The Great Chronicles of the Buddhas

Preface to the Revised Version

Between the years 1956-1969 Bhaddanta Vicittasārābhivamsa, otherwise known as Mingun Sayādaw, who had been the Chief Respondent answering the questions on both discipline and doctrine at the 6th Buddhist Council held in Yangon, compiled his Great Chronicles of the Buddhas (Mahā-buddha-vaṃsa) in the Myanmar language.

The original translation was made by three different translators: T U Ko Lay, U Tin Lwin and U Tin Oo and is a big contribution which helped make this work available in English. However, their English was of variable standard, and their terminology sometimes differed from each other.

Changes made in this edition mainly affect five areas: language, presentation, format, rearrangement and addition.

In this edition I have corrected the English and harmonized the terminology. Nearly every sentence has had to be corrected for spelling or grammar; the use of diacritics was fairly haphazard – sometimes using them, sometimes not and sometimes wrongly – and most times the spelling of Pāḷi words has had to be corrected.

I have occasionally divided long chapters into two: a & b or more, to better bring out the various contents of the chapters; headings have many times been changed, omitted or added for consistency; and presentation has been simplified and made more consistent.

I have also rearranged some material, this especially applies to the early and later chapters, so that Chapter VI, originally entitled Reflections on Perfections (sic), Chapter VII, On Miscellany and Chapter VIII, Eighteen Abhabbaṭṭhānas, have all been moved to the Further Explanations, as has the Supplement that would have been Chapter X. This is so the story is more cohesive, and the treatises and supplements are treated separately. Also in the Dhamma Jewel section the three discourses: the Discourse setting the Dhamma Wheel Turning (Dhamma-cakkappavattana-sutta, SN 56.11), the Discourse about the Characteristics of Non-Self (Anatta-lakkhaṇa-sutta, SN 22.59) and the Discourse about the Treasures (Ratana-sutta, Khp 6, Sn 2:1) have been removed from that section and inserted in their proper place in the narrative.

I have also at times added in material, including Jātaka stories where these were just mentioned in passing and sometimes new translations, such as that of the Discourse about Taking up Weapons (Atta-daṇḍa-sutta, Snp 4.15), and the Āṭānāṭiya Safeguard (Āṭānāṭiya-paritta). The biggest addition though is adding in a chapter on Buddha Metteyya at the end of the Buddha Jewel.

References have been changed into the normal citation style in English works and is usually done with a translation of the title; so that, for instance, the “Third Sutta, 4. Mahā-vagga, Navaka Nipāta of the Āṅguttara-nikāya,” becomes “The Discourse on the Happiness of Nibbāna (Nibbāna-sukha-sutta, AN 9.34).” Also, in many cases, references that were omitted in the original have been added in, and I have given, where appropriate, the PTS page number. Unfortunately, however, the references in the original were sometimes too vague to be tracked down (i.e., simply given as: “Visuddhi-magga-mahā-ṭīkā,” which is a huge work), and I have only updated the title to “sub-commentary to the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga).” Dates and months which were given in an obscure Myanmar style of dating have been converted to CE/BCE, and month names have been given in English with Pāḷi equivalents.

Long notes that break up the story seem sometimes to have been written by the author and sometimes by the translators (there is no guidance given on these matters). I have usually brought them into the body of the text, though they are then distinguished from other parts of the text by being indented and set in a smaller font size, so they can be skipped if the reader wishes to avoid what are often technical details, and can continue with the story; short notes, which were placed in brackets, perhaps again by the translators, have most times been included directly into the body of the text, without marker, as they are essential for a proper understanding of the text. They have also sometimes been changed to footnotes where appropriate.

The Anudīpanī, translated here to Further Explanations, which was a long appendix of 400+ pages, has now been re-edited to bring together material that was sometimes dispersed, and I have moved much more material from the main text to this appendix, where it is better suited, so that it is now well over 500 pages long. All such changes have been noted in the text.

Many times the paragraphs were full of Pāḷi words, with no translation, so that the uninitiated would not know what is being said. Here I have prioritized the English translation and mainly put the Pāḷi in brackets, and sometimes only at the first instance within the section. On the other hand, I have also added in the Pāḷi when it was felt it would help in clarifying the translation.

Pāḷi text is written in blue and indented; translation is in dark red and slightly less indented; comments are given in green text. Footnotes in square brackets have been added in by the present editor.

I benefited greatly by having two helpers: Donny Hacker, who read the whole text through and made many improvements; and Anagārika Ṭhānuttamo, who read through the Further Explanations and helped correct that text, and also commented on the main text up to Chapter XII. Any mistakes that remain – and I am sure there still are some – are my fault. If you see any mistakes, or places where the text could be improved, please mail me at anandajoti@gmail.com.

The Author

The author, Bhaddanta Vicittasārābhivaṃsa, or Mingun Sayādaw, as he is popularly known, was born in the village of Thaibyua on November 11, 1911. At the age of eight, he was sent to Sayādaw U Sobhita of Min-gyaung monastery, Myingyan, to start learning the rudiments of Buddhism. When he was ten, he was ordained as a novice by the same Sayādaw. Ten years later he went to Dhammanāda monastery, a secluded monastery in Mingun, Sagaing Township, for further learning. In 1930, he received higher ordination. His sponsors were Daw Dhammacārī, a prominent and learned nun of Mingun, who was the author of the Truth-Speaker (Sacca-vādī) sub-commentary, and Sir U Thwin, a wealthy philanthropist of Yangon. Since then, Daw Dhammacārī became his spiritual mother and Sir U Thwin the fatherly supporter for his religious life. In 1937, when the first Dhammanāda Sayādaw, who was the preceptor at his ordination, passed away, he had to take charge of the monastery.

Sayādaw had passed a series of religious examinations invariably with flying colours since the age of 13. To mention but a few, in his fourth year as a monastic, he passed the Dhammācariya Examination held by the Pariyatti Sāsanaḥita Association of Mandalay, which was a formidable examination for which only a few candidates dare to sit. The Examination is on the three great commentaries, which candidates normally try to finish one by one in three years.

But the author passed all three commentaries in one year and acquired the rare and coveted title of Pariyatti Sāsanaḥita Dhammācariya Vaṭaṃsakā.

However, the first time he really made a name for himself as a man of vast learning was when he passed with distinctions the Tipiṭakadhara Examination, which was held for the first time and was also reputed to be the longest and most difficult Examination. As the name suggests, the candidate has to recite all Three Baskets (Tipiṭaka) that he had learned by heart. In addition, he has to pass the written papers on all the canonical texts and commentaries. It took him four years to sit the whole Examination that earned him, in 1953, the unique title of Tipiṭakadhara Dhammabhaṇḍāgārika, which means “Bearer of the Three Baskets and Keeper of the Dhamma-Treasure.” Sayādaw’s ability to recite what amounts to 16,000 pages of the Buddhist Canonical Texts has been recorded in the Guinness Book of Records in 1985.

As regards his work for the Sāsana, suffice it to say that even before that great achievement of being Tipiṭakadhara Dhammabhaṇḍāgārika, when the Sixth Buddhist Council was well under way, Sayādaw was assigned the task of editing the Canonical texts to be approved by the Council as its sessions. Besides this, when the Council was convened, Sayādaw acted as the Respondent (Vissajjaka) answering questions on all three portions of the Canon. The Questioner (Pucchaka) was the late Mahāsi Sayādaw (1904-1982). In answering the questions, the author took the combined role of Vens. Upāli and Ānanda who answered the questions on the Vinaya and the Dhamma respectively at the First Council presided over by Ven. Mahā Kassapa.

After the Council, the author devoted himself to literary pursuits. At the request of U Nu, then Prime Minister of Myanmar, he assiduously compiled the Great Chronicles of the Buddha (Mahā-buddha-vaṃsa), being the Myanmar exposition on the lives of the Buddhas as related mainly in the Chronicles of the Buddha (Buddha-vaṃsa) of the Collection of the Supplementary Texts (Khuddaka-nikāya). This compilation, which resulted in six volumes in eight books, was commenced in 1956 and ended in 1969. The work, being the author’s magnum opus and a colossal contribution to Myanmar Buddhist literature, has been received with enthusiastic acclaim by members of the Saṅgha and the laity alike.

In the year 1980, an historic event in the history of the Saṅgha in Myanmar took place, which was the emergence of the State Saṅgha Mahā Nāyaka Committee, comprising representatives of all sects of the Buddhist Saṅgha in Myanmar. The author was unanimously elected permanent General Secretary of the Committee, which, as the Supreme Authority on Buddhist religious affairs of the country, is responsible for the growth, development and prosperity of the Buddha-sāsana.

In addition to his responsibilities as General Secretary of the State Saṅgha Mahā Nāyaka Committee, the author was devoted to the service of the Sāsana in three main areas, namely, providing support and facilities for the emergence of more Bearers of the Three Baskets (Tipiṭaka-dhara) for the perpetuation of the Sāsana; providing support and facilities for the dissemination of the Buddha's teaching at home and abroad; and providing adequate medical facilities for members of the Saṅgha from all over Myanmar.

For the first task, the author founded the Tipiṭaka Nikāya Organization whose chief aim is to nurture young monastics so that they may one day become "Bearers of the Three Baskets and Keepers of the Dhamma-Treasure" like himself. There were a number of promising students under his care at Momeik Hill near Mingun.

[Since the author's achievement, there have been twelve other holders of the same title up and till March 2023]

Soon after the formation of the State Saṅgha Mahā Nāyaka Committee, it firmly resolved to establish two separate universities of the Learning Dispensation (Pariyatti-sāsana) in Yangon and Mandalay, where the Good Dhamma of the Perfectly Awakened One would be taught in a new system of education to produce elders who will spread the teaching in Myanmar and elsewhere. In pursuance of the second objective, the author's untiring efforts have resulted in magnificent University buildings which have newly sprung up in both Yangon and Mandalay where courses leading to the Degrees of Dhammācariya and Mahā Dhammācariya have been operating since 1986.

As to the third important project undertaken by the author for the welfare of the Saṅgha, the Jīvitadāna Sāsana Specialist Hospital for monastics was founded in Mandalay. It is a 100-bed specialist hospital with all the facilities and equipment for a modern health centre and was formally opened under the auspices of the author himself on August 18, 1990.

In recognition of his great learning and of his invaluable services to the Sāsana, as mentioned above, the Government conferred upon him the title of Agga- mahā-paṇḍita (The Supremely Learned One) in 1979 and the title of Abhidhaja Mahā-raṭṭha-guru (The Noble Banner and Great Preceptor of the State) in 1984.

Hail and hearty at the age of 79, the indefatigable Sayādaw keeps on striving continuously, day in and day out, towards the furtherance of his three main tasks, thus setting an exemplary model for emulation to all who desire to promote the welfare of beings by means of the Buddha-Dhamma.

[The learned Sayādaw died on Feb 9th, 1993 at the age of 81. This was surely a great loss for the Sāsana, though his spirit lives on in his foundations and disciples.]

Brief History

In 1954, [1] then Prime Minister of Myanmar, U Nu, requested the Late Bhaddanta Vicittasārābhivaṃsa, Ven. Mingun Sayādaw, to compile the Great Chronicles of the Buddhas (Mahā-buddha-vaṃsa), being the Myanmar exposition of the lives of the Buddhas as related mainly in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) in the Collection of the Supplementary Texts (Khuddaka-nikāya).

This compilation entitled “The Great Chronicles of the Buddhas,” resulting in six volumes in eight books, was commenced in 1956 and ended in 1969. The work, being the author’s magnum opus and a colossal contribution to Myanmar Buddhist literature, has been received with enthusiastic acclaim by members of the Saṅgha and the laity alike.

This Chronicle made its appearance after the convening of the Sixth Buddhist Council. It was subsequently translated into English by Myanmar scholars for the benefit of the English-speaking readers and has recently been revised to bring it more in line with English usage and presentation.

The Chronicle vividly describes, for the benefit of those who are virtuous devotees of Buddhism, how the Buddha, the true friend of the three classes of beings, had performed unique, meritorious deeds beginning from his existence as the recluse Sumedha.

Sumedha met Buddha Dīpaṅkara and obtained assurance from him that he would, in time to come, gain Supreme Awakening as Buddha Gotama, which is during our present aeon. In his quest for Awakening in the cycle of births and deaths, the Bodhisatta met the past 24 Buddhas, which are described in detail.

This book retells the Buddha Gotama’s story and also the lives of his prominent disciples, and the book will appeal not only to the casual reader but also to the serious student of Buddhism.

*Kīdiso te Mahā-vīra, abhinīhāro naruttama,
kamhi kāle tayā dhīra, patthitā Bodhim-uttamā?*

O Buddha, who is endowed with the four kinds of right exertion, who is the highest among men and higher than Devas and Brahmas, and who is thus chief of these three categories of beings! How should we comprehend your resolve to become a Buddha with great glory that pervades the whole universe extending from the bottom realm of intense suffering to the top realm of the Brahmas. Since when has your mind become inclined to achieve the highest laurel of Perfect Self-Awakening, which surpasses the Awakening of an Independent Buddha and the Awakening of a Disciple?

The four right exertions (sammappadhāna) are: 1) The endeavour to prevent the arising of evil which has not yet arisen; 2) the endeavour to put away evil that has arisen; 3) the endeavour to bring about the arising of good which has not yet arisen; and 4) the endeavour to further develop the good that has arisen.

[This is the text and a translation of Bv 1.75. As can be seen, this is a very long translation of what is just two lines in Pāḷi, an expansive form of translation the author uses throughout the text. Although not common in English, this form of translation is very common in Buddhist countries.]

This enquiring note of acclamation was sounded in the sky over the city of Kapilavatthu on the first waning moon of May (Vesākha), in the year 527 BCE.<sup>1</sup> The background story, in brief, of this question is narrated below.

The Buddha, the omniscient one and Lord of the Three Worlds, observed the first Rains Retreat (Vassa) in the Deer Park of Isipatana, Bārāṇasī, in the year 528 BCE. During this retreat, he converted the Group-of-Five ascetics and the group of 54 friends headed by Yasa, the son of a wealthy man, leading them to Awakening. When the retreat was over, he asked them to disseminate the Dhamma, which is excellent in all three aspects – the beginning, the middle and the end – with no two of them going in the same direction. He himself went alone towards the forest of Uruvelā to convert the three ascetic Kassapa brothers and their followers, numbering 1,000.

On the way to Uruvelā, on reaching the Kappāsika cotton grove, the Buddha met with the group of 30 auspicious (bhadda-vaggiya) men who were searching for a woman who had run away from their party. He established them in the lower paths and fruitions and made them monastics by summoning them to come forth (ehi-bhikkhu). Then he proceeded alone to Uruvelā, where he liberated the eldest brother, Uruvelā Kassapa and his 500 followers, from heretical views. He did the same for Nadī Kassapa and his 300 followers and Gayā Kassapa and his 200 followers. Finally, he taught to all 1,000 ascetics the Instruction about Burning (Āditta-pariyāya-sutta, SN 35.235)<sup>2</sup> on the stone slab at Gayāsīsa and thereby established them in the fruition of Arahantship. And, together with the 1,000 newly accomplished Arahats, the Buddha set out on a journey to the city of Rājagaha.

The day the Buddha arrived in Rājagaha, he helped King Bimbisāra and the Brahmin householders with his teaching to reach Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala), 110,000 in all, and another 10,000 Brahmin householders were established in the three refuges (tisaraṇa). The following day, the Buddha accepted the Veḷuvana monastery which was generously donated by King Bimbisāra in support of his ministry. It was the first monastery he had ever accepted, and the occasion of his acceptance of the monastery was marked by a great earthquake. From that time onwards, he taught all those worthy of [2] conversion who came to him, including those who would eventually become chief disciples, great disciples and ordinary disciples. He did so as though he were dispensing amongst them the medicine of deathlessness.

While the Buddha was thus busily engaging himself, his father, King Suddhodana, sent nine ministers, one after another, each with 1,000 men, on a mission to invite him to return to Kapilavatthu. Instead, they became Arahats and neither conveyed the king's message to the Buddha, nor sent back any information to the king. So the Buddha's playmate, the minister Kāḷudāyī, was sent as the tenth envoy, also with 1,000 men. Kāḷudāyī and his men became Arahats also and spent time enjoying the bliss of their spiritual attainment. When the cold season was over and spring arrived, Kāḷudāyī made a humble request to the Buddha, in 64 verses, persuading him to return to the home of his kinsmen. The Buddha then journeyed to the city of Kapilavatthu on the first day after the full moon of March (Phagguṇa) travelling slowly, covering only one league a day, and arrived at Kapilavatthu on the first day after the full moon of May (Vesākha) in the year 527 BCE.

On the same day, the Sakyan princes welcomed the Buddha and his host of monastics in a great ceremony and took them to Nigrodhārāma monastery as arranged beforehand. On arrival at the monastery, the Buddha sat in the seat specially prepared for him and remained quiet, surrounded by 20,000 Arahats. The Sakyans, who took too great a pride in their high birth, thought to themselves: “This Prince Siddhattha is younger than us. He is only a young brother, or a young nephew, or a young grandson of ours,” and puffed up with conceit, they urged their younger kinsmen: “You bow in homage to the Buddha; we shall, however, stand behind you.”

The Buddha knew the inner minds of the Sakyan princes were full of pride at their birth and thought to himself: “These proud kinsfolk of mine do not realize that they have grown old without accomplishing anything beneficial for themselves. They know nothing about the nature of a Buddha. They know nothing about the power of a Buddha. Thinking: “What if I were to display a Buddha’s might by performing the twin miracle of water and fire; I will make a jewelled walk in the sky, a platform as broad as the 10,000 world-element and I will walk to and fro on it and pour forth a shower of teachings to suit the temperaments of all those who come to me.” No sooner had he resolved on this, than the Brahmas and Devas shouted out their joyous approval.

Then the Buddha entered upon the fourth absorption (jhāna) taking the colour white as his object of concentration. On arising from that absorption, he made a firm resolve that light should spread all over the 10,000 world-element. Immediately after that resolution, all the universes were flooded with light to the great delight of humans, Devas and Brahmas. While they were rejoicing, the Buddha rose up into the sky by developing the supernormal power through exercise of the fourth absorption.

Then he proceeded to perform the twin miracle (yamaka-pāṭihāriya), which consisted of the appearance of flames of fire and streams of water emitted alternatively from: 1) The top and bottom of the body; 2) the front and the back; 3) the eyes; 4) the ears; 5) the nose; 6) the shoulders; 7) the hands; 8) the sides; 9) the feet; 10) the fingers, toes and from between one finger and another, as well as from between one toe and another; 11) from each hair of the body; and 12) from every pore of the body.

The fire-sparks emitted and water-sprays fell amidst the crowds of human and celestial beings as though the Buddha was letting the dust fall from his feet onto their heads. This exhibition of the twin miracle with the emission of fire and water alternately from the body of the Buddha created a marvellous spectacle of great splendour which inspired all the Sakyan princes with awe and reverence, moving them to utter words of resounding praise.

After the performance of the twin miracle, the Buddha created a jewelled walk of great brilliance which extended from east to west reaching even beyond the 10,000 world-element. He then walked up and down the jewelled walk and delivered several discourses to Devas and humans according to their mental dispositions.

At that time, Venerable Sāriputta, who was residing at Gijjhakūṭa Hill in Rājagaha, through his supernormal power saw the whole event taking place at Kapilavatthu and [3] thought to himself: “I shall now go to the Buddha and make a request for a complete narration of the life stories of the Buddhas and the perfections (pāramī) they had fulfilled.” Accordingly, he lost no time to gather the 500 Arahats, who were all his co-residents, and said to them: “Come, we will go and pay a visit to the master and ask him about the past stories of the Buddhas.” Having urged them to accompany him, they travelled through space by means of supernormal power, at a speed which surpassed that of the wind and the storm, and in a moment, Ven. Sāriputta, with a company of monastics, arrived before the Buddha and paid homage to him. Then he uttered the verse (Bv 1.75):

*Kīdiso te Mahā-vīra, abhinīhāro naruttama,

which was mentioned above, thereby asking the Buddha to elaborate on how he had received the definite prophecy from the former Buddhas and how he had fulfilled the ten perfections, which extend to thirty in all, for the Bodhisattas. Then the Buddha, who was still on the walkway, responded with two verses (Bv 1.80-81):

*Pīti-pāmojja-jananam, soka-salla-vinodanam, sabba-sampatti-paññābhāṇam, cittī-katvā suṇātha me.
Mada-nimmadanam sokaṇudam, Saṃsāra-parimocanam, sabba-dukkhakkhayam maggam, sakkaccam paṭipajjatha.*

Listen to the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) which will give you joy and happiness, remove the thorns of sorrow and bestow upon you the three kinds of bliss: human existence, divine existence and Nibbāna. Having thus listened, try to follow and practise the path, as will be explained in this discourse that will dispel conceit, eradicate sorrow, liberate you from Saṃsāra and put an end to all suffering.

Thus, the Buddha, out of compassion, urged all humans, Devas and Brahmās reciting the verses numbering four recital sections (bhāṇavāra) or approximately 1080 verses.<sup>3</sup>

The Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) is included in the Collection of the Supplementary Texts (Khuddaka-nikāya), which was recited at the first, second and third councils by Arahats. The commentary on it, entitled the Clarifier of the Sweet Meaning (Madhu-rattha-vilāsinī), consisting of 26 bhāṇavāra (approx 200,000 syllables) was authored by Ven. Buddhadatta, a resident of the Port monastery of Kāvīrapaṭṭana of the Coḷa Country in South India.

The Great Chronicles of the Buddha's Story

During the reign of King Bagyidaw (A.D.1819-37), the fourth founder of the city of Ratanapūra, the first Ngakhon Sayādaw, recipient of the title of Ādiccavaṃsābhidhaja Mahādhammarājādhirājaguru, wrote the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) story in prose. He combined the text and its commentary, interspersed with certain Pāḷi verses and their word-for-word translations, for the benefits of joy, the end of sorrow, etc., by young men and women of good families, but he did not translate the whole text word for word, as there already existed well-known translations in that style called nissaya, or word-by-word translations.

That Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) in Myanmar prose was published in 1935 by Zambumeitswe Piṭaka Press, Yangon, in three volumes, with the title: “The Great Chronicles of the Buddhas Story.”

Sudhammavatī Buddha-vaṃsa

Not long after the Great Chronicles of the Buddhas Story was published, the Chronicles of the Buddhas endowed with the True Dhamma (Sudhammavatī Buddha-vaṃsa) appeared in one volume of poetical prose, written by editor U Htun Sein. [4]

The State Buddhasāsana Council's Version

After the founding of the newly independent country of the Union of Myanmar, the people, both the Saṅgha and the laity, were busy assiduously making preparations and arrangements, shouldering their respective responsibilities for holding the Sixth Buddhist Council. The Prime Minister U Nu, seeing their dedicated activities, was inspired by the profound thought of bringing out a new version of the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) and its commentary, a version that should include everything that is connected with the Buddhas. Accordingly, he requested me, in his house, on the occasion of a “Countless births” (Aneka-jāti) ceremony<sup>4</sup> and inauguration of his shrine-room, to write such a story of the Buddhas in commemoration of the great event of the Buddhist Council.

I said to the Prime Minister then: “I have been assigned to participate as a Bearer of the Three Baskets (Tipiṭaka-dhara) in the Sixth Buddhist Council, which is to be held soon, and I still have to work hard to become qualified for the title.” With this excuse, I declined to comply with his request. Indeed, at that time, I had just passed the written examination in the Basket of Discipline (Vinaya-piṭaka) and was about to sit for another one on the Basket of the Abstract Teaching (Abhidhamma-piṭaka).

Succession of Compilers

Undaunted by my refusal of his request, the Prime Minister persisted in his earnest effort to produce the proposed book by approaching other scholars, and the compilation was started first under the supervision of Medhāvī Sayagyi U Saing. Some months later, when only a portion had been done, the work was interrupted until Mahāpaññābala Paṭhamagyaw Sayagyi U Kyee Pe took over as supervisor. In the same way, the compilation again passed on to Aggamahāpaṇḍita Sayagyi U Lin, M.A. After one and a half years, he could finish compiling only the first volume of the series, from the story of Sumedha up to the end of the story of Buddha Kassapa. Then U Lin passed away to our great regret, leaving only the fame of his learning.

The Assignment

It was on the 11th day of the waxing moon on December 6, 1954, that Sayagyi U Lin passed away. Four days later, the sponsor of my ordination and spiritual father, the wealthy Sir U Thwin, Thadosirī Sudhamma, Chairman of the State Buddhasāsana Council and Patron of the Sixth Buddhist Council, came to see me at the request of the Prime Minister and asked me not to refuse should the Prime Minister make a request for writing a Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa). On the full moon day of January 8th 1955, the Prime Minister himself came to see me at my temporary residence at the Saṅgha Yeiktha Meditation Centre and made a formal request as follows:

1. Please supervise the compilation of a treatise on the lives of the Buddhas. In so doing, please include everything about the Buddhas, not leaving out even minor details. If one volume is not enough, make it two; if two is not enough, make it four, eight and so on. It is important that the work should be exhaustive.
2. The writing should be intelligible and interesting to all, young and old, even to non-Buddhists who wish to know about the lives of the Buddhas.
3. Should the Ven. Sayādaw undertake the task of writing the Great Chronicles of the Buddhas (Mahā-buddha-vamsa) in Myanmar, it will be welcomed by all, both the Saṅgha and the laity alike.

The request had been made repeatedly, the first time in 1951, the second time in 1953, and now in 1954, by my spiritual father, and finally by the Prime Minister himself. I therefore felt that I should no longer refuse to comply with their request. Accordingly, I gave my consent firmly, saying: “Very well, Dāyakagyi, when the proceedings of the Council are over, I will take charge of the compilation and supervise the work to the best of my ability without sparing my energy.”

Yañ-hi kayirā tañ-hi vade; yañ na kayirā na tañ vade, [5] akarontam bhāsamānam, parijānanti paṇḍitā.

One should say what one would do; one should not say what one does not do. He who says but does not do is subject to blame by the wise.

Request by the State Buddhasāsana Council

Not long after I had made a promise to the Prime Minister, the State Buddhasāsana Council also made its own request. In reply to it, I stipulated the following three terms for carrying out the work: 1) The work would be done voluntarily without acceptance of any honorarium; 2) I would have nothing to do with office administrative work; and 3) I would only take charge of the literary matters in which I feel competent. I added that if these three conditions were agreeable to the State Buddhasāsana Council, it would mean that I had accepted the assignment.

Some days later, three officials from the State Buddhasāsana Council, namely, Chief Editor U Ba Hmi and Editors Saya Htun and Saya U Ba Than, approached me with the favourable reply that the State Buddhasāsana Council had agreed to all the points raised by me.

Then, in accepting the compilation work, I said to Saya Htun and Saya U Ba Than: “Subject to failure is a work without a leader, so is a work with too many leaders. I accept the work as its supervisor so that the compilation of the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) may not fail. You carry on with the assignment as has been planned since the time of Sayagi U Lin. I shall attend to the editing work when the proceedings of the Council come to an end.”

The Prime Minister’s Request

As though “to drive in a nail where it is already firm, or to strap on an iron belt where it is already tight,” the Prime Minister’s formal request in writing came. The letter was dated the December 28, 1955.<sup>5</sup>

Sayagi U Lin’s Great Learning

When the Sixth Buddhist Council and the ceremonies commemorating the 2500th year of Buddhism in 1956 came to an end, in compliance with the Prime

Minister's request and in fulfilment of my promise, I started editing the manuscripts so far prepared on the Great Chronicles of the Buddhas (Mahā-buddha-vam̐sa). I found them running to over 700 pages and they were full of noteworthy facts with profound meanings, covering a wide field but not easy to be grasped by ordinary people. In preparing these manuscripts, it looked as if the Sayagyi was making a final display of his great genius of learning.

When Sayagyi U Lin first planned the compilation of the Great Chronicles of the Buddhas (Mahā-buddha-vam̐sa), he had in mind to write it only briefly and did so accordingly. But the Prime Minister U Nu earnestly urged him, saying: "Let it be as elaborate as possible, Sayagyi. Write all there is to know about the Buddhas; there cannot be anything that is too insignificant to be left out. Please write to the best of your ability for the benefit of the coming generations." Sayagyi then put aside all that had been written before briefly and worked afresh keeping his mind steadfastly on the subject of the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vam̐sa) all the time. When he began working, on arrival at his office, he would put both his arms on the desk and start dictating to his stenographer, giving him no rest, sometimes making a clicking sound with his tongue, at other times, clenching the fists, closing the eyes and gnashing the teeth to concentrate his energy. All this was known from the information given by Saya Htun.

A New Plan for the Work

Such a very ambitious literary work, which was full of noteworthy doctrinal points with their deep meanings, like a treasure house of knowledge presented by the Sayagyi as if "he [6] had hoisted the flag of learning" of his lifetime, could not be published as originally envisaged by him. I feared that readers would find it rather confusing and difficult to read and understand. Therefore, the writing of the Great Chronicles of the Buddhas (Mahā-buddha-vam̐sa) had to be planned anew as follows:

1. The main subject of the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vam̐sa) should be treated separately.
2. Chapter II on "The Rare Appearance of a Buddha" should be re-written and confirmed by other learned Sayādaws.
3. A new chapter, now chapters VII and VIII, on miscellaneous matters concerning duties which should be comprehended and performed by every aspirant of Buddhahood, should be added. [This is now The First Treatise on the Perfections in the Further Explanations.]

4. Explanatory notes and interpretations should be given fully in a separate chapter, entitled the Further Explanations, to serve as a supplement to the first part of the first volume.
5. Difficult usages should be made easy by replacing them with simple ones.

When the manuscripts of the Great Chronicles of the Buddhas (Mahā-buddha-vaṃsa) finally went to the press of the State Buddhasāsana Council, Sayagyi Saya Nyan, Mahāpaṇṇābala, Professor of Pāḷi, acted as chief proof reader.

Exhortation to Readers

This version of the Great Chronicles of the Buddhas (Mahā-buddha-vaṃsa) contains the same material with the same meaning as that preserved in the original Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) text and its commentary, etc. The only difference between the original works and this lies in the medium employed, the former in Pāḷi and the latter in Myanmar.

Here, of course, translated into English. It should be said that the Great Chronicles of the Buddhas contains far more than just the original Chronicles of the Buddhas, including much information about Buddha Gotama, which is greatly expanded on and now forms the bulk of the work, and his disciples, which is entirely absent from the original work.

Since a Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) can truly confer upon its worthy readers such benefits as: 1) Joy and happiness, 2) an end of sorrow, and 3) the three attainments of human existence, divine existence and Nibbāna, as has been pronounced by the Buddha, this Introduction is concluded with an exhortation in verse so that each reader might enjoy his or her share of welfare.

Buddha-vādīnam-atthāya taṃ nisāmetha sādhave.*

You worthy men of gentle mind, seeking your own interest and that of others! This book of the Great Chronicles of the Buddhas, a version commissioned by the State Buddhasāsana Council, which has made its appearance in commemoration of the convening of the Sixth Buddhist Council, resembles a plot of land on which virtuous Buddhists may sow the seeds of the Dhamma. It vividly describes, for the benefits of those who are virtuous devotees of Buddhism, how the Buddha, the friend of the three classes of beings, performed unique, meritorious deeds beginning from his existence as Sumedha. Therefore, you all who aspire after the fourfold knowledge of the path, the true Awakening, should study it carefully with an eye of wisdom, fully confident that you will gain the fruits of joy and happiness, an end of sorrow, and the three attainments of human existence, divine existence and Nibbāna.

U Vicittasārābhivaṃsa,

Tipiṭakadhara Dhammabhaṇḍāgārika,

The 7th waxing moon of July (Āsālha), 1969.

[The printed translation gave the date as 1399, Myanmar era, but there must be some mistake here, as 1399 corresponds to 2037 CE, which cannot be right. It says in the Introduction that the author started the work in 1956 and completed it in 1969. I have therefore dated it at the year of completion.]

The Bodhisatta<sup>6</sup>

I: Salutation and Intention<sup>7</sup>

Namo Tassa Bhagavato Arahato Sammā-sambuddhassa!

This Pāli sentence is a formula of great honour paid to the Buddha which may be translated: “Honour to him, the Fortunate One, the Worthy One, the Perfectly Self-Enlightened One.” A Buddhist literary work usually begins with this to show the author’s devotion and obeisance.

With [7] most respectful adoration, I pay obeisance to the Buddha who, like his predecessors, has made a very rare appearance; who, like them, has no peers among humans, Devas and Brahmas in the three worlds; who, like them, forms a refuge for all these beings who bow in homage; and who is like them in all aspects of glory, virtues and attributes.

Malalasekera says there are eight differences (aṭṭha-vemattāni), “the eight particulars in which the Buddha differ from each other.” His rendering of these eight are: “Length of life in the epoch in which each is born, the height of his body, his social rank – some are born as nobles (khattiya), others as Brahmins – the length of his austerities, the aura of his body,<sup>8</sup> the conveyance in which he makes his renunciation, the tree under which he attains Enlightenment, and the size of the seat (pallaṅka) under the Bodhi tree.” See the Dictionary of Pāli Proper Names under Buddha (DPPN II, p. 296). [Also see the discussion in the Supplement in the Further Explanations.]

With most respectful adoration, I pay obeisance to the Dhamma, which, through his omniscience and out of profound compassion for all beings, has been well taught<sup>9</sup> by the Buddha, and which has been held in high esteem.

With most respectful adoration, I pay obeisance to the Saṅgha, the community of noble ones, who have become true sons of the master by their proper and upright practice<sup>10</sup> of the Dhamma.

Having paid respects to the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha, I shall now write in a language neither too brief nor too elaborate, neither too simple nor too difficult, and relying mainly on the canonical texts of the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa)<sup>11</sup> and its commentary, but also taking relevant materials from other texts and commentaries, the Great Chronicles of the Buddhas (Mahā-buddha-vamsa), a book on the lives of the 25 Awakened Ones from out of innumerable past Buddhas, whose number is far greater than that of the grains of sand of the Ganges,<sup>12</sup> beginning with the account of the exalted Dīpaṅkara, from whom the future Gotama, as the ascetic Sumedha, received the definite prophecy that he would [8] become a Perfectly Self-Awakened One.

Receiving of the definite prophecy (nīyata-vyākaraṇa) is an important feature in the spiritual evolution of a Bodhisatta. We shall see more about it when we come to the story of Sumedha.

May those virtuous people, who are desirous of seeking merit and knowledge; who, with abiding faith, have established a firm foundation of refuge in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha; and who are properly and uprightly cultivating the threefold practice of morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā), easily attain the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna. [9]

After the word Buddha, the author adds an adjectival clause reading: “Whose supremacy in the three worlds is like the ruby-studded pinnacle of a palace.” The three worlds here are the three realms of sensuality (kāma), form (rūpa) and the formless (arūpa). The first corresponds to the realm of the five senses, comprising the four woeful states (apāya), the human world and the six celestial worlds. The form and formless worlds belong to the Brahmas.

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha

Living When a Buddha Appears

The wealthy Anāthapiṇḍika,<sup>13</sup> who was to become the supporter of the Jetavana monastery, was on his visit to Rājagaha when he saw the Buddha for the first time, having heard the word Buddha from his wealthy brother-in-law<sup>14</sup> in Rājagaha. As soon as he heard the sound Buddha, he exclaimed: “Friend, rare indeed it is in the world even to hear the utterance, Buddha, Buddha (ghoso pi kho eso gahapati dullabho lokasmiṃ, yad-idaṃ, buddho buddho ti).”<sup>15</sup> Also while the Buddha was staying in the market town of Āpaṇa, in the country of Aṅguttarāpa, Sela, a leading Brahmin teacher, heard from Keṇiya, the matted-hair ascetic, the word Buddha. As soon as he heard the sound Buddha, it occurred to him thus: “Rare indeed it is in the world even to hear the utterance, Buddha, Buddha (ghoso pi kho eso dullabho lokasmiṃ, yad-idaṃ, buddho buddho ti).”

He visited his friend Keṇiya, who was then preparing to shower his lavish hospitality on the Buddha and his Saṅgha, an incident similar to that of Anāthapiṇḍika. Both were filled with joy on hearing such a great name as Buddha. See the Discourse concerning Sela (Sela-sutta, MN 92).

Not long after, together with 300 followers, he gained the “Come bhikkhu” (ehi-bhikkhu) ordination, and seven days thence, he became an Arahat together with his followers.

“Come bhikkhu,” was the summons made by the Buddha in order to bring a deserving person into the Saṅgha. Accordingly, it formed the oldest formula of admission to the Saṅgha.

In the light of these canonical extracts it can be seen it is very rare and difficult in the world even to hear the word Buddha; inexpressibly and extremely more so indeed is the actual appearance of a Buddha.

In this respect, it may be noted that the utterance ‘diamond’ may refer to a genuine diamond or a fake. Likewise, because rumours of a coming Buddha had

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 22

been widespread prior to the Buddha's appearance, both Anāthapiṇḍika and Sela must have heard before of the false claim of the six teachers to be Buddhas.

They were Pūraṇa Kassapa, Makkhali Gosāla, Ajita Kesakambala, Pukudha Kaccāyana, Nigaṇṭha Nāṭaputta and Sañjaya Belaṭṭhaputta. Chasatthara in Pāli simply means “six teachers.” They were all ascetics (samaṇa) and non-brahmanical teachers and contemporaries of the Buddha but older in age.

But just as the sound of the word ‘diamond’, only when spoken of a genuine one, would please one who can differentiate between a genuine diamond and a fake one; so also, to such men of highly developed intelligence as Anāthapiṇḍika and Sela, the utterance Buddha could have been delightful only when spoken of the true Buddha.

Just as taking a fake diamond to be genuine by unworthy persons of poor intelligence is a wrong notion, even so taking their masters, the six heretical teachers, to be genuine Buddhas by those who followed them was a wrong and harmful conclusion [10] (micchādhimokkha).

In order to appreciate more profoundly the rare phenomenon of a Buddha's appearance in the world, it is important to know briefly at the beginning the following matters concerning a Bodhisatta and a Buddha:

1. A being destined to attain Awakening (Bodhisatta).
2. The daily duties of a Bodhisatta (Bodhisatta-kicca).
3. A Supreme Being who has fulfilled the duties of a Bodhisatta and has consequently attained Awakening (Buddha).
4. The daily duties of a Buddha (Buddha-kicca).

1. Bodhisatta

The fourfold insight knowledge of the path (magga-ñāṇa) with or without accompaniment of omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) is called Awakening (Bodhi).

The four noble truths are: 1) the truth of suffering (dukkha), 2) the origin of suffering (dukkha-samudaya), 3) the cessation of suffering (dukkha-nirodha) and 4) the path leading to the cessation of suffering (dukkha-nirodha-gāminī paṭipadā).

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 23

The path leading to the cessation of suffering, which forms the last of the four noble truths, is eightfold. The eightfold path consists of 1) Right understanding (sammā-diṭṭhi); 2) right thinking (sammā-saṅkappa); 3) right speech (sammā-vācā); 4) right bodily action (sammā-kammanta); 5) right livelihood (sammā-ājīva); 6) right effort (sammā-vāyāma); 7) right mindfulness (sammā-sati); and 8) right concentration (sammā-samādhi). The first two form wisdom (paññā), the second set of three, morality (sīla) and the last three, concentration (samādhi), see the Dispeller of Delusion (Sammoha-vinodanī, PTS 90).

Knowledge of omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) is a compound of omniscience (sabbaññutā) and knowledge (ñāṇa). The word occurs in Netti 204; DA 1.44; VibhA PTS 144. One who is endowed with omniscience (sabbaññutā) or knowledge of omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) is an omniscient one (sabbaññū).

“The Buddha is omniscient, not in the sense that he knows everything, but that he could know anything should he so desire.” DPPN under Buddha (DPPN II p. 302).

Awakening is of three kinds:

1. Awakening consisting of the fourfold insight knowledge of the path with the accompaniment of omniscience (Sammā-sambodhi). The fourfold insight knowledge of the path is understanding of the four noble truths by oneself without a teacher’s help, and it has distinctive power of removing mental defilements as well as the habitual tendencies (vāsanā) of past existences; omniscience (sabbaññutā) is understanding all principles worthy of understanding.
2. Independent Awakening consisting of the fourfold insight knowledge of the path, which is understanding of the four noble truths by oneself without a teacher’s help (pacceka-bodhi).
3. Awakening consisting of the fourfold insight knowledge of the path, which is understanding of the four noble truths only with the help of a teacher (sāvaka-bodhi).

1. Noble persons who have a strong wholesome desire to realise Perfect Awakening (Sammā-sambodhi) are called Perfect Bodhisattas (Sammā-sambodhisattas).

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 24

2. Noble persons who have a strong wholesome desire to realise Independent Awakening (Pacceka-bodhi) are called Independent Bodhisattas (Pacceka-bodhisatta).

3. Noble persons who have a strong wholesome desire to realise the Awakening of a disciple (sāvaka-bodhi) are called future disciple Bodhisattas (sāvaka-bodhisatta).

Three Types of Bodhisattas

Of these three kinds of noble persons, 1) Perfect Bodhisattas (Sammā-Sambodhisatta) are grouped into three types:

1. Bodhisattas with predominant wisdom (paññādhika).
2. Bodhisattas with predominant faith (saddhādhika).
3. Bodhisattas with predominant energy (viriyādhika). [11]

Becoming a Buddha is attainment of omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa). To attain this supreme wisdom, the seeker must have a mentality in which wisdom is predominant. The factor of predominant wisdom means careful consideration and forethought in doing everything: physically, verbally or mentally. By so doing, one's wisdom becomes strengthened and mature, existence after existence, so that in due course one painlessly attains omniscience which is far superior to all kinds of wisdom. Just as money is gained in the world by means of monetary investment, even so omniscience is gained by means of intellectual investment.

1. Bodhisattas with the factor of predominant wisdom (paññādhika) always become Buddhas after fulfilling their perfections (pāramī) for four immeasurable periods (asaṅkhyeyyas) and 100,000 aeons.

Perfection: pāramī, also called pāramitā, “completeness” and “highest state,” are also given as meanings of the Pāli word in PED. The perfections are ten in number, which are “the perfect exercise of the ten principal virtues of a Bodhisatta.”

Immeasurable (asaṅkhyeyya) literally means “immeasurable” or “uncountable.” Some take it to be the figure one followed by 140 zeros, i.e., 10 to the power of 14, see Kacc. 395; Abhidh. 474-6.

Aeon (kappa) may also be translated as: “world cycle.” An aeon has an age of enormous length. For details, see the Further Explanations.

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 25

2. Other Bodhisattas also believe that they can become Buddhas by fulfilling the perfections, and in their mentality faith is predominant. With them, faith plays a greater role than wisdom. They are therefore called Bodhisattas with predominant faith (saddhādhika). Since they are not led by wisdom but by faith in their fulfilment of the perfections, they cannot become Buddhas after four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, but only after eight immeasurables and 100,000 aeons.

3. There are still other Bodhisattas who rely solely upon their energy. For them, wisdom is not a principal factor. Neither do they place emphasis on the faith that the perfections lead to Awakening. Holding that energy brings about Buddhahood, they give top priority to energy in their fulfilment of the perfections and become Buddhas only after sixteen immeasurables and 100,000 aeons. They are therefore called Bodhisattas with predominant energy (viriyādhika).

Thus it should be noted that the three designations viz., those with predominant wisdom (paññādhika), predominant faith (saddhādhika) and predominant energy (viriyādhika), are applied only to Bodhisattas. Otherwise, one would think that they belonged to Fully Awakened Buddhas. These distinctions exist only while they remain as Bodhisattas, but once they attain Buddhahood, they are all identical in respect of wisdom, faith and energy. One cannot say which Buddha is more accomplished than the other in each of these aspects.

*Paññādhikānaṃ hi saddhā mandā hoti, paññā tikkhā;
saddhādhikānaṃ paññā majjhimā hoti, saddhā balavā;
viriyādhikānaṃ saddhā-paññā mandā, viriyāṃ balavam.*<sup>16</sup>

In Bodhisattas with predominant wisdom, wisdom is strong but faith is weak; in Bodhisattas with predominant faith, wisdom is medial but faith is strong; in Bodhisattas with predominant energy, faith and wisdom are weak, but energy is strong.

Differences between the Three Types of Bodhisattas

Bodhisattas are of three types with three respective periods of [12] fulfilment of the perfections, namely, four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, eight immeasurables and 100,000 aeons and sixteen immeasurables and 100,000 aeons. The reason for this difference is mentioned in the Poem on the Perfections (Pāramidawgan Pyo)<sup>17</sup> an epic composed by the celebrated poet of Old Burma, Ashin Sīlavaṃsa, who was a monastic poet and literary genius (1453-1520), born in a village near Taungdwingyi, who made his name in the city of Ava. According to that text, the difference lies in the path chosen by the individual Bodhisatta; a Bodhisatta with predominant wisdom chooses the wisdom path which takes four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons to reach the goal; a Bodhisatta with predominant faith chooses the faith path which takes eight immeasurables and 100,000 aeons to reach the goal; and a Bodhisatta with predominant energy chooses the energy path which takes sixteen immeasurables and 100,000 aeons to reach the goal.

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 26

But what is mentioned in the Poem on the Perfections (Pāramidawgan Pyo) with regard to the three types of future Buddhas is apparently based on commentarial statements. It is interesting to note that, in the author's view, the words 'with predominant wisdom (paññādhika)', and so on, belong only to Bodhisattas, but not to Buddhas.

According to the view of other teachers, as mentioned in the Miscellany (Pakiṇṇaka-kathā) of the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka) commentary, the difference between the three durations lies in the three degrees of energy: strong, medial and weak.

This view implies that it takes Bodhisattas with predominant wisdom only four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons for fulfilment of the perfections because of their predominant energy; the view is thus not free from the fault of confusion (saṅkara-dosa) as it mixes up Bodhisattas with predominant wisdom with Bodhisattas with predominant energy.

The word saṅkara-dosa is also found in Sanskrit which in rhetoric means the confusion or blending together or metaphors which ought to be kept distinct, see SED.

The view, which appeals to the commentator Ven. Dhammapāla and others, is that the difference in duration is due to the difference in the degrees: strong, medial and weak, of the maturity of the perfections leading to emancipation (vimutti-paripācanīyā). To elaborate: even at the time of receiving the prophecy, Bodhisattas are of three types:

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 27

1. Bodhisattas who quickly grasp the teaching (ugghaṭitaññū-bodhisatta) are those who have the capacity to become Arahats together with the six super knowledges (abhiññā) and four kinds of analytical knowledges (paṭisambhidā). They can attain that stage even before the end of the third line of a verse of four lines delivered by a Buddha, if they wish to achieve the Awakening of a disciple (sāvaka-bodhi) in that very existence. This is one of the eight factors for receiving the prophecy.

The super knowledges (abhiññā) are: 1) Psychic powers (iddhi-vidhā); 2) the divine ear (dibba-sota); 3) penetration of others' mind (citta-pariyāya-ñāṇa or ceto-pariyāya); 4) the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu); 5) remembrance of former existences (pubbe-nivāsānussati or pubbe-nivāsa); and 6) extinction of the pollutants (āsavakkhaya). The first five, being mundane, can be attained through intense mental concentration (samādhi) whereas the last being supermundane can be attained only through penetrating insight (vipassanā).

The analytical knowledges (paṭisambhidā) are: 1) Of meaning (attha); 2) of causal relations (dhamma); 3) of language (nirutti); and 4) and having a sharp intellect (paṭibhāna) which can define the above three analytical knowledges.

2. Bodhisattas who grasp the teaching after a detailed explanation (vipañcitaññū-bodhisatta) are those who have the capacity to become an Arahāt together with the six super knowledges and four kinds of analytical knowledge. They can attain that stage before the end of the fourth line of a verse of four lines delivered by a Buddha, if they wish to achieve the Awakening of a disciple (sāvaka-bodhi) in that very existence. [13]

3. Bodhisattas who need to be led (neyya-bodhisatta) are those who have the capacity to become an Arahāt together with the six super knowledges and four kinds of analytical knowledge. They can attain that stage at the end of the whole verse of four lines delivered by a Buddha, if they wish to achieve the Awakening of a disciple (sāvaka-bodhi) in that very existence.

With Bodhisattas who quickly grasp the teaching (ugghaṭitaññū-bodhisatta), the degree of maturity of the perfections leading to emancipation is so strong that they have to endeavour only for four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons after receiving the prophecy.

With Bodhisattas who grasp the teaching after a detailed explanation (vipañcitaññū-bodhisatta), the degree of maturity of the perfections leading to emancipation is medial and they have to endeavour for eight immeasurables and 100,000 aeons after receiving the prophecy.

With Bodhisattas who need to be led (neyya-bodhisatta), the degree of maturity of the perfections leading to emancipation is so weak that they have to endeavour for sixteen immeasurables and 100,000 aeons after receiving the prophecy.

Bodhisattas who quickly grasp the teaching are identical with Bodhisattas with predominant wisdom; so are Bodhisattas who grasp the teaching after a detailed explanation with Bodhisattas with predominant faith and Bodhisattas who need to be led with Bodhisattas with predominant energy.

The rice paddy species that ripens only when it is three, four or five months old by no means yields crops in fifteen days or a month although watering and weeding may have been done many times a day; its stems and leaves cannot grow as much as one would like and its ears cannot start bearing seeds, thrive and mature. In the same way, it should be noted that the three types of Bodhisattas by no means attain full Buddhahood with its perfectly ripe fruit of omniscience before they have completed the full course of the perfections that lasts 100,000 aeons in addition to four, eight or sixteen immeasurables even if, since receiving the prophecy, they have given daily alms like those of Prince Vessantara and have observed pertinent virtues such as morality, etc.

Vessantara was famous for his most daring generosity. From the time he was made king at the age of sixteen by his father he gave alms each day costing 600,000 pieces of money. Besides, he gave his white elephant, which had the power of causing rain, to the draught-stricken citizens of Jetuttara against the will of his own people. He was therefore banished to Vaṅkagiri, and while in exile he gave his son and daughter to Jūjaka, an old Brahmin who wanted to use them as slaves; he also gave his wife to Sakka, who came under the disguise of a Brahmin, to ask for her as a test of his generosity. His existence is said to be the last of the Bodhisatta before he was reborn in Tusitā, the third highest abode of celestial beings, see the Birth Story of Vessantara (Vessantara-jātaka, Ja 547) for more details.

2. The Duties of a Bodhisatta

Mere desire to possess wealth and not working for it leads nowhere. Only when one works hard enough can one hope to gain the desired object. In the same way, the three types of Bodhisattas, who wish to attain the above mentioned three respective types of Awakening, attain them only when they have fulfilled their perfections (pāramī), sacrificed their lives and limbs in charity (cāga) and developed their virtues through good conduct (cariyā) as a means of achieving the Awakening which they so desire.

In a business enterprise, the extent of profit gained is determined by the capital invested and the effort put in. When the capital is large and the effort great, the profit is considerable; when the capital and effort are fair, the accruing profit is just fair; when the capital and effort are little, the profit gained is little. In the same way, there exist distinctions between Awakening attained by those who make investment in the form of a fulfilment of the perfections, abandoning of life and limb in charity and development of virtues: [14] the practices which are conducive to the maturity of Awakening (Bodhi-paripācaka). The profits gained in the form of Awakening differ inasmuch as there are differences in their investment of the perfections, charity and virtues through practice. The differences may be explained as follows:

1. Perfect Bodhisattas (Sammā-Sambodhisatta) who even before the definite prophecy accumulate merits and make the mental resolution to become a Buddha. The definite prophecy is made by a Buddha saying: “This person will become a Buddha under a certain name in a certain world,” like Buddha Dīpaṅkara who predicted Sumedha would become Gotama Buddha, as mentioned in the passage (Ap 1.4, PTS 1.1):

Aham-pi pubba-Buddhesu, Buddhattam-abhipatthayim, manasā yeva hutvāna Dhamma-rajā asaṅkhiyā.

I also amongst the previous Buddhas, aspired for becoming a Buddha, having made with my mind innumerable kings of the Dhamma.

In the Traditions about the Buddha (Buddhāpadāna), a Bodhisatta aspires mentally to Buddhahood in the presence of innumerable Buddhas throughout immeasurable aeons.

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 30

After thus making the mental resolution for becoming a Buddha and accumulating special merits for an inestimable period of time, when he becomes endowed with the eight factors, like the recluse Sumedha, a Bodhisatta receives the definite prophecy from a living Buddha.

Here it should be noted that the act of resolution by an aspirant to become a Buddha (abhinīhāra)<sup>18</sup> is made up of two phases; as aspiration to Awakening prior to his possession of the eight factors is mainly mental, his act of resolution made before Buddhas, one after another, is not complete, and he is not yet entitled to the designation of Bodhisatta. But when he becomes endowed with eight factors like Sumedha and, on that very account, he now makes the resolution saying (Bv 2.57):

*Iminā me adhikārena katena purisuttame,

As the fruit of this great meritorious deed done by me for the sake of this omniscient Buddha Dīpaṅkarā without regard even for my life, may I, having myself attained omniscient Buddhahood, be able to save multitudes of beings.

His act of resolution becomes complete then and there, and it enabled him to be worthy of receiving the definite prophecy, and being designated a Bodhisatta.

It should be noted that this complete act of resolution (abhinīhāra) is the great wholesome consciousness intention or volition (mahā-kusala-cittuppāda) that arises as a result of his reflection on the unimaginable attributes of a Buddha and his great compassion for the welfare of the entire world of beings. And this great wholesome consciousness has the unique power of motivating his fulfilment of the perfections, abandoning of life and limb in generosity and development of virtues through practice.

The moment that great wholesome consciousness arises in the Bodhisatta, he sets himself on the path leading to omniscience. Because he is definitely on his way to Buddhahood, he now wins the title, Bodhisatta. Owing to the complete resolution which, as has been explained above, is the great wholesome consciousness, there becomes [15] established in him the wholesome aspiration for full omniscience and the unrivalled ability to fulfil the perfections, to abandoning of life and limb in generosity and to develop virtues which form the requisites for the attainment of omniscience.

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 31

And also, because of the aforesaid great wholesome consciousness, he reflects on the perfections to be accomplished and determines the order for doing so. He does it by means of the knowledge of investigation of the perfections (pāramī-pavicaya-ñāṇa) which enables him to penetrate things without a teacher's help. This knowledge is a precursor to the attainment of omniscience; it is followed by the actual fulfilment of the perfections one after another.

As mentioned in the Introduction (Nidāna-kathā) of the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka) commentary (see PTS 18), after receiving the definite prophecy of Buddhahood, the Bodhisatta ceaselessly and uniquely strives to fulfil the perfections (pāramī), charity (cāga) and good conduct (cariyā) which are requisites for achieving the path-knowledge of Arahantship (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) and omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) by four means of development.

Perfections, charity and good conduct (pāramī-cāga-cariyā): The perfections (pāramī) are ten in number. Charity (cāga) here refers to great offerings or charity of an extraordinary nature (mahā-pariccāga), which are five kinds of relinquishing of wealth, of children, of wife, of limbs and of life. For details of the perfections (pāramī) and charity (cāga), see the Further Explanations. Cariyā literally means “conduct, behaviour, or practice” cultivated for the welfare of both oneself and others. Good conduct is of three categories: 1) Practice for the benefit of all beings (lokattha-cariyā); 2) practice for the benefit of one's own kith and kin (ñātattha-cariyā); and (3) practice and efforts to achieve Awakening (Buddhattha-cariyā).

Of these four, these things are necessary:

1. The complete development of the entire range of the perfections (sabba-sambhāra-bhāvanā).
2. The development of the perfections throughout the minimum period of four immeasurable periods (asankhyeyyas) and 100,000 aeons, or the medial period of eight immeasurables and 100,000 aeons, or the maximum period of sixteen immeasurables and 100,000 aeons, without a break of even a single existence (nirantara-bhāvanā).

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 32

3. The development of the perfections for a long duration which is not an aeon less than the minimum period of four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons (cira-kāla-bhāvanā).
4. The development of the perfections with seriousness and thoroughness (sakkacca-bhāvanā).<sup>19</sup>

Moral Qualities of a Bodhisatta

The Bodhisatta, who has received the definite prophecy, is strongly moved by great compassion for beings when he sees these helpless ones who have no refuge in this difficult journey of life, who are beset with a variety of intolerably acute sufferings such as those springing from birth, old age, sickness and death; of killings, imprisonment, of being maimed and disabled; of hardships associated with earning a living and the sufferings of suffering states. Being so moved by this great compassion, he forbears his own suffering from such outrageous oppressive atrocities as cutting off of the hand, the leg, the ear, etc., perpetrated against him by those totally blind and ignorant people, and his compassion for them is long and enduring.

He suffuses them with compassion in this manner: “How shall I treat these people who have wronged me? I am, of truth, a person who is striving for the perfections with a view to liberating them from the woes of the cycle of births. Powerful indeed is delusion! Forceful indeed is craving! Sad it is that, being overwhelmed by craving and delusion, they have committed such great offences even against me, who endeavours to liberate them thus. [16] Because they have perpetrated these outrages, serious troubles lie in wait for them.”

Shedding his compassion on them, he tries to find suitable ways and means to save them and reflects: “Being overwhelmed by craving and delusion, they have wrongly taken what is impermanent to be permanent, suffering to be happiness, non-self to be self and unpleasantness to be pleasantness. In what way shall I go to their rescue and bring them out of suffering that arises owing to a cause?”

<sup>19</sup> Sakkacca is usually taken to be respect or reverence, but is rendered here as seriousness and thoroughness, see the Further Explanations for a full interpretation of sakkacca under sakkacca-dāna in types of giving (dāna) in group of twos.

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 33

While contemplating thus, the Bodhisatta rightly discerns that forbearance (khanti) is the only means to set beings free from the bondage of existence. He does not show even the slightest anger to beings who have outraged him by cutting off his limbs, etc. He thinks to himself: “As the result of demeritorious deeds done in my past existences, I deserve this suffering now. Since I, myself, have done wrong previously, I deserve this suffering. I am the one who has started the wrongdoing.” Thus, he takes the offence of others upon himself.

It further occurs to him thus: “Only with forbearance will I be able to save them. If I do wrong to the wrongdoer, I will become like him, I will not be different from him. How then can I liberate them from the woes of the cycle of births? I can never do so.

The above exposition of the moral qualities of a Bodhisatta is drawn from the Explanation of the Requisites for Awakening (Bodhi-sambhāra-vaṇṇanā) of the sub-commentary on the Ornaments of the Victor (Jināḷankāra).

Therefore, resting on the strength of forbearance, which is the basis of all strengths, and taking their misdeeds upon myself, I will forbear; and with loving-kindness and compassion as guides, I will fulfil the perfections. Only by so doing will I attain omniscient Buddhahood. Only by having attained omniscient Buddhahood will I be able to save all beings from suffering that arises owing to a cause.” He thus sees the situation correctly, as it is.

Having observed in this way, the Bodhisatta fulfils his perfections in a unique manner: The perfections being ten ordinary ones, ten superior ones and ten most superior ones, 30 in all, are known as the requisites of Awakening (Bodhi-sambhāra). The fulfilment of the perfections takes place in the above-mentioned four ways of development.

Before he attains the complete fulfilment of the perfections, as in the existence of Vessantara (Ja 547), while still fulfilling the perfections, sacrificing life and limb in generosity and developing practices in a unique manner, a Bodhisatta may be reborn frequently as a divine being of long life in consequence of his great meritorious deeds. But he chooses to cut short his long life in that divine world by means of intentional death (adhimutti-maraṇa)<sup>20</sup> because it is difficult to fulfil the perfections in those celestial abodes. Accordingly, he is reborn in many a world of human beings where he can continue to fulfil the perfections.

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 34

However enormous an ocean may be, it is finite in its extent, being limited by its bed at the bottom, its surface at the top and encircled by the Cakkavāḷa mountains on all sides. On the other hand, the ocean of perfection in alms giving (dāna-pāramī), fulfilled and accumulated by the Bodhisatta, is infinite in its extent; its dimensions are limitless. With regard to this particular perfection of alms giving, one cannot define its limits by the extent of external properties given away, the amount of flesh or blood given away or by the number of eyes or heads sacrificed. Likewise, one cannot speak of the limits of the other perfections such as that of morality (sīla-pāramī). Thus, in this comparison of the ocean with the ocean of the perfections, it should be noted that the former is limited in capacity, however vast it may be, whereas, the latter is of infinite magnitude. [17]

At noon, during the hot season, a man may go into a deep lake and take a bath, submerging himself; and while he is doing so, he does not take note of the intense heat that descends from the sky. In the same way, the Bodhisatta who suffused himself with great compassion, while seeking the welfare of beings, goes down into the ocean of the perfections and submerges himself there. Since he is suffused with great compassion, he does not feel even intense pains which are inflicted by evil, cruel persons, and which are caused by the cutting off his limbs, etc., as suffering.

The Long Duration Needed

A Bodhisatta has to fulfil the perfections for at least four immeasurable periods (asaṅkhyeyya) and 100,000 aeons from the time of his receiving the prophecy to the last existence when he achieves the completion of his fulfilment of the perfections, as in the existence of Vessantara.

According to the Thematic Discourses on the Inconceivable Beginning (Anamatagga-saṃyutta, SN 15), an aeon is a period of time during which, if the bones of beings were piled up, the size of that pile would become as high as a mountain. Therefore, the number of births taken by the Bodhisatta, during the long period of four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, would be greater than the number of drops of water in a great ocean. Among these existences, there is none who has not witnessed the fulfilment of the perfections and none who has passed in vain.

The accounts of the fulfilment of the perfections by the Bodhisatta, as mentioned in the 547 Birth Stories (Jātaka) and in the 35 stories of the Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka), are just a few examples out of the total experiences which he had during the long period of four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons. It is like a bowl of sea-water taken out of a great ocean in order to sample its salty taste. The Buddha told these stories as illustrations, as occasions arose and under appropriate circumstances. The number of stories he told and the number of stories he did not tell, may be compared to the water in a bowl and the water in a great ocean respectively.

The perfection of alms giving fulfilled by the Buddha is sung in praise in the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra) as follows (Jināl 31):

*So sāgare jaladhikaṃ ruhiraṃ adāsi, bhūmāparājiya samaṃsam-adāsi dānaṃ,
Meruppamāṇam-adhikañ-ca samoḷi-sīsaṃ, khe tārakādhika-taraṃ nayanam adāsi.*

Aiming at infinite wisdom, and full of faith and fervour, that Bodhisatta gave in generosity, his ruby-red blood in quantities much more than drops of water in the four oceans; aiming at infinite wisdom and full of faith and fervour, he gave in generosity, his naturally soft and tender flesh in quantities which would exceed the great earth that is 240,000 leagues in extent; aiming at infinite wisdom and full of faith and fervour, his heads, with glittering crowns studded with nine gems, he gave in generosity, would pile up higher than Mount Meru; aiming at infinite wisdom and full of faith and fervour, he gave in generosity, his wondrous smiling eyes, dark as corundum or of a beetle's wing, more times than the stars and planets in the space of the universe.

This is a translation of the Burmese version of the Pāḷi verse. Moved by the awe-inspiring abandonments of the Bodhisatta, the illustrious author has rendered it in a most ornate language with appropriate elaborations.

