine of one league in diameter and in height. The future Upavāṇa, at that time, became the guardian spirit of the shrine. After passing away from that life, he was born in the Deva realm again. At the time of Buddha Gotama, he was reborn into a noble family. He renounced the householder's life, leaving behind his wife and children, and became an Arahāt.

Thus, the cause and condition for Ven. Upavāṇa's extraordinary powers even among Arahats, was that he had been a guardian spirit at the shrine erected in commemoration of Buddha Kassapa.

After the Buddha had thus explained to Ven. Ānanda that Ven. Upavāṇa was told to move aside in the crowd not because he was at fault but only to satisfy the Devas, Ven. Ānanda said to the Buddha: "Venerable sir, what is the Fortunate One's assessment of the state of mind that is present in the Devas and Brahmas?” By this, Ven. Ānanda was enquiring how far the Devas and Brahmas were able to bear the grief at the impending Buddha’s decease.

The Buddha told Ven. Ānanda that the Devas and Brahmas were in a state of despondency thus: “Ānanda, the Devas, who choose to remain in the air and are standing there as if there was firm ground to stand on, having transformed the sky into firm ground by their divine power, are wailing with dishevelled hair, their arms upraised; they fling themselves down, rolling on the ground in all directions, all the while lamenting: ‘All too soon is the Fortunate One going to realize Parinibbāna! All too soon is the Gracious One going to realize Parinibbāna! All too soon is the Visionary going to vanish from the world!’

Ānanda, the Devas, who choose to remain on the earth and are standing on the ground transforming the natural earth into supportable ground for their bodies of subtle corporeality, are wailing with dishevelled hair, their arms upraised, they fling themselves down, rolling in all directions, all the while lamenting: ‘All too soon is the Fortunate One going to realize Parinibbāna! All too soon is the Gracious One going to realize Parinibbāna! All too soon is the Visionary going to vanish from the world!’

But those Devas, who are free from sensual attachment, can bear it with fortitude in the keen contemplation that all conditioned things are impermanent by nature. And hence, how would it be possible to find any permanence in this conditioned nature?”

The Devas’ bodies are composed of subtle corporeality. The texture of the natural earth cannot support them; if they were to stand on it, their bodies would seep into the earth like a lump of butter. On a certain occasion, a Brahma named Hatthaka went to the Buddha and as he tried to stand there, his body seeped into the earth. The Buddha had to remind him to transform his body into a gross kind of corporeality so as to be able to remain on solid ground. The same situation holds true with Devas. That was why the Devas, in this context, needed to transform the natural earth to suit their subtle corporeality so that it became possible for them to stand on it. [1064]

Four Places That Inspire Emotion

Then Ven. Ānanda said to the Buddha: “Venerable sir, it was customary for monastics who had ended the Rains Retreat period in various parts of the land to pay homage to the Fortunate One. We used to have the privilege of meeting and honouring these monastics whose presence inspired us. But, venerable sir, now that the Fortunate One will be no more, we shall not get the privilege of meeting these inspiring monastics.”

In the days of the Buddha, monastics went to see the Buddha twice a year, before the Rains Retreat period began and at the end of the Rains Retreat period. They went to the Buddha before going into Rains Retreat to learn the meditation method, and at the end of the Rains Retreat period to report to the Buddha their attainments such as the paths and fruitions.

In Sri Laṅkā also, as in the days of the Buddha, monastics used to assemble twice each year, before and after the Rains Retreat period. Monastics, on the shore on the Mahāgāma side, assembled at the Tissa monastery, which was donated by King Kākavaṇṇatissa while those on yonder shore assembled at Lohapāsāda Pinnacled Hall. Of those two groups, monastics on the yonder shore, at the beginning of the Rains Retreat period assembled at the Great Monastery (Mahā Vihāra), bringing with them brooms and garbage-collecting baskets, where they carried out maintenance works to the Great Shrine (Mahā-cetiya) such as, mending the masonry work, white-washing, etc. Before they dispersed to the various places of their choice to pass the Rains Retreat period, after having finished their cleaning up operations, they agreed to meet at the end of the Rains Retreat period at the Lohapāsāda Pinnacled Hall.

At the end of the Rains Retreat period, they assembled again at the Lohapāsāda Pinnacled Hall where the Five Collections (Nikāya) of the Buddha’s teachings were taught by the elders and recited by the students. Some monastics attended the Pāḷi text sessions while others attended the commentarial (aṭṭhakathā) sessions. Whenever the texts or the commentary were wrongly recited, the teachers would ask the student where and under which teacher he had learned it, and correct it. The same functions also took place, by monastics on the shore on the Mahāgāna side, at the Tissa monastery.

Here, Ven. Ānanda was referring to these biannual functions that were customary during the Buddha’s times. Ven. Ānanda was careful in the observance of religious and social duties towards fellow monastics. Whenever he saw an elder arrive, he would rise from his seat to welcome him. He would relieve the guest of the umbrella, alms bowl and double robe and offer a seat to the senior monastic. He would then sit down, make obeisance to the elder, and, finding a suitable lodging place for the visitor, he would clean it for occupation. Whenever he saw a monastic of senior standing arrive also, he would welcome him, ask about his needs and render every possible help to him. This was because Ven. Ānanda was always desirous of being a useful, helpful and respectful monastic to every other monastic. This was his usual way, and hence he expressed his concern about the matter in the above words.

The Buddha knew how Ven. Ānanda was feeling: “Ānanda is concerned about losing the usual privilege of seeing and knowing monastics who are inspiring. Now I shall point out to him those places where he can see such monastics easily by just staying there himself.”

He therefore said to him: “Ānanda, there are four places which are worthy of pilgrimage for persons with devotion to the Three Treasures which will inspire in them a spiritual urgency.

1. Ānanda, the Lumbinī Sāla grove is one such place. A person of devotion, visiting there, reflects: ‘This is the place where the Realised One was born,’ and this reflection will inspire in him a spiritual urgency; hence it is a place worthy of pilgrimage.
2. Ānanda, the Mahā Bodhi, the Great Awakening tree, is another such place. A person of devotion, visiting there reflects: ‘This is the place where the Realised One attained Supremely Perfect Awakening,’ and this reflection will inspire in him, a spiritual urgency; hence it is a place worthy of pilgrimage. [1065]
3. Ānanda, the Isipatana Deer Park is another such place. A person of devotion, visiting there, reflects: ‘This is the place where the Realised One set the Supreme Dhamma Wheel turning,’ and this reflection will inspire in him a spiritual urgency; hence it is a place worthy of pilgrimage.
4. Ānanda, Kusinārā is another such place. A person of devotion, visiting there, reflects: ‘This is the place where the Realised One realized Parinibbāna, having passed away without any attachment to the five aggregates,’ and this reflection will inspire in him a spiritual urgency; hence it is a place worthy of pilgrimage.

Ānanda, these are four places which are worthy of pilgrimage for persons with devotion to the Three Treasures which will inspire in them a spiritual urgency.

Ānanda, there will come to these four places male monastics, female monastics, male lay disciples and female lay disciples who are devoted to the Three Treasures, reflecting: 1) This sacred place of Lumbinī is the place where the Realised One was born; 2) this sacred place of Mahā Bodhi is the place where the Realised One attained Supremely Perfect Awakening; 3) this sacred place of the Isipatana Deer Park is the place where the Realised One set the Supreme Dhamma Wheel turning; and 4) this sacred place of Kusinārā is the place where the Realised One realized Parinibbāna, having passed away without any attachment to the five aggregates. Ānanda, all those pilgrims, if they should die with devotion in their hearts while on pilgrimage to these four sacred places or shrines, after the death and dissolution of the body, they will be bound for fortunate destinations. They will be reborn in the Deva realm.”

Ven. Ānanda’s Questions

Then Ven. Ānanda put a series of questions to which the Buddha answered in detail.

Ven. Ānanda: “Venerable sir, how should we conduct ourselves with regard to women?”

Buddha: “Not seeing them, Ānanda.”

Hence the best way, the Buddha says, is not to see any woman. For if a monastic stays with closed doors and windows inside the monastery, and if a woman were to appear at the door, there is no idea in him of attachment to the woman so long as he does not see her. But when he sees her, some thought of desire may come into his mind, and the mind is agitated. That is why the Buddha says it is best for a monastic not to see a woman.

Ven. Ānanda: “Venerable sir, if we should unavoidably see them, what should we do?”

Buddha: “Do not speak to them, Ānanda.”

On going for alms collection in the mornings, women devotees usually come to offer alms food. They will have to be seen by monastics. In such a case, the Buddha says: “Consider the woman as if she were a fierce man with a sharp knife in his hand, who says to you: ‘If you dare speak to me, I will cut off your head,’ or as a Yakkha who says to you: ‘If you speak to me, I will devour you.’ Consider that if you were to speak to the fierce man or to the Yakkha your life is at stake for the present life only, whereas, if you were to speak to the woman whom you are obliged to see, you are liable to fall to the four lower worlds. If a monastic were to enter into conversation with a woman, there occurs familiarity. When there is familiarity, attachment arises. When the monastic's mind becomes attached to a woman, his morality is spoilt and it leads him to the four lower worlds. That is why the Buddha says to not speak to them.

40c: The Last Days 3, In Malla – 1593

Ven. Ānanda: “Venerable sir, if we have occasion to speak to them what should we do?” [1066]

Buddha: “Ānanda, consider the woman to be your mother, or sister, etc., as the case may be, and be mindful.”

A monastic will, on occasion, be obliged to talk to a woman. She might want to know the fasting days, or she might ask to have the precepts administered, or she might request a discourse, or she might like a doctrinal point cleared. On such occasions, it is quite inadvisable for a monastic to remain silent, lest he should be taken as a dumb monastic or a dullard. If perforce, a monastic is obliged to talk to a woman, he should regard her as his own mother, if the woman is of the age of his mother, or as his own sister, if she is of the age of his sister, or as his own daughter, if she is of the age of a daughter to him.<sup>241</sup>

Ven. Ānanda: “Venerable sir, after the Fortunate One has passed away, what should we do with regards to the remains of the Realised One?”

Buddha: “Ānanda, do not trouble yourself about doing honour to the remains of the Realised One. I exhort you, Ānanda, devote yourselves to the noble practice. Strive in all earnest, without negligence, directing your mind towards Nibbāna. Ānanda, wise nobles, wise Brahmins and wise householders are there, in deepest devotion to the Realised One, who will see to the task of doing honour to the remains of the Realised One.”

Ven. Ānanda: “Venerable sir, in what manner should those wise nobles, wise Brahmins and wise householders perform regarding the remains of the Realised One?”

By this Ven. Ānanda means to say that those wise nobles, and so on, would certainly be seeking advice from him as regards the funeral rites, and so he wants to have a broad suggestion from the Buddha in the matter.

Buddha: “Ānanda, it should be performed as in the case of treating the remains of a Universal Monarch.”

Ven. Ānanda: “Venerable sir, what is the procedure in the case of treating the remains of a Universal Monarch?”

Buddha: “Ānanda, the procedure is as follows: The body of a Universal Monarch, after his decease, is wrapped up in new cloth which is made in the province of Kāsi. Over that wrapping there should be a wrapping of carded cotton-wool.<sup>242</sup> Over the cotton-wool wrapping, there should be another layer of wrapping with new cloth made in Kāsi. Then another layer of wrapping with cotton wool should be made. In this way, the body of the Universal Monarch is wrapped up in 500 pairs of cloth in successive layers and cotton wool. Then it is placed in an oil vat wrought with gold, and covered with a lid wrought with gold. Then it is placed upon a funeral pyre built of various kinds of scented wood and the body of the Universal Monarch is cremated. Then they build a shrine in memory of the Universal Monarch at the junction of the four highways. Ānanda, this is the procedure in the case of the remains of a Universal Monarch.

Ānanda, as is the procedure followed with regard to the relics of a Universal Monarch, so also should the procedure be followed with regard to the relics of the Realised One. A relic shrine (stūpa) to the honour of the Realised One should be erected at the junction of the four highways. People will make offerings of flowers or incense or scented powder, or pay homage, or will reflect on the Buddha’s greatness in front of the shrine, and for such deeds of devotion, those people will enjoy benefit and happiness for a long time.

Four Types of Person Worthy of a Relic Shrine

Ānanda, there are four types or classes of persons who are worthy of honouring by a [1067] shrine in their memory. They are:

1. A Realised One, a Worthy One, a Perfectly Self-Awakened One.
2. A Paccekabuddha.
3. A noble disciple of a Realised One.

---

<sup>242</sup> This is because cloth made in Kāsi is too fine to absorb oil and only cotton wool can absorb oil.

4. A Universal Monarch.

Ānanda, on account of what special benefit is a Realised One, the Arahāt, Perfectly Self-Awakened, worthy of a shrine? Ānanda, a shrine, in honour of a Realised One, arouses in the pilgrims who visit it a keen sense of devotion, with the reverential thought: ‘This shrine is in memory of the Arahāt, Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddha.’ Having reverentially recalled the memory of the Realised One, after the death and dissolution of their bodies, these pilgrims will be bound for fortunate destinations. They will be reborn in the Deva realm. Ānanda, it is on account of this special benefit that a Realised One, Arahāt, Perfectly Self-Awakened, is worthy of a shrine.

Ānanda, on account of what special benefit is a Paccekabuddha worthy of a shrine? Ānanda, a shrine in honour of a Paccekabuddha arouses in the pilgrims who visit it a keen sense of devotion, with the reverential thought: ‘This shrine is in memory of a Paccekabuddha who discovered the four noble truths by himself without the guidance of any teacher.’ Having reverentially recalled the memory of the Paccekabuddha, after the death and dissolution of their bodies, these pilgrims will be bound for fortunate destinations, they will be reborn in the Deva realm. Ānanda, it is on account of this special benefit that a Paccekabuddha is worthy of a shrine.

Ānanda, on account of what special benefit is a noble disciple (ariya) worthy of a shrine? Ānanda, a shrine in honour of a noble disciple (ariya) arouses in the pilgrims who visit it a keen sense of devotion, with the reverential thought: ‘This shrine is in memory of a noble disciple (ariya) of the Arahāt, Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddha.’ Having reverentially recalled the memory of the noble disciple (ariya), after the death and dissolution of their bodies, these pilgrims will be bound for fortunate destinations; they will be reborn in the Deva realm. Ānanda it is on account of this special benefit that a noble disciple (ariya) is worthy of a shrine.

Ānanda on account of what special benefit is a Universal Monarch worthy of a shrine? Ānanda, a shrine in honour of a Universal Monarch arouses in the pilgrims who visit it a keen sense of devotion, with the reverential thought: ‘This shrine is in memory of a Universal Monarch who lived and ruled righteously.’ Having reverentially recalled the memory of the Universal Monarch, after the death and dissolution of their bodies, these pilgrims will be bound for fortunate destinations; they will be reborn in the Deva realm. Ānanda, it is on account of this special benefit that a Universal Monarch is worthy of a shrine.

Ānanda, these are the four types or classes of persons who are worthy of a shrine.” These were the questions by Ven. Ānanda and the detailed answers by the Buddha.

In this connection, it might be asked: “Why is a Universal Monarch who lives and dies a lay person honoured by a shrine whereas a monastic, though yet a worldling, who is possessed of virtue, is not?”

The answer is that the Buddha did not allow a shrine be built in honour of a virtuous monastic who is still a worldling because that would be too common a practice. For, if virtuous monastics were declared by the Buddha to be honoured by a shrine, even in Sri Lankā alone, a great many shrines could be built so that these shrines would be very common.

A Universal Monarch is a very rare personage and a shrine built in his honour will be awe-inspiring. However, although a virtuous monastic, who is a worldling, is not honoured by a shrine, he is entitled to funeral rites on the same scales as the honour that is accorded to an Arahat at his Parinibbāna. [1068]

The Noble Qualities of Ven. Ānanda

After the Buddha had given detailed answers to Ven. Ānanda’s queries, Ven. Ānanda thought to himself: “The Fortunate One has discoursed to me on the four places which inspire spiritual urgency, and the benefits arising from pilgrimage to these places; he has answered me about monastic conduct regarding women; he has detailed to me the procedure about performing the last rites in honour of the Realised One; and he has explained to me about the four classes of persons worthy of a shrine. And just today the Realised One is going to realize Parinibbāna.”

These thoughts made him miserable. He felt like crying but, remembering that it would not be proper to cry near the Buddha, he retired into the assembly chamber and leaning against the door-post, he wailed: “I am still training myself for the three higher paths, and my teacher who has been so compassionate to me, is about to pass away.”

Then the Buddha asked the monastics: “Monastics, where is Ānanda?” – “Venerable sir,” the monastics replied, “Ven. Ānanda has gone into the pavilion and is leaning against the door-post, wailing: ‘I am still training myself for the three higher paths, and my teacher who has been so compassionate to me, is about to pass away!”

Then the Buddha said to a monastic: “Go, monastic, say to Ānanda in my words: ‘Friend Ānanda, the Teacher calls you.’” – Responding to that monastic’s message, Ven. Ānanda went to the Buddha and after paying respects to him, sat in a suitable place. To Ven. Ānanda sitting there, the Buddha said: “Enough Ānanda, do not grieve, nor weep. Have I not previously told you that it is the very nature of things most near and dear to us that one must part with them somehow even while we are living, or when death divides us, or when we are on different planes of existence? Ānanda in this matter, how could one expect anything that has the nature of arising, of appearing, of being conditioned, and of dissolution, not to disintegrate? It is not possible for anyone to wish so.

For a long time, Ānanda, you have attended upon the Realised One faithfully, whether in his presence or not, with infinite kindness in deed, with the welfare and happiness of the Realised One at heart; faithfully, whether in his presence or not, with infinite kindness in words, with the welfare and happiness of the Realised One at heart; faithfully, whether in his presence or not, with infinite kindness in thought, with the welfare and benefit of the Realised One at heart. Ānanda, you have earned much merit. Apply yourself to the task of insight meditation, and you will soon become an Arahat.” The Buddha said this to console Ven. Ānanda.

Ven. Ānanda’s personal service to the Buddha with infinite kindness in deed included all bodily activities, such as preparing the water and toothbrushes for the Buddha’s morning ablutions. His infinite kindness in words included all courteous, respectful communication with the Buddha such as saying: “Venerable sir, it is time for the Fortunate One to wash his face, and so on.” Taken in another sense, it also included words of appreciation and gladness on hearing the Buddha’s admonition. Infinite kindness in thought means after rising early and his personal cleanliness being attended to, Ānanda would sit in a secluded corner and wish the Buddha well: “May the Fortunate One be free from ailments, may he be free from harm, may he be at ease physically and mentally.”

Then as if a strong man were to spread out the great earth that was folded, or as if a strong man were to smoothen the sky that was wrinkled, or as if a strong man were to push downwards Mount Cakkavaḷa, which is 164,000 leagues high, or as if a strong man were to lift up Mount Meru which is 168,000 leagues high, or as if a strong man were to shake the stem of the Jambu Rose Apple Tree [1069] which is 100 leagues high and 100 leagues wide, in order to incite wonder in the hearts of his audience.

Regarding the meritorious qualities of Ven. Ānanda, the Buddha spoke thus to the monastics: “Monastics, the attendant monastics of the Arahāt, Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddhas of the past were as accomplished and devoted as my attendant Ānanda.

Monastics, the attendant monastics of the Arahāt, Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddhas of the future will be as accomplished and devoted as my attendant Ānanda.

Monastics, Ānanda is wise and intelligent. He knows: ‘This is the proper time for the male monastics to approach and see the Realised One, or this is the proper time for the female monastics to approach and see the Realised One, or this is the proper time for the male lay disciples to approach and see the Realised One, or this is the proper time for female lay disciples to approach and see the Realised One, or this is the proper time for the king, the king’s ministers, or the teachers of other faiths or their adherents to approach and see the Realised One.’ ”

Note that the Buddha does not say anything about other Buddhas of the present time because in no other world-element was another Buddha of infinite attributes in existence.

Four Marvellous Qualities of Ānanda

“Monastics, Ānanda has four marvellous and astounding qualities, they are:

1. If, monastics, a company of male monastics should visit Ānanda, they are gladdened on seeing him. If Ānanda should give them a discourse on the doctrine, they are gladdened by the discourse. Even when, at the end of his discourse, Ānanda remains silent, the company of monastics is still unsatiated. This is one marvellous quality.
2. If, monastics, a company of female monastics should visit Ānanda, they are gladdened on seeing him. If Ānanda, should give them a discourse on the doctrine, they are gladdened by the discourse. Even when, at the end of his discourse, Ānanda remains silent, the company of female monastics is still unsatiated. This is another marvellous quality.

Monastics, these are the four marvellous and astounding qualities in Ānanda.”

All the four categories of disciples who visited the Buddha also visited Ven. Ānanda. Many visited him because he had a reputation of being absolutely dignified in bearing, pleasing in appearance, of wide learning, and was the pride of the Saṅgha. When they saw him in person they were gladdened because all the good things they had heard about Ven. Ānanda were found to be true. Ven. Ānanda would give a discourse fitting to each category of disciples. His talk was mostly courteous exchange of personal interest.

To a company of male monastics, he would ask: “Friends, are you doing well in health? Are you able to apply yourselves to the monastic practice with proper attention? Are you able to do your duties towards your preceptors?”

To a company of female monastics, he would ask: “Sister, do you observe well the eight weighty rules (garu-dhamma)?”

To male lay disciples who came to see him, he would not ask such trite questions as: “Supporters, how is your headache? How [1070] is your stomach functioning now? How are your children or relatives doing in health? etc.” Rather, he would ask: “Supporters, do you remain firmly committed to the Three Treasures? Do you observe the five precepts well? Do you keep the Observance Day precepts on the eighth days of each month? Do you look after your parents? Do you minister to the needs of virtuous ascetics and Brahmins?” These words, that monastics are obliged to say to those who visited them, are the usual words that Ven. Ānanda used when male lay disciples visited him. With female lay disciples also, Ānanda’s courteous words are of a similar nature.

Four Marvellous Qualities of a Universal Monarch

“Monastics, a Universal Monarch has four marvellous and astounding qualities. They are:

1. If, monastics, a company of the ruling class should visit the Universal Monarch, they are gladdened by the sight of him. If the Universal Monarch should give them a discourse, they are gladdened by the discourse. Even when, at the end of his discourse, the Universal Monarch remains silent, the company of the ruling class is still unsatiated. This is one marvellous quality.
2. If, monastics, a company of Brahmins should visit the Universal Monarch, they are gladdened by the sight of him. If the Universal Monarch should give them a discourse, they are gladdened by the discourse. Even when, at the end of the discourse, the Universal Monarch remains silent, the company of Brahmins is still unsatiated. This is another marvellous quality.
3. If, monastics, a company of rich householders should visit the Universal Monarch, they are gladdened by the sight of him. If the Universal Monarch should give them a discourse, they are gladdened by the discourse. Even when, at the end of the discourse, the Universal Monarch remains silent, the company of rich householders is still unsatiated. This is another marvellous quality.
4. If, monastics, a company of recluses should visit the Universal Monarch, they are gladdened by the sight of him. If the Universal Monarch should give them a discourse, they are gladdened by the discourse. Even when, at the end of the discourse, the Universal Monarch remains silent, the company of recluses is still unsatiated. This is another marvellous quality.

These are the four marvellous qualities of a Universal Monarch.”

The ruling class, who visit the Universal Monarch includes both crowned kings as well as uncrowned kings. They visit him because they have heard the good reputation of the Universal Monarch, such as: “The Universal Monarch is attractive and dignified in appearance, he roams his realms by air to administer peace and justice, and he rules by justice alone.” And when they see him in person they are gladdened because all the good things they have heard about the Universal Monarch are found to be true. When the ruling class visits him, the Universal Monarch would ask them: “How is it, friends, do you abide by the ten points of kingly conduct? Do you protect and preserve the time honoured traditions of ancient rulers?”

To the Brahmin visitors, he would ask: “How is it, masters, do you teach the Vedas? Do the close pupils of yours learn the Vedas? Are you being honoured with sacrifices, are you being offered new cloth, with milk-cows of variegated colours?”

To the rich house-holders who visits him, he would ask: “How is it, [1071] men, are you free from oppression by the rulers with unjust sentences or unjust taxes? Do you get regular rainfall? Are your harvests bountiful?”

To the recluses who visit him, he would ask: “How is it, recluses, are you being offered your requisites without trouble? Are you arduous in your religious undertakings?”

King Mahā Sudassana

[The following is based on the Discourse about King Mahā Sudassana (Mahā-sudassana-sutta, DN 17) and its commentary.]

After the Buddha had extolled the virtues of Ven. Ānanda, he said to the Buddha: “Venerable sir, pray do not realize Parinibbāna in this insignificant little town of Kusinārā. Venerable sir, there are many great cities, such as Campā, Rājagaha, Sāvattihī, Sāketa, Kosambī and Bārāṇasī. Let the Fortunate One realize Parinibbāna in one of them. In these great cities, there are many rich nobles, many rich Brahmins and many rich householders who are devoted to the Realised One. They will carry out the task of honouring the relics of the Realised One.”

“Do not say so, Ānanda. Do not say: ‘This insignificant little town,’ Ānanda. Ānanda, as it happened in the long, long past, there was a king named Mahā Sudassana, a Universal Monarch, a Righteous Ruler over the four quarters of the four island continents bounded by the four oceans, a conqueror of all enemies, holding unchallenged sway over his territory, and endowed with the seven treasures, the customary boon of the Universal Monarch. And Ānanda, this Kusinārā town was then King Sudassana’s capital city named Kusāvati. From east to west, it was twelve leagues long, and from north to south, it was seven leagues broad.

Ānanda, the capital city of Kusāvātī was prosperous and flourishing, populous and thronging with people, and well provisioned. Just as, Ānanda, the celestial city of Āḷakamandā, the seat of King Vessavaṇa of the Four Great Kings was prosperous and flourishing, populous with Devas and thronging with all sorts of Yakkhas, and was well provisioned. So, Ānanda, the capital city of Kusāvātī was prosperous and flourishing, populous and thronging with all sorts of people and was well-provisioned.

The capital city of Kusāvātī, Ānanda, was never silent by day nor by night, resounding with ten sounds: the noise of elephants, horses, carriages, big drums, tabors, lutes, singing, conches, music-beats with little gongs and cymbals, and of cries of: “Eat, drink, and chew.”

The ten sounds signify the peace and prosperity of Kusāvātī. In some other towns, instead of the ten sounds, there were unpleasant sounds such as: “Dispose of the garbage, bring pick axes, bring baskets; or let us move to some other place, bring provisions, bring cooked meals; or make ready your shields and weapons, prepare yourselves for war!” But in Kusāvātī such unpleasant sounds were never heard. Only pleasant welcome sounds of invitation to feasts and festivals were heard there.

The Buddha discoursed on Kusāvātī, the royal city, by beginning with: “Ānanda, the royal city of Kusāvātī was surrounded by seven rings of fortifications, etc.,” which, lasted for two recitals<sup>243</sup> at the Council.<sup>244</sup>

Having concluded this long discourse on the grandeur of Kusāvātī, the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Go you, Ānanda, enter Kusinārā and announce to the Malla princes of Kusinārā: ‘O Vāseṭṭhas,<sup>245</sup> tonight, in the third watch of the night, the Parinibbāna of the Realised One will take place. Come, Vāseṭṭhas, come! Do not let yourselves regret it later with the thought: “The Realised One passed away in our territory, and yet we failed to take the opportunity of paying our respects at his last hour.” ’ ’ ”

“Very well, venerable sir,” said Ven. Ānanda, and went into Kusinārā with a monastic companion.

<sup>243</sup> [A recital (bhāṇavāra) is said to be equal to 250 siloka verses of 32 syllables, or 8,000 syllables in all.]

In this connection, it might be asked: “Did the Malla princes not know about the arrival of the Fortunate One at Kusinārā?” The answer is, they knew it, of course. For, wherever the Buddha went, there were always some Devas who were devoted to [1072] him and the lay disciples, heralding the glad tidings that resounded in the neighbourhood. On that particular evening, the Malla princes were engaged in a meeting so that they could not go and welcome the Buddha. The Buddha sent Ven. Ānanda at that late hour because there was no monastery built for him in the Sāla grove, and the Malla princes would have to provide shelter for the big company of monastics there. There was also the consideration that the Malla princes might, if not informed at that late hour, feel sad later that they had no news of the Buddha at his last moments.

The Mallas Pay Their Last Respects

When Ven. Ānanda entered the city of Kusinārā, the Malla princes were holding a meeting at the Council Hall. Ven. Ānanda went up to them and announced, as enjoined by the Buddha: “Vāsetṭhas, tonight, in the third watch of the night, the Parinibbāna of the Realised One will take place. Come, Vāsetṭhas, come! Do not let yourselves regret it later with the thought: ‘The Realised One passed away in our territory, and yet we failed to take the opportunity of paying our respects at his last hour.’ ”

On hearing the message brought by Ven. Ānanda, the Malla princes, their sons and daughters, their daughters-in-law, and their wives were grief-stricken and sick at heart, and wailed, their hair dishevelled, their arms upraised; they flung themselves down, rolling on the floor in all directions, all the while lamenting: “All too soon is the Fortunate One going to realize Parinibbāna! All too soon is the Gracious One going to realize Parinibbāna! All too soon is the Visionary going to vanish from the world!”

Then the Malla princes, their sons and daughters, their daughters-in-law and their wives were grief-stricken and sick at heart, and they went to the Sāla grove where they approached Ven. Ānanda. Then it occurred to Ven. Ānanda thus: “If I were to let the Mallas of Kusinārā pay homage to the Fortunate One one by one, the night will have passed into dawn before all of them had finished. It would be well if I should group them together in families and cause them, family-wise, to pay homage to the Fortunate One, by announcing: ‘Venerable sir, the Malla prince named such and such with children, wife, ministers and retinue, pays homage at the feet of the Fortunate One.’ ”

Accordingly, he grouped the Mallas of Kusinārā in families and caused them family-wise, to pay homage to the Buddha, announcing: “Venerable sir, the Malla prince named such and such, with children, wife, ministers, and retinue, pays homage at the feet of the Fortunate One,” thus finishing the whole event even before the end of the first watch of the night.

Subhadda, the Wandering Ascetic

At that time Subhadda, a wandering ascetic, was staying at Kusinārā. He had heard the news: “Tonight, in the last watch of the night, the Parinibbāna of the ascetic Gotama will take place.” Then it occurred to Subhadda, the wandering ascetic, thus: “I have already heard wandering ascetics, teachers, and teachers of teachers, declare that the Arahāt, Perfectly Self-Awakened Realised Ones arise in the world only once in a very long time. Tonight, in the last watch of the night, the Parinibbāna of the Realised One, the ascetic Gotama, will take place. A certain problem, an uncertainty, has arisen in my mind, and I am fully confident that the ascetic Gotama will be able to teach the doctrine to me so that this uncertainty is cleared.”

Before we discuss the previous existence of Subhadda, the wandering ascetic, it is useful to know that there are three Subhaddas connected with the life story of Buddha Gotama. There is Subhadda, son of Upaka and Cāpā. And there is Subhadda the monastic, who entered the Saṅgha after being a householder, who after the decease of the Buddha, was one of the company of monastics that accompanied Ven. Mahā Kassapa from Pāvā to Kusinārā, [1073] and who had the affront to declare that since the Buddha was no more, monastics were free to conduct themselves as they pleased. The Subhadda in our story here, is a wandering ascetic, not a naked ascetic, who came of a well-known and rich Brahmin family, who was the last person that was Awakened though the direct teaching of Buddha Gotama.

The reason for Subhadda’s idea to meet the Buddha at the eleventh hour may be due to his past merit which had the potential and entitled him to gain Awakening only at such a late moment.

Subhadda’s Previous Existence

The peculiar nature of Subhadda’s past merit will be discussed now. In one of their previous existences, there were two farmers who were brothers and both were charitable. But the elder brother had a desire to give in generosity at every stage of the cultivation of paddy which had nine different stages. Thus, when the paddy plants were being sown, he set aside some of the seeds for giving away in generosity, which he cooked and made a seed-rice offering of them; when the paddy crop began to turn into rice, he consulted with his younger brother to extract the milky juice of the formative rice and give away in generosity. The idea was not acceptable by the younger brother who said: “Brother, why do you wish to spoil the young rice?”

Thereupon, the elder brother, to be able to carry out his desire, divided the field equally with the younger brother and extracted the milky juice of the forming rice from his portion of the field, boiled it with ghee and clear oil from sesame, and gave away in generosity as the earliest-stage rice offering. When the rice took solid grain shape, he pounded it and prepared soft rice-flakes offering. When it was time for harvesting, he made harvesting-time rice offering. When bundles of rice plants were made, he selected the earliest bound plants into bundle-time rice offering. When the bundles of rice plants were piled up on the threshing ground, he made the rice from the earliest-piled bundles into bundled-heaped rice offering. When the threshing of the bundles began, he selected the first bundles to be threshed, took the rice and made an offering of threshing-time rice offering. After the rice grains were collected from the threshing floor and heaped up, he selected the earliest samples of the heap and made a paddy-heaped rice offering. When the rice grains were put into the granary, he took the earliest samples and made a granary-time rice offering. In that manner, he made rice offerings of rice for every cultivating season.

As for the younger brother, he made his rice offering only after the harvested rice was garnered.

In their last existences, the elder brother was reborn as Koṇḍañña in the time of Buddha Gotama. When the Buddha viewed the world, thinking: “Who would deserve the privilege of hearing the first discourse?” he saw Koṇḍañña who in his previous existence had made nine various offerings of rice for every cultivating season. Therefore, Koṇḍañña, one of the five ascetics, deserved to have the privilege of hearing the first discourse entitled the Discourse setting the Dhamma Wheel Turning (Dhamma-cakkappavattana-sutta, SN 56.11). Thus Koṇḍañña, who was the first human disciple to realize the Dhamma, was called Aññāsi Koṇḍañña, ‘Koṇḍañña who has understood,’ who became a Stream-enterer along with 800 million Brahmas at the end of the first discourse.

As for the younger brother, as the result of making late offerings, the thought of seeing the Buddha came to his mind only at the last hour.<sup>246</sup> When the time to reap the fruit of his previous merit arrived at last, Subhadda remembered the Buddha. He lost no time to go to the Sāla grove. He approached Ven. Ānanda and said: “Ven. Ānanda, I have heard from elderly wandering ascetics, who are teachers, teachers of teachers, that the Arahat, Perfectly Self-Awakened Realised Ones arise in the world only once in a very long time. Tonight, in the last watch of the night, the Parinibbāna of the ascetic Gotama will take place. A certain problem, an uncertainty has arisen in my mind, and I am fully confident that the ascetic Gotama will be able to teach the doctrine to me so that this [1074] uncertainty is cleared. Ven. Ānanda, pray let me have the chance of seeing the ascetic Gotama!”

Thereupon, Ven. Ānanda reflected thus: “These ascetics, who believe in doctrines other than the Fortunate One’s teaching, cling to their own views. If the Fortunate One were to explain to this Subhadda at much length to make him forsake his own view, it would only strain the bodily and vocal energies of the Fortunate One, and Subhadda is not likely to renounce his own view. As it is, the Fortunate One is already weary.” So he said: “Friend Subhadda, this is out of the question. The Fortunate One is weary. Do not pester or trouble him.”

On that reply, Subhadda, the wandering ascetic, bethought himself: “Ven. Ānanda is withholding his assent. But one must be patient to get what one wants.” And so he said for the second time: “Ven. Ānanda ...” Ven. Ānanda refused again. For the third time Subhadda made his appeal as before. And for the third time Ven. Ānanda refused again.

The Buddha overheard the conversation between the wanderer Subhadda and Ven. Ānanda. Since he had made this exhausting journey to Kusinārā for the sake of Subhadda, he called to Ven. Ānanda: “Ānanda, it is not fitting to stop him. Do not prevent Subhadda from seeing me. Ānanda, let Subhadda have the opportunity to see the Realised One. Whatever Subhadda shall ask of me, he will ask for his information, and not for harassing me. When I answer what he asks, he will readily understand my answer.” Then Ven. Ānanda said: “Go, friend Subhadda, the Fortunate One has given you permission.”

Then Subhadda approached the Buddha and offered courteous greetings to him. After exchanging memorable words of felicitation with him, Subhadda sat in a suitable place. Then he addressed the Buddha thus: “Reverend Gotama, there are ascetics and Brahmins who have a large following, who have adherent sects, who are leaders of their sects, who are renowned, who are proponents of their own doctrines, and who are held in esteem by many people, such as, Pūraṇa Kassapa, Makkhali Gosāla, Ajita Kesakambala, Pakudha Kaccāyana, Sañjaya Belaṭṭhaputta and Nigaṇṭha Nāṭaputta. Do all of them understand what they maintain as the truth? Or do all of them have no understanding of what they maintain as the truth? Or do some of them understand the truth and some of them do not?”

Subhadda’s question is essentially about Buddhahood. He asked: “Reverend sir, are Pūraṇa Kassapa and the five other religious leaders, who claim to be all-knowing Buddhas, and who are held in high esteem by many people, really All-knowing Buddhas? Or are none of them Buddhas? Or are some of them Buddhas while others are not? For if they are really Buddhas the doctrines they preach must lead to liberation from the round of existences. Are all of their doctrines conducive to liberation? Or are none of their doctrines conducive to liberation? Or are some of their doctrines conducive to liberation while others are not?”

Now, the Buddha’s intention in going to Kusinārā was to discourse on the doctrine to the Malla princes in the first watch of the night, to discourse on the doctrine to Subhadda in the middle watch of the night, to give admonition to the Saṅgha in the third watch of the night, and then to realize Parinibbāna at the approach of dawn. In that tight schedule, it would be of no benefit to Subhadda to explain to him about whether the doctrines of the six religious leaders were conducive to liberation or not, and there would be no time for such a discussion. Therefore the Buddha chose to teach Subhadda the Middle Way as contained in the noble Eightfold Path which could lead him to liberation. Accordingly he said: “Subhadda, do not ask that. Leave aside the question whether all of those religious leaders know the truth, whether none of them know the truth, or whether some of them know the truth, while others do not. Subhadda, I shall expound to you the good doctrine leading to Nibbāna. Listen and pay careful attention. I shall speak in full.” [1075] “Very well, Reverend Sir,” said Subhadda, the wandering ascetic.

And the Buddha gave this discourse: “Subhadda, in whatever righteous teaching, the noble Eightfold Path is not found, therein there is not found an ascetic (samaṇa) of the first stage, a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) monastic, nor an ascetic of the second stage, a Once-Returner (Sakadāgāmi) monastic, nor an ascetic of the third stage, a Non-returner (Anāgāmi) monastic, nor an ascetic of the fourth stage, an Arahāt.

Subhadda, in whatever righteous teaching the noble Eightfold Path is found, therein is found an ascetic of the first stage, a Stream-enterer, an ascetic of the second stage, a Once-Returner, an ascetic of the third stage, a Non-returner, and an ascetic of the fourth stage, an Arahāt.

Subhadda, in this righteous teaching of mine, there is the noble Eightfold Path. In this teaching alone is found an ascetic of the first stage, an ascetic of the second stage, an ascetic of the third stage, and an ascetic of the fourth stage, an Arahāt.

All other creeds are devoid of the twelve categories of monastics who comprehend the truth: The four noble ones (ariya) who have attained the paths; the four noble ones (ariya) who have attained the fruitions; and the four trainees who are cultivating insight to attain the four stages of path-knowledge. Subhadda, if these twelve monastics practise and pass on the teaching rightly, the world will not be void of Arahats.

Subhadda, at the age of 29, I renounced the world and became an ascetic to seek the all-knowing truth, the Awakening as a Buddha. It is over 50 years now, since I became an ascetic. Outside of this teaching of mine, there is no one who cultivates insight which is the prelude to the noble path, there is also no ascetic of the first stage; there is also no ascetic of the second stage; there is also no ascetic of the third stage; there is also no ascetic of the fourth stage, an Arahāt.

All other creeds are devoid of the twelve categories of monastics mentioned above who comprehend the truth. Subhadda, if these twelve monastics practise and pass on the teaching rightly, the world will not be void of Arahats.”