2. Independent Bodhisattas (Pacceka-bodhisatta), have to fulfil their perfections for two immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons. They cannot become Independent Buddhas if their duration of fulfilment of the perfections is less than that number of aeons. Because, as has been said in the chapter dealing with previous Bodhisattas, the Awakening of an Independent [18] Buddha (Pacceka-bodhi) cannot become mature before they have completed the full course of the perfections.

3. There are three categories of disciple Bodhisattas (sāvaka-bodhisatta):

1. Future chief disciples (agga-sāvaka) are a pair of disciples like Vens. Sāriputta and Moggallāna.
2. Future great disciples (mahā-sāvaka) are like the 80 great disciples<sup>21</sup> in the lifetime of Buddha Gotama.
3. Future ordinary disciples<sup>22</sup> (pakaṭṭi-sāvaka) are all Arahats other than those mentioned above.

Of these three categories: 1) Future chief disciples have to fulfil their perfections for one immeasurable period and 100,000 aeons; 2) future great disciples for 100,000 aeons; and 3) future ordinary disciples, the duration of their fulfilment of the perfections is not directly stated in the texts. However, it is said in the commentary and sub-commentary on the Discussion of Previous Lives (Pubbe-nivāsa-kathā), on the Long Discourse on the Traditions (Mahāpadāna-sutta, DN 14)<sup>23</sup> that great disciples can remember their past lives of 100,000 aeons ago and ordinary disciples, of less than that figure. Since fulfilment of the perfections takes place in every existence of theirs, it may be inferred that future ordinary disciples have to fulfil the perfections not more than 100,000 aeons. The duration of their fulfilment of the perfections is thus indefinite: it may be 100 aeons or 1,000 aeons, etc. According to some, it may be just one or two existences as illustrated by the story of a frog.

In the story of Maṇḍūka in the Stories about Heavenly Mansions (Vimāna-vatthu, Vv 51) a frog was reborn as a Deva after hearing the voice of the

<sup>23</sup> The discourse deals elaborately with the life of Buddha Vipassī, the first of the seven Buddhas preceding Buddha Gotama. Because it contains the largest number of bhaṇavāras or sections, it came to be known as the king of discourses in the commentaries.

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 37

Buddha who was delivering a discourse. As a Deva, he visited the Buddha and became a Stream-enterer as a consequence of hearing the Dhamma from the Buddha.

3. Buddha

As has been said before, after fulfilling their perfections for their respective durations, the three types of Bodhisattas (those with predominant wisdom, faith or energy) attain the fourfold path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa), which is understanding of the four noble truths by himself without a teacher's help, as well as omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa), which is understanding of all principles that are worthy of understanding.

They acquire, at the same time, the special attributes of a Buddha which are infinite (ananta) and an immeasurable period (aparimeyya). Such attributes are so immense that if a Buddha extols the attributes of another Buddha without touching on any other topic for an aeon, the aeon may come to an end, but the talk about the attributes will not. The noble person, who has thus attained Awakening with no equal in the three worlds, is called an omniscient Buddha or a Perfectly Self-Awakened One (Sammā-sambuddha).

After fulfilling the necessary perfections for two immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, an Independent Buddha attains Awakening consisting of the insight knowledge of the path which is the understanding of the four noble truths (magga-ñāṇa) by himself, without a teacher's help. But he does not achieve omniscience and the ten powers (dasa-bala-ñāṇa), [19] etc. The noble person who has thus attained Awakening is called an Independent Buddha (Pacceka-buddha).

The commentary to the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya, PTS 5.12 ff) enumerates the ten powers (dasa-bala-ñāṇa) as follows: 1) Knowledge according to reality as to the possible as possible and the impossible as the impossible (thānāṭṭhāna-ñāṇa); 2) knowledge of the result of the past, present and future actions (kamma-vipāka-ñāṇa); 3) knowledge of the path leading to the welfare of all (sabbattha-gāminī-paṭipadā-ñāṇa); 4) knowledge of the world with its many different elements (aneka-dhātu-nānā-dhātu-loka-ñāṇa); 5) knowledge of the different inclinations of beings (nānādhimuttikatā-ñāṇa); 6) knowledge of the lower and higher faculties of beings (indriya-paro-pariyatta-ñāṇa); 7) knowledge of the defilements, purity and rising with regard to the absorptions, concentration, attainments, etc. (jhānādi-samkilesa-vodāna-vuṭṭhāna-ñāṇa); 8) knowledge of remembering many former births (pubbe-nivāsa-ñāṇa); 9) knowledge of perceiving with the divine eye how beings vanish and reappear according to their deeds (cutūpapāta-ñāṇa or dibba-cakkhu-ñāṇa); and 10) knowledge of the extinction of all moral pollutants and impurities that befuddle the mind (āsavakkhaya-ñāṇa), that is, becoming an Arahat.

After fulfilling the necessary perfections for one immeasurable period and 100,000 aeons, if he is a future chief disciple, or 100,000 aeons, if he is a future great disciple, or 100 aeons or 1,000 aeons or any smaller number of aeons, if he is a future ordinary disciple, a future disciple attains Awakening consisting of the insight-knowledge of the path, which is understanding of the four noble truths (sāvaka-bodhi-ñāṇa), with the help of a teacher who is a Buddha. The noble person who has thus attained the Awakening of a disciple (sāvaka-bodhi-ñāṇa) is called an Awakened disciple (sāvaka-buddha); he may have the status of a chief disciple, a great disciple or an ordinary disciple.

4. The Duties of a Buddha

There are three types of Awakened Ones:

1. Those who help others cross over (tārayitu).
2. Those who have crossed over (tārita).
3. Those who were helped across (tarita).

Among these great personages, namely, omniscient Buddhas, Independent Buddhas and Awakened disciples, omniscient Buddhas are called ones who makes other cross, and helps them through (tārayitu), the most supreme ones, who, having themselves crossed the ocean of Saṃsāra,<sup>24</sup> save others from their perils.

Independent Buddhas are called those who have crossed over (tārita), the noble ones who have crossed over the ocean of Saṃsāra on their own, but are unable to save others from its perils. Independent Buddhas do not appear in an age when an omniscient Buddha makes his appearance. They appear only in the intervening period between the lifetimes of two Buddhas. An omniscient Buddha realises for himself the four noble truths without guidance and has the ability to teach and make others understand them.

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 39

An Independent Buddha also realises the four noble truths on his own, but he is in no way able to teach and make others understand them. Having realised (paṭivedha)<sup>25</sup> the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna, he is unable to recount his personal experiences of these attainments because he lacks an appropriate terminology for these supermundane doctrines. Therefore, an Independent Buddha's knowledge of the four truths (Dhammābhisamaya)<sup>26</sup> is compared by the commentators to a dumb person's dream or an ignorant peasant's experience of a city life for which he has no words to describe it. Independent Buddhas (tārita) are thus those who have gone across Saṃsāra on their own, but who are in no position to help others cross.

Independent Buddhas may bestow monkhood on those who wish to become monks, and they may give them training in special practices of the holy life (ābhisamācārika)<sup>27</sup> thus: "In this calm manner, you should step forward, step backward, you should see, you should say," [20] and so on; but they are not able to teach them how to differentiate between mind and matter (nāma-rūpa), and how to view them in terms of their characteristics, namely, impermanence, suffering and non-self, etc. so that they may reach the stage of realisation of the paths and fruitions.<sup>28</sup>

Noble disciples who have been helped across the ocean of Saṃsāra and have been saved by omniscient Buddhas are called those who were helped across (tarita). To illustrate, Upatissa, the wandering ascetic, who was to become Ven. Sāriputta, became established in the path and fruition of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti)

<sup>26</sup> Dhammābhisamaya, literally, truth-realisation, which according to the commentaries means penetration of the four noble truths.

<sup>27</sup> Ābhisamācārika, "belonging to the practice of the lesser ethics," according to PED; "the minor precepts," according to CPD.

<sup>28</sup> The next paragraph in the original text deals with the Observance Day services observed by Paccekabuddhas. This account is too technical for lay readers, and we have thus omitted it from our translation.

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 40

on hearing from Ven. Assaji the following verse (Mahā-khandhaka, Vin Mv 1, PTS 1.40):

Ye dhammā hetuppabhavā, tesaṃ hetuṃ Tathāgato āha, tesañ-ca yo nirodho: evaṃ-vādī Mahā-samaṇo.

Whatever things have a cause and source, their cause the Realised One has told, and also that which is their cessation: such is the Great Ascetic's doctrine.

From this account, one would think noble disciples could be both those who have been saved (tarita) by others and those who have saved others (tārayitu). But the teaching of a Buddha's disciple has its origin in the Buddha; it does not originate from the disciple himself. He does not preach a discourse of his own without taking help and guidance from the teaching of the Buddha. Therefore, such disciples are to called those who have crossed over (tarita) and not those who help others to cross over (tārayitu), as they can, by no means, realise the four noble truths without a master; and their realisation of the paths and fruitions can take place only with the master's help and guidance.

As has been said, Independent Buddhas are those who have crossed over (tārita) and noble disciples are those who were helped across (tarita) respectively. Hence, after their realisation of the path and fruition of an Arahāt, they entered into the stage of attainment of fruition (phala-samāpatti) and attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti) for their own enjoyment of bliss of peace, and not working for the benefit of others.

On the other hand, an omniscient Buddha (Sammā-sambuddha) would not remain working for his own interest only. In fact, even at the time of fulfilling the perfections, he resolves: "Having understood the four noble truths, I will make others understand the same (Buddho bodheyyam)," and so on. Accordingly, he performs the five duties of a Buddha continuously, day and night.<sup>29</sup>

Because he has to perform the five duties of a Buddha, the Buddha takes a short rest after his meal each day. At night, he rests only for one third of the last watch of the night. The remaining hours are spent attending to his five duties.

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 41

Only those Buddhas, who possess the energy in the form of unique and supreme diligence (payatta) which is one of the glories (bhaga) of a Buddha, are able to perform such duties. The performance of these duties is not the sphere of Independent Buddhas and disciples.

The Rare Appearance of a Buddha

A Buddha's coming into being is a very rare phenomenon. [21] Numerous were those who aspired after Buddhahood when they had themselves seen or heard the powers and glories of Buddha Gotama after his Awakening such as victory over the heretics bloated with conceit, performance of the twin miracle,<sup>30</sup> etc. Therefore, when the Buddha descended to the city of Saṅkassa from Tāvātimsa, where he had taught the Abhidhamma, humans, Devas and Brahmas became visible to one another owing to the Descent from the Devas (Devorohaṇa) miracle performed by the Buddha. The Descent from the Devas miracle created a great expanse of space from Bhavagga<sup>31</sup> above to Avīci below and throughout the eight directions of the unbounded universe.

Descent from the Devas (Devorohaṇa) means a descent from the abode of the gods, i.e, the Buddha's descent therefrom. The miracle that took place on that occasion is here mentioned as the Descent from the Devas miracle, the most notable feature of which was seeing through all the universes from one end to another, from top to bottom and vice versa. There was nothing to obstruct one's sight: Everybody, whether human or divine, was capable of seeing one another and capable of being seen by the others.

Beholding the Buddha's splendour that day, there was none among the people, who had gathered in a great mass, who did not aspire to become Buddhas. That all the people of this huge gathering wished to become Buddhas is mentioned in the story of the Descent from the Devas in the commentary to the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, Dhp 181) and in the explanations of the three kinds of miracles in the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra).

Although the number of people aspiring after Buddhahood, on seeing and hearing the Buddha's splendour, was great, it is certain that those who were of little faith, wisdom, will and energy would have flinched if they had known the pertinent facts concerning the multiplicity of the perfections such as fulfilment of these perfections on a mighty scale, fulfilment of the perfections in every existence without interruption, fulfilment with seriousness and thoroughness, fulfilment for a long time and fulfilment without regard to one's life. Only undaunted fulfilment of these awesome perfections could lead to Awakening. Buddhahood is therefore said to be something hard to obtain (dullabha). The appearance of a Buddha is indeed a rare phenomenon.

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 42

There are five rare phenomena hard to encounter: 1) The appearance of a Buddha (Buddhuppāda); 2) gaining rebirth as a human being (manussatta-bhāva); 3) being endowed with faith in the Three Treasures and the law of deeds and their results (saddhā-sampatti-bhāva); 4) becoming a member of the community of monastics (pabbajita-bhāva); and 5) getting the opportunity of hearing the teaching of a Buddha (Saddhamma-savana).

Thus, it is mentioned in the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya, AN 1.71):

*Eka-puggalassa bhikkhave pātu-bhāvo dullabho lokasmim:
katamassa eka-puggalassa? Tathāgatassa Arahato Sammāsambuddhassa imassa kho bhikkhave eka-puggalassa pātu-bhāvo dullabho lokasmim.*

Monks, in the world, emergence of one being is very rare. Whose emergence? The Realised One, the Worthy One, the Perfect Self-Awakened Buddha, who is worthy of the highest veneration and who knows the truth, his emergence is indeed very rare.

The commentary on that discourse, too, explains why the appearance of a Buddha is so rare. Of the ten perfections, with regard to alms giving alone, one cannot become a Buddha after fulfilling it just once; one cannot become a Buddha after fulfilling it twice, ten times, 20, 50, 100, 1,000, 100,000 times, or times numbering 10,000,000, 100 billion, 1,000 billion, or 100,000 billion.

Similarly, one cannot become a Buddha after fulfilling it for one day, two days, ten, 20, 50, 100, 1,000, 100,000 days or days numbering 100,000 billion; not after fulfilling it for one month, two months or months [22] numbering 100,000 billion; not after fulfilling it even for one year, two years, or years numbering 100,000 billion; not after fulfilling it even for a great aeon, two great aeons, or great aeons numbering 100,000 billion; fulfilling it even one great immeasurable period (asankhyeyya) aeon, two great immeasurables or three great immeasurable aeons.

The same holds good in the case of the other perfections, such as morality, renunciation, wisdom, energy, forbearance, truth, resolution, loving-kindness and equanimity.

In fact, the shortest duration for fulfilment of the perfections is four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons. It is only after fulfilling all the perfections for such a long time without interruption, and with profound reverence, devotion, seriousness and thoroughness that one can become Awakened. This is the reason for the rare occurrence of an omniscient Buddha.

The sub-commentary on the discourse also emphasises that only when one has fulfilled the perfections for at least four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons can one become a Buddha. There is no other way. This is why the appearance of a Buddha is singularly rare.

No Similes to Illustrate the Perfections

The Bodhisatta's existences during the period of four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, between the life of the recluse Sumedha and that of Vessantara, were more than the drops of water in the great ocean. The number of the perfections that had been fulfilled without interruption of a single existence was so great that its sum total cannot be estimated. There is practically nothing to compare with these perfections. This is extolled in the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra, Jināl 28):

*Mahā-samudde jala-binduto pi, tad-antare jāti anappakā va,
nirantaram purita-pāramīnam, katham pamāṇam upamā kuhiṃ vā?*

The births during the period between the life of Sumedha and that of Vessantara were more than the drops of water in the great ocean. Who can know the measure of the perfections fulfilled without interruption? Where is the simile to illustrate them with?

Besides, in the Discourse on the Provisions for a Journey (Pātheyya-sutta, SN 1.79) commentary and its sub-commentary and the Ornaments of the Victor

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 44

(Jinālaṅkāra), where virtues of 100 kinds of meritorious deeds (sata-puñña-lakkhaṇa) are dealt with, it states:

Having grouped on one side, all the meritorious deeds, such as giving (dāna), etc., done by an inestimable number of beings in the infinite universe, during the period between the moment Sumedha resolved to achieve the goal of Buddhahood at the feet of Buddha Dīpaṅkara and the moment Prince Vessantara gave away his wife, Queen Maddī; and having grouped, on the other side, all the meritorious deeds done by the Bodhisatta alone, during the same length of time, the meritorious deeds in the former group would not come to even 100th nor 1,000th of those in the latter.

Hard to Become a Bodhisatta

Let alone becoming a Perfectly Self-Awakened One, the stage of development attained by the recluse Sumedha since he received the prediction of Buddhahood, can be reached only when one is endowed with eight factors. These are:

1. Being a human being.
2. Being a male person.
3. Having fulfilled all conditions such as the perfections, which are necessary for the realisation of Awakening in that very life. [23]
4. Meeting with a living Buddha.
5. Being an ascetic who believes in the law of deeds and results (kamma-vādī) or being a member of the community of monastics during the Dispensation of a Buddha.
6. Being endowed with the absorptions (jhāna).
7. Intense efforts to develop one's perfections without regard to one's life.
8. A wholesome desire strong enough to aspire after Buddhahood.

Only those who are endowed with these eight factors are able to wear the crown of prophesy accordingly. Let alone becoming a Buddha, it is very difficult to reach the stage of development like the recluse Sumedha when he became eligible to receive the prediction of Buddhahood.

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 45

When, as a Bodhisatta, it is so difficult to receive the prophecy of Buddhahood, what can be said of Buddhahood which can be attained only by fulfilling the perfections by the fourfold mode of development for at least four immeasurable periods (asaṅkhyeyyas) and 100,000 aeons, after receiving the prophecy? Truly, it is hard to become a Buddha.

Since Buddhahood is so hard to attain, the moment of a Buddha's emergence is also very hard to encounter. In this connection, the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya) gives an enumeration of eight moments or existences in Saṃsāra which are to be regarded as inopportune moments<sup>32</sup> or unfortunate existences. On the other hand, the moment of a Buddha's appearance is to be reckoned as an opportune moment of fortunate existence. The eight unfortunate existences are (Akkhaṇa-sutta, AN 8.29):

1. An existence in an abode of continuous intense suffering in Niraya. It is an unfortunate existence because a being in this abode cannot perform any acts of merit as he is all the time suffering from severe and painful tortures.
2. An existence in an animal abode. It is an unfortunate existence because a being of this abode, living in fear always, cannot perform any acts of merit and is in no position even to perceive what is good or bad.
3. An existence in a Peta<sup>33</sup> abode. It is an unfortunate existence because a being in this abode cannot perform any acts of merit as it always feels the sensation of hotness and dryness and suffers from severe thirst and hunger.
4. An existence in an abode of Brahmas who are devoid of consciousness (asañña-satta-bhūmi). It is an unfortunate existence because a being in this abode cannot perform any acts of merit nor listen to the Dhamma as he is not equipped with the faculty of hearing.

With regard to this fourth unfortunate existence, the author says that only the Brahmas who are devoid of consciousness (asañña-satta-bhūmi) are mentioned in the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya) commentary. In the the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra),

however, the immaterial abodes (arūpa-bhūmi) are also included in this unfortunate existence. The reasons for its exclusion from the Collection of the Numerical Discourses are given by the author in the next paragraph. But as they are too technical we have omitted the paragraph in our translation.

5. An existence in a remote area of the land. It is an unfortunate existence because such an area is not accessible to male and female monastics and other disciples and devotees of a Buddha. It is also a place where people are not well informed or up-to-date. A person living there cannot perform any acts of merit as he had no chance to listen to the Dhamma though he possesses the faculty of hearing.
6. An existence in which one holds a wrong view.<sup>34</sup> It is an unfortunate existence because a man holding a wrong view cannot hear and practise the Dhamma even though he may be living in the Middle Country when a Buddha appears and the continuous roar of [24] the Buddha's Dhamma reverberates throughout the land.
7. An existence in which one is born with deficient sense faculties. It is an unfortunate existence because, as a consequence of demeritorious deeds of past lives, his rebirth-consciousness is devoid of three wholesome root-conditions, viz., non-greed, non-hate and non-delusion (ahetuka-paṭisandhika) and, therefore, he is deficient in sense faculties such as sight, hearing, etc. As such, he is unable to see the noble ones, hear their teachings, or practise the Dhamma as taught by them, even if he may be living in the Middle Country<sup>35</sup> and have no staunchly held wrong view.
8. An existence at a time when a Buddha does not appear. It is an unfortunate existence because, at such a time, a man cannot cultivate and practise the threefold training of morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā) though he may be living in the Middle Country, possessing unimpaired sense faculties and holding the right view, that is, belief in the law of deeds and their results (kamma).

II: The Rare Appearance of a Buddha – 47

Unlike these eight unfortunate existences (akkhaṇa), it may be noted that there is a ninth existence which is fortunate and that is the existence in which a Buddha appears (Buddhuppāda-navama-khaṇa). Rebirth at such a time with unimpaired sense faculties and holding right view enables one to cultivate and practise the Dhamma as taught by a Buddha. This ninth existence in which a Buddha appears covers the lifetime of a Buddha when he is teaching the Dhamma and the whole period throughout which his teaching flourishes.

Let the Appearance of a Buddha be Fruitful

Good Buddhists of today, who have gained existence as human beings with unimpaired sense faculties and right view, are living at a time when the Buddha's Dhamma is still flourishing, they have the rare opportunity of encountering a time when the Buddha's teaching flourishes (Buddhuppāda-navama-khaṇa). Despite such a happy encounter, if they should neglect the meritorious practices of morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā), they will indeed miss a golden opportunity. Chances of rebirth in these eight unfortunate existences (akkhaṇa) are great and frequent, whereas chances of rebirth in the Dispensation of a Buddha are very remote. Only once in a long, long while of an unlimited number of aeons does a Buddha emerge, and the opportunity for a fortunate existence is indeed extremely difficult to obtain.

Good Buddhists of the present day possess two blessings. The first is the blessing of being born at a time when the Buddha's teaching, which is very difficult to come by, flourishes in this world; and the other is that of being born as a human being holding right view. At such an opportune moment they ought to ponder seriously and rightly thus: "How can we get to know the Buddha's teaching? We should not miss this golden opportunity of living while the Buddha's teaching flourishes. Should we miss it, we will suffer long and miserably in the four suffering states."

Bearing this in mind, as fortunate beings who encounter this rare opportunity of a time when the Buddha's teaching flourishes, may you be able to cultivate and develop the three noble practices of morality, concentration and wisdom, as taught by the Buddha, till the attainment of Awakening. [25]

III: Sumedha the Brahmin

The Origins of the Chronicle

This discourse on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) was delivered by the Buddha to his kinsmen, the Sakyas, on his first visit to the city of Kapilavatthu after his Awakening. The Sakyan elders and relatives, in their stubborn pride, did not pay obeisance to him when they gathered to meet him. In order to subdue their pride and make them show respect to him, the Buddha caused to appear in the sky a jewelled platform stretching from east to west throughout the 10,000 world-element and performed on it the twin miracle of water and fire.

The Pāli word for twin miracle is yamaka-pāṭihāriya, which Malalasekera calls: “The miracle of the double appearances.” He explains: “It consisted in the appearance of phenomena of opposite character in pairs e.g., producing flames from the upper part of the body and a stream of water from the lower, and then alternatively from the right side of his body and from the left. From every pore of his body a radiance of six colours darted forth, upwards to the realm of Brahma and downwards to the edge of the Cakkavāḷa.” DPPN, s.v. Yamaka pāṭihāriya.

While he was doing so, he gave the discourse on the lives of the Buddhas, beginning with the story of the Brahmin Sumedha, as requested by Ven. Sāriputta, the chief disciple, who had the honour of occupying the seat on the immediate right of the Buddha.<sup>36</sup>

At the time of the First Council, the great elders, Ven. Mahā Kassapa, the Ven. Ānanda, etc., desiring to recite the full discourse of the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) together with the introductions,<sup>37</sup> prescribed a set way of recitation (vācana-magga) beginning with the verse (Bv 1.1) Brahma Sahampati, chief in the world (Brahma ca Lokādhipati Sahampati). Here, however, the narration will begin with the story of the Brahmin Sumedha, as told by the Buddha, at the request of Ven. Sāriputta.

III: Sumedha the Brahmin – 49

Four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons ago, there flourished the city of Amaravatī. A well-planned city in all respects, it was beautiful and pleasant. Surrounded by verdant and delightful open spaces, abounding in shades and springs, well-stocked with food and provisions and rich in assorted goods for people's enjoyment, this city warmed the hearts of the Devas and human beings.

This city was ever resounding with the ten kinds of sounds, such as the sounds of elephants, horses, chariots, long drums, short drums, harps, singing, conch shells, clappers and of invitations to feasts, whereas other cities were full of unpleasant noises and alarming cries.

Here the author gives some examples of unpleasant noises and alarming cries to be heard in other cities. We have omitted them from our translation. In connection with the ten sounds refer to the Further Explanations.

This city was endowed with all characteristics of a metropolis. There was no scarcity of trades and crafts for earning a living. It was rich in the seven kinds of treasures, namely: diamonds, gold, silver, cat's-eyes, pearls, emeralds and coral. It was crowded with foreign visitors. Provided with everything as in a Deva realm, it was the abode of a powerful people enjoying the benefits of meritorious deeds.

Sumedha the Brahmin

There lived in the city of Amaravatī a Brahmin named Sumedha.<sup>38</sup> His parents were descendants from a long line of Brahmin families. He was, therefore, a pure Brahmin by [26] birth from both paternal and maternal sides. He was born of a virtuous and healthy mother. He could not be treated with contempt on account of his birth, by saying: "This man is of low birth that goes back to seven generations of his ancestors." He was not a man to be abused or despised. In fact, he was a man of true Brahmin blood with very good looks that charmed everyone.

As regards his wealth, he had treasures in store worth many billions and abundant grain and other commodities for daily use. He had studied the three

III: Sumedha the Brahmin – 50

Vedas of Iru, Yaju and Sāma, and, being expert in these texts, could recite them flawlessly. Effortlessly, he became well versed in 1) The glossaries that explains various terms (nighaṇḍu); 2) rhetoric (keṭubha), which is concerned with literary works and which explains various literary ornamentations of learned authors; 3) grammar (vyākaraṇa or akkhara-pabheda), that deals with the analysis of words and explains various grammatical rules and such things as the alphabet, consonants, vowels, etc.; and 4) Ancient Histories (Itihāsa), also called tales of old (purāṇa), which constitutes the fifth Veda and which tells of legends and ancient tales.

The author says: “Ancient Histories as the fifth Veda,” means it is the fifth in the enumeration of sciences, which according to the canon, should run: 1) Three Vedas, 2) glossaries (nighaṇḍu), 3) rhetoric (keṭubha) 4) grammar (vyākaraṇa) and 5) Ancient Histories (Itihāsa).

According to the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya) commentary, by adding the fourth, Atharvaveda (Athabbaṇa), the Vedas become four in number and hence Ancient Histories (Itihāsa), which comes after them, is the fifth.

He was equally well-versed in Lokāyata, or natural philosophy, which discourages deeds of merit and favours actions which prolong Samsāra and in works dealing with various characteristics of great men, such as Perfect Bodhisattas, Independent Bodhisattas, etc. He was also an accomplished teacher in Brahmanical lore that had been taught by generation after generation of teachers.

The parents of the wise Sumedha passed away while he was still young. Then the family treasurer, bringing the list of riches, opened the treasure-house which was full of gold, silver, rubies, pearls, etc., said: “Young master, this much is the wealth that has come down from your mother’s side and this much from your father’s, and this much from your ancestors.” He informed him of his wealth which had belonged to seven generations of his ancestors, and saying: “Do as you wish with these riches,” handed them over to him.

IV: The Renunciation of Sumedha

Sumedha's Reflection

One day [27] he went up to the upper terrace of his mansion and sitting cross-legged in solitude, he thought (Bv 2.7-27):

“Miserable, is birth in a new existence; so is destruction of the body; miserable, also it is to die in delusion, oppressed and overpowered by old age. Being subject to birth, old age and sickness, I will seek Nibbāna where old age, death and fear are extinct.

Wonderful it would be, if I could abandon this body of mine without any regard for it, as it is full of putrid things, such as urine, excreta, pus, blood, bile, phlegm, saliva, mucus, etc.

Surely there must be a path leading to the peaceful Nibbāna. It cannot be otherwise. I will seek that good path to Nibbāna so that I shall be liberated from the bondage of life.

For example, just as when there is suffering (dukkha), there is also in this world, happiness (sukha); even so, when there is the round of existences which is the arising of suffering, there should also be Nibbāna, which is the cessation of suffering.

Just as when there is heat, there is cold also; even so, when there are the three fires of passion, hate and delusion, there should also be Nibbāna, which is the extinction of these three fires.

Again, just as when there is demeritoriousness, there is also meritoriousness; even so when there is rebirth, there should also be Nibbāna where potential for rebirth is exhausted.”

After these thoughts had occurred to him, he went on thinking profoundly:

“For example, a man, who has fallen into a pit of excreta or who is besmeared with filth, sees from a distance a clear pond adorned with the five kinds of lotus. If, in spite of seeing it, he does not find out the right way to reach the pond, it is not the fault of the pond, but of the man himself.

In the same way, there exists a big pond of the deathless Nibbāna where one could wash off one's mental defilements, and if one does not search for that big pond of Nibbāna, it is not the fault of Nibbāna.

Again, if a man is surrounded by enemies and he does not try to flee although there is an escape route for him, it is not the fault of the route. In the same way, if a man, who is besieged by enemies in the form of mental defilements, does not wish to run away although there exists so clearly the big road to the golden city of Nibbāna where one is safe from enemies in the form of mental defilements, it is not the fault of that big road.

Again, if a man is inflicted with a disease and he does not get it cured although there is an efficient doctor, the doctor is not to blame. In the same way, if one is suffering painfully from diseases of mental defilements and he does not look for a master for their cure though there exists one who is skilled in removing these mental defilements, the master is not to blame.”

After thinking thus, he contemplated further to be rid of his body:

“Just as a man, who is burdened with the dead body of an animal which is hung round his neck, would get rid of the loathsome carcass and freely and happily go about wherever he likes, even so, I too will go to the city of Nibbāna, abandoning this putrid body of mine which is but a collection of various worms and foul things.

Again, just as people, who have voided their excreta in a lavatory, leave it without looking behind; even so, I will go to the city of Nibbāna, after leaving behind this body full of various worms and foul things. [28]

Again, just as the owners of an old, ruined, decaying and leaking boat, abandon it in disgust; even so, I too will go to the city of Nibbāna, after abandoning this body, from the nine orifices of which, filthy things ooze out incessantly.

Again, just as a man, carrying treasures, who happens to be travelling in the company of robbers, would leave them and flee to safety when he sees the danger of being robbed of his treasures; even so, since the thought of being robbed of my treasures of meritorious deeds, always makes me afraid, I will abandon this body of mine that is like a chief robber and will go seeking the road to Nibbāna, which can undoubtedly give me security and happiness.”

IV: The Renunciaton of Sumedha – 53

When one thinks unwisely and is instigated by greed and hate, this body turns into a robber who takes life, a robber who takes things not given, etc., and plunders all the treasures of one's meritorious deeds, this body is therefore likened to a chief robber.

The Great Alms Giving

After contemplating thus on renunciation in the light of these similes, once again it occurred to the wise Sumedha (BvA): “Having amassed this much of wealth, my father, grandfather and other kinsmen of mine of seven generations were unable to take even a single coin with them when they passed away. But I should find some means of taking this wealth with me up to Nibbāna.”

He could not, of course, carry his wealth bodily with him to Nibbāna. But Sumedha is referring here to the beneficial results that would accrue from his meritorious deeds of giving away his wealth in generosity.

Then he went to the king and said: “Your majesty, since my mind is obsessed with a great dread of the dangers and sufferings springing from such things as birth, old age, etc., I am going to leave the household life and become a recluse. I have wealth worth many millions. Please take possession of it.”

“I do not desire your wealth. You may dispose of it in any way you wish,” replied the king. “Very well, your majesty,” said the wise Sumedha and, with the beating of the mighty drum, he had it proclaimed all over the city of Amaravatī: “Let those who want my riches come and take them.” And he gave away his wealth, in a great alms giving, to all without distinction of status and whether they be destitute or otherwise.

The Renunciation

After thus performing a great act of generosity, the wise Sumedha renounced the world and left for the Himālayas with an intention of reaching Mount Dhammika on that very day. Sakka, seeing him approach the Himālayas after renunciation, summoned Vissakamma and said: “Go, Vissakamma, there is the wise Sumedha, who has renounced the world, intending to become a recluse. Have a residence made ready for him.”

“Very well, Lord,” said Vissakamma, in answer to Sakka's command. He then marked out a delightful enclosure as a hermitage, created in it a well-protected hut with a roof of leaves and a pleasant, faultless walkway.

IV: The Renunciation of Sumedha – 54

Sakka is the name of the Lord of the Devas. He is known by many other names including Vasavā and Sujampati. He rules over Devas in Tāvātimsa which is the second lowest of the six celestial abodes. There are many stories which tell of his help rendered to Bodhisattas and other noble persons. Vissakamma is Sakka's chief architect and builder who built, under Sakka's orders, the hermitages for the Bodhisatta in other existences as well.

The author explains here that the walkway is faultless because it was free from five defects: 1) Having uneven, rugged ground; 2) having trees on the walkway; 3) being covered with shrubs and bushes; 4) being too narrow; and 5) being too wide. [29]

The author then describes the walkway and gives its measurement: 60 cubits long, it consisted of three lanes, the main one with two narrower ones on both sides. The main walkway was one and a half cubits wide, and each of the two flanking, one cubit wide. The whole walkway was on even ground strewn with white sand. For details of the five defects read the Further Explanations.

The author further enumerates the eight sources of comfort which a good hermitage such as the one created by Vissakamma would bring to a recluse. For the eight sources of comfort (samaṇa-sukha), read the Further Explanations and compare with the eight blessings of a recluse (samaṇa-bhadra).

These eight sources of comfort (samaṇa-sukha) are:

1. The non-hoarding of wealth and grains.
2. Searching for blameless food.
3. Enjoying peaceful food only.
4. Being free from worries and distress which are due to the heavy burden of taxation and confiscation of one's property.
5. Being not attached to articles, wares or ornaments, etc.
6. Feeling secure against robbers.
7. Not being associated with kings and ministers.
8. Being free to move to all four quarters.

In addition to these eight, the author says that the hermitage created by Vissakamma was of the kind that facilitated ascetic practices for its residents and helped them gain insight (vipassanā) into the true nature of things, their impermanence, suffering and non-self, without much difficulty. It had chambers, caves, tunnels, trees bearing flowers and fruits, and a pond of sweet and clear water. It was a secluded place free from the disturbances of wild beasts and the raucous noises of birds.

The leaf hut contained various requisites of an ascetic such as a headdress, robes, a tripod, a water jug and so on. Vissakamma then wrote on the wall, inside the hut, an inscription, reading: “Whoever wishes to become an ascetic, may make use of these requisites,” and he went back to his divine abode.

The Beginning of His Ascetic Life

Reaching the foothills of the Himālayas, the wise Sumedha walked along the hills and ravines to look for a suitable place where he could live comfortably. There, at a river bend, in the region of Mount Dhammika, he saw the delightful hermitage which was created by Vissakamma at the instance of Sakka. He then went slowly to the edge of the walkway, but on seeing no footprints, he thought: “Surely, the residents of this hermitage must be taking a rest in the leaf-hut after their tiring alms round in the neighbouring villages.” Thinking like this he waited for a while.

Seeing no signs of habitation after waiting for a fairly long time, it occurred to him: “I have waited long enough. I should now investigate to see whether there are any occupants or not.” He opened the door and entered the leaf-hut. Looking here and there he saw the inscription on the wall and thought: “These requisites are befitting requisites for me. I will use them and become an ascetic.” Having made up his mind, and after reflecting on the nine disadvantages of a layman’s clothing and the twelve advantages of a fibre-robe, he discarded the clothing he was wearing and donned the robe.

For the nine disadvantages of a lay man’s dress and the twelve significant advantages of a fibre-robe, read the Further Explanations.

At verse 28 of the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) it says: “In that region of Mount Dhammika, I made a pleasant enclosure and created a fine hut of leaves.” But in this connection, as has been said before, the hermitage, the hut of leaves, the walkway, etc. were all created by Vissakamma under Sakka’s orders. Nevertheless, the Buddha, referring to the powers accrued from his own meritorious deeds while as Sumedha, said: “I made a pleasant enclosure in the forest and created a fine hut,” etc. as though he himself had done them all. In reality, it should be noted without doubt that they were not constructed by the recluse Sumedha, but by Vissakamma at the command of Sakka.

IV: The Renunciaton of Sumedha – 56

Approaching the Foot of Trees

When he had taken off his fine clothing, the wise Sumedha took the fibre-robe, which was red like a cluster of Anojā flowers. He found the robe, which was folded and placed [30] for ready use on a bamboo peg. He wore it round his waist. On top of it, he put on another fibre-robe, which had the colour of gold. He also placed on his left shoulder a hide, which was complete with hoofs, and was like a bed of laurel (punnāga) flowers. He put the headdress on his top knot and fastened it with an ivory hairpin. Taking a curved carrying yoke, he hung a string net at one end of it whose knots were like pearls and into which he placed the water jug, which was of the colour of coral; at the other end of the yoke, he hung a long hook used for gathering fruits from trees, a basket, a wooden tripod, etc. He then shouldered the yoke which now carried the full equipment of an ascetic. Taking hold of a walking stick with his right hand, he went out of the hut. While walking back and forth along the walkway, 60 cubits long, he surveyed himself in his new garb and felt exultant with the thought (Ja-Nid PTS 9):

“My heart’s desire has been completely fulfilled. Splendid indeed is my ascetic life. The ascetic life has been praised by all wise men such as Buddhas and Independent Buddhas. The bondage of the household life has been abandoned. I have come safely out of the realm of worldly pleasures. I have entered upon the noble life of an ascetic. I will cultivate and practise the holy life. I will endeavour to attain the benefits of the holy practices.”

He then put down the yoke and, sitting gracefully like a golden image on the bean-coloured stone slab in the middle of the walkway, he passed the daytime there.

In the evening, he entered the hut, and lying on the wooden plank by the side of a cane couch, he used the robes as blankets and went to sleep. When he woke up early in the morning, he reflected on the reasons and circumstances of his being there (Ja-Nid PTS 9):

“Having seen the demerits of the household life, and having given up incomparable wealth and unlimited resources and retinue, I have entered the forest and become an ascetic, desiring to seek meritoriousness that will liberate me from the snares of sensuality. From today onwards, I should not be negligent.

There are these three categories of wrong thoughts, namely, thought based on desire (kāma-vitakka), which is directed to sense-pleasures; thought based on ill-will (vyāpāda-vitakka), which is directed to killing, destroying, harming; thought based on cruelty (vihimsā-vitakka), which is directed to causing harm and injury to others. These thoughts may be likened to wild flies which feed on those who are negligent and who abandon the practice of mental detachment from defilements and physical detachment from sense-pleasures. Now is the time for me to devote myself totally to the practice of detachment (paviveka).

True, seeing the defects of the household life, which obstruct, hinder and harm meritorious practices, I have renounced the world. This hut of leaves is indeed delightful. This fine levelled ground is bright yellow like a ripe bael fruit. The walls are silvery white. The leaves of the roof are beautifully red like the colour of a pigeon’s foot. The couch is made of cane, bears the patterns of a variegated bedspread. The dwelling place is very comfortable to live in. I do not think that the luxuries of my former residence can excel the comfort provided by this hut.”

Reflecting thus, he discerned the eight disadvantages of a leaf-hut and the ten advantages of the foot of trees.<sup>39</sup> Consequently, on that very day he abandoned the hut and approached the foot of trees which are endowed with ten virtues. [31]

The following morning, he entered the nearby village for alms food. The villagers made a great effort to offer him choice food. After finishing his meal, he went back to the enclosure in the forest and sat down thinking:

“I became an ascetic not because I lack food and nourishment. Delicacies tend to boost one’s pride and arrogance in being a man. There is no end to the trouble that arises from the necessity of sustaining one’s life with food.

IV: The Renunciaton of Sumedha – 58

It would be good if I should abstain from food made from cultivated grains and live only on the fruits that fall from trees.”

From that moment onwards he lived only on fruits that fell from trees. Without lying down at all, he made strenuous efforts to meditate incessantly only in the three postures of sitting, standing and walking, and at the end of seven days, he achieved the eight attainments (samāpatti) and the five super knowledges (abhiññā). [33]

V: The Prophecy

By the time the recluse Sumedha had become accomplished in the practices of asceticism by following the teachings of noble ascetics and had gained the absorptions (jhāna) and super knowledges (abhiññā), there appeared in the world Buddha Dīpaṅkara,<sup>40</sup> Lord of the Three Worlds. Thirty-two wondrous events such as a quake of the 10,000 world-element, occurred on four occasions concerning the appearance of Buddha Dīpaṅkara, at his conception, birth, becoming a Buddha and the teaching of the first discourse.<sup>41</sup> But Sumedha was not aware of these wondrous events as he was then totally taken with the bliss of the absorptions (jhāna).

After his Awakening, Buddha Dīpaṅkara taught the first discourse<sup>42</sup> to 100,000 billion Devas and human beings at Sunandārāma. After that, he set out on a journey with an intention of removing the mental defilements of beings by pouring on them the purifying water of Dhamma, like the heavy rain that falls on all four continents.

Then with 400,000 Arahats, he went to the city of Rammavatī and stayed at Sudassana monastery. Meanwhile Sumedha was enjoying the bliss of the absorptions (jhāna) in the forest, completely unaware of the appearance of Buddha Dīpaṅkara in the world.

On hearing of the Buddha's arrival at Sudassana monastery, the citizens of Rammavatī, after their morning meal, carried excellent gifts for medicinal use such as butter, ghee, etc., as well as flowers and scents and went into the presence of the Buddha. Having paid their respects to the Buddha and honoured him with flowers, scents, etc., they sat down at suitable places and listened to his exalted discourse. By the end of the discourse, they invited him, together with his disciples, the Saṅgha, to the next day's meal, and having circumambulated the Buddha in salutation, they left the monastery.

Preparations to Receive Buddha Dīpaṅkara

The next day, the citizens of Rammavatī were preparing elaborately for the incomparably great alms giving (asadisa-mahā-dāna). A pavilion was set up, and pure, tender, blue lotuses were strewn in it. The air was refreshed with four kinds of perfume; sweet smelling flowers made from rice-flakes were scattered; pots of cool sweet water were covered with emerald-green banana leaves and placed at the four corners of the pavilion; a canopy, decorated with stars of gold, silver and ruby, was fixed to the ceiling of the pavilion; scented flowers and jewels, like blooms formed into garlands and festoons, were hung here and there. When the decorations of the pavilion were complete, the citizens started to make the city clean and tidy. On both sides of the main road were placed water-pots, flowers, banana plants complete with bunches of fruit. Flags, banners and streamers were hung up and decorative screens were put up at suitable places.

When the necessary preparations had thus been made in the city, the citizens attended to mending the road which the Buddha would take in entering the city. They filled holes and cracks caused by floods with earth, and they levelled the uneven muddy ground. They also covered the road with pearl-white sand and strewed it with flowers of rice-flakes. Thus, they made all the arrangements and preparations for the ceremonial alms giving.

At that time, the recluse Sumedha levitated from his hermitage and, while travelling through the air, saw the citizens of Rammavatī engaging cheerfully in road-mending and [34] decorating. Wondering what was going on below, he alighted and stood at an appropriate place while the people were watching him. Then he asked (Bv 2.40):

“You are mending the road so happily and enthusiastically. For whose benefit are you mending the road?”

The people then answered (Bv 2.41):

“Venerable Sumedha, there has appeared in this world the incomparable Buddha Dīpaṅkara, who has conquered the five kinds of death (māra). He is the supreme lord of the whole world. We are mending the road for his visit.”

From this conversation, it may be noted that Buddha Dīpaṅkara appeared long after Sumedha had attained the absorptions and super knowledges. Sumedha did not happen to be aware of Dīpaṅkara’s conception, birth, becoming a Buddha, and teaching of the first discourse because he had wandered about only in the forests and in the sky, totally absorbed in the bliss of the absorptions and in the exercise of the super knowleges, taking no interest in any event of the human world. It was only while he was travelling through the air and saw the people of Rammavatī were attending to road-mending and cleaning, that he descended to earth to ask what was going on. This suggests that Sumedha was some few thousand years old at that time, as the duration of life, when Buddha Dīpaṅkara appeared, was 100,000 years.

Sumedha Helps with Road-Mending

Sumedha was filled with joy on hearing the word “Buddha,” uttered by the people of Rammavatī. He experienced great mental happiness and repeated the word Buddha, Buddha, as he could not contain the intense joy that had arisen in him.

Standing on the spot where he had descended, Sumedha was filled with happiness and also stirred by spiritual urgency (samvega). He thought thus: “I will sow excellent seeds of merit in the fertile ground of this Buddha Dīpaṅkara, for the cultivation of good deeds. Rare and difficult, indeed, it is to witness the happy moment of a Buddha’s appearance. That happy moment has now come to me. Let me not let it pass by unheeded.”

Having thought thus, he asked the people: “Men, if you are preparing the road for the Buddha’s visit, allot me a stretch of the road. I, too, would like to participate in your road-mending work.” – “Very well,” said the people, and because they were confident that he was a person of great supernormal powers, they allotted him a big, boggy and very uneven portion of ground which would be difficult to mend. As they assigned him his share of work, they said: “You may improve and make it delightful with decorations.”

Then Sumedha, with his heart gladdened by thinking of the attributes of the Buddha, decided: “I can mend the road with my supernormal powers so that it will look pleasant. But if I do so, the people around me may not think highly of it, because it will be done easily, in an instant. Today, I should do my duties with my own physical labour.” Having decided thus, he filled the bog with earth which he carried from a distance.

The Arrival of Buddha Dīpaṅkara

Before Sumedha could finish his assigned work, Buddha Dīpaṅkara came along the road with 400,000 Arahats, who were all endowed with the six super [35] knowledges, who could not be shaken by the eight vicissitudes of the world and who were purified of mental defilements.

The 400,000 Arahats always followed and accompanied Buddha Dīpaṅkara. The virtues of these Arahats are given just for ready reference in the Pāḷi text which says that they were endowed with the six super knowledges (abhiññā), that they could not be shaken by the eight vicissitudes of the world and that they were purified of mental defilements.

But the commentary states that their virtues were in addition to those already mentioned: they had little desire; they were easily contented; they could give others words of advice; in turn they listened to words of advice respectfully; they were devoid of attachment to the five sense objects; they did not mix with lay people unnecessarily; and they observed the five kinds of discipline, etc., says the author, who also makes a quotation from the Poem about Aspiration (Hsutaṅgan Pyo) a well-known epic of Shin Silavaṃsa.

When Buddha Dīpaṅkara came along the road with 400,000 Arahats, both Devas and humans welcomed them with the beating of drums. They also expressed their joy by singing songs of welcome in honour of him.

At that time, human beings were visible to Devas and Devas were visible to human beings. All these beings, divine and human, followed the Buddha, some raising their hands in adoration and others playing their respective musical instruments.

Devas, coming along through the air, tossed and scattered celestial flowers, such as Mandārava, Lotus (Paduma) and Koviḷāra, all over the place – up and down, front and behind, left and right – in honour of the Buddha. Humans also did similar honour to the Buddha with such flowers as Campak (Campaka), Sarala, Indian putat (Mucalinda), Ironwood (Nāga), Indian Laurel (Punnāga), and Ketakī.<sup>43</sup>

<sup>43</sup> [Both Sarala and Ketakī are identified as pine trees in the dictionaries, but pine trees don't have flowers, so it is not clear what they refer to here.]

Sumedha gazed, unblinking, at the Buddha's person, which was endowed with the 32 marks of a Great Man and further adorned with the 80 minor marks. He witnessed the Buddha's resplendent person, looking as if of solid gold, at the height of glory, with the bright aura always around him and the six radiances emanating from his body flashing like lightning against a sapphire-blue sky.

Then he decided thus: "Today, I ought to abandon my life in the presence of the Buddha. Let him not tread in the mud and suffer discomfort. Let the Buddha and all his 400,000 Arahats tread on my back and walk just as they would do on ruby-coloured planks of a bridge. Using my body as a footpath by the Buddha and his Arahats will definitely bring me long-lasting welfare and happiness."

Having made up his mind thus, he loosened his hair-knot, spread a mat of hide, and fibre-robe on the murky swamp and then prostrated himself on them, like a bridge constructed of ruby-coloured wooden planks.

Sumedha's Aspiration towards Buddhahood

So to Sumedha, who had prostrated himself, the aspiration to become a Buddha arose (Bv 2.54-58):

"If I so desire, this very day I can become an Arahāt in whom the pollutants (āsava) are exhausted and mental defilements removed. But what does it profit me to realise the Arahāt fruition and Nibbāna as an obscure disciple in the Dispensation of Buddha Dīpaṅkara? I will exert my utmost for the attainment of omniscient Buddhahood.

What is the use of selfishly escaping the cycle of births alone, in spite of the fact that I am a superior person, fully aware of my prowess in wisdom, faith and energy. I will strive to become an omniscient Buddha and liberate all beings, including Devas, from the cycle of births which is a sea of suffering.

After becoming an omniscient Buddha myself, which is the result of my matchless deed of lying prostrate in the mud and making myself a kind of bridge for the Supreme Buddha Dīpaṅkara, I will rescue beings out of the cycle of births, which is a sea of suffering. [36]

After crossing over the stream of Saṃsāra and leaving behind the three realms of existences,<sup>44</sup> I will, by myself, first embark on the Dhamma-raft of the noble path of eight constituents and go to the rescue of all beings including Devas.”

Thus, his mind was bent upon being a Buddha.

Sumittā, the Future Yasodharā

While Sumedha was making his resolution to attain Buddhahood, a young Brahmin maiden, named Sumittā, went to join the people who were gathering in the presence of the Buddha. She brought eight lotus blooms to honour the Buddha. When she was in the middle of the crowd, and as soon as her eyes fell on Sumedha, she was seized with a sudden great love for him. Though she wanted to offer him some gifts, she had nothing but the eight lotus blooms. Then she said to him: “Venerable recluse, I give you five lotus blooms so that you may offer them to the Buddha yourself. The remaining three blooms are for my own offering to the Buddha.” She then handed the five lotus blooms to Sumedha and expressed her wish saying: “Venerable recluse, throughout the period you are fulfilling the perfections to become a Buddha, may I be the partner who shares your life.”

Sumedha accepted the lotus blooms from the young lady Sumittā and, in the midst of the crowd, offered them to Buddha Dīpaṅkara, who had come towards him, and he prayed for the attainment of Perfect Self-Awakening.

Observing the scene that had taken place between Sumedha and Sumittā, the Buddha made the prediction in the midst of the multitude thus (Yasodharātherī-apadāna, Thi-ap 50):

“Sumedha, this girl Sumittā, will be your partner who will share her life with you, assisting you with equal fervour and deed for your becoming a Buddha. She will be pleasing to you with her every thought, word and deed. She will be lovely in appearance, pleasing, of sweet speech and a delight to the heart. In your Dispensation as a Buddha, in your final existence, she will become a female disciple who will receive your spiritual inheritance of Awakening complete with supernormal psychic powers.”

The Utterance of the Prophecy

As mentioned under chapter II, The Rare Appearance of a Buddha, there was none among the people who did not aspire to Buddhahood on beholding a Buddha’s splendour. Although they aspired to Buddhahood, not one of them was qualified to become a Buddha. But, unlike this multitude of people, Sumedha was fully endowed with all requisites for his becoming a Buddha. In fact, he was inclined to become a Buddha as he was endowed with the eight factors required for receiving the prophecy. These eight factors are:

1. Being a human being.
2. Being a male person.
3. Having fulfilled all conditions necessary for the realization of Awakening.
4. Meeting with a living Buddha.
5. Being an ascetic who believes in the law of deeds and their results (kamma).
6. Having acquired the absorptions (jhāna) and super knowledges (abhiññā).
7. Being prepared to lay down his life for the well-being of a Buddha.

If Buddha Dīpaṅkara and his 400,000 Arahats had walked on the back of the prostrate Sumedha, as though they were crossing a bridge, he would not have survived. Knowing this full well, Sumedha unhesitatingly and courageously prepared himself to render service to the Buddha. Such a performance is called a principal act of merit (adhikāra-kusala).

8. Intense wholesome aspiration to become a Buddha.

Even if the whole universe were filled with glowing red hot coal and sharp pointed spears, he would not hesitate to tread through them in order to become a Buddha.

Knowing that Sumedha was endowed with these requisite qualifications, Buddha Dīpaṅkara went to Sumedha and, standing at the head of his prostrate body, exercised his supernormal psychic power of seeing into the future, to find out whether Sumedha's aspiration to become a Buddha would be fulfilled, and said: "Sumedha will become a [37] Buddha, Gotama by name, after four immeasurable periods (asaṅkhyeyya) and 100,000 aeons have passed from the present one." While still standing at his head, the Buddha uttered the prophecy in nine verses beginning with these words: Passatha imaṃ tāpasam jaṭilaṃ uggatāpanaṃ (Bv 2.61-69):

"Monks, behold this matted-haired ascetic of rigorous austere practices! The recluse Sumedha will become an Awakened One among Brahmas, Devas and human beings after innumerable aeons, to be exact, after four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons from now.

On the threshold of his becoming a Buddha, this Sumedha will renounce the world, leaving behind the marvellously delightful city of Kapilavatthu; he will then devote himself to meditation and perform strenuous austere practices (dukkara-cariyā).

While staying under the banyan tree called Ajapāla, he will accept the offering of milk rice and go to the river Nerañjarā.

Nerañjarā is the name of the river on the banks of which was Uruvelā, the scene of the Bodhisatta's sojourn after his realization at the futility of his severe austerities. He bathed in the river before he ate the meal of milk-rice given by Sujātā. After eating the meal, the Bodhisatta launched the bowl in the river. Having reached the Nāga's riverine abode, it sank down and came into contact with the bowls similarly launched by the three previous Buddhas of this aeon. Read the Further Explanations for the derivation of the river's name.

When his becoming a Buddha is drawing near, he will partake of the milk rice on the river bank and approach the Bodhi tree by the path well prepared by Devas.

As he reaches the Bodhi tree, which will be the site of attaining Awakening, he will go round it clockwise; he will turn from south to west, from west to north and then from north to east, and will sit down with the intentions of becoming a Supremely Awakened One with none to excel him. Then, having seated himself at the foot of the Bodhi tree, he will gain insight knowledge of the four noble truths.

The mother of this Buddha will bear the name Māyā Devī; the father will be named Suddhodana. The Buddha will have the name Gotama.

The pair of his chief disciples will be Kolita and Upatissa, who will be free of mental intoxicants (āsava) and lust (rāga), and who are calm of heart and have profound mental concentration. The monk, Ānanda by name, will wait upon this Buddha as an attendant.

Vens. Khemā and Uppalavaṇṇā, who are free of the mental pollutants and attachments, who have calm hearts and profound mental concentration, will become the two female chief disciples. The fig tree (assattha) will be the Buddha’s Bodhi tree under which he will attain Awakening.

Citta and Hatthālavaka will be the foremost laymen serving the Buddha. Similarly, Uttarā and Nandamātā will be the foremost laywomen.”

Acclamation by Devas and Humans

On hearing the prophecy of Buddha Dīpaṅkara, who had no equal in the three worlds and who was always in pursuit of meritorious deeds, Devas and humans acclaimed with joy: “It is said that this the recluse Sumedha is truly the seed of a Bodhisatta.” They slapped themselves on their upper arms<sup>45</sup> with joy. Devas and Brahmas, who had come from the 10,000 world-element together with humans raised their hands in adoration. They also expressed their wishes (Bv 2.73-75):

“Even though we should now fail to put into practice the teaching of Buddha Dīpaṅkara, lord of the entire world, we have encountered this noble recluse who will become a Buddha. We will then strive to attain the higher knowledge of the Dhamma. [38]

For example, there are those who try to cross a river, but cannot reach the destined landing place on the other side as they are carried away by the current of the river. They manage, however, to cling to a landing place somewhere further down the river and thence cross over to their destinations.

In the same way, although we cannot yet avail ourselves of the teaching of Buddha Dīpaṅkara, we have encountered this noble recluse who is destined to become a Buddha in future, when we will attain the paths and fruitions.”

Buddha Dīpaṅkara Proceeded to Rammavatī

After Buddha Dīpaṅkara, who had insight into the three worlds, who was the possessor of the attribute knower of the world (loka-vidū), who was worthy of accepting the gift brought from a distance,<sup>46</sup> had thus made the prediction and been honoured with eight handfuls of flowers, he departed, stepping out with his right foot placed by the side of Sumedha.

From the place where the Buddha had uttered the prophecy, the 400,000 Arahats also departed, keeping Sumedha on their right, after honouring him with flowers and scents. So also humans, Nāgas and Gandhabbas departed from there after paying obeisance to Sumedha and honouring him with flowers and scents.

Amidst the honours showered on him in reverence by the Devas and citizens of Rammavatī, Buddha Dīpaṅkara, followed by the 400,000 Arahats, proceeded along the well-decorated road into the city where he took the seat especially prepared for him. Sitting down, he appeared like the morning sun rising on the top of Mount Yugandhara. Just as the early radiance of the sun brings the lotus flowers into full bloom, so the Buddha would shed the radiance of Awakening to enable those who were on the verge of liberation to penetrate stage by stage into the depths of the four noble truths. The 400,000 Arahats were also seated in an orderly manner at the places they had reached. The citizens of Rammavatī then performed the ceremony of the great incomparable alms giving (asadisa-dāna) to the Buddha and his monastics.

When Buddha Dīpaṅkara, the leader of the three worlds, and the 400,000 Arahats, went out of his sight, Sumedha got up joyfully from his prostrate position. With his mind suffused with joy and happiness, exultation and delightful satisfaction, he sat cross-legged on the huge pile of flowers that were strewn in his honour by Devas and humans, and contemplated thus (Bv 2.80-81):

“I am fully accomplished in the absorptions (jhāna) and have attained the height of the five super knowledges (abhiññā). Throughout the 10,000 world-element, there is no ascetic who is my peer. I see none who is equal to me in the exercise of supernormal powers.”

Thus contemplating, he experienced intense joy and satisfaction.

The Thirty-two Prophetic Phenomena

When Sumedha was seated cross-legged, happy with the recollection of Buddha Dīpaṅkara's prophecy and feeling as though he already had the precious gem of omniscient Buddhahood in his very hand, Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element arrived and proclaimed with a mighty sound (Bv 83-108):

“Noble Sumedha, 32 prophetic phenomena have now taken place; these phenomena occurred also to all previous Bodhisattas who had received the prediction and were sitting down cross-legged as you are doing now, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, when previous Bodhisattas received the prediction, there was [39] an absence of extreme cold and heat or hotness of the weather. These two phenomena have been clearly discerned today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, when previous Bodhisattas received the prediction, there was utter silence and a complete absence of disturbances over the whole 10,000 world-element. These two phenomena have been clearly discerned today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, when previous Bodhisattas had received the prediction, there were no violent winds blowing, there were no rivers flowing. These two phenomena have been clearly discerned today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, when previous Bodhisattas received the prediction, all the terrestrial flowers and aquatic flowers bloomed simultaneously. The same phenomenon has happened today. So you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, when previous Bodhisattas received the prediction, all the creepers and trees bore fruit simultaneously. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, when previous Bodhisattas had received the prediction, all the precious jewels that lie in the sky and on earth shone bright. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, when previous Bodhisattas had received the prediction, great sounds of celestial as well as earthly music were heard, without either Devas or human beings playing on the musical instruments. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, when previous Bodhisattas received the prediction, strange and exquisite flowers fell from heaven like rain. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, when previous Bodhisattas had received the prediction, there occurred a whirling of the great ocean and a trembling of the 10,000 world-element. There have been great roars today because of these two phenomena, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, on the day that previous Bodhisattas had received the prediction, there occurred an extinction of hell-fires throughout the 10,000 world-element. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, on the day that previous Bodhisattas received the prediction, the sun became clear of blemishes, all the stars and planets were discernable during the day. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, on the day that previous Bodhisattas received the prediction, water gushed from the earth without there being any rain. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, on the day that previous Bodhisattas had received the prediction, the stars and planets shone with splendour. The constellation Visākhā appeared in conjunction with the full moon. The same phenomena have happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, on the day that previous Bodhisattas received the prediction, snakes, mongooses and other animals which live in pits, and foxes and other animals which live in ravines, came out of their holes. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, on the day that previous Bodhisattas received the prediction, there was no sign of dissatisfaction in the hearts of sentient beings and they were [40] content with what they had. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

People are inflicted with discontent in their everyday life, never satisfied with whatever they possess; it is only on the day of a Buddha's prophecy that they are temporarily relieved of their perennial discontent.

Noble Sumedha, on the day that previous Bodhisattas received the prediction, sentient beings were cured of diseases and relieved of hunger. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, on the day that previous Bodhisattas received the prediction, there occurred an alleviation of attachment to sense objects in the minds of sentient beings which are also rid of ill-will and delusion. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, on the day that previous Bodhisattas received the prediction, the minds of sentient beings were rid of fear. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, on the day that previous Bodhisattas received the prediction, the atmosphere was clear, free from dust, dirt and mist. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, on the day that previous Bodhisattas received the prediction, the atmosphere was free of undesirable odours and filled with celestial fragrance. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, on the day that previous Bodhisattas received the prediction Devas and Brahmas – except for the formless Brahmas – became visible. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, on the day that previous Bodhisattas received the prediction, all abodes of incessant suffering became visible. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, on the day that previous Bodhisattas received the prediction, walls, doors and even mountains always opened wide and formed no obstructions or barriers. Today also, these walls, doors and mountains became like the empty space and the open sky, in every way. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Noble Sumedha, at the moment that Bodhisattas received the prediction there occurred no deaths or conceptions of beings. The same phenomenon has happened today, so you will certainly become a Buddha.

Devas and Brahmas, who had arrived from the 10,000 world-element, spoke words of praise and encouragement to Sumedha thus: “Noble Sumedha, strive on earnestly with constant diligence! There should be no retreat. Proceed with your endeavour! We know without any doubt that you will certainly become a Buddha.” [41]

VI: Sumedha's Reflection on the Perfections

The Bodhisatta, Sumedha, was delighted with both the prophetic words of the Buddha Dīpaṅkara and the encouraging words of Devas and Brahmas, and he reflected thus, when Devas and Brahmas had departed (Bv 2.109-115):

“Buddhas are not speakers of ambiguous words, nor are they given to speaking of futile things. Never have their words proved wrong, surely I will become a Buddha.

As a stone thrown upwards will certainly fall back to the ground, so the words of Buddhas always prove unerring and never failing, surely I will become a Buddha.

Again, as death certainly comes to living beings, so the words of Buddhas always prove unerring and never failing, surely, I will become a Buddha.

Again, as the sun certainly rises at the end of night, so the words of Buddhas always prove unerring and never failing, surely I will become a Buddha.

Again, as a lion certainly roars on coming out of his den, so the words of Buddhas always prove unerring and never failing, surely I will become a Buddha.

Again, as birth certainly follows conception in a woman, the words of Buddhas always prove unerring and never failing, surely I will become a Buddha.”

Reflecting on these similes, Sumedha was certain that he would definitely attain Buddhahood in accordance with Buddha Dīpaṅkara's prophetic words. And he thought to himself thus (Bv 2.116):

“Well, I will make a thorough search in the basic principle concerning the three worlds<sup>47</sup> in all the ten directions for the conditions of my becoming a Buddha.”

Thus he thought about and investigated those factors which conditioned his becoming a Buddha (Buddha-kāraṅka-dhamma). [42]

VI: Sumedha's Reflection on the Perfections – 74

The wisdom involved in such mental investigation is called the perfection investigating wisdom (pāramī-pavicaya-ñāṇa). The wisdom that arose in Sumedha's mental process was of great potency. It helped him see clearly the perfections, the great charity and good conduct, all of which are essential in gaining omniscience and are called the constituent elements of Awakening (Bodhi-sambhāra). This wisdom was achieved by himself, without the help of a teacher.

According to the sub-commentary on the Enumeration of Phenomena (Dhamma-saṅgaṇī), it was the forerunner of the arising of omniscience in him. Buddha Dīpaṅkara had merely predicted Sumedha's becoming a Buddha. He did not expound on what and how to practice for becoming one. Sumedha had to think about and find out those practices with his own perfection investigating wisdom, and when he did so, he came to see very clearly what to practise and how to proceed.

Then the author reproduces a long verse that depicts Sumedha's investigation of the ten perfections from the Poem on the Perfections (Pāramidawgan Pyo) of Shin Sīlavamsa.

The phrase “basic principle” in the aforesaid paragraph is the translation of the Pāḷi dhamma-dhātu, in which dhātu literally means “a phenomenon that carries its own nature.” That is to say, it is a phenomenon that is not created by anyone, but which arises on its own as conditioned by a cause. If a phenomenon is created by someone, it cannot be said to be a natural phenomenon. Therefore “basic principle” means “a phenomenon that arises, not through a person's effort, but as a result of natural conditions and circumstances,” which in Pāḷi is dhamma-dhātu.

If one wants to look for Buddha-making factors, one should do so in the basic principle (dhamma-dhātu), hence, “I will make a thorough search in the basic principle” (vicināmi dhamma-dhātuyā). In contrast, when an individual is meant and not a principle, one may say in Pāḷi, loka-dhātuya, “in the world.”

What this means is that a principle is concerned with the basic principle (dhamma-dhātu) whereas an individual is concerned with world (loka-dhātu). For instance, there is such a saying as “there cannot be two contemporary Buddhas in the world (loka-dhātu).” Here as the saying concerns an individual the “world” (loka-dhātu) is used instead of the basic principle (dhamma-dhātu).

1. The Perfection of Generosity

While Sumedha was engaged in the investigation of the Buddha-making factors, he discovered first the perfection of generosity which former Bodhisattas had always followed and practised, and which was like a highway to the state of Buddhahood. Then he admonished himself thus (Bv 118):

“Sumedha, if you are desirous of attaining the knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience,<sup>48</sup> you should constantly establish first, the perfection of generosity and make efforts to become accomplished in fulfilling this perfection.”

He continued to admonish himself thus (Bv 119-120):

“When a jar, full with liquid, is overturned, it pours out all its contents. Likewise, Sumedha, you should give alms to all, whether low, middling or high, leaving nothing with you.”<sup>49</sup>

2. The Perfection of Morality

After discovering and reflecting on the perfection of generosity, he went on to contemplate thus (Bv 121):

“The perfection of generosity alone cannot constitute all the Buddha-making factors. There must be other factors that also contribute to the maturity of the knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience. I shall investigate them.”

When he investigated thus, he discovered morality as the second perfection which former Bodhisattas had always cultivated and fulfilled. He admonished himself thus (Bv 122):

He continued to admonish himself (Bv 124-125):

“The yak (camara) protects its tail even at the risk of its life; if the tail should happen to be caught in something, it would rather die than damage its tail by making an effort to release it. Likewise, Sumedha, you should observe morality in the four purifying fields, namely: 1) Restraint according to the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha-saṃvara); 2) restraint of the sense faculties (indriya-saṃvara); 3) purity of livelihood (ājīva-parisuddhi); and 4) proper use of the requisites (paccaya-sannissita) which form the basis of meritorious deeds. As the yak gives up its life in protecting its tail, so also you should safeguard your morality constantly.”

3. The Perfection of Renunciation

After discovering and reflecting on the perfection of morality, he discovered renunciation as the third perfection which former Bodhisattas had always cultivated and fulfilled. [43] Then he admonished himself thus (Bv 127-128):

He continued to admonish himself (Bv 129-130):

“A man, imprisoned for a long time and suffering from torture all the time, looks only for an opportunity to escape. Likewise, Sumedha, you should regard all the existences in the realms of sensuality, materiality and immateriality as prisons and look towards renunciation to escape from all these existences.”

4. The Perfection of Wisdom

After discovering and reflecting on the perfection of renunciation, he discovered wisdom as the fourth perfection which former Bodhisattas had always cultivated and fulfilled. Then he admonished himself thus (Bv 132-133):

He continued to admonish himself (Bv 134-135):

“A monastic on his alms round receives sufficient food by going from one household to another, be they low, middling or high. Likewise, Sumedha, you should always approach all learned persons, irrespective of their depth of learning and ask them the facts and the meaning of all that should be known by raising questions, such as: “Sir, what is merit? What is demerit? What is faulty? What is faultless?” and so on. You should thus make an effort to become accomplished in the perfection of wisdom. When you are thus accomplished, you will attain the knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience.”

5. The Perfection of Energy

After discovering and reflecting on the perfection of wisdom, he discovered energy as the fifth perfection which former Bodhisattas cultivated and fulfilled. Then he admonished himself thus (Bv 137-138):

He continued to admonish himself (Bv 139-140):

“Crouching, standing and walking, the lion, the king of beasts, is possessed of undiminished energy in these postures, and is always alert. Likewise, Sumedha, you should constantly arouse your energy in all your existences. When you are accomplished in fulfilling the perfection of energy, you will attain the knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience.”

6. The Perfection of Forbearance

After discovering and reflecting on the perfection of energy, he discovered forbearance as the sixth perfection which former Bodhisattas had always cultivated and fulfilled. [44] Then he admonished himself thus (Bv 142-143):

“Sumedha, if you are desirous of attaining the knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience, you should constantly establish the perfection of forbearance without being inconsistent, such as being tolerant sometimes and not at other times, being patient with some people and not with others; if you can practise thus, you will attain the knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience.”

VI: Sumedha's Reflection on the Perfections – 78

He continued to admonish himself (Bv 144-145):

“This great earth shows no signs of love or hate towards all of the things that are dumped upon it but forbears them whether they are clean and good or unclean and foul. Likewise, Sumedha, you should put up with all that is done to you, be it in honour or in contempt. When you are accomplished in fulfilling the perfection of forbearance, you will attain the knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience.”

7. The Perfection of Truthfulness

After discovering and reflecting on the perfection of forbearance, he discovered truthfulness as the seventh perfection which former Bodhisattas had always followed and practised. Then he admonished himself thus (Bv 147-148):

“Sumedha, if you are desirous of attaining the knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience, you should constantly establish the perfection of truthfulness, which is speaking only the truth and not being duplicitous, such as being truthful sometimes and not at other times; speaking truthfully to some people and not to others. If you fulfil the perfection of truthfulness by speaking only the truth, you will attain the knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience.”

He continued to admonish himself (Bv 149-150):

“The morning star, which serves as a guiding light, keeps steady on its course, never deviating from it, irrespective of the season, whether it is rainy, cold or hot. Likewise, Sumedha, you should not deviate from the path of truth, the path that consists of eight sectors: what you see, what you hear, what you feel, what you know; what you do not see, what you do not hear, what you do not feel and what you do not know. When you are accomplished in fulfilling the perfection of truthfulness, you will attain the knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience.”

You stand on the path of truth only when you say that you see what you do see with your eyes in the case of seeing. Only when you say you hear what you hear with your ears in the case of hearing. Only when you say you feel with your nose, tongue or body in the case of feeling. Only when you say you know what you know with your mind in the case of knowing. The same holds good in the case of not seeing, not hearing, not feeling and not knowing. Such a speech established on the path of truth is said to be the speech of the noble ones (ariya-vohāra), said the Buddha.

8. The Perfection of Resolution

After discovering and reflecting on the perfection of truthfulness, he discovered resolution as the eighth perfection which former Bodhisattas had always cultivated and fulfilled. Then he admonished himself (Bv 152-153):

“Sumedha, if you are desirous of attaining the paths, fruitions and omniscience, you should constantly establish the perfection of resolution. When you fulfil it steadfastly without wavering, you will attain the knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience.”

He continued to admonish himself (Bv 154-155):

“A big rocky mountain that stands in a solid mass is [45] not shaken by strong winds, but remains rooted in its place. Likewise, Sumedha, you should perform without fail and at all times meritorious deeds which you have resolved to do. When you are accomplished in fulfilling the perfection of resolution, you will attain the knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience.”

Here the author explains that resolution means determination to see things happen the way you like, once you have resolved: “I will do this or that, and I will make it happen in this manner,” and so on. For instance, Prince Temiya made up his mind to assume the guise of a deaf and dumb person though he was not deaf or dumb, until he was permitted to renounce the world. Such a determination is called resolution (adhiṭṭhāna).

Temiya's story is contained in the Birth Story about the Wise Mūgapakkha (Mūga-pakkha-jātaka, Ja 538). He was the Bodhisatta born as the son of the King of Kāsi. Even in his infancy, he recollected his past lives, one of which was being in the state of severe suffering in the Auxiliary Hells (Ussada-niraya), owing to his giving orders of punishment to convicted criminals. His recollection made him hate kingship bitterly, and on the advice of the goddess of his parasol, who had been his mother in a former existence, he resolved to pretend to be an invalid who could neither hear nor speak.

For sixteen years the royal parents tried in vain to break his determination. As the last attempt, they appointed him king for one week, but he was not happy to rule the country and remained firm in his determination. He was then ordered to be clubbed to death and buried in the charnel ground. Sunanda the charioteer took him there in a chariot, and while he was digging the grave, Temiya spoke to him and expressed his wish to lead an ascetic life. The matter was reported to the palace, and the king and queen rushed to the scene. But after listening to a discourse delivered by Temiya, who was now an ascetic, they all joined him by becoming ascetics themselves.

9. The Perfection of Loving-Kindness

After discovering and reflecting on the perfection of resolution, he discovered loving-kindness as the ninth perfection which former Bodhisattas had always cultivated and fulfilled. Then he admonished himself (Bv 157-158):

He continued to admonish himself (Bv 159-160):

“Water suffuses with coolness all who bathe, the virtuous and the wicked alike, and cleanses them of dust and dirt. Likewise, Sumedha, you should develop goodwill equally towards those who wish for your welfare and those who do not. When you are accomplished in fulfilling the perfection of loving-kindness, you will attain knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience.”

10. The Perfection of Equanimity

After discovering and reflecting on the perfection of loving-kindness, he went on to contemplate thus (Bv 161):

“These nine alone cannot constitute the Buddha-making factors. There must be other perfections that also contribute to the maturity of the knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience. I shall investigate them.”

When he investigated thus, he discovered equanimity as the tenth perfection which former Bodhisattas had always cultivated and fulfilled. Then he admonished himself (Bv 162-163):

VI: Sumedha's Reflection on the Perfections – 81

“Sumedha, a pair of scales remains steady without tipping to one side or the other when poised by equal weights; likewise, if you remain evenly balanced in mind when faced with happiness or suffering, you will attain the knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience.”

He continued to admonish himself (Bv 164-165):

“Sumedha, this great earth shows no sign of love or [46] hate towards all the things that are dumped upon it, whether they are clean or foul. Likewise, Sumedha, you should always remain composed, equable in heart, not being affected either by love or hate. When you are accomplished in fulfilling the perfection of equanimity, you will attain the path and fruition, and omniscience.”

When Sumedha had reflected on the perfection of equanimity, it occurred to him thus (BvA, PTS 113):

“The perfections which contribute to the maturity of the knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience and make a Buddha, and which a Bodhisatta has to fulfil, are exactly these ten. There are no other perfections besides these. And these ten perfections, which are essential to become a Buddha, do not exist outside myself; neither in the sky above nor on the earth below; nor do they lie in the east or in any other direction. In fact, they are in my heart.”

When he had thought thus, he urged himself (BvA, PTS 113):

“Sumedha, fulfil these ten perfections, which are the excellent factors conditioning Buddhahood, without swerving in any way.”

Then he considered going over the perfections in forward order: generosity, morality, renunciation, wisdom, energy, forbearance, truthfulness, resolution, loving-kindness and equanimity. Then he considered them in reverse order: equanimity, loving-kindness, resolution, truthfulness, forbearance, energy, wisdom, renunciation, morality, and generosity.

Then he considered going over them in groups of two beginning with the middle two: energy and forbearance; wisdom and truthfulness; renunciation and resolution; morality and loving-kindness; generosity and equanimity. Then he considered going over them again, beginning from the two ends: generosity and equanimity; morality and loving-kindness; renunciation and resolution; wisdom and truthfulness; energy and forbearance. Thus he contemplated on the ten perfections as thoroughly as an oil-press grinds oil-seeds to produce oil.

He also considered all the matters connected with the perfections that are essential for his becoming a Buddha: giving up external things is an exercise of an ordinary perfection (pāramī); giving up one's limb is an exercise of higher perfection (upapāramī); giving up one's life is an exercise of the highest perfection (paramattha-pāramī).

A Great Earthquake

Because of the power generated by the investigation of the ten perfections complete with their basic principles of functions and characteristics, this great earth leaned left and right, forward and backward, downward and upward, in these ways it shook violently. It also made loud rumbling and echoing sounds. Like a sugarcane press operated by its workers, or like the turning wheel of an oil-mill, the 10,000 world-element swirled and quaked.

After declaring the prophecy to Sumedha, Buddha Dīpaṅkara entered the city of Rammavatī and went to the citizens who had invited him to a meal. It was while he was partaking of the meal that Sumedha reflected on the ten perfections, one after another. And it was at the end of his reflection that the earthquake took place. Because of this violent earthquake, all the people, who were hosts to the Buddha, could not stand firm; like the big Sāla trees lashed by the strong winds descending from Mount Yugandhara they fell to the ground in bewilderment and in a faint.

At the place of the alms offering, thousands of pots containing food and hundreds of water-pots knocked against one another and were shattered into pieces. Being greatly shaken, frightened and troubled in mind, they unanimously approached Buddha Dīpaṅkara and said: "Possessor of the five eyes, does this incident foretell our fortune or misfortune? A fearful danger has befallen us. May it please the Fortunate One to dispel our fears!"

Then the Fortunate One replied: "Be free from the fear caused by this earthquake; be relieved of your worries. There is nothing to be afraid of. I have today made the prophecy to Sumedha, declaring that he will in the future become an omniscient Buddha in the world. He has reflected on the ten perfections that were fulfilled by former Buddhas. Because of [47] Sumedha's reflections on the ten perfections, which are essential for his becoming a Buddha, without leaving out any one of them, the 10,000 world-element shook violently.” Thus, Buddha Dīpaṅkara explained to the citizens of Rammavatī the cause of the great earthquake and assured them of the absence of any danger.

Homage to Sumedha

The citizens at once became calm and free from worry on hearing the words of Buddha Dīpaṅkara. In fact, they were filled with great joy, and taking flowers, scents and other offerings, they marched out of the city and approached Sumedha, honoured him with their offerings and paid respects to him.

Then Sumedha, following the usual practice of Bodhisattas, contemplated on the attributes of an Awakened One; and with steadfast mind directed towards Buddha Dīpaṅkara, he paid homage to him. Then he stood up from his seat where he had been sitting cross-legged.

When Sumedha thus stood up from his seat, both Devas and humans did honour to him by showering on him celestial and terrestrial flowers that they had brought with them. And they spoke auspicious words of praise and encouragement (Bv 179-187):

“You, noble recluse, have aspired for the noble prize of Buddhahood. May your wish be fulfilled!

May all dangers and obstacles, which lie in store for you, remove themselves and never come to pass. May all worries and ailments vanish and may you never encounter them. May no harm befall you. May you speedily attain the knowledge of the paths, fruitions and omniscience!

Great Hero, as trees bloom in their right season in the world, so may you bring forth the fourfold valorous wisdom (catu-vesārajja-ñāṇa), the sixfold unique wisdom (cha-asādhāraṇa-ñāṇa) and the ten powers (dasa-bala-ñāṇa), etc., which are the fruitful possessions of all Buddhas!

The fourfold valorous wisdom (catū-vesārajja-ñāṇa): 1) Knowledge of factors forming an impediment to the attainment of Nibbāna (antarāyika-dhamme vā jānatā); 2) knowledge of factors leading to escape from the round of rebirths (niyyānika-dhamme passatā); 3) knowledge of the destruction of the enemy-like defilements (kilesārīnaṃ hata arahatta); and 4) Perfect Self-Enlightenment, or knowledge of all aspects and characteristics of all factors (sammā samañ-ca sabba-dhammānaṃ buddhattā Sammā-sambuddhena).

VI: Sumedha's Reflection on the Perfections – 84

The sixfold unique wisdom (cha-asādhāraṇa-ñāṇa): 1) Knowledge of the different stages of development in the faculties of beings (indriya-paro-pariyatte-ñāṇa); 2) knowledge of covert and latent inclinations of beings (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa); 3) knowledge of the performance of the twin miracle (yamaka-pāṭihāriya-ñāṇa); 4) knowledge concerning great compassion for beings (mahā-karuṇā-ñāṇa); 5) knowledge of all aspects and characteristics of all factors, i.e., omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa); and 6) unobstructed knowledge of what all Buddhas should know (anāvaraṇa-ñāṇa).

O Great Hero, do fulfil the ten perfections as all Buddhas have done. May you be able to do so!

O Great Hero, as all Buddhas have penetrated the four noble truths at the foot of the Bodhi tree, so may you become a Buddha after penetrating the four noble truths at the foot of the Bodhi tree, the site of victory!

O Great Hero, as all Buddhas have turned the Dhamma Wheel by delivering the first discourse, so may you be able to turn the Dhamma Wheel by delivering the first discourse! [48]

Its full name is the Discourse on the Turning of the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakkappavattana-sutta, SN 56.11). It was delivered to the Group-of-Five ascetics led by Koṇḍañña at the Deer Park in Isipatana, now known as Sarnath, near modern Varanasi, on the full moon day of July (Āsāḷha). It speaks about the two extreme practices which a recluse should avoid, and such fundamental teachings of the Buddha as the four noble truths and the eightfold noble path.

As the moon shines free from the five blemishes of mist, fog, cloud, Asurinda and smoke on a full moon day, so may you appear resplendent in the 10,000 world-element with your heart's desire fulfilled!

As the sun, liberated from the mouth of Asurinda, shines radiant with its own light, so may you shine bright with the glory of a Buddha after your liberation from all the existences!

As all rivers flow and are gathered into the great ocean, so may all Devas and humans congregate in your presence!”

Asurinda, literally, chief of Asuras, form a class of inferior deities. In fact, Asuras are inhabitants of one of the four woeful states. There are more than one Asurinda, but here the word refers to Rāhu, who captures the moon or the sun by means of his mouth. Such a seizure is believed to be the cause of the eclipse of the moon or the sun.

In this manner, Devas and humans proclaimed his glory and offered auspicious words of prayer. Then Sumedha, who had thus been offered resounding words of encouragement, complete with good wishes and admiration, entered a great forest in the Himālayas, being determined to practise and fulfil the ten perfections. [49]

[This section in the Great Chronicles was followed by chapter VII called “On Miscellany” in the original. That has now been moved to the Further Explanations, and is now entitled The First Treatise on the Perfections.

There is also a Second Treatise on the Perfections, which has been extracted from the original Further Explanations, but is now set off as a stand-alone piece.

Chapter VIII, entitled “Eighteen Abhabbaṭṭhānas” is also now included in the Further Explanations, under the heading Eighteen Impossible Rebirths.

We therefore move now to chapter IX: The Chronicle of the Twenty-Four Buddhas, which continues the story.]

IX: The Chronicle of the Twenty-Four Buddhas

The definition of the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) in the commentary is this (BvA, PTS 2):

Ito heṭṭhā kappa-sata-sahassādhikesu catūsu asaṅkheyyesu uppannānaṃ pañca-vīsatiyā Buddhānaṃ uppanna-kappādi-pariccheda-vasena paveṇi-vitthāra-kathā Buddhavaṃso nāma.

From this definition the meaning of the Chronicles of the Buddhas should be understood as:

A description and exposition of the chronicles of the 25 Buddhas, who came into being over the past four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, with their 32 particulars, such as the aeons concerned, their names, clans, families, etc., which is known as the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa).

Though the chronicle of all these Buddhas with their particulars, such as the aeons, etc., is called the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa), when each of them is spoken of, the same term (Buddha-vaṃsa) is applicable to the life-story of each Buddha. For a parallel, though the word Saṅgha is a term for the whole Saṅgha of noble ones, each and every one of them can also be called Saṅgha.

1. The Chronicle of Buddha Dīpaṅkara

In this section on the Chronicle of the Buddha Dīpaṅkara, his life story with the aeon to which he belonged, etc. will be dealt with.

In the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa), the account of Buddha Dīpaṅkara does not contain in detail the events that took place at the time of his conception and birth. Only this much is mentioned about him in the Story of Sumedha (Sumedha-kathā, Bv, 2.34-35):

*Evam me siddhipattassa, vasī-bhūtassa sāsane,
Dīpaṅkaro nāma Jino, uppajji Loka-nāyako.
Uppajjante ca jāyante, bujjhante Dhamma-desane, caturo nimitte nāddasaṃ, jhāna-rati-samappito.*

The Bodhisatta, the recluse Sumedha, says: When I have thus become accomplished in the absorptions (jhāna) and super knowledges (abhiññā), there appeared Buddha Dīpaṅkara, lord of the whole world.

Being totally absorbed in the bliss of the absorptions, I had not seen the wondrous phenomena that took place on the four occasions of his conception, birth, Awakening and the delivery of the first discourse.

Thus the Chronicles of the Buddhas text refers only briefly to the appearance of Buddha Dīpaṅkara in the story of Sumedha.

It is only in the commentary that we find the full story of Buddha Dīpaṅkara, with details of the events in chronological order, starting from the episode of his rebirth in the abode of Tusita Gods.

Early Life

Four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons before the present Fortunate Aeon (Bhadda-kappa), there appeared in one aeon four Buddhas (sāra-maṇḍa-kappa); the first three were Taṇhaṅkara, Medhaṅkara and Saraṇaṅkara, one after another; and after that came an inclusive period (antara-kappa).

Then King Sudeva reigned in the city of Rammavatī. During his reign, Bodhisatta Dīpaṅkara was enjoying life in the [116] celestial abode of Tusita after his fulfilment of the perfections. Deities from the 10,000 world-element approached him with a request. In compliance with which, the Bodhisatta took conception in the womb of Sumedhā, Queen of Sudeva, on the full moon day of July (Āsāḷha) when the moon was in conjunction with the constellation of Uttarāsāḷha. Having been attended to by a great retinue and after ten full months, the Bodhisatta was born.

At the moment of his conception and birth, there appeared 32 portentous phenomena such as the trembling of the thousand world-elements, etc.

These 32 phenomena usually take place on the four occasions of every Bodhisatta's conception, birth, Awakening and teaching of the first discourse. These phenomena, common to all Bodhisattas, will be described when we come to the Chronicle of Buddha Gotama. In the commentary on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa), however, these 32 phenomena and their subsequent happenings were elaborately told in the chapter on Bodhisatta Dīpaṅkara's conception.

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 88

Thereafter, Prince Dīpaṅkara was brought up in luxury, and when he came of age, he ascended the throne. As a king, he lived in three golden palaces by rotation for 10,000 years, namely, Haṃsa, Koṅca and Mayūra. There were about 300,000 well-ornamented female attendants. His chief consort was Padumā and his son, Prince Usabhakkhandha.

Enjoying a divine-like kingly life in the three palaces, Prince Dīpaṅkara went out to the royal garden to enjoy himself. On the way, he saw an old man, a sick man and a dead man who were Deva messengers. Overcome by spiritual urgency (saṃvega), he returned from the garden and entered the city. When he wanted to go out again to the garden for the fourth time, he summoned his elephant-keeper and said: "Today, I will visit the royal garden for sightseeing. Get the elephants ready." – "Very well, your majesty," said the royal elephant-keeper and he had 84,000 elephants prepared. Dressed in a costume offered by Deva Vissakamma and accompanied by 84,000 elephants and a large army of troops, he entered the garden riding the state elephant. Having descended from the elephant's back, he roamed about, sightseeing all over the garden, sat on a cool and pleasant stone slab and aspired to go forth from the world.

Then Mahā Brahma, an Arahat living in the Suddhāvāsa abode, brought the eight requisites and appeared at a place where he could be seen. Seeing the eight requisites, the Bodhisatta asked what they were and when told that they were the requisites for a monk, he took off his royal attire and handed it over to the royal treasurer. Then he cut off his hair with his sword and threw his hair up into the sky.

Then, Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, took the hair knot in a golden receptacle and placed it in a shrine (cetiya) called Makuṭa, which is on Mount Meru and is three leagues in size and built of emerald stones.

The Bodhisatta then put on the robes offered by the Brahma and threw up into the sky his old raiment which was received and enshrined by Brahma in the cloth shrine (dussa-cetiya), which is twelve leagues in size, in the Suddhāvāsa Brahma abode.

A crore of people, who had heard of the prince's donning of the robe, followed his example and became monks themselves. Together with these monks, who had thus followed in his footsteps, Bodhisatta Dīpaṅkara practised the austerities (dukkara-cariyā). On the full moon day of May (Vesākha), on which he was to become a Buddha, he entered a town for alms food. It was the day that townsfolk happened to be making pure milk rice for propitiating gods. Nevertheless, the food was offered to the Bodhisatta and his 10 million of followers.

Having taken the milk rice, the Bodhisatta spent the daytime in the Sāla grove of the neighbourhood, and in the evening, leaving behind all of his followers, he headed alone to the Mahā Bodhi tree. [117]

Awakening

On the way, the Bodhisatta accepted eight handfuls of grass from a naked ascetic (ājīvaka), Sunanda by name, and no sooner had he spread out the grass at the foot of the Bodhi tree, the unconquered seat (aparājita-pallaṅka), which was 53 cubits in size, appeared.

With regard to the size of the seat which was 53 cubits, some say the size means the height and others say it means the breath as found in the sub-commentaries of the Inwa Period. These commentarial statements in detail will be dealt with when we come to the story of Buddha Gotama.

Sitting cross-legged on the unconquered seat, under the Pepper (Pippali) Bodhi tree, the Bodhisatta put forth energy at four levels, where one would be reduced to skin, sinews, bones and where his flesh and blood would dry up, and he overcame Māra and his army.

He gained knowledge of previous existences (pubbe-nivāsa-ñāṇa) in the first watch of the night; knowledge of the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu-ñāṇa) in the middle watch; and contemplated, in the last watch, the doctrine of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda), the revolving of the wheel of Saṃsāra, in forward order, and in the backward order, the stopping of it. Thereafter, he entered upon the fourth absorption (jhāna) through breathing meditation (ānāpānassati); emerging from it and reflecting on the five aggregates, he discerned the 50 characteristics concerning rise and fall of these aggregates and developed insight (vipassanā), up to the stage of the knowledge of a change of lineage (gotrabhū-ñāṇa).<sup>50</sup> As soon as the sun rose, this insight development led to the penetration of the path and fruition of an Arahāt, of all the attributes of a Buddha, and to the incomparable Buddhahood which is supreme in the three worlds.

After attaining Buddhahood, the Buddha spent seven days at each of the seven sites around the Bodhi tree, enjoying the bliss of fruition (phala-samāpatti). Having granted Brahma's request to him to teach, the Buddha delivered the first discourse, the Discourse on the Turning of the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakkappavattana-sutta) at Sunandārāma and 10 billion humans, Devas and Brahmās realized the four truths.

At the time of his Awakening and that of his teaching the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, 32 portentous phenomena occurred. These phenomena on the four occasions, when Bodhisatta Dīpaṅkara was conceived, born, become a Buddha and taught the first discourse, occurred unknown or unseen by the recluse Sumedha as he was absorbed in the bliss of the absorptions (jhāna).

After teaching the first discourse, Buddha Dīpaṅkara set out on a journey for the benefit of humans, Devas and Brahmās. While staying at Sudassana monastery in Rammavatī, at the invitation of the citizens, the Buddha went out to accept the alms food offered by them.

While he was partaking of the food, there took place a violent earthquake as a result of Sumedha's contemplation of the perfections. The people, present on that occasion, were frightened and asked the Buddha about the cause of the earthquake. On hearing from the Buddha that there was nothing to fear as the cause was Sumedha's contemplation of the perfections, they visited and acclaimed him, who thereafter entered the forest, as has been told in the story of Sumedha.

What remains to be told is the following: When the citizens of Rammavatī had finished their offering of alms food to Buddha Dīpaṅkara and his 400,000 monastics, they paid respects to the Buddha with flowers, scents, etc., and assembled to listen to his discourse. Buddha Dīpaṅkara then addressed the assembly (BvA, PTS 119): [118]

Giving should be understood as the noble cause of human and divine happiness and the happiness of Nibbāna; it is said to be the basis of divine bliss.

Beginning with these words the pleasant talk on the practice of giving (dāna-kathā) was given.

Next, the talk on morality (sīla-kathā) was given in detail (BvA, PTS 120):

Sīlaṃ nāmetaṃ idha-loka-para-loka-sampattīnaṃ mūlaṃ.

Morality means the root of various forms of prosperity in this life and the next.

Next, Buddha Dīpaṅkara gave a talk on the divine abodes (sagga-kathā) to explain as to which morality leads to which divine happiness. “This divine abode is desirable, pleasant and delightful, and indeed happy. This abode provides constant merriment and gaiety. The Four Great Kings enjoy celestial happiness for 9,000,000 years in terms of human reckoning.” In this way, the benefit of heavenly attainment was taught.

After persuading, convincing and inspiring the people with this teaching so that they might be inclined to perform giving and morality, the Buddha proceeded to teach that even such heavenly bliss was not permanent and that one should not crave for it. In this way, the Buddha pointed out the disadvantages, unworthiness and foulness of sensual pleasures and also the advantages of emancipation from them. He ended his discourse with a talk on the deathless Nibbāna.

With this discourse given to the people, the Buddha established some of them in the three refuges, some in the five precepts, some in Stream-entry fruition (Sotāpatti-phala), Once-returning fruition (Sakadāgāmi-phala), Non-returning fruition (Anāgāmi-phala) and some in the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala). Some in the threefold knowledges, the sixfold super knowledges, or the eight

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. Having spent 49 days in the neighbourhood of the Bodhi tree after his Awakening, Buddha Dīpaṅkara delivered the first discourse at Sunandārāma at the request of Mahā Brahma and administered the Dhamma, the elixir of immortality to one billion Devas and humans. This was the first occasion (Dhammābhisamaya) of the Buddha's teaching.
2. Next, knowing that his son, Prince Usabhakkhandha, had become intellectually mature, Buddha Dīpaṅkara gave a discourse and administered the Dhamma, the elixir of immortality, to 900 million Devas and humans headed by the prince.
3. Finally, after defeating the heretics near the acacia tree at the city-gate of Rammavatī and displaying the twin miracle of water and fire, the Buddha taught the Abhidhamma, sitting on the stone slab of Paṇḍukambala at the foot of a Pāricchattaka tree in Tāvātimsa heaven, and administered the Dhamma, the elixir of immortality, to 900 million Devas and Brahmas headed by a Deva who, in his previous existence, had been the Buddha's mother, Sumedhā Devī. [119]

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

1. There were three occasions of a meeting (sannipāta) of Buddha Dīpaṅkara's disciples, one of them being at Sunandārāma, where Arahats, numbering about 1,000 billion from all regions, specially met for the first time.
2. Next, the disciples' meeting took place on Mount Nārada. Once, while wandering from place to place with 400,000 monastics, Buddha Dīpaṅkara arrived at the delightful Mount Nārada which was full of marvellous features. The mountain was occupied by a Yakkha named Naradeva. People brought human beings as sacrificial offering in his honour annually.
3. Seeing that the people were endowed with the merits of their past deeds to rely upon, the Buddha ascended the mountain alone, leaving behind his monastics. Thereupon, the Yakkha became furious and caused a trembling of the mountain to scare the Buddha away. On seeing the Buddha serene and undisturbed although he had used all his might to frighten him, it occurred to him thus: “This great monk is indeed wonderful! Powerful indeed is he! The evil consequences of what I have done will come back to me. There is no refuge for me other than this great monk. Like a man, who slips and falls onto the ground, has to rely on the same ground to get up, I will now take refuge in this very monk.”

With this thought, he bowed before the Buddha, touching his head on the Buddha’s feet, the soles of which were adorned with 108 signs. He also begged the Buddha’s pardon and took refuge in him. Then the Buddha gave him talks on generosity, morality, etc., in serial order. By the end of which, Naradeva and his retinue of 10,000 Yakkhas were established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).

On the day Naradeva thus became a Stream-enterer, people from all over Jambudīpa brought a man from each village to make sacrificial offerings to the Yakkha. They also brought with them large quantities of sesame, rice, beans of various kinds, butter, ghee, honey, molasses, etc. Naradeva handed back all these food-stuffs to the people and entrusted the men, originally meant for the sacrifice, to the Buddha.

Then the Buddha ordained these men as summoned monastics (ehi-bhikkhu) and helped them achieved Awakening within seven days. On the full moon day of February (Māgha), staying in the middle of one billion Arahats, the Buddha gave instructions in the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) at the disciples’ meeting having four features.

A summoned monastic does not need to seek the bowl, robes, etc., to become a recluse. On being summoned by the Buddha, saying: “Come, O monk,” his appearance as a layman vanishes, and he assumes the appearance of a monk of 60 years’ standing in the Saṅgha.

The four features of a Disciples’ meeting are:

1. All participants are summoned monastics (ehi-bhikkhu).
2. All participants have attained the sixfold super knowledges (chaḷ-abhiññā).
3. All participants come together without being called by the Buddha.

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 94

4. The congregation takes place on the full moon day of the month, on the Observance Day (Uposatha) of the fifteenth.

The story above of the divine Yakkha, Naradeva, comes from the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) commentary.<sup>52</sup>

In the Chronicles of the Buddhas, however, just this simple narration is given (Bv 3.11):

Again, when Buddha Dīpaṅkara had gone into solitude on the top of Mount Nārada, there gathered one billion Arahats who were free from the defilements.

Once, Buddha Dīpaṅkara observed the Rains Retreat (Vassa) on Mount Sudassana. When the Rains Retreat was over, the people of Jambudīpa went to the mountain to celebrate their annual mountain-top festival. They then happened to encounter the Buddha. They listened to his [120] discourse and were so delighted with it that they became monks. When the Buddha taught them again on the Great Invitation (Mahā-pavāraṇā) day, at the full moon of October (Assayuja), the newcomers became Arahats through the stages of insight (vipassanā) and of the path (magga) as a result of their contemplation of conditioned things in the three planes of existence. The Buddha held the Invitation ceremony with 900 billion Arahats.

The Invitation is a formal ceremony concluding the Rains Retreat in which each monastic invites criticism from his fellow monastics in respect of what has been seen, heard or suspected about his conduct.

The ordinary sermons, given by Buddha Dīpaṅkara, led to the realization of the four truths, and the attainment of liberation by thousands of beings, by countless individuals.

At that time, the thoroughly purified teaching of the Buddha spread far and wide; it was understood by innumerable beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas; it was full and complete with exhortations on morality and such virtues.

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 95

Buddha Dīpaṅkara, the knower of the three realms, was always attended upon by 400,000 Arahats disciples who were immensely powerful with the sixfold super knowledges (abhiññā).

During the Dispensation of Buddha Dīpaṅkara, those who died as learners (sekkha) while trying for Awakening in vain, become the scorn of all.

The teaching of Buddha Dīpaṅkara spread throughout the whole world and remained glorious forever with Arahats who had extirpated their foe, namely the defilements, and who were not disturbed by various sense objects and thus free of impurities and the pollutants (āsava).

Particulars of Buddha Dīpaṅkara

Buddha Dīpaṅkara's birth place was the city of Rammavatī.

His father was King Sudeva and his mother was Queen Sumedhā.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Sumaṅgala and Ven. Tissa.

His attendant was Ven. Sāgata.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Nandā and Ven. Sunandā.

His Bodhi tree was a Pepper (Pippali) tree.

His male supporters were Tapussa and Bhallika.

His female supporters were Sirimā and Koṇā.

His height was 80 cubits. He was splendid like a pillar of blazing light and a great Sāla tree in full bloom.

The advantage of giving these particulars is this: Had they not been given, he might have been mistaken for a Yakkha, a Deva, a Māra, or a Brahma. One could think it is not strange at all that the wonderful events should occur to such a divine being. This would have led to the wrong notion that it was not worthwhile to listen to his teaching. Then there would have been no possibility of realization of the attainment of liberation. On the other hand, the particulars would give rise to the right belief that: "Powerful indeed is this human being." With this belief, beings would listen to his teaching and could understand the truth or could attain liberation. Hence such details were given.

Buddha Dīpaṅkara's radiance spread by itself, i.e., without his exercising any power, to all the directions reaching twelve leagues.

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 96

His lifespan was 100,000 years.<sup>53</sup>

There are also some more particulars in the commentaries which are not contained in the text but which, the commentaries state, must be told.

While leading a layman's life, Buddha Dīpaṅkara had three palaces: Haṃsa, [121] Koṅca, and Mayūra.

His chief consort was Padumā Devī, who had 300,000 female attendants.

His son was Usabhakkhandha.

The duration of his reign was 10,000 years.

When he renounced the world, he went forth on an elephant.

When he became a Buddha, he lived at Nandārāma.

Living throughout such a long period, Buddha Dīpaṅkara saved a large number of beings from suffering.

Having made the three divisions of the true Dhamma, learning (pariyatti), practice (paṭipatti) and penetration (paṭivedha), shine forth throughout the world, and having liberated beings, Buddha Dīpaṅkara and his disciples realized final peace, the way a mass of fire goes out after blazing with bright flames.

The glory of that Buddha Dīpaṅkara, his assemblage of 400,000 Arahats, etc., who were all his disciples, and the signs on both his feet, have all ceased to exist. Impermanent are all conditioned things! They are indeed unsubstantial!

In this way, Buddha Dīpaṅkara, who had penetrated all four noble truths without exception, attained Parinibbāna at Nandārāma. In the same park was erected a shrine (cetiya), 30 leagues in height and dedicated to him. It was made of powdered red orpiment mixed with oil and butter, and in it were enshrined his relics which were in an indestructible and undispersed mass, a natural phenomenon common to all long-lived Buddhas. The people of Jambudīpa came together and completed the shrine with decorations of the seven kinds of gems.

2. The Chronicle of Buddha Koṇḍañña

Early Life

The aeon in which Buddha Dīpaṅkara appeared came eventually to an end. When one immeasurable (asaṅkhyeyya) number of aeons had passed after that, there appeared Buddha Koṇḍañña in a certain aeon.

Asaṅkhyeyya is a number which is immeasurable, and the period between the previous Buddha Dīpaṅkara and the following Buddha Koṇḍañña is called a Buddhantara-asaṅkhyeyya as it is to be understood as an immeasurable interval between two Buddhas.

This is how Buddha Koṇḍañña appeared: At the end of his fulfilment of the perfections for 16 immeasurables<sup>54</sup> and 100,000 aeons, while enjoying his life in the divine abode of Tusita which is a tradition followed by all Bodhisattas, and having complied with the request made by other Devas for becoming a Buddha, he descended to the human world to be conceived in the womb of Queen Sujātā at King Sunanda's palace in the city of Rammavatī. At the moment of his conception there occurred the usual 32 portent phenomena.

The Bodhisatta was born after ten months had passed. At the moment of his birth also, the portents became manifest and other miraculous events that were associated with every Bodhisatta took place.<sup>55</sup> [122]

Since the Bodhisatta belonged to the clan of Koṇḍañña, he was named Prince Koṇḍañña. When he came of age, he enjoyed a kingly life for 10,000 years, living in the three most delightful golden palaces: Suci, Suruci and Subha, with his chief consort Rucī Devī, and being waited upon and entertained by 300,000 female dancers and attendants.

While Koṇḍañña was living thus, Queen Rucī Devī gave birth to a son, named Vijitasena. On seeing the four omens of the aged, the sick, the dead, and the recluse, the Bodhisatta renounced the world, riding a chariot drawn by four thoroughbred horses. Prince Koṇḍañña's renunciation was admired by 100 million people, who became recluses too.

<sup>54</sup> [The original translation said “60 immeasurables,” but no Bodhisatta has to fill the perfections for that long, the quickest is 4 immeasurables and 100,000 aeons, and the slowest is 16 immeasurables and 100,000 aeons, see the Further Explanations. This figure of 16 is confirmed in BvA.]

Bodhisatta Koṇḍañña, with these 100 million recluses, practised austerities (dukkara-cariyā). On the day he was to attain Awakening, the Bodhisatta partook of the milk rice offered by Yasodharā, daughter of a wealthy man of the village of Sunanda. He passed the daytime in the local grove of Sāla trees and in the evening, he went alone to the Bodhi tree, leaving behind all his followers. On the way, he accepted eight handfuls of grass offered by a naked ascetic named Sunandaka and as soon as he spread the grass at the foot of a beautiful Sāla tree, the unconquered seat (aparājita-pallaṅka), which was 57 cubits in height, appeared.

Awakening

Sitting cross-legged on the seat, the Bodhisatta put forth energy at four levels and overcame Māra and his army; then he gained knowledge of previous lives (pubbe-nivāsa-ñāṇa) in the first watch; and the knowledge of the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu-ñāṇa) in the middle watch; and in the last watch he contemplated the doctrine of conditional origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) in forward order and backward order. Thereafter, he entered upon the fourth absorption (jhāna) through breathing meditation, emerged from it and, while reflecting on the five aggregates, he discerned 50 characteristics concerning the rise and fall of the aggregates and developed insight up to the change of lineage (gotrabhū-ñāṇa). Gaining the path-knowledge of an Arahat (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) and penetrating all the attributes of a Buddha, he became a Buddha at sunrise.

After becoming a Buddha, the Buddha Koṇḍañña spent seven days at each of the seven places in the neighbourhood of the Bodhi tree. In the eighth week, he accepted the request made by a Brahma for his teaching and he considered who he should teach first, ahead of all others. Remembering the 800 million recluses who had followed his example of renunciation, he thought of their whereabouts and came to know that they were staying at Devavana, the Divine Grove of Arundhavatī town, eighteen leagues from the Bodhi tree. Taking his bowl and robe, he arrived at their place at once by means of his miraculous power.

Seeing Buddha Koṇḍañña approaching them from a distance and being moved by their devotional faith in him, the 100 million recluses extended him a warm welcome, took his bowl and robe, prepared the seat and paid respects to him.

After which, they sat down at suitable places, surrounding the Buddha. Then the Buddha taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse which was also delivered by all previous Buddhas.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

Buddha Koṇḍañña, who was endowed with unlimited glory, incomparable retinue and fame, countless attributes, formidable appearance to those who are impudent, forbearance like the mass of earth, morality which is extensive like the mass of water in the ocean, concentration, steadfast like Mount Meru, wisdom infinite like the open space, always engaged himself in teaching the faculties (indriya), powers (bala), constituents of Awakening (bojjhaṅga), factors of the path (maggaṅga), truths (sacca) as revealed in the 37 things on the side of the Awakening (Bodhi-pakkhiya-dhamma) for the benefit of large numbers of beings. [123]

1. At this teaching of the first discourse, 1,000 billion Devas and humans headed by 100 million monastics realized the four truths.
2. This was followed, at one time, by the delivery of the Discourse on the Blessings (Maṅgala-sutta, Snp 2.4) to a great gathering of Devas and Brahmas, who arrived from the 10,000 world-element, assuming minute and subtle bodies so that there could be enough room for them all in the universe. At this gathering, an unknown Deva raised the question of blessings (maṅgala), asking as to what helped to bring about a perfect life with prosperity. Addressing that Deva, the Buddha taught the Discourse on the Blessings. At this teaching of the Discourse on the Blessings, 900 billion Devas and humans became Arahats. Those who became Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna), etc., were innumerable.
3. When Buddha Koṇḍañña taught the Dhamma, staying in the sky after defeating the heretics by a display of the twin miracle of water and fire, 880 billion humans, Devas and Brahmas attained the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala). Those who were established in the three lower fruition stages, were innumerable.

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

There were also three occasions of Buddha Koṇḍañña's disciples' meetings (sannipāta):

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 100

1. The first occasion took place in Canda Park, with Candavatī being his supporting city, when he observed the first Rains Retreat (Vassa), after he had become a Buddha penetrating the four truths. In that city, two young men, Bhadda, son of Sucindhara, and Subhadda, son of Yasodharā, whose fathers belonged to the lineage of immensely rich Brahmin families, listened to Buddha Koṇḍañña’s discourse. As a result, they developed devotional faith, donned the robes together with 10,000 youths in the presence of the Buddha and became Arahats. There, the Buddha, being surrounded by 1,000 billion Arahats led by Ven. Subhadda, recited the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) on the full moon day of June (Jeṭṭha).

2. Some time later, Buddha Koṇḍañña’s son, Prince Vijitasena, after becoming a monastic, became an Arahata. The Buddha then recited the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) in the midst of 10 billion Arahats with Ven. Vijitasena at their head.

3. Finally, at one time, while visiting the countryside, Buddha Koṇḍañña ordained King Udena and his host of followers. When they all became Arahats, the Buddha, being surrounded by 900 million Arahats, headed by Ven. Udena, recited the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha).

Bodhisatta Vijitāvī

At that time our Bodhisatta was a Universal Monarch, Vijitāvī by name, ruling in the city of Candavatī, and he received the prediction from Buddha Koṇḍañña. Having numerous distinguished hosts of attendants, he held under his sway the whole stretch of land in the universe up to the end of the four oceans, by righteousness, not by force, nor by arms.

Then Buddha Koṇḍañña, setting out on a journey followed by 1,000 billion Arahats, arrived at Candavatī. Hearing of the Buddha’s visit, the Bodhisatta King [124] Vijitāvī extended a warm welcome to the Buddha, made arrangements for his lodging and invited him and his disciples for the next day’s meal. The following day, he prepared the meals properly and performed a ceremony of alms food offering on an elaborate scale.

Having thus performed, the king listened to the Buddha’s discourse, which was given in appreciation of the offering. At the end of the discourse, he made a request: “May the venerable ones spend the three months of the Rains Retreat (Vassa) in the city of Candavatī, to bring blessings to the citizens.” And he performed matchless deeds of generosity to the congregation of monks led by the Buddha during the whole period of the Rains Retreat.

Then Buddha Koṇḍañña declared a prophecy: “Innumerable aeons from the present one, in the aeon that appears after three immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, you will definitely become a Buddha.”

The prophecy, like the one made by Buddha Dīpaṅkara, is given in full detail in the Pāli, mentioning the practice of austerity and other events, but they are not repeated here as they have already been given in the story of Sumedha.<sup>56</sup>

Having declared the prophecy, Buddha Koṇḍañña carried on teaching. After listening to the Buddha’s discourse, the king’s faith in the Buddha grew to a great extent and being desirous of achieving Buddhahood, he made an offering of his vast kingdom to the Buddha, in whose presence he became a monk. After learning the Three Baskets, he acquired the eightfold attainment and the fivefold super knowledges (abhiññā). Reaching the apex of the super knowledges, he was reborn in the Brahma abode on his death.

Particulars of Buddha Koṇḍañña

Buddha Koṇḍañña’s place of birth was the city of Rammavatī.

His father was King Sunanda, and his mother was Sujātā Devī.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Bhadda and Ven. Subhadda.

His attendant was Ven. Anuruddha.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Tissā and Ven. Upatissā.

His Bodhi tree was a Beautiful Sāla (Sāla-kalyaṇī).

His male lay attendants were Soṇa and Upasoṇa.

His female lay attendants were Nandā and Sirimā.

His height was 88 cubits, and he shone like the moon or the sun at noon.

<sup>56</sup> This statement is made after the declaration of prophecy made by each Buddha. We will leave out similar statements from the accounts of later Buddhas.

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 102

The lifespan then was 100,000 years and throughout that long period he saved beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, taking them out of the flood-waters of Samsāra and placing them on the shore of Nibbāna.

While a lay-prince, Buddha Koṇḍañña had three palaces: Suci, Suruci and Subha.

His female attendants were 300,000.

His chief consort was Rucī Devī, and his son Vijitasena.

He reigned for 10,000 years.

He used for his renunciation the chariot drawn by thoroughbred horses.

When he became Buddha, he stayed at Candārāma.

In Buddha Koṇḍañña's Dispensation, the earth with Arahats, whose pollutants (āsavas) were destroyed and who were purified of impurities, was in splendour like the open sky with stars and planets. That is to say, the colour of the Arahats' robes covered the surface of the whole earth.

The Arahats were of incomparable nobility. They were not at all disturbed by the eight vicissitudes of life; it was hard for the fiery tempered unruly people to approach them. When these Arahats, who were endowed with great fame, were desirous of passing into Nibbāna, they rose into the sky, about seven toddy palm trees high, like the lightning rushes into the murky clouds. They entered upon absorption attained with the fire-element as a meditation device (tejo-kasiṇa-jhāna) and [125] flashing a great light completely burned themselves in the sky and attained Parinibbāna.

The peerless glory of Buddha Koṇḍañña and his concentrated mind that was permeated with omniscience have all vanished. Unsubstantial and futile indeed are all conditioned things!

Buddha Koṇḍañña, who had fully realized the four noble truths, attained Parinibbāna at Candārāma. In the same park, a shrine, seven leagues high, was built. It was made of powdered red orpiment mixed with oil and butter and was dedicated to him.

The unbreakable relics of the Buddha, true to the nature of long-lived Awakened Ones, remained solid like golden images without falling into pieces. These relics were laid in the shrine and people from all over Jambudīpa completed the construction by decorating it with the seven kinds of precious stones.

3. The Chronicle of Buddha Maṅgala

When one immeasurable period had elapsed after the aeon of Buddha Koṇḍañña, in one aeon there appeared four Buddhas: 1) Maṅgala, 2) Sumana, 3) Revata and 4) Sobhita in that order. The first of the four Buddhas therefore was Maṅgala.

Early Life

Having fulfilled the perfections for sixteen immeasurables and 100,000 aeons and on completion of his fulfilment of the perfections, Bodhisatta Maṅgala was reborn in Tusita which is a common abode of all Bodhisattas. While enjoying a divine life, he accepted the request made by the Devas and descended to the world of human beings to take conception in the womb of Uttarā, Queen of King Uttara, in the city of Uttara which excelled all other cities.

From the moment the Bodhisatta took conception, the light from the queen's body spread eight cubits all around and could not be overpowered even by sunlight and moonlight. Not requiring other lights, the queen moved about by means of her own luminescence with her maids of honour at her service.

The conception was guarded by celestial beings, and when ten months had elapsed the Bodhisatta was born in the excellent and delightful Uttaramadhura Park.

When Bodhisatta Maṅgala came of age, he ascended the throne. He lived in three golden palaces, namely, the most famous Yasavanta palace, the most delightful Rucimanta palace and the most splendid Sirimanta palace, together with his chief consort Yasavatī, and surrounded by 30,000 dancers who were exquisitely adorned. Thus he enjoyed kingly luxuries that were likened to divine comforts for 9,000 years. Queen Yasavatī gave birth to a son, named Sīvala.

The Bodhisatta saw the four omens of the aged, the sick, the dead and the recluse, and he renounced the world by going forth riding on the well decorated thoroughbred horse named Paṇḍara and became a monk. His renunciation example was followed by 30 million people who also donned the [126] robe.

With the 30 million monks, Buddha Maṅgala engaged in austerities (dukkara-cariyā) for eight months. On the full moon day of May (Vesākha) when he was about to attain Buddhahood, he partook of the milk rice offered by Uttarā, the daughter of a wealthy man and a resident of the village of Uttara. After spending the daytime in the local Sāla grove, he left behind his host of monastics and went alone to the Mahā Bodhi tree in the evening. On the way, he accepted the eight handfuls of grass from a naked ascetic, Uttara by name. As soon as he spread the grass under the Ironwood (Nāga) Bodhi tree, there appeared the unconquered seat, which was 58 cubits high.

Awakening

Sitting cross-legged on that seat and putting forth energy at four levels, the Bodhisatta defeated Māra and his army. He acquired the knowledge of previous lives (pubbe-nivāsa-ñāṇa) in the first watch; and knowledge of the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu-ñāṇa) in the middle watch of the night. In the last watch, however, he reflected on the doctrine of conditional origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) in forward and backward order, after which he entered upon the fourth absorption (jhāna) through breathing meditation (ānāpānassati). Having emerged from that absorption, he reflected on the five aggregates, discerned the 50 characteristics of their rise and fall and developed insight (vipassanā) up to the change of lineage (gotrabhū-ñāṇa). Gaining the path-knowledge of an Arahat (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) and penetrating all attributes of a Buddha, he attained the incomparable state of a Buddha at sunrise.

Buddha Maṅgala's radiance shone forth more intensely than those of other Buddhas. The radiance from other Buddhas produced automatically without supernormal power, reached the distance of either 80 cubits or just an arms length. But Buddha Maṅgala's radiance shone day and night all over the 10,000 world-element. Because of such brilliance, not only all the surrounding objects, such as trees, the ground, forests, hills, oceans, etc., were illuminated, but, to say the least, pots and pans that were usually dirty and black with soot were lit up as if they were covered with gold.

The lifespan of people belonging to the period in which Buddha Maṅgala appeared was 90,000 years, and during that whole period everything was gold in colour. During his Dispensation, the sun, the moon, stars and planets had no light. Since there was no sunlight, the demarcation between day and night was not distinct.

Though there was absence of sunlight, people moved about attending to their business by means of the Buddha's radiance. Days and nights are recognized with the help of the chirps of birds that were normally heard in the morning and the blooms of flowers that are normally seen in the evening.

The question may be asked whether other Buddhas were lacking such glorious powers. The answer is: they were not, indeed, they also had such powers. They could make the radiance permeate the 10,000 world-element if they so desired. But while others had their natural luminescence of their bodies just within an arm's length, the radiance of Buddha Maṅgala's body always spread throughout the 10,000 world-element without having to be produced purposely because of the power of his wish made in a previous existence.

When Buddha Maṅgala was a Bodhisatta in one existence that was similar to that of Vessantara, he lived with his wife and children at a place that resembled Mount Vaṅka. Hearing that the Bodhisatta was very generous, a Yakkha named Kharadāṭhika, in the guise of a Brahmin, approached him to ask for his son and daughter.

The Bodhisatta handed his son and daughter over to the Brahmin most delightedly and thus caused the trembling of the great earth, 240,000 leagues in size, the bottom of which is touching the waters below.

Leaning against the wooden plank of the railing of the walkway, the Yakkha devoured up both children as though he chewed and ate a bundle of lotus stems while the Bodhisatta was looking on. [127]

While looking, he saw bright blood like flames of fire pouring out from the Yakkha's mouth as he opened it, but there arose not one iota of distress in him. Instead, he was greatly delighted and happy, thinking: "This is an excellent act of generosity."

He then expressed his wish: "As a result of this generous act of mine, may my body emanate radiance in future, bright like the blood in the Yakkha's mouth." Hence, in fulfilment of that wish, on becoming a Buddha, the brilliant natural radiance emanated and spread from Buddha Maṅgala's body all over the 10,000 world-element.

Besides, there was another wish made previously by Buddha Maṅgala. As a Bodhisatta, he once got an opportunity to pay homage to a shrine (cetiya) dedicated to a Buddha. Thinking: "I should sacrifice my life to this Awakened

One,” he had his whole body wrapped up in cloth soaked with oil. He then filled a golden bowl, which was worth 100,000 pieces of money, with butter up to the brim which was about a cubit in diameter. In that golden bowl, he lighted 1,000 wicks and carried the bowl on his head. He also set his body ablaze and spent the whole night circumambulating the sacred shrine.

Though the Bodhisatta was paying homage thus till dawn, the heat could not touch even the pores of his body, as if he were living amidst lotus blooms. Indeed the nature of the Dhamma is such that it gives reciprocal protection from danger to one who protects it. Therefore the Buddha says (Ja 447.11):

*Dhammo have rakkhati Dhamma-cāriṃ, Dhammo suciṇṇo sukham-āvahati, esānisaṃso Dhamme suciṇṇe:
na duggatiṃ gacchati Dhamma-cārī.*

The Dhamma surely protects one who lives by Dhamma, the Dhamma well-practiced brings happiness, this is the advantage of the Dhamma well-practiced: one who lives by Dhamma does not go to a bad destiny.

Also as a result of this act of merit, Buddha Maṅgala’s natural body radiance spread throughout the 10,000 world-element.

Three Occasions of the Buddha’s Teaching

1. After his Awakening, Buddha Maṅgala stayed for seven days at each of the seven sites near the Bodhi tree. He then accepted a Brahma’s request for his teaching, and when he contemplated to whom he should teach, he saw the 30 million monastics who had donned the robe to follow his example and who were endowed with sufficing conditions (upanissaya) for the paths and fruitions.

Thinking that he would teach them first, the Buddha contemplated also their whereabouts and came to know that they were staying in the forest called Sirivana of the city of Sirivaḍḍhana, eighteen leagues away from the Mahā Bodhi tree. Taking with him his bowl and robe, the Buddha immediately appeared at the forest of Sirivana, using his psychic power.

On seeing the Buddha approaching them, the 30 million monastics, with faithful minds, welcomed the Buddha by taking his bowl and robe, prepared the seat for him, and paid their respects to him. When all this had been done, surrounding the Buddha they took their appropriate seats.

Then the Buddha delivered the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse as all previous Buddhas had done. By the end of which, the 30 million monastics attained the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala). Devas and humans, numbering 100,000, realized the four truths.

2. Immediately before Buddha Maṅgala taught the Abhidhamma, he was staying near the city of Citta, his resort for food. Like our Buddha Gotama who performed the twin miracle of water and fire near the mango tree of the gardener, Kaṇḍa, near the city-gate of Sāvathī, and defeated the heretics, so did Buddha Maṅgala display the twin miracle and defeat the heretics at the city-gate of Citta. He then went up to Tāvatisa where he sat on the emerald stone slab called Paṇḍukambala at the foot of Pāricchattaka tree and taught [128] the Abhidhamma discourses to Devas and Brahmas. Then 1,000 billion Devas and Brahmas realized the four truths.

3. Before Buddha Maṅgala appeared, there was King Sunanda, in the city of Surabhi, who performed the duties necessary for acquisition of the wheel which is one of the seven treasures of a Universal Monarch. After fulfilment of the duties, the wheel treasure came into his possession.

When Buddha Maṅgala appeared, the wheel slipped from its place. Seeing this, King Sunanda became very unhappy and asked his Brahmin advisors: “Why has the wheel treasure that appeared by the power of my meritorious deeds slipped from its place?”

Then the Brahmins replied: “King, the wheel slips because the life of a Universal Monarch is nearing its end; or when the monarch becomes a monk; or because a Buddha appears. There is absolutely no danger of your life ending. You will live a very long life. Indeed, Buddha Maṅgala has now appeared in the world. That is the reason for the slipping of your wheel treasure.”

Having heard the reply given by the Brahmins, the Universal Monarch Sunanda with his retinue paid his respects to the wheel treasure and made a request thus: “I will do obeisance to Buddha Maṅgala by means of your glory, O wheel. Please do not disappear yet in the meantime.” Then the wheel returned to its original place.

Immensely delighted, the Universal Monarch Sunanda with his multitude of people, 30 leagues in size, approached Buddha Maṅgala who was indeed auspicious (maṅgala) for the whole world. The king gave alms on a grand scale to the Buddha and his Saṅgha. He offered the 100,000 Arahats pieces of cloth from Kāsi, to be made into robes, and all kinds of requisites to the Buddha. After the alms giving, he sat down at a suitable distance to listen to the Buddha's discourse. Likewise, Prince Anurāja, son of the Universal Monarch, took his seat.

Then Buddha Maṅgala gave the audience, headed by King Sunanda, the usual series of sermons beginning with generosity (dāna-kathā) and so on. This led to the attainment of Awakening with the fourfold analytical knowledge by the Universal Monarch Sunanda and his followers, numbering 900 million.

Contemplating on the deeds of merit done by them in the previous existence, the Buddha saw their past wholesome deeds that would bring them bowls and robes miraculously without looking for them. So he stretched out his right arm and uttered: "Come, O monks! (Etha bhikkhavo!)" Instantly all of them became monks with their hair being less than two fingers in length, carrying their respective bowls and putting on their respective robes and assuming the respectable appearance of great elders of 100 years' standing in the Saṅgha, and they surrounded the Buddha.

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

1. While Buddha Maṅgala was sojourning in the city of Mekhala, his future chief disciples, the young men Sudeva and Dhammasena, who had 1,000<sup>57</sup> youthful companions each, became summoned monastics (ehi-bhikkhu) in the Buddha's presence, and when they became Arahats on the full moon of February (Magha), the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha) in the midst of 1,000 billion monks.

2. Again, the Buddha recited the same advice at the meeting of 10 billion monks, who had been ordained at the assembly of the Buddha's kinsmen that took place in Uttara Park. [129]

3. In the midst of 900 million monks, who took part in the Saṅgha meeting headed by the monastic who formerly was Sunanda the Universal Monarch, the Buddha repeated his recitation of the advice.

<sup>57</sup> Or, according to the Sinhalese commentary, 10,000.

Bodhisatta Suruci

At the time of Buddha Maṅgala, our Bodhisatta was a Brahmin, Suruci by name, living at the village of Suruci. He was accomplished in the Vedic texts, glossaries (nighaṇḍu), rhetoric (keṭubha), grammar (akkhara-pabheda) and the Ancient Histories (Itihāsa) as the fifth treatise. He was clever in writing and reading poetry (padaka) as well as prose (veyyākaraṇa).

He was well-versed in materialist (lokāyata) philosophy, which was concerned not with spiritual matters but only with mundane affairs, and also in the art of reading bodily signs of a Great Man (Mahā-purisa-lakkhaṇa).

Having listened to the Buddha's talks on the Dhamma, Brahmin Suruci cultivated faith in him and took refuge in the Three Treasures. He then invited the Buddha and his disciples: "Please accept my offering of food for tomorrow."

"Brahmin, how many monks do you like to have?" asked the Buddha. "How many monks are there, venerable sir?" – "There are all together 1,000 billion," replied the Buddha, as it was the occasion when his disciples assembled for the first time. "Then venerable sir, together with all these monks, please accept my offering of the meals." The Buddha kept silent, showing his consent.

Having invited the Buddha, Bodhisatta Suruci went home and thought thus: "I can afford to give such a great number of monks rice gruel and pieces of cloth meant to be robes. But how can the seating for them be arranged?"

The Bodhisatta's thought caused warming of the stone slab, which was the seat of Sakka on Mount Meru, 84,000 leagues high.