Subhadda Ordains and Becomes an Arahāt

When this was said by the Buddha, Subhadda, the wandering ascetic, said: “Venerable sir! Excellent is the Dhamma! Venerable sir! Excellent is the Dhamma! It is, venerable sir, as if that which had been turned over has been turned up, or as if that which has been hidden is revealed, or as if a lost traveller is told the way, or as if a lamp is lit and held up in a dark place so that those with eyes may see visible objects, even so has the Fortunate One shown the Dhamma to me in various ways. Venerable sir I, Subhadda, take refuge in the Buddha, I take refuge in the Dhamma, I take refuge in the Saṅgha. Venerable sir, may I be ordained into the Saṅgha in the presence of the Fortunate One; may I receive full admission into the Saṅgha.”

When Subhadda made this appeal, the Buddha said: “Subhadda, if a person, who has been a believer in another faith, wishes to receive ordination and admission into this Saṅgha as a monastic, he has to live under probation for four months, and if at the end of the four months, the monastics are satisfied with him, he will be ordained and admitted into the Saṅgha. But in this matter, I recognize there is a difference in individuals, and whether a person needs to go on probation or not.”

Subhadda replied: “Venerable sir, if a person, having been a believer in another faith and wishing to receive ordination and admission into the Saṅgha as a monastic, has to live under [1076] probation for four months, and if at the end of the four months the monastics are satisfied and grant him ordination and grant him admission, I’m prepared to live under probation even for four years. And at the end of four years, if the monastics are satisfied with me, let them grant me ordination into the Saṅgha and raise me to the status of a monastic.”

Then the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Well, then, Ānanda, let Subhadda be ordained into the Saṅgha.” – “Very well, venerable sir,” Ānanda replied. Then Subhadda said to Ven. Ānanda: “Friend Ānanda, how fortunate you all are, what a boon you all have, that you all have been personally conferred by the Fortunate One the status of close discipleship.”

Here the actual words used by Subhadda were: “That you all have been sprinkled by, or anointed by, the sprinkling of close discipleship.” This idea of being dubbed a close disciple by the head of the religious Saṅgha was, in the religious system of the wandering ascetics, a great honour and privilege.

Then Ven. Ānanda took Subhadda, the wandering ascetic, to an appropriate place where his head was wetted with water out of a water container, and he was taught the method of reflecting on the loathsomeness of the body, particularly the group of five parts, or aspects, of the body with skin as the fifth. With the shaving of the head and the face, robing with monastic robes, and administering of the refuges, performed in succession, he was ordained. After that Subhadda was brought before the Buddha.

Then the Buddha caused the novice Subhadda to be admitted into the Saṅgha as a full-fledged monastic (bhikkhu) and then taught him the appropriate method of meditation. Ven. Subhadda sought seclusion in the Sāla grove, went into meditation in the walking posture alone, by walking up and down. With intent mindfulness, and striving arduously, he became an Arahāt during that very night, and he was endowed with the four discriminative knowledges (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa). Then he went to the Buddha and sat there in a worshipping posture. Ven. Subhadda became one of the Arahats, and he was the last one to become an Arahāt in the presence of the Buddha.

Herein, “the last to become an Arahāt in the presence of the Buddha,” may mean any one of the following: 1) One who was ordained into the Saṅgha during the time of the Buddha, who was admitted into the Saṅgha as a monastic after the Buddha’s decease and who learnt insight meditation, and became an Arahāt; 2) one who was ordained and admitted into the Saṅgha as a monastic during the time of the Buddha who learnt insight-meditation after the Buddha’s decease and became an Arahāt; 3) one who was ordained and admitted into the Saṅgha as a monastic who learnt insight-meditation, and became an Arahāt after the Buddha’s decease.

Ven. Subhadda was one who was ordained and admitted into the Saṅgha, who learnt insight-meditation and became an Arahāt during the time of the Buddha. Thus he was the last of those who became an Arahāt in the presence of the Buddha.

Subhadda, according to the Dhamma Verses Commentary

What is related above about Subhadda, the wandering ascetic, is according to the Long Discourse about the Emancipation (Mahā-parinibbāna-sutta, DN 16) and the commentary thereon. The story of Subhadda, the wandering ascetic, as described in the commentary on the Dhamma Verses (Dhp 254-255), is briefly related below: While the Buddha was lying on the couch, his death-bed, in the Sāla grove, Subhadda, the wandering ascetic, thought to himself: “I have referred my three questions to wandering ascetics but have not done so to the ascetic Gotama because he is young. Now, the ascetic Gotama is about to pass away. If I do not ask my questions to him, I shall have cause to regret later for failure to do so.”

Musing thus, he went to the Sāla grove where the Buddha was staying and requested Ven. Ānanda to gain an audience with the [1077] Buddha. Ven. Ānanda refused as related above. However, the Buddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Ānanda, do not prevent him. Let him put his question to me.” Subhadda was accordingly admitted into the Buddha’s private quarters which was screened off from outside. He sat at the foot of the Buddha’s couch and addressed him thus: “How is it, Revered Gotama?

1. Is it possible for a track to be present in the sky?
2. Is it possible for ascetics who can quell the defilements to be present outside of the teaching of Buddha Gotama?
3. Is it possible for any conditioned thing to remain permanent?

The Buddha answered the above three questions in the negative in the following verses (Dhp 254-255):

*Ākāse va padaṃ natthi, samaṇo natthi bāhire,
papañcābhiratā pajā, nippapañcā Tathāgatā.*

Subhadda, in the sky, there is no track. Even so, outside the Buddha’s teaching, there is no monastic of the twelve categories who can quell the defilements. All sentient beings, be they Brahmas, Devas, or humans take delight in the three factors that tend to prolong Samsāra: craving, conceit and wrong view. All the Buddhas are free from these factors, having overcome them at the time of Awakening at the foot of the Bodhi tree.

Ākāse va padaṃ natthi, samaṇo natthi bāhire, saṅkhārā sassatā natthi, natthi Buddhānam-iñjitā.

Subhadda, in the sky there is no track. Even so, outside the Buddha’s teaching, there is no monastic of the twelve categories who can quell the defilements. There is no conditioned thing, such as the five aggregates, that remains permanent. All the Buddhas are unperturbed either by craving, conceit, or wrong view.

At the end of the discourse Subhadda, the wandering ascetic, became a Non-returner (Anāgāmi-magga). And the audience that were present also benefited from the discourse.

In this matter the two stories may be recompiled in this way: Subhadda, the wandering ascetic, posed his question as contained in the Long Discourse about the Emancipation (Mahā-parinibbāna-sutta, DN 16), and after listening to the Buddha's answer to it, he further asked the three questions as mentioned in the Dhamma Verses commentary. After hearing the answers thereto, he became a Non-returner (Anāgāmi). Then he became a Buddha's disciple, was admitted into the Saṅgha, devoted himself to the threefold training, and became an Arahat before the Buddha realized Parinibbāna.

The Buddha's Last Words

After Subhadda had become the last one to become an Arahat, the Buddha gave admonition, his last one, which he addressed to Ven. Ānanda, but it was also directed towards the large gathering of monastics: “Ānanda, it may be that some of you will think: ‘The doctrine propounded by the teacher is bereft of its propounder; we have now no teacher.’ But, Ānanda, despondency of such a nature is uncalled for. The doctrine and discipline which I have taught and prescribed for you over these 45 years, is to be your teacher when I am gone.

Whereas Ānanda, monastics now address each other by the term friend (āvuso), irrespective of seniority, they should not address each other like that after I am gone. A senior monastic should address a junior monastic either by his given monastic name [1078] or by his family name, or by the title of friend (āvuso). And a junior monastic should address a senior monastic by the title of venerable sir (bhante or āyasmā).”

Ānanda, after I am gone, the Saṅgha may abolish the lesser and minor rules of the discipline, if it wishes to.

Ānanda, after I am gone, let the supreme penalty be imposed upon the monastic Channa.”

“But, venerable sir, what is the supreme penalty?”

“Ānanda, let Channa say what he likes. No monastic should make any remarks on what he says, nor should they admonish him, nor check him.”

With regard to this first point: The Buddha means to say: “Ānanda, while I am living, I have taught you the Discipline,<sup>247</sup> covering the seven classes of offences with their respective background cases, such as: ‘This is an offence of a light nature; this is an offence of a grievous nature; this is a retrievable offence, this is an irretrievable offence; this is a definitely demeritorious offence, this is merely a nominal offence; this is an offence redeemable with the pardoning by the aggrieved party; this is an offence redeemable with the pardoning by the sect of monastics concerned; this is an offence redeemable by the Saṅgha as a body, etc.’ All these in the Discipline will, after I am gone, remain as your teacher, discharge the function of the teacher himself.

Ānanda, while I am living, I have taught you the Discourses encompassing the thirty-seven constituents of Awakening, comprising the four methods of steadfast mindfulness, the four right endeavours, the four bases of psychic power, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven factors of Awakening, the eight constituents of the path, together with their details. All these, under the Discourses will, after I am gone, remain as your teacher, discharging the function of the teacher himself.

Ānanda, while I am living, I have taught you the Abhidhamma specifying in minute detail: ‘These are the five aggregates, the twelve sense spheres, the eighteen elements, the four truths, the twenty-two faculties, the nine root causes, the four nutriments, the seven kinds of contact, the seven kinds of sensation, the seven kinds of perception, the seven kinds of volition, the seven classes of consciousness. And, of these phenomena, which I have taught you, classifications enumerating them under phenomena pertaining to the sense sphere, to the form realm, to the formless realm; phenomena that are included in the round of resultants; phenomena that are mundane, phenomena that are supermundane.’ Thus, beginning from an enumeration of the phenomena, such as the aggregates (khandha), the edifice of the Abhidhamma has been built up for you with an infinite variety of methods of analyses and syntheses comprising the Conditional Relations (Paṭṭhāna). All these, under the Abhidhamma will, after I am gone, remain as your teacher, discharging the function of the teacher himself.

These doctrines that I have taught you over 45 Rains Retreat (vassa), constituting the Dhamma,<sup>248</sup> number 84,000 units. These 84,000 units of Dhamma factors are still with you. The Realised One is the teacher that will not be there any longer. While I am living, you are under the guidance and supervision of only one teacher; when I am gone, these 84,000 units of the Dhamma factors, which can be called the 84,000 teachers, will guide you, supervise you on my behalf.” Thus the Buddha admonished and consoled the monastics.

Under the next point, the Buddha instructed the rule of social conduct among monastics.

Under the following point, the Buddha did not give an unequivocal [1079] directive to the effect that lesser and minor rules of the Discipline be abolished. Instead, he left the option to do so to the Saṅgha. Why did he leave the matter in an equivocal state? The answer is: He saw the strength of conviction and the strength of wisdom in Ven. Mahā Kassapa. The Buddha saw that even if he were to give an unequivocal directive on the matter, the Saṅgha, in the council headed by Ven. Mahā Kassapa, would not agree to abolish any rules, even the lesser and minor ones.

After the Buddha had said these words to Ven. Ānanda, he addressed the monastics thus: “Monastics, in case there should be any uncertainty or misgiving in any one of you regarding the Buddha, or the Dhamma, or the Saṅgha, or the path leading to Nibbāna, or the noble practice, ask me questions, and do not leave an occasion for regret later, with the thought: ‘We were there together with the Fortunate One, and yet we failed to clear our doubts by asking him our questions.’”

When the Buddha said this, the monastics remained silent. He asked a second time, but the monastics remained silent. When asked for a third time, the monastics also remained silent. Thereupon, he said to them: “It may be, monastics, that you do not ask questions because you have deference for the Fortunate One, thinking: ‘We all are monastic disciples under the Fortunate One, we owe the four requisites to the Fortunate One, we have had no uncertainty about him, and yet it is not proper for us to have uncertainty about him at this last moment.’ Monastics, if that is so, then let each one tell his companion about his uncertainty or misgiving.” And still the monastics were silent.

Ven. Ānanda said to the Buddha: “Wonderful it is, venerable sir! Astounding it is, venerable sir! I believe that in this assembly of monastics there is not a single monastic who has uncertainty or misgiving regarding the Buddha, or the Dhamma, or the Saṅgha, or the path, or the practice.”

And the Buddha said: “Ānanda, you say this out of faith. But, as for the Realised One, it is a matter of knowledge that, in this assembly of monastics, there is not a single monastic who has uncertainty or misgiving regarding the Buddha, or the Dhamma, or the Saṅgha, or the path, or the practice.

Ānanda, amongst these 500 monastics, even the least accomplished one is a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna), not liable to be reborn in the four miserable realms, but is destined to gain the three higher paths.<sup>249</sup> Then the Buddha said to the monastics as his last admonition:

Handa dāni, bhikkhave, āmantayāmi vo, vaya-dhammā saṅkharā, appamādena sampādettha.

Now, monastics, I say this as my last exhortation: Decay is inherent in all compounded things, strive with heedfulness to complete the task.

This was the Buddha’s last exhortation. This was given even as he was on his death-bed. It is a most significant compression of all that he had taught over 45 years into just one word, heedfulness (appamāda). [1080]

The Buddha’s Parinibbāna

After the Buddha had uttered these words about striving with heedfulness (appamādena sampādettha), no more words were uttered. The whole Sāla grove fell silent. The Buddha was then engaged in mental activity only, preparing himself to realize utter cessation through passing away. His mind was now purely absorbed in meditation.

First, the Buddha entered into the first fine material absorption (rūpāvacara-kriyā-paṭhama-jhāna). Rising from the first absorption, he entered into the second absorption. Rising from the second absorption, he entered into the third absorption. Rising from the third absorption, he entered into the fourth fine material absorption.

Rising from the fourth absorption, he entered and became absorbed in the non-material absorption of the sphere of infinity of space (arūpāvacara-kriyā-ākāsānañcāyatana-samāpatti). Rising from the absorption of the sphere of infinity of space, he entered and became absorbed in the sphere of the infinity of consciousness (viññāṇañcāyatana-samāpatti). Rising from the absorption of the sphere of infinity of consciousness, he entered and became absorbed in the sphere of nothingness (ākāṅkamañcāyatana-samāpatti). Rising from the absorption of the sphere of nothingness, he entered and became absorbed in the sphere of neither-consciousness-nor-non-consciousness (nevasaññā-nāsaññāyatana-samāpatti). Rising from the absorption of the sphere of neither-consciousness-nor-non-consciousness, he entered and became absorbed in cessation (nirodha-samāpatti), so-called because consciousness and sensation cease during the absorption.

While the Buddha was absorbed in cessation, there was no breathing. When Ānanda noticed the stoppage of breathing, he was alarmed and asked Ven. Anuruddha: “Venerable sir, has the Fortunate One passed away?” Ven. Anuruddha explained to Ānanda: “No, friend, the Fortunate One is only in the absorption of cessation which is marked by a complete cessation of consciousness and sensation.”

“How did Ven. Anuruddha know that the Fortunate One was absorbed in cessation?” Ven. Anuruddha was entering and remaining absorbed in the first absorption (jhāna) throughout the absorptions of formless realm absorption along with every step that the Buddha went through, entering and rising from each absorption, up to the absorption of the sphere of neither-consciousness-nor-non-consciousness. Only when the Buddha became absorbed in cessation, Anuruddha did not join him at this stage. Therefore, he knew that the Buddha was in the absorption of cessation and he knew that during this kind of absorption death never takes place.

Then the Buddha, rising from the absorption of cessation, entered and became absorbed in the sphere of neither-consciousness-nor-non-consciousness. Rising from the absorption of the sphere of neither-consciousness-nor-non-consciousness, he entered and became absorbed in the sphere of nothingness. Rising from the absorption of the sphere of nothingness, he entered and became absorbed in the sphere of infinite consciousness. Rising from the absorption of the sphere of infinite consciousness, he entered and became absorbed in the sphere of infinite space. Rising from the absorption of the sphere of infinite space, he entered into the fourth fine material absorption. Rising from the fourth absorption, he entered into the third absorption. Rising from the third absorption, he entered into the second absorption. Rising from the second absorption, he entered into the first absorption.

40c: The Last Days 3, In Malla – 1617

A few technical details:

The Buddha entered upon the first fine-material absorption with the following 24 objects of meditation:

1. 10 concepts of loathsomeness.
2. 8 concepts of the preliminary mental objects (kaṣiṇa).
3. The concept of the corporeality group which is the mental object of mindfulness of the body.
4. The concept of out-breathing and in-breathing which [1081] is the mental object of breathing meditation (ānāpanasati).
5. Three concepts of boundless living beings which in the mental object of the three Divine Abidings (Brahma-vihāra) of loving-kindness (mettā), compassion (karuṇā) and sympathetic joy (muditā).
6. The concept of the limit of space.

Total: 24

He entered upon the second and third fine-material absorptions (jhāna) with the thirteen objects of meditation comprising the five out of six groups of the above table, i.e., minus groups 1 and 3. He entered upon the fourth absorption (jhāna) with fifteen objects of meditation mentioned below:

1. 8 concepts of the preliminary mental objects (kaṣiṇa).
2. The concept of out-breathing and in-breathing.
3. The concept of boundless living beings, which is the mental object of the divine abiding of equanimity (upekkhā).
4. The concept of the limit of space.
5. Four meditation objects of non-materiality.

Total: 15

This is only a broad outline. In fact, at the last moment, just before entering the utter cessation, the Buddha remained in the myriads of absorptions numbering 24,000 billion which was his daily routine. Like a traveller leaving home would bid all the family farewell with embraces and kisses, the Buddha dwelt in the bliss of the absorptions to the full before realizing Parinibbāna.

Then again, rising from the first absorption (jhāna), the Buddha entered into the second absorption. Rising from the second absorption, he entered into the third absorption. Rising from the third absorption, he entered into the fourth absorption. Rising from the fourth absorption, he contemplated equanimity and one-pointedness of mind, the two absorption factors of the fourth absorption, alternatively or both of them together. Then at the end of the reviewing impulsion (paccavekkhaṇa-mahā-kriyā-javana), with the life-continuum thought-moment or consciousness, which is associated with happiness, associated with knowledge, the unprompted resultant of the first-order, which is the truth of suffering (dukkha-sacca) of neither meritorious nor demeritorious thought, the Buddha realized Parinibbāna and made an end of suffering (dukkha).

There are two kinds of Parinibbāna, namely:

1. Passing away after the end of dwelling in absorption where the incumbent Arahant, after entering into absorption and rising from it, reverts to the life-continuum thought moment, during which he passes away.
2. Passing away after the reviewing impulsion where the incumbent Arahant, after entering in absorption and rising from it, contemplates the absorption and the factors combined or separate, and at the end of such contemplation, which is the reviewing impulsion, he reverts to the life continuum thought-moment, during which he passes away.

Of the above two kinds, the Buddha passed away after the second kind.

[1082]

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha Utterings That Arouse Religious Urgency

[Although in a separate chapter, this is a continuation of the retelling of DN 16.]

When the Buddha passed away, there occurred simultaneously a great earthquake, so terrible as to cause the body hair to rise and gooseflesh to appear on the skin. Rumbings of celestial big drums reverberated in the sky. When the Buddha passed away, at the moment of his passing away, Brahma Sahampati uttered this verse:

Sabbe va nikkhipissanti, bhūtā loke samussayaṃ, yattha etādiso Satthā, loke appaṭipuggalo, Tathāgato balapatto Sambuddho parinibbuto.

In this transient world even such an incomparable person as the Self-Awakened Realised One, the teacher of humans, Devas and Brahmas, endowed with Ten Powers, has to pass away. All beings in this world, when the time of death is due, must lay down this body, which is a composite of mental and physical phenomena.

When the Buddha passed away, at the moment of his passing away, Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, uttered this verse:

Anicca vata saṅkhārā, uppādavaya dhammino, upajjhivā nirujjhanti, tesāṃ vūpasamo sukho.

Impermanent indeed are all conditioned things, they are in the nature of arising and dissolution; having arisen, they cease to be, the realization of Nibbāna on their utter cessation is blissful peace.

When the Buddha passed away, at the moment of his passing away, Ven. Anuruddhā uttered this verse:

Nāhu assāsa-passāso, ṭhita cittassa tādino, anejo santim-ārabbha, yaṃ kālam-akarī Muni.

Friend monastics! The Great Sage, Lord of the Three Worlds, free of craving for existence, has ended his span of life, intent on the peace of Nibbāna. No more breathing in or out is there.

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1620

Asallīnena cittena, [1083] vedānaṃ ajjhavāsaya, pajjo tasseva Nibbānaṃ, vimokkho cetaso ahu.

Of him who was steadfast. Against the storm of worldly conditions, friends, our teacher endured the physical pain with fortitude. Like the extinction of a flame when the fuel is exhausted, his mind has attained total liberation from all bonds.

When the Buddha passed away, at the moment of his passing away, Ven. Ānanda uttered this verse which aroused spiritual urgency:

Tadāsi ya bhimsanakam, tad-āsi lomahaṃ sanam, sabhā kāra va rūpete, Sambuddhe parinibbate.

At the moment of the passing away of our teacher, endowed with glorious qualities, there was a terrifying earthquake. Then at that moment, there occurred the hair-raising, goose flesh causing earthquake of sixfold intensity.

When the Buddha passed away, those monastics who had not been able to abandon attachment and anger, i.e., the Stream-enterers and the Once-returns wailed with their arms upraised; they flung themselves down, rolled in all directions, all the while lamenting: “All too soon has the Fortunate One realized Parinibbāna! All too soon has the Gracious One realized Parinibbāna! All too soon has the possessor of the Eye of Wisdom vanished from the world!”

But those monastics who had abandoned attachment and anger, i.e., the Non-returns, bore the event with fortitude in the keen contemplation that “all conditioned things are impermanent by nature, and hence, how would it be possible to find any permanence in this conditioned nature?”

Then Ven. Anuruddha said to the monastics: “Enough, friends, do not grieve, nor weep. Has not the Fortunate One previously expounded to you that it is the very nature of things most near and dear to us that we must part with them somehow, even while we are living, or when death divides us, or when we are on different planes of existence? Friends, in this matter, how could one expect anything that has the nature of arising, of appearing, of being conditioned, and of dissolution, not to disintegrate? It is not possible for anyone to wish so. Friends, the Devas are reproachful, saying, if even venerable ones cannot bear with it, how could they give comfort to others?”

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1621

At these words of Ven. Anuruddha, Ven. Ānanda asked: “But Ven. Anuruddha, according to your observation, what is the state of mind that is present in the Devas and Brahmas?”

“Friend Ānanda, the Devas who remain in the sky are standing there as if there was firm ground to stand on, having transformed the sky into firm ground by their divine power, and are wailing with dishevelled hair, their arms upraised, they fling themselves down, rolling on the fancied ground in all directions, all the while lamenting: ‘All too soon has the Fortunate One realized Parinibbāna! All too soon has the Gracious One realized Parinibbāna! All too soon has the Visionary vanished from the world!’

“Friend Ānanda, the Devas who remain on the earth are standing on the ground [1084] transforming the natural earth into supportable ground for their bodies of subtle corporeality, and are wailing with dishevelled hair, their arms upraised, they fling themselves down, rolling on the ground in all directions, all the while lamenting: “All too soon has the Fortunate One realized Parinibbāna! All too soon has the Gracious One realized Parinibbāna! All too soon has the Visionary vanished from the world!

But those Devas who are free from sensual attachment bear the event with fortitude, contemplating that ‘all conditioned things are impermanent by nature, and hence how would it be possible to find any permanence in this conditioned nature?’ ”

Then Ven. Anuruddha and Ven. Ānanda spent the rest of the small hours of the night in Dhamma discourse. They discussed the omnipresence of death: “Friend, death has no shame even to snatch away such a great unrivalled teacher of the three worlds. How should any common beings expect any shame from death? He would take away anyone without shame.” Thus they were talking Dhamma and soon it was dawn.

Then Ven. Anuruddha said to Ven. Ānanda: “Go, friend Ānanda, enter Kusinārā and tell the Malla princes: “Vāseṭṭhas, the Fortunate One has passed away. Do now what you deem fitting.” – “Very well, venerable sir,” Ānanda assented and he went into Kusinārā accompanied by a monastic.

At that time the Malla princes were engaged in a meeting at the Council Hall, discussing the details needed in connection with honouring the Buddha who had passed away, such as flowers and incense to be arranged, seating places for the Saṅgha, offerings of food, etc. Then Ven. Ānanda went to the Council Hall and said to them: “Vāseṭṭhas, the Fortunate One has passed away. Do now as you deem fitting.”

On hearing the news from Ven. Ānanda, the Malla princes, their sons and daughters, their daughter-in-laws, and their wives were grief-stricken, and sick at heart, and wailed, their hair dishevelled, their arms upraised; they flung themselves down rolling on the floor in all directions, all the while lamenting: “All too soon has the Fortunate One realized Parinibbāna! All too soon has the Gracious One realized Parinibbāna! All too soon has the Visionary vanished from the world!”

Last Rites for the Remains of the Buddha

Then the Malla princes of Kusinārā ordered their men to gather flowers, perfumes and all kinds of musical instruments in Kusinārā. Then they went to the Sāla grove where the body of the Buddha was, bringing flowers, perfumes and all kinds of musical instruments, as well as 500 sets of long cloth. And there they passed the day in song and dance by way of venerating, honouring, revering and paying homage to the remains of the Buddha. Flowers and perfumes were placed at suitable locations, canopies of cloth were made, and pavilions set up with long cloth. Then the Malla princes of Kusinārā decided that it was rather late for that day to cremate the remains of the Buddha. “We shall perform the cremation tomorrow,” they all agreed.

Then the second day was also passed in song and dance, by way of venerating, honouring, revering and paying homage to the remains of the Buddha, where flowers and perfumes were placed in suitable locations, canopies of cloth were made, and new pavilions set up with long cloth. In the same manner the third day, the fourth day, the fifth day and the sixth day were also spent.

Then on the seventh day, the Malla princes of Kusinārā conferred among themselves and decided thus: “We shall cremate the remains of the Fortunate One at the south of the town, to which place we shall carry the body by the southern road and perform the ceremony with song and dance, flowers and perfumes, thereby venerating, honouring, revering and paying homage to the remains of the Fortunate One.”

Thereupon, eight most senior Malla princes of robust build, after washing their heads and [1085] donning new clothes, thinking: “We shall now lift up the body of the Fortunate One,” exerted in unison to lift up the body of the Buddha, but the body did not budge.

Then the Malla princes of Kusinārā, being confident that Ven. Anuruddha as the foremost monastic in the power of divine eye should be able to explain it, asked him: “Ven. Anuruddha, these eight most senior Malla princes, after washing their heads and donning new clothes, thinking: ‘We shall lift up the body of the Fortunate One,’ exerted in unison to lift up the body of the Fortunate One, but the body did not budge. What is the reason, what is the cause of this?”

“Vāseṭṭhas, it is because you are working with a different intention from the Devas.”

“What, Ven. Anuruddha, is the will of the Devas?”

“Vāseṭṭhas, your intention is this: ‘We shall cremate the remains of the Fortunate One at the south of the town, where we shall carry the body by the southern road and perform the ceremony with song and dance, flowers and perfumes, thereby venerating, honouring, revering, and paying homage to the remains of the Fortunate One.’

The intention of the Devas however is this: ‘We shall cremate the remains of the Fortunate One at the east of the town near the Makuṭabandhana Shrine of the Malla princes, where we shall carry it first northwards by the northern road, hence via the North Gate into the town, then to the East Gate by the middle road, to the Makuṭabandhana Shrine, and perform the ceremony with song and dance, flowers and perfumes, thereby venerating, honouring, revering and paying homage to the remains of the Fortunate One.’ ”

“Venerable sir, let it be according to the wish of the Devas.”

At that time, Kusinārā, the home town of Malla princes, was thickly strewn with celestial Mandārava flowers everywhere, even including fence borders and rubbish heaps.

Then the Devas and the Malla princes of Kusinārā carried the remains of the Buddha northwards by the northern road; thence via the North Gate into the town, thence to the centre of the town by the middle road, venerating, honouring, revering and paying homage to the remains of the Buddha all along the route by both celestial and human dance and song, flowers and perfumes.

Mallikā, Widow of General Bandhula

While the remains of the Buddha was thus being paid homage to in the town, along the middle road, Mallikā, the widow of General Bandhula, on hearing the news, awaited in front of her house with her famous Great Creeper (Mahā-latā) gown which she had not garbed herself with since the death of her husband. She had it cleaned and washed in perfumed water to decorate the body of the Buddha with it as her unique way of honouring the memory of the Buddha.

The Great Creeper gown was a rare kind of dress which only three outstanding persons owned, viz., Visākhā, Mallikā and a robber called Devadāniyā. This dress is referred to as the Mallikā dress these days.

As the procession carrying the remains of the Buddha reached her door, Mallikā requested the people in the procession: “Princes, put down the body of the Fortunate One for a while here!” And when they complied with her request, she placed the Great Creeper gown around the body of the Buddha. It fitted well with the body from head to foot. The golden-hued body was then resplendent with the bejewelled dress wrought with the seven kinds of gems.

Mallikā was throbbing with joy at the glorious sight of the Buddha’s body being garbed in her bejewelled dress. “Fortunate One, may I, in all future existences in Samsāra, be blessed with a completely garbed person without the need to garb myself,” thus did she make her wish on that occasions. After she died, she was reborn in the Tāvātimsa Realm and her wish was fulfilled, see the commentary on the Story about Mallikā’s Heavenly Mansion (Mallikā-vimāna-vatthu, Vv 36).
[1086]

Thereafter, the Malla princes carried the body of the Buddha with the Great Creeper gown and proceeded to the East Gate. They put it down at the Makuṭabandhana Shrine of the Malla princes to the east of the town.

The Funeral Rites

Then the Malla princes asked Ven. Ānanda: “Venerable sir, in what manner should the body of the Realised One be properly handled?” – “Vāseṭṭhas, it should be treated in the same way as is done to the remains of a Universal Monarch.” – “Venerable sir, what is the procedure in the case of treating the remains of a Universal Monarch?”

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1625

“Vāseṭṭhas, the body of a Universal Monarch is wrapped up in new cloth. Over that wrapping, there should be a wrapping of carded cotton wool. Over the cotton wool wrapping, there should be another layer of wrapping with new cloth. In this way the body of a Universal Monarch is wrapped up in 500 pairs of pieces of cloth. Then it is placed in an oil vat wrought with gold, and covered with a lid wrought with gold. Then it is placed upon a funeral pyre, which is built of various kinds of scented wood and then cremated. The relics, after the cremation, are then enshrined at the junction of the four highways. Vāseṭṭhas, this is the procedure in treating the remains of a Universal Monarch.

Vāseṭṭhas, in the same way as the procedure is followed with regard to the relics of a Universal Monarch, so also should the procedure be followed with regard to the relics of the Fortunate One. A relic shrine (stūpa) to the honour of the Fortunate One should be erected at the junction of the four highways. People will visit the shrine and make offerings of flowers or incense or fragrant powder, or pay homage, or will reflect on the Buddha’s attributes. And, for such deeds of devotion, these people will enjoy benefit and happiness for a long time.”

These instructions were the Fortunate One’s instructions, as has been described above.

Then the Malla princes of Kusinārā ordered their men to collect cotton wool from the storehouses of the Malla princes. Then they treated the body of the Buddha as instructed by Ven. Ānanda. They wrapped it up in new cloth. Over that wrapping they made a cotton wool wrapping, and over that they again wrapped it up with new cloth. In this way the body of the Buddha was wrapped up in 500 pairs of pieces of cloth. Then they placed it in an oil vat wrought with gold, and covered it with a lid wrought with gold. A funeral pyre with various kinds of scented wood was built, on which they placed the embalmed body.

Ven. Mahā Kassapa

When the funeral ceremony of the Buddha was thus taking place in Kusinārā, Ven. Mahā Kassapa had finished the alms round in the city of Pāvā. And, with his mind set on going to Kusinārā, he was on his way from Pāvā to Kusinārā, accompanied by 500 monastics. On his way, he left the road and sat underneath a tree together with his company of monastics.

He sat there, not to pass the day, as of routine, but to take a rest. Here is the explanation: All the companion monastics had been brought up in an easy way. So when they travelled on foot under the scorching heat of noon, they were tired out. Ven. Mahā Kassapa saw how tired his followers were. The journey was not long ahead. There was time for rest and they would proceed in the cool of the evening and see the Buddha. That was what was in the mind of Ven. Mahā Kassapa. He sat at the foot of a tree, had his double robe spread on the ground, and cooled his limbs with the water from his water-container. Some of the companion monastics were meditating while others were discussing the glories of the Three Treasures.

At that time a wandering ascetic was approaching them on the road from Kusinārā heading for Pāvā. He was holding a celestial Mandārava flower above his head with a stick as the prop of the umbrella. [1087]

Ven. Mahā Kassapa noticed the celestial Mandārava flower held in the ascetic's hand. He knew that this flower is not seen on earth at all times and that it appears on earth only on such rare occasions as when some person of great power carries out an exercise in his psychic power, or when a Bodhisatta takes conception in his mother's womb. "But," he reflected, "this is not the day when some powerful person is carrying out an exercise in his psychic power, nor is it the day the Bodhisatta takes conception, nor the day he is being born, nor the day he attains Awakening, nor the day he delivers the Dhamma Wheel discourse, nor the day he displays the twin miracle, nor the day he descends from the Tāvātimsa Realm, nor the day he relinquishes the life-maintaining mental process, hence, this must be the day he has passed away."

Ven. Mahā Kassapa wanted to verify his deduction and asked the wandering ascetic. But if he were to mention about the Buddha in his sitting posture it might be lacking in respect, so he thought, and therefore he rose up and moving a few steps away from where he was sitting, he covered his head with the dark-brown robe made from dust heap rags which the Buddha had offered him in exchange, just as the Chaddanta white elephant would cover his head with a ruby-studded ornamental headdress, and putting his ten fingers, with their lustre aglow, together in the raised hands atop his forehead, he stood facing the wandering ascetic and asked him: "Friend, do you know our teacher?"

Herein, it might be asked: "Did Ven. Mahā Kassapa know the demise of the Buddha or did he not?" The commentaries reject the idea that he did not know. The reasons for assuming that he knew are given by the commentators thus: There was no reason to believe that Ven. Mahā Kassapa did not know the demise of the Buddha since the great earthquake that took place in all the 10,000 world-element could not go unnoticed by him.

The reason why he asked the wandering ascetic was this: “Some monastics who were with him had seen the Buddha in person while others had not. Those who had seen the Buddha wanted to see him again just because they had seen him before; those who had never seen the Buddha also wanted to see him because they had not seen him before.

If someone did not break the news of the demise of the Buddha before they arrived at Kusinārā, on their arrival there, only to find the Fortunate One had already gone, they would not be able to contain their grief and they would weep and wail and made a wretched spectacle of themselves, throwing away their upper garments, or donning the robes improperly, or beating their breasts. People seeing them would say: “The company of monastics that came with Ven. Mahā Kassapa, all rag-wearers, are crying like women. If they cannot restrain themselves, how could they be able to give comfort to us?” And so I shall have to bear the blame for them. This is a remote place here. If, on hearing the bad news, these monastics should cry, and cry as much as they like, the blame will not fall on me, for no other follower of the Buddha is here to see them. If these monastics are to receive the sad news early they would not get the shock on arrival at Kusinārā and suffer grief.”

On being asked by Ven. Mahā Kassapa, the wandering ascetic replied: “Yes, friend, I know of him. It is seven days now since the ascetic Gotama passed away. As a matter of fact, I have brought this celestial Mandārava flower from the place of his demise.”

Thereupon, some of the monastics who were with Ven. Mahā Kassapa, and had not abandoned attachment, wailed with their arms upraised; they flung themselves down rolling in all directions, all the while lamenting: “All too soon has the Fortunate One realized Parinibbāna! All too soon has the Gracious One realized Parinibbāna! All too soon has the Visionary vanished from the world!”

But, those among them who were free from sensual attachment bore the news with fortitude, contemplating that: “All conditioned things are impermanent by nature, and hence [1088] how could it be possible to find any permanence in this conditioned nature?”

Subhadda, the Elderly Monastic

Now, at that time there was an elderly monastic named Subhadda among Ven. Mahā Kassapa's 500 monastics. He had become a monastic only late in his life. When the other monastics were crying and wailing helplessly, he said these ugly words to them: "Enough, friends. Do not grieve. Do not lament. Only now we are all well-liberated from that great ascetic (samaṇa). He had been hard upon us, always saying: 'This is proper for you; that is not proper for you.' Now we are free to do what we like, and equally free not to do what we do not like."

"Why did Monastic Subhadda say those horrendous words?" it might be asked. The answer: "Because he bore a grudge against the Buddha."

Now to relate the story: Subhadda was a barber by profession before he became a monastic. He had two sons, both trainee barbers, living together with him in the town of Ātuma, who were gifted with pleasant speech and well-known as skilful barbers. Once, when the Buddha went to Ātuma from Kusinārā with a company of 1,250 monastics, he received the news of the happy event and, intending to offer a great offering of rice gruel, he said to his two trainee sons: "Sons, the Fortunate One is coming to Ātuma with 1,250 monastics. Go now, sons, carry your barber's tools with you, and collect in vessels or in bags from every house in the town whatever provisions, such as rice, oil, salt, and other edibles, being offered. Let us prepare rice gruel with those things and offer gruel to the Fortunate One."

Ven. Subhadda's two trainee sons obeyed the instruction of their father. Thanks to their melodious speech and the skill in their profession, the townspeople sponsored them in their trade. Even those who did not actually need a hair cut or a hair-do submitted themselves to them. After the job was done they asked the trainee barbers: "Sons, what would you like as fees?" They would reply: "We are planning to offer rice gruel when the Fortunate One comes to our town. So we want only the necessary ingredients to make rice gruel."

And the people were generous in their gifts to the novices. They did not even consider those gifts of rice, oil, salt and other edibles as fees. The provisions collected were of such an abundance that they could not carry them home. Instead, the supporters had to help to carry them.

Then with the arrival of the Buddha in Ātuma and his entering the straw-thatched monastery, the monk Subhadda went to the village gate in the evening and announced to the townspeople: “Disciples, I do not want any other thing but utensils to cook rice gruel from the provisions which my young sons have collected. I also would like you to lend a hand in the preparation of the rice gruel.” Then, after making ready the cooking place, he personally supervised the operations, with the dark-brown loin cloth and the dark-brown upper robe on. He prepared a special kind of gruel worth 100,000 which was to be in solid form and had to be first eaten and then drunk. The gruel contained ghee, honey, molasses, fish, meat, nectar, fruit juices, etc. It smelt like hair pomade and was also suitable to be used as such. Besides this rich rice gruel, he also prepared honey-cakes.

The Buddha, rising early, and having finished cleaning himself, went to the town of Ātuma, accompanied by a big following of monastics, for alms round. The people informed Ven. Subhadda: “The Fortunate One is now on the alms round. For whom is the rice-gruel being prepared?”

Ven. Subhadda, in his usual garb of dark-brown robes, sat in the Brahma sitting posture, with his right knee-top placed on the ground and holding a ladle and a big spoon in one hand, paid homage to the Buddha and said: “May the Fortunate One accept my thick gruel as a food offering.”

The Buddha inquired after how the food had been made, what ingredients were used, etc. as described in the Chapter about Medicines (Bhesajjakkhandhaka, Vin Mv 6) and being told of the facts, he reprimanded Ven. Subhadda on a number of counts. The Buddha then laid down fresh [1089] Vinaya rules: 1) Taking upon oneself improper activity which is liable to a wrong-doing (dukkata) offence (akappiya-samādāna); and 2) keeping up the outfit of a barber by one who had been a barber, which is also liable to a wrong-doing offence (khura-baṇḍa-pariharaṇa).

He also enjoined the monastics from accepting Ven. Subhadda’s rice gruel in these words: “Monastics, you have spent millions and millions of aeons in search of food. The food now offered by Subhadda is improper for monastics. If you take this food, you will suffer in the four lower worlds for thousands of existences. Monastics, move away. Do not accept the food.” After saying so, the Buddha proceeded to the alms collecting area of the town. None of the monastics accepted any of the thick gruel that Ven. Subhadda offered.