Then Sakka contemplated thus: "Who is interested in removing me from this place?" When he looked for the cause of the warming of his seat, he saw Brahmin Suruci; it then occurred to him thus: "This Bodhisatta has invited the Saṅgha, led by the Buddha, for meals and is worrying about their accommodation. I should go there and take my share of merits." Assuming the appearance of a carpenter and carrying an axe in hand, he appeared before the Bodhisatta.

Sakka, as the carpenter, enquired: "Is there any job for a worker?" Seeing the carpenter, the Bodhisatta asked: "What can you do?" – "There is no craft that I do not know. If anybody wants to build a pavilion, a palace, a house, or any other building, that is my job." – "Then I have something for you to do." –

“What is it?” – “I have invited 1,000 billion monks to tomorrow’s meal. Can you build a pavilion to accommodate them.” – “Yes, I can, provided you pay me.” – “Friend, I will.” – “Very well, I will construct it as you will make payment.” So saying, Sakka looked round for a certain plot of land.

The plot of land, twelve leagues in size, which was viewed by Sakka, became an evenly level ground like a meditation device (kasīṇa). Sakka looked around and made the wish: “Let a great pavilion made of the seven kinds of jewels, pleasing to the eye and richly adorned, appear from the earth.” And while he was watching, there rose up a great pavilion of jewels, splitting the earth’s surface. Its pillars of gold had lotus-vases of silver; its pillars of silver had lotus vases of gold; its pillars of rubies had lotus-vases of coral; its pillars of coral had lotus-vases of rubies, and its pillars of the seven kinds of jewels had lotus-vases of the seven kinds of jewels. [130]

Thereupon he looked at the pavilion and made the wish: “Let there be chains of tinkling golden bells hanging between the pillars in the pavilion.” As he was thus looking, the chains of tinkling golden bells appeared, hanging between one pillar and another. Fanned by a gentle breeze, the tinkling bells made a very sweet sound like the sound of music produced by the five kinds of musical instruments. It was like the time when celestial beings in heaven performed a concert.

Again, he made the wish: “Let there be festoons of heavenly perfumes, flowers and leaves hanging down.” At that moment, festoons of heavenly perfumes, flowers and leaves appeared hanging down.

Again, he made the wish: “Let seats for the 1,000 billion monks, costly spreads and bowl stands allowable to monks appear, breaking through the earth.” Instantly, these things appeared. Still again Sakka made the wish: “Let there be huge water pots in every corner.” Instantly, huge water pots appeared.

When all these had been created, Sakka went to the Bodhisatta Suruci and said: “Come, Brahmin, please have a look at your pavilion and make payment due to me.” The Bodhisatta went to the pavilion and while he was examining it, the whole frame of his body was suffused with the five kinds of joy.

While the Bodhisatta was looking at the pavilion, it occurred to him thus: “This pavilion could not have been made by a human being. On account of my wholesome desire to perform a great act of generosity and also of my virtues, surely Sakka's seat must have become warm. The warmth must have led the Lord of the Devas to construct this pavilion. With such a pavilion, it does not benefit me to make offerings just for one day. For seven days I will perform a great act of generosity." He then accommodated the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha in the pavilion for seven days and offered them specially prepared milk rice.

When the milk rice was offered, it was not possible for the people alone to wait upon the monks, Devas too, one beside each man, participated in waiting upon them. The site which was twelve or thirteen leagues was not large enough for all the monastics. Therefore those monastics, who could not get seats, had to make their own accommodation there by exercising their respective powers.

The day the alms giving was over, all the monks' bowls were washed well, filled with clarified butter, ghee, honey and molasses for medicinal purposes, and were offered together with sets of three robes. The set of robes that was received by the most junior member of the Saṅgha was worth 100,000 pieces of money.

When Buddha Maṅgala was giving his discourse in appreciation of the alms given to him, he contemplated through his foreseeing wisdom: "This man has performed such an act of great alms giving. What will he become in the future?" Then he foresaw that Bodhisatta Suruci would definitely become a Buddha, Gotama by name, in one Fortunate Aeon (Bhadda-kappa) after two immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons had elapsed. He then called out to him and made a prophetic declaration: "When two immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons have elapsed, you will definitely become a Buddha, Gotama by name."

Hearing Buddha Maṅgala's prophecy, the Bodhisatta became elated and rejoiced, and it occurred to him thus: "The Buddha has predicted that I would certainly become a Buddha. What is the use of living a household life? I shall go forth immediately." Having abandoned the wealth of a rich Brahmin's household as though it were spittle, he became a monk in the presence of Buddha Maṅgala, learned the Three Baskets, and attained the five super knowledges (abhiññā) and eight absorptions (jhāna), and without slackening from his absorptions, he was reborn in the Brahma world on his death. [131]

Particulars of Buddha Maṅgala

Buddha Maṅgala's birthplace was the city of Uttara.

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 112

His father was King Uttara and his mother was Queen Uttarā.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Sudeva and Ven. Dhammasena.

His attendant was Ven. Pālita.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Sīvalā and Ven. Asokā.

His Bodhi tree was an Ironwood (Nāga) tree.

His male supporters were the wealthy men Nanda and Visākha.

His female supporters were Anulā and Sutanā.

Buddha Maṅgala's height was 88 cubits.

His physical radiance always appeared in splendour throughout the 10,000 world-element. Sometimes they spread beyond the 10,000 world-element, reaching hundreds of thousands of world-elements.

The lifespan of people during his time was 90,000 years, and the Buddha lived throughout that period, rescuing such beings as humans, Devas and Brahmas out of the flood-waters of Saṃsāra and placing them on the shore of Nibbāna.

While a prince, the golden palaces he lived in were three viz., Yasavanta, Rucimanta, and Sirimanta.

His chief consort was Yasavatī, who had 30,000 female attendants.

His son was Sīvala.

He reigned for 9,000 years.

He went forth riding the horse named Paṇḍara.

After his Awakening he stayed in Uttara Park.

Just as counting the waves in the great ocean is impossible, so was the number of the Arahats disciples of Buddha Maṅgala.

Throughout the lifetime and Dispensation of Buddha Maṅgala who conveyed all the three kinds of beings to Nibbāna, there never was a single recluse who died with defilements. They all became Arahats and were pure when they passed away into Nibbāna.

Buddha Maṅgala, who had large numbers of followers and great fame, lighted the lamp of Dhamma and carried a great multitude of people from the currents of Saṃsāric to the shores of Nibbāna.

Like a mass of fire that had shone forth became extinct and like the sun that has set, the Buddha attained Parinibbāna, revealing thereby the nature of impermanence, suffering and the uncontrollability of conditioned things to humans together with Devas and Brahmas.

As soon as Buddha Maṅgala had thus passed away, his physical radiance disappeared, and the entire 10,000 world-element were left in total darkness. Then there occurred a great lamentation of people throughout the world-elements.

The peerless glory of Buddha Maṅgala and his concentrated mind that was permeated with omniscience have all vanished. Unsubstantial and futile indeed are all conditioned things!

Buddha Maṅgala, who had fully realized the four noble truths, thus attained Parinibbāna at Uttara Park.<sup>58</sup> In the same park, a shrine, 30 leagues high, was built with the soft plaster made of powdered red orpiment mixed with oil and butter; and it was dedicated to Buddha Maṅgala.

The unbreakable relics of the Buddha, true to the nature of long-lived Awakened Ones, remained solid like a golden image without falling into pieces. These relics were placed [132] in the shrine and people from all over Jambudīpa completed the construction by decorating it with the seven kinds of precious stones.

In this way, Buddha Maṅgala, by means of his physical radiance, outshone the various radiances of the sun, moon, stars and planets, Devas and Brahmas throughout the 10,000 world-element of the fields of birth (jāti-khetta), making no difference between day and night, and then passed away into Nibbāna as though he had simultaneously created massive darkness.

There are three regions associated with the Buddha: 1) The fields of birth (jāti-khetta), the 10,000 world-element that quaked at the time of his conception, birth, Awakening, giving up of the life-sustaining mental process and attaining Nibbāna; 2) the 100,000 world-elements throughout which his teaching spread (āṇā-khetta); and 3) the infinite world-elements which form the field of investigation of his omniscience (visaya-khetta).

4. The Chronicle of Buddha Sumana

The lifespan, which was 90,000 years in Buddha Maṅgala's time, gradually decreased to ten years; and again the lifespan increased therefrom, it again increased to immeasurables, and when it reached 90,000 years on its decline, Bodhisatta Sumana, having fulfilled the perfections, was reborn in Tusita, a practice common to all Bodhisattas. Consenting to the request made by Devas and Brahmas, he descended to the human abode and took conception in the womb of Sirimā, Queen of Sudatta, in the city of Mekhala.

Early Life

At the time of his conception, 32 prophetic phenomena became manifest. At his birth, which took place after ten months, similar phenomena also took place, and all miracles, associated with all Bodhisattas, occurred.

When he came of age, Prince Sumana occupied three golden palaces, namely, Canda, Sucanda and Vataṃsa, which he enjoyed for 90,000 years, a blissful life resembling that of Devas, with his chief consort Vataṃsikā<sup>59</sup> who was waited upon by beautifully adorned maids of honour, 83,000 of them.

With regard to the number of these maids, it should not be taken that they all waited upon the princess at the same time; it was the total number of all those ladies who served her in turn. [The author stated there were 6,300,000 maids, but the number given in BvA is as above.]

When Princess Vataṃsikā gave birth to a son, Anupama, the Bodhisatta saw the four omens of the aged, the sick, the dead and the recluse, and he renounced the world, following the tradition of all Bodhisattas, in the clothings offered by Devas and, riding an elephant. His example of renunciation was followed by 300 million people who became recluses like him.

Awakening

Bodhisatta Sumana with the 300 million recluses engaged in the practice of the austerities (dukkara-cariyā). On the full moon day of May (Vesākha), having partaken of the milk rice offered by Anupamā, the daughter of a wealthy man of the village of Anoma, he spent the daytime in the local Sāla grove. In the evening, he left all his followers and went alone to the Bodhi tree. On the way, he accepted the eight handfuls of grass offered by Anupama, a naked ascetic, and spread it under the Ironwood Bodhi tree; suddenly there appeared the unconquered seat of 30 cubits in height.

Sitting cross-legged on that seat as has been described previously in the Chronicle of Buddha Maṅgala, he dispelled Māra and his hordes, attained Perfect Self-Awakening, the crowning glory of the three worlds, and uttered the verse of elation, beginning with Aneka-jāti saṃsaram, “through the round of countless births and deaths” (Dhp 153), which was also uttered by each and every Buddha.

Three Occasions of the Buddha’s Teaching

1. After becoming a Buddha and spending 49 days in the neighbourhood of the Bodhi tree, the Buddha accepted a Brahma’s request and contemplated who [133] he should teach first. Then he discerned the 300 million recluses who, with him, had renounced the world, his half-brother, Prince Saraṇa and his Brahmin chaplain’s son, the youthful Bhāvitatta, who were endowed with the merits of their past deeds that would lead them to the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna. Thinking: “I shall teach them first,” he contemplated as to their whereabouts and saw that they were living in Mekhala Park of the city of Mekhala which was eighteen leagues away from the Mahā Bodhi tree. Accordingly, taking his bowl and robe, the Buddha, by his psychic power, immediately appeared in Mekhala Park, the residence of those monastics.

On seeing Buddha Sumana approaching them, the 300 million monastics, with faithful hearts, welcomed the Buddha, took his bowl and robe, prepared the seat and did obeisance respectfully. When all these were done, they took appropriate seats surrounding him.

Then Buddha Sumana sent the gardener to fetch Prince Saraṇa and the youth, Bhāvitatta, son of the Brahmin chaplain. To the prince and the youth with their 370 million followers, to the 300 million monastics who were his companions on his renunciation and as well as to many millions Devas and humans, the Buddha taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, which was taught by previous Buddhas too, and hence beat the drum of his Dispensation of nine constituents, accompanied by the conch of the four noble truths.

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 116

The nine constituents of the Buddha's Dispensation (navan̄ga-satthu-sāsana) are: 1) Discourses (Sutta) such as the Discourse on the Supreme Net (Brahma-jāla-sutta, DN 1), the Discourse on the Fruits of the Ascetic Life (Sāmañña-phala-sutta, DN 2) etc. in plain prose; 2) Mixed Poems and Prose (Geyya) such as these in the Thematic Discourses about Devas (Devatā-saṃyutta, SN 1); 3) teaching without any verses (veyyākaraṇa) such as the Basket of the Abstract Teaching (Abhidhamma-piṭaka); 4) teaching with verses only (gāthā) such as the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada), the Verses of the Elder Monks (Thera-gāthā), the Verses of the Elder Nuns (Therī-gāthā); 5) Exalted Utterances (Udāna) in 80<sup>60</sup> discourses; 6) 112<sup>61</sup> discourses beginning with the expression: "Thus said (Iti-vuttaka) the Fortunate One"; 7) 550 Birth Stories (Jātaka);<sup>62</sup> 8) discourses describing the marvellous attributes (abbhūta-dhamma) of persons such as Ānanda, etc.; 9) discourses with questions and answers (vedalla) such as the Long Discourse giving an Elaboration (Mahā-vedalla-sutta, MN 43), the Small Discourse giving an Elaboration (Cūḷa-vedalla-sutta, MN 44), the Discourse of Right View (Sammā-diṭṭhi-sutta, MN 9).

What should be particularly mentioned is this: Having attained omniscience, Buddha Sumana was desirous of fulfilling Brahma's request. In order to liberate beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, from the bondage of existences and to protect those who were robbed of their treasures of meritorious deeds by the defilements, he built the deathless city of Nibbāna with the walls of morality (sīla), the moats of concentration (samādhi) that encircled the city and adorned it with the gate of insight knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa), the doors of mindfulness (sati), the grand pavilions and mansions, etc., of absorption attainments (samāpatti) and it was inhabited by the noble citizens of a group of things on the side of Awakening (Bodhi-pakkhiya-dhamma).

Having thus built the city of Nibbāna, Buddha Sumana created the unbroken, straight, tidy, beautiful, broad, and long boulevard of the four methods of steadfast mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). On either side of the boulevard, he laid out peaceful and pleasant rows of shops of Dhamma where those who wanted the precious fourfold fruitions (phala), fourfold analytical knowledges

(patisambhidā-ñāṇa), sixfold super powers (abhiññā) and eight absorption attainments (samāpatti), could buy them to their hearts content with mindfulness (sati), energy (virīya), conscience (hirī), and concern (ottappa).

Having thus built the great city of Dhamma and laid out the market of Dhamma, Buddha Sumana beat the drum of Dhamma by delivering the first discourse, the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, and provided the means of liberation to one billion humans, Devas and Brahmas.

2. In order to subjugate the wrongful conceit of the intoxicated and arrogant heretics in Sunandavati, Buddha Sumana once performed the marvellous twin miracle of water and fire near a mango tree and administered the Dhamma, the elixir of immortality, to humans, Devas [134] and Brahmas. Then one billion beings realized the four noble truths.

3. On another occasion, Devas and Brahmas of the 10,000 world-element came and met humans, Devas and Brahmas of this universe and discussed the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti). “How can one enter upon the attainment of cessation? How can one attain it? How can one rise from it?” Since they could not solve such problems, all of them, up to the nine abodes of Brahmas, had doubts as to the right answers and they divided themselves into two groups. Along with King Arindama, the lord of people, they approached Buddha Sumana, Lord of the Three Worlds, and put forward the aforesaid questions. The Buddha solved them by giving appropriate Dhamma discourses, and 900 million humans, Devas and Brahmas penetrated the four noble truths.

Three Occasions of the Disciples’ Meeting

1. There were three occasions of meetings of Buddha Sumana’s disciples. Of these three, the first took place when, having observed the Rains Retreat (Vassa) with Mekhala city as the resort for food, together with 100,000 Arahats who were all summoned monastics (ehi-bhikkhu), Buddha Sumana held the Invitation (Pavāraṇā) ceremony on the full moon day of October (Assayuja), at the end of the Rains Retreat.

2. At one time when Buddha Sumana was sojourning on the mountain of pure gold, one league in size, which appeared, as the result of King Arindama’s act of merit, he admonished, by means of his excellent discourses, 900 billion royal servants who accompanied the king on his visit. The Buddha made them all summoned monastics and being surrounded by all these monastics, who became Arahats on the same day, he recited the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) at the meeting complete with four features.

The four features are not given in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddhavaṃsa) commentary. However, as mentioned in the exposition of the Discourse concerning Dīghanakha (Dīghanakha-sutta, MN 74) commentary, these should be understood as follows: 1) The meeting is held on the full moon day of February (Magha); 2) the meeting is held by Arahats on their own accord without being called together by anyone; 3) the monastics at the meeting are all Arahats, who are endowed with six super knowledges (abhiññā); and 4) they are all summoned monastics (ehibhikkhu).

3. At another time, Sakka went to pay homage to Buddha Sumana. Being surrounded by 800 billion Arahats, the Buddha recited the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha).

Bodhisatta Atula

In the lifetime of Buddha Sumana, Bodhisatta Gotama was reborn as Atula, a powerful Nāga King. Learning that a Buddha had appeared in the three worlds and accompanied by all his kith and kin, he came out of his residence and performed deeds of merit towards the Buddha and his 1,000 billion monastics by making celestial music in their honour, and by performing a great act of alms giving in the form of food and drinks. He also offered a set of robes to each monastic and was established in the refuges.

Then Buddha Sumana predicted: “This Nāga King will become Buddha Gotama in future.” Hearing Buddha Sumana’s prophecy, Atula the Nāga King became all the more heartened and resolved firmly to increase his effort in fulfilling of the ten perfections.

Particulars of Buddha Sumana

Buddha Sumana’s birth place was Mekhala city. [135]

His father was King Sudatta and his mother was Queen Sirimā.

He reigned for 9,000 years.

His three palaces were named Canda, Sucanda and Vatamsa.

His chief consort was Vatamsikā, and she had 83,000 maids of honour.

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 119

His son was Prince Anupama.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Saraṇa and Ven. Bhāvitatta.

His attendant was Ven. Udena.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Soṇā and Ven. Upasoṇā.

His Bodhi tree was an Ironwood (Nāga) tree.

His distinguished male supporters were the wealthy men Varuṇa and Saraṇa.

His distinguished female supporters were Cālā and Upacālā.

Buddha Sumana's height was 90 cubits.

Resembling a golden pillar created as an object of worship, the Buddha was of great splendour with his physical radiance shining forth throughout all the universe.

The lifespan during his time was 90,000 years and throughout these years, he saved large numbers of humans, Devas and Brahmas from the flood-waters of Saṃsāra and placed them on the shore of Nibbāna.

Having liberated those who deserved liberation out of the great ocean of Saṃsāra and taught those who deserved to be taught the four noble truths, Buddha Sumana attained Parinibbāna like the setting moon.

Those noble ones, who had become Arahats after eradicating their pollutants (āsava), and that Buddha Sumana, who was unmatched in the three worlds, brightened the peerless light of Dhamma. Having done so, the most glorious, famous Buddha and his Arahats disciples attained Parinibbāna.

Buddha Sumana's unrivalled omniscience, his matchless Dhamma treasures, such as the four fruitions, the fourfold analytical knowledge, etc., have all disappeared. Unsubstantial and futile indeed are all conditioned things!

In this manner, the attainment of Parinibbāna by Buddha Sumana, who had realized the four noble truths without any exception and who had achieved great fame, took place in the park called Aṅga. In that very park was constructed a shrine, four leagues high. It was made of powdered red orpiment mixed with oil and butter and dedicated to Buddha Sumana.

As it was customary with long-lived Buddhas, the relics that were unbreakable remained like golden statues. These relics were placed in that shrine which was decorated with the seven kinds of jewels and completed by the people of Jambudīpa.

5. The Chronicle of Buddha Revata

After Buddha Sumana had attained Parinibbāna, the lifespan of human beings decreased gradually from 90,000 years down to ten years; and from ten years, it again increased to immeasurables. When the lifespan became 60,000 years on its decline, Bodhisatta Revata, on complete fulfilment of the perfections, was reborn in Tusita, as is the common practice of all Bodhisattas.

While enjoying the celestial life there, he agreed to comply with the request made by Devas and Brahmas, and descended to the human abode and took conception in the womb of Queen Vipulā, wife of King Vipula, in the city of Sudhaññavatī. When ten months had elapsed, he emerged from his mother's womb like the golden goose king that appears from Mount Citta. [136]

Early Life

When the Bodhisatta, Prince Revata, came of age, he resided in three uniquely beautiful palaces, namely, Sudassana, Ratanagghi, and Āveḷa, which appeared as a result of his perfections and glorious deeds of the past. He enjoyed a royal household life that was comparable with a divine life for 6,000 years together with his consort Sudassanā and was entertained and waited upon by 33,000 attendants.

While he was thus enjoying his life, his wife, Princess Sudassanā, gave birth to a son named Varuṇa. After seeing the four omens presented by Devas, which was something common to all Bodhisattas, he mounted the chariot drawn by thoroughbred horses and went forth, renouncing the world, in a procession composed of his fourfold army of elephants, horses, chariots and foot-soldiers, like the moon surrounded by the stars and planets, like Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, followed by his fellow-beings or like Hārita, King of Brahmas, followed by divine beings of his abode. On reaching a grove, he handed his garments to the keeper of his treasures, cut off his hair with his ever-present sword and flung his hair into the sky.

His hair was received in a golden receptacle by Sakka, who built a shrine of the seven kinds of jewels over it in Tāvatiṃsa on Mount Meru. Having put on the lotus-robe offered by the Brahma he thus became a recluse. 10 million men followed his example and became recluses themselves. Bodhisatta Revata then put efforts to undergo the practice of the austerities (dukkara-cariyā) with his 10 million followers for seven months.

Awakening

Having completed the practice of the austerities, on the full moon day of May (Vesākha) the day he was to become a Buddha, he partook of the milk rice offered by Sādhu Devī, daughter of a wealthy man, and spent the daytime in the local Sāla grove. In the evening, he left behind his followers and went alone to the region of the Mahā Bodhi tree. On the way, he accepted eight handfuls of grass from a naked ascetic, Varunindhara by name, and spread it under the Ironwood (Nāga) Bodhi tree. Suddenly, there appeared the unconquered seat (aparājita-pallaṅka) of 53 cubits in size, on which he sat cross-legged, mobilized his resources of fourfold energy, dispelled Māra and his forces, and attained the omniscient state of a Perfectly Self-Awakened One, Lord of the Three Worlds.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. After becoming a Buddha and staying near the Bodhi tree for 49 days, Buddha Revata accepted a Brahma's request for his teaching. When he considered who he should teach first, he discerned the 10 million of monastics, who joined him in his renunciation, and also Devas and humans, who were endowed with meritorious deeds from the past, leading them to the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna. When he contemplated their whereabouts, he came to know that they were staying in Varuṇa Park, eighteen leagues from the Mahā Bodhi tree.

Taking his bowl and robe and using his psychic power he immediately appeared at the monastics' residence in Varuṇa Park. On his arrival there, Buddha Revata was very warmly received by the monastics. To these monastics the Buddha taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse and 10 million monastics realized Awakening. Those who were established in the lower paths and fruitions were countless.

2. At another time, Buddha Revata paid a visit to the city of Uttara, so named because it excelled all other cities, during the reign of King Arindama, who had conquered all of his enemies. Learning of the Buddha's arrival, the king, with his 30 million followers, extended a warm welcome and invitation to the Buddha for the next day's meal. For seven days he gave a great alms gift (dāna) and held a festival of lights extending three miles in honour of [137] the Buddha and stayed near him. Then the Buddha gave various sermons that suited the king's disposition. On that occasion of the teaching of Dhamma, 10 billion Devas and humans attained liberation as they realized the truths.

3. Still at another time, while sojourning at a place near the market-town of Uttara, a resort for his alms food, Buddha Revata engaged himself in the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti) for seven days. Then townsfolk brought rice-gruel and other kinds of food and drink and offered them to the members of the Saṅgha. "Venerable Sirs, where is the Buddha staying?" asked the people. "Dear supporters," replied the monks, "the Buddha is absorbed in the attainment of cessation." When seven days had lapsed, they had an opportunity of seeing the Buddha and asked him about the advantages of that very attainment. Accordingly, the Buddha explained to them the advantages of the attainment of cessation. As a result, one billion Devas and humans were established in the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala).

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

1. There were three meetings of the Buddha's disciples, the first of which took place in the city of Sudhāññavatī where Buddha Revata recited the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) for the first time to the Arahats, who had become summoned monastics and who were too innumerable to count.
2. Later, at the meeting held in Mekhala city, the Buddha recited the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) to 1,000 billion summoned monastic Arahats.
3. At the third meeting, Buddha Revata explained the three characteristics of impermanence, suffering and unsubstantiality to the people who went to enquire after the ailing Ven. Varuṇa, who was the Buddha's chief disciple and right-hand man and was foremost among knowers of Dhamma as he was able to keep the Dhamma Wheel in constant motion. His health condition then was so serious that it gave rise to anxiety and the question: "Will he survive?" At that meeting, the Buddha also made 100,000 men summoned monastics and established them in the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala). Finally he recited the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) in that very meeting which was composed of four features.

Bodhisatta Atideva

At that time, our Bodhisatta was a Brahmin named Atideva, fully accomplished in Brahminic lore, which was handed down by generation after generation of teachers. On encountering Buddha Revata, and after listening to the Buddha's discourse, he took refuge in the Three Treasures. He also sang 1,000 verses in praise of the Buddha's attributes of morality, concentration and wisdom, and offered his upper garment which was worth 1,000 pieces of money.

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 123

Thereupon Buddha Revata made a prophecy: "Two immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons<sup>63</sup> after the present one, you will become a Buddha by the name of Gotama." On receiving Buddha Revata's prophecy, the Bodhisatta's mind became all the more serene and he courageously resolved to make more effort in fulfilling of the perfections: "I will contemplate and develop the perfections and try to attain the state of a Buddha that I long for."

Particulars of Buddha Revata

Buddha Revata's birthplace was Sudhaññavatī city.

His father was King Vipula and [138] his mother was Queen Vipulā.

He reigned for 6,000 years.

His three palaces were Sudassana, Ratanagghi and Āveḷa.

His chief consort was Sudassanā, who had 33,000 maids of honour.

His son was Varuṇa.

Having seen the four omens, he renounced the world in a chariot drawn by thoroughbred horses.

He practised the austerities for seven months.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Varuṇa and Ven. Brahmadeva.

His attendant was Ven. Sambhava.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Bhaddā and Ven. Subhaddā.

His Bodhi tree was an Ironwood (Nāga) tree.

His male noble supporters were the wealthy men Paduma and Kuñjara.

His female noble supporters were Sirimā and Yasavatī.

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 124

Buddha Revata's height was 80 cubits. He illumined all the directions like the hoisted banner of Sakka. His physical radiance spread all round, up to one league, day and night.

The lifespan during his time was 60,000 years. He lived throughout the period equal to four-fifths of this lifespan, rescuing numerous humans, Devas and Brahmas from the flood-waters of Saṃsāra and placing them on the shore of Nibbāna.

Having taught the doctrine of deathlessness to the world by showing the powers of the tenfold wisdom of the Awakened Ones, Buddha Revata attained Parinibbāna, like great flames of fire that become extinct as the fuel runs out.

When his Parinibbāna was drawing near, Buddha Revata resolved: "May my relics remain not in a mass but split into pieces and reach various places so that, when I am gone, all beings may attain celestial abodes and Nibbāna as a result of them." Then he attained Parinibbāna in the Ironwood (Nāga) grove, neither too near nor too far from the city. His relics did not form into one mass, a deviation from the usual mode of relics of long-lived Buddhas, but dispersed and spread to every nook and corner of Jambudīpa, in accordance with his resolve and were held in honour by humans, Devas and Brahmas.

That Buddha Revata's frame, which was like a solid gem stone, and his incomparable tenfold Dhamma have all vanished. Unsubstantial and futile indeed are all conditioned things!

6. The Chronicle of Buddha Sobhita

After Buddha Revata's Parinibbāna, the lifespan of human beings decreased gradually from 60,000 years to ten years and then from ten years it increased to immeasurables. When the lifespan became 90,000 years on its second decline, Bodhisatta Sobhita, after complete fulfilment of the perfections for four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, was reborn in Tusita, a practice common to all Bodhisattas. While living there, he accepted the request made by Devas, and then descended from his celestial abode to the human world and took conception in the womb of Sudhammā, Chief Queen of King Sudhamma, in the city of the same name. Ten months thereafter, the Bodhisatta left his mother's womb in Sudhamma Park, similarly to how the big full moon comes out from behind the clouds.

Early Life

When the Bodhisatta Prince Sobhita came of age, he lived in three golden palaces: Kumuda, Nāḷina and Paduma, and enjoyed a heavenly-like royal household life with his chief consort Manilā, and being entertained and waited upon by 70,000<sup>64</sup> [139] female attendants.

While he was enjoying thus, a son, named Sīha, was born by the Princess. Seeing the four omens, Bodhisatta Sobhita was stirred by a strong spiritual urgency (saṃvega). Even while in the palace, he lived the life of a recluse and practised breathing meditation (ānāpāna-bhāvanā) till he attained the fourth absorption. Still again in the very palace, he practised the austerities (dukkara-cariyā) for seven days.

Then on the full moon of May (Vesākha), the day he would attain Awakening, he took the milk rice offered by the chief consort Manilā herself. Determined on renunciation, he resolved: “Let this very palace of mine, with its usual decorations, go through the air while the populace is watching and descend onto the earth, making the Mahā Bodhi tree stand in the centre. When I take residence near the Bodhi tree, may all female courtiers here leave the palace on their own accord without my asking.”

As soon as he had thus resolved, the Bodhisatta’s palace rose from the courtyard of his father, King Sudhamma, into the sky of the dark blue-green colour of collyrium. The palace adorned with scented festoons shone very brightly as though it beautified the whole sky like the sun with its splendid colour of liquid gold showers, and also like the bright moon of the month of November (Kattikā) in autumn. The flying palace travelled all over the vault of heaven and attracted the people’s eyes, as would the brilliant colour of tree branches and various gems.

It had a net of various exquisite little bells hanging downwards. Touched by the breeze, the net made a sweet tinkling sound that was like the sound of five musical instruments played by highly skilled musicians. The sweet tinkling sound, from a distance, attracted the people as if enticing them from its aerial travel, neither too low nor too high, whether they were staying in the houses or standing on cross-roads, they praised and marvelled at the sound. The sound seems to be proclaiming the qualities of the deeds of merit done by the Bodhisatta.

The female dancers, who were in the flying palace, sang with delightful voices resembling the sound of five musical instruments. They also spoke sweetly in praise of the Bodhisatta among themselves. The Bodhisatta's fourfold army surrounded the palace in the sky, just as it did on the ground. They were like Devas, brilliant with their shining equipment and physical radiance and in their raiment of fragrant blossoms.

Having taken its flight, the palace descended onto the earth making the Ironwood (Nāga) Bodhi tree lie in the centre. This tree was 88 cubits tall, its trunk straight, broad, round, and beautiful with flowers, leaves, sprouts and buds. Then the female dancers went out of the palace and departed of their own accord.

Awakening

Glorious with numerous qualities and surrounded by hosts of people, Buddha Sobhita acquired the threefold knowledge during the three watches of the night. Māra's forces were defeated. The palace, however, remained where it was.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. After his attainment of Awakening, Buddha Sobhita spent 49 days near the Bodhi tree. Having agreed to a Brahma's entreaty, he thought as to whom he should teach first and he saw, with his mind's eye, his younger half brothers, princes Asama and Sunetta. Knowing that they were endowed with the supporting merits (upanissaya) and were able to grasp the profound and subtle Dhamma, he decided to teach them. Accordingly, by his psychic power, he immediately appeared at Sudhamma Park. Through the gardener, the Buddha summoned the princes. Being surrounded by the princes and their retinues, in the midst of the audience of countless humans, Devas and Brahmas from all over the regions, ranging from the highest Bhavagga abode down to the lowest Avīci hell, the [140] Buddha taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse. As a result of which, a large multitude of humans, Devas and Brahmas realized the four truths.

2. On another occasion, having displayed the twin miracle of water and fire near an exquisite Cittapāṭali tree, in the neighbourhood of the city-gate of Sudassana, sitting on the emerald stone slab of Paṇḍukambala under the coral tree, the Buddha taught Abhidhamma. At the conclusion, 900 billion Devas and Brahmas realized the truths and were liberated.

3. Still on another occasion, Prince Jayasena had a monastery built in the compound of a garden in Sudassana where he had such excellent trees as Asoka, Assakaṇṇa, etc., planted, one close to another. He dedicated the monastery, together with the garden, to the Saṅgha with the Buddha at its head. At the great ceremony of dedication, the Buddha Sobhita gave a discourse in appreciation of the dedication, lauding the prince's great generosity (mahā-dāna). At the conclusion of the discourse, 1,000 billion beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, attained realization of the truths and liberation.

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

1. Another offering of a monastery, Sunandārāma, at the city of Sunanda, was given by King Uggata to the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha. On this occasion, one billion summoned monastic Arahats assembled. To them, the Buddha recited the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha).

2. Again, a group of virtuous people built a monastery named Gaṇārāma in the city of Mekhala and offered it to the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha. They also performed alms givings (dāna) of various requisites. On this occasion, 900 million summoned monastics Arahats assembled. At this meeting, the Buddha uttered the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha).

3. After teaching Abhidhamma in Tāvātimsa and staying there for the whole period of the Rains Retreat (Vassa), being accompanied by Devas and Brahmas, Buddha Sobhita returned to the human world to perform the Invitation (Pavāraṇā) ceremony and did so at the meeting of four features attended by 800 million Arahats.

Bodhisatta Sujāta

At that time, our Bodhisatta was born a Brahmin, Sujāta by name, whose parents were of Brahmin caste, in Rammavati city. Having listened to the Dhamma, he was established in the three refuges. He gave alms on a grand scale to the Buddha and his Saṅgha for the three months of the Rains Retreat (Vassa). Then the Buddha made a prophetic declaration concerning Sujātā the Brahmin: “This man will become a Buddha, Gotama by name, in the future.”

Particulars of Buddha Sobhita

Buddha Sobhita's birthplace was Sudhamma city.

His father was King Sudhamma and his mother was Sudhammā.

He reigned for 9,000 years.

His three palaces were Kamuda, Nāḷina and Paduma.

His chief consort was Manilā, and she had 70,000 maids of honour.

His son was Sīha.

His conveyance on his renunciation, after seeing the four omens, was a palace.

He [141] observed the austerities for just seven days even in this palace.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Asama and Ven. Sunetta.

His attendant was Ven. Anoma.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Nakulā and Ven. Sujātā.

His Bodhi tree was an Ironwood (Nāga) tree.

His noble male lay supporters were the wealthy Ramma and Sudatta.

His noble female supporters were Nakulā and Mittā.

Buddha Sobhita's height was 58 cubits.

Like the rising sun, he possessed body lustre which could shine and spread all over the directions as much as he wished.

Like a great grove full of trees in full bloom and fragrant with various scents, the Buddha Sobhita's grove of instructive words was fragrant with the scents of morality. Another simile: As one is not satiated looking at the moving and rising waves of the ocean, so beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, were not satiated listening to the words of Buddha Sobhita.

The lifespan during Buddha Sobhita's time was 90,000 years and living four-fifths of this lifespan, he saved humans, Devas and Brahmas from the floodwaters of Samsāra and placed them on the shore of Nibbāna.

After bequeathing his diverse teaching, long and short, to future beings who had not attained liberation in his presence, Buddha Sobhita, together with his Arahat disciples, came to the cessation of his existence and attained Parinibbāna just as a great flame becomes extinguished.

That Buddha Sobhita, equal only to the peerless Buddhas, and his Arahāt disciples who had acquired the super knowledges and other powers, have all vanished. Unsubstantial and futile indeed are all conditioned things!

Before his Parinibbāna, Buddha Sobhita resolved: “When I am gone, let the relics of my body not remain in a mass but split into pieces and reach various places,” and his Parinibbāna took place in Sīha Park. Accordingly his relics did not remain in a mass but dispersed all over Jambudīpa and were worshipped by beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas.

7. The Chronicle of Buddha Anomadassī

After the lapse of the aeon in which Buddha Sobhita lived, came one immeasurable period devoid of Buddhas (suñña-kappa). Again, after these had passed, there appeared in a certain aeon three Buddhas, namely, Anomadassī, Paduma and Nārada. The first of these was the Buddha Anomadassī.

Having fulfilled the perfections for sixteen immeasurables and 100,000 aeons, like other Bodhisattas, he was reborn in Tusita heaven. At the request of Devas and Brahmas, he descended to the human world to be conceived in the womb of Princess Yasodharā of King Yasavā, in the city of Candavatī. A strange event happened then. As soon as Prince Anomadassī was conceived, because of his meritorious deeds, light spread out from the princess to the extent of 80 cubits and was unsurpassed by the light of the sun and the moon.

When ten months had elapsed, Princess Yasodharā gave birth to Prince Anomadassī in Sudassana Park. On his naming day, he was given the name of Anomadassī by wise men because, while [142] he was in the womb, there was incessant falling from the sky of the jewels called Anoma.

Early Life

When the Bodhisatta, Prince Anomadassī, came of age, he lived a divine-like household in three palaces: Sirī, Upasirī and Sirivaḍḍha, with his consort Sirimā, and being entertained and waited upon by 23,000 female attendants for 10,000 years.

While he was thus living, Princess Sirimā gave birth to a son, named Upavāṇa. Seeing the four omens, the Bodhisatta Prince Anomadassī went forth from household life on a palanquin and became a recluse. 30 million men, who were inspired by his act of renunciation, also became recluses like him. Surrounded by these recluses, the Bodhisatta practised the austerities (dukkara-cariyā) for ten months.

Awakening

Having practised thus, he went on alms round on the day of his Awakening on the full moon day of May (Vesākha) to the Brahmin village of Anupama. He partook of the milk rice offered by Anupamā, daughter of a wealthy man, then he passed the day in the local Sāla grove and proceeded alone to the Mahā Bodhi tree in the evening. On the way, he was given eight handfuls of grass by Anoma, the heretic. As soon as he spread the grass at the foot of Arjuna tree, there appeared, under the tree, the unconquered seat (aparājita-pallaṅka), which was 38 cubits in size. Sitting on it cross-legged, he mobilized his resources of the fourfold energy and dispelled Māra's forces and, above all, he became a Buddha, the state of a Perfectly Self-Awakened One, Lord of the Three Worlds.

Having cut off the strings of attachment to Saṃsāra and having overcome with his path-wisdom the destruction of productive deeds (kammakkhaya), which are the deeds leading to the three kinds of existence, Buddha Anomadassī was able to expound the doctrine, from the eightfold noble path to Nibbāna.

The Buddha was like an ocean, being endowed with virtues that could not be disturbed. With attributes that made it difficult for insincere persons to approach him, he was also like Mount Meru. He was also like the vault of heaven because his qualities were boundless. Magnificent with his characteristic marks, large and small, he was like a great Sāla tree in full bloom.

People were delighted with Buddha Anomadassī. Hearing the Buddha's teaching they attained Nibbāna, which is deathless.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. Having become a Buddha, Buddha Anomadassī stayed around the Bodhi tree for 49 days; then he accepted a Brahma's entreaty for his teaching and he surveyed the world of beings with his Buddha's Eye, which includes the knowledge of the inclination and latent tendencies of beings (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa), and knowledge of mature or immature controlling faculties of beings (indriya-paro-pariyatti-ñāṇa). He saw the 30 million followers who had become recluses together with him and who were endowed with the merits of their past deeds, which were conducive to attainment of the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna. Reflecting on their present whereabouts, he saw them in Sudassana Park near the city of Subhavatī. He immediately appeared in the Park by his psychic power. Being surrounded by the 30 million recluses, he taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse amidst the audience of Devas and humans. On that occasion, thousands of millions of beings realized the four truths and attained liberation.

2. At another time, when he had performed the twin miracles near an Indian Laurel (Asana) tree, close to Osadhi city, sitting on the emerald stone slab under it, he caused the rain of Abhidhamma to fall for the three months of the Rains Retreat (Vassa). Then 800 million beings penetrated the four truths and attained liberation. [143]

3. Still at a later time, when the Buddha gave an analytical discourse with regard to the blessings (Maṅgala-sutta), 780 million beings attained liberation through gaining knowledge of the four noble truths.

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

1. There were also meetings of Buddha Anomadassī's disciples. In the first meeting, Buddha Anomadassī recited the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) in the midst of 800,000 Arahats, who had already become summoned monastics out of great faith, at the time when he taught the Dhamma to King Isidatta in the city of Soreyya.

2. Again, when the Buddha was teaching King Sundarindhara<sup>65</sup> in the city of Rādhavatī, he recited the Rules in the midst of 700,000 Arahats who had already become summoned monastics out of faith.

3. Still again, the Buddha uttered the Monastic Rules in the midst of 600,000 Arahats, who had already become summoned monastics, together with King Soreyya in the city of the same name.

The Bodhisatta as a Yakkha General

During the Dispensation of the Buddha Anomadassī, our Bodhisatta was a Yakkha general commanding many billions of powerful Yakkhas. Hearing that a Buddha has appeared in the world, he visited the Buddha and created a magnificent pavilion decorated with very beautiful gems, in which he performed a great alms giving of food, drink, etc., to the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha, for seven days.

While the Yakkha general was listening to the discourse given by the Buddha, in appreciation of the meal, the Buddha made a prophetic declaration, saying: “One immeasurable period and 100,000 aeons from the present aeon, this Yakkha general will definitely become a Buddha by the name of Gotama.”

Particulars of Buddha Anomadassī

Buddha Anomadassī's birthplace was Candavatī city.

His father was King Yasavā and his mother was Princess Yasodharā.

He reigned for 10,000 years.

His three palaces were Sirī, Upasirī and Sirivaḍḍha.

His chief consort was Sirimā Devī, who had 23,000 maids of honours.

His son was Prince Upavāṇa.

When he renounced the world after seeing the four omens he used a golden palanquin as the vehicle.

He practised the austerities for ten months.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Nisabba and Ven. Anoma.

His attendant was Ven. Varuṇa.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Sundarī and Ven. Sumanā.

His Bodhi tree was an Arjuna (Ajjuna) tree.

His lay male supporters were Nandivaḍḍha and Sirivaḍḍha.

His female supporters were Uppalā and Padumā.

Buddha Anomadassī's height was 58 cubits.

Like the newly rising sun, the radiance from his body shone as far as twelve leagues. [144]

The lifespan during the time of Buddha Anomadassī was 100,000 years. He lived throughout the period equal to four-fifths of this lifespan, rescuing beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, from the flood-waters of Saṃsāra and placed them on the shore of Nibbāna.

Buddha Anomadassī's Dispensation, consisting of his noble teaching, was resplendent with noble ones who were Arahats, undisturbed by pleasant and unpleasant conditions of the world and free of passions and other defilements.

Buddha Anomadassī, who possessed boundless retinue and fame, and his two chief disciples and others, who were possessors of peerless qualities, have all vanished. Unsubstantial and futile indeed are all conditioned things!

Buddha Anomadassī, conqueror of the five kinds of death (māra), attained Parinibbāna in Dhammārāma Park. The shrine built and dedicated to him, in that very Park, was 25 leagues high.

Two persons, who would become the Vens. Sāriputta and Moggallāna, wished in the presence of Buddha Anomadassī for the state of chief disciples. This will be narrated later in the section on the Saṅgha Jewel.

8. The Chronicle of Buddha Paduma

After the Parinibbāna of Buddha Anomadassī, the human lifespan decreased from 100,000 years to ten years and then it increased again to an immeasurable and decreased again. When the lifespan was 100,000 years, Bodhisatta Paduma, on complete fulfilment of the perfections, was reborn in the celestial abode of Tusita which was a practice common to all Bodhisattas. Having agreed to the entreaty of other Devas and Brahmas, he descended to the human world to be conceived in the womb of Asamā, Chief Queen of King Asama. When ten months had elapsed, the Bodhisatta was born in the grove of Campak trees.

At the Bodhisatta's birth, a rain of Paduma lotuses fell from the sky over the whole of Jambudīpa, reaching the surrounding seas. On his naming day, therefore, learned omen-readers and relatives named him Mahā Paduma.

Early Life

When the Bodhisatta Mahā Paduma came of age, living in three palaces, namely, Nanduttara, Vasuttara and Yasuttara, and being entertained and waited upon by 33,000 female attendants under his chief consort Uttarā Devī, he lived a divine-like royal household life for 10,000 years.

While he was thus living, Princess Uttarā gave birth to a son, named Ramma. After seeing the four omens, he went forth in celestial raiment, riding a chariot drawn by thoroughbred horses and became a recluse. 10 million men joined him and became recluses too. With these recluses, the Bodhisatta practised the austerities for eight months.

Awakening

After striving thus for eight months, on the day he was to become a Buddha, the Bodhisatta ate the milk rice offered by Dhaññavatī, daughter of a wealthy man, named Sudhañña, of the city of Dhaññavatī. Having spent his time at midday in the local Sāla grove, he went alone, in the evening, to the place where the Mahā Bodhi tree stood. On the way, he accepted eight handfuls of grass given by Titthaka, a naked ascetic. The moment he spread the grass under the great Soṇa Bodhi tree, there appeared the unconquered seat of [145] 33 cubits in size. Sitting cross-legged and mobilizing his resources of the fourfold energy, the Bodhisatta dispelled Māra's forces and attained the state of a Buddha, the omniscient and Perfectly Self-Awakened One, Lord of the Three Worlds.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. After becoming a Buddha, the Awakened One, Paduma, spent 49 days in the neighbourhood of the Mahā Bodhi tree. Having accepted a Brahma's request for his teaching, he contemplated who he should teach first and he saw his fellow recluses, numbering 10 million. Using his psychic vision, he found that they were staying in Dhanañjaya garden, near Dhaññavatī city, and taking his bowl and robe, he appeared immediately in the garden.

On seeing the Buddha coming from a distance, the recluses, with faithful hearts, welcomed him. Taking his bowl and robe, preparing his seat, after paying respects, they took their seats around him. Being thus surrounded, Buddha Paduma, like the past Buddhas, taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse amidst the audience of humans, Devas and Brahmas. In that occasion, one billion humans, Devas and Brahmas attained the unique Dhamma of the paths and fruitions.

2. At another time, Buddha Paduma, in an assembly of his relatives, helped his younger brothers, princes Sāla and Upasāla, his future chief disciples, and their retinues, became monks and gave a discourse to 900 million Devas and humans who attained the paths and fruitions.

3. Still at another time, Buddha Paduma instructed his son Ven. Ramma in Dhamma. On this occasion 800 million beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, attained realization of the four noble truths and were liberated.

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

1. There were three occasions of the meetings of Buddha Paduma's disciples. In the first occasion, a king by the name of Subhāvitatta became a summoned monastic together with his retinue of one billion. In that meeting, the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha).

2. At a later time, Buddha Paduma observed the Rains Retreat, relying upon Usabhavatī as his resort for food. Then the Buddha taught the citizens who visited him. Many of them developed their faith in him and became monks. On the full moon day of October (Assayuja), Buddha Paduma performed the Invitation of the Pure (Visuddhi-pavāraṇā) with the monks of Usabhavatī and others, numbering 300,000 Arahats in all. The Invitation of the Pure means the Invitation was attended by Arahats only.

3. When the laymen in the city, who remained as householders, heard about the benefits of the Cloth (Kaṭhina) offering, they offered a piece of Cloth (Kaṭhina) to the Saṅgha. Then members of the Saṅgha formally dedicated it, by reciting the formal procedure (kamma-vācā) to Ven. Sāla who was privileged to stay on the Buddha's right hand side as the general of the Dhamma (Dhamma-senāpati). Monks then prepared to sew the robe collectively, so that the sewing might be finished in the same day. As it was an act of the Saṅgha, the Buddha himself helped them by putting the thread through the eye of a needle. When the sewing [146] was done, the Buddha and his 300,000 monks set out on a journey. After that, the Buddha observed the Rains Retreat in a forest that was like the Gosiṅga grove of Sāla trees. While the Buddha was sojourning with his retinue, people visited him. Having listened to his discourse, their faith in him increased and on being called by him they became summoned monastics then and there. Then, surrounded by 200,000 monks, the Buddha performed the Invitation (Pavāraṇā) ceremony.

The second and third meeting (sannipāta) have been narrated as mentioned in the commentary. According to the Pāḷi text, however, the meeting of the 300,000, where the sewing of Cloth (Kaṭhina) for the chief disciple Sāla took place, it seems, should be taken as the second meeting. Although the commentator knew this, he described the event somewhat differently from the text. Since such a deviation was done in line with older commentators, who are believed to have grasped what was meant by the Buddha, and since the meetings where the Invitation (Pavāraṇā) was performed or the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha) was given, are shown as the meetings of disciples in the previous and later Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa), the commentary's order is followed in this work.

The Bodhisatta as King of the Lions

While Buddha Paduma was staying in that forest grove, our Bodhisatta was a king of lions. Seeing the Buddha in the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti), the lion-king developed faith in him, and did obeisance by circumambulating him. Exalted with joy, he roared three times and remained there for seven days without losing his ecstasy which was derived from the sight of the Buddha. Without going in search of food, he stayed near the Buddha respectfully, at the risk of starvation.

When seven days had elapsed, on emerging from the attainment of cessation, Buddha Paduma saw the lion and made a wish: “May this lion have faith in the Saṅgha of monks also.” At the same time, he resolved to have the Saṅgha near him: “May the monks come here!” Immediately many millions of monks arrived on the spot. The Bodhisatta developed faith in the Saṅgha also. After surveying and knowing the Bodhisatta's mind, Buddha Paduma made a prophetic declaration: “In the future, this lion-king will become a Buddha, Gotama by name.”

Having heard the Buddha's prophecy, the Bodhisatta became even more devotionally inclined and resolutely determined to fulfil the ten perfections even more energetically.

Particulars of Buddha Paduma

Buddha Paduma's birthplace was a Campak grove.<sup>66</sup>

His father was King Asama and his mother was Queen Asamā.

He reigned for 10,000 years.

His three palaces were Nanduttara, Vasuttara and Yasuttara.

His chief consort was Uttarā, who had 33,000 maids of honour.

His son was Prince Ramma.

His vehicle used for renunciation, after seeing the four omens, was a chariot drawn by thoroughbred horses.

He practised the austerities for eight months.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Sāla and Ven. Upasāla.

His attendant was Ven. Varuṇa.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Rādhā and Ven. Surādhā.

His Bodhi tree was a Great Soṇa tree (Mahā-soṇa).

His noble male lay attendants were the wealthy Bhiyya and Asama.

His noble lay female attendants were Rucī and Nandarāmā.

Buddha Paduma's height was 58 cubits.

The radiance that emitted from his body diffused as far as he wished. The light of the moon, the sun, jewels, fire and rubies disappeared on encountering the body light of the Buddha. [147]

The lifespan during the lifetime of Buddha Paduma was 100,000 years and living for four-fifths of this lifespan, he conveyed beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, from the flood-waters of Saṃsāra and placed them on the shore of Nibbāna.

Having caused the beings of mature faculties to realize the four noble truths, even in his lifetime, leaving out none, and having taught other beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, so that they might realise the four noble truths, together with his Arahat disciples, Buddha Paduma attained Parinibbāna.

Just as a snake sheds its old skin, as a tree discards its old leaves, as a bright fire becomes extinct after consuming up all its fuel, so the Buddha attained Parinibbāna, giving up all conditioned things, internal and external.

In this way, Buddha Paduma, conqueror of the five kinds of death (māras) attained Parinibbāna in the Park known as Dhammārāma. In accordance with his resolve, his relics dispersed in the way mentioned before all over Jambudīpa and were honoured by humans, Devas and Brahmas.

9. The Chronicle of Buddha Nārada

After Buddha Paduma had attained Parinibbāna, the lifespan of 100 years decreased gradually to ten years and from ten years it again increased to immeasurables. When it was 90,000 years on its next decline, Bodhisatta Nārada was reborn in Tusita which was a practice common to all Bodhisattas on complete fulfilment of the perfections.

Having accepted the request by Devas and Brahmas to become a Buddha, he descended to the abode of human beings to be conceived in the womb of Anomā, Chief Queen of the Universal Monarch Sudeva, in the city of Dhaññavatī. After ten months in the womb, the Bodhisatta was born in Dhanañjaya garden.

On his naming day, just when he was about to be named, falling from the sky, various kinds of clothing and ornaments, like a heavy rainfall, were seen falling from wish-fulfilling trees, etc. On account of this, he was named Nārada by the wise men who gave his name. Nāra means “ornaments befitting people” and da, “one who gives.”

Early Life

When Prince Nārada came of age, he lived in three palaces, namely, Jita, Vijita and Abhirāma. Being entertained and waited upon by 2 billion female attendants headed by his chief consort Vijitasenā, he thus enjoyed a divine-like royal household life for 9,000 years.

While he was thus enjoying life, Princess Vijitasenā gave birth to a son, Nanduttara by name. Having seen the four omens, he put on various garments, perfume, flowers, etc., and being surrounded by his fourfold army, he went to the garden on foot. Having taken off his ornaments and handed them over to his treasurer, he cut off his hair with his own sword and threw it into the sky.

Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, received it in a golden casket and built a shrine of seven kinds of jewels over it, three leagues in height, in Tāvatiṃsa on Mount Meru. Donning the robes offered by the Brahma, the Bodhisatta became a recluse in that very garden. Joining him in renunciation were 100,000 men who also became recluses.

A noteworthy point here is: Other Bodhisattas saw the omens while they were taking a trip to the royal garden to amuse themselves. On seeing the omens, they were stirred by spiritual urgency (saṃvega) and went forth, not to the usual resort of the royal garden but to a remote region of forests and hills, to renounce the world.

The sight of seeing the omens and the locality of their renunciation were two different places. Because of a considerable distance between the two they had to take some forms of conveyance, a vehicle such as an elephant, a horse, a chariot, etc. [148] But, in the case of Buddha Nārada, it is to be noted that it was in the royal garden where he came across the omens and it was also in this very garden where he stayed after renunciation. The commentary says that Dhanañjaya garden was just outside the city.

Awakening

Buddha Nārada practised the austerities in the garden for seven days. On the full moon of May (Vesākha), the day he was going to attain Awakening, he partook of the milk rice offered by Princess Vijitasenā and spent the daytime in the same garden. In the evening, he left all his followers and went alone to the Bodhi tree. On the way, he accepted eight handfuls of grass from Sudassana the gardener. As soon as he spread the grass at the foot of a great Soṇa tree, there appeared the unconquered seat of 57 cubits in extent. Sitting cross-legged on the seat, the Bodhisatta put forth energy at four levels, dispelled Māra's forces and attained omniscience, and became a Perfectly Self-Awakened One, and Lord of the Three Worlds.

The Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) commentary has this to say with regard to Buddha Nārada's Bodhi tree, a great Soṇa tree: "The great Soṇa tree was 90 cubits high. It has a round smooth trunk. It possessed many forks and branches, dense and abundant foliage in dark green and closely knitted shade. As it was guarded by a spirit, no birds could make it their resort. It was honoured as though it were a monarch among trees on the surface of the earth. It was full of branches adorned with red flowers, very delightful and pleasing to the eye. It thus served as an elixir to those Devas and humans who saw it.”

Three Occasions of the Buddha’s Teaching

1. After he had become a Buddha, Buddha Nārada spent 49 days in the neighbourhood of the Bodhi tree. Having accepted a Brahma’s request for his teaching, he contemplated who he should teach first. Then he saw his companions in renunciation being endowed with meritorious qualities, which were conducive to the attainment of the paths and fruitions. After reflecting on their whereabouts, he came to know that they were staying in Dhanañjaya Park. Accordingly, he took his bowl and robe and, by his psychic power, he immediately appeared in the Park.

At that time, the 100,000 monks saw the Buddha coming from a distance. With faithful hearts, they welcomed him; taking his bowl and robe, preparing a seat for him, paying their respects to him and taking their appropriate seats around him. Being surrounded thus, Buddha Nārada taught these 100,000 monks the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse amidst the audience of humans, Devas and Brahmas, as was done by former Buddhas. In that occasion, 1,000 billion humans, Devas and Brahmas realized the supreme Dhamma of the paths and fruitions.

2. Once, a Nāga King, called Doṇa, was ruling on the banks of the Ganges, near the city of Mahā Doṇa. He was powerful and was held in esteem and honour. If the local inhabitants did not appease him with an offering, he would destroy the locality either by total drought or by extremely heavy rainfall or by a rain of pebbles.

Buddha Nārada, who had realized the other shore of Nibbāna, foresaw a large number of people who would definitely attain the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna if he would go and tame the Nāga King, as they were endowed with the merits of their past deeds, which qualified them for such attainments. Accordingly, accompanied by monks, he travelled to the residence of the Nāga King.

When the people saw the Buddha, they requested him, saying: “Exalted Buddha, here lives a Nāga King, who is terribly venomous and mighty, reigning terror in this region. Please do not come here lest you should get hurt.” The Buddha went, nevertheless, as though he did not hear their entreaties and sat on the flowers which were spread in honour of the Nāga King. [149]

The people then assembled, thinking: “We shall now see a battle between the Buddha, the lord of sages, and Doṇa, the Nāga King.” On seeing the Buddha sitting on the seat of flowers which was prepared for him, the Nāga King could not control his anger and made himself visible with an emission of smoke. Using his psychic power, the Buddha also emitted forth smoke in return. Again, when the Nāga King sent forth blazing flames, the Buddha sent back blazing flames by his power. The Nāga King was so severely affected by the flames from the Buddha that he was not able to stand the suffering. Thinking: “I will kill this great monk by means of venom,” the Nāga King discharged venom.

Although the Nāga King’s poisonous discharge was so virulent that it could destroy the whole of Jambudīpa it was powerless to disturb a single hair on the Buddha’s body. “What is the condition of the great monk?” wondered the Nāga King? When he surveyed the scene, he saw the Buddha with a face so serene and bright with the six radiances, like the sun and the full round moon in the month of November (Kattikā) in the autumnal season. Then he thought to himself: “This great monk is indeed powerful. Knowing not my own ability, I have wronged him,” and so he took refuge in the Buddha. After taming the Nāga King, the Buddha displayed the twin miracle of water and fire in order to arouse pious faith in the multitude gathered there. At that time, 900 billion Devas and humans were established in Awakening.

3. At another time, Buddha Nārada instructed his son, Prince Nanduttara. As a result, 80,000 Devas and humans attained the supreme Dhamma of the path and fruition.

Three Occasions of the Disciples’ Meeting

1. There were three occasions of the meetings (sannipāta) of Buddha Nārada’s disciples. The first occasion took place in the city of Thullakoṭṭhita, where the two Brahmin youths, who were to be his future chief disciples, Bhaddasāla and Vijitamitta, encountered Buddha Nārada who was seated boldly in the middle of a gathering. They were looking for the “great pool of the deathless Dhamma.” When the two youths saw the 32 marks of a Great Man on the body of the Buddha, they concluded: “This man indeed is a Buddha who has removed the veil of ignorance in the world.” Developing faith in the Buddha, they became monks together with their followers. After their establishment in Awakening, the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha) in the midst of 1,000 billion monks.

2. At another time, at an assembly of his relatives, Buddha Nārada related his life story with an introduction, beginning from the episode of his aspiration to become a Buddha. 900 billion Arahats then met.

3. At another time, a Nāga King, Verocana by name, who had developed great faith in the Buddha on the occasion of his taming of the Nāga King, Mahā Doṇa, created a huge pavilion of jewels, three miles in size and let the Buddha and his retinue of monks stay inside the pavilion. He also invited his courtiers together with the people of the district to visit his pavilion. Presenting a concert of Nāga dancers in various costumes and ornaments, he held a resounding ceremony of reverence, and performed a great alms giving to the Buddha and his company of monastics.

After finishing the meal, the Buddha gave a discourse in appreciation of the alms food. Listening to the discourse, the people developed faith in him and asked to become monks. The Buddha then uttered: “Come, monks,” and they all became summoned monastics. In the midst of eight million summoned monastics, the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha). [150]

The Bodhisatta as a Recluse

At that time our Bodhisatta was a recluse, who found a hermitage in the Himālayas and lived there, and who had mastered the five super knowledges (abhiññā) and the eight attainments (samāpatti). Out of compassion for the Bodhisatta recluse, Buddha Nārada visited the hermitage in the company of 800 million lay disciples who were all Non-returners (Anāgāmi).

The noble recluse was glad to see the Buddha. He then created a residence for the Buddha and his monastics. During the whole night, the recluse extolled the Buddha, relating all his attributes and listened to his discourses. The next morning, he went to the northern continent by his psychic power and brought back cooked rice and other kinds of food which he offered to the Buddha and his monastics and lay disciples.

In this way, the Bodhisatta offered food for seven days, after which he paid homage to the Buddha and offered priceless red sandalwood from the Himālayas. Then Buddha Nārada, after delivering a discourse, predicted: “You will certainly become a Buddha in the future.” Hearing the Buddha’s prophecy, the Bodhisatta became very happy and resolved to fulfil the perfections even more energetically.

Particulars of Nārada Buddha

Buddha Nārada’s birthplace was Dhaññavatī city.

His father was the Universal Monarch Sudeva and his mother was Queen Anomā.

He reigned for 9,000 years.

His three palaces were Jita, Vijita and Abhirāma.

His chief consort was Vijitasenā, who had 43,000 maids of honour.

The number of the maids is given as 2 billion in the section on “royal household life” but here it is mentioned as 43,000. The two numbers therefore seems inconsistent. It should be noted, however, that the former was the total number of maids serving the princess and the latter was the number of maids in each batch that waited upon the princess at any given time.

His son was Nanduttara.

Seeing the four omens, he went forth on foot without taking a vehicle.

He practised the austerities for seven days.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Bhaddasāla and Ven. Vijitamitta.

His attendant was Ven. Vāseṭṭha.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Uttarā and Ven. Phaggunī.

His Bodhi tree was a Great Soṇa tree (Mahā-soṇa).

His noble male lay attendants were the wealthy Uggarinda and Vāsabha.

His noble female attendants were Indāvarī and Vaṇḍī.<sup>67</sup>

Buddha Nārada’s height was 88 cubits. He was dignified in the 10,000 world-element of births, like a column of gold erected as an object of honour.

The radiance emitted from his body extended for a league, during day and night without interruption. While Buddha Nārada was alive, because of the dazzling brilliance of his radiance, people living within a league did not have to light torches.

The lifespan during Buddha Nārada's time was 90,000 years. He lived throughout the period equal to four-fifths of this lifespan, rescuing beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, from the flood-waters of Saṃsāra and placed them on the shore of Nibbāna.

As the sky is exquisitely beautiful with stars and planets, so was Buddha Nārada's Dispensation with noble Arahats. For those other than Arahats who remained worldlings and trainees (sekkhas), the Buddha constructed the huge strong bridge of the path for them to easily cross over Saṃsāra. Having done all his tasks as a Buddha, he attained Parinibbāna with his Arahats disciples.

Buddha Nārada, who was equal only to peerless Buddhas, and his Arahats, who were endowed with matchless glory, have all vanished. Unsubstantial and futile indeed are all [151] conditioned things!