Ven. Subhadda was greatly disappointed: “This ascetic (samaṇa) goes about declaring: ‘I am omniscient.’ If he could not accept my offering, he ought to have sent someone to say so. My food is totally spoiled and wasted. Cooked food cannot last seven days. If it were not yet cooked the provisions could have lasted for my whole life. This ascetic has ruined me. He is inimical and antagonistic towards me.” Thus thought Ven. Subhadda, and he bore a grudge against the Buddha. But he knew that: “This ascetic Gotama comes from the Sakyans, a superior social class. If I were to say anything, I could only face oppression,” and so he did not murmur while the Buddha was alive. Now he heard the news that the Buddha was no more, and he felt at ease and was greatly pleased, hence his vulgar remarks.

Ven. Mahā Kassapa’s Plan

On hearing the wild remarks uttered by Ven. Subhadda, Ven. Mahā Kassapa was very concerned. It was as though his heart had been dealt a blow, or as though he was struck by thunder on the head. “Alas, barely seven days have passed since the teacher passed away. His golden-hued body is still in existence. How soon has such a bad monastic, the scum of the religion, a thorn to the Saṅgha, arisen to threaten the existence of the teaching that the Fortunate One has so painfully set up. If such a monastic were to be left unchecked the number of his kind would grow to the detriment of the teaching.” Thus a spiritual urgency occurred to Ven. Mahā Kassapa.

Then the idea of convening a Council to recite and approve the doctrine was conceived by him, through the thoughts described as follows: “If I were to expel, on the spot, this old monastic, who is a late entrant to the Saṅgha, deriding him and sprinkling his body with ash, the people would say: ‘Even when the remains of the ascetic Gotama are still in existence, his disciples are already in disharmony.’ I must, therefore, hold my patience.

For the teachings of the Fortunate One are at present like a big heap of flowers not strung into garlands. Just as a loose heap of flowers could very well be blown away in all directions by the winds as time passes on, monastics of Subhadda’s sort would work havoc to the Discipline Collection (Vinaya-piṭaka) by one or two rescissions at first, the Discourse Collection (Sutta-piṭaka) would be diminished by revocation, at first by one or two dialogues; the Abstract Collection (Abhidhamma-piṭaka) would suffer by the omission of one or two of the ultimate things out of the existing doctrines, such as things pertaining to the sensuous sphere, things pertaining to the form realm, things pertaining to the formless realm, and things supermundane. In this manner, the disappearance of the teaching would come about, Collection by Collection, in turn. If the teaching rooted in the Discourses, the Discipline and the Abstract Collections were to disappear, the world would have nothing to stand on; where the branches of a tree are cut off, the guardian spirit of that tree can dwell in the stem of the tree; if the stem is destroyed the spirit can dwell in the roots; but if the roots are destroyed then the spirit will be rendered homeless. If the Three Baskets (Tipiṭaka) were to disappear, there would be nothing that the followers of the Buddha could point out as their religion. [1090]

Or, to take another simile: The father Yakkha has entrusted his Yakkha son with a charm that can make its holder invisible. If the Yakkha son loses this charm through forgetfulness or by being robbed of it, then he would be totally helpless. Similarly, if the Collections were to be lost then we all are lost. Therefore, we shall convene a Council and recite the Discourses and the Discipline. By doing so, we would be putting the teaching in proper order that would withstand assault just as flowers are carefully strung into garlands.

The Fortunate One had come to Kusinārā after travelling three miles to enable me to pay my last respects to him. He admitted me into the Saṅgha after three chapters of admonition. He gave me the robes he was wearing, in exchange for the robes I was wearing. When he discoursed on the practice with the similes of the moon, he referred to me by way of example. In these three events, he showed his intention of leaving the custodianship of his teaching to me (see SN 16.6-8).

So long as a true son of the Fortunate One such as myself is living, let this wicked man not grow in influence in this teaching. Before depravity gets a footing, before depravity mars the true Dhamma, before new fangled rules gain ground, before spurious regulations obstruct the Vinaya, before miscreants hold sway, before upholders of righteousness are on the wane, before those people who misrepresent the Fortunate One become a strong force, before the faithful exponents of the Fortunate One's teaching are on the wane, I shall see to it that a Council is convened to recite and unanimously approve the Discipline, the Discourse and the Abstract Collections. When such a Council is convened, monastics will learn the teaching as much as they are capable of, and discuss the Discipline with the matters that are proper and improper. When such a session is held, this wicked old monastic will know where he stands and will be duly chastised and he will never be able to show his face. And, above all, the Buddha’s teaching will become well-defined and it will prosper.”

These thoughts occurred to Ven. Mahā Kassapa. However, he did not confide his plan to any other monastics or to any other person. He simply consoled the lamenting monastics by his discourse on the doctrine thus: “Enough, friends, do not grieve. Do not weep. Has not the Fortunate One previously expounded to you that it is in the very nature of things that regarding those most near and dear to us that we must part with them some day, even while we are living, or when death divides us, or when we are on different planes of existence? Friends, in this matter, how could one expect anything that has the nature of arising, of appearing, of being conditioned, and of dissolution, not to disintegrate? It is not possible for anyone to wish so.”

The Mallas Cremate the Body of the Buddha

Then four of the most senior Malla princes of robust physique washed their heads, donned themselves in new clothes, and intending to set fire to the funeral pyre of the Buddha, ignited it; but, try as they would, the pyre did not catch fire at all. Herein, the pyre of fragrant woods was 120 cubits high, when four strong men failed to ignite it, eight were engaged in it and when eight failed too, sixteen, and again 32 men were put to the task. All means to help ignite it were also employed, such as fanning and even blowing with the smith’s bellows, but all in vain. This may be explained like this: The 80 great disciples of the Buddha had great followings devoted to them, when these people, numbering 80,000 passed away they were reborn in the Deva realms. Among these Devas, the Devas who had particular devotion to Ven. Mahā Kassapa when they were lay supporters of the monastic, saw the critical situation that their esteemed monastic was still on the way from Pāvā to Kusinārā. So they made their wish that this funeral pyre be not lighted until he arrived on the scene. It was due to their will that no amount of human effort could ignite the funeral pyre.

Then the Malla princes asked Ven. Anuruddha for the reason the funeral pyre remained unburnt. He replied to them: “The Devas wish it otherwise.”

“Venerable sir, what is the wish of the Devas?” [1091]

“Vāseṭṭhas, Ven. Mahā Kassapa is now on his way from Pāvā to Kusinārā in the company of 500 monastics. The Devas have willed that, until he has paid homage at the Fortunate One's feet, the funeral pyre of scented woods will remain unburnt.”

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1633

“Venerable sir, let the wish of the Devas prevail,” replied the Malla princes.

When the people heard that Ven. Mahā Kassapa was coming to pay homage at the feet of the Buddha, and that the funeral pyre of scented woods would not catch fire until he had done so, they were agog with excitement. “Friends, is that Ven. Mahā Kassapa dark complexioned or fair complexioned? Is he tall or short? How does he look? Friends, how could that be, that there lives such a great monastic, when the Fortunate One's passing away has taken place?” Some of them took perfumes and flowers and went out to meet Ven. Mahā Kassapa while others prepared the roadway he was coming along and stood there waiting.

Then Ven. Mahā Kassapa arrived and went to the funeral pyre of scented woods at the Makuṭabandhana Shrine of the Malla princes in Kusinārā. He wore a folded robe on one shoulder, with joined palms raised to his forehead, and he walked around the funeral pyre keeping it on his right for three rounds. By his special powers he reflected on the embalmed body of the Buddha and knew for certain which end of the body was the Buddha's feet. And standing at the end where the Buddha's feet lay, he entered upon the fourth absorption (jhāna) which is the prelude or basis of special apperception and, rising from that absorption, he made the solemn wish: “May the Fortunate One's feet, marked with 1,000 spokes at the wheels, push through the golden casket together with the multilayered wrappings of cotton-wool and 500 pairs of pieces of cloth, and come out to lie on my head.”

As soon as his solemn wish was made, the Buddha's feet pushed through the 500 layers of cloth and cotton-wool wrappings like the full moon appearing from the clouds. Ven. Mahā Kassapa spread out his palms of pinkish red, like the new bloom lotus, and holding the golden hued feet of the Buddha firmly in his hands up to the ankles, placed the pair of feet on his head, thus paying homage in a most touching manner.

Witnessing the miraculous scene, the people raised a thunderous applause and made their offerings of perfumes, flowers and other things and paid their homage at the feet of the Buddha to their hearts' content. The 500 monastics who accompanied Ven. Mahā Kassapa also wore folded robes on one shoulder and with their joined palms raised to their forehead, walked around the funeral pyre of scented wood keeping it on their right for three rounds, and paid homage at the feet of the Buddha.

After Ven. Mahā Kassapa, the people and the 500 monastics had paid homage at the Buddha's feet as much as they liked, at the instant Ven. Mahā Kassapa let go the Buddha's feet, the lac-coloured feet of the Buddha returned to their former place inside the casket, without any further wishing by Ven. Mahā Kassapa. As the feet disappeared into the golden casket, not a piece of scented wood was bestirred. As a matter of fact, as when the Buddha's feet came out of the golden casket and as they re-entered it, nothing was disturbed, not a strand of cotton-wool, not a fibre of the cloth, not a droplet of oil, not a piece of scented firewood was caused to stir itself. When once the feet were inside the golden casket again, everything was perfectly intact.

But when the Buddha's feet disappeared from view like the setting of the sun or the moon beyond the western mountain, the people wailed. They presented an even more pitiable sight than they did at the passing away of the Buddha.

After Ven. Mahā Kassapa and his 500 monastics had paid their last respects, the funeral pyre of scented wood burnt by itself, all at the same time without human effort but by the power of celestial beings; this is called the combustion by the element of heat (tejo).

Of the body of the Buddha that had burnt itself, the outer, thinner layer of the skin, the inner, thicker layer of the skin, flesh, sinews and sticky substances did not remain in the form of ash or soot; what remained was only the relics that were formed out of the body. It is just like the case of burning clear butter which leaves no ash or soot. Of the five [1092] hundred pieces of cloth that were wrapped round the body of the Buddha only the innermost and the outermost remained intact.

Notes on the Relics of the Buddha

Relics of the Buddhas that appear in the aeons when human lifespans are very long, by tens of thousands of years are of one solid mass of golden colour. Our Gotama Buddha appeared in the period when human lifespan was short, 100 years. The Buddha reflected thus before passing away: "My teaching has not spread to all directions at the time of my passing away. Let people from various places procure the relics from my body which may be as tiny as a mustard seed, enshrine them and make them a place of pilgrimage, and thus acquire merit leading to the good destination.” With that compassionate thought, he willed that the relics of his body be split up into many pieces.

In this matter, relics of the Buddha are of two broad classes: the relics that do not break up into many, and those that break up into many. Of the two classes, seven items belong to the first category: the four canines, the two collar bones, the frontal bone of the head. The remaining relics belong to the second category. About a basketful of the latter remained, of these: 1) The smallest are of the size of mustard seed, having the shape of the red jasmine buds, and a total collection of about six measures (aḷhaka);<sup>250</sup> 2) the medium size relics are of the size of broken rice, look like pearls, and have a total collection of about five measures; 3) the big-size relics are of the size of a grain of green gram, having a golden colour and a total collection of about five measures; see the commentaries on the Long Discourse about the Emancipation (Mahā-parinibbāna-sutta, DN 16) and the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa).

After the spontaneous combustion of the Buddha’s body by the element of heat had occurred, there came down from the sky, through the agency of Devas, huge columns of water, ranging in diameter from the thickness of a man’s arms, to that of a man’s calf, and to that of a palm tree, that quelled the fire arisen in the funeral pyre of scented wood. Fountains of water also sprang from the boughs of the Sāla trees. To cope with the size of the pyre which was 120 cubits high, thick columns of water with a diameter of a plough shaft sprang up from the ground on all sides of the pyre. The Malla princes of Kusinārā brought scented water in gold and silver pots and sprinkled it on the pyre. Then they combed the ashes with ploughs fitted with eight golden and silver ploughshares each, to scatter and cool the ashes. A particularly wonderful phenomenon here is that although the flames were rising fiercely through the boughs, branches and foliage of the Sāla trees around the funeral pyre, not a leaf or a blossom was burnt. Insects living in the Sāla trees were going about their own way, quite unharmed.

Last Rites for the Remains of the Buddha

After the funeral pyre had been quelled of the fire, the Mallas assembled at the Council Hall to prepare for a grand ceremony. They pounded into a cosmetic paint, four ingredients: The rhododendrons, the saffron, cloves and leaves of gum trees which they applied to various parts of the hall. Then they strew flowers, such as the primrose, the red jasmine, white durra grass, the saffron and parched grain. They made a canopy and decorated it with gold and silver spangles and hung fragrant things, flowers and precious jewels all about the Council Hall.

---

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1636

Then they made a ceremonial roadway from the Council Hall to the Makuṭabandhara Shrine with half a wall of matting and long cloth on either side of the route, along it they put up canopies which were studded with gold and silver spangles. Fragrant things, flowers and precious jewels were also hung about. Fresh bamboo poles, looking like solid pieces of emerald, were set up along the route with five coloured flags fluttering in the breeze, vying with the fluttering paper streamers. The route was made smooth and clean. Banana plants, water pots filled with water, and oil lamps in their stands were set up at regular intervals. Then they put the gold casket, which contained the relics of the Buddha, on the royal elephant fitted with bejewelled ornaments.

The reader can visualize the ceremonial route which stretched between the Council Hall, which was in the town of Kusinārā, and [1093] the funeral site at the Makuṭabandhana Shrine, which lay to the east of the town.

The Malla princes, in a ceremonial procession with song and dance, led the royal elephant bearing the golden casket containing the relics of the Buddha into Kusinārā town, making offerings of flowers and incense in front of the relics. In the town, in the council hall, they had erected a high platform, called the Sarabha, which was supported by sculpted figure of a lion and was a platform decorated with the seven kinds of jewels. There they placed the Buddha's relics, above which, the white ceremonial parasol was set up.

Around the Council Hall, where the relics were placed in state, the security of the place was arranged in great elaboration. Around the Council Hall, there was stationed an army of elephants standing close to one another. Outside this ring of elephants, there was a cavalry with horses standing close to one another. And outside the ring of cavalry, there was an army of chariots standing close to one another. Outside the ring of chariots, infantry men stood guard in a ring, in close formation. Outside the ring of infantry, there was an army of archers in close formation. And outside the ring of archers, there was an army of lancers in close formation. Thus the security guard extended to a league on all sides which took on the appearance of one huge network of chain mail. For seven days the funeral celebrations were held in all gaiety.

The Malla princes staged these celebrations only a fortnight after the demise of the Buddha because, during the previous fortnight, they were busily engaged in attending to the Saṅgha's needs regarding their lodging and meals. Now they thought: "Now we shall celebrate the great occasion in gay festivities that are connected with spiritual urgency for seven whole days. During these days of jollity we must make sure that the Buddha's relics are safe against any thief, and so we shall mount guard over the relics to the best of our ability," hence the elaborate security arrangements.

Distribution of the Relics

King Ajātasattu of Magadha heard that the Buddha had passed away in Kusinārā. The news reached him in the following manner: First the ministers of King Ajātasattu heard the news of the passing away of the Buddha and they said among themselves: "Even such a great person as the Buddha has passed away. Nothing in the world can make him alive again. Among worldlings, our king is unrivalled in the matter of devotion to the Buddha. If he were to learn this news in the normal course, he is sure to die of a broken heart. So it behoves us to see that he does not die of this news." After conferring among themselves, they made ready three golden troughs filled with a concoction of the four nutriments of sesame oil, honey, butter and molasses.

Then they said to King Ajātasattu: "Your majesty, we had had a bad dream. To avert the evil consequences of the bad dream, we would advise your majesty to wear two layers of white cloth and lie in the trough immersed in the four nutriments, with only the nose above the concoction."

The king believed the loyalty of his ministers and said: "Nobles, let it be as you say," and putting on two layers of white cloth, he lay immersed in the concoction in the trough, with only his nose exposed.

Then an official, discarding the official garb and in plain clothes, with dishevelled hair, with his face directed towards Kusinārā where the demise of the Buddha had taken place, with joined palms raised, addressed King Ajātasattu: "Your majesty, no one can escape death. The preserver of our lives, our shrine, the fertile field to sow our merit, the person worthy of sprinkling with ceremonial water on the occasion of the king's consecration and enthronement, the teacher of Devas and humans, has now passed away at Kusinārā!”

As soon as he heard this news, King Ajātasattu fainted. His body was so heated with sorrow that the concoction in which he lay immersed simmered. Thereupon, the officials removed the king from the trough and put him into a second trough filled with the concoction of four nutriments. Then King Ajātasattu regained his consciousness and asked: [1094] “What did you say, my nobles?”

“Your majesty, the Fortunate One has passed away.” And King Ajātasattu fainted again. The concoction in the trough simmered with the body heat of the king. Then the officials removed the king from the trough and placed him into a third trough filled with the concoction of the four nutriments. When King Ajātasattu regained consciousness, he again asked what was said to him. The news was repeated to him, and he fainted again. Then the officials took him out of the trough, bathed him in scented water, and poured pots of cool clear water over his head.

When King Ajātasattu regained consciousness, again he stood up and throwing down his dishevelled dark hair on his broad back, beat his chest in desperation and holding firmly his golden-hued chest with his lac-coloured fingers as if to check its breaking asunder, wailed helplessly and ran out along the high road like a lunatic.

Then King Ajātasattu, accompanied by a big company of embellished court dancers, left the town and went to the monastery in Jīvaka's Mango Grove. There, gazing at the place where the Buddha used to deliver discourses, he lamented: “The Fortunate One, the omniscient Buddha! Have you not discoursed to me on the doctrine? Have you not removed the darts of sorrow from our hearts with your discourses? We are one of your disciples who go to you for refuge, who are established in the three refuges. But now you do not speak a word to me!

Venerable sir! In previous times, about this hour, I had had the good news of the Fortunate One and his big company of monastics having gone to the various places in this southern island continent. But now, I have only the bad news of your demise!”

Thus, he went on lamenting the passing away of the Buddha, recalling the glory of the Buddha in 60 verses. He then bethought to himself: “Lamenting alone will get me nowhere. There is the more serious business of procuring the relics of the Buddha.”

This is a more complete account of King Ajātasattu’s reaction on hearing the news of the passing away of the Fortunate One.

Then King Ajātasattu of Magadha sent an envoy to the Malla princes of Kusinārā, saying: “Malla princes of Kusinārā! The Fortunate One was of the ruling class; I too am of the ruling class. Therefore I am entitled to a share of the relics of the Fortunate One. I too shall build a relic shrine (stūpa) where the Fortunate One’s relics will be held and honoured.”

After sending an envoy, King Ajātasattu thought: “It would be well and good if the Malla princes comply with our demand. But in case they should refuse, we will get relics by force.” Accordingly, he marched to Kusinārā at the head of an array of the four wings of the armed forces: elephants, horses, chariots and foot soldiers.

Similar actions of sending envoys were taken by: the Licchavī princes of Vesālī; the Sakyans of Kapilavatthu; King Buli of Allakappa; and the Koḷiyan princes, natives of Rāmagāma.

Further, they also thought: “It would be well and good if the Malla princes comply with our demand. But in case they should refuse, we will get the relics by force.” Accordingly, they marched towards Kusinārā at the head of an array of the four wings of the armed forces: elephants, horses, chariots and foot soldiers.

The Brahmin of Veṅṅhadīpa heard that the Buddha had passed away at Kusinārā. He also sent an envoy to the Malla princes of Kusinārā saying: “Malla princes of Kusinārā, the Fortunate One was of the ruling class. I am of the Brahmin class, therefore, I am entitled to a share of the relics of the Fortunate One. I too shall build a shrine (stūpa) where the Fortunate One’s relics will be held and honoured.” Besides sending an envoy, the Brahmin also went to Kusinārā with his followers.

The Malla princes of Pāvā, like King Ajātasattu, sent an envoy to Kusinārā demanding their share of the relics. They also marched towards Kusinārā in full battle array of the [1095] four wings of the armed forces.

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1640

Of the seven rival claimants mentioned above, Pāvā was the closest to Kusinārā, a mere three quarters of a league distance. Yet they arrived last because they were engaged in more elaborate ceremonial arrangements.

The seven rival claimants sent their respective envoys and at the same time surrounded the town of Kusinārā, declaring that if their demands were not met they would wage war.

The reply by the Malla princes of Kusinārā was this: “We did not ask, by messenger, for the Fortunate One to come to our place, nor personally did we go to the Fortunate One. As a matter of fact, the Fortunate One came here on his own accord and informed his arrival to us. Naturally, you will not part with whatever treasure that arises within your domain. In the world of Devas and all sentient beings there is no treasure as noble as the Buddha. We have the greatest of treasures that has come to us. So we cannot, by any means, share it with you. You had been nourished by your royal mothers, and so have we. You are brave men, and so are we. If you would choose war, then so be it.” Thus there was a vainglorious attitude on both sides. Tension was great.

Should there be a war, the Mallas of Kusinārā were bound to win because the Devas that came to pay homage to the relics of the Buddha took the correct view that the relics were the legitimate property of the Kusinārā Malla princes.

Doṇa the Brahmin Distributes the Relics

When Doṇa, the Brahmin, learnt the tense situation between the seven disputants, he thought: “These princes are doing dishonour to the place where the Fortunate One passed away. This is most improper as no one is going to benefit from war. I will pacify them all.” So he went to the scene, stood on a small mound and uttered a series of verses extolling the glory of the Buddha. His verses are known as A Panegyric to the Buddha by Doṇa (Doṇa-gajjita). It describes the Buddha’s endowment of root causes, of results or fruits of merit, and of being a benefactor to all beings, known as the three endearments.

The story of how Brahmin Doṇa got the ability to versify such a weighty panegyric should be noted here. On a certain occasion, when the Buddha was travelling from Ukkaṭṭha to Setabya, he left his footprint with the solemn wish: “May this footprint of mine remain intact until Brahmin Doṇa has viewed it,” and then he rested underneath a tree.

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1641

When Brahmin Doṇa came along on the way and saw the footprint he knew for certain: “This is the footprint of the greatest person among all beings, including Devas.” Then he traced the track of the Buddha and met him resting under the tree. The Buddha gave a discourse to him and Brahmin Doṇa became devoted to the Buddha, hence his ability to sing in praise of the Buddha at such length.

Although the Brahmin’s verses were as lengthy as two recitals, since the disputing princes were squabbling, they did not hear the first half at all. It was only when the second half was nearly over that they recognized the voice. “Well, this is our teacher’s voice! Friends, this is the voice of our teacher, isn’t it?” Then all the tumult died down out of respect for Brahmin Doṇa, for in all Jambudīpa in those days almost all youths of good families had been pupils of Brahmin Doṇa. Very few of them would not know him as a teacher.

When Brahmin Doṇa knew that the princes were now paying attention to him he said to them:

Sirs, listen to one word of mine, our Fortunate One was an upholder of forbearance. It would not be proper to make war over the matter of sharing the relics of him who was of such noble nature. Sirs, let us all be united and in harmonious agreement to divide the relics into eight parts. There are the multitudes devoted to the Buddha. Let there be shrines to [1096] his honour, everywhere across the land.

The squabbling princes assented. “Brahmin master,” they said, “in that case, divide fairly the relics of the Fortunate One into eight parts.” – “Very well, sirs,” and Brahmin Doṇa caused the golden casket of relics to be opened. On seeing the golden-hued relics lying motionless inside the casket, all the princes lamented: “The all-knowing Fortunate One! In previous times we used to see the resplendent sight of the Fortunate One with the golden complexion, marked with the 32 marks of the Great Man, emitting the six-hued radiance, and embellished by the 80 lesser marks of the Buddha. But now we are seeing only the golden relics that remind one of the Fortunate One. What a misfortune for us!”

When Brahmin Doṇa saw the princes in their grief and knew they would not notice him, he snatched the right canine tooth and hid it in his head gear. When the princes were in their stable senses, he took eight equal measures of the relics in a basket and distributed them, each sharing two measures (aḷhaka), for the whole amount of the relics was sixteen measures.

Even while Brahmin Doṇa was distributing the relics, Sakka was watching. “Where is the right canine tooth of the Buddha now, that of the Fortunate One, the expounder of the four truths that expelled all doubts in the minds of Devas and humans? Who has got it?” He scanned the scene and he saw the right canine tooth hidden in the head-gear of Brahmin Doṇa. He thought: “This canine tooth of the Buddha is such a cherished relic, I shall acquire it. And so he took it, it was a case of the robber being robbed. He took it from Brahmin Doṇa and placed it reverentially in a golden chalice and took it to the Tāvātimsa Realm where he enshrined it in the Cūḷāmaṇi Shrine.

After distributing the relics to the eight claimants, Brahmin Doṇa felt with his hand to reassure himself about the hidden relic in his head-gear but it was no longer there. But since he had stolen it himself, he dared not ask anybody about it. If he were to claim his share now, the princes would say: “Master, you distributed the relics yourself. Why did you not think of yourself to get a share for yourself?” So he consoled himself with the thought: “The basket-measure used in dividing up the relics has become sacrosanct. I shall be content with obtaining it. I shall put up a shrine enshrining it.”

So he said to the princes: “Sirs, let me keep the measure basket used in dividing the relics. I shall erect a shrine in its honour.” The princes agreed and so Brahmin Doṇa got the measure basket used in the division of the relics.

The Moriyān princes of Pippalivāna also heard that the Buddha had passed away, and they also, like King Ajātasattu, sent an envoy to Kusinārā to demand their share of the relics and also marched to Kusinārā in full array of battle, with the four wings of their armed forces, but they reached there late.

The Malla princes of Kusinārā said to them: “There is no share of the Buddha’s relics remaining. All the claimants have divided the relics among themselves. Take the charred pieces of firewood from the site of the cremation.” And the Moriyān princes had to take away the charred pieces of firewood from the site of the cremation.

Building Relic Shrines in Reverence

1. King Ajātasattu of Magadhā built a relic shrine (stūpa) at Rājagaha where he enshrined the relics of the Buddha in reverence.
2. The Licchavī princes of Vesālī built a relic shrine at Vesālī where they enshrined the relics of the Buddha in reverence.

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1643

3. The Sakyan princes of Kapilavatthu built a relic shrine at Kapilavatthu where they enshrined the relics of the Buddha in reverence. [1097]
4. The Buli princes of Allakappa built a relic shrine at Allakappa where they enshrined the relics of the Buddha in reverence.
5. The Koliyan princes of Rāma village built a relic shrine at Rāma village where they enshrined the relics of the Buddha in reverence.
6. The Brahmin of Veṭṭhadīpa built a relic shrine in his Veṭṭhadīpa country and enshrined the relics of the Buddha in reverence.
7. The Malla princes of Pāvā built a relic shrine at Pāvā and enshrined the relics of the Buddha in reverence.
8. The Malla princes of Kusinārā built a relic shrine at Kusinārā and enshrined the relics of the Fortunate One in reverence.
9. Brahmin Doṇa built a shrine and enshrined the measure basket in reverence.
10. The Moriyan princes of Pippalivana built a shrine and enshrined the charred pieces of firewood from the site of cremation in reverence.

Thus there were eight shrines of the Buddha-relics, with the ninth one, a shrine of the measuring-basket, and the tenth a shrine of charcoal, altogether making ten shrines.

King Ajātasattu's Shrine

Of the above ten shrines, we shall relate the events connected with the building of King Ajātasattu's shrine as told in the commentary and sub-commentary on the Long Discourse about the Emancipation (Mahā-parinibbāna-sutta, DN 16).

King Ajātasattu carried home his share of the relics in great ceremony. He prepared the 25 league stretch of the journey between Kusinārā and Rājagaha, a grand route of 5,000 metres wide, which was levelled. He made elaborate arrangements similar to what the Malla princes did with their passage route for the relics between the Makuṭabandhana Shrine and the Council Hall. Besides doing honour to the relics in various ways, he arranged for the opening of stalls at various places all along the route for the crowds. The golden casket of relics was placed in a golden coffin which was carried in all pomp and honour, escorted by a big army of lancers.

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1644

Before the relics arrived in Rājagaha, King Ajātasattu ordered the people to assemble in a gathering 500 kilometres wide. The festivities, which started in Kusinārā, continued all along the route under the escort of his big army. Wherever golden-coloured flower trees were in bloom, he placed the relics in the ring, surrounded by the army of lancers and made ceremonial offerings, which lasted for as long as the golden flowers were in bloom. Then the procession moved on from there. At every length of the ceremonial carriage, as it proceeded along, the procession halted to hold festivities and to make offerings, which lasted for seven days. The procession thus moved on at leisurely pace so that it lasted seven years, seven months and seven days to get to Rājagaha.

Believers in wrong views raised an outcry that King Ajātasattu held funeral ceremonies on the passing away of ascetic Gotama against the wishes of the people and that these festivities caused neglect of work by the people who had to suffer hardships. In denouncing thus the 86,000 holders of wrong views were motivated by malevolent thoughts about the Three Treasures, as a result of which, they were reborn in the four lower worlds.

The Arahats then reviewed the situation. The prolonged festivities over the carriage of the relics was causing transgressions against the Three Treasures amongst the people, which was indeed undesirable. So they thought of seeking the co-operation of the Devas to speed up the King's procession to Rājagaha. They requested Sakka, the Lord of the Devas: "Sakka, think of some way to speed up the carriage of the relics to Rājagaha."

Sakka replied: "Venerable sir, there is no worldling who is as devoted to the Three Treasures as King Ajātasattu. He will not take my advice. But I can use other means. One possible way is to assume myself a terrifying appearance as Māra is wont to do, to cause terrible sounds to possess people, to cause people to sneeze, to cause people to lose appetite, which are also [1098] Māra's pet devices. When I use these means, the venerable ones should say to King Ajātasattu: "King, the prolonged festivities over the carriage of the relics has angered the Devas. Speed up the procession to Rājagaha." On your advice only would King Ajātasattu speed up his procession." Sakka did his part as suggested, causing terror among the people.

The Arahats then went to King Ajātasattu and said: "Great King, the prolonged festivities over the carriage of the relics has angered the Devas. Speed up the procession to Rājagaha.” King Ajātasattu replied: “Venerable sirs, I cannot fully satisfy myself in honouring the relics yet. However, I will follow your advice.” And so he ordered his men to speed up the carriage of the relics to Rājagaha. This order was given on the day when seven years and seven months had elapsed on the way to Rājagaha. Now in the next seven days the procession reached its destination.

King Ajātasattu erected a shrine in Rājagaha in honour of the relics which had arrived. Other kings and Brahmins who received their share of the relics or the measuring basket or charred firewood also put up shrines in honour of the relics, according to their means, in their own cities. These facts are recorded under the title: “The Honouring of the Relics by Raising Shrines,” which states: “King Ajātasattu of Magadha raised a shrine in Rājagaha in honour of the relics of the Buddha,” which was recited at the Second and Third Councils.

A Secret Relic Depository

[The following account is based on Thūpavaṃsa, chapter 5.]

After the various kings and Brahmins had erected their respective shrines at their own places where the Buddha-relics were enshrined, Ven. Mahā Kassapa by his special power of seeing into the future, saw:

1. That these shrines were liable to be pilfered by holders of wrong views.
2. That if a secret depository were to be built these relics would be discovered by King Asoka who should cause the spread of the relics over the whole of Jambudīpa to the benefit of Devas and humans.

So he went to King Ajātasattu and said solemnly: “Great King, it would be highly advisable that a secret depository be built to safeguard the relics.”

“Very well, venerable sir,” said King Ajātasattu, “leave the matter of building a secret depository to me, but how should the relics in other places be collected?”

“Great King, the collection of the relics that are with the other kings and Brahmins will be our responsibility, not yours.”

“Very well, venerable sir, let the venerable ones collect the relics. I shall build the depository.”

Having reached this understanding, Ven. Mahā Kassapa went around to the recipients of the relics, and explained to them his vision; and was able to collect the relics, leaving only an appropriate quantity of them for private homage at the various homes of the recipients. All the relics collected were brought to Rājagaha.

The relics at Rāma village were an exception. There, the Nāgas were guarding the relics and they were therefore secure against pilferers. Ven. Mahā Kassapa foresaw that, at a later time the relics of Rāma village would be enshrined when the Mahā Cetiya was erected at the Mahā Vihāra monastery in the island of Śrī Lankā, so relics from that place were not among the relics collected and brought to Rājagaha. There, at a site to the north east of the city, Ven. Mahā Kassapa made a solemn wish: “May the ground at this site be flawless and clean. If there be any rocks let them disappear now. Let no water arise here.”

King Ajātasattu then ordered earth digging work at that site. The earth dug up there was made into bricks. Then he built 80 shrines in honour of the 80 senior disciples. When asked what the project was. The king replied that it was the building project of shrines in honour of the 80 senior disciples. Nobody was allowed to know that the Buddha-relics were underneath. [1099]

The Enshrining of the Relics in Caskets

At the depth of 80 cubits, a copper platform was laid out, over which a copper chamber the size of a standard shrine was built. Then a series of eight sets of containers of various sizes beginning from golden sandalwood caskets and eight sets of shrines of golden sandalwood were made ready, each to be encased in another by turn in the following order: The relics of the Buddha were first put into a casket made of golden sandalwood. Then this was encased in a second casket of the same material. Then this was encased in a third casket of the same material. In this manner, eight caskets of golden sandalwood encased in one another in turn formed one casket of eight layers of golden sandalwood.

This eight-layered casket of golden sandalwood was enshrined in the series of eight shrines made of golden sandalwood, each shrine being encased in another in turn so that a shrine of eight layers of golden sandalwood was formed.

Likewise, this shrine of golden sandalwood was encased in a series of eight ivory caskets which formed one casket of eight layers of ivory caskets. This eight-layered ivory casket was enshrined in a series of eight ivory shrines, each being encased in another in turn, so that a shrine of eight layers of ivory shrines was formed.

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1647

Likewise, this ivory shrine was encased in a series of eight caskets wrought with the seven gems, which formed one casket of eight layers of the caskets of seven gems. This eight-layered casket of the seven gems was enshrined in a series of eight shrines wrought with the seven gems, each being encased in another in turn so that a shrine of eight layers of shrines of the seven gems was formed.

Likewise, this shrine of the seven gems was encased in a series of eight silver caskets which formed one casket of eight layers of silver caskets. This eight-layered silver casket was enshrined in a series of eight silver shrines, each being encased in another in turn so that a shrine of eight layers of silver shrines was formed.

Likewise, this silver shrine was encased in a series of eight emerald caskets which formed one casket of eight layers of emerald caskets. This eight-layered emerald casket was enshrined in a series of eight emerald shrines, each being encased in another in turn so that a shrine of eight layers of emerald shrines was formed.

Likewise, this emerald shrine was encased in a series of ruby caskets which formed one casket of eight layers of ruby caskets. This eight layered ruby casket was enshrined in a series of eight ruby shrines, each being encased in another in turn so that a shrine of eight layers of ruby shrines was formed.

Likewise, this ruby shrine was encased in a series of cat's-eye caskets which formed one casket of eight layers of cat's-eye caskets. This eight layered cat's-eye casket was enshrined in a series of eight cat's-eye shrines, each being encased in another in turn so that a shrine of eight layers of cat's-eye shrines was formed.

Likewise, this cat's-eye shrine was encased in a series of glass caskets which formed one casket of eight layers of glass caskets. This eight layered glass casket was enshrined in a series of eight glass shrines, each being encased in another in turn so that a shrine of eight layers of glass shrines was formed.

Thus systematically encased in turn, the outermost glass shrine had the size of the Thūpārāma in Sri Laṅkā. The glass shrine was placed in a shrine set with the seven gems. This again was sheltered inside in a golden shrine, which was again sheltered inside a silver shrine, and finally sheltered inside a copper shrine. Inside the copper shrine, seven jewels were strewn about as sand flooring above which thousand of flowers grown on land were scattered. Golden statuettes depicting the 550 Birth Stories (Jātaka), the 80 senior disciples, King Suddhodana, father of Buddha Gotama, Queen Māyā Devī, mother of Buddha Gotama, the seven remarkable conatals that were born or appeared at the birth of Bodhisatta, etc. were placed there. Five hundred golden pots and 500 silvers pots filled with water, 500 golden streamers, 500 golden lamps, 500 silver lamps fitted with wicks of white cloth filled with scented [1100] oil, were also set up inside.

Then Ven. Mahā Kassapa made a solemn wish: “May the flowers remain fresh, may the scents retain their fragrance, may the lighted lamps remain aglow.” On a golden sheet, he had the following inscription etched out and scaled: “At some future date a prince named Piyadassi will be enthroned as a righteous king by the name of Asoka. That King Asoka will spread these relics through the southern island continent of Jambudīpa.”

After having carried out all forms of doing honour to the relics, King Ajātasattu closed all entrances to the inner shrine wrought with the seven jewels; the same was done to the golden shrine and the silver shrine that successively housed the inner shrine. He locked up the outermost shrine made of copper.

Against the steel padlock he placed a big piece of ruby accompanied by an inscription that read: “Let some needy king of some future date utilise this ruby to meet the expenses of doing honour to the relics.”

Then Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, said to Vissakamma: “My good Vissakamma, King Ajātasattu had done his best for the security and preservation of the relics. You now see to the security of the depository.”

Vissakamma went to the relic depository and set up a complex mechanism which emitted searing heat and which presented an awful sight with interconnected moving parts. The moving parts were made of steel blades shining like glass, which turned at the speed of whirlwinds, and which were held by wooden statues of demons which guarded it on all sides. All these complex rotating blades had only a single key-switch. Having thus made the relic depository secure, Vissakamma returned to his celestial abode.

King Ajātasattu further put up stone walls around the depository as was usually erected in the construction of a masonry monastery. Atop the walls, he covered the whole area with a rock platform which was covered up with earth. The earth was made into an even surface upon which a stone shrine was erected.

The First Council

[This section has been moved here from the story about Ven. Ānanda. It is based on the Council of the Five Hundred (Pañca-satikakkhandhaka, Vin Kandh 21), and its commentary.]

Ven. Mahā Kassapa remembered the special recognition shown by the Buddha to him. “The Fortunate One exchanged his double robe with me. He declared to the monastics: ‘Monastics, in abiding in the first absorption (jhāna), Kassapa is my equal; and so on,’ thus extolling my power of absorption (jhāna) attainments with reference to the successively higher absorptions, which embraced the nine absorption attainments that require abiding at each of the progressive levels, as well as the five supernormal powers.

Again, the Fortunate One remained in mid-air, and waving his hand, declared, that: ‘In the matter of detachment to the four types of followers, Kassapa is unequalled,’ and that: ‘In the attitude of equanimity, Kassapa conducts himself like the moon.’ These words of praise are truly unparalleled. I must live up to these attributes in no other way but by undertaking to convene a Saṅgha Council for reciting the Dhamma and the Discipline for their preservation.

Inasmuch as a king appoints his eldest son heir-apparent, conferring all his own regal paraphernalia and authority on the son with a view to perpetuating his sovereignty, so also the Fortunate One had indeed praised me so lavishly, in such extraordinary ways, seeing that I, Kassapa, would be able to perpetuate his teaching.”

After pondering deeply thus, Ven. Mahā Kassapa related to the monastic congregation the sacrilegious words of Subhadda, the old monastic and made this proposal: “Now, friends, before immorality has gained ground and becomes an obstruction to the Dhamma, before infamy has gained ground and becomes an obstruction to the Discipline, before upholders of immorality have gained strength, before upholders of the good doctrine have become weak, before upholders of infamy have gained strength, and before upholders of the Discipline have become weak, let us recite in unison the Doctrine and the Discipline and preserve them.”

On hearing his animated appeal, the congregation said to him: “Ven. Kassapa, may the venerable one select the monastics to carry out the reciting of the Doctrine and the Discipline.” Ven. Mahā Kassapa then selected 499 Arahats

[1318] who had memorized the Dhamma-Vinaya, and most of whom were also endowed with the fourfold analytical knowledge, the three knowledges (vijjā), and the six supernormal powers, and were designated as the foremost monastic disciples by the Buddha.