Thus Buddha Nārada, conqueror of the five kinds of death (marā), attained Parinibbāna in the city of Sudassana. In that very city was erected a shrine of four leagues in height, and dedicated to him.

An aeon in which only one Buddha appears is called an essential aeon (sāra-kappa); two Buddhas is a fine aeon (maṇḍa-kappa); three Buddhas is called a noble aeon (vara-kappa); four Buddhas is called an essential and noble aeon (sāra-maṇḍa-kappa); five Buddhas is called an Auspicious aeon (Bhadda-kappa). The aeon in which no Buddha appears at all is called an empty aeon (suñña-kappa). The aeon in which three Buddhas, such as Buddha Anomadassī, Buddha Paduma and Buddha Nārada, appeared is therefore a noble aeon (vara-kappa).

10. The Chronicle of Buddha Padumuttara

[The most momentous of the events in Buddha Padumuttara's life story has somehow been left out of this account. For, as we will see later, in chapters 43-45, it was during his Dispensation that nearly all of the 80 Buddha Gotama's foremost disciples, both male and female, monastic and lay, were inspired, and made their aspirations for their respective positions later on. The only exceptions to this are Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, who made their aspiration earlier under Ven. Anomadassī owing to a greater time amassing the perfections needed for these positions. This is very much worth noting.]

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 145

After the aeon with three Buddhas (vara-kappa), in which appeared the Buddhas Anomadassī, Paduma and Nārada had come to an end, one immeasurable period passed. Then in one aeon, 100,000 aeons before the present one, there appeared Buddha Padumuttara.

This particular aeon was an essential aeon (sāra-kappa) as Buddha Padumutta alone appeared then, yet it resembled a fine aeon (maṇḍa-kappa) of two Buddhas because of its delightful features. In the aeon to which Buddha Padumuttara belonged, there lived only people who abounded in meritoriousness.

In the Chronicle of the Buddhas, Padumuttara's appearance was like this: Having completed his fulfilment of the perfections, Bodhisatta Padumuttara was reborn in Tusita which was a practice common to all Bodhisattas. Having agreed to the entreaties of Devas and Brahmas, he descended to the human abode to be conceived in the womb of Sujātā, Queen of King Ānanda, in the city of Hāmsavatī. When ten months had elapsed, the Bodhisatta was born in the royal garden of Hāmsavatī. When Prince Padumuttara was born, a rain of Paduma lotuses fell and his relatives gave him the name of Padumuttara.

Early Life

When he came of age, he enjoyed the divine-like royal household life living for 10,000 years in three palaces: Naravāhana, Yasavāhana and Vasavatti, and being entertained and served by 120,000 female attendants headed by his chief consort Vasudattā.

While he was thus living the royal household life, Princess Vasudattā gave birth to a son, named Uttara. Having seen the four omens, he resolved to undertake the noble task of renunciation. No sooner had he thus resolved, the Vasavatti palace rotated thoroughly like a potter's wheel and rose up to the sky. Then it moved on its course, like the moon and other heavenly bodies, and descended onto the ground with the Bodhi tree at its centre.

The Bodhisatta came down from the palace and putting on the lotus robes offered by the Brahma, he became a recluse at that very spot. The palace then returned to the city and stood at its original site. Except womenfolk, all those who accompanied the Bodhisatta also became recluses themselves. [152]

Awakening

Buddha Padumuttara practised the austerities with his companions for seven days. On the full moon day of May (Vesākha), the day of his Awakening, he ate the milk rice offered by Rucanandā, daughter of the local wealthy man of Ujjenī. Having passed the daytime in a Sāla grove, he went alone, in the evening, to the Bodhi tree. On the way, he accepted eight handfuls of grass offered by a heretic named Sumitta. As soon as he spread the grass at the foot of the Salala Bodhi tree, there appeared the unconquered seat, which was 38 cubits.

Sitting cross-legged on the seat, he mustered his energy at four levels and dispelled Māra's forces. He acquired the knowledge of previous lives in the first watch of the night; the knowledge of the divine eye in the middle watch; and contemplated conditional origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) in the third watch. After contemplating it, the Bodhisatta emerged from the fourth absorption (jhāna) through breathing meditation, and viewed the five aggregates with their characteristics.

By means of the knowledge of rise and fall (udayabbaya-ñāṇa) of all conditioned things, he contemplated the impermanence in 50 modes, and developed insight (vipassanā) up to the change of lineage (gotrabhū-ñāṇa). Through the noble path (ariya-magga), he realized all the attributes of the Buddhas, and became a Buddha, and uttered the verse of elation: Aneka-jāti saṃsaram, “through the round of countless births and deaths” (Dhp 153). This utterance was customarily made by all Buddhas.

There are ten modes for each of the five aggregates (khandha), which makes 50 altogether. The ten modes are enumerated in the Path of the Analytic Knowledges (Paṭisambhidā-magga) commentary as follows: impermanent (anicca), crumbling (paloka), unstable (cāla), disintegrating (pabhaṅgu), uncertain (addhuva), mutable (vipariṇāma-dhamma), essenceless (asāra), unprosperous (vibhava) and liable to death (maraṇa-dhamma).

No sooner had the Bodhisatta become a Buddha than a rain of lotuses fell as though to adorn everything in the 10,000 world-element.

What is particularly noteworthy is this: After becoming an Awakened One, Buddha Padumuttara stayed absorbed in the fruition attainment (phala-samāpatti) for seven days under the Bodhi tree in the first week. On the eighth day, he thought he would set his foot on the ground, and as he was trying to put down his right foot on the ground, Paduma lotuses, which normally flower in water, miraculously pushed through the earth and appeared under his feet. Each lotus leaf measured nine cubits, each stamen filament, holding pollen, 30 cubits; each pollen, twelve cubits and each bloom had pollen that would fill nine water-jars.

Buddha Padumuttara was 58 cubits tall; the measurement between his two arms was eighteen cubits; that of his forehead five cubits; and that of each arm and leg eleven cubits. As his leg of eleven cubits trod on another pollen of twelve cubits, about nine jars-full of pollen rose up and spread all over his body of 58 cubits in height as though the powder of red orpiment and sulphuret of arsenic was sprinkled on it. On account of this particular happening, the Buddha was renowned as Buddha Padumuttara.<sup>68</sup>

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. Having become a Buddha, Buddha Padumuttara stayed near the Salala Mahā Bodhi tree for seven weeks. Having accepted a Brahma's request, he thought as to whom he should teach first and saw Prince Devala and Prince Sujāta his future chief disciples who were endowed with the merits of their past deeds leading to the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna. Then he thought of their whereabouts and came to know that they were staying in Mithilā. Accordingly, taking his bowl and robe, and by his psychic power, the Buddha immediately appeared in the garden of Mithilā city.

Buddha Padumuttara then sent the gardener for the two princes, who discussed thus among themselves: "Our uncle's son, Prince Padumuttara, after becoming a Buddha, has come to Mithilā city. We shall now visit him." Then they approached the Buddha with their retinues and sat in suitable places. [153]

Buddha Padumuttara appeared resplendent with the princes waiting upon him, like the full moon attended upon by stars, he taught the audience of Devas and humans led by the princes, the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse which was also taught by all past Buddhas. At that time 1,000 billion Devas and humans attained the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna.

2. At another time, Sārada the recluse was teaching his followers some evil doctrine that would lead them to rebirth in the suffering states. The Buddha went to Sārada's assembly and taught the Dhamma, giving the congregation illustrations of the dangers of rebirth in the Niraya hell, an abode of intense suffering. At that time 3,700,000 Devas and humans, including the disciples of Sārada, attained the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna.

3. Still at another time, the Buddha's father, King Ānanda, sent 20 ministers with 20,000 men to bring back Buddha Padumuttara, who was staying at Mithilā, to his home city of Hāmsavatī, in the same way King Suddhodana did for his son Buddha Gotama. On arriving in the presence of the Buddha in Mithilā, the 20 ministers and their 20,000 men, after giving them a discourse, were called upon: "Come, O monks," by the Buddha and they became summoned monastics. Accompanied by them, he travelled to Hāmsavati and stayed in the city to uplift the royal father's spiritually.

Like our Buddha Gotama who visited Kapilavatthu and narrated the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) in the assembly of his relatives, Buddha Padumuttara also taught the Chronicles of the Buddhas in the midst of his relatives while walking on the jewel-walk in the sky. At that time, five million Devas and humans attained the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna.

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

1. The meetings (sannipāta) of Padumuttara's disciples took place three times. In the first meeting of 1,000 billion monastics on the full moon day of the month of February (Māgha), the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha) in the garden nearby, also named Mithilā.

2. At another time, after observing the Rains Retreat (Vassa) at Mount Vebhāra, the Buddha taught numerous people who had come to see him; on being called upon by the Buddha: "Come, O monks," 900 million became summoned monastics. At the meeting of these monastics, the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha).

3. Still at another time, Buddha Padumuttara, Lord of the Three Worlds, while travelling, in order to help multitudes of people free from the bonds of defilements, recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha) at the meeting of 80,000 monks, who as laymen had gone forth in renunciation from various villages, market-towns, districts and countries.

The Bodhisatta as a Governor

At that time, our Bodhisatta was Jaṭila, governor of a province, and he was very wealthy. He performed a great alms giving of food and clothing-material to the Saṅgha, with the Buddha at its head. At the end of the discourse, which was delivered in appreciation of the alms giving, the Buddha predicted of the governor: “A 100,000 aeons from now this man will certainly become a Buddha, named Gotama.” On hearing the Buddha’s prophecy, the Bodhisatta was extremely happy and determined to fulfil the ten perfections more energetically. [154]

Unusual Features of Buddha Padumuttara’s Dispensation

When Buddha Padumuttara appeared, the opposing heretics who were holding wrong views were unhappy, distressed, powerless and started fading away. They received no respect, no generosity and the like, even from a few people. In fact, they were driven out of the country. Then the heretics met together and approached the Buddha with these words: “Most energetic, heroic, venerable sir, may you be our refuge.”

The compassionate Buddha Padumuttara established the heretics, who had come to him, in the three refuges together with the observance of the five precepts. In this way the Dispensation of Buddha Padumuttara was free of heretics who were holding wrong views. It was indeed marvellous, with Arahats who were accomplished in the five kinds of mastery, who were not affected by the vicissitudes of the world, and who had the virtues of morality, concentration, wisdom, and forbearance.

Particulars of Buddha Padumuttara

Buddha Padumuttara’s birthplace was Hamsavatī city.

His father was King Ānanda and his mother was Queen Sujātā.

He reigned for 10,000 years.

His three palaces were Naravāhana, Yasavāhana and Vasavatti.

His chief consort was Vasudattā, who was attended by 43,000 maids of honour.

The number of the maids is given as 120,000 in the section on “royal household life” but here it is mentioned as 43,000. The two numbers therefore seems inconsistent. It should be noted, however, that the former was the total number of maids serving the princess and the latter was the number of maids in each batch that waited upon the princess at any given time.

His son was Prince Uttara.

The vehicle during his renunciation, after seeing the four omens, was a palace.

He practised the austerities for seven days.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Devala and Ven. Sujāta.

His attendant was Ven. Sumana.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Amitā and Ven. Asamā.

His Bodhi tree was a Salala tree.

His noble male lay attendants were the wealthy men, Vitiṅṅa and Tissa.

His noble female attendants were Hatthā and Vicittā.

Buddha Padumuttara's height was 58 cubits.

Endowed with 32 marks of a Great Man, he was like a column of gold erected as an object of worship.

The radiance emitting from the Buddha's body cannot be hindered by gates, doors, walls, trees, high and huge earthen hills, rocky mountains and the like. In fact, the radiance shone forth within the surrounding area of twelve leagues.

The lifespan during Buddha Padumuttara's time was 100,000 years. He lived for 80,000 years, four-fifths of the lifespan and rescued many beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, from the currents of Samsāra and placed them on the shores of Nibbāna.

Having eradicated all kinds of doubt in beings whom he conveyed to Nibbāna, Buddha Padumuttara with his monastic disciples, attained the end of his existence just as a great mass of fire became extinct after burning brightly!

In this way, Buddha Padumuttara, conqueror of the five kinds of death (māra), attained Parinibbāna in [155] Nanda Park. In the Park, the shrine dedicated to him was twelve leagues in height.

11. The Chronicle of Buddha Sumedha

After the lapse of the aeon in which Buddha Padumuttara appeared, there passed 70,000 empty aeons (suñña-kappas), which were devoid of Buddhas. In one aeon, 30,000 aeons before the present one, there appeared two Buddhas (maṇḍa-kappa), namely Sumedha and Sujāta.

Of these two Buddhas, Buddha Sumedha, as a Bodhisatta, on complete fulfilment of the perfections was reborn in Tusita which was a common practice of all the Bodhisattas. Having accepted the request made by Devas and Brahmas to become a Buddha, he descended to the human world to be conceived in the womb of Sudattā, Queen of King Sudatta. When ten months had passed, the Bodhisatta was born in Sudassana royal gardens.

Early Life

When he came of age, Prince Sumedha lived in three palaces, namely, Sucanda, Kañcana and Sirivaḍḍhana. Entertained and served by his chief consort Sumanā and her 48,000 maids of honour, he thus enjoyed a divine-like royal household life for 9,000 years.

While he was thus living a royal household life, Princess Sumanā gave birth to a son, named Punabbasu. Having seen the four omens, he renounced the world riding an elephant and became a recluse. Joining him in renunciation were one billion men who also became recluses.

Awakening

Bodhisatta Sumedha observed the austerities with the one billion recluses for fifteen days, or for eight months according to the Sinhalese version. On the day of his Awakening, the full moon day of May (Vesākha), he ate the milk rice offered by Nakulā, daughter of a wealthy man of Nakula village, and spent the daytime in the local Sāla grove. In the evening, leaving his companions, he went alone to the Bodhi tree. On the way, he accepted eight handfuls of grass from a naked ascetic named Sirivaḍḍha. As soon as he spread the grass under the Asoka Mahā Bodhi tree, there appeared the unconquered seat of 57 cubits. Sitting cross-legged on the seat, the Bodhisatta mustered his energy at four levels, dispelled Māra's forces and attained the state of a Buddha, omniscient, and Perfectly Self-Awakened One, Lord of the Three Worlds.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. Having become a Buddha, Buddha Sumedha stayed near the Mahā Bodhi for seven weeks. Agreeing to the entreaty made by a Brahma, he saw his younger half-brothers, princes Saraṇa and Sabbakāma, his future chief disciples, and also the one billion recluses who were his companions in renunciation. He then, by his psychic power, immediately appeared at Sudassana royal gardens near the city of Sudassana.

On seeing the Buddha from a distance, the one billion recluses, with faithful heart, welcomed him: taking his bowl and robe, preparing his seat, paying respects and taking their seats around him. Then the Buddha sent the gardener for his brothers, princes Saraṇa and Sabbakāma. He then taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse to all, including Devas and humans, who had gone to listen to him. At that time, 1,000 billion Devas and humans attained the paths and fruitions.

2. At another time, having engaged in the attainment of great [156] compassion (mahā-karuṇā-samāpatti) in the morning and surveyed the beings who were ripe for liberation, Buddha Sumedha saw a Yakkha, named Kumbhakaṇṇa, a man-eating demon who revealed his terrible appearance at an entrance of a thick forest, thus making the forest tracks deserted. Buddha Sumedha went alone to the Yakkha's dwelling and, after entering it, sat on his prepared seat.

Then Kumbhakaṇṇa became furious, like an extremely poisonous snake struck with a stick. In order to threaten the Buddha, he assumed a horrible shape with his head like a mountain, his eyes opened wide and bright like sunrays; his long and broad fangs like ploughshares; his dark blue belly skin, flabby and pendulous; his nose concave in the middle, convex at its base and tip and terrifyingly ugly; his mouth wide and reddened like a mountain cavity; his hair thick, tawny and rough. With this most terrible appearance, he stood before the Buddha, breathing forth smoke and flames towards him and showered on him rains of rocks, mountains, fire, hot water, hot mud, hot ashes, weapons, burning coal, and hot sand. Despite this rain of the ninefold weapons, the Yakkha was unable to ruffle even a single hair on the Buddha's body. Thinking to himself: "I will kill him by asking a question," he put forward a question, like the Yakkha Ālavaka, to the Buddha. By successfully answering the Yakkha's question, Buddha Sumedha tamed him.

Yakkha Āḷavaka, was the best known Yakkha of Buddha Gotama's lifetime, and was King of Āḷavi. Once while he was away, the Buddha went to his palace and taught to his women-folk. Hearing of the Buddha's intrusion, the furious Āḷavaka hurried home and tried to drive the Buddha out of his residence, but in vain. On the contrary, it was the Buddha who succeeded in softening the Yakkha's anger. Yet the Yakkha asked some questions just to fatigue the Buddha, who answered them to Āḷavaka's satisfaction and thereby making him a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna).

On the second day, which happened to be the day the ruler of a nearby country was supposed to sacrifice his son to the Yakkha, the countrymen brought cart-loads of food and offered it, together with the prince, to the Yakkha. Instead, the Yakkha offered the prince, whom he was to devour, to the Buddha. Having heard the good news, the people, who were waiting at the entrance of the forest, approached the Buddha. In that assembly, Buddha Sumedha taught to the Yakkha a suitable discourse and helped 900 billion beings attain the knowledge of the path.

3. Still on another occasion, Buddha Sumedha taught the four noble truths to Devas and humans in the garden of Sirinanda, near the city of Upakāri. At that time, 800 billion of them attained the path and fruition.

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

1. There were three meetings (sannipāta) of Buddha Sumedha's disciples. In the first meeting, the Buddha was in the city of Sudassana. Then one billion Arahats happened to have congregated.

2. At another time, the Buddha kept the Rains Retreat (Vassa) at Mount Deva. When the Cloth (Kaṭhina) ceremony was held after the Rains Retreat, 900 million monks assembled.

3. Still at another time, the Buddha set out on a journey. Then the 800 million monks, who followed the Buddha on his journey, met.

Bodhisatta Uttara

At that time, our Bodhisatta was a young man named Uttara, whose name means one who excels all others in virtues. He gave the Saṅgha, headed by the Buddha, his wealth of 800 [157] million, which was accumulated in his residence. After hearing the Buddha's discourse, he was established in the three refuges and became a monk in the Dispensation of the Buddha. When the discourse given in appreciation of the offering was over, the Buddha uttered the prophecy: “This young man, Uttara, will indeed become a Buddha, named Gotama, in the future.” Hearing the Buddha’s prophecy, the Bodhisatta was overjoyed and resolved to fulfil the perfections even more.

Uttara became a monk and shouldered his religious responsibilities and became accomplished in studying the Buddha’s ninefold teaching of discourses and discipline (sutta-vinaya), thus promoting the splendour of his Dispensation.

Mindfully cultivating and developing his virtues as a monk in the three postures of sitting, standing and walking but entirely without lying down, he reached not only the eight attainments (samāpatti) but the apex of the super knowledges (abhiññā) and on his passing, he was reborn in the Brahma abode.

Particulars of Buddha Sumedha

Buddha Sumedha’s birthplace was Sudassana.

His father was King Sudatta and his mother was Queen Sudattā.

He reigned for 9,000 years.

His three palaces were Sucanda, Kañcana and Sirivaḍḍhana.

His chief consort was Sumanā, who had 48,000 maids of honour.<sup>69</sup>

His son was Prince Punabbasu.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Saraṇa and Ven. Sabbakāma.

His attendant was Ven. Sāgara.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Rāmā and Ven. Surāmā.

His Bodhi tree was an Asoka tree (Mahā-nīpa).

His noble male lay supporters were the wealthy persons, Uruvela and Yasava.

His noble female supporters were Yasodharā and Sirimā.

His height was 88 cubits.

<sup>69</sup> [Text: 84,000, but again this didn’t agree with BvA, or what was stated earlier, so I have changed it.]

The radiance emanating from his body spread over all directions, like the moon lighting up the sky and its stars. Or, the Buddha's body radiance spread everywhere in the area of one league, like the Universal Monarch's ruby shining all around to the extent of a league.

The lifespan during Buddha Sumedha's time was 90,000 years. He lived throughout, for four-fifths of this lifespan, and rescued beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, from the flood-waters of Samsāra and placed them on the shore of Nibbāna.

Buddha Sumedha's Dispensation witnessed numerous noble Arahats everywhere in his Dispensation, who were endowed with the threefold knowledge and the sixfold super knowledges, who were possessed of energy, who were undisturbed by the vicissitudes of the world, who had the ability to view things, pleasant or unpleasant, in one and the same manner.

These noble Arahats of incomparable fame were all liberated from defilements and free of the four bases of existence (upadhi). The Arahats, who were the Buddha's disciples, having large retinues, shed the light of their wisdom and attained the peaceful Nibbāna.

In this way Buddha Sumedha, conqueror of the five kinds of death (māra), attained Parinibbāna in the gardens of Medha. His relics dispersed in accordance with his resolve and existed all over Jambudīpa, being honoured by beings such as humans, Devas and Brahmas. [158]

12. The Chronicle of Buddha Sujāta

After Buddha Sumedha had attained Parinibbāna, the lifespan of human beings gradually decreased from 90,000 years to ten and then it again increased to immeasurables. When the lifespan reached 90,000 years on its next decrease, Bodhisatta Sujātā was reborn in Tusita on complete fulfilment of the perfections which was a practice common to all Bodhisattas. Having agreed to the entreaties of Devas and Brahmas to become a Buddha, he descended to the human world to be conceived in the womb of Queen Pabhavatī of King Uggata, in the city of Sumaṅgala. Ten months thereafter the Bodhisatta was born.

On his naming day, wise men who were to give him a name, named him Sujāta, on account of the fact that, at the time of his birth, all the people in Jambudīpa experienced both physical and mental happiness.

Early Life

When he came of age, he lived in three palaces: Sirī, Upasirī and Nanda, and entertained and was served by Princess Sirinandā and her 23,000 maids of honour for 9,000 years.

When the Bodhisatta had seen the four omens and when Princess Sirinandā had given birth to a son, named Upasena, he went forth in renunciation riding the state steed, named Haṃsavaha and became a recluse. 10 million men were inspired and became recluses themselves.

Awakening

Bodhisatta Sujātā practised the austerities with that 10 million of recluses for nine months. On the full moon day of May (Vesākha), the day of his Awakening, he ate the milk rice offered by the daughter of the wealthy man Sirinandana of the city of Sirinandana and spent the daytime in the local Sāla grove. In the evening, he proceeded alone to the Mahā Bodhi tree. On the way, he accepted eight handfuls of grass offered by the naked ascetic Sunanda. As soon as he spread the grass at the foot of the Great Bamboo Bodhi tree, there appeared the unconquered seat, which measured 33 cubits, on which he sat cross-legged and mustered his energy at four levels and dispelled Māra and his army and attained omniscience, Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddhahood and the state of Lord of the Three Worlds.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. Having become a Buddha and stayed in the neighbourhood of the Mahā Bodhi tree for 49 days, the Buddha accepted a Brahma's request for his teaching and he contemplated who he should teach first. He saw his younger half-brother, Prince Sudassana, and his Brahmin chaplain's son, Sudeva the youth, who were endowed with the merits of their past deeds, which would lead to the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna. Resolving to teach them first, by his psychic power, he immediately appeared in Sumaṅgala Park, near Sumaṅgala city and then he sent the gardener for Prince Sudassana and Sudeva the youth. To the audience of Devas and humans, the Buddha taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, which was also taught by previous Buddhas. At that time, 800 million Devas and humans attained the paths and fruitions.

2. At another time, Buddha Sujāta defeated the heretics by displaying the twin miracle of water and fire, near the Sāla tree close to the gate of the Sudassana Royal Park. And while observing the Rains Retreat (Vassa) sitting on the emerald stone slab, which was placed at the foot of the Pāricchattaka tree in Sakka's abode of Tāvātimsa, the Buddha taught the Abhidhamma. On that occasion of the Abhidhamma teaching, 3,700,000 Devas [159] and Brahmās attained the paths and fruitions.

3. Still at another time, Buddha Sujāta paid a visit to his father in the city of Sumaṅgala and taught him the Dhamma. By the end of his teaching, six million Devas and humans attained the paths and fruitions.

Three Occasions of The Disciple's Meeting

1. There were three meetings of Buddha Sujāta's disciples; the first was at Sudhamma, near Sudhammatvā city, where the Buddha taught people who visited him and admitted six million men into the Saṅgha by calling upon them: "Come, monastics," and recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha) to them.

2. At another time, when Buddha Sujāta descended from Tāvātimsa, a meeting of five million monks took place.

3. Still at another time, when the chief disciple, Ven. Sudassana, who sat on the right side of the Buddha, took 400,000 men to the Buddha. These men had decided among themselves to go forth on hearing that the Buddha's younger brother, Prince Sudassana had become a monk in the presence of the Buddha and had become an Arahāt, as they were inspired. The Buddha gave them instructions, made them summoned monastics and recited the Advisory Rules at the meeting with four features.

The Bodhisatta as a Universal Monarch

At that time our Bodhisatta was a Universal Monarch. Hearing that there had appeared a Buddha in the world, he approached the Buddha, listened to the Dhamma discourses, offered his kingship with his seven treasures to the Saṅgha with the Buddha as its head and then he became a monk. The inhabitants of Jambudīpa made themselves monastery attendants, collected taxes from his domain and constantly supplied the Buddha and his Saṅgha with the four requisites of robes, food, shelter and medicines. Then Buddha Sujāta made a prophecy: "He will indeed become a Buddha in future." Having received the Buddha's prophecy, the Bodhisatta rejoiced and was determined to fulfil the ten perfections even more energetically.

He joined the Saṅgha of Buddha Sujāta and became accomplished in the studies of the Buddha's teachings which are of nine divisions together with the discourses and discipline (sutta-vinaya). Thus he contributed to the beauty of the Buddha's Dispensation.

Having cultivated the practice of meditation on the divine abodes (Brahma-vihāra-bhāvanā), leading to rebirth in the Brahma abode, without absent-mindedness in the three postures of sitting, standing and walking, but not in the posture of lying down, he reached the apex, not only of the eight attainments but also of the five super knowledges. On his death, he was reborn in the world of the Brahmas.

Particulars of Buddha Sujāta

Buddha Sujāta's birthplace was Sumaṅgala city.

His father was King Uggata and his mother was Queen Pabhāvatī.

He reigned for 9,000 years.

His three palaces were Sirī, Upasirī and Nanda.

His chief consort was Sirinandā, who had 23,000 maids of honour.

His son was Prince Upasena. [160]

He renounced the world riding a horse, after seeing the four omens.

He practised the austerities for nine months.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Sudassana and Ven. Sudeva.

His attendant was Ven. Nārada.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Nāgā and Ven. Nāgasamālā.

His Bodhi tree was the Great Bamboo (Mahā-veḷu).

The bamboo plant had a massive trunk, its leaves were so luxuriant that there was no space to let the sunlight through. It was pleasant to look at, straight and big and thus attractive. It grew from one stem and from that one stem came out branches, which were very beautiful, like the feathers of a peacock's tail being well tied together. The bamboo plant had absolutely no thorns. Its branches spread out in the four directions and were not so sparse, thus providing a delightful, cool and dense shade.

His noble male lay-attendants were the wealthy men, Sudatta and Citta.

His noble female lay attendants were Subhaddā and Padumā.

Buddha Sujāta's height was 50 cubits. He was endowed with all the good physical qualities.

Buddha Sujāta's physical radiance, resembling those of past incomparable Buddhas, emanated from various parts of his body towards all directions as much as he desired. They could not be likened to anything as they were beyond all comparisons.

The lifespan, during the time of Buddha Sujāta, was 90,000 years, and living for four-fifths of this lifespan, he saved beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, from the currents of Saṃsāra and placed them on the shores of Nibbāna.

Just as the rising waves look wonderful in the ocean, like the stars and planets twinkling and shining look marvellous in the sky, even so Buddha Sujāta's Dispensation shone forth with Arahats.

Buddha Sujāta, who was to be likened to the past peerless Buddhas, and his attributes, which were equal to those of the peerless Buddhas, have all vanished. Unsubstantial and futile indeed are all conditioned things!

In this way, Buddha Sujāta, conqueror of the five kinds of death (māra), attained Parinibbāna in Sīlārāma Park. In that very Park the shrine dedicated to him was three miles high.

13. The Chronicle of Buddha Piyadassī

When the aeon in which Buddha Sujāta appeared had come to an end and 1,800 aeons had elapsed, in a certain noble (vara) aeon there appeared three Buddhas: Piyadassī, Atthadassī and Dhammadassī.

The story of Piyadassī, the first of these three, is as follows: On completion of his fulfilment of the perfections, Bodhisatta Piyadassī was reborn in Tusita which was a practice common to all Bodhisattas. Having agreed to the entreaties of Devas and Brahmas to become a Buddha, he descended to the human world to be conceived in the womb of Queen Candā, Queen of King Sudatta, in the city of Sudhaññavatī. When ten months had elapsed, the Bodhisatta was born in the garden, named Varuṇa. The Bodhisatta was given the name of Piyadassī as delightful miracles were manifest to multitudes of people on his naming day.

Early Life

When the Bodhisatta came of age, he lived in three palaces: Sunimmala, Vimala and Giriguhā. Being entertained and served by Princess Vimalā and her 33,000 maids of honour for 9,000 years, he enjoyed a divine-like royal household life.

After seeing the four omens, and after Princess Vimalā had given birth to a son, named Kañcanaveḷa, he went forth in a chariot drawn by thoroughbred steeds. 10 million men were inspired and became recluses themselves.

Awakening

With that 10 million of recluses, Bodhisatta Piyadassī practised the austerities for six months. On the full moon day of May (Vesākha), the day of his Awakening, he partook of the milk rice offered by the daughter of Brahmin Vasabha, a resident of the Brahmin village of Varuṇa and spent the daytime in the local Sāla grove. He went alone to the Mahā Bodhi tree in the evening. On the way, he accepted eight handfuls of grass offered by Sujāta the Ājīvaka. As soon as he spread the grass under the Kakudha Bodhi tree, there appeared the unconquered seat, which was 53 cubits. Sitting cross-legged on it, and mustering his energy at four levels, he drove away Māra's forces and attained omniscience, Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddhahood and the state of the Lord of the Three Worlds.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. After his Awakening, Buddha Piyadassī stayed in the neighbourhood of the Mahā Bodhi tree for 49 days, just as previous Buddhas did. He discerned that the 10 million recluses, who had renounced the world with him, were endowed with the merits of their past deeds which lead to the attainment of the paths and fruitions. He then, by psychic power, immediately appeared in the royal garden, which was named after the nearby city of Usabhavatī. Being surrounded by the 10 million of recluses, he taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, which was also taught by previous Buddhas, to Devas and Brahmas who had gathered there to listen to him.

2. The Buddha's second teaching took place on the mountain of Sudassana, near Usabhavatī city. Sudassana, the Yakkha King of the mountain, was then holding to a wrong view. People living in Jambudīpa annually brought food costing 100,000 pieces of money to offer to him, who, sitting side by side with the human king of Usabhavatī, was honoured by the whole continent as a god.

Things offered to gods or kings are called bali in Pāḷi; offering bali to gods is said to be “feeding bali to gods”; giving it to kings is known as “paying taxes.”

At that time, thinking that he would remove Sudassana's wrong view, Buddha Piyadassī went to his mansion, while he was away at a meeting of Yakkhas. He sat on Sudassana's splendid couch and stayed there emitting his radiance of six colours, like the sun appearing at the top of Mount Yugandhara in the month of November (Kattikā), in autumn. Sudassana's retinue of Yakkhas, surrounding him, honoured the Buddha with flowers, scents, unguents, etc.

On his return from the Yakkhas' meeting, Sudassana saw the radiance of six colours coming out from his mansion, and thought to himself: “Never have I seen before such splendour of diverse brilliant colours. Who could be the person occupying my place? Is it a human being? Or, is it a divine being?” On surveying, he saw the Buddha with a network of radiance of six colours like the autumnal sun rising from Mount Yugandhara. “This shaven-headed monk is sitting on my luxurious bed and is surrounded by members of my retinue,” said Sudassana to himself, with his heart tormented by anger. “Well, I shall display my physical [162] might to this monk.” So thinking, he turned the whole mountain into a mass of blazing flames.

Having done so, he inspected it, wondering “whether the shaven-headed monk has become ashes in the flames,” but he saw the Buddha with a serene face and a glorious body emitting brilliant lights because of the network of diverse radiance. “This monk can withstand even the burning fire,” he thought. “Well, I will drown him in a huge flood of water.” He then caused an immense mass of water to rush into the mansion at high speed. Though the Buddha remained in the mansion flooded with water, not even a single thread of his robe nor a single hair of his body got wet.

After that the Yakkha King Sudassana contemplated another method by which he hoped the Buddha would be suffocated and killed. He brought the mass of water close to the Buddha, who appeared glorious in the greenish blue waters with the network of radiance like the bright moon on the full moon night of November (Kattikā) and sitting surrounded by Sudassana's courtiers. Unable to control his anger and thinking: "I shall put the great monk to death by all means," he caused a rain of nine kinds of weapons to fall on the Buddha. Because of the Buddha's great physic power, all these weapons turned into various beautiful and fragrant clusters and garlands of flowers and fell at his feet.

Seeing that miraculous phenomenon, Sudassana became much more resentful and violent instead of getting awed with faith. He caught hold of the Buddha by the legs with his two hands and lifted him up. Then passing over the great ocean, he rushed to the mountain ranges that mark the end of the Cakkavāḷa, for he wanted to rid his abode of the Buddha.

"How is he? Is he dead or alive?" Thinking thus, he looked at the Buddha and, as though in a dream, saw that he remained seated in the mansion. It then occurred to him thus: "Ah, this great monk is so powerful, I was not able to drag him out of my place. If somebody comes to know of what I am doing now, it will be a disgrace to me. Therefore, before anyone sees, I shall go away, abandoning both the monk and the mansion."

At that moment, the Buddha, knowing Sudassana's thoughts, resolved so that Devas and humans could see him holding his legs. In accordance with this resolve, Sudassana was unable to leave his abode as he had planned but remained there holding the Buddha's legs with both of his hands.

That was the day when 101 kings of the whole of Jambudīpa gathered together to honour the Yakkha King with offerings (bali). The 101 kings saw Sudassana holding the Buddha's legs and marvelled at what they saw, exclaiming: "Our King of Yakkhas is massaging the legs of the king of recluses! Oh, Buddhas should be indeed marvelled at with a snapping of the fingers.<sup>70</sup> Oh, their attributes are indeed wonderful!" With their hearts inclined towards the Buddha they paid homage to the Buddha with their clasped hands placed on their heads.

At that gathering, Buddha Piyadassī gave Dhamma instructions to the audience with Sudassana at its head. Then 900 billion Devas and humans became Arahats.

<sup>70</sup> With the snapping of the fingers: equivalent to an expression of praise or approval with clapping of the hands.

3. At another time, in the city of Kumuda, which was nine leagues in extent, its area being nine leagues, the wicked monk Soṇa, opponent of Buddha Piyadassī and the counterpart of Devadatta in the lifetime of our Buddha Gotama, after consulting with the king's son, Prince Mahā Paduma, incited him to kill his father. After various attempts to have Buddha Piyadassī killed proved futile, he enticed the driver of the royal elephant, Doṇamukha by name, to whom he gave instructions, saying: “When Buddha Piyadassī enters the city on alms round, kill him by driving Doṇamukha towards him.”

Since the elephant-driver was not so intelligent to judge what was beneficial and what was not, he thought thus: “This monk Soṇa is an intimate friend of the king. If he does not [163] like me, I could be dismissed from service.” So he agreed to do so. On the next day, he managed to know the time when the Buddha would enter the city for alms food. Then he went to Doṇamukha, who was in a state of frenzy and made him more intoxicated and then sent him to kill the Buddha.

As soon as he was let out, Doṇamukha crushed elephants, horses, buffaloes, bulls, men and women whom he encountered on the way, destroyed all buildings that were in his way, and like a cannibal-demon, he devoured all the flesh of its prey in the noisy company of eagles, kites, crows and vultures. And finally, as soon as he saw the Buddha from a distance, he rushed towards him at high speed.

The hearts of the citizens, almost burst open with fear and anxiety, took to house-tops, walls, stone parapets, brick parapets, trees, etc., and on seeing the elephant, who was rushing towards the Buddha, they called out, and some of them even tried to stop the elephant in various ways. Seeing Doṇamukha, the king of elephants rushing towards him, the “Elephant of a Buddha,” with his tranquil heart, diffusing intense compassion, permeated it with sublime loving-kindness.

Noble ones such as Buddhas and Arahats are sometimes figuratively likened to such noble animals as elephants, lions, bulls, etc. in Buddhist literature. For instance in the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada), there is a chapter named the Chapter about the Elephant (Nāga-vagga), the verses of which described the qualities of an elephant (nāga). That may be compared to those of a sage in the Questions of King Milinda (Milinda-pāñha), where the epithet Buddha-nāga is conspicuously mentioned.

Then Doṇamukha, his heart made tender with the permeation of the Buddha's loving-kindness, realized his wrong-doing and became so ashamed that he could not stand in a natural manner before the Buddha but lay down with his head at the Buddha's feet as though he was about to sink into the earth.

Watching the event, the citizens were filled with joy and shouted in acclaim, like the roar of a lion. They also honoured the elephant in various ways, with highly fragrant flowers, sandalwood powder, ornaments and so on. They even threw up their turbans and garments, and celestial drums were beaten in the sky.

Nālāgiri, the elephant during the time of our Buddha Gotama, was similarly tamed, and when it was respectfully lying before the Buddha, people threw on it various ornaments, which covered the whole of its body. From that moment onwards, Nālāgiri had been called Dhanapāla, Keeper of Wealth. Thereupon, it walked backwards with respect and when it had entered its shed, it is said in the Short Birth Story about the Golden Goose (Cūḷa-haṃsa-jātaka, Ja 502) commentary, the adornments went back to their respective original owners owing to the Buddha's resolve. In the same way, when the people threw theirs on Doṇamukha, it should be taken that they were given as a reward to the elephant.

Then the Buddha stroked the head of the elephant who was lying prostrate at his feet and exhorted it with the words that suited his mentally. The elephant that has thus been exhorted regained his conscience and became so tame that he looked like a monk-disciple of the Buddha, disciplined in Vinaya. Having exhorted Doṇamukha the way Buddha Gotama exhorted Dhanapāla, Buddha Piyadassī give a discourse in the midst of the people who had gathered there. At that time, 800 billion people attained the paths and fruitions.

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

1. There were three meetings (sannipāta) of the disciples of the Buddha. On the first occasion, when Buddha Piyadassī paid a visit to the city of Sumaṅgala, the two friends, Prince Pālita and the youth, Sabbadassī, son of the king's Brahmin chaplain, who were his future chief disciples, hearing of the Buddha's visit to their city, welcomed him together with their 1,000 billion retinue. They listened to his discourse and gave alms for seven days. On the seventh day, at the end of the Buddha's discourse which was given in appreciation of the meal, both of them, together with their 1,000 billion [164] followers, became monks and became Arahats. In the midst of these monks, the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha).

2. At another time, at the gathering where the Yakkha Sudassana was tamed, 900 million men put on the robe and became Arahats. Being surrounded by these 900 million monks, the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules.

3. Still at another time, on the occasion of the taming of the elephant Doṇamukha, 800 million men renounced the world and became Arahats. In the midst of these 800 million Arahats, the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules.

The Bodhisatta as Brahmin Kassapa

At that time, our Bodhisatta was a Brahmin youth, Kassapa by name, who was accomplished in the three Vedas. Having listened to the Buddha's teaching, he cultivated great faith and had a huge monastery built at the cost of 1,000 billion. He then offered it to the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha. Rejoicing in his act of merit, he took refuge in the Three Treasures and kept the five precepts steadfastly, lest he should become heedless.

Remaining in the midst of the Saṅgha, Buddha Piyadassī made the prophecy concerning the youth, Kassapa: "1,800 aeons from the present one, this youth, Kassapa, will become a Buddha indeed."

Having heard Buddha Piyadassī's prophecy, the Bodhisatta was extremely happy and determined to fulfil the perfections even more energetically.

Particulars of Buddha Piyadassī

Buddha Piyadassī's birthplace was Sudhaññavatī city.

His father was King Sudatta and his mother was Queen Candā.

He reigned for 9,000 years.

His three palaces were Sunimmala, Vimāla and Giriguhā.

His chief consort was Vimalā, who had 33,000 maids of honour.

His son was Prince Kañcaveḷa.

The vehicle he used for his going forth, after seeing the four omens, was a chariot drawn by thoroughbred horses.

He practised the austerities for six months.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Pālita and Ven. Sabbadassī.

His attendant was Ven. Sobhita.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Sujātā and Ven. Dhammadinnā.

His Bodhi tree was a Kakudha.

His noble male lay-supporters were the wealthy men, Sandhaka and Dhammaka.

His noble female lay-disciples were Visākhā and Dhammadinnā.

Buddha Piyadassī had innumerable followers and good reputation. He was also endowed with the 32 marks of a Great Man. His height was 80 cubits, like a great Sāla tree in full bloom.

There was no torchlight, moonlight or sunlight that could vie with the physical light of the peerless Buddha Piyadassī which surpassed them all.

The lifespan during the time of Buddha Piyadassī was 90,000 years. Living for four-fifths of this lifespan, he rescued many beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, from the currents of Saṃsāra and put them on the shores of Nibbāna.

Buddha Piyadassī, who was to be likened with past peerless Buddhas, and the pair of his peerless chief disciples, etc., have all vanished. Unsubstantial and futile indeed are all conditioned things!

In this way, the noble monk, Buddha Piyadassī attained Parinibbāna in the park of fig trees. In that park, the shrine erected and dedicated to Buddha Piyadassī, as has been stated before for other Buddhas, was three leagues high.

14. The Chronicle of Buddha Atthadassī

After Buddha Piyadassī had attained Parinibbāna, in that aeon<sup>71</sup> the lifespan of human beings decreased gradually from 90,000 years to ten years, and then it again increased to immeasurables. When the lifespan reached 100,000 years on its next decrease, Bodhisatta Atthadassī was reborn in Tusita on complete fulfilment of the perfections which was a practice common to all Bodhisattas. Having agreed to the entreaties of Devas and Brahmas to become a Buddha, he descended to the human world to be conceived in the womb of Queen Sudassanā, consort of King Sāgara, in the city of Sobhana. Ten months thereafter the <sup>71</sup> Which should be called Maṇḍa-kappa because it was full of pleasing, spotless, special attributes though it was actually a Vara-kappa as three Buddhas appeared during that period.

Bodhisatta was born in Sucindhana Park. On his naming day, he was named Atthadassī because owners of treasures, which were hidden underground, recovered them, after having discovered the forgotten sites where their treasures had long been kept, one generation after another.

Early Life

When Bodhisatta Atthadassī came of age, he lived in three palaces: Amaragiri, Sugiri and Girivāhana. Being entertained and served by 33,000 female attendants, headed by Princess Visākhā, he thus enjoyed a divine-like royal household life for 10,000 years.

When the Bodhisatta had seen the four omens and when Queen Visākhā had given birth to a son, named Sela, he went forth riding a horse, named Sudassana. 90 million men joined him and became recluses themselves.

Awakening

With these 90 million recluses, Bodhisatta Atthadassī practised the austerities for eight months. On the full moon day of May (Vesākha), the day of his Awakening, people brought delicious milk rice to offer it to the female Nāga, Sucindharā by name. But she did not eat it. Having revealed herself to the people, she instead offered it in a golden bowl to the Bodhisatta. The Bodhisatta partook of it, and spent the daytime in the local grove of Sāla trees. In the evening, he proceeded alone to the Mahā Bodhi tree. On the way, he accepted eight handfuls of grass offered by the Nāga King, Mahā Ruci. As soon as he spread the grass at the foot of the Campak Bodhi tree, there appeared the unconquered seat, measuring 53 cubits. Sitting cross-legged on this seat, he mustered his energy at four levels, dispelled Māra's forces and attained omniscience, Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddhahood and the state of Lord of the Three Worlds.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. After becoming a Buddha, the Buddha stayed in the neighbourhood of the Mahā Bodhi tree for 49 days. Accepting a Brahma's request for his teaching, he contemplated who he should teach first. Then he saw the 90 million monks who had followed him in renunciation and who were endowed with past meritorious [166] deeds, which could lead to the paths and fruitions. And surveying their whereabouts, he saw them staying in Anoma Park, near the city of Anoma. He then, by his psychic power, immediately appeared in Anoma Park.

At that time, the 90 million monks saw, from a distance, Buddha Atthadassī approaching them. With faithful heart, they all performed their duties, as has been described in the previous chapters. They took their seats around the Buddha, who then taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, which was also taught by other Buddhas. By the end of the discourse, 1,000 billion beings attained the paths and fruitions.

2. At another time, Buddha Atthadassī travelled up to Tāvātimsa and taught the Abhidhamma to Devas and Brahmas. 100,000 Devas and Brahmas attained the paths and fruitions.

3. Still at another time, like our Buddha Gotama, who visited his father in the city of Kapilavatthu and narrated the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa), so did Buddha Atthadassī visit the city of Sobhana and taught the Dhamma to his relatives, headed by his father. At the time, 1,000 billion people attained the paths and fruitions.

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

1. There were three meetings of the Buddha's disciples. The first one took place at Sucandaka, where Prince Santa and the Brahmin chaplain's son, Upasanta who were his future chief disciples, seeing no essence in the three Vedas as well as in various creeds, assigned four intelligent men and some brave watchmen at the four gates of the four sides of the city with an instruction: "Come and inform us if you see or hear of any Awakened person, be he a recluse or a Brahmin."

When Buddha Atthadassī, lord of the three kinds of men, with his disciples, arrived at Sucandaka city, those on assignment went to the prince and the Brahmin chaplain's son and informed them of the Buddha's arrival. Being thus informed, with joyous hearts, they both hurriedly went outside the city with a retinue of 1,000 members and greeted, honoured and invited him into the city. Having done so, they performed a great incomparable alms giving (asadisa-mahā-dāna) for seven days to the Saṅgha with the Buddha at its head. On the seventh day, with all the citizens, they both listened to the Buddha's teaching. On that day, 98,000 people, on it being pronounced: "Come, O monks," became summoned monastics and became Arahats. In the midst of that assembly of monks, the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha).

2. At another time, when Buddha Atthadassī gave instructions to his own son, Ven. Sela, 88,000 people developed faith and asked the Buddha to become monks. The Buddha then pronounced: “Come, O monks,” and they all became summoned monastics and Arahats. In the midst of that assembly of monks, the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules.

3. Still at another time, on the full moon day of February (Māgha), when beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, assembled to listen to the Great Discourse on the Blessings (Mahā-maṅgala), taught by the Buddha, 78,000 humans became Arahats. In that assembly of monks, the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules. [167]

The Bodhisatta as Recluse Susīma

At that time our Bodhisatta was reborn as Susīma, in the city of Campaka. He was a wealthy Brahmin, considered and recognized by the whole world as a virtuous person. Having given away all his wealth to the poor, the helpless, the destitute, travellers and others, he went to the Himālayas and lived the life of an ascetic. After achieving the eight attainments and the five super knowledges, he became a noble ascetic with supernormal power. Teaching people the merit of wholesome deeds and the demerit of unwholesome deeds, he waited for the time when a Buddha would appear.

Later on, when Buddha Atthadassī appeared in the world and “showered the rain of discourses of immortality” in the midst of an audience, which was composed of the eight assemblies of people, Susīma the ascetic listened to the Buddha’s Dhamma. And he went up to the celestial abode, brought back such celestial flowers as the Mandārava, Paduma, Pāricchattaka, etc., from Tāvātimsa. Wishing to display his miraculous power, he made himself visible and caused a rain of flowers to fall in the four quarters, like a great rain that fell all over the four continents. He also created a pavilion of flowers decorated on all sides with flowers, had a pinnacled arch over the entrance with decorated columns and nets, etc., and adorned with flowers. He then honoured the Buddha with a huge umbrella of celestial Mandārava flowers. Buddha Atthadassī then made a prophecy concerning Susīma the ascetic: “This ascetic Susīma will definitely become a Buddha, Gotama by name, in the future when 1,800 aeons have elapsed.”

On hearing Buddha Atthadassī's prophecy, the Bodhisatta was extremely happy and firmly resolved to fulfil the ten perfections even more energetically, fearing that he would become heedless.

Particulars of Buddha Atthadassī

Buddha Atthadassī's birthplace was Sobhana city.

His father was King Sāgara and his mother was Queen Sudassanā.

He reigned for 10,000 years.

His three palaces were Amaragiri, Sugiri and Girivāhana.

His chief consort was Visākhā, who had 33,000 maids of honour.

His son was Prince Sela.

The vehicle he used in renunciation was a steed, Sudassana by name.

He practised the austerities for eight months.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Santa and Ven. Upasanta.

His attendant was Ven. Abhaya.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Dhammā and Ven. Sudhammā.

His Bodhi tree was a Campak.

His male noble supporters were the wealthy persons, Nakula and Nisabha.

His female supporters were Makilā and Sunandā.

The height of Buddha Atthadassī, who had as his equals only peerless Buddhas, was 80 cubits tall and he was majestic like a Sāla tree in full bloom or like the full moon, king of all the stars and planets.

Buddha Atthadassī's radiance of intense power emitting from his body, constantly radiated, glowing above and below in the ten quarters for a league.<sup>72</sup>

Excelling all beings, Buddha Atthadassī was endowed with five eyes and existed in the world for 80,000 years.

---

After shedding the peerless light of Dhamma in the world of Devas and humans, Buddha [168] Atthadassī attained Parinibbāna just like a fire becomes extinct on exhaustion of fuel.

In this way, Buddha Atthadassī, conqueror of the five kinds of death (māra), attained Parinibbāna in Anoma Park. His relics were dispersed according to his resolve and reached all over Jambudīpa and received veneration from beings such as humans, Devas and Brahmas.

15. The Chronicle of Buddha Dhammadassī

After Buddha Atthadassī had attained Parinibbāna in that aeon<sup>73</sup> the lifespan of human beings decreased gradually from 100,000 years to ten years and then it again increased to immeasurables. When the lifespan reached 100,000 years on its next decrease, Bodhisatta Dhammadassī was reborn in Tusita on complete fulfilment of the perfections which was a practice common to all Bodhisattas. Having accepted the requests made by Devas and Brahmas to become a Buddha, he descended to the human world to be conceived in the womb of Queen Sunandā, consort of King Saraṇa, in the city of Saraṇa. Ten months thereafter the Bodhisatta was born in Saraṇa Royal Park.

Since his birth, unrighteous rules and codes applied in lawsuits had all automatically disappeared from the law books, while righteous ones had remained. Therefore, when the prince was to be named, he was given the name of Dhammadassī by learned omen-reading men, and his relatives.

Early Life

When Bodhisatta Dhammadassī came of age, he lived in three palaces: Araja, Viraja and Sudassana. Being entertained and served by 43,000 female attendants headed by Princess Vicikoḷī, he thus enjoyed a divine-like royal household life for 8,000 years.

After he had seen the four omens and after his Princess Vicikoḷī had given birth to a son, named Puñṇavaḍḍhana, Bodhisatta Dhammadassī, gentle like a celestial being and experiencing a divine life, woke up at midnight. Sitting on his bed, he saw the various loathsome conditions of the female attendants who were asleep. With his mind greatly disturbed, he decided to renounce the world. No sooner had he decided than Sudassana Palace, which was occupied by him and his fourfold army, rose to the sky and travelled like a second sun, as if a flying celestial mansion, and descended near the Bimbijāla Mahā Bodhi tree.

The Bodhisatta then put on the lotus-ropes offered by a Brahma and getting off the palace, he stood not far from it. The palace then travelled through the sky again and landed on the ground encompassing the Bodhi tree. Female courtiers and their followers got down from the palace and stayed at a distance of half a mile. From among these people the male folk donned the yellow robes joining the Bodhisatta in renunciation. Those who did so numbered about 1,000 billion.

Awakening

After practising the austerities for seven days, Bodhisatta Dhammadassī ate the milk rice offered by Princess Vicikoḷī on the full moon day of May (Vesākha), the day of his Awakening, and spent the daytime in the local plum grove. In the evening, he went alone to the Mahā Bodhi tree. On the way, he accepted eight handfuls of grass from Sirivaḍḍha, the watchman of the barley-field. As soon as he spread the grass at the foot of the Bimbijāla Bodhi tree, there appeared the unconquered seat, measuring 53 cubits. Sitting cross-legged on that seat, he became a Buddha, in the same manner as previous Buddhas. [169]

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. After becoming a Buddha, the Buddha stayed in the neighbourhood of the Mahā Bodhi tree for 49 days. Having accepted a Brahma's request for his teaching, he contemplated who he should teach first. He saw the 1,000 billion monks, who had renounced the world along with him, who had done meritorious deeds in the past that would lead to the paths and fruitions. By his psychic power, he immediately appeared at the Deer Park called Isipatana, which was a place where flying ascetics, masters of mundane absorptions, normally alighted, and which was eighteen leagues from the Mahā Bodhi tree.

On seeing the Buddha from a distance, the 1,000 billion recluses welcomed him by performing various duties faithfully and finally taking their seats around him. Then the Buddha taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, which was also taught by previous Buddhas, to these recluses and all the Devas and humans who had come to listen to him. By the end of the discourse, 1,000 billion beings attained the paths and fruitions.

2. Once, thereafter, in the town of Tagara, King Sañjaya, having seen the disadvantages of sensual pleasures and the advantages of renunciation, became an ascetic. Following his example, 900 million men also became ascetics. All of them achieved the five super knowledges and the eight attainments. Seeing them endowed with meritorious deeds leading to the paths and fruitions, the Buddha appeared at Anaya's hermitage. He stood in the sky and taught a discourse that suited their inclinations and dispositions. Thus, the Buddha helped them attain the knowledge of the path known as the vision of the Dhamma (Dhamma-cakkhu).

3. At still another time, the Lord of the Devas, wishing to listen to a discourse, approached the Buddha with his retinue. When the Buddha taught them a discourse, 800 million of them attained the paths and fruitions.

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

1. There are three meetings (sannipāta) of Buddha Dhammadassī's disciples. The first meeting took place at Saraṇa city, where Buddha Dhammadassī caused his half-brothers, Prince Paduma and Prince Phussa, and their retinues to become monks and observe the Rains Retreat (Vassa) in that city. During the Rains Retreat and in the midst of one billion monks who had become Arahats, the Buddha performed the Invitation of the Pure (Visuddhi-pavāraṇā).

2. At another time, Buddha Dhammadassī taught Abhidhamma in Tāvatiṃsa and descended back to the human world. Then one billion monks assembled.

3. Still at another time, Buddha Dhammadassī explained the advantages of the thirteen ascetic practices (dhutaṅgas) and proclaimed Hārīta, a great disciple and Arahāt, to be the foremost among those who engaged in the ascetic practices. Then, at the meeting of 800 million monks, he recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha).

The Bodhisatta as Sakka

At that time, our Bodhisatta was Sakka, the Lord of the Devas. Being accompanied by Devas of two divine abodes, the Cātumahārājika and the Tāvatiṃsa, he visited the Buddha and honoured [170] him with celestial flowers, etc., and various sounds of celestial music. Then the Buddha made a prophetic declaration: “This Sakka will indeed become a Buddha, Gotama by name, in the future.”

Having heard Buddha Dhammadassī’s prophecy, Sakka the Bodhisatta, became extremely pleased and resolved to fulfil the perfections even more energetically.

Particulars of Buddha Dhammadassī

Buddha Dhammadassī’s birthplace was Saraṇa city.

His father was King Saraṇa and his mother was Queen Sunandā.

He reigned for 8,000 years.

His three palaces were Arāja, Virāja and Sudassana.

His chief consort was Vicikoḷī, who had 43,000 maids of honour.

His son was Puñṇavaḍḍhana.

The vehicle he used in renunciation, after seeing the four omens, was a palace.

He practised the austerities for seven days.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Paduma and Ven. Phussa.

His attendant was Ven. Sunetta.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Khemā and Ven. Sabbanāmā.

His Bodhi tree was a Bimbijāla.

His noble male lay supporters were the wealthy persons Subhadda and Kaṭṭissaha.

His noble female lay supporters were Sāḷiyā and Kāḷiyā.

Buddha Dhammadassī, who had as his equals only peerless Buddhas, was 80 cubits tall.

He was glorious with power in the 10,000 world-element. Buddha Dhammadassī was majestic like the Sāla tree in full bloom or like the lightning or the sun at midday that brightens the sky.

Buddha Dhammadassī, who was endowed with unparallel might and the five eyes, lived the whole lifespan of his time which was 100,000 years.

Having displayed his power and knowledge and purified his teaching so that it had no stain, the Buddha attained Parinibbāna with his Arahāt disciples and disappeared like the moon that vanishes after shining in the sky.

In this way, the greatly energetic Buddha Dhammadassī attained Parinibbāna in the Sāla Park, in the city of Sālavatī. A three-leagues high shrine was erected in the Park and dedicated to him.

16. The Chronicle of Buddha Siddhattha

After the aeon in which Buddha Dhammadassī appeared had come to an end, there elapsed, one after another, 1,706 aeons.<sup>74</sup> Then 94 aeons ago from now, there appeared the one and only Buddha of that aeon, Siddhattha by name.

At that time, 94 aeons ago, the lifespan of human beings decreased from immeasurables to 100,000 years. Bodhisatta Siddhattha, on complete fulfilment of the perfections, was reborn in Tusita, a practice common to all Bodhisattas. Having accepted the request made by Devas and Brahmas, he descended to the human world to be conceived in the womb of Queen Suphassā, chief consort of King Udena, in the city of Vebhāra. When ten months had elapsed, the Bodhisatta was born in Viriya Park.

On his naming day, learned readers of omens, and his relatives, named him Siddhattha [171] because, at the time of his birth, everybody's endeavours, big or small, were accomplished and desirable results achieved.

Early Life

When Bodhisatta Siddhattha came of age, he lived in three palaces: Kokā, Suppala and Kokanada. Being served and entertained by 48,000 female attendants headed by Princess Somanassā, he thus enjoyed a divine-like royal household life for 10,000 years.

When Bodhisatta Siddhattha had seen the four omens and when Princess Somanassā had given birth to a son, named Anupama, he went forth riding a golden palanquin on the full moon day of July (Āsāḷha) and became a recluse in Viriya Park. 1,000 billion men joined him and also became recluses.

<sup>74</sup> [There is something awry with the calculations here. It appears that this number should be 27,106 aeons, which would indeed add up. BvA though agrees with the translation in stating 1,706.]

Awakening

With the 1,000 billion recluses, Bodhisatta Siddhattha practised the austerities for ten months. On the full moon day of May (Vesākha), the day of his Awakening, he partook of milk rice offered by a Brahmin girl, named Sunettā, of Asādisa village and spent the daytime in the local Jujube grove. In the evening, he went alone to the Kaṇikāra Mahā Bodhi tree and accepted, on the way, eight handfuls of grass from Varuṇa, a watchman of the barley fields. As soon as he spread the grass under the Bodhi tree there appeared the unconquered seat, measuring 40 cubits. Sitting cross-legged on the seat, he became a Buddha, in the same manner as previous Buddhas.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teachings

1. After becoming a Buddha, Buddha Siddhattha stayed in the neighbourhood of the Mahā Bodhi tree for 49 days. Agreeing to the entreaties made by a Brahma, he contemplated who he should teach first. Then he discerned the 1,000 billion recluses who, with him, had renounced the world and who were endowed with the merits of their past deeds, which would lead them to the paths and fruitions. Thinking: "I shall teach them first," he contemplated as to their whereabouts and saw that they were still living in the Deer Park, which was eighteen leagues from the Mahā Bodhi tree. By his psychic power, he immediately appeared at the Deer Park.

The 1,000 billion recluses, seeing the Buddha approaching them, welcomed him with faithful heart, attending upon him in the way as described in the previous Buddhas, and finally, took their appropriate seats, surrounding the Buddha. Then the Buddha taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse which was also taught by all the previous Buddhas to Devas and humans who had come to listen to him. At that time, 1,000 billion beings attained the paths and fruitions.

2. At another time, at the invitation of King Bhīmaratha of Bhīmaratha city, Buddha Siddhattha visited that city and, staying at the royal pavilion, which was erected on a grand scale in the city-centre, he spoke in a voice that was like that of the king of the Indian Cuckoo birds, or like that of the king of the Brahmas, as it was sweet, pleasing to the ear and appealing to the hearts of the wise. Thus, letting the Dhamma reach the ten quarters, he beat the drum of deathlessness. At that time, 900 million beings attained the paths and fruitions.

3. Still at another time, Buddha Siddhattha visited his home-town of Vebhāra, where, in the assembly of his relatives headed by his father King Udena, he narrated to them the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa). At that time, 900 million beings attained the paths and fruitions. [172]

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

1. There were three meetings of Buddha Siddhattha's Arahāt disciples. The first meeting took place at the city of Amara, which was beautiful and pleasing to the eye, like the divine city of Tāvātimsa. There, in the city, two brothers, who were also his two future chief disciples, Prince Sambala and Prince Sumitta, reigned together like Licchavī princes during the lifetime of our Buddha. Seeing that the two princes were endowed with the merits of their past deeds, which would lead to the paths and fruitions, Buddha Siddhattha instantly appeared in the centre of Amara city. There, he descended to the surface of the earth, impressing it with the soles of his feet which were even and adorned with 108 marks. He thus showed his footprints (pada-cetiya), which were worthy of respect, and then he went to Amara Park where he stayed in glory, like a golden statue on a stone slab.

The two royal brothers, seeing the footprints, together with their retinues traced them till they came to the Buddha. They paid respects to him and sat down near him. When the Buddha taught a discourse to them that suited their inclinations and dispositions they developed faith in him and after becoming monks, they became Arahats. In the midst of these 100 billion monks, the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha).

2. At another time, in the midst of 900 million monks, who had become monastics at the assembly of his relatives in Vebhāra, the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules.

3. Still at another time, in the midst of 800 million monks who had assembled at Sudassana monastery, the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules.

The Bodhisatta as Recluse Maṅgala

Meanwhile, our Bodhisatta was reborn in the city of Surasena as a Brahmin, named Maṅgala who was accomplished in the Vedas in their original texts as well as in their branches of literature. He gave away all his possessions worth many millions to the poor and the destitute and since he took delight in seclusion, he became an ascetic. Developing the attainments (samāpatti) and super knowledges (abhiññā), he achieved effective powers by virtue of which nobody could torture him.

While he was thus abiding, he heard the news: “Buddha Siddhattha had appeared in the world.” He therefore approached the Buddha and adoringly paid respects to him. Hearing the Buddha’s teaching, the ascetic became so pleased that he brought fruits from the rose-apple tree of Jambudīpa with his psychic power, and at Surasena monastery, where he accommodated the Buddha, he offered the fruits as food to the Buddha who was accompanied by 900 million disciples. Having partaken of the fruits, Buddha Siddhattha declared prophetically: “This Maṅgala, the ascetic, will indeed become a Buddha, Gotama by name, in the 94th aeon from now.”