In this connection, the selection of 499 monastics indicates that one seat was reserved by Ven. Mahā Kassapa for Ven. Ānanda. The reason is that, at that moment, Ven. Ānanda had not become an Arahāt, and was still training himself to become an Arahāt. Without Ven. Ānanda, it would not be possible to hold the Council because he had heard all the discourses of the Buddha which comprise the five sections (nikāya), the nine parts (aṅga) or, the doctrines numbering a total of 84,000.

Why, then, should Ven. Ānanda be put on the list of the reciters by Ven. Mahā Kassapa? The reason was that Ven. Mahā Kassapa wanted to avoid criticism that he was partial to Ven. Ānanda because there were other Arahats endowed with the fourfold analytical knowledge like Ven. Ānanda while Ven. Ānanda was still in training (sekkha) to become an Arahāt.

This criticism was probable, considering the fact that Ven. Mahā Kassapa and Ven. Ānanda were very intimate. The former would address the latter in such intimate terms as: “This young lad,” even when the latter was about 80 years old with gray hair.<sup>251</sup> Further, Ven. Ānanda was a Sakyan Prince and a first cousin of the Buddha. For that reason, Ven. Mahā Kassapa, although knowing full well that Ven. Ānanda was indispensable to the project of the recitations, awaited the general consent of the congregation in selecting him.

When Ven. Mahā Kassapa informed the congregation about his having chosen 499 Arahats for the purpose, the congregation unanimously proposed Ven. Ānanda to be selected for the Council in spite of his still being a trainee (sekkha).

They said: “Ven. Mahā Kassapa, although Ven. Ānanda is still a trainee, he is not one who is likely to be misled into wrong judgment on any of the four unjust ways. Moreover, he is the monastic with the greatest learning imparted by the Buddha both on the Doctrine and the Discipline.” Then Ven. Mahā Kassapa put Ven. Ānanda on the list of the reciters. Thus there were 500 reciters selected with the approval of the congregation.

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1651

Then the venue for the holding of the recitals was considered by the congregation. They chose Rājagaha because it was a big city, big enough to provide daily alms food to the big gathering of monastics, and because it had many big monasteries where the monastics could stay. They also thought about the need to disallow other monastics outside of the Council to spend the Rains Retreat (Vassa) in Rājagaha, where the Council members would reside during that period.

The reason for disallowing non-participating monastics was because as the proceedings of the Council was to be conducted every day for a number of days, unless non-participating monastics were officially disallowed from residence during the Rains Retreat (Vassa), dissenters might interfere in the proceedings.

Then Ven. Mahā Kassapa by making his formal proposal as an act-in-congregation, and getting the formal approval of the congregation, passed the Saṅgha resolution in the following terms:

*Suṇātu me, āvuso Saṅgho, yadi Saṅghassa patta-kallaṃ, Saṅgho imāni pañca bhikkhu-satāni sammaneyya Rājagahe vassam vasantāni, Dhammāñ-ca Vinayañ-ca saṅgāyituṃ, na aññehi bhikkhūhi Rājagahe vassam vasitabban-ti.
Esā ñatti.*

The gist of this is: 1) Only 500 monastics, who were to recite the Doctrine and the Discipline, were to stay in Rājagaha during the Rains Retreat; and 2) that no other monastics were to stay in Rājagaha during the same period.

The above legal act of the Saṅgha-in-council took place 21 days after [1319] the passing away of the Buddha. After the act was performed, Ven. Mahā Kassapa made a proclamation to all the members of the congregation: “Friends, I allow you 40 days to enable you to attend to any of your personal obligations. After these 40 days, on no account will any excuses be accepted for failure to attend to the task of the recitation, whether for sickness, business concerning the preceptor, or parents or monastic requisites, such as alms bowls or robes. Every one of you is expected to be ready to begin the proceedings at the end of 40 days.”

After giving these strict instructions to the Saṅgha, Ven. Mahā Kassapa, accompanied by 500 monastic pupils, went to Rājagaha. The other members of the Council also went to various places, accompanied by their monastic disciples, to assuage the sorrow of the people by means of discourses on the good doctrine. Ven. Puṇṇa and his 700 monastic pupils remained at Kusinagara giving solace with their discourses to the devotees who mourned the demise of the Buddha.

Ven. Ānanda carried, as usual, the alms bowl and robes of the Buddha, and went to Sāvathī accompanied by 500 monastic disciples. His following of monastics increased day by day. Wherever he went, devotees lamented and wailed.

When, going by stages, Ven. Ānanda reached Sāvathī, and news of his arrival spread through the city and people came out with flowers and perfumes to welcome him. They wailed, saying: “Ven. Ānanda, you used to come in the Buddha’s company, but where have you left the Buddha now and come alone?” The people’s lamentation in seeing Ven. Ānanda alone was as pitiable as the day of the Buddha’s passing away.

Ven. Ānanda solaced them with discourses on the impermanence, suffering and non-self of conditioned existence. Then he entered the Jetavana monastery, paid homage before the Buddha’s Perfumed Chamber, opened the door, took out the cot and the seat, cleaned them, swept the precincts of the Chamber, and removed the withered flowers. Then he replaced the cot and the seat and performed the routine acts at the Buddha’s residence, as in the days when the Buddha was living.

Whenever he carried out these routine tasks, he would say, weeping: “Fortunate One, is this not the time for your taking a bath?” “Is this not the time for your delivering a discourse?” “Is this not the time to give admonition to monastics?” “Is this not the time to lie on the right side in all the Buddha’s grace like a lion?” “Is this not the time to wash your face?” He could not help weeping in the hourly routine activities in the usual service of the Buddha because, knowing well the benefits of the pacifying quality of the Fortunate One, he had a deep love for the Buddha, out of devotion as well as out of affection. He had not purged all the pollutants; he had a soft heart towards the Buddha owing to the mutual deeds of kindness that had taken place between him and the Buddha over millions of former existences.

Advice Given by a Forest-Deity

While he himself was suffering intense grief and lamentation over the loss of the Buddha, Ven. Ānanda was also giving much time to offering solace to the devotees who went to see him in sorrow on account of the Buddha's passing away. As he was then staying at a forest in the kingdom of Kosala, the guardian spirit of the forest felt sorry for him; and to remind him of the need to check his sorrow, the spirit sang the following verse to him (SN 9.5):

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1653

*Rukkha-mūla-gahanam pasakkiya,
Nibbānam hadayasmiṃ opiya.
Jhāya Gotama mā pamādo, kiṃ te biḷi-biḷikā karissati. [1320]*

Venerable one of the Gotama clan, resort to seclusion at the foot of a tree, immerse your mind in Nibbāna<sup>252</sup> and abide in the absorption (jhāna) characterized by concentration on the object of meditation, and on its characteristics of impermanence, suffering, non-self. What good is there in your tittle-tattling with your visitors in your effort to solace them?

That admonition caused urgency (samvega) in Ven. Ānanda. Since the passing away of the Buddha, he had been standing and sitting too much so that he was feeling out of sorts, and to get relief, he took a laxative prepared from milk on the next day, and did not go out of the monastery.

On that day, Subha, son of the deceased Todeyya the Brahmin, went to invite Ven. Ānanda to an offering of a meal. Ven. Ānanda said to the youth that he could not accept the invitation that day because he had taken a laxative made from milk, but that he might be able to do so the next day. On the next day, Ven. Ānanda went to Subha's residence where he was asked a question about the doctrine. Ven. Ānanda's discourse, in reply to that question, can be found in the Discourse to Subha (Subha-sutta, DN 10).

Then Ven. Ānanda supervised the repairs to the Jetavana monastery. When the Rains Retreat (Vassa) was approaching, he left his monastic pupils at the monastery and went to Rājagaha. Other members who were selected for the Council to recite the Doctrine and Discipline also went to Rājagaha, at about the same time. All these members performed the Observance Day (Uposatha) on the full moon of July (Āsāḷha) and on the first waning day of the month they vowed to remain in Rājagaha for the three-month Rains Retreat (Vassa).

Rājagaha had eighteen monasteries around the city at that time. As they had been unoccupied for some period, the buildings and the precincts were in a state of despair and neglect. On the occasion of the Buddha's passing away, all the monastics had left Rājagaha for Kusinārā and the monasteries remained unused and untended so that the buildings became mouldy and dusty, while there were broken panes and gaping walls.

The monastics held a meeting and decided that, as according to the Vinaya laid down by the Buddha on living places, the monastic buildings and compound should be repaired and maintained to proper condition. So they assigned the first month of the Rains Retreat (Vassa) period to the repairing and maintenance of the monasteries, and the middle month to the recitals. They attended to the repair work to honour the Buddha's instructions found in the Discipline and also to avoid criticism by the religious sects outside the Buddha's teaching, who would say: "The disciples of ascetic Gotama took care of the monasteries only when their teacher was living, but when he is dead and gone, they neglect them and let the valuable assets donated by their followers go to waste."

After coming to the decision, the monastics went to King Ajātasattu's palace. They were paid homage to by the king who asked them the purpose of their visit. They told him that they needed men to carry out repair work to the eighteen monasteries. The king provided men to repair the monasteries under the supervision of the monastics. In the first month the job was completed. The monastics then went to King Ajātasattu and said: "Great King, the repair work at the monasteries is completed. Now we shall convene the Council by reciting the Doctrine and the Discipline in unison." The king said: "Venerable sirs, carry out your task freely. Let there be the joint operation of our regal authority with your doctrinal authority. Mention your needs and I will see to them." The monastics said: "We need an Assembly Hall for the Saṅgha to carry out the task." The king asked them the place of their choice, and they mentioned the mountain-side on Mount Vebhāra where the great Sattapaṇṇi tree stood.

A Grand Pavilion Donated by King Ajātasattu

"Very well, venerable sirs," said King Ajātasattu and he built a grand pavilion for the Council, as splendid as one that might have been created by Vissakamma, the Deva architect. It had compartments for the efficient working of the Council, each with stairways and [1321] approaches, all the walls, pillars and balustrades beautifully painted with artistic designs. The whole pavilion would seem to outshine the royal palace and its gorgeousness, would seem to put a Deva mansion to ridicule. It presented itself as a magnificent mansion which attracted the eyes of its beholders, Devas and humans alike, as a pleasant river bank attracts all sorts of birds. In fact, it gave the impression of an object of delight which was the sum total of all delightful things put up together.

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1655

The Council Hall had a canopy laid with gems. Clusters of flowers of various sizes, shapes and hues hung from it. The flooring was inlaid with jewels which looked like a huge platform of solid ruby. On it were floral festoons of variegated hues forming a wondrous carpet as would decorate a Brahma's mansion. The 500 seats for the 500 monastic-reciters were made of priceless material, yet suitable for monastic use. The throne, or the raised dais, for the elder in charge of posing questions, had its back leaning on the southern wall, facing north. In the middle, stood the throne or raised dais of the elder in charge of answering the question, facing east, which was suitable for use by the Buddha. On it was placed a ceremonial circular fan, made of ivory. Having made all these detailed arrangements, the king informed the Saṅgha that all was ready.

It was the fourth waning day in the month of August (Sāvāṇa). On that day, some of the monastics went about saying amongst themselves: “In this gathering of monastics, one can still stand with defilements,” which was plainly an allusion to Ven. Ānanda. When these words of ridicule reached Ven. Ānanda's ear, he knew that no one else but himself was going about spreading the stink of defilements. He felt spiritual urgency (saṃvega) from those words. There were other monastics who said to him: “Friend Ānanda, the Council will begin tomorrow. You still have to gain the higher stages of the path. It would not be proper for you to participate in the proceedings as a noble one who is still training (sekkha) himself for becoming an Arahat. We would like you to be mindful in striving for becoming an Arahat in this time.”

Becoming an Arahat Outside of the Four Postures

Then Ven. Ānanda thought to himself: “Tomorrow, the Council begins. It would not be proper for me to participate in the proceedings as a mere Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna).” He meditated on the body the whole night. Early in the morning, he thought of getting some sleep. Going into the monastery, he mindfully reclined on the cot. As his two feet lifted off the ground and his head was not yet touching the pillow, he became an Arahāt in a split second, outside of any of the four bodily postures.

To explain this further: Ven. Ānanda had been meditating while walking up and down along the walk outside the monastery. Despite this, the paths and fruitions at the three higher levels was still not attained. Then he remembered the Buddha's words when the latter was about to pass away: "Ānanda, you have done many meritorious actions. Meditate diligently. You will soon become an Arahāt." He knew that the Buddha's word never went amiss.

He reviewed his meditation effort: "I have been overzealous; this makes my mind distracted. I must strike a balance between energy and concentration." Reflecting thus, he washed his feet and entering his meditation cell, he thought of taking a short rest. With mindfulness, he reclined on the cot. As his two feet lifted off the ground and his head had not touched the pillow, during that fleeting moment he became an Arahāt, purified of all the pollutants.

Therefore, if someone were to pose a question: "Which monastic in this teaching gained Awakening while outside of the four bodily postures?" the answer is "Ven. Ānanda."

It was on the fifth waning day, in the month of August (Sāvāṇa), the day after Ven. Ānanda had become an Arahāt, after finishing their meal, the reciters selected for the Council kept their alms bowls and other requisites and congregated at the great pavilion to begin the recitation.

By the custom of the Indian subcontinent, the period from the full moon day of the month in July (Āsāḷha) to the full moon day of the month in August (Sāvāṇa) is reckoned as one month. During that period of one month, the Saṅgha had [1322] attended to the repairing and maintenance of the monasteries. On the first day of the waning moon in August, they requested King Ajātasattu to build a pavilion. The construction took three days. On the fourth day, Ven. Ānanda became an Arahāt. On the fifth day, the proceedings of the Council commenced.

Ven. Ānanda Becomes an Arahāt

He entered the pavilion when everybody was present. Donning his upper robe in the manner prescribed for monastics when appearing before a meeting or for going into the village, he stepped into the hall with a beaming face which looked as fresh as a toddy palm fruit just plucked, or a ruby placed on a white piece of velvet, or a full moon in a clear sky, or a lotus blooming forth on being radiated with dawn's sunshine. It seemed to radiate with the inner purity of the Arahat. Its splendour proclaimed the Arahat fruition of the possessor.

In this connection, it might be asked: "Why did Ānanda enter the hall as if proclaiming his being an Arahat?" Ven. Ānanda reflected: "An Arahat does not declare his attainment of the Arahat fruition in words but he may let the fact known to others, and this is extolled by the Buddha." He knew that the Council was prepared to let him participate in the proceedings because of his vast knowledge, even though he was still a trainee (sekkha). And now that he had become an Arahat, those other monastics would be very happy to know about it. Further, he wanted to demonstrate to everyone that the Buddha's last words: "Work with diligence, towards the attainment of your set task," had proved most beneficial.

On seeing Ven. Ānanda, Ven. Mahā Kassapa thought: "Ven. Ānanda looks glorious as an Arahat. If the Fortunate One were living, he would surely laud Ven. Ānanda today. Now I must say words of praise on behalf of the Fortunate One." And he said: "Friend Ānanda, glorious it is indeed that you have become an Arahat." He said these congratulatory words thrice aloud.

Proceedings of the Council

With the arrival of Ven. Ānanda, the Council was complete with the 500 selected reciters. Ven. Mahā Kassapa asked the Council where to begin their recitals, whether the doctrine including the Discourses and the Abhidhamma should be recited first, or whether the Discipline (Vinaya), should be recited first. The Saṅgha unanimously proposed: "Ven. Mahā Kassapa, the Vinaya is the lifeblood of the Buddha's teaching. For, if the Vinaya lasts long, the Buddha's teaching will last long. Therefore let us begin our recitals with the recital of the Vinaya." Ven. Mahā Kassapa then asked: "Whom shall we make the leading monastic in reciting the Vinaya?" – "We will make Ven. Upāli the leading monastic." – "Would Ven. Ānanda be incapable of it?" – "Ven. Ānanda would be quite capable of it. However, when the Fortunate One was living he had declared Ven. Upāli as the foremost among the male monastic disciples who have mastered the Vinaya. Therefore, we should make Ven. Upāli, after getting his consent, the leading monastic in reciting the Vinaya."

Ven. Mahā Kassapa was the presiding monastic at the First Council. He also took the responsibility for the questioning. Ven. Upāli took the responsibility of answering the questions on the Vinaya. Both took the special seats made for them and conducted the proceedings. Each section of the Discipline was put as a question consisting of the subject, the background story, the person that was the cause of the Buddha's prescribing the rule, the original rule, the amendment thereto if any, whether a breach of that rule amounts to an offence or not; and each question was answered fully under those headings. The Council then put them on record by reciting in unison, clothing the subject-matter with such formal expressions as: "At that time," "It was then that," "Then," "When it was said," etc. to give cohesion to the matter. The recitals were made in unison: "At that time the Fortunate One was staying at Verañjā, etc."

This reciting of the words of the Buddha by the Saṅgha in a special assembly is called the holding of a Council, or literally, Chanting Together (Saṅgāyaṇa).

When the reciting of the First Expulsion (Pārājika) rule was completed, the great earth trembled [1323] vehemently down to the sheet of water that supports it as if applauding the noble historic event.

The three remaining Expulsion rules were recited in the same manner, as also were the rest of the 227 rules, each framed as a question and followed by its answer. The whole of the text, which contains the Rules on Expulsion (Pārājika), Requiring a Meeting of the Saṅgha (Saṅghādisesa), the Undecided Rules (Aniyata), and the Confession Rules involving Forfeiture (Nissaggiya-pācittiya), all of these together was entitled the Section on Expulsion (Pārājika-kaṇḍa); and together with the Simple Confession Rules (Suddha-pācittiyā), the Acknowledgment Rules (Pāṭidesanīyā), the Training Rules (Sekhiya) and the Settling of Legal Issues (Adhikaraṇa-samathā) became known as the Analysis of the Monks' Rules (Bhikkhu-vibhaṅga), and is popularly referred to as the Great Analysis (Mahā-vibhaṅga). It was prescribed as the official text and has since been taught at the monasteries from generation to generation. At the conclusion of reciting the Great Analysis, the great earth also shook violently as before.

Then followed the 304 rules of the Analysis of the Nuns' Rules (Bhikkhunī-vibhaṅga), containing the same sections, but more Rules, recited in the form of questions and answers as before. This Analysis of the Monks' Rules and the Analysis of the Nuns' Rules together are known as "the Twofold Analysis (Ubhato Vibhaṅga) of 64 recitals (bhāṇavāra), or over half a million syllables in length." This was prescribed as the official text that has since been taught from generation to generation. At the conclusion of reciting the Twofold Analysis the great earth also shook violently as before.

The Council of 500 reciters entrusted the approved version of the Collection of Discipline (Vinaya-piṭaka) to Ven. Upāli with the mandate: “Friend, teach this Collection of Discipline to the disciples who come to you for instruction.” When the reciting of the Collection of Discipline was completed, Ven. Upāli, having done his task, laid down the ceremonial circular ivory fan on the throne of the monastic in charge of answering the questions, descended from it, paid his respect to the elders, and sat in the place marked out for him.

After the reciting of the Vinaya, the Dhamma, which includes the discourses and the Abhidhamma, was to be recited. So Ven. Mahā Kassapa asked the Council of reciters: “Which monastic shall we make the leader in reciting the Dhamma?” The Council unanimously named Ven. Ānanda for the post.

Then Ven. Mahā Kassapa named himself as the Questioner (Pucchaka) and Ven. Ānanda as the Answerer (Vissajjaka). Rising from his seat, rearranging his upper robe, and making his obeisance to the elders, Ven. Ānanda held the ceremonial circular ivory fan and sat on the throne prepared for the purpose. Then the plan of reciting the Dhamma was discussed by Ven. Mahā Kassapa and the participating elders:

Ven. Kassapa: Friends, as there are two divisions of the Dhamma, the Collection of Discourses (Sutta-piṭaka) and the Collection of the Abstract Teaching (Abhidhamma-piṭaka), which shall we take up first?

Elders: Venerable sir, let us start with the Collection of Discourses.

The Vinaya is mainly concerned with higher morality (adhi-sīla); the Dhamma is mainly concerned with higher consciousness, i.e., concentration (adhi-citta); and the Abhidhamma is mainly concerned with higher wisdom (adhi-paññā). Therefore, the Council recited the threefold training of morality, concentration and wisdom in that order, it should be noted.

Ven. Kassapa: Friends, there are four Collections (Nikāya) of the discourses in the Collection of Discourses; which of them shall we take up first?

Elders: Venerable sir, let us start with the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya).

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1660

Ven. Kassapa: Friends, the Collection of Discourses contains 34 discourses (sutta) in three Divisions (Vagga), which Division shall we take up first?

Elders: Venerable sir, we shall start with the Division on the Category of Virtue (Sīlakkhandha-vagga).

Ven. Kassapa: Friends, the Division on the Category of Virtue contains 13 discourses, which discourse shall we take up first?

Elders: Venerable sir, the Discourse on the Supreme Net (Brahma-jāla-sutta, DN 1) portrays the three grades of morality. It is useful for the abandoning of deceitful talk or hypocrisy on the part of monastics which is detrimental to the teaching. It also explains the 62 kinds of wrong views. It had caused 62 times the shaking of the great earth when it was delivered by the Fortunate One. Therefore, let us start with the [1324] Discourse on the Supreme Net.

Having thus agreed upon the plan of verification, Ven. Mahā Kassapa posed appropriate questions on the Discourse on the Supreme Net to Ven. Ānanda regarding the background story, the persons connected with the discourse, the subject matter, etc. Ven. Ānanda answered every question completely, at the end of which the 500 reciters recited in unison the Discourse on the Supreme Net (Brahma-jāla-sutta). When the reciting of the discourse was completed, the great earth quaked violently as before.

Then followed the questioning and answering about the recital of the twelve other discourses in the Division on the Category of Virtue, which was recognized as the title of the Division and prescribed as part of the course of studies of the collections in respect of the discourses.

Then the Great Division (Mahā-vagga), which consisted of ten discourses, was next and followed by the Division beginning with the discourse about Pāthika, a naked ascetic (Pāthika-vagga), which consisted of eleven discourses, each with the questioning and answering. Hence the 34 discourses in three Divisions (Vagga), whose recitals (bhāṇavāra) numbered 24, were recorded as the Buddha's words under the title of the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīghanikāya). This approved version of the text was then entrusted to Ven. Ānanda with the following instruction from the elders: "Friend Ānanda, teach this Collection of the Long Discourses to the pupils who come to you for instruction."

After that the Council approved the Collection of Middle Length Discourses (Majjhima-nikāya), after the usual questioning and answering, which took 80 recitals (bhāṇavāra, or 640,000 syllables) in all. Then they entrusted the approved version of the text to the pupils of Ven. Sāriputta, saying: “Friends, preserve this Collection of Middle Length Discourses well.”

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1661

Then the Council approved the Collection of Thematic Discourses (Saṃyutta-nikāya), after the usual questioning and answering, which took 100 recitals (800,000 syllables). They then entrusted the approved version of the text to Ven. Mahā Kassapa, saying: “Venerable sir, teach this Collection of Thematic Discourses, the sayings of the Fortunate One, to the pupils who come to you for instruction.”

Then the Council approved the Collection of Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya), after the usual questioning and answering, which took 120 recitals (960,000 syllables). Then they entrusted the approved version of the text to Ven. Anuruddha, saying: “Venerable sir, teach this Collection of Numerical Discourses to the pupils who come to you for instruction.”

Then the Council approved the seven books of the Abhidhamma: the Enumeration of Phenomena (Dhamma-saṅgaṇī), the Analyses (Vibhaṅga), the Discussion about Elements (Dhātu-kathā), the Designation of Persons (Puggala-paññatti), the Debates (Kathā-vatthu), the Pairs (Yamaka) and the Causal Relations (Paṭṭhāna), with the usual questionings, answerings and recitals. At the end of the recital of these Abhidhamma texts the great earth quaked violently as before.

Then the Council recited: the Birth Stories (Jātaka), the Expositions (Niddesa), The Path of the Analytic Knowledges (Paṭisambhidā-magga), the Traditions (Apadāna), the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta), the Supplementary Readings (Khuddaka-pāṭha), the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada), the Exalted Utterances (Udāna), the This-Saids (Iti-vuttaka), the Stories about Heavenly Mansions (Vimāna-vatthu), the Stories about Petas (Peta-vatthu), the Verses of the Elder Monks (Thera-gāthā), and the Verses of the Elder Nuns (Therī-gāthā), after the usual questioning and answering. These thirteen books collectively were called the Collection of the Supplementary Texts (Khuddaka-nikāya).

According to the elders who had memorized the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya), it was said: “The Collection of the Supplementary Texts (Khuddaka-nikāya) was recited and approved along with the Abhidhamma.” But according to the elders who had memorized the Collection of Middle Length Discourses (Majjhima-nikāya), these 13 books, together with the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) and the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka), making 15 books altogether, were named as the Collection of the Supplementary Texts (Khuddaka-nikāya) and are classified in the Collection of Discourses.

These statements are based on the introduction to the commentary on the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya). A bhāṇavāra or a “recital” is the length of time it took to recite a piece of the text, which by our modern clock time, would be about half an hour. [A bhāṇavāra is calculated as being the same as 250 Siloka verses in length. As a Siloka is normally considered to have 4 lines of 8 syllables each that would give 32 syllables to the verse. A bhāṇavāra therefore is 250 x 32 syllables long, which is equal to 8,000 syllables in length.] The naming of the principal elders: Ven. Mahā Kassapa, Ven. Upāli and Ven. Ānanda, in their respective offices, are on record in the Discipline (Vin Cv 11).

Thus Ven. Ānanda was a principal monastic in the First Council, in answering most competently all the questions concerning the Dhamma which comprised the Basket of Discourses (Dhamma-piṭaka) and the Basket of the Abstract Teaching (Abhidhamma-piṭaka). [1325]

King Asoka’s Shrines

After making the elaborate arrangements for the relic depository and the Council, Ven. Mahā Kassapa, living to the end of the span of life destined for him, passed away. King Ajātasattu also was dead and gone to his next existence according to his deeds, good and bad. People of those times also are dead and gone. Alas! All conditioned phenomena of mind and matter are of such an impermanent nature, such an unstable nature, such a suffering nature.

[The following account is based on Thūpavaṃsa, chapter 6.]

After more than 200 years from the year of the passing away of the Buddha, a prince named Piyadassi was enthroned as King Asoka. He excavated the relics of the Buddha which was kept in the depository by Ven. Mahā Kassapa and erected many relic shrines (stūpa) all over Jambudīpa.

This story is related here: King Asoka became a great devotee of the Buddha through the help and assistance of the novice Nigrodha. His remarkable devotion to the Buddha and his teaching found expression in 84,000 monasteries.

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1663

After building them he said to the Saṅgha: “Venerable sir, I have built 84,000 monasteries, but where can I find the relics?” The venerable ones said: “Great King, we have heard about a relic depository built by Ven. Mahā Kassapa and King Ajātasattu. But we do not know its exact location.”

King Asoka first searched for the relics in Rājagaha. In the hope of finding the relics, he pulled down the original shrine built by King Ajātasattu but failed to find anything there. He restored the shrine to its original condition. Then he organized a company of four types of assembly, namely male and female monastics, male and female lay disciples, and went to Vesālī.

In Vesālī, he searched for the relics inside the original shrine built by the Licchavī princes after pulling it down but found none. He restored the shrine to its original condition and searched for the relics inside the shrine built in Kapilavatthu. He failed again there and proceeded to Rāma village. [1101]

The Nāgas who had taken custody of the relics in Rāma village did not allow the shrine to be pulled down. All the implements that were used in the operation were broken up into pieces.

After the unsuccessful attempt at Rāma village, King Asoka went to other places where the relics were known to have been enshrined. He went to the Allakappa province, Veṭṭhadīpa province, Pāvā, Kusinārā, one by one, he pulled down the shrines at each place but finding no relics in any of them, he restored all those shrines into their original condition and so went back to Rājagaha again. Back in Rājagaha, King Asoka held a meeting with the four assemblies and asked: “Is there anyone who has heard where King Ajātasattu had deposited the relics?”

An elderly monastic said: “Great King, the exact location of the depository is not known. But I remember how my father, an elderly monastic, said to me: ‘Come novice, in such and such an overgrowth of thickets there lies a stone shrine. Let us go and pay our homage there! We made offerings of flowers there.’ My father then told me: ‘Novice, remember this place well,’ this all I know about it.”

According to the sub-commentary, some teachers said that as there were no monastics present at the assembly who are possessed of psychic powers through absorption (jhāna) they had to take note of what the elderly monastic said. According to other teachers, however, there were monastics possessed of psychic powers at that meeting but these monastics were unwilling to win fame and acclaim by revealing what they knew by their special apperception, and they thought that just by taking the slim clue from what the elderly monastic said, the king would be able to trace the treasure.

King Asoka Discovered the Sacred Relic Chamber

King Asoka was able to locate the spot. “This must be the place where King Ajātasattu deposited the relics,” he decided and ordered the excavations. Clearing the overgrowth of vegetation, they found the stone shrine, and when the shrine and the earth underneath were removed the rock platform was revealed. Then tearing away the bricks and mortar, the depository came to view. They saw in wonderment the seven jewels spread on the flooring, and the wheeling blades held in the hands of a formidable ring of demon statues.

King Asoka engaged necromancers to try to halt the protective mechanism but they could not solve the mystery of the whirling blades. Then King Asoka invoked the Devas: “I intend to enshrine and honour these relics in the various monasteries numbering 84,000. May the Devas not cause any hindrance to my sincere efforts!”

At that moment Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, was on his round of travels and saw the event. He said to Vissakamma: “My good Vissakamma, King Asoka is now inside the precinct of the relic depository, wishing to get the relics. You now go and remove the protective mechanism.” Then Vissakamma took on the appearance of a young boy with five knots of hair. He went up to King Asoka with a bow in hand and said: “Great King, I shall remove those mechanical demons.” The king gladly said: “Go on, please, son!” Then Vissakamma in the guise of a young boy sent a shaft aimed at the key spot in the mechanical device and all the demon statues fell into pieces.

Then King Asoka inspected the padlock at the entrance and saw the inscription on the gold plate which reads: “Let some needy king of some future date utilise the ruby to meet the expenses of doing honour to the relics.”

King Asoka was displeased with the inscription. “How dare anyone say of me that I am a ‘needy’ king!” he remarked. Then after repeated efforts, he removed the many obstacles placed at the entrance and got inside the relic depository.

He found the lamps lit some 218 years ago still alight. The brown lotuses were as fresh as ever, and so were the bed of flowers strewn about the floor. The perfumes were as fragrant as though freshly prepared.

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1665

King Asoka took hold of the gold plate on which Ven. Mahā Kassapa had inscribed the words: [1102] “At some future date, a prince named Piyadassi will be enthroned as a righteous king by the name of Asoka. That King Asoka will spread these relics throughout Jambudīpa.”

He was exhilarated and cried out: “Friends! Ven. Mahā Kassapa had rightly foreseen me!” And bending his left arm, he slapped it with his right hand thereby producing loud clapping sounds.

King Asoka then removed much of the relics, leaving only an appropriate amount in the depository for local worshippers. He closed all entrances to the depository carefully as previously done, and restored the whole edifice to its original condition. He rebuilt a new stone relic shrine (stūpa) about it. Then he enshrined the relics inside the 84,000 monasteries that he built and donated.

Conclusion of the Chapters on the Buddha

We have come to the end of the chapter on the Buddha. You may have noticed, in going through this chapter, the seven auspicious days connected with the Buddha, namely:

1. The day of his conception.
2. The day of his birth.
3. The day he renounced the world.
4. The day he attained Perfect Awakening.
5. The day he delivered the first discourse.
6. The day he passed away.
7. The day his body was consumed by the element of heat.

These seven dates may be noted thus:

1. The Bodhisatta was conceived on Thursday, the full moon of July (Āsāḷha) in 564 BCE.
2. He was born on Friday, the full moon of May (Vesākha) in 563 BCE.
3. He renounced the world on Monday, on the full moon of July (Āsāḷha) in 534 BCE.

41a: After the Passing of the Buddha – 1666

4. He attained Perfect Awakening on Wednesday, the full moon of May (Vesākha) in 528 BCE.
5. He delivered his first discourse on Saturday, the full moon of July (Āsāḷha) in 528 BCE.
6. He passed away on Tuesday, the full moon of May (Vesākha) in 483 BCE.
7. His body was consumed by the element of heat on Sunday, the twelfth waning day of May (Vesākha) in 483 BCE.

Ledi Sayādaw’s Verses on the Seven Memorable Days

The late Ledi Sayādaw composed the following rhymes on the above seven days for remembering and honouring the Buddha by the devotees:

1. Being implored in union by the Devas and Brahmas of the 10,000 world-element, the Lord of the Three Worlds, the object of my adoration, descended from the Tusita Realm into his royal mother’s womb on Thursday, the full moon of July (Āsāḷha) in 564 BCE, an occasion promising peace for Devas and humans.
2. Ten months after conception, on Friday, the full moon of May (Vesākha), in 563 BCE, the lord was born in the cool shade of the Lumbinī Park when the great earth quaked to honour the ominous event [1103] that laid out the road to the city of Nibbāna for Devas and humans.
3. At the young age of sixteen, being provided with the three princely palaces as seasonable residences he lived in regal splendour for thirteen years. Then at the youthful age of 29, being overcome by spiritual urgency on seeing the four omens conjured up by the Devas, he went forth into the homeless life in the quiet seclusion of the forest. That was on Monday, the full moon of July (Āsāḷha) in 534 BCE.
4. After six years of seclusion in the forest, came the time for the Perfect Awakening. On Wednesday, the full moon of May (Vesākha) in 528 BCE, sitting on the throne of victory, with the Tree of Awakening as a majestic canopy, he vanquished the vexatious hordes of Māra. The 10,000 world-element cheered the arising of the Fortunate One, the great event heralded spiritual security for the denizens of the three worlds.
5. Making his way to the Deer Park at Isipatana, the Buddha expounded the doctrine, the Discourse setting the Dhamma Wheel Turning (Dhamma- cakkappavattana-sutta, SN 56.11), to the Group-of-Five ascetics and to an assemblage of Devas and Brahmas coming from the 10,000 world-element. That was Saturday, the full moon of July (Āsāḷha) in 528 BCE, when the great drum of the Dhamma was first sounded.

6. Then for 45 years the Buddha, with the help of the Dhamma, ferried across to the yonder shore of safety the multitudes of the three worlds belonging to 10,000 world-element. At the ripe old age of 80, in 483 BCE, on Tuesday, the full moon of May (Vesākha), under the twin Sāla trees at Kusinārā in the province of the Mallas, the Buddha realized the ultimate cessation that cast gloom on the 10,000 world-element.

7. The remains of the Buddha, a wondrous golden corpse, burned by itself, thanks to the prior resolution of the Fortunate One, leaving for posterity eight portions of relics. That was a Sunday, on the waxing moon of May (Vesākha) in 483 BCE.

8. Reflecting on the seven memorable days [1104] connected with the Buddha, the Most Fortunate One amongst the exalted, Lord of the Three Worlds, I pay my deepest devotion by deed, word and thought to the great master. For this good deed, may every blessing come showering on me!

41b. Buddha Metteyya

[Mingun Sayādaw did not include a chapter about the coming Buddha Metteyya. To rectify that omission I include this story compiled by Saya U Chit Tin in his book on the Coming Buddha Ariya Metteyya. Saya's retelling has been modified here to fit in with the vocabulary adopted in this work, and most of his notes have been omitted.]

Many [18] details concerning the coming Buddha can be assembled by combining Buddha Gotama's prediction in the Discourse about the Universal Monarch (Cakkavatti-sutta, DN 26), the Lineage in the Future (Anāgata-vaṃsa), the Garland of the Times of the Victor (Jina-kāla-mālī), the Appearance of the Ten Bodhisattas (Dasa-bodhisattuppatti-kathā), the Teaching about the Ten Bodhisattas (Dasa-bodhi-satta-uddesa) and the Book of the Ten Stories (Dasa-vatthupparāṇa). Further details can be added from the description by Buddha Gotama of the past Buddha Vipassī (Mahāpadāna-sutta, DN 14), Ven. Ananda's praise of the Buddha (Acchāriya-abbhuta-sutta, MN 123), and the commentary on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa). These are our sources for what follows.

The Bodhisatta Metteyya

Buddha Gotama [8] predicted as follows in the Prelude to the Lineage in the Future (Anāgata-vaṃsa):

*Uttamo Metteyyo Rāmo, Pasenadi Kosalo ca
Abhibhū Dīghasoni ca, Caṇḍani ca Subho Todeyya-brahmaṇo
Nālāgiri Palaleyyo, Bodhisattā anukkamena Sambodhiṃ labhanti anāgate.*

In the future ten Bodhisattas will attain full awakening in the following order: the most honourable Ariya Metteyya, King Rāma, King Pasenadi of Kosala, the Deva Abhibhu, the Asura Deva Dīghasoni, the Brahman Caṇḍani, the young man Subha, the Brahman Todeyya, the elephant Nālāgiri, and the elephant Palaleyya.

The [11] Great Bodhisattas are confirmed in their aspiration by many Buddhas. A sixteenth-century Pāḷi text from Thailand, the Garland of the Times of the Victor (Jina-kāla-mālī) says that Bodhisatta Metteyya received his prediction of future Buddhahood from Buddha Mahutta. This would then be the first prediction for him. This text also gives details of the period during which the Bodhisatta who became Buddha Gotama made a mental resolve to become a Sammā Sambuddha. This is shown to be his preparation for the life in which he received his first sure prediction. Bodhisatta Metteyya is mentioned as being associated with him in two of these lives: as his leading disciple when he was a religious teacher and as his chaplain named Sirigutta when he was King Atideva.

The story of one occasion when Bodhisatta Metteyya made an aspiration and when the perfection which is strongest for him is illustrated is told in the Pāli texts which were written down after the compilation of the canon. The story of Bodhisatta Metteyya's aspiration was told to the leading disciple Ven. Sāriputta when he was residing near Sāvatti in the Eastern Monastery (Pubbārāma), which was offered by the laywoman Visākhā.

Long ago, Bodhisatta Metteyya was the Universal Monarch Saṅkha in the city of Indapatta in the Kuru country. This large city resembled a city of the Devas. Universal Monarchs reign over the whole earth and have seven great treasures: The wheel, elephant, horse, gem, wife, householder, and adviser. Saṅkha lived in a seven-storey palace made of the seven kinds of gems. This palace rose up out of the earth through the power of his merit. Saṅkha led others to follow the path leading to rebirth in the higher planes of existence, and he administered justice with impartiality.

After Saṅkha became a Universal Monarch, there arose the Buddha Sirimata. Whenever a Bodhisatta is to be born in his last life, there is a Buddha proclamation a thousand years before. Brahmas of the Pure Abodes (Suddhāvāsa) travel throughout the world of men and proclaim: "A thousand years from now, a Buddha will arise in the world." King Saṅkha must have heard of this proclamation, for one day, as he sat on his golden throne under the royal white umbrella, he said: "A long time ago there was a proclamation that a Buddha would be born. I will turn over the place of Universal Monarch to whoever knows of the Three Treasures, to whoever points out to me the gems of the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Saṅgha, as well as the Dispensation. I will go to see the Supreme Buddha." Buddha Sirimata was residing at that time only sixteen leagues from Saṅkha's capital city.

Among the novices in the Saṅgha, there was a boy who came from a poor family. His mother was a slave, so the novice went [12] to the city to seek wealth in order to set his mother free. When the people saw him, they thought he was a

Yakkha so they threw sticks at him. Afraid, he went to the palace and stood before the king. “Who are you, young man?” the king asked.

“I am a novice (sāmaṇera), Great King,” the novice answered.

“Why do you call yourself a novice?”

“Because, Great King, I do no evil, I have established myself in moral conduct, and thus I lead the holy life. Therefore I am called a novice (sāmaṇera).”

“Who gave you that name?”

“My teacher gave it, Great King.”

“What is your teacher called, young man?”

“My teacher is called a monk (bhikkhu), Great King.”

“Who gave your teacher the name monk, young man?”

“Great King, my teacher’s name was given by the priceless gem of the Saṅgha.”