Having heard the Buddha’s prophecy, the Bodhisatta, Maṅgala the ascetic, was overjoyed and firmly resolved to fulfil the ten perfections even more energetically.

Particulars of Buddha Siddhattha

The birthplace of Buddha Siddhattha was Vebhāra city.

His father was King Udena and his mother was Queen Suphassā.

He reigned for 10,000 years.

His three palaces were Kokā, Suppala and Kokanada.

His chief consort was Somanassā, who had 48,000 maids of honour.

His son was Prince Anupama.

The vehicle he used in renouncing the world was a palanquin.

He practised the austerities for ten months.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Sambala and Ven. Sumitta.

His [173] attendant was Ven. Revata.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Sīvalā and Ven. Surāmā.

His Bodhi tree was a Kaṇikāra.

His noble male lay supporters were the wealthy persons Suppiya and Samudda.

His noble female supporters were Rammā and Surammā.

Buddha Siddhattha’s height was 60 cubits.

He shone forth in the 10,000 world-element like a column of jewels erected for worship.

Resembling the unequalled former Buddhas, peerless and unrivalled and endowed with the five eyes, Buddha Siddhattha lived for 100,000 years.

Having displayed extensively his physical radiance as well as his intellectual brilliance, having caused the flowering of the paths and fruitions in his disciples, and having glorified them with attainments, both mundane and supermundane, Buddha Siddhattha attained Parinibbāna with all of them, and came to the end of his final existence.

In this way, Buddha Siddhattha, noble monarch of all monks, attained Parinibbāna in Anoma Park, near Kañcanaveḷu city. In that very park, a four leagues high shrine of jewels was erected, in the way mentioned for previous Buddhas, and was dedicated to him.

17. The Chronicle of Buddha Tissa

When the aeon in which Buddha Siddhattha appeared had come to an end, there immediately followed a void or empty aeon (suñña-kappa), in which no Buddha appeared. When that aeon was over, and in the 92nd aeon previous to the present, two Buddhas, namely, Tissa and Phussa, appeared, in a two-Buddha aeon (maṇḍa-kappa).

The chronicle of Buddha Tissa was as follows: In that aeon, human lifespan declined from immeasurables to 100,000 years. The Bodhisatta Tissa was then reborn in Tusita, on complete fulfilment of the perfections. Having complied with the request made by Devas and Brahmas to become a Buddha, he descended to the human world to be conceived in the womb of Queen Padumā, chief consort of King Janasandha, in the city of Khemaka. When ten months had elapsed, the Bodhisatta was born in Anoma Park. On his naming day, learned readers of omens and his relatives named the Bodhisatta, Prince Tissa.

There are two kinds of name: according to the sense, or meaning (anvattha) and according to custom, or tradition (rūḷhi). The name given after a particular event or in a particular meaning is according to the sense (anvattha). The name given not after a particular event or in a particular meaning but given for convenience sake is according to custom (rūḷhi). Here the name Tissa given to the Bodhisatta is of the convenience (rūḷhi) kind.

Early Life

When the Bodhisatta, Prince Tissa, came of age, he lived in three palaces: Gūhasela, Nārisaya and Nisabha. Being entertained and served by 30,000 female attendants headed by Princess Subhaddā, he thus lived a divine-like royal household life for 7,000 years.

When the Bodhisatta had seen the four omens and when Princess Subhaddā had given birth to a son, named Ānanda, he went forth riding a thoroughbred horse, named Soṇuttara, and became a recluse. 10 million men were inspired by his renunciation and joined him, to become recluses themselves too. [174]

Awakening

With this 10 million of recluses, Bodhisatta Tissa practised the austerities for eight months. On the full moon day of May (Vesākha), the day of his Awakening, he partook of the milk rice offered by Vīrā, the daughter of a wealthy person of Vīra market-town, and spent the daytime in the local Salala grove. In the evening, he went alone to the Mahā Bodhi tree. On the way, he accepted eight handfuls of grass offered by Vijitasanḡāmaka, a watchman of the barley fields. As soon as he spread the grass at the foot of the Indian Laurel (Asana) Mahā Bodhi tree, there appeared the unconquered seat, which measured 40 cubits. Sitting cross-legged on the seat, he became a Buddha in the same manner as previous Buddhas.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. After becoming a Buddha, Buddha Tissa stayed in the neighbourhood of the Mahā Bodhi tree for 49 days. Having complied with a Brahma's request for his teaching, he contemplated to whom he should teach first and he saw his future chief disciples, princes Brahmadeva and Udaya, who were residents of Yasavatī, and who, together with their retinues, were endowed with previous meritorious deeds, which led to the paths and fruitions. By his psychic power he immediately appeared in the Deer Park near Yasavatī. He then sent the gardener for the two princes. On arrival with their retinues, Buddha Tissa then taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse to Devas and humans, who had followed the two princes and their men to listen to the teaching. The Buddha did so, proclaiming all over the 10,000 world-element in a voice similar to that of the King of Brahmas which was distinct, far-reaching and sweet. Then 100,000 beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, attained the paths and fruitions.

2. At another time, when 10 million recluses, who had been his companions in renunciation, and who had parted with him as he was moving to the Mahā Bodhi tree, on hearing that he had taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, travelled to the Deer Park near Yasavatī. On arriving there, they paid homage to the Buddha and took their seats around him. When the Buddha taught the Dhamma to these monks and all others who had come to listen to him, 900 million beings headed by 10 million monks attained the paths and fruitions.

3. Still at another time, when Devas and humans discussed what constituted the blessings (maṅgala) leading to prosperity in the world, but could not get an answer acceptable to all, and when they put forward the same question to the Buddha, he taught them the Discourse on the Blessings. By the end of this discourse, 600 million Brahmas and humans attained the paths and fruitions.

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

1. There were three meetings of Buddha Tissa's disciples. The first took place at Yasavatī, where the Buddha, being accompanied by 100,000 Arahats who were monastics at the beginning of the Rains Retreat (Vassa) and became Arahats during the same Rains Retreat. He then performed the Invitation of the Pure (Visuddhi-pavāraṇā) on the full moon day of October (Assayuja).

2. At another time, when the Buddha was going on a journey and arrived at the city of Nārivāhana, Prince Nārivāhana, son of King Sujāta of that city, with his hosts of followers, welcomed the Buddha and invited him and his Saṅgha to the ceremony of an unparalleled alms giving which was held for seven days. Having relinquished his princely right over the kingdom to his son, he sought monkhood together with his followers in the presence of the Buddha. Buddha Tissa then called upon them, saying: "Come, O monks," and they all became summoned monastics. When the news of Nārivāhana's renunciation spread, people from all quarters came and followed his example. Then, in the midst of the monastics, numbering nine [175] millions, Buddha Tissa recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha).

3. Still at another time, in the city of Khemavatī or Khemaka, at the assembly of the Buddha Tissa's relatives, after listening to his narration of the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa), eight million people became monastics in his presence and became Arahats. Surrounded by these monastics, Buddha Tissa recited the Advisory Rules.

The Bodhisatta as Recluse Sujāta

Meanwhile our Bodhisatta was King Sujāta in the city of Yasavatī. He had a prosperous city, his wealth was worth many millions and he had members of a retinue, who were always willing to attend upon him. He abandoned them all with no attachment whatsoever, as though they were blades of grass and stalks of reeds. With his heart filled with the fear of suffering in rebirth, etc., he renounced the world and became an ascetic even before Buddha Tissa's appearance, and acquired great psychic power and fame. On hearing that Buddha Tissa has appeared, his whole body was pervaded with the five kinds of ecstasy. Most respectfully, he approached the Buddha and paid respects to him, thinking: "I will honour the Buddha with such flowers as from the Salala, Pāricchattaka trees and others," he went to the celestial abode by means of his psychic power and entered the garden of Cittalatā. There he filled a basket, measuring a mile, with such celestial flowers and brought it across the sky and finally honoured the Buddha with these immensely fragrant flowers.

Besides, in the middle of the four assemblies, the Bodhisatta stood, holding over the Buddha's head a lotus (paduma) sunshade, which was an umbrella made of very sweet smelling pollens, with a rod of ruby, and a pinnacle of leaves of red ruby. In this way, he thus honoured the Buddha. Then the Buddha predicted concerning the Bodhisatta, Sujāta the ascetic: "In the 92nd aeon from the present one, this Sujāta will become a Buddha, Gotama by name."

On hearing the Buddha's prophecy, Bodhisatta Sujāta the ascetic, was filled with devotional faith and resolved to fulfil the ten perfections even more energetically.

Particulars of Buddha Tissa

Buddha Tissa's birthplace was Khemaka city.

His father was King Janasandha and his mother was Queen Padumā.

He reigned for 7,000 years.

His three palaces were Gūhasela, Nārisaya and Nisabha.

His chief consort was Subhaddā, who had 30,000 maids of honour.

His son was Prince Ānanda.

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 183

After seeing the four omens, he renounced the world riding a thoroughbred horse named Soṇuttara.

He practised the austerities for eight months.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Brahmadeva and Ven. Udaya.

His attendant was Ven. Samaṅga.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Phussā and Ven. Sudattā.

His Bodhi tree was an Indian Laurel (Asana) tree.

His noble male supporters were the wealthy persons, Sambala and Sirima.

His noble female supporters were Kisā Gotamī and Upasenā.

Buddha Tissa was ten cubits tall. He was matchless and unequalled. He appeared like a mountain in the Himālayas, to those who saw him.

The lifespan of Buddha Tissa, who was endowed with incomparable psychic power, was neither too short not too long. Buddha Tissa, the possessor of the five eyes, lived in the world for 100,000 years. [176]

Buddha Tissa, who had dispelled the darkness of ignorance (avijjā), after enjoying great fame, which surpassed the fame of those highly noble and admirable personages, attained Parinibbāna with his many Arahāt disciples, just as a mass of fire that had become extinct after burning very brightly.

In this way, Buddha Tissa, conqueror of the five kinds of death (māra), attained Parinibbāna in Nanda Park, near Sunandavatī city. In that very park, a three leagues high shrine was erected, in the same way as mentioned with previous Buddhas, and was dedicated to Buddha Tissa.

18. The Chronicle of Buddha Phussa

After Buddha Tissa's Parinibbāna in that aeon of two Buddhas (maṇḍa-kappa), the human lifespan decreased from 100,000 years to ten years and then increased to immeasurables. When it reached 90,000 years on its next decline, Bodhisatta Phussa, on completion of his perfections, was reborn in Tusita which was a practice common to all Bodhisattas. Having accepted the request made by Devas and Brahmas to become a Buddha, he descended to the human world to be conceived in the womb of Queen Sirimā, consort of King Jayasena, in the city of Kāsika. When ten months had elapsed, the Bodhisatta was born in Sirimā Park.

Early Life

When Prince Tissa came of age, he lived in three palaces, Garuḷapakkha, Haṃsa and Suvāṇṇabhārā. Being entertained and served by 30,000 female attendants headed by Princess Kisā Gotamī, he thus enjoyed a divine-like royal household life for 9,000 years.

When the Bodhisatta, Prince Phussa, had seen the four omens while thus enjoying life, and when Princess Kisā Gotamī had given birth to a son, named Anupama, he renounced the world, riding an elephant. Ten million men joined him and also became recluses themselves.

Awakening

With these ten million recluses, the Bodhisatta Phussa practised the austerities for six months. Thereafter, leaving his followers, he cultivated the practice of living a solitary life for seven days. On the full moon day of May (Vesākha), the day of his Awakening, he partook of the milk rice offered by Sirivaḍḍhā, daughter of a certain wealthy man of a certain town, and spent the daytime in the local Indian Rosewood (Siṃsapā) grove. In the evening, he went alone to the Emblic Myrobalan (Āmalaka) Mahā Bodhi tree. On the way, he accepted eight handfuls of grass offered by an ascetic, Sirivaḍḍha by name. As soon as he spread the grass at the foot of the Mahā Bodhi tree, there appeared the unconquered seat, measuring 38 cubits. Sitting cross-legged on the seat, he became a Buddha in the same manner as previous Buddhas.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. After becoming a Buddha, Buddha Phussa stayed in the neighbourhood of the Mahā Bodhi tree for 49 days. Having agreed to the request made by a Brahma for his teaching, he contemplated who he should teach first and he saw the 10 million monks, who were his companions in renunciation and who were endowed with past meritorious deeds which could lead to the paths and fruitions. By his psychic power, he immediately appeared at the Deer Park, called Isipatana, near the city of Saṅkassa. In the midst of these recluses, the Buddha taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse to all the listeners, as had been done by former Buddhas. Then 1,000 billion Devas and humans attained the paths and fruitions. [177]

2. At another time, King Sirivaḍḍha of Bārāṇasī, having abandoned his great wealth, became an ascetic. Nine million people did the same as the king. Buddha Phussa went to the place of these ascetics and taught them the Dhamma. Then nine million beings attained the paths and fruitions.

3. Still at another time, Buddha Phussa taught to his son, Prince Anupama. Then eight million Devas and humans attained the paths and fruitions.

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

1. There were three meetings of Buddha Phussa's disciples. The first took place at Kaṇṇakujja. There, Prince Surakkhita and the Brahmin chaplain's son, Dhammasena, both his future chief disciples and residents of the city, with six million men welcomed the Buddha who was on a visit to the city. They also respectfully invited him and performed a great alms giving ceremony for seven days. After listening to the Buddha's discourse, they developed faith in him and became monks together with their six million companions and together they became Arahats. In the midst of these Arahats, the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha).

2. At another time, at the assembly of his relatives headed by his father, King Jayasena of the city of Kāsi, the Buddha narrated the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa). Having listened to the chronicle five million people became summoned monastics and became Arahats. At the meeting of these five million Arahats, Buddha Phussa recited the Advisory Rules.

3. Still at another time, when Devas and humans discussed what constituted the blessings (maṅgala) leading to prosperity in the world, but could not agree on an answer acceptable to all, and when they put the same question to Buddha, he taught the Discourse on the Blessings (Maṅgala-sutta, Snp 2.4). After listening to this discourse, four million people became monastics and became Arahats. In the midst of these Arahats, the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules.

The Bodhisatta as King Vijitāvī

At the time of Buddha Phussa our Bodhisatta was King Vijitāvī, in the city of Arindama. Having listened to the Buddha's discourse, he developed faith in him, and performed a great alms giving by giving his city, and he became a monastic and learned the Three Baskets. Being well-versed in the Collections, he disseminated the Dhamma to all people, and also fulfilled the perfection of morality.

Then Buddha Phussa, a noble leader of the three worlds, made a prophecy concerning the Bodhisatta monastic Vijitāvī: “In 92 aeons from the present one, this monastic Vijitāvī will become a Buddha, Gotama by name.” Having listened to Buddha Phussa’s prophecy, the Bodhisatta Vijitāvī was filled with devotional faith and was determined to fulfil the ten perfections even more energetically.

Having become a monastic and a servant in the Dispensation of Buddha Phussa, and becoming accomplished in the studies of the Buddha’s teachings which are of nine divisions together with the discourses and discipline (sutta-vinaya), the noble Bodhisatta contributed to the glory of the Buddha’s Dispensation.

Without lying down at all, meditating only in the three postures of sitting, standing and walking, the Bodhisatta developed the sublime modes of living (Brahma-vihāra) without [178] negligence, and attained not only the eight attainments but also the apex of the five super knowledges, and was reborn in the Brahma world.

Particulars of Buddha Phussa

Buddha Phussa’s birthplace was Kāsi city.

His father was King Jayasena and his mother was Queen Sirimā.

He reigned for 9,000 years.

His three palaces were Garuḷapakkha, Hamsa and Suvanṇabhārā.

His chief consort was Kisā Gotamī, who had 30,000 maids of honour.

His son was Prince Anupama.

The vehicle he used in his renunciation, after seeing the four omens, was an elephant.

He practised the austerities for six months.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Surakkhita and Ven. Dhammasena.

His attendant was Ven. Sabhiya.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Cālā and Ven. Upacālā.

His Bodhi tree was an Emblic Myrobalan (Āmalaka).

His noble male lay supporters were the wealthy men Dhanañjaya and Visākha.

His noble female supporters were Padumā and Nāgā.

Buddha Phussa was 58 cubits tall.

He shone forth like the sun and was endowed with the pleasing qualities of the moon.

The lifespan in the aeon in which he appeared was 90,000 years. He lived for four-fifths of the lifespan. He rescued beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, from the flood waters of Samsāra and placed them on the shore of Nibbāna.

Endowed with unparalleled retinue and fame, Buddha Phussa, together with his Arahāt disciples, attained Parinibbāna and came to the end of their final existence.

In this way, Buddha Phussa, conqueror of the five kinds of deaths (māra), attained Parinibbāna in a park named Sena, near the city of Kusinārā. In accordance with his resolve, his relics dispersed all over Jambudīpa and were honoured by humans, Devas and Brahmas.

[For more about this Buddha see the story forming the basis on the Beyond the Walls discourse in chapter 15.]

19. The Chronicle of Buddha Vipassī

When the aeon in which Buddha Phussa had appeared came to an end, 91 aeons before the present one, there appeared Buddha Vipassī. The chronicle of Buddha Vipassī is as follows: In that aeon, when the lifespan of human beings decreased from immeasurables to 80,000 years, Bodhisatta Vipassī, on complete fulfilment of the perfections, was reborn in Tusita which was a practice common to all Bodhisattas. Having accepted the request made by Devas and Brahmas, he descended to the human world and was conceived in the womb of Queen Bandhumatī, consort of King Bandhuma, in the city of Bandhumatī. When ten months had elapsed, he was born in the Migadāya garden which is also called the Deer Park, for as a sanctuary, Khemā by name, it was full of deer.

Early Life

When the Bodhisatta Prince was born, wherever he went, by day or by night, a huge white umbrella of divine origin constantly hovered over him to protect him from heat and cold, dust and dew drops. He was ever adored by people. He was brought up being carried now in someone's lap and then in another's, having no chance to put his feet on the ground. [179]

Since his birth, he had possessed wonderful eyes which appeared as a result of his meritorious deeds (kamma-vipākajā), and powerful divine-like eyes. With these eyes, the Bodhisatta could see unobstructed as far as one league around, in daytime or at night. As Devas of Tāvātimsa always see with their ever-open eyes, so had the Bodhisatta Prince seen things with his never-closed but ever-open eyes since his birth; hence his famous name, Prince Vipassī.

Besides, one day, while a case was being tried in the law-court of his father, King Bandhuma, the duly adorned baby Prince was handed to the king who placed him in his lap and while he was fondly amusing him, his ministers judged against a certain owner of property, saying that he was not the owner. Unsatisfied with the unjust decision, the prince suddenly cried bitterly. The king then asked his men to look for the reason, saying: “Why has such a thing happened to my son? Investigate into this matter.” When they investigated they could find no cause, other than that judges at the law court must have made a wrong verdict. So the verdict was reversed. Being satisfied then, the prince stopped crying. In order to find out whether the prince cried because he actually knew the case, they reverted to the original decision. This made him cry again, as bitterly as before. Then only did the father realise: “My son really knows what is right and what is wrong.” Since then the king ruled his country without negligence. From that time onwards, the Bodhisatta’s name, Prince Vipassī, became more famous on account of his ability to distinguish between right and wrong.

When Prince Vipassī came of age, he lived in three palaces: Nanda, Sunanda and Sirimā. Being entertained and served by female attendants headed by Princess Sudassanā,<sup>75</sup> he thus enjoyed a Deva-like bliss in a royal household life for 8,000 years.

One day, Prince Vipassī summoned his charioteer and said: “I would like to see the gardens. I shall go there.” On his way to the gardens in a chariot he saw an old man who was a Deva in disguise. Since it was a strange sight as he had never seen any aged person before, he asked: “Charioteer, what is this man doing? His hair and his body are not like the others.”

“My lord, this is an old man,” replied the charioteer. “What is an old man?” asked the prince again, as he did not actually know what the words “old man” meant. “My lord,” answered the charioteer, “an old man is an aged person. He cannot live much longer.” – “Charioteer, will I also become old? Am I subject to old age, too?” – “My lord, you and I, and everyone else is liable to grow old. Nobody can escape old age.”

Then the Bodhisatta Prince said: “No longer do I want to see the gardens, turn back from here and return to the palace.” When he arrived in the palace, he contemplated: “Oh, birth is indeed wearisome. When there is birth, there will definitely be old age.” Contemplating this, the prince became very unhappy.

Having learnt about the matter from the charioteer, the king provided him with the means for enjoying sensual pleasures more than before in order to prevent his son from renouncing the world.

Several thousand years after that, the prince went to the gardens for a second time and he saw a sick person on the way. He did not proceed but turned back to the palace as before. When the father heard of his son’s unhappiness and pensive mood, he enticed him with even more objects of sensual pleasures.

On his third trip to the gardens too, several thousand years after the second visit, having seen a dead body, he returned to the palace as before.

Several thousand years thereafter, when he made a fourth trip to the gardens, he came across a monk on the way and asked the charioteer about the monk. When he came to [180] know what a monk was, he was so pleased that he had the chariot driven towards the monk’s direction.

On reaching the monk, he asked more details of the monk’s life and became all the more delighted. Accordingly, he said to the charioteer: “Charioteer, take back the chariot to the palace and keep it there. I shall become a recluse in this very place.” He thus sent the charioteer back. That was the day in which Princess Sudassanā gave birth to a son named Samavaṭṭakkhandha.

After sending back the charioteer, Prince Vipassī shaved his head, put on the robes and became a recluse. Then 84,000 citizens of Bandhumatī, on hearing of the prince’s renunciation, joined him and also became recluses themselves.

Awakening

Being accompanied by the 84,000 recluses, Bodhisatta Vipassī made a tour of villages, market-towns, and cities. Wherever he went, people erected pavilions and gave him alms food on a grand scale, but the Bodhisatta was tired of such grand offerings. The day before the eighth month of his renunciation, i.e., on the fourteenth waxing moon of May (Vesākha), it occurred to him thus: “It is not proper for me to live in the company of my followers. What if I were to stay alone and away from them?” So he parted from his recluses. On the full moon day of May (Vesākha), the day of his Awakening, he partook of the milk rice offered by the daughter of Sudassana, the wealthy man, and spent the daytime in the local Sāla grove.

In the evening, he went to the Trumpet Flower (Pāṭali) Mahā Bodhi tree. On the way, he accepted eight handfuls of grass from Sujāta, a watchman of the barley fields. As soon as he spread the grass at the foot of the Trumpet Flower Bodhi tree, there appeared the unconquered seat, measuring 53 cubits high.

The trunk of the Trumpet Flower Bodhi tree was 50 cubits high, its main branches were also 50 cubits in length; so the total height of the tree was 100 cubits on the day the tree was approached by the Bodhisatta. That day, the tree looked as though it was covered, from the bottom to the top, by fragrant flowers which were strung together uniformly. It was pervaded with divine scents. On that day, not only the Trumpet Flower Bodhi tree but also all the trees and bushes in the 10,000 world-element bloomed.

Sitting cross-legged on the seat, the Bodhisatta concentrated his energy at four levels, in the same manner as described with previous Buddhas, and became a Buddha.

Three Occasions of the Buddha’s Teaching

1. Having become a Buddha, the Buddha stayed in the neighbourhood of the Bodhi tree for 49 days. Having accepted a Brahma’s request, he considered who he should teach first and he saw his half-brother, Prince Khaṇḍa, and Tissa, the Brahmin chaplain’s son, who were both his future chief disciples, and were endowed with the merits of their past deeds which could lead to the paths and fruitions, and he, by his psychic power, immediately appeared at the Deer Park, called Khema. Upon arriving, he sent the gardener for Prince Khaṇḍa and his friend Tissa. When they arrived, he advised them to renounce the world and he taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse to all humans, Devas and Brahmas who had gathered to listen to him. Then a large multitude of humans, Devas and Brahmas, who were headed by the prince and the Brahmin chaplain's son, attained the paths and fruitions. In particular, Prince Khaṇḍa and the Brahmin chaplain's son Tissa, who were the future chief disciples, became summoned monastics and became Arahats not long after.

2. At a later time, on hearing that: "Buddha Vipassī has arrived at Khema Deer Park near Bandhumatī," and that: "Prince Khaṇḍa and the Brahmin chaplain's son, Tissa, have also become monks in the presence of Buddha Vipassī," 84,000 male citizens of [181] Bandhumatī joined them and became monks themselves. To these 84,000 monks, the Buddha administered the elixir of immortality.

3. The 84,000 men, who were members of the retinue while Buddha Vipassī was a prince, came to attend upon him early in the morning of the day the Bodhisatta went to the royal gardens for the fourth time, which was also the day of his renunciation. When they did not see the prince at the palace, they returned home for the morning meal. After finishing their meal, they enquired about the prince. Hearing that he had gone to the garden, they also went to the garden to see the prince.

On the way, they met the charioteer who was sent back by Prince Vipassī and heard from him of the prince's renunciation. Instantly they took off all of their layman's clothing, cut their hair and beards and became recluses wearing the robes which were bought at a market. Then these 84,000 recluses, who had followed his example, approached Bodhisatta Vipassī and sat around him. Surrounded thus by them, the Bodhisatta practised the austerities (dukkara-cariyā) for eight months. On the day before the full moon of May (Vesākha), the fourteenth waxing moon of the month, he became tired of association with them and thought: "I have been with them all along. While I was a prince, I roamed about in the company of these 84,000 men. It is not proper to have them with me now also. What is the use of such a band of people?" He also thought thus: "I shall depart from them immediately today." Then he changed his thought thus: "There is little time left for doing so today. If I go now they will all know my departure. I had better go tomorrow."

Meanwhile, residents of a certain village, which was like Uruvelā in the time of our Buddha, were busy preparing milk rice for the Bodhisatta and his 84,000 companions for the next day, after duly inviting them. On that day, which was the full moon of May (Vesākha), Bodhisatta Vipassī partook of the meal with his retinue at the village and returned to his sylvan residence.

On his return, the recluses, after performing their duties towards the Bodhisatta, withdrew to their respective places. Then only the Bodhisatta, who was in his little leaf-hut, decided: “It is the best time for me to leave,” came out from his hut, shut its door and headed for the Mahā Bodhi tree.

In the evening, the recluses went to the Bodhisatta’s retreat to attend upon him and waited around his hut, expecting to see their master. Only after a long time, they said among themselves: “A long time has elapsed. Let us investigate.” So saying, they opened the door of the leaf-hut and looked inside but did not see the Bodhisatta.

Although wondering: “Where has the master gone?” they did not make any effort to search for him. “He must have been tired of our company and seems to like staying alone. We shall see him only when he becomes a Buddha.” With such thoughts, they left the place and went towards the interior of Jambudīpa.

Later on, when they heard that Prince Vipassī has become a Buddha and taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, they left for the Khema Deer Park near Bandhumatī city and assembled there in due course. The Buddha then gave them a talk on the Dhamma. The 84,000 monks attained the paths and fruitions.

Three Occasions of the Disciples’ Meeting

1. There were three meetings (sannipāta) of Buddha Vipassī’s disciples. The first took place at Khema Deer Park. There, in the midst of the 84,000 monks who had followed Buddha Vipassī and another 84,000 monks who had followed Prince Khaṇḍa and the Brahmin chaplain’s son, Tissa, in renunciation, totalling 168,000 monks, Buddha Vipassī recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha). [182]

2. At a later time, there took place the meeting of 100,000 monks who had put on the robes after witnessing the twin miracle displayed by the Buddha.

3. At a still later time, Buddha Vipassī’s three half-brothers, on their return after crushing an insurgency at the border, were asked to express their boons by their royal father who was so delighted with their success. “We have been permitted to ask what we want,” said the princes among themselves, “we do not need to ask for any other boon than permission to attend upon our elder brother.” When their request was granted, they invited the Buddha to the towns and villages under them and attended upon him and honoured him. Accordingly, the Buddha went and accepted the veneration shown to him. He also gave them a discourse, as a result of which, 80,000 people became summoned monastics and became Arahats. In the company of these 80,000 Arahats, in Khemaka Deer Park, Buddha Vipassī recited the Advisory Rules.

The Bodhisatta as the Nāga King Atula

Meanwhile our Bodhisatta was the Nāga King Atula of great might. In the company of many millions of Nāgas who were playing celestial musical instruments, he approached Buddha Vipassī, Lord of the Three Worlds. In order to honour the Buddha and his monastics, he invited the Saṅgha, headed by the Buddha to his place. He built a great pavilion which was adorned with the seven kinds of gems and was pleasing to the eye, like the orb of a full moon. He accommodated the Buddha with his Saṅgha in the pavilion and performed grand alms giving to them for seven days. He also offered a golden bench, which was richly decorated, to the Buddha.

Sitting in the midst of the Saṅgha, the Buddha taught him a discourse in appreciation of his alms giving and, at the conclusion of the discourse, declared prophetically about him, saying: “In the 91st aeon from the present one, this Atula Nāga King will indeed become a Buddha.”

Having heard the Buddha’s prophecy, Bodhisatta Atula, the Nāga King, was overjoyed, and determined to fulfil the perfections even more energetically.

Particulars of Buddha Vipassī

Buddha Vipassī’s birthplace was Bandhumatī city.

His father was King Bandhuma and his mother was Bandhumatī.

He reigned for 8,000 years.

His three palaces were Nanda, Sunanda and Sirimā.

His chief consort was Sudassanā, who had 120,000 maids of honour.

His son was Prince Samavaṭṭakkhandha.

The vehicle he used after seeing the four omens was a chariot drawn by thoroughbred horses.

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 194

He practised the austerities for eight months.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Khaṇḍa and Ven. Tissa.

His attendant was Ven. Asoka.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Candā and Ven. Candamittā.

His Bodhi tree was a Trumpet Flower tree.

His noble male lay supporters were the wealthy persons, Punabbasumitta and Nāga.

His female supporters were Sirimā and Uttarā.

The height of Buddha Vipassī, Lord of the Three Worlds, was 80 cubits.

His radiance spread as far as seven leagues.

The lifespan during Buddha Vipassī's time was 80,000. Living for four-fifths of this lifespan, he rescued humans, Devas and Brahmas from the waters of Samsāra and placed them on the shores of Nibbāna. [183]

After showing the light of Dhamma and the teaching about the deathless Nibbāna, Buddha Vipassī, with many of his Arahat disciples, finally attained Parinibbāna like a mass of fire which becomes extinct after burning brightly.

Buddha Vipassī's exalted power, exalted glory, and his body adorned with characteristic marks, vanished. Unsubstantial and futile are all conditioned things!

In this way Buddha Vipassī, conqueror of the five kinds of deaths (māra), attained Parinibbāna in Sumitta Park. A seven leagues high shrine was erected in that very Park and dedicated to him

20. The Chronicle of Buddha Sikhī

After the end of the aeon in which Buddha Vipassī appeared, no Buddhas appeared in the world for 59 aeons as these were empty aeons (suñña-kappas). There was no light of Dhamma. In fact, the total darkness of ignorance (avijjā) prevailed and only Māra, the Wicked One and the defilements, reigned supreme in the world without any opposition. It was their whim and fancy that beings were bound to follow. When the 59 empty aeons were over, 31 aeons previous to the present one, two Buddhas, Sikhī and Vessabhū, appeared in a two-Buddha aeon (maṇḍa-kappa).

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 195

The chronicle of the Buddha Sikhī, the first of the two is as follows: In that aeon, when the lifespan of human beings decreased from immeasurables and reached 70,000 years, on complete fulfilment of the perfections, Bodhisatta Sikhī was reborn in Tusita. Having agreed to the request made by Devas and Brahmas to become a Buddha, he descended to the human world to be conceived in the womb of Pabhāvatī, consort of King Aruṇa of Aruṇavatī city. When ten months had elapsed, the Bodhisatta was born in Nisabha Park. On his naming day, learned readers of omens and his relatives named him Sikhī, because a band on his head, which was like a protuberance (uṇhīsa), stood out like the crest of a peacock.

Early Life

When he came of age, Prince Sikhī lived in three palaces: Sucandaka, Giri and Vāsabha. Being entertained and served by 24,000 female attendants headed by Princess Sabbakāmā, he thus enjoyed a divine-like royal household life for 7,000 years.

When Bodhisatta Prince Sikhī had seen the four omens while enjoying the royal household life and when Princess Sabbakāmā had given birth to a son, named Atula, he renounced the world riding an elephant. Seven million men also renounced the world, following his example.

Awakening

With these seven million recluses, Bodhisatta Sikhī practised the austerities for eight months. On the full moon day, the day of his Awakening, he left these recluses. He partook of the milk rice offered by Piyadassī, daughter of a wealthy man, resident of the market town of Sudassana, and spent the daytime in the local grove of young acacias. In the evening, he proceeded alone to the Mahā Bodhi tree and accepted, on the way, eight handfuls of grass offered by an ascetic named Anomadassī. As soon as he spread the grass at the foot of the Fragrant Mango (Puṇḍarīka) Mahā Bodhi tree, there appeared the unconquered seat, measuring 32 cubits.

The size of that Fragrant Mango Bodhi tree was the same as that of the Trumpet Flower Bodhi tree [184] of Buddha Vipassī. Its trunk was 50 cubits high and its main branches were also exactly 50 cubits high, on the day the Bodhisatta approached it. It stood as though it was covered by fragrant flowers of divine origin. It seemed to have been covered not only by flowers but also by fruits.

They were hanging from here and there young fruits on one side of the tree and medium-sized fruits on another side. Those ripe enough were all very tasty as if celestial nutriments were put in them. In fact, they all possessed wonderful colour, flavour and taste. Likewise, all fruit-trees and flower-trees in the 10,000 world-element bore fruits and flowers on that very day.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. After becoming a Buddha, Buddha Sikhī stayed in the neighbourhood of the Fragrant Mango Mahā Bodhi tree for 49 days. Having complied with a Brahma's request for his teaching, he contemplated who he should teach first, and he saw the seven million fellow monastics who were endowed with the merits of their past deeds, which could lead to the paths and fruitions. By his psychic power he then immediately appeared in Migājina Park, their residence near the city of Aruṇavatī. Sitting gracefully in the midst of these seven million recluses, Buddha Sikhī taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, which was also taught by previous Buddhas, to Devas and humans who had come to listen. Then 1,000 billion Devas and humans attained the paths and fruitions.
2. At a later time, also near the city of Aruṇavatī, the Buddha taught Dhamma to his future chief disciples, Prince Abhibhū and Prince Sambhava and their retainers, and administered the elixir of immortality to 900 billion Devas and humans.<sup>76</sup>
3. Still at another time, near a Campak tree, close to the gate of Sūriyavatī city, the Buddha displayed the twin miracle and gave a discourse in order to suppress the arrogance of the heretics and to free beings from the bondage to the defilements. At that time, 800 billion Devas and humans attained the paths and fruitions.

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

1. There were three meetings of Buddha Sikhī's Arahāt disciples. At the first meeting, in the midst of 100,000 Arahats, who were princes Abhibhū's and Sambhava's companions during their renunciation, Buddha Sikhī recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha).

2. At a later time, in the midst of 80,000 monks who had put on the robes at the meeting of his relatives at Aruṇavatī city, Buddha Sikhī recited the Advisory Rules.

3. Still at another time, in the midst of 70,000 monks, who had become monastics after he had tamed the elephant Dhanapālaka of Dhanañjaya city, Buddha Sikhī recited the Advisory Rules.

The Bodhisatta as King Arindama

Meanwhile, our Bodhisatta was King Arindama, in the city of Paribhutta. When Buddha Sikhī visited the city with his retinue, the king welcomed him. He paid homage to the Buddha respectfully and invited him to the palace where he performed a grand alms giving befitting his status of kingship, high birth, of wealth and faith in the Buddha.

He opened his warehouse of clothing and offered to the Saṅgha, headed by the Buddha, several tens (koti) of garments, which was worth a great deal of money.

In common parlance, a koṭi [185] means 20 sets of clothing. Here, however, it should be understood that ten pieces make one koṭi according to the commentary to the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅuttara-nikāya, PTS. 3.270).

Moreover, he offered the Buddha his state elephant which was possessed of strength, beauty, auspicious marks and speed and which was adorned with golden nets and flowers. Having assessed the value of the elephant together with his adornments, he also offered the Saṅgha, headed by the Buddha, objects that were permissible to monks.<sup>77</sup>

Then, with reference to the Bodhisatta Arindama, Buddha Sikhī declared prophetically: “In the thirtieth aeon from the present one, this King Arindama will indeed become a Buddha, Gotama by name.”

Particulars of Buddha Sikhī

Buddha Sikhī’s birthplace was Aruṇavatī city.

His father was King Aruṇa and his mother was Queen Pabhāvatī.

He reigned for 7,000 years.

---

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 198

His three palaces were Sucandaka, Giri and Vāsabha.

His chief consort was Sabbakāmā, who had 24,000 maids of honour.

His son was Prince Atula.

He renounced the world riding an elephant after seeing the four omens.

He practised the austerities for eight months.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Abhibhū and Ven. Sambhava.

His attendant was Ven. Khemaṅkara.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Sakhilā and Ven. Padumā.

His Bodhi tree was a Fragrant Mango tree (Puṇḍarīka).

His noble male supporters were the wealthy men, Sirivaḍḍha and Nanda.

His noble female supporters were Cittā and Suguttā.

Buddha Sikhī was 70 cubits tall. He was like a golden column, created as an object of worship. He was beautiful with the 32 marks of a Great Man.

Buddha Sikhī's normal physical radiance shone everywhere, day and night, uninterruptedly as far as 30 leagues, which could illuminate several world-elements, if he so desired.

The lifespan during Buddha Sikhī's time was 7,000 years. Living for four-fifths of this lifespan, he conveyed beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, from the flood-waters of Saṃsāra and placed them on the shore of Nibbāna.

Causing the rain of Dhamma, Buddha Sikhī had all beings drenched with the pure water of Dhamma, let them reach Nibbāna, which is the end of repeated suffering, and together with his Arahāt disciples attained Parinibbāna.

The Buddha's physical frame, which possessed the 80 minor signs, such as red fingers and toe nails and adorned with the 32 marks of a Great Man, has completely vanished. Unsubstantial and futile are all conditioned things!

Buddha Sikhī attained Parinibbāna in the Park named Assa, near Sīlavatī city.

The Buddha's relics remained in a mass without dispersing. The people of Jambudīpa constructed for their honour a memorial shrine of the seven kinds of jewels three leagues high. [186]

21. The Chronicle of Buddha Vessabhū

After Buddha Sikhī's attainment of Parinibbāna, in that very aeon of two Buddhas, the lifespan of human beings decreased gradually from 70,000 years<sup>78</sup> to ten years; then it increased to immeasurables, and when it reached 60,000 years on its next decline, on complete fulfilment of the perfections, Bodhisatta Vessabhū, accepting the request made by Devas and Brahmas to become a Buddha, descended to the human world to be conceived in the womb of Queen Yasavatī, consort of King Suppatīta, in the city of Anoma. When ten months had elapsed, the Bodhisatta was born in Anupama Park.

When the Bodhisatta Prince was born, he uttered triumphant words that were pleasing to people and, on that account, on his naming day, learned readers of omens and his relatives named him Prince Vessabhū.

By "triumphant words" was meant the three great words beginning with: Aggoham-asmī lokassa, "I am the greatest in the world," etc., uttered courageously like the roar of a bull.

Early Life

When he came of age, Bodhisatta Vessabhū lived in three palaces: Ruci, Suruci and Rativaḍḍhana. Being entertained and served by 30,000 female attendants headed by Princess Sucittā, he thus enjoyed a royal household life for 6,000 years.

When he had seen the four omens while enjoying royal household life, and when Princess Sucittā had given birth to a son, named Suppabuddha, Bodhisatta Vessabhū renounced the world riding a golden palanquin to the royal gardens. He then wore the robes offered by a Brahma, and 37,000 men joined him to become recluses themselves.

Awakening

With these 37,000 recluses, Bodhisatta Vessabhū practised the austerities for six months. On the full moon day of May (Vesākha), the day he would become a Buddha, he partook of the milk rice offered by Sirivaḍḍhanā, resident of the market-town of Sucitta, and spent the daytime in the local Sāla grove. In the evening, he went alone to the Mahā Bodhi tree. On the way, he accepted eight handfuls of grass offered by Narinda, King of the Nāgas. As soon as he spread the grass at the foot of the Sāla Mahā Bodhi tree, there appeared the unconquered seat, measuring 40 cubits. Sitting on the seat, the Bodhisatta concentrated his energy at four levels and become a Buddha, in the same manner as previous Buddhas.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. After becoming a Buddha, Buddha Vessabhū stayed in the neighbourhood of the Mahā Bodhi tree for 49 days. Accepting a Brahma's request for his teaching, he contemplated who he should teach first and saw his younger half-brothers, Prince Soṇa and Prince Uttara, who were his future chief disciples, and who were endowed with the merits of their past deeds which led to the paths and fruitions, he immediately appeared in Aruṇa Park near Anupama city by his psychic power. He then sent the gardener for the two princes and, in the midst of the two princes and their retinues, he taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, which previous Buddhas had taught too, to Devas and Brahmas who had also gone to listen to the Dhamma respectfully. On that occasion, 800 billion Devas and humans attained the paths and fruitions.

2. At a later time, when Buddha Vessabhū made a tour of big towns in the country and taught Dhamma, 700 million<sup>79</sup> Devas and humans of his audiences attained the paths and fruitions.

3. Still at a later time, Buddha Vessabhū, in the same city of Anupama, eradicated wrong views that were entangled like meshes of net and highly injurious. In this way, he [187] pulled down the “banner of arrogance” of the heretics and hoisted the “banner of the noble Dhamma.” In this assembly of human beings, who had gathered in an area of nine leagues, and a large multitude of Devas and Brahmas, he displayed the twin miracle of water and fire, and developing their faith, 600 million Devas and humans were delighted with the “elixir of immortality” administered by the Buddha.<sup>80</sup>

Three Occasions of the Disciples' Meeting

1. There were three meetings of Buddha Vessabhū's disciples. The first took place on the full moon day of February (Māgha). At that time, in the midst of 80,000<sup>81</sup> Arahats, who had previously become monks at the meeting of Ven. Soṇa and Ven. Uttara, his future chief disciples, Buddha Vessabhū recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha).
2. At a later time, there took place a meeting of 37,000 recluses of the town of Soreyya. They were those who followed Bodhisatta Vessabhū's example when he renounced the world but, when the Bodhisatta left them and went alone to another place, they also moved on to somewhere else. On hearing that the Buddha had taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, they went to Soreyya and paid homage to the Buddha, who taught them Dhamma and made them summoned monastics. In the audience consisting of four features the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules.
3. Still at a later time, Buddha Vessabhū visited the city of Narivāhana to give blessings to the city's ruler, named Upasanta. Hearing of the Buddha's visit, King Upasanta and his retinue immediately went out to welcome the Buddha, invited him respectfully and performed a grand alms giving ceremony. Having listened to his Dhamma, the king was so filled with piety that he renounced the world. Joining him were 60,000 of his men who also became monks themselves. Together with Upasanta they became Arahats. Being surrounded by these monks, the Buddha recited the Advisory Rules.

The Bodhisatta as King Sudassana

At the time of Buddha Vessabhū our Bodhisatta was King Sudassana who had an appearance, fair and pleasing to the eye, in the city of Sarabhavatī. When Buddha Vessabhū, Lord of the Three Worlds, visited the city, he listened to the Buddha's Dhamma and became so pleased that, with his folded hands raised to his head, he made a great alms giving, including robes to the Saṅgha, headed by the Buddha. In the very city of Sarabhavatī, he built a hut called the Perfumed Chamber for the Buddha and also 1,000 encircling huts for the Saṅgha, and offered them.

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 202

Since the Bodhisatta was profoundly delighted with the Dhamma taught by Buddha Vessabhū, he desired fervently to become a monk. Accordingly, he gave away all his royal wealth to the cause of the Buddha's Dispensation and took up, in the Buddha's presence, the life of a virtuous monk, free from idleness, day and night. Having become a monk, he acquired moral qualities, observed the thirteen ascetic practices (dhutaṅgas) and lived in the Buddha's Dispensation, being happy in fulfilment of the perfections.

Filled with faith and joy, the Bodhisatta as a monk paid respects to Buddha Vessabhū. Then there occurred a great longing in him for omniscience. Knowing that the Bodhisatta monk had undiminished energy, Buddha Vessabhū predicted: "In the Fortunate Aeon (Bhadda-kappa), the 31st aeon from the present one, this monk, Sudassana, will indeed become a Buddha, Gotama by name." Having heard Buddha Vessabhū's prophecy, the Bodhisatta monk Sudassana was overjoyed and he determined to fulfil the ten perfections even more energetically. [188]

Particulars of Buddha Vessabhū

Buddha Vessabhū's birthplace was Anoma city.

His father was King Suppatīta and his mother was Queen Yasavatī.

He reigned for 6,000 years.

His three palaces were Ruci, Suruci and Rativaḍḍhana.

His chief consort was Sucittā, who had 30,000 maids of honour.

His son was Prince Suppabuddha.

The vehicle he used in renunciation, after seeing the four omens, was a golden palanquin.

He practised the austerities for six months.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Soṇa and Ven. Uttara.

His attendant was Ven. Upasanta.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Rāmā and Ven. Samālā.

His Bodhi tree was a Great Sāla tree.

His noble male supporters were the wealthy persons, Sotthika and Ramma.

His two female supporters were Gotamī and Sirimā.

Buddha Vessabhū's height was 60 cubits and glorious like a golden column.

The radiance emitted from various parts of his body was particularly bright, like the fire on top of a hill at night.

The lifespan during Buddha Vessabhū's time was 60,000 years. He lived for four-fifths of this lifespan, rescuing beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, from the flood-waters of Saṃsāra and placed them on the shore of Nibbāna.

He explained Dhamma elaborately to people in accordance with their dispositions. Having bequeathed the Dhamma-boat to cross the waters of Saṃsāra for the benefit of posterity, Buddha Vessabhū with his Arahats disciples attained Parinibbāna.

Buddha Vessabhū and his Arahats, who were worthy of veneration shown to them by humans, Devas and Brahmas, and the monastic buildings where they had physically maintained themselves, all have vanished. Unsubstantial and futile are all conditioned things!

In this manner, Buddha Vessabhū, conqueror of the five kinds of deaths (māra) and teacher of Devas and humans, attained Parinibbāna in Khemā Park, near Usabhavatī city. His relics, according to his resolve, dispersed and reached everywhere in Jambudīpa to be placed in shrines, and became objects for honour by beings such as humans, Devas and Brahmas.

22. The Chronicle of Buddha Kakusandha

After Buddha Vessabhū's attainment of Parinibbāna, when the aeon in which he appeared had come to an end, 29 empty aeons (suñña-kappa) which were aeons having no Buddhas elapsed and then there emerged the present Fortunate Aeon (Bhadda-kappa) of five Buddhas. In this aeon appeared four Buddhas, namely, Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana, Kassapa and Gotama. The next Buddha, who is yet to come, is Buddha Metteyya.

The chronicle of Buddha Kakusandha, the first of these five Buddhas, is as follows: The Fortunate Aeon comprises 64 inclusive periods (antara-kappa). In the eighth inclusive period according to the Long Chronicle of the Kings (Mahārāja-vaṃsa) or in the first inclusive period according to the Glass Palace Chronicle (Hmannan Rāja-vaṃsa), when the human lifespan decreased from immeasurables to 40,000 years, Bodhisatta Kakusandha, on complete fulfilment of the perfections, was reborn in Tusita Heaven.

Early Life

Having complied with the request made by Devas and Brahmas to become a Buddha, he descended to the human world to be conceived in the womb of a Brahmin woman, Visākhā [189] by name, wife of the Brahmin chaplain Aggidatta, who was advisor to King Khemaṅkara of the city of Khemavatī. When ten months had elapsed, the Bodhisatta was born in Khemavatī Park.

As has been mentioned, all past Buddhas, from Dīpaṅkara to Vessabhū, belonged to royal families, but Buddha Kakusandha was born to a Brahmin family. In the society which is composed of four assemblies of people: nobles (khattiya), Brahmins, traders and lowly ones, never is a Buddha conceived, in his final existence, in the womb of a woman of the latter two classes.

As for nobles and Brahmins, sometimes nobles enjoy superiority and at other times, Brahmins do. At a time, when people show the highest honour to nobles, Bodhisattas are born into that class, for they are considered the best. At other times, when people show the greatest honour to the Brahmins, Bodhisattas are born in their families, for they are then supposed to be the foremost.

In this way, Buddhas hail only from noble and Brahmin families. Since recognition of the former as the most superior is more frequent, Buddhas are generally nobles by birth; and because it is only sometimes that Brahmins gain superiority, Buddhas of Brahmin birth are fewer. Thus, the greater number of noble Buddhas and the smaller number of Brahmin Buddhas should be understood.

When the youthful Bodhisatta Kakusandha came of age, he lived in three mansions: Kāma, Kāmavaṇṇa and Kāmasuddhi. Being entertained and served by his Brahmin wife, Rocinī by name, who had 30,000 Brahmin maids, he thus enjoyed a divine-like household life for 4,000 years.

When he had seen the four omens and when Rocinī had given birth to a son named Uttara, Brahmin Kakusandha renounced the world riding a chariot drawn by a thoroughbred horse and became a recluse. Joining him were 40,000 men who also became recluses themselves.

Awakening

With these 40,000 recluses, Bodhisatta Kakusandha practised the austerities for eight months. On the full moon of May (Vesākha), the day he would become a Buddha, he partook of the milk rice offered by the daughter of a Brahmin, Vajirindhā, of the market-town of Vajirindhā and spent the daytime in the local acacia grove. In the evening, he went alone to the Mahā Bodhi tree and on the way he accepted eight handfuls of grass from Subhadda, a barley field watchman. As soon as he spread the grass at the foot of the Sirīsa Mahā Bodhi tree,<sup>82</sup> there appeared the unconquered seat of 26 cubits. Sitting cross-legged on the seat, he concentrated his energy at four levels and became a Buddha in the same way as previous Buddhas.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. After becoming a Buddha, Buddha Kakusandha stayed in the neighbourhood of the Sirīsa Mahā Bodhi tree for 49 days. Having accepted the request made by a Brahma for his teaching, he contemplated who he should teach first and he saw his companions in renunciation. Using his psychic power, he immediately appeared at their residence in Isipatana Deer Park, near the town of Makila. When in their midst, he taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, which was also taught by previous Buddhas, to numerous Devas and Brahmas who went to listen to it respectfully. At that time, 400 billion Devas and humans attained the paths and fruitions. [190]
2. At a later time, Buddha Kakusandha displayed the twin miracle near a Sāla tree, close to the city-gate of Kaṇṇakujja and taught the Dhamma. 300 billion Devas and humans penetrated the four noble truths and gained emancipation.
3. Still at a later time, another Dhamma teaching occasion (Dhammābhisamaya) took place in the following manner. At a Deva shrine, not too far away from the town of Khemavatī, lived a divine Yakkha named Naradeva. At the time of propitiation, he received, in his visible frame, honour done to him by the people. He was, however, in the habit of catching human beings who, through a difficult road approach to a big pond in the middle of a huge forest, fetched various species of lotus. If there were no people there, he went back to his great forest-abode and caught those who happened to be there and devoured them.

In fact, the road through the forest was notorious for its difficult terrain. At one time, at both ends of the forest, people were discussing among themselves as to how to get through the wilderness. At that time, after emerging from his attainment of great compassion (mahā-karuṇā-samāpatti) early in the morning, Buddha Kakusandha surveyed the world and saw the Yakkha, Naradeva, and those people in his vision of wisdom. So, using his psychic power, he went through the sky and, while the people were looking up, he displayed various types of miracles. Then he descended into Naradeva's mansion and took a seat on the Yakkha's splendid couch.

Naradeva became delighted the moment he saw the Buddha in the sky emitting a radiance of six colours from his body, and thought to himself: "The Buddha is coming here out of compassion for me." With his attendant Yakkhas, he went to the Himālayas and brought back aquatic and terrestrial flowers of various hues and scents, with which he honoured the Buddha, singing in praise of him who still remained on the couch. Naradeva stood with his clasped hands touching his forehead in salutation.

On seeing the Buddha's miracles, the people's minds became serene and they all went to the Buddha and encircling him and paid respects to him. By explaining to the Yakkha how wholesome deeds are related to wholesome results, Buddha Kakusandha inspired the Yakkha and by giving a talk on the abodes of intense suffering, made him frightened. Thereafter, the Buddha taught the four noble truths. At that time, countless Devas and humans penetrated the truths and gained emancipation.

A Single Meeting of the Disciples

There was only one meeting of Buddha Kakusandha's disciples. It took place in the Isipatana Deer Park, near the city of Kaṇṇakujja, on the full moon of February (Māgha). Amidst 40,000 Arahats, who had been his companions in renunciation, Buddha Kakusandha recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha).

Bodhisatta as King Khema

At the time of Buddha Kakusandha our Bodhisatta was King Khema. Having made a grand offering of bowls and robes to the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha, and also having offered them such medicinal materials as minerals for preparing eye-ointment, and herbs including liquorice among others, he became so immensely pleased with the Dhamma taught by the Buddha that he renounced the world and became a monk in the Buddha's presence. With reference to him, the Buddha predicted: "This monk Khema will indeed become a Buddha, named Gotama, in this Fortunate Aeon."

Having heard the Buddha's prophecy, the Bodhisatta Khema became overjoyed and determined to fulfil the ten perfections even more energetically.

Particulars of Buddha Kakusandha

Buddha Kakusandha's birthplace was Khemavatī city.

His father was Brahmin Aggidatta, Brahmin chaplain to King Khemaṅkara, and his mother was Visākhā, a Brahmin [191] lady.

He lived a household life for 4,000 years.

His three mansions were Kāma, Kāmavaṇṇa and Kāmasuddhi.

His wife was Rocinī, a Brahmin lady, who had 30,000 attendants.

His son was Uttara.

The vehicle he used in renunciation, after seeing the four omens, was a chariot drawn by a thoroughbred horse.

He practised the austerities for eight months.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Vidhura and Ven. Sañjīva.

His attendant was Ven. Buddhija.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Sāmā and Ven. Campā.

His Bodhi tree was a Sirīsa.

His noble male supporters were the wealthy men, Accuta and Sumana.

His noble female supporters were Nandā and Sunandā.

Buddha Kakusandha's height was 40 cubits.

The radiance from his body spread around, up to ten leagues.

The human lifespan during his time was 40,000 years. He lived for four-fifths of this lifespan rescuing beings such as humans, Devas and Brahmas from the flood-waters of Saṃsāra and placed them on the shore of Nibbāna.

In the world of Devas and humans, he opened the “shop of Dhamma” for the virtuous, male and female alike, and bravely roared a lion’s roar: “I am an omniscient Buddha indeed. The defilements and mental pollutants with their latent tendencies have all been rooted out from me.” After that, with his Arahāt disciples, Buddha Kakusandha attained Parinibbāna.

The Buddha, who was endowed with a voice of eight qualities:<sup>83</sup> clearness, sweetness, legibility, pleasantness, firmness, fullness, depth and echo, and his two chief disciples and other Arahāt disciples who were possessed of morality that was unbreached, untorn, unmottled, and free at all times, they have all disappeared. Unsubstantial and futile indeed are all conditioned things!

In this manner, Buddha Kakusandha attained Parinibbāna in Khema Park. In that very park, a shrine was erected over the relics of Buddha Kakusandha. It was exactly one league high.

23. The Chronicle of Buddha Koṇāgamana

After Buddha Kakusandha’s attainment of Parinibbāna, in the present Fortunate Aeon (Bhadda-kappa), the lifespan of human beings gradually decreased from 40,000 years to ten years and increased to immeasurables. When it reached 30,000 years on its next decline, Bodhisatta Koṇāgamana, on his complete fulfilment of the perfections was reborn in Tusita. Having complied with the request made by Devas and Brahmas to become a Buddha, he descended to the human world to be conceived in the womb of a Brahmin lady named Uttarā, wife of the Brahmin Yaññadatta, in the city of Sobhavatī. When ten months had elapsed, he was born in Subhavatī Park.

At the time of the boy’s birth, there fell a heavy shower of gold over the whole of Jambudīpa and taking the significance of this event, “the coming down of gold from the sky,” learned readers of omens and his relatives named him Kanakāgamana [192] kanaka means “gold,” āgamana means “coming,” hence Kanakāgamana “the boy for whom gold has come down.” Owing to its antiquity, the original name Kanakāgamana has taken the corrupt form of Koṇāgamana. Or by means of derivation, the first syllable ka is changed into ko, na into ṇa and the final ka has been elided.

Early Life

When the boy Koṇāgamana came of age, he lived in three palatial mansions: Tusita, Santusita and Santuṭṭha. Being entertained and served by his wife Rucigattā, a Brahmin lady, and her host of 16,000 Brahmin female attendants, he thus enjoyed a divine-like household life for 3,000 years.

When Brahmin Koṇāgamana had seen the four omens while living a household life and when his wife Rucigattā had given birth to a son, named Satthavāha, he renounced the world riding an elephant. Thirty thousand men, following his example also renounced the world.

Awakening

With his 30,000 recluses Koṇāgamana practised the austerities. On the full moon of May (Vesākha), the day in which he would become a Buddha, he partook of the milk rice offered by Aggisoṇā, daughter of Aggisoṇa, and spent the daytime in the local Acacia grove. In the evening, he went alone to the Mahā Bodhi tree. On the way, he accepted eight handfuls of grass offered by Jaṭatinduka, a barley field watchman. As soon as he spread the grass at the foot of the Cluster Fig (Udumbara) Mahā Bodhi tree, there appeared the unconquered seat of 20 cubits. Sitting cross-legged on the seat, he concentrated his energy at four levels in the same manner as previous Buddhas, and became a Buddha.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. After becoming a Buddha, Buddha Koṇāgamana stayed in the neighbourhood of the Mahā Bodhi tree for 49 days. Having accepted a Brahma's request for his teaching, he contemplated who he should teach first, and he saw the 30,000 recluses who were his companions in renunciation. By his psychic power, he immediately appeared at their residence in the Isipatana Deer Park, near the city of Sudassana. Sitting in the middle of these recluses, he taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, which was also taught by previous Buddhas, and which Devas and Brahasmas went to listen to. By the end of this discourse, 300 billion Devas and humans attained the paths and fruitions.
2. At a later time, when Buddha Koṇāgamana displayed the twin miracle of water and fire near the Sāla tree, close to the city gate of Sundara, and eradicated wrong views and taught Dhamma, 200 billion Devas and humans attained the paths and fruitions.

3. After displaying the twin miracle, Buddha Koṇāgamana went to Tāvātimsa and sat on the stone-slab placed at the foot of the Pāricchattaka tree, he taught Abhidhamma to Devas and Brahmas who had assembled there from the 10,000 world-element. At that time, 100 billion attained the paths and fruitions.

Single Occasion of the Disciples' Meeting

The only meeting of Buddha Koṇāgamana's disciples took place when the Buddha was staying in a park, named Surindadeva, near the city of Sundaravatī. He taught Dhamma to princes Bhiyyosa and Uttara, who were to become his chief disciples, together with 30,000 [193] strong retainers and called upon them: "Come, monks." They became summoned monastics and became Arahats. In the middle of these 30,000 Arahats, on the full moon of February (Māgha), Buddha Koṇāgamana recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha).

The Bodhisatta as King Pabbata

At the time of Buddha Koṇāgamana our Bodhisatta was King Pabbata, in the city of Mithilā. He was a powerful ruler associated with strong allies. Hearing that Buddha Koṇāgamana had arrived in his city, he welcomed him with his retinue and army, invited him respectfully and performed a grand alms giving. He also requested the Buddha to observe the Rains Retreat (Vassa) in his city and he would look after him and his Saṅgha for the three months of the rainy season. Besides, he offered the Saṅgha, headed by the Buddha, cotton cloth, silk cloth, woollen cloth, golden sandals and many other things made in Pattuṇṇa country and Cīna country. The Buddha then predicted of him: "In this Fortunate Aeon, this King Pabbata will indeed become a Buddha, named Gotama." Having heard the Buddha's prophecy, the Bodhisatta, King Pabbata, was so pleased that he firmly resolved to fulfil the ten perfections even more energetically.

Since he was a man who had been seeking omniscience, he made a great offering of gifts to Buddha Koṇāgamana, renounced his magnificent kingship and became a monk in the presence of the Buddha.

Particulars of Buddha Koṇāgamana

Buddha Koṇāgamana's birthplace was Sobhavatī city, which was ruled by King Sobha.

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 211

His father was the Brahmin Yaññadatta and his mother was Uttarā, a Brahmin lady.

He lived a household life for 3,000 years.

He lived in three palatial mansions: Tusita, Santusita and Santuṭṭha.

His wife was Rucigattā, a Brahmin lady, who had a retinue of 16,000 female Brahmin attendants.

His son was Satthavāha.

He renounced the world riding an elephant after seeing the four omens.

He practised the austerities for six months.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Bhyyosa and Ven. Uttara.

His attendant was Ven. Sotthija.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Samuddā and Ven. Uttarā.

His Bodhi tree was a Cluster Fig (Udumbara).

His noble male supporters were the wealthy men, Ugga and Somadeva.

His female supporters were Sīvalā and Sāmā.

Buddha Koṇāgamana's height was 30 cubits.

He was adorned with the radiance of six colours like the pure gold in the goldsmith's crucible.

The lifespan during Buddha Koṇāgamana's time was 30,000 years. For four-fifths of this lifespan he lived, rescuing beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, from the flood waters of Saṃsāra and placing them on the shores of Nibbāna.

In order that beings could stay and worship on the shrine platform of insight wisdom (vipassanā-ñāṇa-paññā), Buddha Koṇāgamana constructed the shrine of the 37 constituents of Awakening (Bodhi-pakkhiya-dhammā) that was adorned with the banner of the four noble truths, and made the "bouquet of Dhamma," after which, with his Arahat disciples, he attained Parinibbāna.

Buddha Koṇāgamana's disciples, who were accomplished in the exercise of supernormal powers, and Buddha Koṇāgamana, who had expounded supermundane Dhamma, all of them have passed away. Unsubstantial and futile are all conditioned things! [194]

In this way, Buddha Koṇāgamana, who had penetrated the four noble truths and other Dhammas that should be known, attained Parinibbāna in the pleasure named Pabbata. His relics were dispersed in accordance with his resolve, reaching everywhere in Jambudīpa and were paid homage to by beings such as humans, Devas and Brahmas.

24. The Chronicle of Buddha Kassapa

After Buddha Koṇāgamana's attainment of Parinibbāna in this Fortunate Aeon, the lifespan of human beings gradually decreased from 30,000 years to ten years and increased to immeasurables. When it reached 20,000 years on its next decline, Bodhisatta Kassapa was reborn in Tusita.

Early Life

Having complied with the request made by Devas and Brahmas to become a Buddha, he descended to the human world to be conceived in the womb of Dhanavatī, a Brahmin lady and wife of the Brahmin Brahmadatta in the city of Bārāṇasī, which was ruled by King Kiki. When ten months had elapsed, the Bodhisatta was born in Isipatana Deer Park. On his naming day, learned readers of omens and his relatives named him Kassapa, for he was a descendant of the clan of that name.