Full of joy, King Saṅkha rose from his throne and prostrated himself at the feet of the novice. And he asked: “Who gave the name to the Saṅgha?” – “Great King, the Supreme Buddha Sirimata gave the name to the Saṅgha.” Hearing the word “Buddha,” which is so difficult to hear in many hundreds of thousands of aeons, King Saṅkha fainted from joy. When he regained consciousness, he asked, “Venerable sir, where does the Supreme Buddha Sirimata reside at present?”

And the novice told him the Buddha was in a monastery called the Eastern Monastery (Pubbārāma), sixteen leagues away. King Saṅkha turned over the power of a Universal Monarch to the novice. He gave up his kingdom and a great number of relatives. Filled with joy at the thought of seeing the Buddha, he started walking to the north towards the Eastern Monastery. The first day, the soles of his feet split open, for they were very tender due to his luxurious upbringing. On the second day, his feet began to bleed. He was unable to walk on the third day, so he went on his hands and knees. On the fourth day, his hands and feet bled, so he determined to continue on his chest. The joy of the possibility of seeing the Buddha enabled him to overcome his great suffering and pain.

Buddha Sirimata surveyed the world with his omniscience and seeing the power of the effort (virīya-bala) of the king, the Buddha thought: “This Universal Monarch Saṅkha is surely a seed, a Buddha-sprout (Buddhaṅkura-bīja). He undertakes great pain because of me. Indeed, I should go to him.” By his psychic powers, the Buddha hid his great splendour and went disguised as a young man in a chariot. He went to where Saṅkha was and blocked his path in order to test the power of his effort.

“You there!” Buddha Sirimata said to King Saṅkha: “Go back on your chest! I am going down this road in my chariot.” But King Saṅkha refused, saying he was on his way to see the Buddha. The Buddha in disguise invited the king to get into his chariot, saying that is where he was going also. On the way, the Deva maiden Sujātā came down from the Tāvatiṃsa heaven, and taking the form of a young girl, offered food. The Buddha had it given to Saṅkha. Then Sakka, in the form of a young man, came down from the Tāvatiṃsa heaven and gave water. As a result of the divine food and water, all of King Saṅkha’s ailments disappeared.

When they arrived at the Eastern Monastery, the Buddha sat on his seat in the monastery, assuming his true appearance with the rays of six colours shining forth. When the king went in and saw the Buddha, he again lost consciousness. After a while, he came to himself, approached the Buddha, and paid his respects.

“Venerable sir,” he requested, “protector of the world, refuge of the world, teach me one point of the doctrine which may calm me when I have heard it.” – “Very well, listen” the Buddha said. The Buddha reviewed the teaching about Nibbāna and taught the king a discourse concerning Nibbāna. This aroused reverence for the Doctrine in the king, but after hearing only a little of the teaching, he requested the Buddha: “Please stop, Fortunate One. Do not teach me any more.” He said this because he thought to himself that he would not have a gift worthy of what the Buddha taught him if he heard any more. [13]

“Indeed, venerable sir,” the king said, “of all the doctrines taught, the Fortunate One has pointed out Nibbāna, which is the highest. So, of all the parts of my body, I will pay homage to your teaching with my head.” He began to sever his neck with his fingernails and said: “Venerable Buddha Sirimata, you go to the deathless first; through the gift of my head, I will afterwards go to Nibbāna. Having said just these few words, I pay homage to the teaching about Nibbāna. Now, may this be the means for my attaining omniscience.” And saying this, he finished severing his head with his fingernails.

King Saṅkha’s predominant characteristic was his great energy (virīya). This is shown through his overcoming the difficulties in going to see Buddha Sirimata.

His effort was so strong, the Buddha realised that he was a Great Bodhisatta. Other perfections are also illustrated in this story. He gives away his position of Universal Monarch in renunciation. Even before hearing of the Buddha, he set the example of leading a moral life leading to higher rebirths. As a just king, he would show his wisdom, patience, truthfulness, loving kindness, and equanimity. Once he heard of the Buddha, he renounced his kingdom and family, giving up the highest position that can be attained by a human being. And great resolution worked together with his energy.

The final action of King Saṅkha is the gift of his head to the Buddha. This may seem strange, but it is explained in the text by the fact that the Buddha had taught him one aspect of the teaching concerning Nibbāna, the highest goal. King Saṅkha cannot find any other gift worthy of Nibbāna, so he resolves to offer his own head. In the Pāli commentaries, it is said that only giving their own limbs or their life makes Great Bodhisattas exalt when they give. Joy arises when they give such gifts and they experience no contrariety of mind. So we can see that such gifts are beyond ordinary people, and we need not feel that we should make such sacrifices ourselves.

Ven. Ajita

During the time of Buddha Gotama, the Great Bodhisatta who is to be the next Buddha was a monk named Ajita. According to the commentary on the Lineage in the Future (Anāgata-vamsa), Ajita was the son of King Ajātasattu and Queen Kañcanadevī. Prince Ajita had five hundred attendants, and when he reached the age of sixteen, the king asked his son to inherit the Buddha's heritage. The prince agreed, so the king took him to the Bamboo Grove Monastery in great pomp and splendour along with his five hundred attendants. Prince Ajita was ordained as a novice, and because of his serenity, calmness, and wisdom he was much respected. Later he was ordained as a monk. The Buddha took him when he went from Rājagaha to Kapilavatthu to reside in Nigrodha's Monastery.

While they were residing at that monastery, Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī came one day with two special cloths to be presented to the Buddha for use as robes. She had planted the cotton seeds herself and did all the necessary work up to the time the robes were finished. The account of the gift of the cloths is found in the Discourse giving the Analysis of Offerings (Dakkhiṇā-vibhaṅga-sutta, MN 142). There, the Buddha refused three times to accept the robes offered by Mahā

Pajāpatī Gotamī and suggested that she offer them to the Saṅgha with the Buddha at its head. Ven. Ānanda approached the Buddha, suggesting he should accept the cloths. The Buddha then gave the discourse on the Analysis of Offerings. [14]

No other details are given in the Pāḷi or Ven. Buddhaghosa’s commentary on this discourse. In the commentary on the Lineage in the Future (Anāgata-vaṃsa), it is said that the Buddha accepted one robe for himself and instructed his step-mother to offer the second one to the Saṅgha. But not one of the eighty leading disciples came forward to accept that robe. Eventually, Ven. Ajita thought to himself that the Buddha had told his step-mother to give the robe to the Saṅgha for her benefit, so he bravely got up like a king of the lions in the midst of the Saṅgha and accepted the robe. There was some confusion and much talk about how an unknown monk could accept the robe when none of the leading disciples had taken it.

Realising the situation, and in order to dispel any doubts, the Buddha said: “Do not say this monk is an ordinary monk. He is a Bodhisatta who will be the coming Buddha Metteyya.” Then the Buddha took the bowl that had been given to him shortly after his Awakening by the world’s Four Great Kings and threw it into the air. None of the eighty leading disciples could retrieve it, but Ven. Ajita understood that the Buddha intended for him to show his psychic powers, so he brought back the bowl. Then Ven. Ajita took the cloth he had accepted and put it in the Buddha’s Perfumed Chamber as a canopy under the ceiling, making the aspiration that this act of generosity might result in his having a canopy made of seven gems and with hangings made of gold, silver, coral, and pearls measuring twelve leagues when he becomes a Buddha.

The Buddha smiled after this and Ven. Ānanda asked why he had smiled. The Buddha replied: “Ānanda, the monk Ajita will become the Buddha Ariya Metteyya in this Auspicious Aeon.” Then he remained silent, enjoying the Arahat fruition. The first chief disciple, Ven. Sāriputta, who knew the assembled monks wished to hear more information, requested the Buddha give a discourse about the coming Buddha. And the Buddha gave the account in the Lineage in the Future (Anāgata-vaṃsa).

The Book of the Ten Stories (Dasa-vatthupparāṇa) goes on to say that from the time of the sure prediction, the Bodhisatta taught a large number of monks, explaining the whole canon and causing them to increase in insight and to attain the knowledge of adaptable patience. At the end of that life, he was reborn in a Deva world. But there is a reference to at least one other human life as he should have a life in which he is generous in the way the Bodhisatta Vessantara was. After that life, he should be reborn in the Tusita Realm, where all Great Bodhisattas reside before their final birth. According to the Lesser Chronicle (Cūḷa-vam̐sa), the Bodhisatta would have other human births.

When Ven. Buddhaghosa went from India to Ceylon to consult the commentaries on the Pāḷi canon, he was given two verses to comment on as a test. The result was the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga). The Devas, in order to convince the people of his greatness, hid the text twice so that Ven. Buddhaghosa had to write it out three times. When the copies were compared with the original, no deviations were found. The Saṅgha then exclaimed: “Without a doubt this is Metteyya!”

In another Pāḷi text that is not part of the canon, there is a description of Metteyya in the Tusita Realm. He is said to go to the Cūḷāmaṇi shrine in the Tāvātimsa Deva world to pay respects to the hair cut off by the Bodhisatta Siddhattha when he made the great renunciation and to relics brought there by the Sakka, the Lord of the Gods, after the death of Buddha Gotama. The Bodhisatta Metteyya is described as being surrounded by a host of male and female Devas. Four female Devas in particular are described as having beautiful complexions, halos, ornaments, and clothes, one of a shining colour, one red, one dark gold, and the fourth, golden.

The Buddha describes how morality among human beings grows stronger and stronger. As a result, their life span grows longer until it reaches 80,000 years, and at that time, Buddha Metteyya will come. Ven. Buddhaghosa explains that the life span increases to an incalculable number of years (asaṅkhyeyya) and then begins to decrease again until it reaches 80,000 years, for Buddhas arise only when the life span is decreasing. A tradition in Burma says that Buddha Metteyya will live for 80,000 years and that the human life span at that time will be 100,000 years, just as Buddha Gotama lived for eighty years when the human life span was one hundred years. No definite number of years is given for the period between Buddha Gotama and Buddha Metteyya. The Lineage in the Future (Anāgata-vam̐sa) verse 5, says Buddha Metteyya will arise 10 million years later (vassa-koṭṭiye), but the commentary says this means after many hundreds of thousands times 10 million years.

Dvp 125/132 says that after the human life span decreases to ten years, there will be seven intervening aeons (sattantara-kappa), then the life span will increase to an incalculable, and when it has decreased again to 80,000 years, the next Buddha will arise.

This aeon (kappa) is an Auspicious Aeon (bhaddha-kappa), which means that the maximum number of five Buddhas will arise in the same aeon. Some aeons are empty ones, meaning no Buddhas arise (suñña-kappa). In other types of aeons, one to four Buddhas arise.<sup>253</sup> Buddha Gotama was the fourth Buddha in this Auspicious Aeon, and Metteyya will be the fifth and last Buddha in it.

The commentary to the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) says that an Auspicious Aeon is very difficult to encounter. Those who are born in such aeons are usually rich in goodness and happiness. They usually have the three root conditions of non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion, and destroy the defilements. Those with the two root conditions of non-greed and non-hatred are usually reborn in good planes of existence, and those with no root conditions acquire one. In another commentary, it is said that during the time of Buddha Metteyya, the group of sensual pleasures will have little initial power to distract.

The Birth of the Next Buddha

Before his last rebirth, which is in the human world, each Bodhisatta resides in the Tusita Realm. He is mindful and aware when he is reborn there and while he lives there. He lives there as long as his life span lasts. One thousand years before he is to be reborn as a human and become a Buddha, Devas or Brahmas go to the world of men and announce that a Buddha will arise. This is a Buddha uproar (Buddha-kolāhala). [19]

When the time is right, he descends into his mother's womb, mindful and aware. He is aware it is his last existence. At that time, there is an illimitable, splendid radiance throughout the universe. His mother is protected by the Four Great Kings during the gestation period. His mother does not break the five precepts during her pregnancy, and she is not attracted to any man. The mother is surrounded by all the pleasures of the five senses. She suffers from no illness, and she can see the Bodhisatta in her womb. He is seated cross-legged in the womb facing outward.

41b. Buddha Metteyya – 1676

His mother gives birth in a standing position and in a forest. The Bodhisatta Metteyya will be born in the Deer Park at Isipatana. The feet of the baby are placed in a golden cloth. He is received first by Devas and afterwards by men. Before his feet touch the ground, the Four Great Kings present him to his mother, saying: “Rejoice, lady, for mighty is the son that is born to you.” He comes forth without any stain. Two showers of cool and warm water fall from the sky to bathe mother and the Bodhisatta. He takes seven steps to the north, surveys the four quarters, and pronounces the lion’s roar that he is supreme in the world. When he is born, an illimitable, splendid radiance is seen throughout the universe. Seven days after the birth of the Bodhisatta, his mother dies and is reborn in the Tusita Realm.

When Bodhisatta Metteyya is reborn in the human world, life on earth will be like life in a Deva world. Women will marry at the age of five hundred. There will only be three diseases: desire (iccha), hunger (anasana), and old age (jarā). Jambudīpa will have Ketumatī, which is present-day Bārāṇasī, as its capital city. In addition, there will be 84,000 cities with 900 million princes. Jambudīpa will extend for 100,000 leagues. It will be without thorns, clear, with green grass. There will be grass which is four inches high and soft as cotton. The climate will always be good. The rains will be even, and the winds will be neither too hot nor too cold. The rivers and ponds will not lack water. There will be white sand that is not rough, the size of peas and beans. The country will be like an adorned garden. The villages will be close together, full of people, without interval.

The people will be tranquil, safe, and free from danger. They will be happy and joyful, enjoying festivals. They will have plenty to eat and drink. Jambudīpa will be delightful, like Āḷakamandā, the capital city of the Kurus. The capital city of Jambudīpa, Ketumatī, will be twelve leagues long and seven leagues wide. The city will have beautiful lotus ponds, full of water that is fragrant, clear, clean, cool, and sweet. The ponds will be accessible to people at all times. There will be seven rows of palm trees and walls of seven colours, made of jewels, will surround the city.

In squares at the gates of the city, there will be shining wishing trees: one blue, one yellow, one red, and one white. Divine adornments and ornaments as well as all sorts of wealth and possessions will be hanging on the trees.

The Universal Monarch Saṅkha

At this time, there will be a Universal Monarch named Saṅkha. In a past life, he and his father made a hut for a Paccekabuddha. They had him stay there for the three months of the Rains Retreat and [20] then gave him three robes. In the same way, they had seven Paccekabuddhas stay in the hut. The father and son were reborn in the Tāvātimsa Realm, and Sakka requested that the father be reborn in the human world as Prince Mahāpanāda. The architect for the Devas, Vissakamma, built a palace for Mahāpanāda. During the time of Buddha Gotama, Mahāpanāda was Ven. Bhaddaji, who, on one occasion, raised up the Mahāpanāda palace from the bottom of the Ganges. The palace still waits there for the future Saṅkha, who was the son that gave to the Paccekabuddhas in the past.

When Saṅkha becomes the Universal Monarch, he will raise up the Mahāpanāda palace which will serve as his palace in the centre of Ketumatī. The palace is described as resplendent with many jewels, so bright it is hard to look at. And he will possess the seven treasures of a Universal Monarch: the wheel, elephant, horse, gem, wife, householder, and adviser.

Through the merit of Saṅkha, there will be a square in the middle of the city with four halls facing the four directions with wishing trees. Hanging from the trees there will be all sorts of fine garments, drums, and jewellery.

Through the merit of the people at that time, there will be rice that grows without being cultivated. It will be pure, sweet-smelling, and the grains will be ready-husked. The residents of Ketumatī will have whatever they want. They will be very rich. They will wake up to the sound of drums and lutes. They will be exceedingly happy in both body and mind.

King Saṅkha's palace will have 84,000 dancing girls. He will have one thousand sons, valiant, of heroic forms, crushing enemy armies. The eldest son will be the king's adviser. The king will conquer the sea-girt land of Jambudīpa without violence, without a sword, but rather by righteousness.

The Career of Bodhisatta Metteyya

The Bodhisatta will be the son of the Universal Monarch's head priest, Subrahma, and his wife, Brahmavatī. He will be named Ajita, and he will bear the 32 marks and 80 minor marks that are common to Buddhas and Universal

41b. Buddha Metteyya – 1678

Monarchs. He will lead the household life for 8,000 years. He will have four palaces named: Sirivaḍḍha, Vaḍḍhamana, Siddhattha, and Candaka.<sup>254</sup> He will have 100,000 dancing girls. His wife will be Candamukhī and his son will be named Brahmavaḍḍhana.

Bodhisattas decide to give up household life after they have seen the four signs of an old man, a sick man, a dead man, and a recluse. They go forth from lay life and after a son is born to them. They put on the yellow robe and engage in striving. The Bodhisatta Metteyya will go forth [21] in one of his palaces. Accompanied by his followers, he will fly through the air in the palace and go to the Ironwood (Nāga) tree, which will be his Bodhi tree. He will engage in striving for seven days, which is the minimum period.

At the age of 8,000 years, the Bodhisatta will mount a chariot that resembles a glorious celestial palace and when going to the royal park, he will see the four signs. They will produce a sense of spiritual urgency (samvega). And he will long for the state of going forth. Then he will return and go up to his palace. His mind will be bent on the state of going forth. At that moment, that jewelled palace will fly up by a path in the sky, and he will leap up into the sky, like the king of the golden water fowl, together with his followers.

Then the Devas of the 10,000 world-element will take flowers and honour him. The 84,000 kings of Jambudīpa, the people from the cities and from the countryside will honour him with perfume and flowers. The king of the Asuras will guard the palace, the king of the Nāgas will take him a precious gem, the king of the Supaṇṇas will take him a jewel necklace, the king of the Gandhabbas will honour him with musical instruments and dancers. The Universal Monarch, together with his consorts and followers, will go to the Bodhisatta.

By the power of the king and the power of the Bodhisatta, that crowd will be established in the state of going forth, and the people will rise into the sky with him and go to the Bodhi tree. Then, a Mahā Brahma will take a sixty-league parasol and hold it over them. The Deva king Sakka will blow the Vijayuttara conch shell. The king of the Yāma Devas, Suyāma, will take a yak's tail fan and honour him. The king of the Tusita Devas, Santusita, will hold a jewel fan. The Gandhabba Deva, Pañcasikha, will take his celestial lute Beluva, and play it. The Four Great Kings, swords in hand, will surround them on all four sides. All those people, Devas, Gandhabbas, Yakkhas, Nāgas, and Supaṇṇas, surrounding him in front, in back, and on both sides, will go with him. Surrounded by a crowd of Devas and women, etc., of great splendour and beauty, the Bodhisatta will rise into the sky, and then descend near the place of Awakening. At that moment, the Mahā Brahma will take the eight requisites of an ascetic created by his psychic powers and offer them to him. Then the Bodhisatta will cut off the topknot of hair on his head and throw it up into the sky. He will take the eight requisites from the hands of the Mahā Brahma and go forth. For seven days he will make the austere striving. And all that great crowd of people will follow the example of the Bodhisatta in going forth.

---

<sup>254</sup> This is the only case in which a Bodhisatta is said to have four rather than three palaces. As each of the three palaces were used for one of the three seasons, we can surmise that there will be four seasons during the time of the next Buddha.

The Ironwood (Nāga) tree where the Bodhisatta will be Awakened is described as being 120 cubits high with four main branches 120 or 130 cubits long. There will be 2,000 minor branches. The tips of the branches will be bent, constantly moving, and will be continually in bloom with blossoms as big as wheels. They will have a heavenly smell, full of pollen. The perfume will spread around for ten leagues, both with and against the wind. The leaves will be a deep green in all seasons and the flowers will scatter on the people all around.

The Lineage in the Future (Anāgata-vamsa) describes the people who go forth with the Buddha, including the names of the most important people among them: He will be accompanied by a large group of people, including friends, ministers, and members of his family. There will be a fourfold army and an assembly of the four castes to go forth with him. There will be 84,000 princesses and 84,000 Brahmins who are skilled in the Vedas. Among the 84,000 there will be the brothers Isidatta and Purāṇa; the twins of unlimited wisdom, Jatimitta and Vijaya; the householder Suddhika and the female disciple Suddhanā; the male disciple Saṅgha and the female disciple Saṅghā, the householder Saddara and the famous man Sudatta; and the [22] husband and wife Visākha and Yasavatī. Many other citizens and people from the countryside of various social ranks will go forth.

The spot on which the Bodhisattas attain Awakening is one of the four fixed places, so Metteyya will make his final bid for liberation on the same spot as all the past Buddhas – the present-day Bodhagaya. On the day they attain Self-

Awakening, Bodhisattas have a meal of milk-rice. They are seated on a spreading of grass. They use mindfulness of breathing as their preparation for developing insight and shatter the forces of Māra. They attain the three knowledges and the six special qualities not shared by others, etc., while still seated in the cross-legged position. And they spend seven weeks near the Bodhi Tree after becoming Self-Awakened. The Lineage in the Future commentary says that from the time he becomes Awakened, Ariya Metteyya will be known as the Buddha-King (Buddha-rāja). Then the Mahā Brahma will request that Buddha Metteyya teach others the path to Nibbāna.

Buddha Metteyya will preach his first discourse, the Discourse setting the Dhamma Wheel Turning (Dhamma-cakkappavattana-sutta, SN 56.11), in the Elephant Grove (Nāga-vana). The park is said to be in Isipatana near the city of Ketumatī. He will be surrounded by an assembly extending one hundred leagues. A great many Devas will approach him at that time, and he will set free one billion from their bondage. This will be the first occasion when a great number of beings attain penetration (abhisamaya) into the four noble truths.

Then King Saṅkha will give his jewel palace to the Saṅgha with the Buddha at its head, and he will make a great donation to the poor, the needy, and beggars. Accompanied by his wife and 900 billion people, the king will approach the Buddha. And all that 900 billion people will be ordained with the words: “Come, bhikkhu” (etha bhikkhu). This will be the second penetration.

After that, the third penetration of 800 billion will take place when Devas and men approach the Buddha with a question concerning Arahatsip.

There will be three assemblies (sannipāta) of Arahats. The first will include 1,000 billion. This may be, as for many past Buddhas, at the time the Buddha recites the Pātimokkha on the full moon day of February (Magha) to an assembly possessing four factors: 1) All the monks present are ordained with the “Come, bhikkhu” ordination; 2) all have the six types of higher knowledge; 3) all of them come without any previous announcement; and 4) the Observance Day (Uposatha) is on the fifteenth day in the bright fortnight.

The second assembly will be at the time the Buddha proclaims the Invitation (Pavāraṇa) at the end of the rainy season and will include 900 billion.

For the third assembly, 800 billion Arahats will accompany the Buddha when he goes in seclusion on the Gandhamādana slope of the Himavant mountain range.

41b. Buddha Metteyya – 1681

Otherwise, the Buddha Metteyya will continually be surrounded by 1,000 billions of those who have attained the six types of higher knowledge (abhiñña) and great psychic power.

Buddha Gotama said that just as he was accompanied by a Saṅgha of hundreds of bhikkhus when he wandered around, Buddha Metteyya will be accompanied by thousands. Buddha Metteyya will go through the countryside teaching the Dhamma, awakening many people. Some will take the three refuges, some will be established in the five precepts, some will undertake the [23] ten skilful actions. There will be some who become ordained, some who attain the four excellent fruition states, some who will attain analytic insight into the Dhamma, some who will attain the eight excellent perfections, some the three knowledges, and some the six types of super knowledge. The teachings of Buddha Metteyya will be widespread. Seeing people who are ready to be Awakened he will go 100,000 leagues in a moment to cause them to be Awakened.

It is said that Buddha Metteyya will quench the heat for beings reborn in the lower realms. The first chief disciple will be the Universal Monarch Saṅkha who will have the bhikkhu name of Asoka. The second chief disciple will be Brahmadeva. The Buddha's attendant will be named Sīha. The chief women disciples among the female monastics (bhikkhuni) will be Padumā and Sumanā. The chief lay attendants among the men will be Sumana and Saṅgha; among the women, Yasavatī and Saṅghā.

Wherever he goes, Buddha Metteyya will be accompanied by a great company of Devas honouring him. The Devas will make necklaces which will be adorned by the kings of the Nāgas and the Supaṇṇas. There will be eight garlands each of gold, silver, jewels, and coral. There will be many hundreds of banners hanging down. Awnings adorned with jewels will resemble the moon. They will be surrounded by nets of bells and jewelled garlands. They will scatter sweet-smelling flowers and different sorts of perfumed powder, both divine and human. And there will be various types of cloth of many colours. Having faith in the Buddha, they will sport all around, and many marvels will take place through the power of Buddha Metteyya's merit. Seeing those marvels, many people will decide they would rather die than abandon him as their refuge. Many of them will attain Awakening, and those who do not, will do good deeds which lead to heavenly worlds.

41b. Buddha Metteyya – 1682

Several other details can be predicted for Buddha Metteyya as they are part of the list of thirty things that are true of all Buddhas: He will live regularly at a monastery at Jetavana. His bed there will be on the same spot as those of past Buddhas. He will perform the Double Miracle at the gateway to the city of Sāvattihī. He will teach the Abhidhamma to his mother in the Tavatimsa Deva world. He will descend from that Deva world at the gateway to the city of Saṅkassa. He will lay down a rule of training whenever necessary. He will tell the story of one of his past lives (Jātaka) whenever necessary. He will teach the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-varṃsa) to a gathering of his relatives.

Several details have to do with his day-to-day habits: He will give a friendly welcome to monastics when they arrive. He will spend the Rains Retreat where he is invited to and will not leave without asking permission. Each day, he will carry out the duties to be performed before and after meals and for the three watches in the night. [24]

The Lineage in the Future (Anāgata-varṃsa) says his eyelashes will be thick, that the eyes will be broad and pure, not winking day or night; and that with his physical eye he will be able to see large and small things all around for ten leagues without obstruction.

Rays of six colours will radiate from his body and illumine the 10,000 world-element. The major and minor marks will always be visible as countless hundreds of thousands of rays which will shine in all directions for 25 leagues. Through the merit acquired when the blood flowed from his head when he offered it to Buddha Sirimata, his radiance as a Buddha (Buddha-pabhā) will shine from the summit of the world (Bhavagga) to the lowest of the hells (Avīci), and the offering of his head and the drops of blood will mean that the radiance from the hair between his eyebrows will be unlimited.

People will not be able to distinguish night from day. The only way they will know when it is night is through the sound of bird cries and the closing of the blossoms and leaves of lotuses and water lilies. They will know it is day by the cries of birds going to seek food and the opening of the flowers and leaves of lotuses and water lilies.

Wherever Buddha Metteyya walks, lotuses will spring up for him to step on. This is said to be the result of his great effort in the past life when he was the Bodhisatta King Saṅkha and went to Buddha Sirimata. The main petals of the lotuses will be thirty cubits, and the minor petals, twenty-five. The stamens will be twenty cubits, the pistils will be sixteen cubits, and they will be full of red pollen.

But even Buddhas are subject to the law of impermanence. Eventually, Buddha Metteyya will attain Parinibbāna. All Buddhas have a meal with meat on the day of their Parinibbāna. Before their Parinibbāna, they will have accomplished 24,000 billion attainments. According to the Lineage in the Future (Anāgata-vamsa) commentary, when Ariya Metteyya attains Parinibbāna, he will not leave behind his human body (vipāka-kammaja-rūpa), the body produced by the fruition of volitional actions; he will enter the element of Nibbāna (Nibbāna-dhātu) and no relics will remain. Although the text says his Dispensation will last for 180,000 years, the commentary says it will continue for 380,000 years.

How to Meet Buddha Metteyya

The Teaching about the Ten Bodhisattas (Dasa-bodhi-satta-uddesa) and the Lineage in the Future (Anāgata-vamsa) both give instructions on what people must do if they are to meet Buddha Metteyya. This is very important for all those who do not attain at least the first stage of Awakening during this Buddha Dispensation, for, as we have seen, Buddha Metteyya will be the last [25] Buddha to arise in this world-cycle. If a person does not attain Awakening in this world-cycle, it will be extremely difficult to get another opportunity.

In the Teaching about the Ten Bodhisattas (Dasa-bodhi-satta-uddesa), Buddha Gotama says to Ven. Sāriputta: “Not all men will see my physical body. If they encounter my Dispensation (Sāsana), give gifts (dāna), observe morality (sīla), and cultivate development of the mind (bhāvanā), through the fruit of that, they will be reborn in the time of Buddha Ariya Metteyya.”

These three actions are the basis of meritorious action (puñña). Through these actions a person can be assured of rebirth in the higher planes of existence. Developing the mind leads to the temporary purity attained through the absorption (jhāna) states. But it can also lead to insight (vipassanā) and true liberation.

The Lineage in the Future (Anāgata-vamsa) gives more details. In order to meet Buddha Metteyya, people should put forth effort (viriya) and be firm (daḥha), with agitated mind (ubbigga-mānasa). We can surmise that “agitated mind” means the profound stirring of the mind or sense of spiritual urgency (samvega) that comes from realising the urgent need to work for liberation.

All those who do good deeds and who are vigilant – whether they are male monastics, female monastics, laymen, or laywomen – will be able to encounter the next Buddha. All those who pay great honour to the Buddha will see the auspicious assembly of Buddha Metteyya. The spiritual life (brahma-cariya) should be practised. Gifts (dāna) should be given. The Observance Days (Uposatha) should be kept. Loving kindness (mettā) should be carefully developed. By delighting in vigilance and meritorious actions, it will be possible to eventually make an end to misery (dukkha).

Ven. Ledi Sayadaw points out that it is necessary to make balanced effort in terms of good conduct (carana) and right knowledge (vijjā) if one is to meet the next Buddha. Right conduct means developing morality (sīla) and concentration (samādhi). Knowledge means developing wisdom (paññā). Right conduct can be compared to having sound limbs. Right knowledge can be compared to being able to see. If one or the other is missing, a person will be unsuccessful. A person may be generous and keep the moral rules of the five precepts and the eight precepts on Observance Days, but if the seeds of knowledge are not planted, that person may meet Buddha Metteyya but still not Awaken. If only knowledge is developed, wrong conduct will mean that the chances of encountering the next Buddha will be slight, due to the intervening period (antara-kappa) between this Buddha's Dispensation and the next one.

Examples of wrong conduct mentioned by Ven. Ledi Sayadaw are: Not being generous, being poorly guarded in physical actions, being unrestrained in speech, and unclean in thought. Such conduct will mean rebirth in the lower realms, either in the next life or in a future life. If people who act in this way do manage to be reborn in a higher world, their lack of generosity will mean they will encounter hardships, trials, and tribulations in making a living. Through not keeping the precepts, they are likely to meet with disputes, quarrels, anger, and hatred; and they will be susceptible to diseases and ailments. This will make it even harder to avoid actions leading to the lower worlds.

It may be possible, however, that a person today has already prepared in the past for attaining Awakening. If the right effort is made in this life, that person can reach at least the first stage of Awakening and become a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna). Then, it will be impossible to do any action that results in rebirth in the lower realms. This will not necessarily mean that such a person will miss the opportunity to see the next Buddha. Eventually, as a Non-returner, he or she can be reborn in the Suddhāvāsa Brahmā worlds, and life in these worlds can span the careers of several Buddhas.

If a person who has enough perfections (pāramī) to reach Awakening in this lifetime does not make the necessary effort, it may be possible to become a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) in the next life in the Deva worlds. If such a person does not practise the factors leading to Awakening, he or she will miss out entirely during this Buddha's Dispensation and will only be able to attain release during the next Buddha's Dispensation.

The Dhamma Treasure

42: The Attributes of the Three Treasures

The Dhamma Treasure is made up of the nine supermundane phenomena, which are the four paths, the four fruitions and Nibbāna; and the doctrine (pariyatti) of the Buddha forming the Three Baskets (Tipiṭaka) or the Buddhist Scriptures, together with the practice of the doctrine (paṭipatti) as delineated in the texts. It also implies the attributes of the Three Treasures. This chapter features a discussion of the attributes of the Three Treasures in a treatment that is neither too concise nor too elaborate but that will cover all salient features.

The Nine Supreme Attributes of the Buddha

The Buddha is endowed with infinite noble qualities. However, for ready remembrance for the devotees among humans, Devas and Brahmas, only nine special attributes beginning with Worthiness (Araham), were specially taught by the Buddha in the various discourses, and the same applies to the teaching about the six supreme attributes of the Dhamma and the nine supreme attributes of the Saṅgha later.

Iti pi so Bhagavā Araham̃ Sammā-sambuddho, vijjā-caraṇa sampanno sugato loka-vidū, anuttaro purisa-damma-sārathi, satthā Deva-manussānaṃ Buddho Bhagavā.

The Buddha<sup>255</sup> who has attained Perfect Awakening after fulfilling the 10 perfections (pāramī) in three ways, and has destroyed all defilements is endowed with the following attributes:

1. He is Worthy (Araham), being perfectly pure of defilements, so that no trace of them, not even a vague impression, is left to suggest their presence; being incapable of doing evil, even where nobody could know of it; having broken up the spokes of the wheel of existence; being worthy of homage by all the three worlds of humans, Devas and Brahmas.

2. He is perfectly Self-Awakened (Sammā-sambuddho), in that he truly comprehends the Dhamma by his intellect and insight and is able to expound it to others.
3. He is endowed with the three knowledges (vijjā-caraṇa-sampanno): knowledge about the past existences of all beings, the divine eye and the extinction of all moral pollutants, which knowledges are expandable into eight knowledges together with the good conduct definable in fifteen ways.
4. The Buddha is Well-gone (Sugato) to Nibbāna through the four paths and fruitions (magga-ñāṇa); because the Buddha speaks only what is beneficial and true.
5. He knows the conditioned arising of all beings (loka-vidū), the bases of their arising in the various planes of existence, and the conditionality of physical and mental phenomena.
6. He is incomparable in taming those who deserve to be tamed (anuttaro purisa-damma-sārathi).
7. He is the teacher of Devas and humans (Satthā Deva-manussānaṃ), showing them the path leading to Nibbāna. [1106]
8. He is the Awakened One (Buddho), who knows and teaches the four noble truths.
9. He is endowed with the six exalted qualities (Bhagavā): supremacy (issariya), knowledge of the nine supermundane factors (magga-phala-nibbāna), fame and following (yasa), physical perfection (sirī), power of accomplishment (kamma) and diligence (payatta).

An Explanation of the Above Attributes

Although the Buddha is endowed with infinite attributes only the above nine are declared in his discourses, as the attributes of the Buddha to the various hearers in the Deva and human worlds simply to meet the spiritual or intellectual capacity of the hearer. Each of the nine attributes should be taken as representative of a category of qualities which may be attributed to the Buddha. How the meaning of the nine attributes may be properly understood is given below, not too briefly and yet not too comprehensively either.

1. He is Worthy (Araham).

Here the attribute, in the abstract sense, and the possessor of the attribute, should be distinguished. The former refers to the natural states that arise in the mental process of the Buddha, while the latter refers to the particular continuum of the five aggregates wherein those attributes arise. There are five beneficial qualities included in the attribute of being Worthy. They are:

1. It means the Buddha, who has destroyed by the supermundane path (lokuttara-magga) all the defilements (kilesa), numbering 1,500, without leaving a trace. Defilements may be compared to one's enemies that always work against one's interest and welfare. The defilements were present in the mind-body continuum of the Bodhisatta; they are called enemies (ari). The Buddha, after meditating on dependent origination called the great diamond insight (mahāvajira-vipassanā) as mentioned earlier on, attained Supreme Awakening on the undefeated throne. The four supermundane paths enabled him to destroy all those defilements group by group. So, the supermundane Dhamma, the four noble paths, are the attribute called Araham whereas the Buddha's mind-body continuum of five aggregates is the possessor of that attribute.

2. Then there is the derivation of the word Araham from its root araha, meaning: "The one who has distanced himself from the defilements." As explained above, the Buddha has destroyed all the defilements together with the subtle proclivity to some form of habit without leaving a trace; not even a vague impression to suggest their presence. The defilements and the proclivities have no possibility of ever arising in the Buddha. It is in this sense that the Buddha has distanced himself from the defilements and the proclivities. He has banished them thoroughly. This absolute casting off of all defilements together with proclivities is the attribute of Araham and the Buddha's mind-body continuum of five aggregates is the possessor of that attribute. This attribute is derived from the four noble paths.

The above attributes explained above are not possessed by other Arahats; they are not entitled to be called Araham. The reason is this: All Arahats have destroyed all the 1,500 defilements (kilesa), but unlike the Buddha, certain vague impressions or traces of their proclivity to some habits still remain with them.

The vague impression is some subtle proclivity remaining in the ordinary Arahats' mentality that can involuntarily cause some action to arise in him, as in the case of a worldling. This is because of lingering tendencies for certain actions that had repeatedly occurred in the previous existences of the Arahat concerned, in whom they remain as a residual force even after the destruction of all defilements.

An example of this phenomenon is found in Ven. Pilinda Vaccha, an Arahat who lived during the Buddha's times. He had been, for 500 successive existences, a Brahmin of a haughty clan. Members of that clan considered every person outside of their [1107] clan as a scoundrel and the future Pilinda Vaccha used to address all outsiders as "scoundrels." This habit became ingrained in him for so long a chain of existences that even after becoming an Arahat, Ven. Pilinda Vaccha could not help himself while addressing others, though inadvertently, as "you scoundrel." This was not through any defilement of conceit of birth but was merely a habituated action of the past.

3. Araham can be interpreted as: "One who has no secret place for doing evil" (negative particle a + raha). There are some people who pose themselves as wise men or good men who put on appearances, but who are prone to evil in private. As for the Buddha, since he has destroyed all defilements absolutely, together with any proclivity to habitual actions, there can be no secret place for him to do evil nor does he do any evil in any secret place. This noble quality of having no secret place for evil is the attribute of Araham, and the Buddha's mind-body continuum of five aggregates is the possessor of that attribute.

4. Araham can also mean: "One who has broken up into pieces the spokes that make up the wheel of existences" (ara + hata). Existence in the three spheres, which are the sensuous sphere, the form realm and the formless realm, are figuratively called "the carriage of the round of existences." The continuous arising of the aggregates (khandha), and the sense spheres (āyatana) and elements (dhātu) is figuratively called "the wheel of existences," which is the essential part of the carriage of the round of existences. In that wheel, there are ignorance and craving for existence as its hub, while volitions (puññābhisankhārā) that find their expression in meritorious volitions or meritorious actions pertaining to the sensuous sphere and the form realm make up the spokes of the wheel that arise in the sensuous sphere and the form realm. Likewise, demeritorious volitions (apuññābhisankhārā) that cause demeritorious actions pertaining to the four lower worlds (apāya) make up the spokes of the wheel that arise in the four lower worlds. And likewise, meritorious volitions pertaining to the formless realm (aneñjābhisaṅkhāra), and cause meritorious actions, make up the spokes of the wheel that arise in the formless realm.

Of the arising of those three types of volitions, ignorance and craving for existence are called “the hub,” since the hub is where the turning of the wheel originates, forming thereby the cause of the cycle of Saṃsāra. Its force is passed on to the rim or tyre, figuratively, the result that ends in ageing and death, by the spokes, the volitions.

In this first mode of presentation, the gist about the twelve factors of dependent origination is that ignorance and craving are shown as the hub of the wheel; ageing and death are shown as the tyre; and the three types of volitions are shown as the spokes of the wheel of Saṃsāra. The remaining factors of dependent origination are shown as the body of the carriage in the round of existences.

It is due to the presence of the pollutants (āsava) that ignorance (avijjā) arises. Ignorance has its source or cause in the pollutants. As such, the pollutants can be seen as the axle that is fixed to the hub of ignorance and craving for ignorance.

Thus, in the wheel of Saṃsāra, with the axle of the pollutants fitted to the hub of ignorance and craving for existence, with the spokes of three volitions and the tyre of ageing and death, which has been turning since the beginningless Saṃsāra, that has borne the carriage of existence in the three spheres, the Buddha has, on his attaining Perfect Awakening, broken into pieces, the spokes of the wheel by standing on the two feet of mental and physical endeavour, taking a firm stand on morality (sīla), and holding, in his hand of conviction, the pick-axe of path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa), which is the merit that exhausts productive deeds (kamma).

Therefore, the breaking up of the spokes of the wheel of Saṃsāra by the pick-axe of the four paths and fruitions (magga-ñāṇa) is the attribute of Araham; the mind-body continuum of the five aggregates of the Buddha is the possessor of this attribute.

Another explanation: [1108] The beginningless round of existences is called the cycle of Saṃsāra. This cycle, if reviewed in its ultimate sense, is a set of the twelve factors of dependent origination.

Ignorance being the source or cause of rebirth is the hub of the wheel. Ageing and death being the end of a given existence is the tyre of the wheel. The remaining ten factors, having the hub, ignorance, and the tyre, ageing and death, as their two extremities, are the spokes of the wheel.

The Buddha has totally destroyed these spokes of the wheel of Saṃsāra. Therefore the breaking up of the ten factors of dependent origination by the four strokes of the sword of the paths and fruitions (magga-ñāṇa) is the attribute of Araham in this fourth interpretation. The mind-body continuum of the five aggregates of the Buddha is the possessor of this attribute.

5. Araham can also be interpreted as: “He who is worthy of homage by humans, Devas and Brahmas.” That is because the Buddha is the noblest person, worthy of receiving the special offerings of the four monastic requisites by all three worlds. That is why when the Buddha arises in the world, powerful Devas and humans do not make their offerings and pay homage to any other deity but the Buddha.

Let us take some important instances of this fact: Brahma Sahampati made a special offering of a garland of flowers the size of Mount Sineru to the Buddha. Other Devas and kings, such as Bimbisāra, Kosala, etc., made the greatest offerings they could afford to the Buddha; further, after the passing away of the Buddha, King Asoka spent 960 million to build 84,000 monasteries throughout Jambudīpa in honour of the Buddha.

Therefore, the incomparable morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi), wisdom (paññā), emancipation (vimutti) and knowledge leading to emancipation (vimutti-ñāṇa-dassana), are the noble qualities that make the Buddha worthy of homage by humans, Devas and Brahmas, that is, the attribute of Araham. The mind-body continuum of the five aggregates of the Buddha is the possessor of this attribute.

2. He is perfectly Self-Awakened (Sammā-sambuddha).

This is analysed like this: Sammā, truly, correctly; saṃ, on one’s own; buddho knower of all knowable things.

The Buddha discovered the Dhamma by his own intellect and insight, unaided by anyone. Paccekabuddhas also discover the Dhamma by their own intellect and insight. But they are not able to teach the Dhamma, which they discover, to other persons, so they do not deserve the epithet Sammā-sambuddha. They are only called Sambuddha, as in Paccekasambuddha.

Noble disciples (ariya) know the Dhamma only with the assistance of some teachers and they are able to teach it to others, but, since they do not discover the Dhamma by themselves, they are also not called Sammā-sambuddha. They are only called Sammā-buddha, rightly Awakened. The Buddhas are Sambuddha, knowers of the Dhamma and all knowable things through Self-Awakening. They are also Sammā-buddha because they can teach the four truths to their disciples each according to their capacity, and in the language they can understand. So, a combination of these two qualities makes the Buddha deserving of the title Perfectly Self-Awakened, or Sammā-sambuddha.

Therefore, the four path-knowledges (magga-ñāṇa) that enable the Buddha to know, unaided, all knowable things with omniscience at the highest level, is this attribute called Sammā-sambuddha. The mind-body continuum of the five aggregates of the Buddha is the possessor of this attribute.

3. He is endowed with the three knowledges (vijjā-caraṇa-sampanno).

The one endowed with the three knowledges or the eight knowledges and the fifteen forms of good conduct. The three knowledges are taught by the Buddha in the Discourse about Fear and Fright (Bhaya-bherava-sutta, MN 4), the eight knowledges are taught by the Buddha in the Discourse to Ambaṭṭha (Ambaṭṭha-sutta, DN 3). The two ways of teaching knowledge in three categories and eight categories is adopted by the Buddhas through compassionate consideration of the mental framework of [1109] the hearers on each occasion.

The three knowledges:

1. The knowledge of past existences (pubbe-nivāsa-ñāṇa). By this knowledge, the Buddha can see the past existences of himself and other beings.
2. The knowledge of the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu-ñāṇa). By this knowledge, the Buddha can see things at far away places, things concealed, and things too subtle for the ordinary human eyes to see.
3. The knowledge of the extinction of the pollutants (āsavakkhaya-ñāṇa). This is knowledge of the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala-ñāṇa) which extinguishes all four of the pollutants.

The eight knowledges:

1-3 as above, and:

4. Insight knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa). This is understanding the impermanence, suffering and unsubstantiality of all conditioned mental and physical phenomena.

5. Psychic power of the mind (manomayiddhi-ñāṇa). The power to assume various forms through mastery of mind, accomplished by absorption (jhāna) practice.

6. Multifarious kinds of psychic power (iddhividha-ñāṇa). The power to conjure up great numbers of various forms, human or otherwise.

7. The knowledge of the divine ear (dibba-sota-ñāṇa). The power to hear sounds from far away places, sounds muffled and sounds too subtle to hear by the ordinary human ear.

8. The knowledge of reading the mind of others (ceto-pariyāyaya-ñāṇa). The Buddha can know the minds of others in sixteen different ways.

Of the above eight knowledges, the fourth knowledge, insight knowledge, is knowledge pertaining to the sensuous sphere. The third knowledge, knowledge of extinction of the pollutants (āsava) is supermundane knowledge. The remaining six knowledges pertain to the form realm absorption (jhāna) powers called (rūpāvacara-kriyā-abhiññā-ñāṇa).

The Fifteen Forms of Perfect Practice of Morality

1. Morality of restraint (sīla-saṁvara). The observance of the monastic precepts of restraint under the Monastic Rule (Pātimokkha-saṁvara-sīla).

2. Control of the faculties (indriyesu gutta-dvāratā). Keeping watch over the doors of eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind with constant mindfulness, so as not to allow any demeritoriousness enter.

3. Knowing the proper extent regarding food (bojane mataññutā). He knows the proper extent in receiving alms food, and in enjoying it. In receiving alms food, the Buddha considers the degree of devotion of the supporter. If the devotion is strong but the gift is small, the Buddha does not scorn the gift for its smallness but accepts it. On the hand, if the gift is big but the supporter's devotion is weak, the Buddha accepts only a small amount of the gift, considering the weak devotion of the supporter. If the gift is big and the supporter's devotion is strong, the Buddha accepts just an appropriate amount to satisfy his need. This is called knowing the proper extent regarding the acceptance of alms food. In enjoying the food thus collected, the Buddha never eats to the full but stops four or five morsels short of filling his stomach. More important, he never takes food without cultivating the monastic's contemplation while eating.

4. Wakefulness (jāgariyānuyoga). Wakefulness does not mean just remaining without sleep. The Buddha spends the whole day: during the first watch of the night and the last watch of the night in meditation, while walking or sitting, thus keeping away the hindrances. This purposeful waking is called wakefulness. Out of 24 hours in a day, the Buddha sleeps just four hours, i.e., between 10p.m. and [1110] 2a.m., to recuperate his energy; the remaining 20 hours are spent in meditation and monastic practice.

The seven properties of virtuous persons:

5. Confidence in the Three Treasures (saddhā).
6. Mindfulness (sati).
7. Conscience about doing evil (hiri).
8. Concern about doing evil (ottapa).
9. Wide learning of the doctrine (bāhu-sacca).
10. Diligence (virīya).
11. Wisdom (paññā).

12-15. The four form realm absorptions (jhāna). These refer to the four absorptions (jhāna) of the form realm under the fourfold reckoning of absorptions (jhāna).

The above fifteen forms of good conduct lead straight to Nibbāna, the deathless element, which as worldlings, the disciples never have realized before. Hence they are called good conduct (carāṇa).

Knowledge (vijjā) and good conduct (carāṇa) are complementary to each other. The former is like the eyes, whereas the latter is like the legs. To get to a desired place the eyes without the legs cannot accomplish it any more than the legs without the eyes. Therefore, knowledge and good conduct should be cultivated together.

It might be asked: “Are not knowledge and good conduct attainable by the noble disciples?” The answer is yes and no. The noble ones (ariya) can attain them, but they cannot be said to have the attribute of knowledge and good conduct (vijjā-carāṇa-sampaññā) which belongs to the Buddha alone for the reasons given below: There are two factors in this attribute, they are, being accomplished in knowledge, and being accomplished in good conduct. The Buddha’s accomplishment of knowledge is the source of omniscience. His accomplishment of good conduct is the source of his being a compassionate one. Being thus accomplished in two ways, the Buddha, by his knowledge, knows what is beneficial to each individual being and what is not. Further, the Buddha, by his good conduct, extends his compassion on all beings to cause them to abstain from what is not beneficial to them and to adopt what is beneficial to them. His accomplishment of knowledge and accomplishment of good conduct, therefore, together make his teaching the doctrine of liberation. It also ensures that his disciples that their practice is the righteous, correct practice.

Therefore, the accomplishment of knowledge and the accomplishment of good conduct combined together are called the attribute of Vijjā-carāṇa-sampanno. The mind-body continuum of the five aggregates of the Buddha is the possessor of this attribute.

4. Being Well-gone (Sugato). The commentary explains this attribute in four ways:

1. Su, well; gata, gone. Thus the going to, the attaining of, the noble path, hence the one who has attained the noble paths is the first meaning. The noble path is faultless or flawless and therefore is magnificent. Therefore, the Buddha is called Well-gone (Sugato) because he proceeds to the haven from all dangers, by the magnificent path, in an unattached attitude. Under this interpretation, the noble path is the attribute and the mind-body continuum of the five aggregates of the Buddha is the possessor of that attribute.

2. Su = Nibbāna, the excellent goal; gata, means he proceeds there by means of knowledge. Nibbāna is the excellent goal because it is the end of all strife and is the ultimate [1111] peace. Attaining that excellent goal with path-knowledge (maggā-ñāṇa) at one sitting is the Buddha’s attribute. Here the noble path is the attribute and the mind-body continuum of the five aggregates of the Buddha is the possessor of that attribute.

In both of these interpretations, proceeding to Nibbāna means having Nibbāna as an object of thought. The going or proceeding here is by means of knowledge only and does not, indeed cannot, connote the physical act of going which only applies where a certain geographical place is the destination.

3. Su = Sammā, well; gata, means gone to Nibbāna by means of path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa). Here the adverb “well” denotes freedom from the defilements. The going is well since the defilements destroyed by the four path-knowledges do not arise in the Buddha any more.

In all the above three interpretations the ultimate sense is the same, having Nibbāna as object of thought through the four paths. This is the first explanation of Well-gone (Sugato) in the brief meaning given earlier on.

4. Su = Sammā, well; gata, speaks appropriately on all occasions. Here the root gada is changed into gata. The appropriate speech, or speaking well, is further explained thus: There are six kinds of speech among people; of these six, four should be rejected, i.e., not resorted to, and only two should be adopted.

1. There is the kind of speech which is not true, which is not beneficial, and not liked by the other party; for instance, saying that a virtuous person is wicked. The Buddha avoids this kind of speech.

2. There is the kind of speech which is true but which is of no benefit to, and not acceptable to, the other party; for instance, calling a bad man a bad man, not intending to correct him but merely out of malice. The Buddha avoids this kind of speech also.

3. There is the kind of speech which is true, which is beneficial but is not liked by the other party hearing it; for instance, referring to Devadatta as the one heading for Niraya, which was spoken by the Buddha out of compassion for him. The Buddha speaks this kind of speech when occasion demands it.

4. There is the kind of speech which is not true, which is not beneficial to the other party, but is liked by him; for instance, quoting the Vedas and claiming that an evil deed such as killing will lead to the good destinations. The Buddha avoids this kind of speech also.

5. There is the kind of speech which is true but is not beneficial to the other party, and he likes to hear it; for instance, a true statement which is going to drive a wedge between the other parties. The Buddha avoids this kind of speech also.

6. There is the kind of speech which is true, which is beneficial to the other party, and he likes to hear it; for instance, discourse on generosity, morality, etc. given on appropriate occasions. The Buddha speaks this kind of speech when the occasion is appropriate.

Out of the above six kinds of speech, the Buddha speaks only the third and the sixth kinds.

Regarding the third kind above, if a statement is true and is beneficial to the other party, although he does not like to hear it, the Buddha would say it because it would benefit other people who might hear it, and it will therefore be for the good of the world at large.

Thus, if a statement is true and is beneficial to the hearer, the Buddha says it whether the hearer likes it or not. Therefore the Buddha is called Well-gone (Sugato), the one who speaks what is beneficial and true. The speaking of what is beneficial and true is the attribute, and the mind-body continuum of the five aggregates of the Buddha is the possessor of this attribute.

The Discourse about Prince Abhaya

[The following is based on the Discourse to Prince Abhaya (Abhaya-rājā-kumāra-sutta, MN 58) and its commentary.]

These six kinds of speech are featured in [1112] the Discourse to Prince Abhaya. A brief account follows: At one time, the Buddha was staying in Veḷuvana monastery at Rājagaha. During that time, Prince Abhaya, son of King Bimbisāra approached his teacher, Nigaṇṭha Nāṭaputta, and, after paying respects to him, sat in a suitable place.

Then Nigaṇṭha Nāṭaputta said to Prince Abhaya: “Go to the ascetic Gotama, prince, and accuse him with falsity in doctrine. If you can accuse him you will gain wide fame as one who can accuse even the ascetic Gotama with falsity in doctrine.”

“But, venerable sir,” said Prince Abhaya, “how am I to accuse ascetic Gotama, who is so powerful, of falsity in doctrine?”

1. “Prince, go to ascetic Gotama and say this: ‘Venerable sir, would you say something that is unacceptable or unwelcome to someone?’ And if ascetic Gotama were to reply: ‘Prince, the Realised One would say something that is unacceptable or unwelcome to someone.’ In that case, you should say to ascetic Gotama: ‘Venerable sir, if that is so, what is the difference between the venerable one and any other worldling? For any worldling would say something unacceptable or unwelcome to someone.’

2 If, on the other hand, ascetic Gotama replies: ‘Prince, the Realised One would not say something that is unacceptable or unwelcome to someone.’ In that case, you should say to ascetic Gotama: ‘Venerable sir, if that is so, why did the venerable one say to Devadatta: “You, Devadatta are heading to the lower realms of Niraya, you are going to suffer in the Niraya realms throughout an aeon, you are irredeemable?” If I may add, Ven. Devadatta is very angry and miserable at those remarks.’ Prince, if you only confront ascetic Gotama with the above questions, which allows no escape for him, that ascetic Gotama will be just helpless, like a man who has swallowed a fish-hook.”

It took Nigaṇṭha Nāṭaputta four months to think out the above questions with which to harass the Buddha. Then he taught it to his disciple, Prince Abhaya. Before the advent of the Buddha there were six religious teachers who led their own sects, claiming themselves as Buddhas. People could not discriminate truth from untruth and went, each after his or her liking, to these teachers. Only when the Buddha appeared in the world, did these adherents, who possessed previous merit, leave them in large numbers and become disciples of the Buddha.

Nigaṇṭha Nāṭaputta was sore with the thought that ascetic Gotama had won over his followers. He thought hard how to discredit the Buddha: “I must find a question to confront ascetic Gotama; a question so neat that ascetic Gotama would be caught helplessly.” He fed himself well on the offerings of daily food sent to him from his royal disciple, Prince Abhaya, and spent days thinking of a problem that would confound ascetic Gotama.

When a question came to his thought, he turned it over in his mind and found a flaw which the Buddha would easily point out. And, when he thought of another question, he would later detect a flaw there, and had to drop it. And thus he spent four hard months in thinking out really hard questions. At last, he got the question: “Would the Buddha speak something that would be unacceptable or unwelcome to someone?”

42: The Attributes of the Three Treasures – 1699

Nigaṇṭha Nāṭaputta was sure that he had found a question which ascetic Gotama would be quite at a loss to find fault in, either in its presentation or in its answer. He then thought about some suitable agent who would confront the Buddha. He remembered Prince Abhaya, whom he believed was wise. So, he taught the question to the prince and persuaded him to go and present it to the Buddha.

Prince Abhaya was a censorious person and so gladly undertook to do what his master asked. “Very well, master,” he said, and after paying respects to Nigaṇṭha Nāṭaputta, he left him. He went to the Veḷuvana monastery where the Buddha was staying, and after paying respects to the Buddha, he sat in a suitable place. Then he looked at the sun which was [1113] about to set. He thought: “It took four months for my teacher to formulate this question. If such a profound question were to be taken up point by point, there would not be sufficient time today. I will confront the Buddha tomorrow at my palace,” he thought to himself. So he said to the Buddha: “Venerable sir, may the venerable one, for the sake of my merit, kindly accept an offering of food to the venerable one and three other monastics at my palace tomorrow.”

The number of three monastics only being invited by Prince Abhaya is based on two considerations: 1) If a big company of monastics were present on the occasion of his putting the question, even though the question itself is in a few words only, there might be wide discussions by the company and other matters and other discourses might arise, in which case controversy and heated debates might occur; 2) if no monastics were invited to accompany the Buddha, people might think: “This Prince Abhaya is a stingy man. He knows the Fortunate One goes on the daily alms round accompanied by hundreds of monastics, and yet he invites only the Fortunate One.”

The Buddha accepted the invitation of Prince Abhaya by remaining silent. Prince Abhaya, having noted that his invitation was accepted, rose from his seat and, paying respects to the Buddha, returned to his palace.

The next morning the Buddha went to the palace of Prince Abhaya and took his meal there. After the meal was finished Prince Abhaya took his seat at a lower place and addressed the Buddha as taught by Nigaṇṭha Nāṭaputta thus: “Venerable sir, would the venerable one say something that is unacceptable or unwelcome to someone?” the Buddha said to Prince Abhaya: “Prince Abhaya, regarding your question, no single answer can be given in a straight yes or no.”

42: The Attributes of the Three Treasures – 1700

The Buddha, in effect, said: “A speech of this nature as described by you, may or may not be spoken by the Realised One. If by saying it, there is benefit to the other party, the Realised One would say it. If there is no benefit the Realised One would not say it.”

By this single statement the Buddha crushed the question like a mountain shattered by a thunder bolt, thus disposing of the weighty question which took four months for Nigaṇṭha Nāṭaputta to formulate.

Thereupon Prince Abhaya could no longer challenge the Buddha and said to him: “Venerable sir, by this question all the Nigaṇṭhas have gone to wreck and ruin!” – “Prince, why do you say: ‘Venerable sir, by this question all the Nigaṇṭhas have gone to wreck and ruin?’ ” Prince Abhaya then recounted the whole episode about his visit to Nigaṇṭha Nāṭaputta and the mission he was assigned by his master.

At that time, Prince Abhaya had on his lap his infant child who could only lie flat on its back.

The prince placed the baby there on purpose. Wherever dogmatic persons enter into a debate on a matter of doctrine they used to keep something handy with them, such as a fruit or a flower or a book. As the debate proceeds, and if one of the disputants is gaining his points, he would trounce the opponent relentlessly. But if the going is tougher than is expected and defeat is likely, he would pretend to be smelling the flower, or tasting the fruit, or reading the book that is in his hand, as if he was not following the trend of the arguments. Here, Prince Abhaya placed the infant on his lap for the same purpose. He thought to himself: “Ascetic Gotama is a great man who has won many a debate on doctrine. He is the one who quashes others’ doctrines. If I were to win, it is well and good. But if I should be cornered, I would pinch the baby and announce: ‘O friends, how the baby cries! Let us break the debate now and continue later.’ ”

The Buddha, being infinitely wiser than Prince Abhaya, chose to make the infant itself trounce the prince. And even before Prince Abhaya could find time to pinch the baby, the Buddha asked Prince Abhaya thus: “Prince Abhaya, what do you think of this? You may answer whatever you think fit. Suppose this infant on your lap, either due to your negligence or to the negligence of its nurse, were to put a piece of wood or a potsherd or a broken piece of a glass bottle in its mouth, what would you do to the infant?”

And Prince Abhaya answered: “Venerable sir, I would take out the piece of wood or [1114] potsherd or broken glass from the baby quickly. If there should be difficulty in taking it out at the first attempt, then I would hold the baby’s head fast with my left hand, and, with the bent forefinger of my right hand, I would dislodge the piece of wood or potsherd or broken glass from its mouth even if that operation might draw blood. I would do it because I have great love and compassion for my baby.” – “Prince Abhaya, on the same analogy, there are these six kinds of speech:

1. The Realised One does not speak that kind of speech which is not true, which is not beneficial and which is unacceptable to the other party.
2. The Realised One does not speak that kind of speech which is true but is not beneficial and which is unacceptable to the other party.
3. The Realised One would, if occasion demands, speak that kind of speech which is true, which is beneficial but which is unwelcome by the other party.
4. The Realised One does not speak that kind of speech which is not true, which is not beneficial, but which is welcome by the other party.
5. The Realised One does not speak that kind of speech which is true, which is not beneficial but which is welcome by the other party.
6. The Realised One would, if he sees benefit to the hearers, speak that kind of speech which is true, which is beneficial, and which is welcome by the other party.

Prince Abhaya, out of these six kinds of speech, the Realised One avoids four of them and speaks two of them. This is because I have great good will and compassion on all beings.”

The gist is that the Buddha speaks what is beneficial and true regardless of the person. The commentary terms the fourth kind of speech above as aṭṭhānīya-kathā, an absurdity, i.e., a speech that neither party likes, nor is it true, and it is not beneficial, but it is liked by the other party, and illustrates it with the story of a rustic old man. The story is related below for general knowledge.

The Story of a Rustic Old Man

A rustic old man was drinking in a liquor shop in town. A group of swindlers joined him and conspired between themselves to divest the old man of his possessions by trickery. They agreed among themselves: “We shall relate our experiences each in turn. Anyone who says he does not believe it will lose all his possessions to the story-teller and also become his slave.” And they said to the old man: “Grand uncle, do you agree to this proposition?” The old man replied: “So be it boys, so be it.”

Then the first town dweller at the drinking party related his story thus: “Friends, when my mother conceived me, she had a particular longing to eat wood apple. And as she had no one to pick the fruit for her she sent me to pick a wood apple. Then I who was in my mother’s womb, went to a wood apple tree. As I could not climb up the tree, I took hold of my two legs and threw them upwards into the tree as I would a wooden club. Then I went from one bough to the other and picked the wood apples. After that I found myself unable to climb down the tree and so I went back home, took a ladder and used it to get down. I gave the fruit, to my mother. They were of a size as big as a water pot.

All the wood apples were carried down the tree in my pouch fashioned from the loin cloth I was wearing. Out of my gathering of wood apples my mother ate 60 of them at one sitting till she satisfied herself with the special longing during conception. The remainder of the fruit, after my mother had eaten, were for distribution to all the villagers, both young and old. The front room of our house is sixteen cubits wide, we stored the wood apples in it after removing all furniture from there. The fruit filled the room to the roof. The surplus fruit had to be piled up outside the house and it was as high as a hillock of 80 cubits high. Now, friends, what do you say? Do you believe the story or not?” [1115]

The rustic old man remained silent. The town folks at the drinking party answered in the positive. Then they asked the old man: “Do you believe the story?” The old man replied: “Well, this is a vast country. It is believable in this vast country.”

42: The Attributes of the Three Treasures – 1703

The remaining men at the drinking party told their tall stories in turn. And then it was the old man's turn. "Now listen to my story," he said. "Not only are the houses in your town big and grand, houses in our village are also big and grand. I want you to note that our family specializes in cotton planting. We have hundreds of acres under cotton cultivation.

Amidst the vast cotton plantation, we had a particularly big cotton plant that grew to a height of 80 cubits. There were five branches in it. Of those five, four were fruitless, but the fifth one, turning to the east, bore a huge cotton pod as big as a water jar. From that pod with six compartments there bloomed forth six blossoms of cotton flower.

I shaved myself, bathed, and after applying unguent to my body, I went to the cotton field and when I saw the six big cotton blossoms from the same pod I was very pleased. I reached out to them and plucked them. Then lo and behold! In place of these six cotton blossoms there were in my hands six strong slave men. These six slave men of mine left me and ran away to other places. I have not seen them for a long time. Now only, I have found them. They are none other than the six of you. You, my boy, are Nanda my slave. And you are Poṇṇa, my slave. And you are Vaḍḍhamāna, my slave. And you are Citta, my slave. And you are Maṅgala, my slave. And you are Poṭṭhiya, my slave." Then the old men rose up suddenly and stood holding the six knots of the six men firmly in his hand.

The six town dwellers who were at the drinking party could not deny that the story was not true, for if they did, they would, under the terms of agreement, become slaves to the old man, all the same. The old man then took the six men to the court where they were officially branded as slaves and they remained so for as long as the old man lived."

This sort of nonsensical speech may be amusing but it is not true and is not beneficial. This kind of speech is never spoken by the Buddha.

Then Prince Abhaya said to the Buddha: "Venerable sir, when wise princes, wise Brahmins, wise householders and wise monastics come to you with their various questions, do you have answers thought out beforehand to fit their possible questions? Or do the answers come to mind instantly?"

The Buddha said to the Prince: “Prince Abhaya, in that case, I will put a question to you. You may answer it in any way you like. Now, what do you think of this? You are an expert in chariots, are you not?”

“That is true, venerable sir, I am an expert about the chariot and its various components.”

“Prince, what do you think of this? If anybody should ask you: ‘What is this part of the chariot called?’ Would you have the answer thought out beforehand, or would you answer it straight away instantly?”

“Venerable sir, I am reputed as an expert about chariots. I am skilful about all the components of a chariot. All the components of the chariot are clear in my mind. Therefore any question concerning a chariot is at my finger tips.”

“Prince, in much the same way, when wise princes, wise Brahmins, wise householders, and wise monastics come to me with their various questions, the answer comes to my mind instantly. This is because the Realised One is possessed of the Dhamma-element (Dhamma-dhātu), which is omniscience, the penetrating knowledge about all things knowable.”

When this was said in a wonderfully amiable manner, Prince Abhaya was deeply impressed. He begged of the Buddha to be his refuge, the Dhamma to be his refuge, the Saṅgha to be his refuge, and became a disciple of the Buddha

Later Prince Abhaya became a monastic, and taking up monastic practice ardently, he became an Arahāt with the four discriminations (paṭisambhidā), the six special apperceptions (chaḷ-abhiññā) and the knowledge of five outstanding features: penetration, facility, quickness, breath and brilliance.<sup>256</sup>

5. He knows the conditioned arising of all beings (loka-vidū).

Loka means the five aggregates that are clung to (upādānakkhandha); in another sense, the world of sentient beings (satta-loka), the world of conditioned phenomena, (saṅkhāra-loka), the world as the bases of various planes of existence (okāsa-loka). Vidu means the one who has analytical knowledge and complete comprehension.

The the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) explains loka-vidū in two ways:

1. Under the first method, loka is interpreted as the five aggregates that are clung to. These five are understood:

1. As suffering (dukkha).
2. As originating in craving (taṇhā).
3. As ceasing when Nibbāna is realized.
4. As the noble path that is the true path leading to Nibbāna, the cessation of the aggregates.

Thus loka-vidū means the Buddha has complete knowledge about the five aggregates that are clung to.

In knowing about the world of the five aggregates that are clung to, the Buddha knows not only the five aggregates but knows them in their four aspects that make his knowledge complete and perfect. The four aspects are:

1. He understands that the five aggregates that are clung to are suffering indeed (dukkha).
2. He understands the originating aspect of these five aggregates, that craving is the origin of the five aggregates.
3. He understands Nibbāna, the cessation aspect of the five aggregates.
4. He understands the way leading to cessation, the noble path.

Thus the Buddha has a complete understanding of the five aggregates that are clung to. That is why the Buddha is called loka-vidū. Under the first method, the complete all-round knowledge from the four aspects of the five aggregates of clinging is the attribute of loka-vidū. The five aggregates of the Buddha is the possessor of that attribute.

2. Although the first method of interpretation is complete about the world of the five aggregates, the method does not describe loka fully yet. Therefore, the commentary gives a second interpretation.

Under the second method, loka is taken to mean the world of sentient beings (satta-loka), the world of conditioned phenomena (saṅkhāra-loka) and the world constituting the bases for the various planes of existence (okāsa-loka).

Loka means that which rises and falls, that undergoes rise and fall. In the Abhidhamma point of view, the aggregates of living things are called the aggregates connected with the faculties (indriya-baddha-khandā). The aggregates of non-living things are called the aggregates divested of the faculties (anindriya-baddha-khandā).

1. The aggregates of living things are liable to attachment to visible objects, and so on, and hence are called satta (attached). Since these aggregates form the bases of merit or demerit that rise and fall, they are also called (loka). Thus, we have the term satta-loka (the world of attached beings).
2. The aggregates of non-living things, such as the infinite world-elements (cakka-vāḷa), the bases of sentient existence (bhūmi) and mansions, etc. are the bases where sentient beings exist, whether they are liable to get frightened as in the case of worldlings, Stream-enterers and Once-returners, or are free from fear as in the case of Non-returners and Arahats, and are called okāsa. And since these bases are the places where sentient beings rise and fall, they are called loka. Thus we have the term okāsa-loka (the world of what is possible).
3. Both the living things and non-living things are conditioned by causes and are called conditioned (saṅkhāra). The world is subject to rising and falling, and hence called loka. Thus we have the term saṅkhāra-loka (the conditioned world). This conditioned world is fully understood by the Buddha.

We shall expand on this as explained in The Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga): Eko loko sabbe sattā āhāraṭṭhitikā, “all beings have each its own conditioning factors; this is a world in itself.”<sup>257</sup> Therefore, loka here means the conditioned world (saṅkhāra-loka). This is because although reference is made to all beings, the crucial point here is the conditioned nature which is causing the rise and fall of all beings. [1117]

1. The Buddha has full knowledge about the conditioned world in that he knows it:

42: The Attributes of the Three Treasures – 1707

1. As a single factor that causes all conditioned things.
  2. As two conditioned things, mind and matter.
  3. As three conditioned things in the three kinds of sensation.
  4. As four conditioned things in the four conditional factors.
  5. As five conditioned things in the five aggregates that are clung to.
  6. As six conditioned things in the internal sense spheres.
  7. As seven conditioned things in the seven stations of consciousness.
  8. As eight conditioned things in the eight worldly conditions.
  9. As nine conditioned things in the nine bases of existence for beings.
  10. As ten conditioned things in the ten corporeal sense spheres.
  11. As twelve conditioned things in the twelve sense bases.
  12. As eighteen conditioned things in the eighteen elements.
2. Just as the Buddha has full knowledge of the conditioned world, so also he knows fully about the world of living beings in that:
1. He knows the proclivities of individuals (āsaya).
  2. He knows the latent tendencies in individuals (anusaya).
  3. He knows the habitual conduct of individuals (carita).
  4. He knows the leanings or dispositions of individuals (adhimutti).

He knows individuals who have little dust of defilements in their eye of wisdom, and he knows individuals who have a thick layer of dust of defilements in their eye of wisdom. He knows individuals who have sharp faculties such as conviction, and he knows individuals who have dull faculties. He knows individuals who have a natural desire for liberation and individuals who have little desire for liberation. He knows individuals who are endowed with righteousness such as conviction and wisdom that facilitate them to win path-knowledge, and individuals not so endowed. He knows individuals who are free from drawbacks in their previous deeds, defilements and resultants that mar the attainment of path-knowledge and individuals not so free.

1. Proclivities (āsaya).

Proclivities means the mental bent or disposition of individuals. For example, a forest deer is naturally disposed to live in the forest; he may go out to the fields to graze but his home is the forest. Similarly, individuals attend their mind to various sense objects but, after wandering about from object to object, the mind of those who are bent on faring in the round of existences remain in wrong views, whereas the mind of those who are bent on liberation from the round of existences, are pure, and remain in knowledge. So wrong views and knowledge are called proclivities (āsaya).

The proclivity of wrong views, diṭṭhi-āsaya, is again of two kinds: the proclivity towards the wrong view of annihilation (uccheda-diṭṭhi), and the proclivity towards the wrong view of eternalism (sassata-diṭṭhi).

The proclivity towards wisdom, paññā-āsaya, also is of two kinds: insight knowledge tending to path-knowledge (vipassanā-paññā-āsaya), and path-knowledge itself which is the knowledge in seeing things as they really are (yathā-bhūta-ñāṇa-āsaya).

In knowing the proclivities of individuals, the Buddha knows:

1. That this individual is bent on faring in the round of existences and has a proclivity towards the wrong view of annihilation.
2. That this individual is bent on faring in the round of existences and has a proclivity towards the wrong view of eternalism.
3. That this individual is bent on liberation from the round of existences, a pure being, and has insight knowledge.
4. That this individual is bent on liberation from the round of existences and has path-knowledge.

2. Latent tendencies (anusaya).

These are defilements that have not been eradicated by path-knowledge (maggā-ñāṇa) and are liable to arise perceptibly whenever circumstances prevail. These latent tendencies are of seven kinds. They are called the elements of latent tendencies. They are:

1. The latent tendency of passion (kāmarāgānusaya).
2. The latent tendency of attachment to existence (bhavarāgānusaya).

3. The latent tendency of hatred (paṭighānusaya).
4. The latent tendency of conceit (mānānusaya).
5. The latent tendency of wrong view (diṭṭhānusaya).
6. The latent tendency of uncertainty (vicikicchānusaya).
7. The latent tendency [1118] of ignorance (avijjānusaya).

In knowing the latent tendencies of individuals, the Buddha knows that this individual is full of the latent tendency to passion; that this individual is full of the latent tendency of attachment to existence, that this individual is full of the latent tendency of hatred ... the latent tendency of conceit ... the latent tendency of wrong views ... the latent tendency of uncertainty ... the latent tendency of ignorance.

Anusaya-kilesa, it should be noted, is of three degrees according to its tendency to occur, namely:

1. The latent tendency to defilements.
2. The defilements that have actually arisen with their three phases of arising (upāda), developing or momentary presence (ṭhīti), and dissolution (bhaṅga).
3. The defilements that have erupted into physical or verbal misconduct.

Let us illustrate this: Supposing some worldling in whom defilements have not yet been eradicated by path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa) was making an offering. Even during the meritorious act, while great wholesome thoughts (mahā-kusala-citta) are arising in his mind, if he were to meet with some pleasant sense object, this circumstance tends to bring alive sensuous thoughts, it is the latent tendency of passion in the supporter because being a worldling, he has not eradicated passion.

When further contact occurs with the sense object that is agreeable to him, that latent tendency of passion grows into decidedly defiled thoughts (pariyuṭṭhāna-kilesa). Then, if he checks himself with right attention, the thoughts defiled by passion may subside.

42: The Attributes of the Three Treasures – 1710

If, however, instead of right attention, he is driven by wrong attention, the defiled thoughts become translated into wicked acts, either bodily or verbally. This is the eruptive stage of the defilement of passion (vītikka-kilesa).

This is an example of the way the defilement of passion grows from its latent tendency or seed element to overt acts in three progressive stages. The same principle also applies to the other defilements, such as hatred, conceit, etc.

3. Habitual conduct (carita).

Habitual conduct means meritorious actions or demeritorious actions. In another sense, it refers to the six kinds of habituated action or habitual conduct that occurs frequently in the present life: greed (rāga), hatred (dosa), delusion (moha), faith (saddhā), intelligence (buddhi), and cogitation (vitakka).

The two Pāli terms carita and vāsanā should be distinguished. The vague impression of habituated acts, whether good or bad, in previous existences that persist till the present existence, is called vāsanā. Out of the six kinds of conduct described above, the one which is apt to occur for most of the time in the present existence is called carita.

The Buddha knows the habitual conduct (carita) of every individual, such as this individual is predominantly of good conduct (sucarita); this individual is predominantly of bad conduct (duccarita); this individual is predominantly of greedy conduct (rāga-carita); this individual is predominantly of hateful conduct (dosa-carita); this individual is predominantly of deluded conduct (moha-carita); this individual is predominantly of faithful conduct (saddhā-carita); this individual is predominantly of intelligent conduct (buddhi-carita); this individual is predominantly of a cogitative conduct (vitakka-carita). Further, the Buddha also knows the nature of these six types of conduct, the defiling conditions, the purifying conditions, the essential conditions, the results, and the consequences of these six types of conduct.

4. Leaning or disposition (adhimutti).

Disposition means the natural leaning of individuals. There are two kinds of disposition: the natural preference for, or leaning towards, ignoble things (hīnādhimutti), and the natural preference for, or leaning towards, noble things (paṇītādhimutti). People generally associate with persons of like nature; those of ignoble disposition associate with persons of ignoble disposition; those of noble disposition associate with persons of noble disposition.

The Buddha knows the type of disposition in every individual, such as whether a certain [1119] person is of ignoble disposition or of noble disposition.

Further, the Buddha knows the degree of disposition in each individual, such as whether it is high, or lower, or lowest. Disposition depends on the degree of faith, endeavour, mindfulness, concentration, and knowledge, which are the five faculties.

Thus the Buddha knows fully about living beings in respect of the four proclivities (āsaya), the seven latent tendencies (anusaya); the three volitions (abhisankhāra) or the six types of habitual conduct (carita), and the types and degrees of disposition (adhimutti).

3. Just as the Buddha has complete knowledge of the world of living beings, he also has complete knowledge of the world of non-living things; the places where living beings have their abodes, such as the world-elements (cakka-vāḷa), mansions, forests and mountains, etc.

[A long section included here on The Cosmos has been moved to the Further Explanations.]

In this way the Buddha has a complete knowledge of the infinite world-elements as bases for sentient existence. This complete and clear knowledge of the world of living beings, the world of conditioned phenomena and the world of non-living things is the attribute of loka-vidū. The five aggregates of the Buddha is the possessor of that attribute.

6. He is incomparable in taming those who deserve to be tamed (anuttaro purisa-damma-sārathi).

The Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) gives the explanation of anuttaro purisa-damma-sārathi in two separate ways: anuttaro explained as one attribute and damma-sārathi as another. And it also gives a combined meaning as one attribute. We shall describe both the interpretations here:

Anuttaro. The Buddha is incomparable in morality and so on, in the whole world, so that he reigns supreme in this attribute among the world of living beings. To explain this further: The Buddha reigns supreme in morality, in concentration, in wisdom, in emancipation, and in knowledge leading to emancipation. This supremacy is the attribute of anuttaro; the five aggregates of the Buddha is the possessor of that attribute.

Purisa-damma-sārathi. He who tames those who deserve to be tamed [1122] (purisa-damma), those beings deserving to be tamed; sārathi, the tamer, i.e., a skilful teacher or instructor. Those deserving to be tamed include humans, Devas and Brahmas. For example, the Buddha tamed Nāga kings: Apalāla, Cūḷodara, Mahodara, Aggisikha, Dhūmasikha, and Aravāḷa, Dhanapāla the elephant king, etc. and made them abandon their savagery and established them in the three refuges. Then the Buddha tamed Saccaka; the wandering ascetic, Nigaṇṭhaputta; Ambaṭṭha, the young man; Brahmins Pokkharasāti, Soṇadanta and Kūṭadanta, etc. He also tamed powerful Devas, such as Āḷavaka, Sūciloma, Kharaloma and even Sakka, the Lord of the Devas.

The Buddha not only tamed individuals from their savage stage into being disciples, but also uplifted those virtuous persons who had had purity of morality to attain the first absorption (jhāna), or the noble ones (ariya) who were Stream-enterers, to attain the three higher paths by showing the method of training. So his taming also includes leading already half-tamed persons to the Arahat fruition (Arahatta-phala). Therefore, purisa-damma-sārathi means establishing savage beings in the lower morality, and guiding those possessed of lower morality, i.e., those half-tamed, to attain the higher benefits leading to the Arahat fruition (Arahatta-phala). This knowledge of instructing others is the attribute of damma-sārathi. The five aggregates of the Buddha is the possessor of this attribute.

In the combined interpretation of anuttaro and purisa-damma-sārathi, only a single attribute is counted, to mean the Buddha, who is unrivalled in taming those who are untamed. To explain this: When a horse tamer trains a horse, he does not and cannot train it into the desired state in a day. He has to train it over many days repeatedly. The same holds true with other animals, such as elephants, bullocks, etc. Even when a horse is supposed to be tame it is not free from pranks. The same holds true with other animals. But the Buddha can tame a person at once in the course of one dialogue to attain the eight absorptions (jhāna) or attain the Arahat fruition. When the disciple has become an Arahat he becomes completely tamed never showing any more mad frolics. Therefore the Buddha is unrivalled in taming the untamed. The knowledge of tutoring the untutored, ignorant, persons is the attribute of anuttaro purisa-damma-sārathi; the five aggregates of the Buddha is the possessor of this attribute.