When the boy Kassapa came of age, he lived in three mansions: Haṃsa, Yasa and Sirinanda. Being entertained and served by his wife Sunandā, a Brahmin lady, who had 48,000 female attendants, he thus enjoyed a divine-like household life for 2,000 years.

When he had seen the four omens while living a household life and when his wife Sunandā had given birth to a son, named Vijitasena, he was stirred with spiritual urgency and he thought to himself: "I shall renounce the world immediately today."

No sooner had he thought this than the Bodhisatta's mansion rotated like a potter's wheel and flew up into the sky. And, like the moon coming out in the company of the stars in autumn, it produced a very delightful light, and the mansion moved on, with hundreds of people accompanying it as though adorning the vault of heavens, as though exhibiting its glory, as though attracting spectators and captivating their hearts, and as though lending splendour to the treetops. Finally, it came down to the ground with the Banyan (Nigrodha) Bodhi tree in its centre.

Then the Bodhisatta got down from the mansion. Standing on the ground, he accepted the robes offered by a Brahma and put them on. The Bodhisatta's wife and female attendants also got down from the mansion and went to a distance of half a mile where they erected temporary shelters like the barracks of an army. Joining the Bodhisatta, all the men, who had come along with him, also renounced the world.

Awakening

With the recluses who had joined him, Bodhisatta Kassapa practised the austerities. On the full moon of May (Vesākha), the day on which he would become a Buddha, he partook of the milk rice offered by his wife Sunanda and spent the daytime in the local Acacia grove. In the evening, he proceeded alone to the Mahā Bodhi tree. On the way, he accepted eight handfuls of grass offered by Soma, a barley field watchman. As soon as he spread the grass at the foot of the Mahā Bodhi tree, there appeared the unconquered seat of fifteen cubit feet. Sitting cross-legged on the seat, he concentrated his energy at four levels and, in the same manner as previous Buddhas, he became a Buddha.

Five Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

1. After becoming a Buddha, Buddha Kassapa stayed in the vicinity of [195] the Mahā Bodhi tree for 49 days. Having complied with a Brahma's request for his teaching, he contemplated who he should teach first and he saw ten million recluses, his companions in renunciation, who were endowed with the merits of their past deeds which could lead to the paths and fruitions. By his psychic power, he immediately appeared at their residence, Isipatana Deer Park, near the city of Bārāṇasī. Staying in the middle of these recluses, the Buddha taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse by following the practice of previous Buddhas, as well as to Devas and Brahmas, who went to listen respectfully. By the end of the discourse, 20 million Devas and humans attained the paths and fruitions.

2. At a later time, when Buddha Kassapa taught Dhamma while travelling from town to town, from village to village, and from market-town to market-town, 100 billion Devas and humans attained the paths and fruitions.

3. Still at a later time, when Buddha Kassapa displayed the twin miracle of water and fire and taught the Dhamma near the Indian Laurel (Asana) tree, close to the gate of Sundara city, 50 billion Devas and humans penetrated the four noble truths and gained emancipation.

4. Having displayed the twin miracle of water and fire, Buddha Kassapa, in the celestial Assembly Hall named Sudhamma in Tāvātimsa, taught Abhidhamma in order to benefit Devas and Brahmas who had assembled there and were listening respectfully. This Dhamma was especially meant for a Deva, who had been his mother. At that time, 30 billion Devas and Brahmas penetrated the four noble truths and gained emancipation.

5. There was once a Yakkha who was as powerful as the one named Naradeva during Buddha Kakusandha's lifetime. He was well known by the same name of Naradeva. Assuming the appearance of a king ruling in a city outside Jambudīpa and also assuming the king's voice, behaviour and other characteristics, he killed the king and devoured him. Then he ruled over the whole kingdom slaying many people for food. He also indulged in debauchery with women.

When intelligent queens, maids of honour and members of retinue discovered: "This man is not our master, nor our king; he is indeed a Yakkha," he felt threatened and then killed and devoured them all and moved on to another city where he made himself king in the similar manner.

Killing and devouring people in this way, Naradeva arrived at Sundara city. Having heard of his reign of terror, the citizens became scared of the danger of death and fled from their city. Seeing the tumultuous situation of the people, Buddha Kassapa went and stood before the Yakkha. When he saw the Buddha standing in front of him, he defied the Buddha by roaring thunderously. Unable to frighten the Buddha, he approached him for refuge. He also put forward some questions which the Buddha answered to his satisfaction. When the Buddha admonished him and taught a discourse, a large multitude of Devas and humans, who had assembled there respectfully to listen to it, penetrated the four noble truths and gained emancipation.

The Single Occasion of the Disciples' Meeting

The meeting of Buddha Kassapa's Arahat disciples took place just once, in the city of Bārāṇasī. When Tissa, son of the Brahmin chaplain, saw the 32 marks of a Great Man on the body of Bodhisatta Kassapa, he remembered his father's word that “only those who would become Buddhas can have such marks.” As he had not one iota of doubt about [196] it, he thought to himself: “This Kassapa will become a Buddha through supreme renunciation. I shall work hard to be free from the suffering of Saṃsāra after becoming a monk in the presence of this Buddha Kassapa.” Accordingly, he went to the Himālayas and became an ascetic even before Bodhisatta Kassapa renounced the world. The ascetics of his company were 20,000 in number.

Later on, when he heard that: “Kassapa, after renouncing the world, has now become a Buddha,” he left the Himālayas with his company of 20,000 ascetics, and requested to be ordained in the presence of the Buddha. Being called upon by the Buddha: “Come, monks,” Tissa the ascetic with his 20,000 companions became summoned monastics and Arahats. In the assembly of these 20,000 monks, on the full moon of February (Māgha) Buddha Kassapa recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha).

The Bodhisatta as Jotipāla the Youth

At the time of Buddha Kassapa our Bodhisatta was famous as Jotipāla the youth. He could recite the Veda texts continuously, learned various hymns by heart, and he reached perfection in the Vedas and was accomplished in treatises on prediction that explain the physical marks of an extraordinary being, etc., treatises on legends that narrate ancient tales and all arts and crafts that had been handed down by generation after generation of teachers. No less accomplished, but fully well-versed and skilful was he in terrestrial science and celestial science.

Jotipāla was an intimate friend of Ghaṭikāra the potter, who, being a noble supporter of Buddha Kassapa, was greatly devoted to the Three Treasures and was famous as a Non-returner (Anāgāmi). Ghaṭikāra the potter took him to Buddha Kassapa.

After listening to the Buddha’s Dhamma, Jotipāla became a monk in the Buddha’s presence. Highly energetic, clever in performing duties, big and small, and not negligent in any matters associated with the three trainings of morality, concentration, and wisdom, he shouldered responsibilities in the Buddha’s Dispensation.

Having learned the teachings (pariyatti) of the Buddha which comprised nine divisions, he glorified the Buddha’s Dispensation. Discerning Jotipāla’s aforesaid marvellous qualities, Buddha Kassapa predicted of him: “This monastic Jotipāla will indeed become a Buddha, named Gotama, even in this Fortunate Aeon.” On hearing the Buddha’s prophecy, the noble monastic Jotipāla became overjoyed and resolved to fulfil the ten perfections even more energetically.

On account of his only wish, which was attainment of omniscience, our Bodhisatta, who would become the inconceivable Lord of the Three Worlds, kept himself far away from all demeritorious deeds that are to be avoided throughout Samsāra, and he put efforts unflinchingly to perform meritorious deeds, which ordinary people can hardly do, in absolute fulfilment of the ten perfections.

From the above quoted Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vam̐sa) text, it seems that Ghaṭikāra the potter brought his friend, Jotipāla the youth, to Kassapa Buddha without difficulty. In reality, however, he did not succeed easily in doing so. He had to persuade Jotipāla again and again and finally, used force by dragging him along by his hair. This is mentioned in the Discourse about Ghaṭikāra (Ghaṭikāra-sutta, MN 81). The detailed story of Ghaṭikāra and that of Jotipāla should be known from that discourse.

Particulars of Buddha Kassapa

Buddha Kassapa’s birthplace was Bārāṇasī city where King Kiki reigned.

His father was Brahmin Brahmadata and his mother was Dhanavatī, a Brahmin lady.

He lived a household life for 2,000 years.

His three mansions were Hamsa, Yasa and Sirinanda.

His wife was Sunandā, a Brahmin lady who had 48,000 female [197] Brahmin attendants.

His son was Vijitasena.

The vehicle in which he renounced the world was a mansion.

He practised the austerities for seven days.

His two male chief disciples were Ven. Tissa and Ven. Bhāradvāja.

His attendant was Ven. Sabbamitta.

His two female chief disciples were Ven. Anulā and Ven. Uruvelā.

The Twenty-Four Buddhas – 217

His Bodhi tree was a Banyan (Nigrodha) tree.

His noble male supporters were Sumaṅgala and Ghaṭikāra the potter.

His female supporters were Vijitasenā and Bhaddā.

Buddha Kassapa's height was 20 cubits.

He was glorious like forceful lightning and the full moon surrounded by planets and stars.

The lifespan during his time was 20,000 years. He lived for four-fifths of this lifespan rescuing numerous beings from the waters of Saṃsāra and placed them on the shores of Nibbāna.

Buddha Kassapa created the big pond of Dhamma for beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, and gave the “unguent of the four kinds of monastic precepts (catu-pārisuddhi-sīla) for them to beautify their minds, made them put on the garments of conscience (hirī) and concern (ottappa), distributed among them the flowers of the 37 things on the side of Awakening (Bodhi-pakkhiyā-dhammā), and placed the spotless mirror of the path-knowledge of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga-ñāṇa) so that they could see clearly for themselves, distinguishing between faulty things and faultless things, between deeds of merit and unwholesome deeds. He placed the mirror as though he were inviting those who were wandering in search of Nibbāna near the aforesaid pond: “Behold yourselves in all kinds of adornment.”

He provided those who listened to his admonishment with the clothing of the five precepts, ten precepts and the four kinds of monastic precepts so that they could fight against their enemy, the defilements. By making them fasten their coats of mail of the four mundane and five supermundane absorptions (jhāna); by making them wear the leather robe of mindfulness (sati) and clear comprehension (sampajañña); by supplying them with the full military equipment of the sublime energy at four levels; by giving them the shield of the four steadfast mindfulnesses (satipaṭṭhāna) so that they could defend themselves from the various enemy defilements.

By making his army of disciples wield the lances of very sharp insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) and giving them the sword of path-wisdom (magga-paññā), the swords that had been sharpened on the whet stone of energy (virīya) and by handing to them the supermundane precepts so that they could eradicate their inclinations to associate with defilements. By giving them various dressing articles such as the three understandings (vijjā) and the six super knowledges (abhiññā), having fashioned the crowning flower of supermundane fruitions so that they could adorn and beautify themselves, and by making a big cluster of the flowers of the nine supermundane attainments and together with it, the white umbrella of the Arahat fruition (Arahatta-phala) so that they could protect themselves against the sun of demerits. By so doing, Buddha Kassapa created the great bloom of the eightfold path (magga), leading happily to the haven of Nibbāna. Then Buddha Kassapa and his numerous Arahat disciples attained Parinibbāna and came to the end of his final existence.

That Buddha Kassapa, the embodiment of unmeasurable qualities, whom others could hardly approach; the gem of Dhamma taught by him was in a position to extend its bold invitation saying: “Come, have a look and try it as a practice.”

The gem of the Saṅgha, the Saṅgha of disciples who were most excellent and had practised that gem of Dhamma well, all these have vanished. Unsubstantial and futile indeed are all conditioned things!

In this way, Buddha Kassapa, conqueror of the five kinds of deaths (māra), teacher of Devas and humans, attained Parinibbāna in a great park called Setavya, near Setavya city, in the [198] country of Kāsi. The people of Jambudīpa unanimously held a meeting and, for honouring him, they erected a shrine (cetiya) with bricks; each brick cost ten million of money to lay externally and each brick to lay internally cost five millions. This shrine was one league high.

Our Bodhisatta had thus received the prediction concerning his Buddhahood from the former 24 Buddhas, beginning with Dīpaṅkara and ending with Kassapa, and this has been composed briefly in the Poem on the Dhamma Rays (Dhammarasi Pyo, vv. 7, 8 and 9).<sup>84</sup>

[The chapter that followed this in the original was called Chapter X: Supplement, which summarised the Bodhisatta’s lives during this period. This is now included in the Further Explanations.]

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta

The Story of Setaketu, the Bodhisatta

In this way, our future Gotama had adorned himself with the flower of prophecy: “This man will certainly become a Buddha amongst the three kinds of beings, humans, Devas and Brahmas,” uttered by the 24 Buddhas, from Dīpaṅkara to Kassapa, out of the 27 Buddhas who appeared in the period of time lasting four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons. Throughout that period of four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, the Bodhisatta had endeavoured to fulfil the perfections (pāramī), charity (cāga) and good conduct (cariyā) by the aforesaid four means of development (bhāvanā) and reached the pinnacle of the fulfilment of all these requisites, which were conducive to his becoming a Buddha. This being so, in the last existence as a Bodhisatta when he was reborn as Prince Vessantara, he brought to termination the entire period of the accumulation of the perfections by performing all the final deeds of merit which surpassed everything, which was beyond comparison and which was to be crowned with the success of Awakening. This commanded the awe and veneration even of the inanimate great earth (mahā-paṭhavi) that quaked and trembled seven times. And, having ended his lifespan in the human abode, the Bodhisatta was reborn as a Deva by the name of Setaketu in the abode of Tusita. He was endowed with the ten attributes, in which he was superior to other Devas:

1. Long life.
2. Physical beauty.
3. Great happiness.
4. Immense wealth and retinue.
5. Authority and power.
6. Sense of sight.
7. Sense of hearing.
8. Sense of smell.
9. Sense of taste.
10. Sense of touch.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 220

With reference to the name of the Bodhisatta, it is mentioned in the chapter on Jewelled Walkway (Ratana-caṅkama), in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa, 1.66), as follows: Yadāhaṃ Tusite kāye, Santusito nāmahaṃ tadā. This shows that the Deva had the name of Santusita. Also, in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) commentary and the sub-commentary on the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra), the same name is mentioned.

But in the exposition of the Discussion of Previous Lives (Pubbe-nivāsa-kathā) of the Expulsion (Pārājika) commentary, and in the commentary of the Discourse about Fear and Terror (Bhaya-bherava-sutta, MN 4), [213] the Deva's name is given as Setaketu. Moreover, successive authors of Myanmar Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa), such as the Light on the Realised One's Exalted Utterances (Tathāgata-udāna-dīpanī), the Garland of Decorative Stories (Mālālaṅkāra-vatthu), the Illustration of the Meaning of the Victor (Jinattha-pakāsanī), etc., give Setaketu as the name of the Deva. Therefore, it has been explained by various teachers that Santusita was a common name derived from Tusita, the name of the celestial abode, whereas Setaketu was the proper name that specifically refers to the Deva who would become Buddha Gotama.

Also when it is said that: “The great ocean, starting from the Cakkavāḷa range of mountains, gets deeper and deeper till it reaches the foot of Mount Meru, and its depth becomes 84,000 leagues,” it goes without saying that counting all droplets of water in the ocean is impossible.

In the same way, when virtuous people learned briefly from hearing or from reading that the Bodhisatta, in four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, untiringly and continuously fulfilled the perfections, charity and good conduct by the four means of development, one can reflect profoundly with devotional faith on how the Bodhisatta had developed the perfections, etc., in the course of existences that were more numerous than the countless droplets of water in the great ocean.

The Buddha Uproar

Setaketu, the Bodhisatta, enjoyed supreme divine bliss in the abode of Tusita for 4,000 years, according to Deva reckoning, which is equivalent to 576 million years in the human world. Then 1,000 years before the end of his lifespan by human calculations in Tusita, the Suddhāvāsa Brahma proclaimed: “Friends, 1,000 years from today, there will appear in the human abode an omniscient Buddha!”

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 221

Because of this proclamation from the vault of heaven, the uproar announced the appearance of a Buddha (Buddha-kolāhala): “An omniscient Buddha will appear! An omniscient Buddha will appear!” and it reverberated across the entire human world, 1,000 years ahead of the event.<sup>85</sup>

The Request to the Bodhisatta

On hearing the uproar announcing the advent of a Buddha, all the Deva kings belonging to the 10,000 world-element, such as Catumaharājā, Sakka, Suyāma, Santusita, Sunimmita, Vasavattī, and all Mahā Brahmas congregated at a certain universe to hold a discussion about the Bodhisatta whose divine lifespan would last for only seven days by human reckoning, and whose approaching end of life had become manifest through the five signs (pubba-nimitta).<sup>86</sup>

Then they all approached Setaketu with their hands joined in adoration and requested him as follows: “Bodhisatta, you have completely fulfilled the ten perfections, not with the desire to gain the bliss of Sakka, Māra, Brahma or of a Universal Monarch. You fulfilled these perfections aspiring only after omniscient Buddhahood, in order to acquire for yourself freedom from the three worlds, as well as to liberate the multitudes of humans, Devas and Brahmas. Bodhisatta, this is the most propitious time for you to become an omniscient Buddha! This is truly the right moment to become an omniscient Buddha! Therefore, may you take conception in the womb of your mother in the human realm. After attaining Supreme Awakening, may you liberate humans, Devas and Brahmas from Samsāra by teaching the Dhamma leading to the deathless Nibbāna.”

The Five Great Investigations

The Bodhisatta Setaketu did not hastily give his consent to the request of the Devas and Brahmas who had come together from the 10,000 world-element. In consonance with the tradition of previous Bodhisattas, he made the five great investigations as follows:

1. The appropriate time for the appearance of a Buddha.
2. The appropriate island-continent for the appearance of a Buddha.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 222

3. The appropriate country for the appearance of a Buddha.
4. The family into which the Bodhisatta is reborn.
5. The lifespan of the Bodhisatta's mother-to-be.

1. Of these five great investigations, the Bodhisatta considered first: "Is the time right or not for the appearance of a Buddha in the human world?"

The time is not proper for the advent of a Buddha when the lifespan of human beings is on the increase from 100,000 years. Owing to such longevity, suffering caused by birth, suffering caused by disease, suffering caused by old age and suffering caused by death are not manifest. Veiled by their lengthy lifespan, human beings tend to be oblivious of all suffering.

The Dhamma sermons to be delivered by Buddhas invariably centre around the characteristics of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and non-self (anatta). If Buddhas appear when the lifespan is more than 100,000 years give sermons on the nature of impermanence, suffering and non-self, the people of that period will be perplexed, wondering what the Buddhas are teaching about. They will neither listen to nor believe the sermons. Without listening or believing, human beings will surely wonder what the Buddha's teaching is about. They will never realize the four noble truths and never achieve Nibbāna. It would be fruitless to teach the non-believers the discourse on the three characteristics which would liberate them from Saṃsāra. Therefore, the period when the lifespan extends more than 100,000 years is not the proper time for the Buddhas [214] to appear.

The period when the lifespan of human beings falls below 100 years is also not proper for a Buddha to appear, because beings belonging to such a period abound in the defilements of sensual pleasures. The Dhamma sermons given to such people will not endure. In fact, they will fade away instantly just as the scribbling with a stick on the surface of the water will disappear, leaving no mark whatsoever. Therefore, the short period of the declining lifespan below 100 years is also not the proper time for the Buddhas to appear.

Only the periods when lifespans range from 100,000 years down to 100 years are right for the appearance of a Buddha. These are the periods in which birth, old age and death manifest themselves clearly, in which the teaching on the three characteristics and the teaching as to how beings can be liberated from Saṃsāra is understood easily and in which beings are not so overwhelmed by the defilements of sensual pleasures, hence, it is the appropriate period for the most opportune arrival of a Buddha. Therefore, only the periods when lifespans range from 100,000 years down to 100 years, by human reckoning, is the most propitious time for a Bodhisatta to attain Buddhahood.<sup>87</sup> Thus, Bodhisatta Setaketu came to see the right time clearly, and decided: “This is the most propitious time for me to become a Buddha.”

2. Then he investigated the island-continent which serves as the place for the appearance of Buddhas. There are four large island-continents, each surrounded by 500 smaller islands. Of these, one is called Jambudīpa, as it is distinguished by a rose-apple (jambu) tree growing in it, and was clearly discerned by the Bodhisatta as the only island-continent on which previous Buddhas had appeared.

3. Then he went on investigating thus: “This Jambudīpa is extremely vast measuring 10,000 leagues. Where did former Buddhas appear in this vast expanse of land?” Then he saw it was the Middle Country (Majjhima-desa) in Jambudīpa that was the place of the appearance of the ancient Buddhas.

The Middle Country (Majjhima-desa) is demarcated on the east by the great Sāla tree east of the market-town of Gajaṅgala; on the south-east, by the river Salalavati; on the south, by the market town of Satakaṇṇika; on the west, by the Brahmin village of Thūna; on the north, by Mount Usīradhaja. The Middle Country, having the said five demarcations, is 300 leagues in length and 250 leagues in breadth with a circumference of 900 leagues. Regions outside this boundary are called border areas (paccanta). Only in the Middle Country do omniscient Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, chief disciples, great disciples, Universal Monarchs and powerful, wealthy noble, Brahmin and householder clans live and prosper.

In the Middle Country was situated Kapilavatthu, the royal city of the kingdom of the Sakyas. Bodhisatta Setaketu decided that he should be reborn in that royal city.

4. Investigating the family in which the Bodhisatta, in his last existence, should be reborn, he clearly perceived: “The former Bodhisattas in their respective last existences belonged neither to the merchant class nor to the poor class. They were born only in a noble or a Brahmin family, whichever is considered superior by the people of the period. At the time when people show the highest honour to the ruling families, the Bodhisatta is born in their class. At the time when people do so to the Brahmins, he is born in one of their families. The present time witnesses the nobles being honoured by the people, I should be reborn in one of their families. Among them, King Suddhodana of Kapilavatthu is a direct descendent of Mahā Sammata, the first elected primeval king, through an uninterrupted noble lineage of the pure Sakya clan. This King Suddhodana of pure noble birth shall be my father.”

5. Finally, he investigated as to who should be his mother in his last human existence. He clearly perceived: “The royal mother of a Buddha is a paragon of modesty and chastity; [215] she never indulges in liquor or intoxicants; she has accumulated merit and fulfilled the perfections throughout 100,000 aeons to become the mother of a Buddha. From the moment she is born as the future mother of a Buddha, she continuously observes and upholds the five precepts without any breach. Siri Mahā Māyā Devī, the chief consort of King Suddhodana, is fully endowed with all these qualities. Thus, this Chief Queen, Siri Mahā Māyā Devī, shall be my mother.” Then investigating further the remaining lifespan of the queen, he perceived clearly that she had only ten months and seven days more to live.

The Consent

In this way, after making the five great investigations, the Bodhisatta Setaketu resolved: “I will descend to the human abode and become a Buddha.” Having so resolved, the Bodhisatta gave his consent to the Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element who had assembled to request him: “Devas and Brahmas, now is the time for me to become a Buddha as you have requested. You may now take leave as you please, I will go down to the human abode to attain Buddhahood.”

After delivering his pledge and bidding farewell to all the Devas and Brahmas, Bodhisatta Setaketu, entered Nandanavana, the celestial garden, accompanied by the Devas from the Tusita realm.

Nandana Grove

An account of the Nandana<sup>88</sup> grove will be given here as described in the commentary to the Chapter about Nandaka (Nandana-vagga, SN 1.1). The Nandana Grove is so named because it gives delight (nandana) to all the Devas who visit it.

Each of the six planes of the heavenly realm has its own Nandana Grove. All these gardens give the same delight, whether they belong to the lower or upper celestial planes. Therefore, only the Nandana Grove of Tāvātimsa abode is described in detail in the texts as an example.

This Nandana Grove is a pleasant, splendid place with all kinds of precious celestial trees, flowers, pavilions, vehicles and a variety of enjoyable things which are enchanting, marvellous and awe inspiring to the worldling. It is a true garden resort where Devas can amuse themselves with singing, dancing and other entertainments presented by dancers and artists of various ages, various beauties, various voices, various forms and various colours. Each troupe of performers tries to rival and outplay the other in providing freely all kinds of sensual pleasures to those who come from the four quarters.

This Nandana Grove, which is considered by the Devas to be a great adornment of their abode with all its splendour and auspiciousness, stands as the most charming resort, and those entering it seeking the five pleasures of senses: enjoyable sights, sounds, scents, tastes and touches, are all delighted and satisfied.

This Nandana Grove is also a place of solace to those Devas who are nearing the end of their lifespan, and experiencing the five portents of impending demise, which warn them of the coming fate and which inevitably appear. Many Devas break down, sobbing and grieving at the imminent predicament of losing their blissful life; but once they enter this enchanting garden, they feel transformed back into persons of serenity, peace and happiness in an instant.

On whatever account they are afflicted with despair and lamentation, once these Devas step inside the Nandana Grove, they are absorbed in pleasures. As the morning dew and mist evaporate at the touch of the radiance of the rising sun, as the flame of the oil lamp flickers and dies out through a strong gust of wind, so the worries of the dying Devas are laid to rest. A saying has come into existence thus: “He who has not been to Nandana Grove, where all the best sensual pleasures of the world converge, cannot understand worldly happiness.” Such is the attraction of the Nandana Grove to all worldlings.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 226

In the commentary to the Section about Verañjā (Verañjā-kaṇḍa, Vin Pār 1, PTS 3.1) in the Vinaya, the following description is given: “The Nandana Grove of the Tāvātimsa Devas covers an area of 60 leagues in extent.<sup>89</sup> It is [216] splendidly decorated with celestial trees of 1,000 different species.”

The sub-commentary on the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra) in its comment on the Threefold Buddha-field (Tividha-buddha-khetta) also says: “Nandana Grove lies to the east of Sudassana city of Tāvātimsa and is surrounded by walls, fire screens and arched gateways made of jewels. The area measures 1,000 leagues. It is a recreational resort for all Devas. Two beautiful lakes, Mahānanda and Cūlananda, are located between Nandana Grove and Sudassana city. The environment of the lakes is clean. The surface water of the lakes is dark blue green, matching the sky free of mist and clouds.”

The Time for the Bodhisatta Demise

When Bodhisatta Setaketu entered Nandana Grove, the accompanying retinue of male and female deities addressed him: “On your demise from this abode of Devas, may you proceed to a good abode, the destination of beings accomplished in meritorious deeds!”

The Devas who were accompanying Bodhisatta Setaketu also urged him to recollect again and again his deeds of merit done in the past and moved around in Nandana Grove, surrounding the Bodhisatta. While the Bodhisatta was roaming about in Nandana Grove in the company of the Devas, who were urging him to reflect upon his previous meritorious life, the time of his demise arrived.

The Conception of the Bodhisatta

At the precise moment of the demise of Bodhisatta Setaketu, Siri Mahā Māyā, the Chief Queen of King Suddhodana of the kingdom of Kapilavatthu, was enjoying magnificent regal pleasures. She had now reached the third portion of the second stage of life<sup>90</sup> called middle age (majjhima-vaya).

The human life span then was 100 years. Thus the age of Sirī Mahā Māyā Devī was around 55 years and four months. This is elaborated on in the sub-commentary called the Light on the All-Seeing one (Samanta-cakkhu-dīpanī).

The Festival of the Constellation Uttarāsāḷha

It was the ninth waxing day of July (Āsāḷha) in the year 564 BCE, when the Chief Queen Siri Mahā Māyā was 55 years and four months old. The people of the kingdom were joyously celebrating the festival of the constellation Uttarāsāḷha, a traditional annual event. Everyone participated in the festivity, outdoing one another in merry-making.

Siri Mahā Māyā Devī also took part in the festival which was celebrated from the ninth to the fourteenth day of the waxing moon. The festival was distinguished by total abstinence from liquor and by beautification with flowers, perfumes and ornaments. On the full moon day of the month, the Chief Queen woke up early, took a perfumed bath and gave a most generous donation of money and materials worth 400,000 pieces of money. She then dressed herself and had a breakfast of the choicest food, after which she took the eight precepts from her teacher Devila, and proceeded to the exquisitely decorated royal chamber and spent the entire day on a couch of splendour, observing the eight precepts.

Mahā Māyā's Dream

Observing the eight precepts and lying on the couch of splendour in the last watch of the full moon night, Siri Mahā Māyā Devī fell into a short slumber and had a dream, which foretold the conception of a Bodhisatta, as follows: The four Great Kings lifted and carried her in her bed to Lake Anotatta in the Himālayas. Then she was placed on the flat surface of the orpiment slab

Thereafter, consorts of the four Four Great Kings came to the scene. They took the queen to Lake Anotatta and bathed her and helped her clean herself. Then they dressed her in celestial costumes and applied celestial cosmetics to her. They also adorned her with celestial flowers. Then she was put to bed with her head towards the east, in the inner chamber of a golden mansion inside a silver mountain, which was not far away from the lake.

At that moment in her dream she saw a pure white elephant grazing around the golden mountain, which was not far from the silver mountain where there was the golden mansion, inside which she slept. Then the white elephant descended from the golden mountain, ascended the silver mountain and entered the golden mansion. The white elephant then walked around the queen clockwise, and entered into her womb from the right side.

The Conception of the Bodhisatta

At the time when the queen was thus dreaming, Bodhisatta Setaketu, was going round Nandana Grove in Tusita enjoying delightful sights and sounds; while doing so he passed away from the abode of Devas with full comprehension and awareness. At that very instant the Bodhisatta was conceived in the lotus-like womb of his mother with the first great resultant consciousness (mahā-vipāka-citta), one of the nineteen initial thought moments (paṭisandhi-citta), a resultant of the first great wholesome consciousness (mahā-kusala-citta) accompanied by joy (somanassa-sahāgatā), combined with knowledge (ñāṇa-sampayutta), unprompted (asaṅkhārika) and caused by preparatory development (parikamma-bhāvanā) prior to the attainment of the absorption of loving-kindness (mettā-jhāna). This event took place on the morning of Thursday, the full moon of July (Āsāḷha), in the year 624 BCE. The precise moment of his conception was marked by the conjunction of the moon with the constellation Uttarāsāḷha.

The name of the year and the days of the Bodhisatta's conception and birth are mentioned here in accordance with the calculations given in secular works of astrology and the chronicles of the kings. The Pāli texts, commentaries and sub-commentaries are silent about them. The Ancient History of Gotama (Gotama-purāṇa) gives the 2570th year of the Kāliyuga as the date of birth of Buddha Gotama.

Simultaneous with the Bodhisatta's conception, there occurred a violent earthquake. The 10,000 world-element trembled and shook in the following six modes: The earth surface rose up in the east and sank in the west; it rose up in the west and sank in the east; it rose up in the north and sank in the south; it rose up in the south and sank in the north; it rose up in the centre and sank along the circumference; it rose up along the circumference and sank in the centre.

The Thirty-Two Great Prophetic Phenomena

Moreover, there appeared the 32 great prophetic phenomena that usually accompany the conception of a Bodhisatta in his last existence. From these wonderful events the wise could learn that the Bodhisatta had been conceived. The 32 prophetic phenomena, as enumerated in the introduction to the Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentary, are as follows:

At that moment:

1. A great light of unsurpassed brilliance spread throughout the entire 10,000 world-element.
2. The blind gained eyesight, as if they were desirous of seeing the glory of the [218] Bodhisatta.
3. The deaf gained hearing.
4. The dumb gained the ability to speak.
5. The deformed became normal.
6. The lame gained the ability to walk.
7. The imprisoned and those fettered with handcuffs, chains, etc., for confinement became free of all bondage.
8. Fires in every hell were extinguished.
9. Those suffering in the state of Petas were relieved of thirst and hunger.
10. Animals became free from danger.
11. All beings afflicted with diseases were cured.
12. All beings spoke endearingly to one another.
13. Horses neighed gleefully, in a sweet and pleasant manner.
14. Elephants trumpeted in a sweet and pleasant manner.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 230

15. All musical instruments, such as cymbals, harps, trumpets, etc., produced their sounds without being played.
16. Ornaments, such as bracelets, anklets, etc., worn by human beings tinkled without striking one another.
17. Open spaces and sceneries in all directions became distinct and clear.
18. A soft breeze blew gently, bringing peace and comfort to all living beings.
19. Unseasonal rain fell heavily, although it was not the rainy season.
20. Subterranean waters oozed out of the earth and flowed away in various directions.
21. No birds flew in the sky.
22. River waters that normally flowed continuously ceased to flow like a frightened servant who stops moving at the shout of his master.
23. Salty water in the ocean became sweet.
24. All lakes and ponds had their water surface covered with the five kinds of lotus.
25. All aquatic and terrestrial flowers blossomed simultaneously.
26. Flowers on tree trunks (khandha-paduma) bloomed exquisitely.
27. Flowers on branches (sākhā-paduma) bloomed exquisitely.
28. Flowers on creepers (latā-paduma) bloomed exquisitely.
29. Inflorescent flowers (daṇḍa-paduma) sprouting all over the land appeared in seven tiers after breaking through stone slabs.
30. Celestial lotus flowers dangled earthwards.
31. Flowers rained down continuously in the environment.
32. Celestial musical instruments made the sound of music automatically.

These 32 great prophetic phenomena can also be called the 32 great wonders. The 32 wonders, which were mentioned in chapter IX on the Chronicle of the Twenty-Four Buddhas, were these 32 great prophetic phenomena.

The entire 10,000 world-element, being adorned with such great prophetic phenomena, appeared resplendent like a huge garland of flowers, or like a large bouquet massively made or a vast bed of flowers spread layer upon layer. The air around was laden with fragrance as though this were caused by the gentle movement of a yak-tail fly-flap.<sup>91</sup> [219]

The Interpretation of Mahā Māyā's Dream

When Queen Siri Mahā Māyā woke up, she reported her dream to King Suddhodana. On the following morning, King Suddhodana summoned 64 leading Brahmin teachers and offered them prepared seats which were fit for the noble ones and the ground was besmeared evenly with fresh cowdung and strewn all over with rice flakes and the like, as an act of honour. The king also offered the Brahmins delicious milk rice cooked with ghee, honey and molasses, filled to the brim of the gold cups which were covered with gold and silver lids. And to please and satisfy them, the king presented them with new clothes, milch cows, and did other forms of honour.

After serving them with food, drinks, etc., and honouring them thus to their pleasure and satisfaction, King Suddhodana had the queen's dream related to the Brahmins and asked them: "What does the dream mean, is it fortune or misfortune? Read it and give me your interpretations."

The Brahmins replied to the king, giving their interpretations: "Great King, lay all your anxieties to rest. The queen has now conceived. The baby in the womb is a boy, not a girl – a son will be born to you. If he chooses to lead a princely life, he will surely become a Universal Monarch reigning over the four continents. If he renounces the household life as a recluse, he will surely become an omniscient Buddha who destroys and removes the roots of the defilements in the three worlds."

The Protection by Deva Kings

From the moment the Bodhisatta was conceived, the Four Great Kings, namely, Vessavaṇa and others who lived in this universe, entered the splendid chamber of Queen Siri Mahā Māyā and gave protection continuously, day and night, each holding a sword to ward off Petas and Yakkhas, and unsightly beasts and birds which could be seen or heard by the Bodhisatta and his mother. In this way, 40,000 Great Kings residing in the 10,000 world-element – each system having four such deities – guarded the entire space from the doors of the queen's splendid chamber up to the edges of the world-element, driving away the Petas, Yakkhas, etc.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 232

Such protection was afforded not because of the fear that someone would harm the lives of the Bodhisatta and his mother. Even if 1,000 billion Māras were to bring 1,000 billion gigantic Mount Merus to threaten the lives of the Bodhisatta in his last existence and his mother, all the Māras as well as the mountains would surely be destroyed and the Bodhisatta and his mother would remain unharmed. The protection was just to ward off evil sights and sounds which could possibly cause anxiety and fear to the queen. Another reason might be that the Great Kings protected the Bodhisatta through sheer veneration and devotion inspired by the Bodhisatta's glorious power.

The question may then arise, i.e., whether the Great Kings who came and kept guard inside the royal chamber of the Bodhisatta's mother made themselves visible or not to her. The answer is: They did not make themselves visible when she was bathing, dressing, eating and cleaning her body. They made themselves apparent when she entered her chamber of splendour and lay down on her excellent couch.

The sight of Devas might tend to frighten ordinary people, but it did not scare the Chief Queen at all by virtue of the Bodhisatta's and her own radiance. Seeing them was just like seeing familiar female and male palace guards.

Mahā Māyā's Observance of Moral Precepts

The mother of a Bodhisatta in his last existence is usually steadfast in observing moral precepts. Before the appearance of a Buddha, people usually took precepts from wandering ascetics by bowing and sitting respectfully before them, and Queen Siri Mahā Māyā, prior to the conception of the Bodhisatta, also used to receive the precepts from the recluse Kāḷadevila. It should be noted that the precepts were kept but not at all by submitting herself as a disciple of the recluse Kāḷadevila. But once the Bodhisatta was conceived in her womb, it was no longer proper for her to sit at the feet of any other person. Only the precepts received from somebody as an equal and not as a subordinate were observed.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 233

From the time of her conception of the Bodhisatta she kept [220] the precepts by herself.

The mother of a Bodhisatta in his last existence, from the time of pregnancy, becomes totally free of all sensuous desire for any man, even for the father of the Bodhisatta. It is her nature to remain chaste and pure. On the contrary, it cannot be said that sensuous thoughts would not arise in worldlings at the sight of her person. By virtue of her long fulfilment of the perfections and performance of deeds of merit, the mother of a Bodhisatta in his last existence is endowed with splendour or superb beauty, and elegance, which could not be faithfully represented in any painting or sculpture of her by the most accomplished master artists and sculptors.

On seeing such a mother of the Bodhisatta, if onlookers are not satisfied with the mere sight of her, and if they would attempt to approach her with passionate thoughts, their feet would become transfixed on the spot as if they were fettered with iron chains. Therefore, it should be well borne in mind that the mother of a Bodhisatta in his last existence is a noble, unique woman inviolable by any man or Deva.

The auspicious womb in which a Bodhisatta is conceived is so sacred, it is like a temple that no one else is worthy of occupying or making use of. Besides, while the mother of a Bodhisatta is living, no woman other than herself can be raised to the highest position as Chief Queen. Therefore, seven days after giving birth to the Bodhisatta, it is a natural phenomenon that she should pass away to the Tusita abode of the Devas. The lotus-like womb of Mahā Māyā Devī in which the Bodhisatta remained was as if filled with brilliant diamonds.

On hearing the good tidings that Mahā Māyā Devī, Chief Queen of King Suddhodana, ruler of the kingdom of Kapilavatthu, had conceived a precious son of power and glory, kings from far and near sent most valuable gifts, such as clothing, ornaments, musical instruments, etc., which might delight the Bodhisatta. The gifts which arrived in tribute from various quarters, owing to the deeds of merit performed in previous existences by the Bodhisatta and his mother, were too numerous to be measured or counted.

The Visibility of the Bodhisatta

Although Mahā Māyā Devī had conceived the Bodhisatta, she had no suffering at all, such as swelling, pain, heaviness, etc., in the limbs, unlike other pregnant women. Being thus free of these discomforts, she easily passed through the first stage of her pregnancy. When she reached the advanced stage and the embryo took concrete shape with the development of the five main branches of the body, she often had a look at her child to find out whether the child was in a proper, comfortable position and, if not, to do the needful as in the way of all mothers. Whenever she took a look, she saw the Bodhisatta clearly like iridescent silk thread passing through the pure, clean, beautiful lapis lazuli gem of eight facets; or, she saw him seated cross-legged reposefully leaning on the backbone of the mother like a speaker of Dhamma, seated on the Dhamma throne, leaning on its back-support.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 234

The reason why Mahā Māyā Devī was able to see her son in the lotus-like chamber of her womb was by virtue of the deeds of merit performed by her in previous existences which resulted in her skin texture and colour becoming extraordinarily clean and smooth, free from all impurities. The skin around the stomach was also smooth, clean and translucent like a sheet of glass or that of a priceless ruby. Thus the embryo was plainly visible to the mother who could see the Bodhisatta with naked eyes through the skin of her stomach, like an object encased in a crystal clear glass box.

Though Mahā Māyā Devī could clearly see the son inside her womb but he, from inside her womb, could not see her because his eye consciousness (cakkhu-viññāṇa) had not [221] yet developed.

The Birth of the Bodhisatta

Women other than the mother of a Bodhisatta in his last existence are apt to give birth either after or before the ten-month period of pregnancy. They know no definite time when their babies will be born. Their childbirth takes place unexpectedly while they are in one of the four postures. Some deliver their babies while lying, others while sitting, still others while standing or walking.

As for the mother of a Bodhisatta in his last existence, it is quite to the contrary. Her pregnancy lasts precisely ten full months or 295 days from the date of conception. Furthermore, a Bodhisatta is born only while the mother is assuming the standing posture. When he is born, he is immaculately clean, without even a speck of impurity, like a ruby placed on a freshly woven cloth of Kāsi origin.

An ordinary baby has to go through a very miserable ordeal at the time of birth. When the first spasms of the mother signalling the impending delivery begins, they set in motion a sequence of events, turning the baby into a head-down position; he also has to force his way out through the tight grip of the hard muscles in the region of the birth-canal thus suffering excruciating pains in the process, which could be compared to a man falling into a fathomless pit, or to an elephant being pulled through a narrow keyhole.

But unlike such childbirths, Bodhisattas always come out at birth as easily as water filtered through a water strainer. Like a preacher of Dhamma slowly and calmly descending from the Dhamma throne after having delivered a discourse; or like a man slowly coming down to the covered stairways of a relic shrine (stūpa); or like the sun with its 1,000 brilliant shafts of light breaking through the golden mountain and peering out, the Bodhisatta emerges in ease and comfort with stretched legs, open hands, wide-opened eyes, with mindfulness and comprehension, totally without fear.

Mahā Māyā's Journey to Devadaha

When Queen Mahā Māyā reached the final stage of her pregnancy, carrying the Bodhisatta for ten full months in the lotus-like chamber of her womb, as though she were carrying oil in a bowl, she felt the urge to visit her royal relatives' city Devadaha. She requested permission from King Suddhodana, saying: "Great King, I would like to pay a visit to my relatives in Devadaha."

King Suddhodana gave his assent and had adequate preparations made for the queen's journey. The entire stretch of road from Kapilavatthu to Devadaha was repaired and smoothed evenly; banana plants, betel palms, and water pots filled to the brim were placed on stands lining both sides of the roadway; flags and banners were also hoisted on poles along the road. Having prepared and decorated the highway which was comparable to a divine highway, the king had Mahā Māyā Devī seated in state on a newly made golden palanquin which was carried by 1,000 royal servants, accompanied by guards and attendants to perform sundry duties on the way. With such pomp and grandeur, the queen was sent off to Devadaha city.<sup>92</sup>

The Lumbinī Garden of Sāla Trees

Between Kapilavatthu and Devadaha cities, there was a grove of Sāla trees by the name of Lumbinī Garden, which was frequented by people from both kingdoms for recreation. When Mahā Māyā Devī reached it, every Sāla tree in the grove was in full bloom, from the bottom of the tree to the topmost branches.

Amidst the flowers and twigs of Sāla trees, swarms of bumblebees in five colours hummed, and flocks of birds of many species chirped, producing sweet melodious sounds. The whole Sāla grove was so delightful and enjoyable, with special features that it might be likened to the [222] Cittalatā Garden of Sakka, the Lord of the Devas. It was also like a place constantly filled with the sounds of mirth and merriment at a feast well organized by a powerful king.<sup>93</sup>

On account of the melodious sounds emanating from the female bees – which were buzzing delightfully among the buds and flowers, the twigs and branches and which were excited with the intoxicating nectar produced by fragrant Sāla flowers, and which were hovering around and enjoying the nectar themselves and carrying it for others as well<sup>94</sup> – Lumbinī was very much like Nandana Grove, the delight of the Devas.

*Vibhūsitā bāla-janāti-cālinī, vibhūsitāṅgī vaniteva mālinī,
sadā janānaṃ naya-nāli-mālinī, vilumpinīvātiviroci Lumbinī.*<sup>95</sup>

Just as a youthful maiden who can infatuate all men, who is possessed of limbs adorned with strings of beads and ear-ornaments, who is wearing flowers and is exceedingly fair, even so the Lumbinī Garden with all its ornamental features, the ever delightful resort which human beings feast their bee-like eyes on, was exceedingly beautiful as though it could even vie in splendour with that fair damsel.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 237

On seeing Lumbinī Garden of such immense splendour, Mahā Māyā Devī felt a desire to amuse herself in it. The ministers sought permission from King Suddhodana and with the royal consent they entered the garden carrying the Chief Queen on the golden palanquin.

The moment Mahā Māyā Devī entered Lumbinī Garden, all Devas proclaimed with an uproar which reverberated throughout the 10,000 world-element: “Today, the Bodhisatta will be born from the lotus-like chamber of his mother’s womb.” The Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element congregated, crowding the whole of this universe, bringing with them a large variety of auspicious treasures as gifts to pay homage and to celebrate the birth of the Bodhisatta. The vault of heaven was covered all over with their celestial white umbrellas and the entire universe resounded with their auspicious songs, celestial music and the sounds of conch shells blown by them.

As soon as Mahā Māyā Devī went into Lumbinī Garden, she felt a sudden urge to grasp with her hand a branch of the fully blooming Sāla tree, the trunk of which was straight and round. As if it were animate, the branch bent itself down like a cane stalk, made pliant by boiling, until it reached the palm of the queen. This is a marvellous event that stirred the minds of many.

Queen Mahā Māyā stood holding the Sāla branch that came down in the palm of her lovely outstretched right hand, which was adorned with newly made gold bracelets, her fingers were shapely like a lotus stem, her finger-nails were bright red, like the colour of a parrot’s beak. The great beauty of Queen Mahā Māyā at that instant resembled the moon that newly emerges from the dark, sombre clouds showing signs of impending rain or the lightning that dazzles in a momentary flash, or a celestial nymph who makes her appearance in the Nandana Grove.

The Birth of the Bodhisatta

Holding the Sāla branch, Queen Mahā Māyā stood majestically in a dress of gold-threaded brocade and draped down to the tip of her feet in a full-length white embroidered shawl with exquisite patterns resembling the eyes of a carp. At that very moment, she felt the unmistakable signs of the impending birth. Her retinue hastily cordoned off the area with curtains and withdrew. [223]

Instantaneously, the 10,000 world-element together with the great ocean roared, quaked, and trembled like the potter’s wheel. The Devas and Brahmas acclaimed in joy and showered flowers from the sky; all musical instruments produced mellifluous melodies automatically. The entire universe became unveiled with unobstructed visibility in all directions. These and other strange marvellous phenomena, 32 in all, occurred simultaneously to herald the birth of the Bodhisatta. As the flying precious jewel emerging from the top of Mount Vepulla hovers and then descends slowly on a readily placed receptacle, so the Bodhisatta magnificently adorned with major and minor physical marks, was delivered clean and pure from the shrine-like lotus-womb of Mahā Māyā Devī on Friday, the full moon of May (Vesākha), a summer month in the year 563 BCE, when the moon was in conjunction with the constellation Visākhā.

The moment the Bodhisatta was born, two fountains of pure spring water, warm and cold, flowed down from the sky and fell on the already pure and clean bodies of the Bodhisatta and his mother as a token of homage, thereby enabling them to adjust the heat and cold in their bodies.<sup>96</sup>

Reception by Brahmas, Devas and Humans

The four Great Brahmas, who were free from all sensual defilements, first received the Bodhisatta with a golden net the moment he was born. Then they placed him before the mother and said: “Great Queen, rejoice, a son of great power has been born to you!”

Next, the Four Great Kings received the Bodhisatta from the hands of the four Brahmas with an antelope skin, which was regarded as an auspicious object. Again, from the hands of the Four Great Kings, human beings received the Bodhisatta with a piece of white cloth.

Then, after leaving the hands of the people, the Bodhisatta stood firmly on his feet with soles like those of golden footwear, and touching the ground fully and squarely, he looked towards the eastern direction. As he did so, thousands of world-elements in the east became one continuous stretch of open space without any barrier or boundary between them. The Devas and human beings in the eastern quarter most respectfully paid homage to the Bodhisatta with perfumes, flowers, etc. and said: “Noble Man, there is no one in this eastern direction who is your equal. How can there be anyone who is superior to you?”

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 239

Similarly, the Bodhisatta looked into the rest of the ten directions – the four cardinal directions, the four intermediate directions, the downward and the upward directions – one after another. He saw no one equal to him in all these quarters. Thereupon, he faced northward from where he stood and took seven steps forward.

The Bodhisatta was followed by Mahā Brahma, King of Brahmas who gave shelter over him with a white umbrella and by Deva Suyāma who held a fly-flap made of a yak tail. Other Devas, with the remaining emblems of royalty, such as the footwear, the sword and the crown, also followed him from behind. The celestial beings in this procession were not visible to the people, who could see only the regalia.

When the Bodhisatta walked, he walked on the natural ground, but to human beings, he appeared to be walking in the air. The Bodhisatta walked without any clothes on, but to the human beings, he appeared to be walking fully clad. As a new born child the Bodhisatta walked, but to the human beings, he appeared to be sixteen years old.

What has been narrated heretofore in connection with the Bodhisatta's taking the seven steps in the northern direction is in accordance with the commentaries on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa), the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya) and the Birth Stories (Jātaka). In the chapter on the Auspicious Birth (Vijāta-maṅgala) of the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra), however, the birth of the Bodhisatta is somewhat more elaborately related [224] as follows.

While the Bodhisatta took his steps, the Great Brahmas followed and shaded him with the royal white umbrella measuring three leagues. So did the Great Brahmas from the remaining worlds with their white umbrellas of the same size. Thus, the whole universe was fully covered by white umbrellas resembling the garlands of white blooms.

The 10,000 Suyāma Devas from the 10,000 world-element held individually their yak-tail fly-flaps; the 10,000 Santusita Devas of the same world-elements, stood, holding their ruby-studded round fans, all swinging their fly-flaps and round fans right up to the mountain sides on the edge of the universe. In the same way, the 10,000 Sakkas residing in the 10,000 world-element stood blowing 10,000 conches.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 240

All other Devas stood in like manner, some carrying flowers of gold while others carried natural flowers or glittering glass flowers; some carrying flaps and banners, while others carried gem-studded objects for offerings. Female deities with various gifts in their hands also stood there crowding the entire universe.

While the phenomenal display of homage, a gratifying sight for the eye, was in progress, while thousands of conches were being blown melodiously by Devas and humans, and celestial and terrestrial musical instruments were being played and female deities were joyfully dancing, the Bodhisatta halted after taking seven steps in the northward direction.

At that moment, all the humans, Devas and Brahmas maintained complete silence, waiting expectantly with the thought: “What is the Bodhisatta going to say?”

When he halted after taking the seven steps in the northerly direction the Bodhisatta made a fearless roar to be heard simultaneously by all throughout the entire 10,000 world-element as follows:

Aggohaṃ asmi lokassa!
Jeṭṭhohaṃ asmi lokassa!
Seṭṭhohaṃ asmi lokassa!
Ayaṃ antimā jāti!
Natthi dāni punabbhavo!

I am superior among the living beings of the three worlds! I am the greatest among the living beings of the three worlds! I am the most exalted among the living beings of the three worlds! This is my last birth! There is no more rebirth for me!

When the Bodhisatta made this bold speech, there was no one capable of challenging or rebutting him; the whole multitude of humans, Devas and Brahmas had to tender their felicitations.

The Bodhisatta’s Extraordinary Acts

Out of the extraordinary acts at the time of the Bodhisatta’s birth, the following were omens, each with its own significance.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 241

1. The Bodhisatta’s firm standing, with both feet evenly on the earth’s surface, was the omen signifying his future attainment of the four bases of psychic power (iddhi-pāda).
2. The Bodhisatta’s facing northwards was the omen signifying his future supremacy over all living beings.
3. The Bodhisatta’s taking seven steps was the omen signifying his future attainment of the seven factors of Awakening (Bodhyaṅga), the jewel of the Dhamma.
4. The Bodhisatta’s having the cool shade of the celestial white umbrella was the omen signifying his future attainment of the Arahat fruition.
5. The Bodhisatta’s acquisition of the five emblems of royalty was the omen signifying his future attainment of five kinds of emancipation (vimutti): 1) Emancipation through suppression (vikkhambhana-vimutti); 2) emancipation through the opposite (tad-aṅga-vimutti); 3) emancipation through cutting off (samuccheda-vimutti); 4) emancipation through tranquillity (paṭippassaddhi-vimutti); 5) emancipation through escape (nissaraṇa-vimutti).
6. The Bodhisatta’s seeing in the ten directions without any obstruction was the omen signifying his future attainment of unobstructed knowledge (anāvaraṇa-ñāṇa).
7. The Bodhisatta’s fearless roar: “I am the most superior, the greatest and the most exalted!” was the omen signifying his future turning of the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) which no humans Devas, or Brahmas are capable of halting or reversing.
8. The Bodhisatta’s fearless roar: “This is my last birth! There is no more rebirth for me!” was the omen signifying his future attainment of Nibbāna with no remaining physical and mental aggregates (anupādisesa-nibbāna).

The Three Existences in which the Bodhisatta spoke at Birth

The Bodhisatta spoke immediately after his birth, not only in this last existence as Prince Siddhattha, but also when he was born to become the wise Mahosadha, and when he was born to become King Vessantara. Hence there were three existences in which he spoke at birth. Here is a brief explanation:

1. In his existence as the wise Mahosadha, the Bodhisatta came out of the mother's womb, holding a piece of sandalwood which had been placed in his hand by Sakka, the Lord of the Devas. His mother on seeing the object in the hand of her newly born baby, asked: "My dear son, what have you brought with you in your hand?" – "Mother, it is medicine," answered the Bodhisatta. He was thus initially named Osadha Kumāra meaning: "Medicine Boy." The medicine was carefully stored in a jar. All patients who came with all kinds of ailment, such as blindness, deafness, etc., were cured with that medicine, beginning with the Bodhisatta's wealthy father, Sirivaḍḍhana, who was cured of his headache. Thus, because of the great efficacy of his medicine, the youthful Bodhisatta later came to be popularly known as Mahosadha, "Great Medicine," the possessor of the most efficacious medicine.
2. In the existence of the Bodhisatta as King Vessantara also, the moment he was born, he extended his right hand with open palm and said: "Mother, what do you have in your golden palace that I can give in generosity." The mother answered: "My dear son, you are born to wealth in this golden palace." Then the mother took the child's open hand, placed it on her palm and put a bag of 1,000 silver pieces. Thus, the Bodhisatta also spoke at birth in the existence of King Vessantara.
3. As has been narrated above, in his last existence as Prince Siddhattha, the Bodhisatta made the fearless roar the moment he was born.

The Phenomenal Events at the Bodhisatta's Birth

Also at the moment of the birth of the Bodhisatta certain events manifested clearly. These events and what they presaged will be explained below in accordance with the Long Discourse on the Traditions (Mahāpadāna-sutta, DN 14) and the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) commentaries.

1. At the time of the birth of the Bodhisatta, the 10,000 world-element quaked. This was the omen presaging his attainment of omniscience.
2. The Devas and Brahmas living in the 10,000 world-element congregated in this [226] universe. This was the omen presaging the assembly of

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 243

Devas and Brahmas listening to the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse when delivered.

3. The Devas and Brahmas were the first to receive the Bodhisatta at the time of his birth. This was the omen presaging his attainment of the four absorptions of the form worlds (rūpāvacara-jhāna).
4. The human beings received the new born Bodhisatta after the Devas and Brahmas. This was the omen presaging his attainment of the four absorptions of the formless worlds (arūpāvacara-jhāna).
5. Stringed instruments such as harps made music without being played. This was the omen presaging his attainment of the nine successive attainments (anupubba-vihāra-samāpatti) consisting of the attainment of the four absorptions of the form worlds, the four absorptions of the formless worlds and the cessation attainment (nirodha-samāpatti).
6. Leather instruments, such as big and small drums, made music without being played. This was the omen presaging his beating the most sacred drum of Dhamma to be heard by Devas and humans alike.
7. Prisons and fetters, which kept men in bondage, broke into pieces. This was the omen presaging his complete elimination of the conceited notion of “I am.”
8. All kinds of diseases afflicting the sick disappeared, like the dirt on copper when washed away by acid. This was the omen presaging the attainment by human beings of the four noble truths, the eradication of the suffering of Saṃsāra.
9. The blind since birth could see all forms and colours just like normal people do. This was the omen presaging the acquisition by human beings of the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu).
10. The deaf since birth could hear all sounds just like normal people do. This was the omen presaging the acquisition by human beings of the divine ear (dibba-sota).
11. The crippled gained healthy legs and could walk about. This was the omen presaging the acquisition of the four bases of psychic power (iddhi-pāda).

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 244

12. The dumb since birth gained mindfulness and could speak. This was the omen presaging the acquisition of the four methods of steadfast mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna).
13. Ships on perilous voyages abroad reached their respective havens. This was the omen presaging the acquisition of the fourfold analytical knowledges (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa).
14. All kinds of precious gems, both celestial and terrestrial, glittered most brilliantly. This was the omen presaging the acquisition of the light of Dhamma. It was also the omen presaging the brilliant glory of the Buddha who disseminated the light of Dhamma to those who were bent on receiving it.
15. Loving-kindness pervaded among all beings who were at enmity with one another. This was the omen presaging the attainment of the four sublime states (Brahma-vihāra).
16. The fires of hell were extinguished. This was the omen presaging the cessation of the eleven kinds of fires, such as greed, anger, etc.
17. There appeared light in the Lokantarika hells which normally are in total darkness. This was the omen presaging the ability to dispel the darkness of ignorance and to [227] shed the light of wisdom.
18. The river water, which had been perennially flowing, ceased to flow. This was the omen presaging the acquisition of the fourfold confidence (catu-vesārajja-ñāṇa).
19. All the waters in the great ocean turned sweet in taste. This was the omen presaging the acquisition of the uniquely sweet taste of peace resulting from the cessation of defilements.
20. Instead of stormy winds, light winds blew, cool and pleasant. This was the omen presaging the disappearance of the 62 kinds of wrong beliefs.
21. All kinds of birds in the sky or on top of the trees or mountains alighted to the ground. This was the omen presaging the lifelong taking of refuge in the Three Treasures by human beings after listening to the teaching of the Buddha.
22. The moon shone forth, far brighter than ever before. This was the omen presaging the delighted mood of human beings.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 245

23. The sun, being of moderate heat and clear radiance, brought clement weather. This was the omen presaging the physical and mental happiness of human beings.
24. The Devas, standing at the doorways of their mansions, slapped their arms with their hands, whistled and flung their clothes in merriment. This was the omen presaging his attainment of omniscient Buddhahood and making the Exalted Utterance.
25. Torrential rain fell all over the four continents. This was the omen presaging the heavy Dhamma rain of deathlessness which fell with the great force of wisdom.
26. All human beings felt no hunger. This was the omen presaging their attainment of the deathless Dhamma of the mindfulness related to the body (kāyagatasati), or freedom from hunger for defilements after enjoying the deathless food of mindfulness related to the body.
27. All human beings felt no thirst. This was the omen presaging their attainment of the bliss of the fruition of Arahantship.
28. Closed doors burst open by themselves. This was the omen presaging the opening up of the gates of Nibbāna which is the eightfold noble path.
29. Flower trees and fruit trees bore flowers and fruits respectively. This was the omen presaging the people's bearing the flowers of emancipation (vimutti) and the fruits of the four noble ones (ariya-phala).
30. All the 10,000 world-element were covered with the one and only flower-banner. The 10,000 world-element were covered with the banner of victory. This was the omen presaging the spreading of the flower-banner, i.e., the noble path.

Moreover, the showering of exquisite flowers and exceedingly fragrant flowers; the brightness of stars and constellations even in sunlight; the appearance of springs of pure, clean water; the emergence of burrowing animals from their habitats; the absence of greed, hate and delusion; the absence of clouds of dust from the ground; the absence of obnoxious smells; the pervasion of celestial perfumes; the clear visibility of the Brahmas of the form worlds to human beings; the absence of birth and death amongst human beings, and other phenomena occurred distinctly. The occurrence of these phenomena constituted omens presaging the [228] Buddha's attainment of attributes other than those mentioned above.

The Seven Coevals of the Bodhisatta

At that precise moment of the birth of the Bodhisatta, the following seven were born simultaneously:

1. Princess Yasodharā, also named Bhaddakaccānā, and mother of Prince Rāhula.
2. Prince Ānanda.
3. The charioteer Channa.
4. Minister Kāḷudāyī.
5. The royal stallion Kanthaka.
6. The Mahā Bodhi tree.
7. The four jars of gold appeared.

Since they were born or came into being at the same time as the Bodhisatta, they were known as the seven coevals of the Bodhisatta. Of these seven:

1. Princess Yasodharā Bhaddakaccānā was born of Suppabuddha, King of Devadaha city, and Queen Amittā.
2. Prince Ānanda was the son of the Sakyan Amittodana, younger brother of King Suddhodana.
3. The Mahā Bodhi tree grew at the centre of the victory site where the Buddha attained Awakening in the Uruvelā forest in the Middle Country.
4. The four large jars of gold appeared within the precincts of the palace of Kapilavatthu.

Of these four jars:

1. One was named Saṅkha, the diameter of its brim was one mile.
2. Another was named Ela, the diameter of its brim was two miles.
3. The third was named Uppala, the diameter of its brim was three miles.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 247

4. The last one named Puṇḍarīka, the diameter of its brim was four miles, equivalent to one league.

When some gold was taken out of these four jars, they became replenished; there was no trace of depletion.

The account of these four jars of gold is given in the commentary on the Discourse concerning Caṅkī (Caṅkī-sutta, MN 95), and also in the commentary on the Discourse concerning Soṇadaṇḍa (Soṇadaṇḍa-sutta, DN 4). The order of the names of the seven birth-mates of the Bodhisatta given above is that contained in the commentaries on the Birth Stories (Jātaka) and the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) and also in the commentary on the Long Discourse on the Traditions (Mahāpadāna-sutta, DN 14).

In the exposition of the story of Kāḷudāyī in the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya) commentary and also in the exposition of the story of Rāhula in the Light on the Essence of Meaning (Sārattha-dīpanī), Ānanda's name has been left out from the list.

There the list states:

1. The Bodhi tree.
2. Yasodharā.
3. The four jars of gold.
4. The royal elephant named Ārohanīya.
5. Kanthaka the steed.
6. The charioteer Channa.
7. Minister Kāḷudāyī.

The order of the items is given according to their respective [229] reciters (bhāṇakas).

After the birth the citizens from the two cities of Kapilavatthu and Devadaha conveyed Queen Mahā Māyā and her noble Bodhisatta son back to the city of Kapilavatthu.

The Story of the Recluse Kāḷadevīla

The very day the new-born prince and his mother were brought back to the city of Kapilavatthu, the Tāvatiṃsa Devas, headed by Sakka, rejoiced on learning: “A noble son has been born to King Suddhodana in Kapilavatthu city,” and that “the noble son will definitely become an Awakened One at the sacred grounds of the Bodhi tree,” and they threw up their garments in the air, clapped their arms with their hands, etc., and indulged in merry-making.