7. He is the teacher of Devas and humans (Satthā Deva-manussānaṃ).

This means the Buddha guides Devas and humans to gain for themselves the benefits at present, the benefits in the future, and the ultimate benefit of Nibbāna. The Buddha teaches, exhorts and instructs all beings to gain present benefits for some; to gain benefit in future existences, for others; and to attain the ultimate benefit of Nibbāna, for others; each according to his or her sufficiency of past merit. Therefore the knowledge in helping Devas and humans to gain present benefits, benefits in the future, and the benefit of Nibbāna is the attribute of Satthā Deva-manussānaṃ. The five aggregates of the Buddha is the possessor of this attribute.

Another explanation: the Buddha is like the master of a caravan, hence he is called Satthā Deva-manussānaṃ.

To explain it further: A wise leader of a caravan (satthā) conducts the caravan safely over a difficult and dangerous journey. There are five kinds of difficult and dangerous journeys:

1. A journey notorious for highway robbers.
2. A journey through wild country where ferocious beasts, such as lions or tigers, roam.
3. A barren stretch of land where food resources are not available.
4. A journey over parched country with no water resources.
5. A journey passing through a country infested with Yakkhas.

Just as a good leader of a caravan safely conducts the caravan through the above five kinds of hazardous journey, so also the Buddha gives protection to the wayfarers of the journey of life against the hazards of the journey marked by rebirth, ageing, disease and death, grief, lamentation, pain, sorrow and anguish, lust, hatred, delusion, conceit, wrong view and demeritorious deeds, and conducts them to the safety of Nibbāna. Therefore, the doctrine of the Buddha which leads beings to Nibbāna is the attribute of Satthā Deva-manussānaṃ; the [1123] five aggregates of the Buddha is the possessor of this attribute.

42: The Attributes of the Three Treasures – 1714

The attribute Satthā Deva-manussānaṃ should not be taken to mean to cover Devas and humans only. The term Deva-manussānaṃ is used to give prominence to beings of the fortunate existences and who are fit to become liberated. However, the Buddha also gives appropriate guidance and counsel to animals so that they also benefit from it and are thereby equipped with sufficing conditions to attain the paths and fruitions in their next existence or in their third existence. The commentary gives the example of Maṇḍūka Devaputta which is related below.

Maṇḍūka Devaputta

At one time, the Buddha was staying at a monastery close to Gaggarā Lake, near the city of Campā, which served as his place for collecting daily alms food. One morning, on his usual Buddha routine of entering the absorption of compassion, he saw that, if he held a discourse in the evening, a frog would come, and being absorbed in the sound of the Dhamma speech, it would be killed accidentally, and be reborn in the Deva realm. And that Deva would come to him, accompanied by his big retinue which would be seen by the large audience who would gain knowledge of the four truths and so make an end of suffering.

After having this foreknowledge through his absorption of compassion, the Buddha went into the city of Campā for alms round in the morning. When the morning meal was finished, he went to the monastery, received the homage paid by the monastics, and went into seclusion in his scented chamber, spending the day in the bliss of the absorption of the Arahat fruition.

In the evening, when the four kinds of assembly were gathered at the lecture hall near Gaggarā Lake, the Buddha came out of his scented chamber, took his seat in the lecture hall, and delivered a discourse. At that time, a frog came out from the lake, listened to the voice of the Buddha, and knowing that “this is the voice of the Dhamma,” was absorbed in it.

Although animals do not have the capacity to understand the meaning of the discourse, at least they can know the voice as one of Dhamma or righteousness or as one of wrongness, as the case may be.

Then a cowherd came upon the scene and being deeply impressed by the Buddha’s splendour in delivering the discourse and the deep silence in which the audience were listening to the discourse, he stood there leaning on his staff in hand. He did not notice that there was a frog on whose head his staff was resting.

42: The Attributes of the Three Treasures – 1715

The frog died on the spot, even while it was absorbed in the sweet voice of the Dhamma. As it died in full consciousness of the clear conviction in the goodness of the Dhamma, it was reborn in the Tāvātimsa Realm, with a golden mansion twelve leagues wide as his residence, waited upon by a large retinue of Devakaññā, or Divine Maidens.

Then he pondered on his new state: “How have I got into this Deva existence? I was just a frog in my previous existence. What merit sent me, a mere animal, to this high state?” And he saw no other merit than his getting absorbed in the voice of the Buddha’s discourse which was the voice of the Dhamma.

Then he went to the Buddha, while himself staying in his mansion, in the company of the divine maidens. He and his divine maidens descended from the mansion in full view of the human audience and stood before the Buddha in worshipping attitude.

The Buddha knew the Deva, who was the frog which was stamped to death just a moment ago. Still, to let the audience realize the workings of productive deeds (kamma), as well as to show the abnormal psychic power of the Buddha in seeing the past existences of all beings, he spoke to the Deva in the following verse:

“Surrounded by a large retinue, shedding resplendent light all around with such powerful possession of a personal aura, who is it that pays homage to me?”

And the Deva who, just a moment ago, had been a frog replied: [1124]

“Venerable sir, in my previous existence, I had been a frog, born and brought up in the water. Even while I was absorbed in your voice teaching Dhamma, a cowherd caused my death with his staff.

Venerable sir, just at the instant of my death, due to the serenity of my mind in listening to the Fortunate One’s voice, I was reborn a Deva. And now, venerable sir, see my glorious state, replete with retinue, my personal appearance and everything, and, above all, my effulgence that reaches twelve leagues!

Gotama, may those, who have for a long time listened to the Dhamma taught by you, attain the Peace of Nibbāna through path-knowledge and become free from all sorrow.”

Then the Buddha delivered the discourse in detail, suited to the audience, by judging their past merits that would serve as sufficing conditions for Awakening. By the end of the discourse, 84,000 beings comprehended the four truths and made an end of suffering. The Deva who had been a frog attained Stream-entry. He made obeisance to the Buddha, turned round with the Buddha on his right, and also worshipping the Saṅgha, returned to the Deva realm in the company of his large retinue of Devakaññā.

8. He is the Awakened One (Buddha).

He is called the Buddha because he knows fully all knowable things. In another sense, he is the knower of the truths and also makes the four truths known to beings fit to know them. Hence, he is called the Buddha.

The distinction between the second attribute of Sammā-sambuddha and the eighth attribute of Buddha lies in that the former refers to the four truths, while the latter refers to the omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa). If, however, the attribute Buddha is taken as supreme knowledge as the same for Sammā-sambuddha, then the former relates to the penetrative knowledge (paṭivedha-ñāṇa) of the Buddha's wisdom while the latter relates to the skilful aspect of the Buddha's wisdom in enlightening others (desanā-ñāṇa).

9. He is endowed with the six exalted qualities (Bhagavā).

This attribute of the Buddha is explained in a variety of ways in the Long Exposition (Mahā-niddesa). The commentary also explains it in six different ways, while the sub-commentary to the Path to Purification (Visuddhi-magga) gives seven different interpretations. Here we shall discuss the first method of explanation in the Pāḷi which is also the third method of explanation in the commentary. This is the meaning generally given by Myanmar translators in their close literal renderings of the word, i.e., “He who is endowed with six exalted qualities,” bhaga, the six exalted qualities; vanta, being possessed of.

The Buddha is called the Fortunate One (Bhagavā) because he is endowed with the six exalted qualities unattainable by the disciples namely: 1) Supremacy (issariya); 2) the 9 supermundane attainments (Dhamma); 3) fame (yasa); 4) glory (sirī); 5) accomplishment (kāma) and 6) diligence (payatta).

1. Supremacy (issariya).

It means the innate power of the Buddha to bend things to his will. Supremacy is of two kinds, supermundane will power (lokuttara-cittissariya) and mundane will power (loka-cittissariya).

As regards supermundane will power, the Buddha has unsurpassed will power. In [1125] displaying the twin miracle, to get a stream of water from the desired part of his body, he enters into the preliminary absorption of the water meditation object (āpo-kasiṇa) and then makes the resolve: “May there be a stream of water,” which is a separate impulsion thought process (adhiṭṭhāna-vīthi). Then he enters into the preliminary absorption of the water meditation object again. Then the special impulsion thought-process (abhiññāna-vīthi) arises that causes the stream of water to appear from whatever part of his body as he has willed it.

Thus, to effect a stream of water from the desired part of his body, the Buddha has to go through four different thought-processes. Likewise, to get a stream of fire glow from the desired part of his body, the Buddha enters into the preliminary absorption of the fire meditation object (tejo-kasiṇa) and then makes the resolve: “May there be a stream of fire,” which is a separate impulsion thought-process. Then he enters into the preliminary absorption of the fire meditation object again. Then the special impulsion thought-process arises that causes the stream of fire to appear from whatever part of his body he has willed it.

Briefly speaking, to get a stream of water to flow from the body, the Buddha has to go through four separate thought-processes. The same is required to get a stream of fire to burn from the body. The mastery of the Buddha’s will power is such that in going through the thought-process in entering into the preliminary absorptions he can bring to a stop the thought-process in any number of thought-moments he chooses. The life continuum thought-moments (bhavaṅga-citta) that have to intervene between the separate thought-processes are also limited to two.<sup>258</sup> The mastery in arranging the separate thought-processes and the life continuum thought-moments as desired are the astonishing features of the

<sup>258</sup> Compare this to the case with the disciples who would need as many life-continuum thought-moments as they feel necessary.

Buddha's accomplishment in will power. This is the power in controlling mundane absorption (jhāna).

Likewise, in supermundane consciousness of the Arahāt fruition, the Buddha has unsurpassed power of will. Due to this power, he enters into the absorption of the Arahāt fruition at such little odd moments when he takes a pause between making a point in his discourse and going on to the next, during which the audience would be saying: Well done! As a matter of fact, there is not the shortest of odd moments when the Buddha does not dwell in the absorption of the Arahāt fruition.<sup>259</sup> This is how the Buddha has amazing control of will power in supermundane consciousness.

Eight Mundane Features of the Buddha's Willpower

In the teaching, eight mundane features of the Buddha's willpower are generally cited. The eight are briefly described below:

1. The Buddha can transform himself as small as small can be, even to an atomic size (animā). This was the power he employed in taming Brahma Baka, where assuming the power of invisibility which was the bet between them.
2. He can transform himself as big as big can be, (mahimā) even making himself taller than Mount Sineru, and up to any conceivable size that might cover up the entire world-element, and still appear proportionate and glorious. This was the power he employed to impress the Lord of the Asuras who had previously thought he might have to look down on the Buddha because of his own enormous size.
3. He can levitate at will and travel in the air (laghimā) due to this power which causes lightness of the body comparable to his lightness of the mind.
4. He can travel to any far away place at will (patti). Ordinary people lacking in this power cannot travel bodily to far-off places as fast as their mind can travel. The Buddha can travel even to the Deva realms and Brahma realms bodily in an instant.

5. He can accomplish anything that he wishes (pākamma). In the eight assemblies he resolved to appear as one of their kind, i.e., among Devas in the Deva realm he appears as a Deva, and so on. In teaching the doctrine to the inhabitants of the other world-elements, he assumes the form, the voice, etc. of one of the kings of those places.<sup>260</sup> [1126]
6. Dominating the will of others (īsitā). All the Buddha-routine is accomplished through this power; all beings have to fulfil the wishes of the Buddha.
7. Mastery of psychic powers and absorptions (vasitā). This is the power used to tame very powerful and arrogant individuals such as the Uruvelā Nāga, overpowering their powers in every respect, such as emitting fire, vapour, etc.
8. He has complete control over the absorptions and in displaying miracles and is able to terminate them as he wills (yatthakāmāvasāyitā). It is this power which accomplishes the twin miracle of fire and water emerging out of the various parts of his body, with fire glowing from the upper part of the body while water flows from the lower part of the body, and then suddenly even when the audience is watching in awe, making fire glowing from the lower part of the body while water flows from the upper part of the body, etc.

The above eight powers of the will in mundane consciousness are included in the knowledge by which supernormal powers are accomplished (iddhi-vidha-abhiññā). The Buddha stands unrivalled in this knowledge.

These eight mundane powers and the mastery in mundane willpower and supermundane willpower mentioned above together are called the first of the six exalted qualities, i.e., supremacy (issariya).

O Fortunate One! Your Arahāt fruition (Arahatta-phala) consciousness is marked by the mastery of supermundane will-power, as well as the eight forms of mastery of mundane will-power, such as in turning yourself into an infinitesimal form. O Fortunate One! May this be my humble adoration to you!

2. Knowledge of the Nine Supramundane Factors (Dhamma).

This glorious quality is the knowledge of the Buddha in his unique attainment of the nine factors of the supermundane sphere: the four paths, the four fruitions and Nibbāna that destroy all defilements so completely that no faint suggestion of their presence due to past habits remains. The meaning is obvious.

Verse in adoration of the exalted quality of Dhamma:

O Steadfast One! You are imbued with the four noble paths, the four noble fruitions, and Nibbāna that destroy all the defilements, leaving not the faintest trace. O Glorious font of the Dhamma! May this be my humble adoration to you!

3. Fame and Followers (yasa).

The glorious reputation surrounding the Buddha is no empty boast, but it is true to its every detail, and well deserved. In that sense the Buddha's reputation is pure, unadulterated and unexaggerated. There are certain personages of wide repute, deserving of them but their repute does not reach the three worlds, the human world, the Deva realm and the Brahma realm.

The reputation attributed to the Buddha is such that the achievers of non-material absorptions (arūpa-jhāna) can remain in the non-material Brahma world (arūpa-brahma) and contemplate on the nine supreme attributes of the Buddha. Since the Buddha's fame reaches even the non-material Brahma world, it hardly needs saying that this fame spreads in the form realm and the sensuous sphere as well.

O Steadfast One! [1127] You are attributed with glorious fame spreading over the three worlds, purely deserved by you. O paragon of personal repute! May this be my humble adoration to you.

4. Splendour of Physical Perfection (sirī).

The Buddha's glorious quality of physical perfection was such that all humans, Devas and Brahmas could never satisfy themselves in gazing at his superb appearance, for he was endowed with the 32 marks of the Great Man, as well as with the 80 lesser characteristics. Those who went to see the Buddha had to leave only because the proper time to stay before his presence had run out but they were not content with feasting their eyes on the sheer majesty of the person of the Buddha.

O Resplendent One! You are endowed with physical excellence in every aspect. That makes you the cynosure of all humans, Devas and Brahmas.
O fairest of all men! May this be my humble adoration to you!

5. Accomplishment (kāma).

The Buddha accomplishes all he sets out to accomplish and the steadfast purpose, the steady effort underlying this power of accomplishment, is called kāma. Since as Bodhisatta Sumedhā, he received the assurance of being a Bodhisatta from Buddha Dīpaṅkara, he had set his mind on leading humanity to liberation: “May I become enlightened and may I be able to lead the multitudes to Awakening (Buddho bodheyyaṃ). May I attain liberation from the round of rebirth, and may I be able to lead the multitudes to liberation (mutto moceyyaṃ). May I cross over to the shore of safety and may I be able to ferry across the multitudes to the shore of safety (tiṇṇo tāreyyaṃ).”

That earnest desire, that steadfast purpose, had never waned in the Buddha. It was that purposefulness that led him to attain perfect Awakening through path and fruit, thus fulfilling his earnest desire. He had thus gained Awakening, had gained liberation from the round of rebirth, and had crossed over to the safe shore that is Nibbāna.

There are some people who may have earlier desired for the good and welfare of oneself as well as of others. But once their welfare is fulfilled, they are apt to forget about others' welfare, or are unable to carry out their set purpose concerning others. The Buddha attaining Buddhahood was reinforced by the path-knowledge in devoting himself to his original task of helping others. This zeal was the principal cause of his accomplishment in making the multitudes see the four truths, enabling them to cross over to the safe shore of Nibbāna. Therefore the steadfast wish (adhigama-chanda) that was responsible for the glorious accomplishment of the Buddha's mission both for himself and for others, is kāma.

O Steadfast One! You have long wished for the good of yourself as well as of others. That earnest wish has found fulfilment now. [1128] O Achieving One! May this be my humble adoration to you!

6. Diligence (payatta).

Diligence means having an unrivalled diligence. His untiring zeal in keeping up the fivefold Buddha routine earned him the love and esteem of the whole world. The right effort (sammā vayana) that entitles him to the warm regard of the whole living world is the glorious quality of diligence (payatta).

The fivefold Buddha routine:

1. Early morning routine: Going on alms round, acceptance of meals by supporters, giving discourses of appreciation to supporters.
2. After meal routine: Advice to Saṅgha, meditation practice suitable for each monastic, short rest, survey of the world to find sentient beings ready for liberation, discourse to laity in the afternoon.
3. First watch of the night: Bathing, slight rest, giving a discourse to the Saṅgha.
4. Middle watch of the night: Giving a discourse to Devas, Brahmas.
5. Last watch of the night: Walking exercise, sleep for four hours from 10pm to 2am, survey of the world of sentient beings ready for liberation.

O Diligent One! You possessed right effort, that steadfastness which won the highest esteem by the whole world. O steadfast One! May this be my humble adoration to you!

The Buddha's Attributes in a Nutshell

The attributes of the Buddha are infinite. Out of them, the nine supreme attributes are mentioned in the scriptures for easy understanding and memorizing by humans, Devas and Brahmas.

All of the Buddha's glorious attributes can be put into two main categories:

1. The attributes that proclaim the accomplishment of the Buddha by himself (atta-hita-sampatti).
2. The attributes that stand testimony to the Buddha's service to the general weal of the multitudes (para-hita-paṭipatti).

In the first category there are two aspects,

1. The success the Buddha achieves in overcoming the defiling tendencies.

42: The Attributes of the Three Treasures – 1723

2. The endowment of a variety of knowledges.

The innate powers of the Buddha that he is invested with flow from these two sources.

In the second category of the Buddha's attributes too, there are two aspects:

1. The severity of effort in teaching the Dhamma to the multitudes purely out of compassion, untinged with any expectation of gain or fame.
2. The infinite patience in wishing well even to persons antagonistic to him and in awaiting the ripeness of time on the part of the hearers to comprehend his teaching.

The Buddha's acceptance of offerings of the four monastic requisites is another form of doing useful service to the supporters who thereby gain great merit. Thus the nine attributes such as being Worthy (Araham), are taught to signify the two above aspects of his own accomplishments and his service for the welfare of others.

The nine supreme attributes are read into the above two aspects in the following way: Being Worthy (Araham) clearly describes the Buddha's success in getting rid of all defilements.

Being perfectly Self-Awakened (Sammā-sambuddho) and knowing the conditioned arising of all beings (loka-vidū) clearly describe the Buddha's endowment of a variety of knowledges.

Here, it might be asked: "Does knowing the conditioned arising of all beings also not stand for Perfect Self-Awakening?" The answer is: "Yes, it does." However, there is this distinction: Being perfectly Self-Awakened stands for the efficacy of Perfect [1129] Self-Awakening while knowing the conditioned arising of all beings signifies the efficacy of the Buddha's discriminating knowledge about the mental framework of his hearers, such as tendencies, etc. Hence two different attributes are proclaimed.

Being endowed with the three knowledges (vijjā-carāṇa-sampanno) completely conveys the comprehensive accomplishment of the Buddha by himself.

Being Well-gone (Sugato) proclaims both the Buddha's accomplishment by himself and the achievement in working for the welfare of others, together with the underlying cause of both.

42: The Attributes of the Three Treasures – 1724

Being incomparable in taming those who deserve to be tamed (anuttaro purisa-damma-sārathi) and being the teacher of Devas and humans (Satthā Deva-manussānam) clearly demonstrate the Buddha's achievement in bringing welfare to others.

Being the Awakened One (Buddho) brings out the meaning of accomplishment by himself as well as accomplishment for the good of others.

After mentioning being perfectly Self-Awakened (Sammā-sambuddho), the Buddha further proclaims being the Awakened One (Buddho) because the former indicates his penetrative knowledge whereas the latter conveys his knowledge in imparting knowledge.

Being endowed with the six exalted qualities (Bhagavā) highlights both the Buddha's accomplishment for himself and the success in bringing the welfare of others.

Considered in another light, the supreme attributes of the Buddha fall under three categories, namely:

1. Attributes that are root causes (hetu).
2. Attributes that are results (phala).
3. Attributes that bring welfare to others (sattūpakāra).

These three may be called success in root cause, success in result and success in the welfare of the world.

Four attributes, viz. Worthiness (Arahāṃ), perfectly Self-Awakened (Sammā-sambuddho), endowed with the three knowledges (vijjā-carāṇa-sampanno), and knowing the conditioned arising of all beings (loka-vidū), portray the root causes of attributes that the Buddha is endowed with.

Being incomparable in taming those who deserve to be tamed (Anuttaro purisa-damma-sārathi) and being the teacher of Devas and humans (Satthā Deva-manussānam) clearly describe the Buddha's success in working for the good of others.

Being the Awakened One (Buddho) clearly points out the Buddha's endowment of happy root cause as well as accomplishment for the good of others.

Being Well-gone (Sugato) and being endowed with the six exalted qualities (Bhagavā) reveal the endowment of the three kinds of success, i.e., in root cause, in result and in the welfare of the world.<sup>261</sup>

Contemplation of the Buddha

Devotees should recite these verses at a speed neither too slowly nor too fast, reflecting on its meaning. One who reflects on the attributes of the Buddha, while doing so, prevents the arising of thoughts of lust, hatred and delusion, besides gaining concentration which clears the mind of lethargy and distraction, and rendering it possible for a righteous thought-process to arise through equanimity.

When the concentration gets stronger through this meditation practice, the hindrances (nīvaraṇa) fall off, and defilements are quelled and consequently, the five faculties beginning with faith (saddhā) become very pure and effective. The repeated reflection on the Buddha sharpens initial application of the mind (vitakka) and sustained application of the mind (vicāra). When these two factors are functioning well, delightful satisfaction (pīti) arises. Due to the delightful satisfaction, serenity of mental concomitants and serenity of mind arise, as the result of which physical and mental uneasiness, which are defilements associated with subtle forms of distraction, are quelled. When there is serenity of mind and serenity of mental concomitants, happiness that causes the arising of concentration becomes pronounced. The thought-process being enriched by happiness is firmly fixed on the object of meditation.

Thus the factors involved in meditation, beginning from initial application of the mind, become more and more efficient stage by stage. The mind is neither retarded nor distracted so that the medium attitude of mental exercise or equanimity is maintained and the five [1130] faculties such as faith are functioning in a balanced way. Now, the five factors of absorption (jhāna): initial application of the mind, sustained application of the mind, delightful satisfaction, happiness and one-pointedness of mind, arise simultaneously at every thought moment with the great meritorious consciousness (mahā-kusala-citta) of the contemplation on the Buddha which is mental cultivation pertaining to the sensuous sphere (kāmāvacara-bhāvanā). Thus, neighbourhood concentration or access concentration (upacāra-jhāna) is achieved. When this concentration arises together with the great meritorious consciousness of the contemplation of the Buddha, which is mental cultivation pertaining to the sensuous sphere, the meditator is called one who has achieved access concentration based on the contemplation of the Buddha.

Contemplation of the Buddha can, at best, reach the level of threshold or neighbourhood concentration (upacāra-jhāna) pertaining to the sensuous sphere only, and not fixed or full absorption (appanā-rūpāvacara-jhāna). Why is it so? It is because the attributes of the Buddha are ultimate phenomena and are too profound to be fully concentrated on up to the full absorption stage. It is like a vessel that cannot remain stable on very deep waters.

It might then be asked: “In contemplating the attributes of the Buddha, the names of the ultimate qualities of the nine attributes, such as Worthiness (Araham), etc. are still made objects of contemplation. Why are these names said to be ultimate qualities?” The answer is, again, that the attributes of the Buddha are so profound that, although at the initial stage of meditation, these names, such as Worthiness, are made as objects of meditation, when concentration is developed the mind passes on from mere names to ultimate reality.

Again, one might further ask: “Are not some ultimate qualities such as the first non-material consciousness (paṭhamārūpa-viññāṇa) used as an object of meditation and full absorption (appanā-jhāna), such as the second non-material absorption, achieved thereby?” That is true, but that is a case of a single object of meditation. The attributes of the Buddha are not a single object. They are a complex variety. So the comparison is not valid.

It may then be questioned: “A yogi contemplating on the 32 aspects or parts of the body, although starting with a number of them, after concentration becomes developed, fixes his mind on a single aspect or part only and achieves the first fine-material absorption (jhāna). Then why is the same process not true in the case of the contemplation of the Buddha?” This is not an appropriate analogy. For, although there are as many as 32 aspects or parts of the body, all of them have a single reality, which is loathsomeness, which truly becomes the object of meditation leading to the achievement of full absorption (appanā-jhāna). In the case of the attributes of the Buddha, they are replete with meaning in a variety of ways, and hence achievable concentration belongs only to the sensuous sphere, and only up to access (upacāra-jhāna) stage.

“Why not concentrate on only one of the nine attributes then?” The answer is: When concentration becomes developed, the attributes of the Buddha are comprehended by the yogi so that he cannot fix his mind on only one of them because his faith grows so much as to know no bounds.

Benefits of Contemplation of the Buddha

A virtuous one, who repeatedly contemplates the attributes of the Buddha, has exceptional esteem of him which is comparable to the noble ones’ devotion to him. Repeated recollection of the Buddha develops his mind such that he has a stable mindfulness. The profundity of the Buddha’s attributes, on which his mind is trained, makes him a person of profound wisdom. The nine attributes in themselves are the fertile field for sowing merit, therefore constant recollection of them is highly meritorious.

Reflection on the Buddha is a mental exercise conducive to delightful satisfaction (pīti), one of the Seven Factors of Awakening. The yogi becomes possessed of much delightful satisfaction, first of the feeble kind but, later, of an ecstatic kind. The mindfulness that dwells on the attributes of the Buddha overcomes fear, therefore the yogi becomes indifferent to fear and dread, great or small. Since this mental exercise has the nature of [1131] warding off physical pain, the yogi acquires a kind of tolerance to pain. He also feels that he is together with the Buddha. The body of one, whose mind is absorbed in the thoughts of the Buddha, is like a shrine containing the Buddha so that it becomes worthy of adoration. His mind is always inclined to Supreme Awakening.

The yogi’s mind is constantly reminded of the attributes of the Buddha with the result that any evil thought that might arise is driven away before any evil word or deed is committed, as if being shameful to do it, and being abhorrent to do it in the presence of the Buddha. Contemplation of the Buddha is a basis for gaining path and fruit. If the yogi does not gain path and fruit in this existence for want of sufficient past merit, he is reborn in the fortunate existences.

These are the benefits of contemplating the Buddha as explained in The Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga). For greater details the reader may refer to the Traditions about the Elder Monk Subhūti (Subhūtitthera-apadāna, Tha-ap 23).

The Six Supreme Attributes of the Dhamma

*Svākkhāto Bhagavatā Dhammo, sandiṭṭhiko akāliko,
ehiṇṇasiko opaneyyiko,
paccattam veditabbo viññūhi.*

The Dhamma has been well-proclaimed by the Fortunate One, is visible, not subject to time, inviting inspection, onward-leading, and can be understood by the wise for themselves.

1. The Dhamma, consisting of the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna and the doctrine (pariyatti) is well-proclaimed (svākkhāto) because:

1. It is excellent in the beginning, excellent in the middle and excellent at the end, in the utterance of each word in strict accordance with the six rules of grammar and ten rules of articulation of the Magadhan language.
2. And because it shows the middle way, avoiding the two extremes, and because it quells the fires of defilements and completely extinguishes them.
3. Because it explains the nature of permanence, stability, pacification and deathlessness.

2. The Dhamma, i.e., the four paths, the four fruitions and Nibbāna, is visible (sandiṭṭhiko) because it is practiced and realized by the noble ones (ariya) who have thus exhausted the defilements; and also because it is the instant destroyer of defilements, it wins the laurels of victory.

3. The Dhamma, the nine supermundane factors, is not subject to time (akāliko) because it comes to fruition immediately, in that the fruition (phala) of the path (magga) is attainable without a moment's delay.

4. The Dhamma is inviting inspection (ehiṇṇasiko) because it is clearly visible like the majestic moon in a clear sky, free of mist, smoke, cloud, etc., or like the Manohara gem that is found on Mount Vepulla, inviting all to come and see for themselves.

5. The Dhamma is onward-leading (opaneyyiko) because the four paths serve as the raft for crossing over to the safety of Nibbāna, while the fruitions (phala) and Nibbāna bestow upon the noble ones (ariya) the realization of a safe haven.

6. The Dhamma can be understood for themselves (paccattam veditabbo) because it must be realized, through individual effort, by the wise (vinnū).

Explanation of the Above Attributes

1. Well-proclaimed (svākkhāto).

In well-proclaimed (svākkhāto), Dhamma refers to the doctrine (pariyatti), the four paths, the four fruitions (phala) and Nibbāna. That is, the doctrine and the nine supermundane factors.

The doctrine (pariyatti) is excellent in the beginning, excellent in the middle and excellent at the end, because it is perfect in meaning and in words and because it proclaims the threefold training and the noble path (magga), as the pure and complete way of practice.

The doctrine (pariyatti) is perfect because even within a single verse, its first line is perfect, and therefore perfect in the beginning; its second and third lines are perfect and therefore perfect in the middle; its fourth line is perfect and therefore perfect at the end.

In a discourse, it has an introduction that makes it perfect in the beginning. It has a conclusion that makes it perfect at the end. And the middle portion, with its logical connections between various points, makes it perfect in the middle.

In a discourse consisting of a [1132] number of connected thoughts, the first connection of logical relationships is perfection in the beginning. The last connection of logical relationship is perfection at the end. The remaining logical relationships are perfection in the middle.

In another way: In the Discourse and Discipline Collections, all of the discourses mention the place where the event took place, for instance Sāvattthī, Rājagaha, etc. which is perfection in the beginning. The compatibility of the discourse with the natural bent of the hearers on that particular occasion, the incontrovertible truth contained in the meaning of the discourse, the substance, and the illustrations make the middle perfect. The benefit gained by the audience through their faith and conviction, the proper conclusion of theme, make the end perfect.

In brief, the whole of the doctrine (pariyatti-dhamma), comprising the Three Baskets (Tipiṭaka), essentially proclaim morality, concentration and insight-wisdom; the paths, fruitions (magga-phala) and Nibbāna. They pronounce the true Buddha, the true Dhamma and the true Saṅgha. They clearly prescribe the noble and correct practice that leads to Buddhahood, or Perfect Self-Awakening, the Awakening of a Paccekabuddha and the Awakening of a disciple (sāvaka). Thus, the Three Baskets have intrinsic excellence in the beginning in morality; intrinsic excellence of the middle in concentration and insight-wisdom; and intrinsic excellence at the end in Nibbāna. Or taken in another light, they are excellent in the beginning through morality and concentration; excellent in the middle through insight wisdom, and the paths (magga); and excellent at the end through the fruitions (phala) and Nibbāna.

Or, put it in another way, they are excellent in the beginning by declaring the true Buddha, excellent in the middle by declaring the true Dhamma, and excellent at the end by declaring the true Saṅgha. Again, anyone, who takes up the practice as shown in the doctrine (pariyatti-dhamma) or the Three Baskets can attain any of the three classes of Awakening, and are therefore excellent in the beginning through Perfect Self-Awakening; excellent in the middle through becoming a Paccekabuddha and excellent at the end through Awakening as a disciple.

The Buddha's doctrine requires his disciples to take two steps: The first step is for them to listen attentively with a certain faith, and the second is to take up the practice of the Dhamma. When the above steps are taken in order and the proper practise is done, a disciple attains the Arahat fruition. Therefore, in listening to the doctrine, if you have the ultimate objective of the Arahat fruition, you gain the knowledge of what has been heard (suta-maya-ñāṇa), the repeated arising of which can put away the hindrances of the mind. Hence paying good attention to the doctrine is excellent in the beginning. If you take up the practice of the Dhamma after repeatedly listening to it, you get the calm and happiness that comes with concentration (samatha-sukha), and then if pursued correctly, you gain insight into phenomena which gives you peace and satisfaction (vipassanā-sukha). Thus the practice of the Dhamma is excellent in the middle. Since proper practice leads to the Arahant fruition, the result of the practice is excellent at the end. In this way is the doctrine (pariyatti) excellent in the beginning, in the middle and at the end, and therefore it is truly acclaimed as well-proclaimed (svākkhāto).

The Buddha's doctrine (pariyatti) clearly marks out two modes of the practice, the practice conforming to the teaching (sāsana-brahma-cariya), and the noble practice of the path (magga-brahma-cariya). Of those two, the first refers ordinarily to the threefold training and kindred teachings while the second refers to the very essence of the threefold training and the successful measure of the threefold training: the noble path (ariya-magga). In teaching these two modes of the practice, the Buddha defined the noble practice in terms of the deepest significance in meaning. For instance, if a religious teacher were to give emphasis on such mundane words as gruel, rice, or men or women, these terms do not have any intrinsic value that can lead to the ending of the suffering of the round of existence. So such words do not carry any significant meaning from a truly religious point of view. The Buddha rejects giving emphasis on these mundane terms but expounds the four foundations of steadfast mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna), the four earnest endeavours (sammappadhāna), etc. in detail which have the effect of gaining release from the round of [1133] existences. Thus, the doctrine (pariyatti) defines the noble practice in these significant absolute terms, replete with profound meaning.

[A section here on the rules of pronunciation has been moved to the Further Explanations.]

The doctrine expounded by the Buddha is perfect because it contains the five qualities: morality, concentration, wisdom, emancipation and insight leading to emancipation so that there is no essential thing or no other element to add to it.

Again, the doctrine expounded by the Buddha is perfect in the sense that there is nothing that is harmful and is to be discarded, for it has no trace of the defiling things such as wrong views or conceit, but is purely productive of liberation from the suffering round of existences. In another sense, there is no flaw whatsoever in this doctrine, since it is not something that is delivered to anyone with an eye on material gain or for fame and applause. Therefore, it is pure in all aspects.

Thus the doctrine taught by the Buddha is truly well expounded (svākkhāta) because of its perfection in meaning, in words and phrases, and by its very nature it is perfectly pure, laying down the practice of purity in its twofold modes. [1134]

Taken in yet another light, the doctrine taught by the Buddha is well-expounded because it does not deviate from what is claimed for it. Consider this: Holders of doctrines other than the Buddha's, preach about impediments which are not truly impediments, and their words about emancipation are not productive of emancipation. Hence, their doctrines deviate from what is claimed for it, and are therefore not well-expounded, but ill-expounded.

The veracity of the Buddha's doctrine is never called in question. What the Buddha declares as impediments to the attainment of absorption (jhāna), paths (magga), fruitions (phala) and Nibbāna are truly impediments. What the Buddha declares as factors conducive to emancipation are truly so. Nowhere does the doctrine deviate from its avowed claims. That is why the doctrine is truly well-expounded (svākkhāto).

The above two interpretations of the attribute of well-expounded is all the more remarkable when they are seen in association with the four kinds of perfect self-confidence of the Buddha (catu-vesārajja-ñāṇa). The commentaries usually relate well-expounded to these four factors or knowledges. The four are given below.

The Four Kinds of Perfect Self-Confidence

1. The Buddha made his bold declaration that: "I am the Supremely Awakened Buddha endowed with All-knowing Wisdom," and truly he possesses All-knowing Wisdom.
2. He made his bold declaration that: "I am an Arahant who has destroyed all the defilements," and truly is he an Arahant.
3. He boldly declared with his All-knowing Wisdom that: "Such and such factors are impediments that do not lead to good destinations, to the absorptions (jhāna), paths (magga) and fruitions (phala)," and truly those factors are impediments.

4. He boldly declared with his All-knowing Wisdom that: “Such and such factors are those that lead to emancipation from the suffering round of existences,” and truly are those factors productive of emancipation.

1. That being so, there is no one who can challenge the Buddha on good grounds saying: “You claim to be omniscient, but you do not know such and such a thing.” And there is indeed not a single thing that the Buddha does not know, that would provide good grounds for anyone to make such a challenge. Knowing himself thus unassailable, the Buddha has perfect self-confidence that his attainment of Perfect Awakening is truly perfect; and this self-confidence gives him great delightful satisfaction coupled with the reviewing knowledge of his own attainment. This is the first kind of perfect self-confidence dependent on his successful knowledge.

2. Likewise, there is no one who can question the Buddha’s claim about purity. No one can challenge him, on good grounds saying: “You claim to be completely pure, yet you still have such and such an impurity or defilement.” For there is indeed no defilement that the Buddha has not rid himself of that would provide good reasons for anyone to make such a challenge. Knowing himself thus unassailable, the Buddha has perfect self-confidence that his purity is truly perfect; and this self-confidence gives him great delightful satisfaction coupled with the reviewing knowledge of his purity. This is the second kind of perfect self-confidence dependent on his successful abandoning of defilements.

3. Likewise, there is no one who can challenge the Buddha, on good grounds, saying: “The factors that you declare to be obstructions against going to the good destinations, to the absorptions (jhāna), paths (magga), fruitions (phala) and Nibbāna, have no obstructing effects on those who resort to them.” For there is indeed no impediment he taught that fails to obstruct the achievement of due results in the practice of the Dhamma. Knowing himself thus unassailable, the Buddha has perfect self-confidence that what he has declared to be impediments are truly impediments to the noble practice; and this self-confidence gives him great delightful satisfaction coupled with the reviewing knowledge of his own doctrine. This is the third kind of perfect self-confidence dependent on his special accomplishment in imparting [1135] knowledge.

4. Likewise, there is no one who can challenge the Buddha, on good grounds, saying: “The factors that you declare to be leading to emancipation from the suffering of the round of existences, do not lead to emancipation of those who take up these factors.” For there is no factor of emancipation he taught that does not bring emancipation to the diligent. Knowing himself thus unassailable, the Buddha has perfect self-confidence that what he has declared to be emancipating factors are truly emancipatory; and this self-confidence gives him great delightful satisfaction coupled with the reviewing knowledge of his own doctrine. This is the fourth kind of perfect self-confidence dependent on the peaceful security of the Dhamma.

The above four kinds of perfect self-confidence of the Buddha are called the four kinds of perfect self-confidence (vesārajja-ñāṇa). Of these four, the first two go to prove the fact that the doctrine expounded by the Buddha is well-expounded in that it is excellent in the beginning, in the middle and at the end. It is perfect in meaning and in wording. It need not be either added to or expunged. It is perfectly pure in its prescription of the noble practice in its two modes, which is the first interpretation of well-expounded (svakkhāto) above.

The remaining two substantiate the fact that the doctrine is well-expounded because whatever are declared as impeding factors are truly impediments and also because whatever are declared as contributory factors to emancipation are truly emancipatory, which is the second interpretation above. This is how the doctrine (pariyatti) is well-expounded (svākkhāto).

The supermundane is well expounded in that it leads to Nibbāna through the practice of the four paths declared by the Buddha thus: “This is the correct practice, the way to Nibbāna, and this is the Nibbāna that is attainable by this practice.” This is how paths and Nibbāna are well expounded.

Of the three aspects of the supermundane, i.e., paths (magga), fruitions (phala) and Nibbāna, the noble path (ariya-magga) is well expounded, in that it avoids the two extremes and steers the middle course as the correct practice. The fruition (phala) of the path (magga), i.e., the ordinary fruitions attained by a noble one (ariya), which are four in number, are the factors where no burning defilements exist. And the declaration of this truth that: “The four fruits are the factors where no burning defilements remain,” is the attribute of its being well-expounded. Nibbāna is permanent, deathless, the ultimate, unconditioned element and this Nibbāna which is declared by the Buddha in terms of permanence, deathlessness, etc., is the attribute of its being well-expounded. This is how path (magga), fruition (phala) and Nibbāna, the supermundane factors, are well-expounded (svākkhāto).

2. Visible (sandiṭṭhika).

This attribute only relates to the supermundane self (saṃ), the truth realizable (diṭṭha) by the noble ones (ariya). All nobles, be it a Stream-enterer, or a Once Returner, or a Non-returner, having destroyed the various defilements, each according to his status, have no wish of harming themselves or harming others, or harming both because they are not subject to defilements such as passion (rāga). Therefore, they have no bodily pain. Since the defilements are extinct, they are free from mental pain. On pondering over this bodily and mental ease, the noble one (ariya) perceives that his freedom from physical and mental troubles is due to the absence of the defilements, such as passion which he has destroyed through path-knowledge. He knows it from personal experience and not from hearsay. Thus, the noble path (ariya-magga) is visible by the noble one (ariya) from his own experience, i.e., it is visible (sandiṭṭhika).

Explained in another way, the noble one (ariya) through the path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa) attained by him, experiences its fruition or (phala-ñāṇa) and realizes Nibbāna. Just as a person with good eyesight can see visible objects, so also the noble one, by means of his reviewing knowledge (paccavekkhanā) sees his own paths, its fruitions, and Nibbāna. Thus the whole of the nine factors of the supermundane are said to be visible by the noble ones (ariya) from their own experience, hence it is visible (sandiṭṭhika). [1136]

Another interpretation: Self (saṃ), that which is extolled (diṭṭha), through path-knowledge; the Dhamma that overcomes the defilements. As we say “the king who conquers his enemies by means of his chariot,” so also it is through path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa) which is the condition, that he overcomes the defilements. Nibbāna, through path-knowledge which makes it its mind-object, overcomes the defilements. Thus all the nine factors of the supermundane, through path-knowledge which is worthy to be extolled, overcome the defilements, and are visible (sandiṭṭhika).

Yet another interpretation: When the nine supermundane factors are fully comprehended through a good grasp of mental cultivation and realization, and through the reviewing knowledge, then the whole set of factors that constitute the vicious circle of rebirths fall away completely. Remember how the noble ones (ariya) make an end of suffering (dukkha) by uprooting all defilements through clear comprehension of the nine supermundane factors. Here the interpretation is: “That the nine supermundane factors are worthy of comprehending.”

Sandiṭṭham arahatī tī sandiṭṭhiko; saṃ diṭṭham, “comprehension,” arahati, “is worthy or worthwhile,” iti, “means,” sandiṭṭhiko, “visible.” The supermundane is worthwhile comprehending by anyone who means to make an end of suffering (dukkha). The supermundane is therefore indispensable for those who wish to break the bonds of the suffering round of existences. There is no other way to attain emancipation. Hence the supermundane is truly visible (sandiṭṭhika).

3. Not subject to time (akālika).

This attribute relates only to the noble path. Refer to the meaning not subject to time (akālika) given above. The noble path fructifies without delay, and so it is timeless in bringing benefit. Consider mundane merit and its benefit which must take a day or at least a few hours to fructify, even if it is the type of merit bearing fruit in the present. With the supermundane Noble Path, it is not so. No time elapses between the arising of path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa) and the fruition-knowledge (phala-ñāṇa). The path-knowledge gives rise to the fruition-knowledge immediately. Hence the supermundane path is timeless (akālika) in its fruition.

The important point to note, in respect of this attribute, is that according to Abhidhamma, in a path thought-process, path consciousness arises for just one thought-moment, after which, not a wink intervenes before fruition consciousness arises, which is the fruition of the path-knowledges. A noble one (ariya) who attains path is a “path-attainer” just for a single thought-moment after which he is a “fruition-attainer” in no time. This is because the thought-process of the arising of the path and its fruition come in a continuous uninterrupted flow.

4. Inviting inspection (ehi-passiko).

The nine supermundane factors are real things in the ultimate sense. They exist in truth and reality. They are beautiful things because they are pure, not defiled by mental taints. They are worth inspection. “Come, see for yourself, experience it yourself! Try it out yourself!” They seem to be inviting. For example, if you have nothing worthwhile in hand to show, such as a piece of gold or silver, you cannot invite others: “Come and see what is here.” Again, if you have something horrible or detestable in hand, such as excreta, you cannot gladly invite others to come and see it. Rather, something detestable or impure is only kept hidden and is not displayed.

The nine supermundane factors are real things in the ultimate sense. They are like the full disc of the moon in a clear sky, or like a big ruby placed on a white velvet cloth. These factors are stainless, spotless and perfectly pure. They are therefore worth inspection, worth appreciation. They invite anyone to testify for himself their presence and their true worth. [1137]

5. Onward-leading (opaneyyiko).

Worldlings do not have the experience of the supermundane. Their mind has never attained path-consciousness and fruition-consciousness. Therefore, they have never realized Nibbāna. It is just because they have never attained path-consciousness and fruition-consciousness and never realized Nibbāna that they wallow in the mire of the suffering round of existences endlessly. If the lowest level of the supermundane knowledge, as Stream-entry, is attained, if Stream-entry consciousness has ever arisen in one, the yogi, as a noble one, has realized Nibbāna as clearly and unmistakably as he has seen something with his own eyes. Once this realization has taken place, he can make an end of all the suffering round of rebirths (dukkha) in the seven further existences in the fortunate destinations at the utmost.

On one occasion, the Buddha placed a pinch of dirt on his finger-nail and said to the monastics: “Monastics, which is greater, this pinch of dirt on my finger-nail or the great earth?” And the monastics replied: “Venerable sir, the dirt on the finger-nail is infinitesimal; the great earth is far greater, beyond comparison.”

“Similarly, monastics,” said the Buddha, “the number of existences that have been prevented from arising by Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga), by a noble one (ariya), is as great as the great earth. The number of existences that remain to arise for him is as little as the pinch of dirt on my finger-nail, there are only seven at the most.”

Thus the supermundane factors have the effect of cutting down the lives in Samsāra into a few further existences only, with the ultimate effect of total release from Saṃsāra, according to the attainment of each individual; that being so, a virtuous one, wishing to make an end of suffering, should give top priority to gaining the paths and fruitions. Even if one's head be on fire, the extinguishing of the fire is not such a matter of urgency as the gaining of path-knowledge because fire on the head can destroy the present life only whereas, the fire of defilements within can cause endless trouble throughout Saṃsāra. The supermundane should be borne in mind diligently until path-knowledge with its fruition is attained. Nibbāna should be made the mind-object with diligence. Thus, the nine supermundane factors are worthy of being constantly borne in one's mind because they are onward-leading (opaneyyiko).

6. Understood by themselves (paccattam veditabbo).

Under this attribute, three types of noble ones (ariya) should be noted, namely:

1. The one who attains path and fruit after hearing the gist of a discourse on the Dhamma (ugghaṭitaññū).
2. The one who realizes path and fruit after hearing an explanation of the Dhamma (vipañcitaññū).
3. The one who gradually comes to comprehend the truth after getting further elaboration and guidance (neyya).

[For more on these see the three types of Bodhisattas see the First Treatise on the Perfections in the Further Explanations below.]

All three types, after attaining the path, know for themselves that they have taken up the noble practice, that they have attained the paths, the fruitions, and have realized Nibbāna through their own experience. For the eradication of defilements is to be accomplished directly by oneself. A close disciple cannot discard his defilements through the attainment of the path by his master. Nor can he dwell in the fruition of the path through the attainment of the fruition by his master. Neither can he make Nibbāna his own mind-object through the master's making Nibbāna his mind-object. Only by the attainment of the path by one's own self, can one get rid of the defilements within oneself. Dwelling in fruition is possible only when one has attained the fruition-knowledge for oneself. Nibbāna also is likewise a matter for direct experience, and not realizable through another's experience. Thus, the nine supermundane factors are not to be considered as ornaments that adorn other people and have no real benefit to oneself but are only the property of the noble ones (ariya) who enjoy them. Since they pertain to the wise, these factors are beyond the pale of fools. Thus the nine supermundane factors are the property of the noble ones (ariya) who alone can realize them in their own minds and enjoy them (paccattam veditabbo). [1138]

Contemplation of the Dhamma

The yogi who wishes to contemplate the Dhamma should commit to memory the six attributes of the Dhamma in both Pāli and in translation. He should recite each of them at a speed neither too slow nor too fast, and reflect on its meaning. One who reflects on the attributes of the Dhamma, while doing so, prevents the arising of thoughts of lust, hatred and delusion, besides gaining concentration which clears the mind of lethargy and distraction, and rendering it possible for a righteous thought-process to arise through equanimity.

As the concentration gets stronger through this meditation practice, the hindrances fall off and consequently the defilements are quelled. The five faculties, such as faith, become very pure and effective. The repeated reflection on the Dhamma sharpens the initial application of the mind (vitakka) and sustained application (vicāra) of the mind. When these two factors are functioning well, delightful satisfaction (pīti) arises. Due to the delightful satisfaction, serenity of mental concomitants and serenity of mind arise, as the result of which, physical and mental uneasiness are stilled. When there is serenity of mind and serenity of mental concomitants, happiness (sukha) that causes the arising of concentration becomes pronounced. The thought-process being enriched by happiness is firmly fixed on the object of meditation, the Dhamma.

Thus the factors involved in meditation beginning from initial application of the mind become more and more efficient stage by stage. The mind is neither lethargic nor distracted so that equanimity of meditative practice is maintained and the five faculties, such as faith (saddhā), are functioning in harmony. The five factors of absorption (jhāna): initial application of the mind, sustained application of the mind, delightful satisfaction, happiness and one-pointedness of mind, arise simultaneously at every thought-moment with the great meritorious consciousness through the contemplation of the Dhamma which is mental cultivation pertaining to the sensuous sphere. Thus, neighbourhood concentration or access concentration (upacāra-jhāna) is achieved. When this concentration arises together with the great meritorious consciousness of the contemplation of the Dhamma, which is mental cultivation pertaining to the sensuous sphere, the yogi is called one who has achieved access concentration via the contemplation of the Dhamma.

A yogi, who contemplates the Dhamma repeatedly, is imbued with the intrinsic value of the Dhamma, in its being worthy of constant companionship so much so that he feels a deep sense of awe and gratitude towards the Buddha, the fount of the Dhamma. For, this Dhamma propounded was never by any other teacher, except a Buddha. Thus, through the habitual contemplation of the Dhamma, one naturally becomes devoted to the Buddha, exceeding devotion to any other person. Therefore, his devotion to the Buddha is comparable to that of the noble one. He gains a stable mindfulness, a profound wisdom, and much merit. He becomes possessed of much delightful satisfaction, first of the feeble kind but later, of an ecstatic kind. He becomes indifferent to fearful things, great or small. He becomes tolerant of pain. He feels that he is in the company of the Dhamma. The body of one whose mind is steeped in the Dhamma is like a shrine worth paying homage. His mind is always inclined to and desirous of attaining the nine supermundane factors. Being constantly aware of the attributes of the Dhamma, he is incapable of allowing himself to commit evil, through shame and dread to do it, whenever occasion for it arises. Contemplation of the Dhamma is a sure basis for gaining the paths and fruitions. If the yogi does not attain the paths and fruitions in this existence for want of sufficient past merit, he is reborn in the fortunate abodes. These are the benefits of contemplating the Dhamma.

A special point to note: The commentary says that of the six attributes of the Dhamma, only the first one, well-proclaimed (svākkhāta), [1139] relates to the doctrine as expounded by the Buddha, and that the remaining five relate to the nine supermundane factors.

The sub-commentary to the Path to Purification (Visuddhi-magga) discusses this matter in another light which is briefly reproduced below: Although the commentary says that in specific terms the five attributes beginning with being visible (sandiṭṭhika) belong to the supermundane, they can also be considered as belonging to the doctrine (pariyatti-dhamma) on the following grounds: A wise person, who is learned, who has memorized much Pāḷi, who is of very stable mindfulness, can perceive the doctrine as being excellent in the beginning, the middle, and the end and so the doctrine is visible (sandiṭṭhika), as visible (sandiṭṭhika) is defined as it conquers other doctrines through being visible (sandiṭṭhiyā jayatī ti sandiṭṭhiko), as the knowledge of the doctrine can be a tool to conquer the believers of other doctrines, it is specifically visible (sandiṭṭhika).

In conquering the defilements, knowledge of the doctrine is a contributing factor and so the doctrine is by inference visible (sandiṭṭhika); or, as another definition puts it: Sandiṭṭhaṃ arahatī ti sandiṭṭhiko, “it is evidently worthy, therefore it is visible.” The doctrine has been expounded to clear away all defiling factors and directed at the promotion of purely meritorious factors, it is therefore worthy to be studied closely to gain perception. Hence it is visible (sandiṭṭhika).

Since the doctrine is the true condition for the attainment of the supermundane path, which may be realized at all times, it is not subject to time (akālika), considered from the point of probable result.

The doctrine itself is real and is perfectly pure. So it also is open to inspection and can invite the world to come and see it, to learn it, and to examine it. Hence it is also inviting inspection (ehi-passika).

Being replete with these attributes, the doctrine is worthy of being constantly borne in mind by the wise who wish to make an end of suffering (dukkha). Therefore it is onward-leading (opaneyyika).

One who studies the doctrine with a mind intent on becoming an Arahāt will get delightful satisfaction both on account of its excellence in language and excellence in meaning. This quality of giving delightful satisfaction to the wise individually, according to their capacity, is truly because it can be understood by the wise for themselves (paccattaṃ veditabbo).

This is the explanation given in the sub-commentary to the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) about how the five later attributes of the Dhamma can also belong to the doctrine.

The Nine Supreme Attributes of the Saṅgha

Suppaṭipanno Bhagavato sāvaka-saṅgho, ujjappaṭipanno Bhagavato sāvaka-saṅgho,

*ñāyappaṭipanno Bhagavato sāvaka-saṅgho,

Yad-idaṃ cattāri purisayugāni, aṭṭha-purisa puggalā, esa Bhagavato sāvaka-saṅgho
āhuneyyo pāhuneyyo

anuttaram puññakhettaṃ lokassa.*

The Fortunate One's Saṅgha of disciples are good in their practice, the Fortunate One's Saṅgha of disciples are straight in their practice, the Fortunate One's Saṅgha of disciples are systematic in their practice, the Fortunate One's Saṅgha of disciples are correct in their practice, that is to say, the four pairs of persons, the eight individual persons, this is the Fortunate One's Saṅgha of disciples, they are worthy of offerings, of hospitality, of gifts, and of reverential salutation, they are an unsurpassed field of merit for the world.

1. The Saṅgha of the disciples of the Buddha, the eight classes of the noble Saṅgha (ariya-saṅgha) take up the monastic practice well and hence are good in their practice (suppaṭipanna).
2. The Saṅgha of the noble disciples of the Buddha are endowed with straight-forward uprightness (ujuppaṭipanna) because they follow the straight and middle way.
3. The Saṅgha of the noble disciples of the Buddha strive to attain Nibbāna, hence they are systematic in their practice (ñāyappaṭipanna).
4. The Saṅgha of the noble disciples of the Buddha are endowed with correctness of practice, being ashamed to do evil and they abhor evil, being always mindful, and controlling their conduct, even being prepared to die rather than lose morality, hence they are correct in their practice (sāmācippaṭipanna).

The disciples of the Buddha, the noble Saṅgha (ariya-saṅgha) consisting of the eight categories of disciples in four pairs. These really great persons:

5. Are worthy of receiving offerings brought even from afar (āhuneyya),
6. Are worthy of receiving offerings specially set aside for special guests (pāhuneyya), [1140]

7. Are worthy of receiving offerings made for the sake of Nibbāna (dakkhiṇeyya),
8. Are worthy of receiving obeisance by the three worlds (añjalīkaraṇīya),
9. Are the incomparably fertile soil for all to sow the seed of merit in (puñṇakkhettaṃ lokassa).

Miscellaneous Notes

The eight classes of noble ones (ariya) are the Saṅgha of disciples (sāvaka-saṅgha) in their true meaning. However, the virtuous monastics are also called, in an extended meaning, the Saṅgha of disciples since they also follow the teaching of the Buddha obediently. The word disciple (sāvaka) is defined as: Sakkaccaṃ suṇantī ti sāvakā, “they listen to the teaching respectfully, therefore they are disciples.” Here, “to listen respectfully” means to live up to the teaching that will lead to them becoming Arahats. According to this definition, only noble ones (ariya) are a Saṅgha of disciples in the true sense and worldlings are called a Saṅgha of disciples as an extended meaning.

Listening respectfully is accomplished only by the Arahats who have accomplished the noble practice. However, worldlings who are on the noble path are sure to become Arahats and so they are also called a Saṅgha of disciples (Sāvaka-saṅgha) in an extended sense of the word.

The Saṅgha are of the same moral standard. Hence Saṅgha in the true sense refers only to noble ones (ariya). This is because noble ones have their morality based on the path (magga) and are of the same purity, just as gold bullion cut in two equal pieces are of equal value.

In the nine attributes of the Saṅgha, the first four beginning with good in their practice (suppaṭipanna) are the conditions that have the five latter ones as consequence.

The four attributes are in fact not four different kinds of practice: If the right practice which is shown as the noble path (ariya-magga) is carried out, all four attributes are accomplished at once.

This is because the Buddha’s teaching, in the last analysis, is right practice as a constituent of the noble path. It is this right practice that was presented to the multitudes over the 45 years of the Buddha’s mission in a multitude of ways to suit the natural bent of the hearer. Thus the right practice is the Buddha's true message, the essential feature of his entire teaching. One who follows the right practice is one who is good in their practice (suppaṭipanno puggalo).

1. The Saṅgha of the disciples of the Buddha are endowed with good practice because they follow the right practice.
2. The right practice, which is a constituent of the Noble Path, has the quality of destroying the opposing factors which are defilements. Therefore, the right-practice is the practice that is unailing and straight. The Saṅgha of the disciples of the Buddha who follow the right practice are therefore called the noble ones who are endowed with the straight practice.
3. The systematic practice, which is a constituent of the noble path, is the practice that does not go against Nibbāna, but is in conformity with Nibbāna. The Saṅgha of the disciples who take upon themselves the systematic practice that conforms to Nibbāna, that is not against Nibbāna, are endowed with the systematic practice leading to Nibbāna.
4. The correct practice, which is a constituent of the noble path, is the practice that is in conformity with the nine supermundane factors, and is therefore called the correct practice, the practice that conforms to the Dhamma. Hence the Saṅgha is endowed with correctness of practice.

Of the eight categories of noble ones (ariya), the four who are established in path-knowledge, are endowed with the above four aspects of the right practice, which is a constituent of the noble path. The four who are established in the fruition knowledge are endowed with the above right practice in the sense that it was through that right practice that they now enjoy the fruition of the path and Nibbāna. [1141]

Further Explanation

1. The noble Saṅgha (ariya-saṅgha) take upon themselves the doctrine and discipline as taught by the Buddha. This is taking up the true practice, the faultless practice. Hence they are endowed with the good practice.
2. The Saṅgha takes up the eight constituents of the path and thereby steer the middle course, avoiding the two extremes of sense-gratification and self-mortification. This practice is also straight, without the slightest deviation or crookedness, in any examples of the three examples of crookedness. Hence they are endowed with the straight practice.

3. Nibbāna is penetrable only by path-knowledge and fruition-knowledge. Since the Saṅgha strives for realizing knowledge (ñāṇa), they are systematic in the practice leading to Nibbāna.

4. Worshipping, welcoming, raising joined palms by way of obeisance and offerings of the four monastic requisites are acts of veneration called correct (sāmīci-kamma).

Devas and men perform these acts of veneration towards the Saṅgha, having regard for the morality, concentration and wisdom of the Saṅgha. Anyone, lacking in morality, concentration and wisdom, does not deserve veneration. As for the Saṅgha of the disciples of the Buddha, the taking up of the right practice which is the noble path, endows them with morality, concentration and wisdom as the necessary threefold training. And so they deserve veneration. Since they conduct themselves to be worthy of veneration through their noble practice, they are endowed with correct practice (sāmīcippaṭipanna). These four attributes are the conditions for their homage worthiness.

The Eight Categories of Ariyas in Four Pairs

1. The noble one (ariya) established in the first path or the Stream-enterer and the noble one established in the fruition thereof.
2. The noble one established in the second path or the Once-Returner and the noble one established in the fruition thereof.
3. The noble one established in the third path or the Non-returner and the noble one established in the fruition thereof.
4. The noble one established in the fourth path or the Arahāt on the path (Arahatta-magga-puggalo) and the noble one established in the fruition thereof or the Arahāt with fruition (Arahatta-phala-puggalo) is the person who is an Arahāt.

Those four pairs, making eight categories of noble ones (ariya), being endowed with the four attributes as conditions, such as good practice, are entitled to the five noble privileges such as being worthy of offerings (āhuneyya) which also are their attributes as consequences.

5. They are worthy of offerings (āhuneyya). Grammatical analysis: ā, even brought from afar; huna, the four requisites as offerings; eyya, entitled to receive. The noble Saṅgha (ariya-saṅgha) can, on account of their four attributes such as good practice (suppaṭipanna) bestow great merit to the supporters who offer them the four monastic requisites. Therefore, if the supporter has these articles ready to offer when the noble Saṅgha goes for alms collection, he should offer them gladly. If those articles are not at hand, he should try and procure them even from afar and offer them. Those articles brought from afar and offered are called āhuna. The noble Saṅgha who are endowed with the four conditions are entitled to receive those offerings brought from afar and more so because in accepting them, the supporters earn great merit. Therefore the noble Saṅgha is possessed of the attribute of being worthy of offerings (āhuneyya).

Another interpretation: ā; even brought from afar; huneyya, worthy to be offered the four monastic requisites. The noble Saṅgha can bestow much merit on the supporter because they are endowed with the four noble conditions. Therefore the supporter, wishing to gain much merit, should make offerings not only when the Saṅgha goes to them on alms collection, but should go and make offerings to the Saṅgha at their monastery which may necessitate a [1142] long journey. The four requisites that are offered after making a journey for that purpose are called āhuna. The noble Saṅgha deserves to receive such offerings on account of the four conditions that they are endowed with. In this sense also the noble Saṅgha are possessed of being worthy of offerings (āhuneyya).

Still another interpretation: The noble Saṅgha is endowed with being worthy of offerings (āhuneyya) because they deserve to receive offerings from Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, and such powerful personages. Taken in another light, in the Brahmin tradition, they keep a sacrificial fire called āhavanīya, which has the same meaning as āhuneyyo. They believe that, if they feed butter to this fire as offering, they earn much merit. If the offering to the sacrificial fire brings merit, and is thus called āhavanīya, the noble Saṅgha, who can bestow greater merit to the supporter, are truly worthy of offerings (āhuneyya). For the so-called āhavanīya of the Brahmins do not bring any real benefit: the butter that they feed the sacrificial fire just gets consumed and becomes ash. The noble Saṅgha, being possessed of the four noble attributes as condition, unfailingly bestow much merit to the supporter, and are truly worthy of offerings (āhuneyya). Note this verse (Dhp 107):

Yo ca vassa-sataṃ jantu, aggim paricare vane, ekañ-ca bhāvitattānaṃ, muhuttam-āpi pūjaye, sāyeva pūjanā seyyo, yañ-ce vassa-sataṃ hutam.

One may tend the sacrificial fire in the forest for one hundred years, one may, on the other hand, make offerings reverentially just once to those noble ones who dwell in insight-meditation. This offering is indeed of greater benefit than one hundred years of tending the sacrificial fire.

The above verse brings out the significance of being worthy of offerings (āhuneyyo), an attribute of the noble Saṅgha.

6. They are worthy of hospitality (pāhuneyyo). Guests who visit you from all the various quarters are called pāhuna. Gifts and offerings such as food, made ready for them are also called pāhuna. In this context the second meaning applies. Pāhuna, gifts and offerings meant for guests; eyya, deserve to receive. Gifts and offerings set aside for guests should be offered to the Saṅgha, if the Saṅgha visits your place, guests come only next to the Saṅgha. The Saṅgha deserve top priority because they are endowed with the four attributes discussed above. That indeed is so because, however important one's guests may be, the noble Saṅgha appear in the world only when the Buddha appears. And the arising of a Buddha is very rare. Further, the Saṅgha are so imbued with noble qualities that they are a source of pleasure, and are the incomparable friend or relative that calls at your door. For these reasons the Saṅgha are entitled to receive hospitality meant for one's valued guests (pāhuneyya).

7. They are worthy of gifts (dakkhiṇeyya): Dakkhaṇṭi etāya sattā yathādhīppetāhi sampattīhi vaḍḍhantī ti dakkhiṇā, “the volition, through which beings are blessed with whatever they wish to have or to be, is called being worthy of gifts (dakkhiṇā).”<sup>262</sup> This means that the gift or offering made with a view for future well-being is called being worthy of gifts (dakkhiṇā). If someone does not believe in the hereafter, if he holds an annihilist view, then he will not make offerings for future well-being.

According to the Buddha's doctrine, Arahats such as the Buddha and his Arahata disciples, having eradicated ignorance and craving for existence, which are the root causes of the round of existences, will not be reborn in a new existence. Until the two root causes have been eradicated, rebirth is inevitable, however much one holds an annihilist view. Just as a [1143] tree whose tap roots are not cut off will remain growing and bear fruit, but when its tap roots are completely cut off it cannot thrive and cannot bear fruit, so also ignorance and craving for existence must be understood as the tap roots of rebirth. All worldlings, Stream-enterers, Once-returners, Non-returners will have rebirth because these two tap roots have not been completely destroyed. Only on becoming Arahats are the two tap roots completely destroyed and rebirth is stopped.

Only one who does not hold the wrong view of annihilism believes in the afterlife. Only when existence after death is believed in, will there be alms giving for one's own well-being in future existences. Only when volitional acts of giving are done, can there be the fulfilment of whatever one may aspire to as the result. Thus, any act of giving with the belief in its good result in future existences is called being worthy of gifts (dakkhiṇā). Therefore a worthy gift means an object that is given, motivated by the belief in a future benefit.

The noble Saṅgha can make that object of offering efficacious as is desired by the supporter because they are endowed with the four supreme attributes mentioned above. In that sense, they deserve to receive offerings that are called worthy (dakkhiṇā). Hence they are possessed of the noble attribute of being worthy of gifts (dakkhiṇeyya).

Another interpretation: The noble Saṅgha purify the object that is being offered (dakkhiṇā) in the sense that they bestow the merit on it through their nobility. Dakkhiṇāya hito dakkhiṇeyyo, "the noble Saṅgha bestow merit on the offering." This is another meaning by which the attribute of being worthy of gifts (dakkhiṇeyya) may be understood.

8. They are worthy of reverential salutation (añjali-karaṇīyo). Being endowed with the four noble qualities based on their right practice, the noble Saṅgha is worthy of reverential salutation. The term for this attribute is defined as those wishing to earn merit pay obeisance to these eight noble ones (ariya), hence the noble Saṅgha is worthy of reverential salutation (añjalī-karaṇīyā etthā ti añjali-karaṇīyo).

9. They are an unsurpassed field of merit for the world (anuttaram puññakkhettaṃ lokassa): Unsurpassed (anuttaram); there is no better field for sowing merit than the noble Saṅgha (atthi ito uttaran-ti anuttaram). Although by definition “there is no better field than the noble Saṅgha,” but, in fact there is not even any field of merit equal to the noble Saṅgha. Hence this attribute has been rendered as “unsurpassed field of merit for the world.”

Field (khetta) means a field for the cultivation of crops. Field of merit (puñña-khetta) means a field where merit is cultivated, a metaphor for the noble Saṅgha. Just as a field nurtures the seeds sown in it, so also the noble Saṅgha nurtures the seeds of good deeds sown in them. Here the Saṅgha nurtures the good deeds of the supporters through the morality, concentration and wisdom which are like the nutrients of the soil. Thus the noble Saṅgha bestows great merit to the good deeds done towards them, and are called the field that nurtures the seeds of merit.

A field where the king sows his seeds is called the king’s field. Likewise, the noble Saṅgha where all the three worlds sow their seeds of merit is called the unsurpassed field where the whole world sows their seeds of merit (anuttaram puññakkhettaṃ lokassa).

Contemplation of the Saṅgha

The yogi who wishes to contemplate the Saṅgha should commit to memory the nine attributes of the Saṅgha in Pāḷi and its translation as given above. He should recite each of them, such as good in their practice (suppaṭipanno), at a speed that is neither too slow nor too fast, reflecting on its meaning. One who reflects on the attributes of the Saṅgha, while doing so, prevents the arising of thoughts of lust, hatred and delusion, besides gaining concentration which clears the mind of lethargy and distraction, and rendering it possible for a righteous thought-process to arise through equanimity. [1144]

As the concentration gets stronger through this meditation practice, the hindrances fall off and consequently the defilements are quelled. The five faculties, such as faith (saddhā), become very pure and effective. The repeated reflection on the Saṅgha sharpens the initial application of the mind and the sustained application of the mind. When these two factors are functioning well, delightful satisfaction arises. Due to the delightful satisfaction, serenity of mental concomitants and serenity of mind arise, as the result of which, physical and mental uneasiness are stilled. When there is serenity of mind and mental concomitants, happiness that causes the arising of concentration becomes pronounced. The thought-process, being enriched by happiness, is firmly fixed on the object of meditation, the Saṅgha.

Thus, the factors involved in meditation, beginning with initial application of the mind, become more and more efficient stage by stage. The mind is neither lethargic nor distracted so that the medium attitude in mental exercise is maintained and the five faculties, such as faith, are functioning in harmony. The five factors of absorption (jhāna): initial application of the mind, sustained application of the mind, delightful satisfaction, happiness and one-pointedness of mind, arise simultaneously at every thought moment with the great meritorious consciousness of the contemplation of the Saṅgha which is mental cultivation pertaining to the sensuous sphere. Thus access concentration (upacāra-jhāna) is achieved. When this concentration arises together with the great meritorious consciousness of the contemplation of the Saṅgha, which is mental cultivation pertaining to the sensuous sphere, the yogi is called one who has achieved access concentration via the contemplation of the Saṅgha.

The Benefits of Contemplating the Saṅgha

The virtuous one, who repeatedly contemplates the Saṅgha, becomes exceptionally devoted to the Saṅgha comparable to the noble ones' devotion to the Saṅgha. He gains a stable mindfulness, a profound wisdom, and much merit. He becomes possessed of delightful satisfaction, at first of the feeble kind, but later of an ecstatic kind. He becomes indifferent to fearful things, great or small. He becomes tolerant to pain. He feels that he is always in the company of the Saṅgha. His mind is always ennobled by the awareness of the attributes of the Saṅgha so that his body is like the boundary halls (sīma) where the Saṅgha are being assembled, and therefore is worthy of veneration. His mind is bent on acquiring the attributes of the Saṅgha. Being constantly aware of the attributes of the Saṅgha, he feels like he is in the very presence of the Saṅgha and is incapable of committing any evil, through shame and dread to do it, whenever occasion for it arises. Making the contemplation of the Saṅgha as the bases, one may, after gaining concentration, meditate for gaining insight into conditioned phenomena with facility and succeed in it. If he does not attain path and fruit in

The Saṅgha Treasure

43: The Life Stories of the Monks

I shall now narrate the stories of the great disciples on the authority of the exposition of the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) commentary<sup>264</sup> beginning with the story of the great elder Koṇḍañña, taken from among the members of the noble Saṅgha, the Buddha's Disciples who were endowed with such attributes as practising well (suppaṭipaññatā). In narrating the stories of these great disciples, I shall do so in three stages:

1. Aspiration in the past.
2. Ascetic life adopted in final existence.
3. Foremost title achieved.

1. Ven. Koṇḍañña

Aspiration in the Past

Counting backward from this Fortunate Aeon (Bhadda-kappa), over 100,000 aeons ago, there appeared the Buddha Padumuttara.

The reason for the Buddha having this name has been mentioned in chapter 9: The Chronicle of Buddha Padumuttara: ... about nine jars-full of pollen rose up and spread all over his body of 58 cubits in height as though powder of red orpiment and sulphuret of arsenic was sprinkled on it. On account of this particular happening, the Buddha was renowned as Buddha Padumuttara.

Having appeared among the three classes of beings, Buddha Padumuttara, in the company of 100,000 monks, made his alms rounds visiting a series of villages, townships and royal cities in order to compassionately release many from suffering, and arrived at his native city of Hamsavatī. His father, King Ānanda, heard the good news of his son's visit and together with his people and officials extended welcome to the Buddha. As the Buddha gave a discourse to the crowd headed by King Ānanda, some became Stream-enterers, some Once-returners, some Non-returners and the rest Arahats at the end of the discourse.

The King then invited the Buddha for the next day's meal, and the next day he sent for the Buddha with a message about the meal-time and made a grand offering of food to him and his company of 100,000 monks at his golden palace. Buddha Padumuttara gave a talk in appreciation of the meal and went back to the monastery. In the same way, the citizens gave their great gift (mahā-dāna) the following day. The third day saw a gift again by the king. Thus the great gifts performed by the king and the citizens on alternate days went on for a long time.

At that time, a man of good family, the future Koṇḍañña, was born in a prosperous household. One day, while the Buddha was teaching, he saw the citizens of Hāmsavatī with flowers, perfumes, etc. in their hands, heading to where the Buddha's was to deliver his discourse and he went along with them too.

In the meantime, Buddha Padumuttara declared a certain monastic as the first of all long-standing (rattaññū) monastics to realize the four truths and thereby to gain release from Saṃsāra in his Dispensation. When Koṇḍañña, the man of good family, heard this, he reflected: "Great indeed is this man! It is said that, leaving aside the Buddha himself, there is no other person before him who has realized the four truths. What if I too become a monk like him, realizing the four truths before all others do in the Dispensation of a coming Buddha!" At the close of the Buddha's teaching, the man of good family approached the Buddha and gave an invitation to him, saying: "Please accept my offering of food tomorrow, exalted Buddha!" the Buddha accepted the invitation by keeping silent.

Knowing clearly that the Buddha had accepted his invitation, the man of good family paid his respects to the Buddha and returned home. During the whole night, he spent decorating the seats with fragrant festoons of flowers and also by preparing delicious food. The following day, he treated the Buddha and his company of 100,000 monks at his house to a sumptuous feast of fine rice with gruel and other courses as side-dishes. When the feast was over, he placed at the feet of the Buddha entirely new and soft, but thick pieces of cloth, made in the country of Vaṅga and enough to make three robes. Then he reflected as [1177] follows: “I am not a seeker of a small religious post but I am a seeker of a big one. One day’s great gift (mahā-dāna) may not be adequate if I aspire for a lofty designation. Therefore, I shall aspire after it by performing a great gift for seven days successively.”

Thus, the man of good family gave a great gift in the same manner for seven days. When the meal-offering was over, he had his storehouse of garments opened and put fine and nice clothes at the feet of the Buddha and offered three-piece sets of robes to the 100,000 monks. He then approached the Buddha and said: “Exalted Buddha, just as the monastic whom you declared as foremost seven days ago, may I be able to become the first to penetrate the four truths after donning the robe in the Dispensation of a coming Buddha.” Having said so, he paid respects by prostrating at the Buddha’s feet.

Hearing the man of good family’s words of aspiration, Buddha Padumuttara tried to see in his vision, saying to himself: “This man of good family has done many significant deeds of merit. Will his aspiration be fulfilled or not?” He then came to know clearly that: “It definitely will be!”

Indeed, there is no hindrance at all, even as an atom, that would cover his vision when a Buddha tries to see the past or the future or the present events. All the events in the past or the future, though there is a barrier of a millions of millions of aeons, or all the events in the present, though there is a barrier of thousands of universes, they are all associated with reflection. As soon as they are reflected, they become manifest distinctly. In this way, with his intellectual power that knew no hindrances, Buddha Padumuttara saw in his vision thus: “100,000 aeons from now, there will arise a Fortunate One, Gotama by name, among the three classes of beings. Then will this man of good family’s aspiration be fulfilled!” Knowing thus, the Buddha predicted to the man of good family: “Dear man of good family, 100,000 aeons from now, a Buddha, by the name of Gotama, will appear in the three worlds. When Buddha Gotama delivers the first discourse, the Turning of the Dhamma Wheel, you will be established at the end of this discourse with its three functions, together with 180 million Brahmas, in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).

Mahākāla and Cūlakāla

Having performed deeds of merit such as alms giving for a period of 100,000 years, the wealthy man of good family, the future Koṇḍañña, was reborn in a celestial abode on his death. While he was repeatedly being reborn either in the Deva realm or human world, 99,909 aeons elapsed. After living through such a long duration, 91 aeons, when counted backwards from this Fortunate Aeon, the future Koṇḍañña, was born in the family of a householder and named Mahākāla, in a village near the gate of the royal city Bandhumatī. His younger brother was known as Cūḷakāla.

At that time, the Bodhisatta Vipassī expired from the Tusita Realm and took conception in the womb of Bandhumatī, the Chief Queen of King Bandhuma,<sup>265</sup> and, in time, became an omniscient Buddha. As he was requested by Mahā Brahma to preach, he pondered as to whom he should preach first. He then saw his own younger brother Prince Khaṇḍa and the chaplain's son, the young Tissa. "These two," he decided, "are capable of penetrating the four truths first." He decided thus: "I will preach to them. I will also do a favour to my royal father." He then took an aerial journey, by his psychic power, from the Mahā Bodhi tree and descended at the Deer Park called Khemā. He sent for Prince Khaṇḍa and Tissa and taught them a discourse, at the end of which, both of them became Arahats, together with 84,000 sentient beings.

The 84,000 clansmen, who went forth together with the Bodhisatta Vipassī, heard of the event and went to him to listen to his Dhamma and they duly became Arahats also. Buddha Vipassī appointed Ven. Khaṇḍa and Ven. Tissa to the position of chief disciples and placed them on his right and left hand side respectively.

On receiving the news, King Bandhuma became desirous of paying homage to his son, [1178] Buddha Vipassī, and went to the park, listened to the discourse and took the three refuges. He also invited the Buddha for the next day's meal and departed after paying his respects to the Buddha. On arrival at his palace, an idea arose to him while sitting in his grand pavilion: "My older son has renounced the word and has become a Buddha. My second son has become chief disciple on the Buddha's right-hand side. The chaplain's son, the young Tissa, has become chief disciple on the left. The rest of the 84,000 monks used to surround and attend upon my son while they were laymen. Therefore, the Saṅgha, headed by my son, was under my charge before and so should they be now too. I alone, will be responsible for the provision of them with the four requisites. I will give others no chance to do so.”

Thinking thus, the king had the walls of acacia wood built on either side of the route, from the gate of the monastery to the palace and had them covered with canvas. He had festoons hung which were as thick as the trunk of a toddy palm and decorated with gold stars; he also had canopies put up. As for the ground, he had it covered with exquisite spreads. On both sides of the route within the walls, he had pots filled with water and placed near the flowering bushes and had perfumes placed among flowers and flowers among perfumes. Then he sent the Buddha a message that it was now time for the meal. In the company of his monks, Buddha Vipassī came to the palace along the fully covered route and partook of his meal and went back to the monastery. Nobody else had a chance even to see the Buddha. How could one have an opportunity to offer food and to honour him?

Then there took place a discussion among the citizens: “It has now been seven years and seven months since the arising of the Buddha in the world. But we have so far had no opportunity even to see the Buddha, what to speak of offering food, honouring him and listening to his sermons, we have no such privileges at all. The king personally attends to the Buddha adoringly with the notion that: “The Buddha is my Buddha only, the Dhamma is my Dhamma only and the Saṅgha is my Saṅgha only.” The arising of the Buddha is for the welfare of the world of sentient beings, together with Devas and Brahmas, and not only for the king’s welfare. Indeed, it is not that hell-fire is hot only for the king and is like a cool blue lotus to others. It would be better, therefore, if the king gave us our right of service to the Fortunate One; if not, we shall battle with the king and take over his rights to donate to the Saṅgha and do deeds of merit towards them. Let us fight for our right. But there is one thing, we citizens alone might not be able to do so. Let us, therefore, find a chief who will lead us.”

Accordingly, they went to the general of the army and openly told him of their plan and directly asked: “General, will you be one of us or will you join the king?” Then the general said: “I will be one of you. But there is one condition: You must give me the first day for my service to the Buddha.” And the citizens agreed.