At that time, the recluse Kāḷadevīla, who had gained the five super knowledges and eight attainments and who was in the habit of frequenting the palace of King Suddhodana, took his meal there as usual and went up to Tāvatiṃsa to spend the daytime in that celestial abode. He sat on the throne of gems in the jewelled mansion, enjoying the bliss of the absorptions (jhāna). When he emerged from his absorption, standing at the mansion’s gate and looking around, he saw Sakka was joyous and other Devas were tossing up their headgears and costumes and extolling the virtues of the Bodhisatta at the main road of 60 leagues length. He asked: “Devas, what makes you so happy and so playful? Tell me the reason.”

Thereupon the Devas answered: “Venerable sir, a noble son has been born to King Suddhodana today. That noble son, sitting cross-legged under the Bodhi tree at the most sacred spot, the centre of the universe, will attain omniscient Self-Awakening. He will then deliver the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse. We will thus get the opportunity of seeing the boundless glory of a Buddha and of listening to his supreme Dhamma discourse. That is why we are indulging ourselves in merry-making.”

On hearing the Devas’ reply, Kāḷadevīla speedily descended from Tāvatiṃsa and took his seat prepared in the palace of King Suddhodana. After exchanging words of greeting with the king, Kāḷadevīla said: “King, I have heard that a noble son has been born to you. I would like to see him.” Then the king had his fully dressed son brought to him, and he carried the son straight to Kāḷadevīla to make him pay homage to the royal teacher. When he was thus carried, the two feet of the prince flew aloft and rested on the recluse’s matted hair, just as a streak of lightning flashed on the top of dark blue clouds.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 249

There is no one deserving of the homage by a Bodhisatta who is in his last existence. Should anybody, not knowing this, place the Bodhisatta's head at the feet of Kāḷadevila, Kāḷadevila's head would split into seven pieces.

Kāḷadevila, realizing this astonishing and extraordinary glory and power of the prince, decided: "I should not destroy myself." Then rising from his seat he paid respects to the prince with his hands clasped. Witnessing the marvellous scene, King Suddhodana also bowed down before his own son.

Kāḷadevila, having acquired the five super knowledges and the eight attainments, could recall events of the past 40 aeons (kappa) and also foresee those of the future 40 aeons. Thus he was capable of recollecting and discerning the events of 80 aeons in all.<sup>97</sup>

Having inspected the major and minor characteristics on the prince, Kāḷadevila pondered whether the prince would become a Buddha or not and came to know, through his foreseeing wisdom, that the prince certainly would become a Buddha. With the knowledge that: "Here is a superb man," he laughed in great delight.

Again, Kāḷadevila pondered whether he would or would not see the young prince attain [230] Buddhahood. He realized through his foreseeing wisdom that before the young prince's becoming a Buddha, he would pass away and be reborn in a formless abode of the Brahmās where he would not be capable of hearing the deathless Dhamma even if hundreds and thousands of Buddhas were to go and teach it. "I will not get an opportunity of seeing and paying obeisance to this man of marvel who is endowed with the unique merits of the perfections. This will be a great loss for me." So saying and being filled with immense grief, he wept bitterly.<sup>98</sup>

When the courtiers saw Kāḷadevila laughing and weeping, it occurred to them thus: "Our venerable recluse laughed first, and later he wept, which is strange indeed." So they enquired: "Venerable sir, is there any danger that might befall our master's son?" – "There is no danger for the prince. In fact, he will become a Buddha." – "Then why do you lament?" the people asked again. "Because I shall not get an opportunity to see the attainment of Awakening by an extraordinary man who is endowed with such wonderful qualities, and this will be a great loss to me. So thinking, I lament,” he replied.

The above narration has been made in accordance with what is described in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vam̐sa) and Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentaries and the sub-commentary on the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra).

In some works on the life of the Buddha in prose, the story is as follows: When King Suddhodana asked: “At what age will the prince renounce the world and attain Buddhahood?” Kāḷadevila answered: “At the age of 35.” This passage is a deduction from the words addressed by Kāḷadevila to his nephew, Nālaka the youth: “Dear Nālaka, a son has been born to King Suddhodana. The child is the Bodhisatta; he will attain Buddhahood at the age of 35.” The king was not pleased to hear that his son would become a Buddha. He wanted to see his son as a Universal Monarch, not as a Buddha. Therefore, he must [232] not have asked about the time of his son’s renunciation and becoming a Buddha. That is the reason for the omission of such a passage in the aforesaid commentaries and sub-commentary. Here in this work, too, we make no mention of it.

Nālaka the Youth

Having answered thus, the recluse Kāḷadevila pondered: “Though I will miss the prince’s becoming a Buddha, I wonder whether somebody among my relations will have an opportunity of witnessing it.” Then he foresaw that his nephew, Nālaka, would. So he visited his sister and summoned his nephew and urged him, saying: “My dear nephew, Nālaka, the birth of a son has taken place in the palace of King Suddhodana. He is a Bodhisatta. He will attain Buddhahood at the age of 35. You, my nephew, are somebody deserving of meeting the Buddha. Therefore, you had better become a recluse immediately.”

Though born to the parents who had 870 millions worth of wealth, the young Nālaka had confidence in his uncle, and thought: “My uncle would not have urged me to do what is not beneficial. He did so because it is of benefit indeed.” With this conclusion, he had the robes and the alms bowl bought and brought immediately from the market, thinking: “I have become a recluse with dedication to the Buddha, the noblest personage in the world.”

Having said this, he faced the direction of Kapilavatthu where the prince was and made obeisance by raising his clasped hands in veneration. Thereafter, he put his bowl in a bag, slung it on his shoulder and entered the Himālayas. Waiting for the Buddha there in the forest, he devoted himself to asceticism.<sup>99</sup>

The 32 Marks of a Great Man

On the fifth day after the birth of the prince, his father, King Suddhodana, held the head-washing ceremony, and with the idea to name his son, he had his palace pervaded with four kinds of fragrant powder: jasmine (tagara), cloves (lavaṅga), saffron (kuṅkuma), and cinnamon (tamāla), and strewn with the five kinds of bulbs: grass (saddala), rice, mustard seeds, jasmine buds and puffed rice.

He had also pure milk rice cooked without any water, and having invited 108 learned Brahmins who were accomplished in the three Vedas and given them good, clean seats prepared in the palace, he served them with the delicious milk rice.

The enumeration of the four kinds of fragrant powder here is in accordance with that given in the sub-commentary on the Discourse about the Trainee (Sekha-sutta, MN 53) and in the sub-commentary on the Long Discourse about the Emancipation (Mahā-parinibbāna-sutta, DN 16).

In the sub-commentary on the Discourse about King Mahā Suddasana (Mahā-sudassana-sutta, DN 17), however, saffron is replaced by frankincense (turukkha); in the exposition of the Introduction to the Birth Stories (Jātaka-nidāna), etc., the enumeration is black sandalwood, jasmine, camphor and essence of sandalwood; in the Light on the Dictionary (Abhidhānappadīpikā) glossary the four are saffron, cloves, jasmine and frankincense; the sub-commentary on the Discourse containing the Explanation of the Corrupt (Avassuta-pariyāya-sutta, SN 35.243) has saffron, frankincense, cloves, and cinnamon; the Garland of Decorative Stories (Mālālaṅkāra-vatthu) has Sāla, great jasmine, camphor essence and sandalwood essence; and the Illustration of the Meaning of the Victor (Jinatha-pakāsani) mentions aloe (aguru), jasmine, camphor and sandalwood.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 252

Having fed them, the king honoured them by making excellent offerings to them, and out of the 108 Brahmins, eight were selected and asked to prognosticate the marks on the body of the prince. Among the eight selected Brahmins, Rāma, Dhaja, Lakkhaṇa, Jotimanta, [233] Yañña, Subhoja and Suyāma, having examined the physical marks of the prince each raised two fingers and made two alternative predictions with no decisiveness thus: “If your son, who is endowed with these marks, chooses to live the life of a householder, he will become a Universal Monarch, ruling over the four great islands; if he becomes a monk, however, he will attain Buddhahood.”

But Sudatta of the Brahminical clan Koṇḍañña, the youngest of them, after carefully examining the prince’s marks of a Great Man raised only one finger and conclusively foretold with just one prediction thus: “There is no reason for the prince’s remaining in household life. He will certainly become a Buddha who breaks the root of the defilements.”

The young Brahmin Sudatta of the Koṇḍañña clan was one whose present existence was his last and who had previously accumulated meritorious deeds that would lead him towards the Arahat fruition. Therefore, he excelled the seven senior Brahmins in learning and could foresee the prospects of the prince that he would definitely become a Buddha. Hence his bold reading with only one finger raised.

This reading of the marks by young Sudatta, a descendent of the Koṇḍañña family, with the raising of a single finger was accepted by all the other learned Brahmins.

It became possible for these Brahmins to read the physical marks of a Great Man, such as a Buddha and other noble ones, owing to the following events: At times when the appearance of a Buddha was drawing near, Mahā Brahmas of Suddhāvāsa abode incorporated in astrological works certain compilations of prognosticative matters with reference to the marks of a Great Man who would become a Buddha (Buddha-mahā-purisa-lakkhaṇa). The Brahmas came down to the human world in the guise of Brahmin teachers and taught all those who came to learn as pupils. In so doing their idea was: “Those, who are possessed of accumulated merit and mature intelligence, will learn the works of astrology which include the art of reading the marks of a Great Man.” That was why these Brahmins were able to read the marks such as those indicating the future becoming a Buddha and others.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 253

There are 32 major marks which indicate that their possessor is a Great Man or Bodhisatta. They are as follows:

1. The mark of the level soles of the feet which, when put on the ground, touch it fully and squarely.
2. The mark of the figures in the 108 circles on the sole of each foot together with the wheel having 1,000 spokes, the rim, the hub and all other characteristics.
3. The mark of the projecting heels.
4. The mark of the long and tapering fingers and toes.
5. The mark of the soft and tender palms and soles.
6. The mark of the regular fingers and toes like finely rounded golden rail posts of a palace window, there is only a narrow space between one finger and another as well as between one toe and another.
7. The mark of the slightly higher and dust-free ankles.
8. The mark of the legs like those of an antelope (eni).
9. The mark of the long palms of the hands which can touch the knees while standing and without stooping.
10. The mark of the male organ concealed in a sheath like that of a Chaddanta elephant. [234]
11. The mark of the yellow and bright complexion as pure gold (siṅgī-nikkha).
12. The mark of the smooth skin which was so smooth no dust could cling to it.
13. The mark of the body-hairs, one in each pore of the skin.
14. The mark of the body-hairs with their tips curling upwards as if they were looking up at the Bodhisatta's face in devotion.
15. The mark of the upright body like a Brahma's.
16. The mark of the fullness of flesh in seven places of the body: the two upper parts of the feet, the two backs of the hands, the two shoulders and the neck.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 254

17. The mark of the full and well-developed body, like a lion's front portion.
18. The mark of the full and well-developed back of the body extending from the waist to the neck like a golden plank without any trace of the spinal furrow in the middle.
19. The mark of the symmetrically proportioned body like the circular spread of a banyan tree, for his height and the compass of his arms are of equal measurement.
20. The mark of the proportionate and rounded throat.
21. The mark of 7,000 capillaries with their tips touching one another at the throat and diffusing throughout the body the taste of food even if it is as small as a sesame seed.
22. The mark of the lion-like chin which is somewhat like that of one who is about to smile.
23. The mark of the teeth numbering exactly 40.
24. The mark of the teeth set proportionately in a row.
25. The mark of the teeth touching one another with no space in between.
26. The mark of the four canine teeth white and brilliant as the morning star.
27. The mark of the long, flat and tender tongue.
28. The mark of the voice having eight qualities like a Brahma's.
29. The mark of the very clear blue eyes.
30. The mark of the very soft and tender eyelashes like a new-born calf.
31. The mark of the hair between the two eyebrows.
32. The mark of the thin layer of flesh that appears by nature like a gold headband on the forehead.

These are the 32 marks of a Great Man.

This information is extracted from the Long Discourse on the Traditions (Mahāpadāna-sutta, DN 14) and the Discourse on the Marks (Lakkhaṇa-sutta, DN 30), as well as from the Discourse concerning Brahmāyu

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 255

(Brahmāyu-sutta, MN 91). [A long explanation of these marks and their genesis has been moved to the Further Explanations.]

The 80 Minor Characteristics

The Bodhisatta, a Great Man, is also endowed with 80 minor characteristics (asīti-anuvyañjana), which accompany the major ones. These 80 minor marks will now be briefly mentioned, as they appear in the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra) and other texts.

1. Close-knit fingers and toes with no intervening gaps (citaṅgulitā).
2. Fingers and toes tapering gradually from the base to the tips (anupubbaṅgulitā).
3. Round fingers and toes (vaṭṭaṅgulitā).

These are the three characteristics concerning the fingers and toes.

4. Red fingernails and toenails (tamba-nakhatā).
5. Tall, pointed and prominent fingernails and toenails (tuṅga-nakhatā).
6. Neat and smooth fingernails and toenails (siniddha-nakhatā).

These are three characteristics concerning the fingernails and toenails.

7. Neither receding nor protruding ankles, i.e., inconspicuous ankles (niḅūḷha-goppakatā).

This is the one characteristic concerning the ankles.

8. Evenness of the tips of all ten toes (sama-pādatā).

This is the one characteristic concerning the toes.

9. A manner of walking gracefully like an elephant king (gaja-samānakkamatā).
10. A manner of walking gracefully like a lion king (sīha-samānakkamatā).
11. A manner of walking gracefully like a goose king (haṃsa-samānakkamatā).
12. A manner of walking gracefully like a bull king (usabha-samānakkamatā).
13. A manner of walking clockwise (dakkhiṇā-vaṭṭa-gatitā).

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 256

These are the five characteristics concerning the manner of walking.

14. Round knees that are beautiful on all sides (samantato cāru-jaṅṅu-maṅḍalatā).

This is the one characteristic concerning the knees.

15. A well-developed male organ (paripuṇṇa-purisa-vyañjanatā).

This is the one characteristic of the male genitalia. [243]

16. A navel with uninterrupted lines (acchidda-nābhitā).
17. A deep navel (gambhīra-nābhitā).
18. A navel with a right turning ringlet (dakkhiṇāvatta-nābhitā).

These are the three characteristics concerning the navel.

19. Thighs and arms like an elephant's trunk (dviradakara-sadisa-ūrubhujatā).

This is the one characteristic concerning the thighs and arms.

20. A well-proportioned body (suvibhatta-gattatā).
21. A gradually rising body (anupubba-gattatā).
22. A fine body (mattha-gattatā).
23. A body that is neither lean nor plump (anussannānussanna-sabbagattatā).
24. A wrinkle-free body (alīna-gattatā).
25. A body free of moles, freckles, etc. (tilakādi-virahita-gattatā).
26. A regularly lustrous body (anupubba-rucira-gattatā).
27. A particularly clean body (suvisuddha-gattatā).

More characteristics concerning the body will follow later on.

28. Physical strength equal to that of one billion elephants (koṭi-sahassahatthi-bala-dhāraṇatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning physical strength.

29. A prominent nose like a golden goad (tuṅga-nāsatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning the nose.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 257

30. Dark red gums (suratta-dviija-mamsatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning the gums.

31. Clean teeth (suddha-dantatā).

32. Neat and smooth glossy teeth (siniddha-dantatā).

There are the two characteristics concerning the teeth.

33. Pure faculties of sense, such as eyes, etc. (visuddhindriyatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning the sense-faculties of the eyes, ears, nose, tongue, and body.

34. Round canine teeth (vaṭṭa-dāṭhatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning the canine teeth.

35. Red lips (rattoṭṭhatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning the lips.

36. Long mouth-cavity (āyata-vadānatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning the mouth.

37. Deep lines on the palms (gambhīra-pāṇi-lekhatā).

38. Long lines on the palms (āyata-lekhatā).

39. Straight lines on the palms (uju-lekhatā).

40. Beautifully formed lines on the palms (surucira-saṅṭhāna-lekhatā).

These are the four characteristics concerning the palms.

41. Halo spreading around the body in a circle (parimaṇḍala-kāyappabhāvantatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning the halo.

42. Full cheeks (paripuṇṇa-kapolatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning the cheeks. [244]

43. Long and broad eyes (āyata-visāla-nettatā).

44. Very clear eyes with five kinds of colour (pañca-pasāda-vanta-nettatā).

These are the two characteristics concerning the eyes.

45. Eyelashes with their tips curling upwards (kuñjitagga-bhamukatā).

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 258

This is the only characteristic concerning the eyelashes.

46. Soft, thin and red tongue (mudu-tanuka-ratta-jivhatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning the tongue.

47. Long and beautiful ears (āyata-rucira-kaṇṇatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning the ears.

48. Varicose-free veins (niggaṇṭhi-siratā).
49. Neither receding nor protruding, but inconspicuous veins (niggūḷa siratā).

These are the two characteristics concerning the veins.

50. Round elegant head like a circular umbrella (vatta-chatta-nibha-cāru-sīsatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning the head.

51. Long, broad and graceful forehead (āyata-puthu-nalāṭa-sobhatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning the forehead.

52. Natural and beautiful eyebrows that need not be groomed (susaṇṭhāna-bhamukatā).
53. Soft eyebrows (saṇha-bhamukatā).
54. Eyebrows in regular order (anuloma-bhamukatā).
55. Large eyebrows (mahanta-bhamukatā).
56. Long eyebrows (āyata-bhamukatā).

These are the five characteristics concerning the eyebrows.

57. A supple body (sukhu-māla-gattatā).
58. A very relaxed body (ativiya-somma-gattatā).
59. A very bright body (ativiya-ujjalita-gattatā).
60. A dirt-free body having an absence of body secretion (vimala-gattatā).
61. A non-sticky body with the body skin always looking fresh (komala-gattatā).
62. A neat and handsome body (siniddha-gattatā).

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 259

63. A fragrant body (sugandha-tanutā).

These are the fifteen characteristics concerning the body, including the eight above from 20 to 27.

64. Body hairs of equal length with no difference in length (sama-lomatā).

65. Non-sticky hairs (komala-lomatā).

66. Every body hair coiling clockwise (dakkhiṇāvāṭṭa-lomatā).

67. Blue body hairs like the colour of broken stones of collyrium (bhinnañjana-sadisa-nīla-lomatā).

68. Round body hairs (vaṭṭa-lomatā).

69. Smooth body hairs (siniddha-lomatā).

These are the six characteristics concerning the hairs of the body.

70. Very subtle inhaling and exhaling of the breath (atisukhuma-assāsa-passāsa-dhāraṇatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning the respiration. [245]

71. A fragrant mouth (sugandha-mukhatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning the mouth.

72. A fragrant top of the head (sugandha-muddhanatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning the top of the head.

73. Jet-black hair (sunīla-kesatā).

74. Hair curling clockwise (dakkhiṇāvāṭṭa-kesatā).

75. Naturally well-groomed hair (susaṅṭhāna-kesatā).

76. Neat and short hair (siniddha-kesatā-saṅha-kesatā).

77. Untangled hair (aluṭita-kesatā).

78. Hair of equal length (sama-kesatā).

79. Non-sticky hair (komala-kesatā).

These are the seven characteristics concerning the hair.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 260

80. An aggregate of luminous radiance or halo which shines forth from the top of the head. The Bodhisatta is considered marvellous because of this halo (ketu-mālā-ratana-vicittatā).

This is the only characteristic concerning the halo.

The Bodhisatta possesses the above 80 minor characteristics. The enumeration made here is in accordance with that contained in the sub-commentary on the Ornaments of the Victor (Jināḷaṅkāra).

The aforementioned major and minor marks can also be termed as the hundred meritorious (sata-puñña) characteristics. The Bodhisatta has performed a hundredfold the number of times all other beings have performed each kind of meritorious deed throughout the innumerable world-elements. Hence, his merits are known as a hundredfold merit (sata-puñña), whereby he acquires the 32 major and 80 minor marks as a result.

In this way, having examined the prince's major and minor marks carefully, the learned Brahmins made a prediction saying: "The prince will attain Buddhahood." After discussing amongst themselves the matter of the naming of the prince, they gave him the name of Siddhattha as an omen indicating that he would successfully accomplish the task for the benefit of the entire world.

The Story of the Five Monastics

Regarding the foundation story of the Group-of-Five monastics (pañca-vaggiya) headed by Ven. Koṇḍañña, the Light on the Essence of Meaning (Sārattha-dīpanī) sub-commentary on one hand and the Birth Stories (Jātaka) and the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) commentaries on the other, narrate different stories. The story of these five will be included here according to the versions of the said sub-commentary and commentaries.

The sub-commentarial story recorded in the Light on the Essence of Meaning (Sārattha-dīpanī) goes like this: At the time of the birth of the prince, out of the learned Brahmins who were the selected mark-readers: Rāma, Dhaja, Lakkhaṇa, Manti, Koṇḍañña, Bhoja, Suyāma and Sudatta, five, led by Koṇḍañña foretold, saying: "The prince will certainly become a Buddha." Thereafter, having handed over to their families the remunerations they received at the prediction ceremony, they put on the robes, dedicating themselves to the Bodhisatta as they had come to the conclusion: “That great man, the prince, will not remain in a household life, he will definitely attain Buddhahood.”

These Brahmins had been well-versed in the Vedas since their childhood; they had been also treated as teachers since then. They agreed among themselves to renounce the world, for they thought to [246] themselves: “We will not be able to cut off the entanglement to our families when we get married. It is therefore better for us to go forth early,” hence their dedication to the Bodhisatta immediately after their prediction when they were still young.

Taking up their residence in forest dwellings, they sometimes enquired, asking lay people: “Friends, has the young prince renounced the world?” – “How can you see the prince’s renunciation? He is still enjoying royal luxuries in the midst of female dancers in the three palaces, as though he were a divine being,” replied the people. Then the Brahmins, thinking that: “The wisdom of the prince is not mature yet,” went on waiting unworriedly for the moment of the prince’s renunciation.

The story recorded in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) and Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentaries is like this: After naming the Prince Siddhattha, the select eight learned Brahmins went home and summoned their sons and said: “Dear sons, we are now advanced in age. Prince Siddhattha, son of our King Suddhodana, will certainly become an Awakened One. We do not know for sure, however, whether we will see the young prince attain Buddhahood. When he does, take up the ascetic life in the Dispensation of that Buddha.”

Out of the eight learned Brahmins, seven lived till old age but expired before the prince’s renunciation and were reborn in good or evil existences in accordance with their respective deeds. Koṇḍañña alone survived in good health. When the prince attained manhood and renounced the world, he went to Uruvelā forest and mused: “Delightful is this region! It is agreeable to one who is inclined to engage in meditation.” And while the Bodhisatta was then devoting himself to asceticism (dukkara-cariyā) in that forest, Koṇḍañña, learning the news that: “The prince has become a recluse,” went to the sons of the late seven Brahmins and said: “Young men, Prince Siddhattha is said to have become a recluse. The prince will certainly become a Buddha. If your fathers were still alive, they would have gone forth and taken up an ascetic life themselves today. If you are desirous of becoming recluses yourselves, do come along. I am going to follow the prince and become an ascetic.” Of the seven Brahmins’ sons, three remained laymen as they did not agree to go forth.

Only the remaining four agreed and became recluses with Koṇḍañña as their leader. These five persons came to be known as the Group-of-Five monastics (pañca-vaggiya).

Preventing the Prince from seeing the Four Omens

When King Suddhodana heard the prophecy about his son it was reported by the Brahmins that: “Your son will renounce and become a recluse,” so he asked: “After seeing what will my son go forth?” – “On seeing the four omens of an old man, a sick man, a dead man and a recluse, your son will renounce the world and become a recluse,” answered the Brahmins unanimously.

On hearing the Brahmins’ reply, King Suddhodana ordered his servants, saying: “If my son will renounce only after coming across these four omens, from now on, do not permit any person who is aged, sick or a recluse visit my son. Otherwise they will create spiritual urgency (saṃvega) in him and he will want to renounce. I do not want my son to become a Buddha. I want to see him as a Universal Monarch ruling over the four great islands with their 2,000 surrounding smaller islands and travelling in the sky by means of the Wheel-Treasure in the company of his followers, 36 leagues in extent.” Then guards, in sufficient number, were placed around the four quarters at every distance of one mile to ensure the absence of the aged, the sick, the dead and the recluse within the sight of the prince.

That very day, an auspicious head-washing ceremony was held at which 80,000 royal relatives were present and they discussed among themselves thus: “Whether the prince will become a Buddha or a Universal Monarch, each of us will give a son to wait upon him. If he becomes a Buddha, he will travel magnificently in the company of recluses who are of royal blood. Or, if he becomes a Universal Monarch, he will tour majestically being accompanied by 80,000 princes.” Then each of them promised to present a [247] son to the prince.

The Death of Queen Mahā Māyā Devī

On the seventh day after the birth of the prince, his mother, Mahā Māyā Devī, reaching the end of her lifespan, passed away and was reborn in Tusita abode as a Deva bearing the name of Santusita.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 263

The mother died, not because she had given birth to a Bodhisatta, but because her lifespan had come to an end. It may be recalled that even when the Bodhisatta Setaketu made the five great investigations Mahā Māyā had only ten months and seven days left to live. Nobody else is worthy of occupying the lotus-like womb of a Bodhisatta's mother, for it is like the perfumed chamber which has housed a Buddha or his statue or an object of worship. Besides, while a Bodhisatta's mother is still alive, it is not appropriate to keep her aside and make another woman Chief Queen. So it is the usual course of events (dhammatā) that a Bodhisatta's mother should remain alive for only seven days after giving birth to her son, hence the passing away of the mother at that time.

To the query: “In which period of life did Mahā Māyā die?” the answer is: “She died in the middle period.” Since desires and passions abound in sentient beings in the first period of life, a woman who conceives in this period cannot take good care of her pregnancy. Accordingly, the baby at that time is susceptible to many diseases. But the womb of the mother remains clean when she passes two thirds of her middle period and reaches the last third. And whoever takes conception in such a clean womb is free from diseases. Therefore, the Bodhisatta's mother, after enjoying palatial luxuries in the first period of life, gave birth to a son and died when she came to the third and last stage of the middle period of life.<sup>100</sup>

Strictly following the exposition of this commentary, famous teachers of old have composed an aphorism in a verse form to state that the mother of the Bodhisatta passed away when she was precisely 56 years, 4 months and 27 days old. There is also another one saying that the royal mother conceived at the age of 55 years, 6 months and 20 days.

At the time when mother Māyā was born as a human being, the general lifespan was 100 years which may be equally divided into three periods, each consisting of 33 years and 4 months. She enjoyed a luxurious life in the first period of 33 years and 4 months. If the second period of 33 years and 4 months are made into three portions, each portion covers 11 years, 1 month and 10 days. The sum of the first two portions will then be 22 years, 2 months and 20 days. To this, add the number of years and months of the first period, and the result is 55 years, 6 months and 20 days. At this age, Mahā Māyā conceived the Bodhisatta, hence the second aphorism.

If and when the pregnancy of ten months duration as well as the seven days that followed the prince's birth are added to the 55 years, 6 months and 20 days, the sum total will be 56 years, 4 months and 27 days, hence the first aphorism.<sup>101</sup>

Mother Māyā's Rebirth in Tusita Heaven

To the question as to whether the royal mother, Māyā, was reborn as a male or a female celestial being in the abode of Tusita, the answer, no doubt, should be that she was reborn as a male.

In this matter, after superficially studying the Pāli statement: Mātaram pamukham katvā, "having put his mother to the front," some scholars say or write that she was reborn as a female deity; but such reliable works as the [248] Verses of the Elder Monks (Thera-gāthā) commentary and others hold that: "Māyā was a male deity in the Tusita Realm of gods." Concerning Kāḷudāyī's verses in the Verses of the Elder Monks (Thera-gāthā, PTS 2.226) commentary it is said: Devūpapatti pana purisa-bhāveneva jātā, "(Māyā's) rebirth in the abode of gods took place in the form of a male."

Also in the section on the Bodhisatta's auspicious birth, the sub-commentary on the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra) mentioned:

Yasmā ca Bodhisattena vasita-kucchi nāma cetiya-gabbha-sadisā hoti, na sakkā aññena sattena āvasitum vā paribhuñjitum vā, tasmā Bodhisatta-mātā gabbha-vuṭṭhānato sattame divase kālaṃ katvā, Tusita-pure deva-putto hutvā nibbatti.

The womb in which the Bodhisatta had stayed was like the chamber of a shrine, other beings were not able to stay there or to use it. Therefore, seven days after giving birth, the Bodhisatta's mother died and became a Devaputta in the celestial city of Tusita.

Still further, in the exposition on the Twenty Verses (Vīsati-gāthā) of the sub-commentary, the Jewel Light (Maṇi-dīpa-ṭīkā),<sup>102</sup> it is asserted:

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 265

Siri Mahā Māyā hi Bodhisattam̐ vijayitvā, sattāha-mattam̐ thatvā, ito cavitvā, Tusita-bhavane purisa-bhāveneva nibbattā, na itthibhāvenā ti.

Having lived only for seven days after giving birth to the Bodhisatta, Siri Mahā Māyā passed away from this world and was reborn as a male, not as a female.

It is a regular incident that all the mothers of Bodhisattas should live only seven days after childbirth and that they should all die and be reborn in the Tusita abode only as a god and never as a goddess. Therefore, the fact that Mahā Māyā was born as a Deva in Tusita should be accepted without doubt.

The Prince's Attendants

For his son, Prince Siddhattha, King Suddhodana selected and appointed 240 female attendants who were clean and fair, skilled in carrying out their duties such as breast-feeding, by giving sweet milk free of pungent, salty and other unpleasant tastes, bathing, carrying and nursing. The king also appointed 60 male servants to help the female attendants and further appointed 60 officers who would oversee the duties of these men and women.

Of the 240 female attendants, 60 were to breast-feed the prince; another 60 were to bathe him with scented water and dress him; still another 60 were to carry him, supporting him with their hands, or in their laps and so on; and the remaining 60 had to share the same duty by taking over the prince in turn. Thus the nursing work was distributed among 240 female attendants. With the 60 male servants and 60 officers, there were altogether 360 persons responsible for looking after the little prince.

All this is given in accordance with the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya) and its commentary, where mention is made of the appointment of attendants by King Bandhuma for his son Prince Vipassī, who was the Bodhisatta. On this basis, the appointment by King Suddhodana has been described.

In the Swezon Kyawhtin (Volume I, Question No. 33), a question is asked in verse form by Shin Nandadhaja, the celebrated novice of Kyeegan village. The answer given by Kyeethai Layhtat Sayādaw is: “There are 60 Myanmar hours in one day and one night; since four nurses had to take charge in turn every one hour, multiply 60 by 4, and the result is 240.”

If we take the reckoning made in the Swezon Kyawhtin: “Four nurses had to take charge in turn every hour,” in the sense that one was to feed, and another was to bathe and dress, still another to tend to him, supporting and clasping him with her hands or in her lap, and the last one to carry on the same task after taking over the prince in turn, then it is quite in consonance with what is contained in the exposition of the Long Discourse on the Traditions (Mahāpadāna-sutta, DN 14) of the aforesaid commentary.

The Selection of Attendants

In the commentary to the Birth Story about the Wise Temiya (Temiya-jātaka, Ja 538, actually called the Birth Story about the Wise Mūgapakkha, Mūga-pakkha-jātaka), the detailed description of how the King of Kāsi chose attendants for his son Temiya, the Bodhisatta, is recorded as follows: [249]

1. A tall woman was not appointed nurse because the child’s neck is apt to become elongated for having to suck milk while remaining close to her bosom.
2. A short woman was not appointed nurse because the child’s neck is apt to become stunted for having to suck milk while remaining too close to her bosom.
3. A thin woman was not appointed nurse because the child’s limbs, such as his thighs, etc., are apt to be hurt by having to suck milk while remaining close to her bosom.
4. A fat woman was not appointed nurse because the child is apt to become crippled, with its thighs, knees and legs deformed, for having to suck milk while remaining close to her bosom.
5. A long-breasted woman was not appointed nurse because the child’s nose is apt to be snubbed as it might be pressed by her long breasts as he sucks milk while remaining close to her bosom.
6. A woman with too dark a complexion was not appointed nurse because her milk is very cold and not suitable for the child in the long run.

1: The Birth of the Bodhisatta – 267

7. A woman with too white a complexion was not appointed nurse because her milk is very warm and not suitable for the child in the long run.
8. A woman suffering from cough was not appointed nurse because her milk is very sour and not suitable for the child.
9. A woman suffering from consumption was not appointed nurse because her milk is pungent and bitter and not suitable for the child.

The above mentioned commentary says that such women were not appointed attendants; only those free from the above defects were appointed.

Relying on the statement of the commentary, Manli Sayādaw describes the same selection of attendants in verse form (vs. 498) in his Verses on Magha Deva and the Great Cause of Learning (Mahā-suta-kārī-magha-deva-lankā).<sup>103</sup>

Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī

Though attendants were selected and appointed for Prince Siddhattha in the said manner, it was his aunt, or step-mother, Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī who more often than not breast fed him. After the demise of Mahā Māyā Devi, King Suddhodana raised the prince's aunt to the status of Chief Queen. Two or three days after the birth of the prince by Queen Māyā, his aunt Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī bore Prince Nanda. When Queen Māyā passed away on the seventh day after the prince's birth, Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī entrusted her own son Prince Nanda, who was only three or four days old, to nurses, and she herself breast-fed Prince Siddhattha and looked after him. It was in the lap of his aunt that Prince Siddhattha stayed most of the time.<sup>104</sup>

In this way, Prince Siddhattha, the Bodhisatta, grew up blissfully in a gradual manner under the care and treatment of hosts of attendants and in great pomp and splendour. [250]

2: The Bodhisatta's Youth

King Suddhodana Salutes for the Second Time

The day arrived for King Suddhodana to perform the ploughing ceremony which was an annual seasonal festival. On that day, the whole royal city of Kapilavatthu was decorated like the abode of the Devas. All the people of the city including workers dressed in their best attires, having perfumed and adorned themselves with flowers, assembled in the palace square. In the fields where the ploughing ceremony was to be held, 1,000 ploughs were kept in readiness, 800 of them were meant for the king and his ministers. 799 ploughs to be manned by the ministers were decorated with silver ornaments and equipped with ploughshares together with yokes, oxen and driving rods. The plough to be ridden and driven by the king was fully ornamented with red gold.

When King Suddhodana left the royal city with a great retinue of ministers, courtiers, bodyguards and other followers, he brought his son, the Bodhisatta, to the ceremonial sites and kept him under the delightfully cool shade of a big Rose-apple (Syzgium jambos) tree in full foliage. The ground underneath the tree was well-carpeted with the best velvet cloth, on which the royal child was placed. And above him was fixed a crimson-red velvet canopy embroidered with gold and silver stars. The whole place was screened off with heavy curtains, and guards were posted for security. The king then dressed himself in the regal accoutrement which was customarily put on for the ploughing ceremony. Accompanied by ministers and courtiers, he proceeded to the auspicious field where the ploughing ceremony would be held.

On arrival at the auspicious field, King Suddhodana mounted the golden plough which was specially prepared for him. The 799 courtiers taking part in the ceremony also rode and drove their respective silver ploughs. The remaining 200 ploughs were handled by 200 royal farm workers who proceeded to plough the field thoroughly, going back and forth many times across the field. King Suddhodana ploughed the field only once to bring auspicious blessing to the ceremony by driving across the field from one side to the other. The ceremony was magnificently performed.

The nursing attendants and security guards, who were assigned to look after the prince, left their posts and went out of the royal enclosure, saying: "Let us watch the grand spectacle of our lord performing the ploughing ceremony."

The Prince's Attainment of the First Absorption

In the meanwhile, the prince, on looking around and seeing no one, quickly rose and sat cross-legged quietly and calmly. He then practised breathing (ānāpāna) meditation, concentrating on the inhaling and exhaling breath, and thereby attained the first absorption of the form world (rūpāvacara-jhāna).

It should be understood that the Bodhisatta achieved the first form absorption (rūpāvacara-jhāna) within a short time as a result of the habitual practice of breathing (ānāpāna) meditation throughout many existences of successive aeons.

The attendants, who left their charge, loitered around the food stalls enjoying themselves for quite a while. All the trees, with the exception of the rose-apple tree under which the Bodhisatta was sitting, cast their shade in a natural manner, in line with the movement of the sun. When past noon the shades of the trees fell on the east, however, the shade of the rose-apple tree, under which the prince was resting, did not move with the sun, even after noon-time, strangely remaining in a round shape as before.

The nursing attendants, eventually remembering: “Oh, the son of our lord has been left behind alone,” hurried back and on getting inside, after parting the curtains of the [251] enclosure, saw with their own eyes and to their amazement the prince sitting cross-legged in the place of glory; and saw also the miracle (pāṭihāriya) of the shade of the rose-apple tree remaining fixed in the same position and in the same round shape. They went speedily to the king and reported: “Your majesty, your royal son is sitting quietly and calmly in a certain posture. And though the shadow of other trees moved with the changing position of the sun, the shade of the rose-apple tree, under which the prince reposes, remains unchanged even after noon-time, retaining its circular shape.”

King Suddhodana quietly went and observed. On seeing with his own eyes the two strange miracles, he uttered: “Noble son, this is the second time that I, your father, salute you,” and made obeisance to his son lovingly and adoringly.

Vissakamma Creates an Auspicious Royal Lake

The following is from the commentary on the Discourse about the Refined (Sukhu-māla-sutta, AN 3.39).

2: The Bodhisatta's Youth – 270

In this manner, when the prince reached the age of seven, having grown up happily amidst a luxury like that of the Devas, King Suddhodana one day asked his ministers: “Men, what kind of sport pleases the children of tender age?” When the ministers informed him: “Your majesty, young children like to play in the water,” King Suddhodana sent for artisans and ordered them to select a suitable site to dig a magnificent royal lake.

Thereupon, Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, becoming aware through reflection that steps were underway to select a site for the lake, thought to himself: “It is not proper at all for the Bodhisatta to use a lake built by human beings; only a lake created by Devas will be appropriate for him.”

He summoned Vissakamma and assigned him the task of digging a lake, saying: “Go now, to the human abode, O Deva, and create a suitable lake for the Bodhisatta to play in.” To the question: “What kind of lake would you like me to create?” Sakka replied thus: “The lake that you create should be free of mud and slime; its bed should be strewn with rubies, pearls and corals; it should be surrounded by walls made of the seven kinds of precious stones. The descending steps leading into the lake should be made with planks of gold, silver, and rubies; the hand-rails should be of rubies and the main balusters supporting the rails should have their tops encrusted with coral. Inside that celestial lake, for the Bodhisatta to play water-throwing, you should create a golden boat equipped with a silver throne, a silver boat with a golden throne, a ruby boat with a coral throne and a coral boat with a ruby throne. They should also be furnished with golden, silver, ruby and coral bowls for water-throwing. The lake should be beautifully covered and graced with the five kinds of lotus.”

Vissakamma, after giving assent, descended to the human abode that very night and created a lake, complete in all details in accordance with Sakka's instruction, on the site chosen by King Suddhodana.

Here, it may be questioned as to how the five kinds of lotus could grow and blossom in the lake which was devoid of mud. The answer is as follows: Vissakamma created small golden, silver, ruby and coral boats in such and such places in the mud-free lake and made the solemn wish: “Let these small boats be filled with slime and thick mud and let the five kinds of lotus grow and bloom in these mud-filled boats.” Thus created and resolved by Vissakamma, five kinds of lotus thrived and bloomed in the royal lake.

The pollen from the lotus flowers spread over the surface of the lake moving with the gentle breeze and rippling waves. Five species of bees in five different colours buzzed and droned merrily as they bustled from flower to flower. In this manner, Vissakamma created the royal lake as instructed by Sakka and returned to the celestial abode.

When the new day dawned, thousands of citizens seeing the awe-inspiring and magnificent lake, exclaimed joyously: “Surely, this lake must have been created by Sakka and the Devas for the prince!” And so, with joy and delight, they went and reported the matter to King Suddhodana. The king, accompanied by a vast retinue, went to see the lake. When he saw the magnificence and splendour of the lake, he exclaimed with delight: “This lake is verily the creation of divine beings because of the power and glory of my son!” Thereafter, the prince went to play in the water of the lake which was a requisite for celestial pleasures. [252]

The Bodhisatta, Prince Siddhattha, grew up in great comfort and luxury, enjoying such delights as playing in the water of the celestial lakes covered and graced with the five kinds of lotus as said above, wearing very soft and smooth garments which were newly made and produced in Kāsi country, being at all times given cover and protection against heat, cold, dust, mist and snow, with the white umbrellas of Devas and humans.

The Construction of Three Palaces for the Prince

When he had grown to the age of sixteen years, King Suddhodana thought: “It is time to build mansions for my son,” and he had the most celebrated and skilled architects, carpenters, masons, sculptors and painters summoned to the palace for discussion. After making the necessary preliminary preparations, such as the ground breaking at the chosen site, and at the time indicated as propitious by the stars, he gave orders for the construction of three palaces named Ramma, Suramma, and Subha which were specially designed to suit the weather conditions of the three seasons. These three palaces were of equal length, breadth and height. They differed only in the number of tiers in the spires.

These three palaces are not described in detail in the commentaries on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) and Birth Stories (Jātaka). They are described at length in the commentary on the Discourse about the Refined (Sukhu-māla-sutta, AN 3.39); in the commentary on the Discourse to Māgaṇḍiya (Māgaṇḍiya-sutta, MN 75); and the sub-commentary on the Prosperity of the Household Life (Agārika-sampatti) chapter in the

2: The Bodhisatta's Youth – 272

Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra). What is presented here is the combined account of the expositions in these various texts.

1. Ramma palace was built for residence during winter.
2. Suramma palace was built for residence during summer.
3. Subha palace was built for residence during the rainy season.

1. The Winter Palace.

The Ramma palace had a nine tiered-spire. The structure and room formations were designed to keep the floors somewhat low so as to retain warmth. Meticulous care was taken in the arrangement of the lion-propped windows and ventilators to prevent elements of cold from outside, such as snow, mist, and breeze, from entering inside. Painters also drew pictures of blazing fires and flames on the walls, central planks, roofs, etc., of the said palatial mansion to dispel coldness on seeing them. Festoons of perfumes, flowers and pearls were hung, dangling here and there at appropriate places. The ceilings were canopied with fabrics of pure wool and silk which were very soft and smooth and warmth-giving and which were adorned with stars of gold, silver and rubies giving out bright and flaming colours. Besides, there were woollen partitions and gauze curtains adorned with velvet and woollen shawls which were very soft and smooth to the touch. Velvet garments and woollen apparel appropriate for the cold season were also kept in readiness for wear. In the winter season, nourishing seasonal food, such as hot, spicy delicacies, were prepared in readiness. To keep the room warm windows were kept open in the day and closed at night.

2. The Summer Palace.

There were five tiers in the spire of the palace named Suramma. The structure and room formations were so designed as to provide ventilation; the tiers were built high, windows and shutters kept spacious and wide to procure as much breeze and coolness as required from outside, the main doors and windows were kept not too secure; some doors had perforations and others had nettings made of iron, gold and silver.

The walls, central posts, roofs, etc., were decorated with paintings of blue, red and white lotus to give soothing impressions to the observers. Newly made pots filled with water to the brim were installed near the windows and placed therein were aquatic flowering plants such as blue, red, white lotuses, and lotuses with 100 petals. Mechanical devices, such as fountains and [253] showers, were installed to cool and freshen appropriate places simulating the rainy season when greenness pervaded the scenery.

Inside the mansion, flower pots and barrels filled with scented mud and slime were placed at suitable corners and in them were planted the five varieties of lotus. The ceilings were canopied with pure cotton fabric, which were soft and smooth and capable of generating a cooling effect. Besides, there were golden partitions and soft, thin curtains which were beautifully and marvellously decorated. Floor carpets of very white cloth, which were capable of making the atmosphere cool. Sets of very thin white garments suitable for summer wear were also kept ready to wear. Cold and savoury food that are cooling (sīta-viriya) were also prepared.

On the roof of the Suramma palace was hung a network of small tinkling golden bells producing sounds which were sweet, soft and pleasant and excelling the sounds of the five kinds of celestial music. Ceilings made of fine gold sheets with very tiny holes were fixed under the roof. When the water from the four ponds on the four sides of the mansion was pumped up by mechanical devices onto the ceilings it fell on the ceilings and trickled down through the tiny holes like rain drops as if it were raining.

Above the ceilings of golden sheets were spread out dried sheets of buffalo hide; then pebbles were lifted aloft by machines to the rooftop and from there released to fall on the stretched buffalo hides. The sound produced by these falling pebbles resembled the rumbling of thunder during the rainy season.

108 huge pots made of gold and silver were filled with perfumed water and placed around the royal bed which was in an enclosure of embroidered netting with blue lotus designs. To have the effect of a cool and pleasant atmosphere, blue, red and white lotuses were planted in large bronze barrels filled to the brim with scented mud and placed everywhere. The lotus bloomed when touched by the radiance of the sun. All species of honey bees came inside the mansion and hovered around these lotus flowers sucking their sweet nectar. Thus, Suramma palace, the summer resort of the prince, was always pervaded with the sweet fragrance of flowers. The main door and the windows of that summer residence were kept closed by day and open by night to give a cool breeze.

When the prince took up his residence in this palace, and when it was time for playing in the water, pebbles were thrown onto the sheets of buffalo hides, mentioned above, to produce roaring sounds similar to that of thunder; water pumped up to the ceilings trickled down in drops through the fine holes therein as if it were raining. At that time, the prince, wearing blue garments and robes and adorning himself in blue, revelled in water, enjoying its coolness for the day in the company of 40,000 attendants and followers who were also dressed and adorned in blue with their bodies perfumed.

On the four sides of the Suramma summer palace were four ponds in which the water was emerald green, cool and clean and covered all over with the five kinds of lotuses. Aquatic birds, such as swans, ducks, herons, etc., of various hues, rising from the ponds on the east, flew across the palace making melodious sounds continuously, and went down and gambolled in the pond on the west. In this manner, these water birds from the west pond flew to the east, those from the north lake to the south and those from the south pond to the north and so on. The summer palace, even during the summer months, was pleasant as in the rainy season.

3. The Rainy Season Palace.

There were seven tiers in the spire of the palace named Subha. The structure and room formations were so designed as to be of medium size, neither too low nor too high and neither too wide nor too narrow, in order to generate both heat and cold. The main door and windows were designed to suit both the cold and hot seasons, some fitted with closely knit planks and some with holes and wire meshes. There were paintings of blazing fires and flames and also pictures of lakes and ponds. Garments, robes and carpets, which would suit both the cold and heat, forming an assortment of apparels used in the two previously mentioned palaces, were kept ready to be used. Some of the doors and windows were open by day and closed by night; and others were kept closed by day and open by night.<sup>105</sup> [254]

<sup>105</sup> The beauty and perfection of this palatial mansion for the rainy season was identical with that of the summer and winter residences.

The Archery Display

After King Suddhodana, the royal father, had the three palatial mansions constructed for his son in such grandeur and magnificence which no succession of kings had ever enjoyed before, he thought to himself: “My son has reached the age of sixteen. After crowning him king with the white umbrella raised, I shall watch him enjoying the luxury and glory of kingship.” He then ordered messages to be sent to his 80,000 Sakyan relatives thus: “Dear Sakyan princes, my son has come of age and is sixteen years old now. I will crown him king. All Sakyan princes should bring their daughters, who have come of age, to my palace.”

When the Sakyan princes received the royal message from King Suddhodana, they refused to comply with his request, replying in derogatory terms: “Prince Siddhattha lacks education, although possessing a pleasant personal appearance. Not having acquired any skill of a livelihood he will not be able to discharge his obligation to support a family. So we cannot accede to the demands of King Suddhodana and give our daughters.”

These words are as given in the commentaries on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa), the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya), and also in the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra). However, in the Introduction to the Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentary, in the section on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa), it is mentioned that the Sakyan relatives made the derogatory remarks about Prince Siddhattha at one of their assemblies, when the Bodhisatta, Prince Siddhattha, had already been living in luxury in the three palatial mansions amidst 40,000 attendants headed by his chief Princess Yasodharā.

On receiving the replies from the Sakyan princes, the fathers of the princesses, King Suddhodana went to the Prince and related the matter. The prince asked: “My dear father, I do not have to learn anything. What skill do you want me to display?” King Suddhodana replied: “Dear son, you should demonstrate to the royal relatives the art of archery with a bow which requires 1,000 units of weight (pala) to draw.” Prince Siddhattha then said: “In that case, royal father, have it proclaimed by the beat of drums in the royal city that on the seventh day from today, I will give a display of archery.” King Suddhodana accordingly had it proclaimed widely all over the kingdom of Kapilavatthu by the beat of drums.

2: The Bodhisatta's Youth – 276

With regard to the term: “A bow which requires 1,000 units of weight (sahassa-thāma-dhanu),” the Light on the All-Seeing one (Samanta-cakkhu-dīpanī), says that it can also mean: “A bow which requires 1,000 men to draw,” which is in accordance with the commentary on the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya) and its sub-commentary, and the commentary on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa). It adds: “If, however, the Pāli word is taken to refer to the force or weight, it should be translated: ‘A bow which requires a force equal to 1,000 units of weight (pala) to draw.’ ”

The author continues to discuss the units of weight, which are differently stated in the commentaries and sub-commentaries and in the Poem about the Kinnarī Candā (Canda-kinnarī Pyo) and the Verses about Magha Deva (Magha-deva-līṅkā), which are famous works in Myanmar literature. We have left them out from our translation.

After the proclamation had been made by means of beating the drum, arrangements were made to prepare a site for the prince's demonstration of his archery skills and to construct a decorated viewing panel for the ministers, palace ladies, retinue, service personnel, soldiers, and distinguished royal relatives. On the seventh day, when all the arrangements were completed, the king with his ministers, military commanders and guests were all seated in their respective places. The prince, after taking his seat on the gem-studded throne in the centre of the open ground, took hold of the big bow handed to him by the royal attendants.

Sitting cross-legged on the throne, the prince held the bow in his left hand, twisted the [255] bow string round one big toe with which was pulled to make it taut, then he struck the bow string with his right hand to adjust it. The vibrating sound emitted from the string was so loud that it echoed throughout the city of Kapilavatthu which appeared as if it was on the verge of flying up into the sky.

Thereupon, some people asked: “What is that sound?” and some people replied: “This is the roaring sound of thunder.” Others, however, said: “Oh, you do not know! This is not the sound of thunder, it is the sound produced when the Sakyan Prince Siddhattha, so graceful in form and resplendent in complexion, drew the bow which requires 1,000 men<sup>106</sup> to stretch, struck the bow string.” All the 80,000 Sakyan princes and royal relatives witnessing the spectacular display by the prince of striking and adjusting the bow strings were exceedingly delighted.

The Twelve Minor Types of Archery

The prince sent for the most famous master archers of Kapilavatthu by the name of Akkhaṇavedhī, Vālavedhī, Saravedhī, and Saddavedhī and assembled them in the palace ground. As for himself, much like in a previous existence, when the Bodhisatta was born as the young Jotipāla, as mentioned in the Birth Story about the Teacher Sarabhaṅga (Sarabhaṅga-jātaka, Ja 522), he stood in the midst of the four kinds of audience with a majestic bearing like a serpent prince emerging from the earth or Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, at a military parade. He was clad in martial attire studded with rubies, wearing on his head a diadem adorned with the nine kinds of multi-faceted precious gems and girdled around his waist was a sash massively finished with the seven kinds of gems. He was holding a crescent-shaped bow, made of an animal horn, with coral-coloured strings and slung over his shoulder was a quiver of emerald colour.

The four aforesaid master archers were made to take up their positions at the four corners, as those of a rectangular tank, with their personal attendants carrying a supply of 30,000 arrows each. He himself, however, held an arrow with a diamond (vajira) tip and called upon the four master archers to shoot at him simultaneously.

1. Defending from the incoming arrows of the enemy with one's own arrow (sara-paṭibāhana).

The master archers pleaded: “Son of our lord, we are the most accomplished archers, who can shoot and hit the target many times in a flash of lightning (akkhaṇa-vedhī); who can split into two halves of a target as small as the tail hair or feather of an animal as if it were a target such as a brinjal (vāla-vedhī); who can shoot an arrow to hit another arrow which was shot ahead of it (sara-vedhī); and who can shoot to hit the target without seeing with the eyes but by listening to the sound (sadda-vedhī). Your highness is young and tender in age; we do not have the heart to shoot at you.”

Replying: “Fear not! If you can shoot to hit, shoot at me,” he stood erect, fearless like a golden lion in the centre of the open court. Thereupon, the master archers started shooting simultaneously thousands of arrows in a flash of lightning with all their might. The prince stopped all the incoming arrows, repulsing them by striking them only with a single arrow tipped with a diamond and manipulating them not to fall in disarray but making the arrow heads, tails, leaves and stems group together in a regular pattern to form a large chamber of arrows (sara-gabbha). In this manner, the four master archers had exhausted the 30,000 arrows allotted to each of them. When the prince knew that all the arrows had been used up, he jumped out of the chamber of arrows without disturbing it.

At this demonstration of archery skill of stopping and warding off the incoming arrows (sara-paṭibāhana), the spectators consisting of princes and princelings, Brahmins and rich people, etc., who filled the whole of the surrounding expanse, made joyous exclamations of praise and wonder, by the beating of breasts; and their tumultuous applause reverberated in the sky almost causing the earth to tremble.

Thereupon, King Suddhodana asked his son: “Dear son, what do you call the archery skill that you have just demonstrated?” – “Respected father, what I have demonstrated is the art of defending from the incoming arrows of the enemy with one’s own arrow (sara-paṭibāhana).”

King Suddhodana asked again: “Dear son, is there anyone other than you who had mastered this skill?” In reply, the prince said: “Respected father, there is no one who has skill in this art in the whole of Jambudīpa besides myself.”

2. Hitting all intended targets in a circle with a single arrow which returns to the archer’s hand (cakka-vedhī).

King Suddhodana then said: “Dear son, proceed to demonstrate to us other kinds of archery skill.” Thereupon the prince said: “These four master archers standing at the four corners were unable to shoot and hit me. Now I shall shoot with a single arrow and hit all the four master archers.” Hearing these words of the prince, the four master archers could not control themselves, shuddering with great fright.

Then the prince had four banana plants planted in the four corners where the four master archers were previously positioned; tying a piece of red silk thread to the tail of the arrow tipped with a diamond, he aimed at one banana trunk and released the arrow. The arrow bore through the first banana trunk but without stopping proceeded to the second banana trunk which it pierced; again continuing to pierce through the third and the fourth banana trunks, it finally hit and bore again the banana trunk he had first aimed at and came to rest in the hand of the Bodhisatta Prince. The four banana trunks each pierced through with red silk thread stood interconnected. The spectators exclaimed resoundingly and shouted in approbation.

King Suddhodana again asked his son: “Dear son, what is the name of the archery skill that you have just demonstrated?” – “Respected father, what I have just demonstrated is the archery skill of hitting all the intended targets in the form of a circle with a single arrow which returns to the archer’s hand (cakka-vedhī).” Then King Suddhodana said: “Dear son, proceed with the demonstration of other kinds of archery skill.”

The prince proceeded to display the following varieties of archery skill one after another:

3. Shooting the arrows continuously to form a stream resembling a long stretched-out vine or creeper (sara-laṭṭhi).
4. Shooting the arrows continuously to resemble a series of strings (sara-rajju).
5. Shooting the arrows in a formation resembling a terrace (sara-pāsāda).
6. Shooting the arrows in a formation resembling a stairway with tiered roofs (sara-sopāna).
7. Shooting the arrows in a formation resembling a pavilion (sara-maṇḍapa).
8. Shooting the arrows in a formation resembling a circular walling (sara-pākāra).
9. Shooting the arrows in a formation resembling a rectangular lake (sara-pokkharāṇī).
10. Shooting the arrows in successive tiers in a formation resembling a multi-petal lotus flower (sara-paduma).
11. Shooting the arrows in such a way that the preceding arrow is hit by the succeeding one (sara-vedhī).
12. Shooting the arrows to cause a shower of arrows resembling the falling of rain (sara-vassa).

These are the twelve minor skills in the art of archery. [257]

The Four Major Archery Skills

In addition, Prince Siddhattha demonstrated the following four major archery skills to his royal father, King Suddhodana, and the assembled royal guests:

1. The major skill of shooting volleys of arrows instantaneously in a flash of lightning at a target without missing (akkhaṇa-vedhī).
2. The major skill of shooting to split into two halves a tiny target such as a feather as if it were a brinjal (vāla-vedhī).
3. The major skill of shooting to hit every preceding arrow with the subsequent arrows (sara-vedhī).
4. The major skill of shooting to hit a target not by sight but by listening to the sound (sadda-vedhī).

Piercing the Seven Kinds of Massive Bodies

Besides, the prince also demonstrated to the assemblage of people, presided over by King Suddhodana, the skill of shooting to pierce through the seven kinds of massive bodies (satta-mahā-kāya-padālana).

The seven kinds of massive bodies are enumerated as follows: 1) A great mass of hide (camma-kāya); 2) a great mass of wood (dāru-kāya); 3) a great mass of bronze (loha-kāya); 4) a great mass of iron (ayo-kāya); 5) a great mass of sand (vālikā-kāya); 6) a great mass of water (udaka-kāya); 7) a great mass of planks (phalaka-kāya).

Of the seven kinds of massive bodies: 1) At their best, other archers could shoot through only one sheet of buffalo hide. But the prince shot through the mass of 100 sheets of buffalo hide. 2-7) Whereas other archers could shoot to penetrate through one plank of the cluster fig (udumbara) of the thickness of eight finger-breaths, or one plank of jack (panasa) of a thickness of four finger-breaths, the prince could shoot to pierce through 100 such planks.

Similarly, whereas other archers could pierce through only one copper sheet of two finger-breath thickness, or an iron sheet of one finger-breath thickness, the prince could penetrate many layers of such copper and iron sheets. Although other archers could shoot an arrow from the front through a cart loaded with sand or planks or hay and make it come out from the rear, or from its rear to make it come out from the front, the prince could shoot to penetrate through many such carts either from the front or from the back. Whereas other archers could shoot to cover a distance of just two and a half kilometres (catu-usabha)<sup>107</sup> in water and just five kilometres on land, the prince demonstrated shooting which could cover many kilometres, or even leagues, if desired, in water or on land. This is according to the commentary on the Birth Story about Prince Asadisa (Asadisa-jātaka, Ja 181).

The Archery Skill of the Bodhisatta

The Bodhisatta demonstrated his skill in archery not only in his last human existence as Prince Siddhattha, but also while he was still in the early stages of the fulfilment of the perfections, in his existence as Prince Asadisa.

Here follows a brief account of this episode: While still fulfilling the perfections, he was reborn in one of the existences as Prince Asadisa, the eldest son of King Brahmadata of the city of Bārāṇasī. When he attained the age of sixteen, he proceeded to the university town of Takkasilā where under the world-famous teacher, Disāpāṃokkha, he learned the three Vedas together with the eighteen branches of learning to the highest stage of perfection. In particular, he had mastered, without any equals, the archery skills. When he returned to Bārāṇasī after completion of his study, he refused the kingship offered to him as the elder son, in accordance with the [258] dying wishes of his father, King Brahmadata. The ministers then elected his younger brother, Prince Brahmadata, to be king. The elder Prince Asadisa continued to live the princely life in a peaceful manner. But the sycophants and opportunists serving the king, in order to sow the seeds of discord, maligned Prince Asadisa, saying to the king: “Prince Asadisa is planning to seize your throne.” Believing these slanderous words, the king ordered the arrest of his elder brother, Prince Asadisa.

On being informed of the said matter by a well-wishing palace attendant, Prince Asadisa felt deeply hurt and left the kingdom of Bārāṇasī for another country. From there, he had word sent to the king that a master archer had arrived at the palace gate, seeking permission to be in the king's service. Summoning the master archer to his presence, the king questioned him as to the remuneration he sought for his services. Agreeing to be employed on a salary of 100,000 pieces of silver per annum, Prince Asadisa remained henceforth in the service of the king as an archer. The incumbent archers were jealous of the newcomer being thus paid a salary of 100,000 a year, and spoke in disparagement of him.

One day, while in the royal garden near the auspicious stone slab, the king saw a bunch of mangoes on the top of a big mango tree. Considering: "It is impossible to climb up and pluck the mangoes," the king summoned the old archers and asked them: "Can you shoot down that bunch of mangoes with an arrow?" They submitted unanimously: "Your majesty, there is no trouble for us to shoot it down; but your majesty has seen our performance many a time. Let the new archer, who is earning much more than us, bring it down."

The king then sent for Prince Asadisa, and asked him: "My son, can you shoot down that bunch of mangoes with an arrow?" The prince replied: "Your majesty, if I have permission to use the place where you are reclining, the job can be done."<sup>108</sup> The king moved out from his reclining position and permitted the prince to shoot from there.

Unlike other archers, Prince Asadisa did not go about carrying his bow in his hand ostentatiously. He moved about with his bow folded and wrapped up in cloth. He had an enclosure formed of screens and curtains. Then entering the enclosure to take off the white outer garment, he changed into red attire. He also then girded up his loins and had a red sash wrapped tightly round his chest, after which, he took out the sword from inside the bag and hung it on the left shoulder. He then put on a cloak of the colour of gold and with the quiver slung on his back, held the large bow made of a ram's horn, each sector of which was fastened properly at the joints and set the bow strings of coral red colour.

Then, with a frontlet of precious gems adorning his head, and rotating the sharp arrow with his fingernails, he parted the curtain and came out like a Nāga youth emerging from the earth. Then going straight to the place for shooting, he asked the king: "Your majesty, shall I shoot down the bunch of mangoes with the ascending arrow or with a descending one?" The king replied: "My son, I have seen many archers bring down fruit with the ascending arrow, but I have not seen archers shoot them down with the descending one. I want you to shoot and cut the stem with the descending arrow.” The prince replied: “Your majesty, this first arrow I am shooting will go up as far as the Cātumahārājika abode, I beseech you to be patient and wait for the arrow’s descent from the said Deva abode.” – “So be it,” said the king.

He further explained thus: “Your majesty, this first arrow I am shooting, on its way up will cleave in half the stalk of the mango bunch and when it descends from the sky, it will cut the remaining half precisely without missing it, even by a hair’s breath, and bring down the bunch. Behold now, your majesty.” Uttering these bold words, the prince shot the arrow which went skywards at an accelerating speed.

The said arrow went up after cleaving half the mango stalk as the prince had said. The prince, judging: “The arrow may have reached the Cātumahārājika abode by now,” shot a second arrow with greater force and speed than the first one. The second arrow went up and struck the tail-feather of the first arrow to make it turn and fall downwards; and [259] itself went up and up till it reached the Tāvātimsa abode where it was caught by the Tāvātimsa Devas.

The sound, produced by the descending arrow cutting through strong winds in the atmosphere, roared loudly like that of thunder as if to make the earth tremble. When people asked: “What is that sound?” the prince replied: “It is the sound of the first arrow descending.” He calmed the fears of the people who were feeling anxious lest the arrow might fall onto them, saying: “Do not be afraid; the arrow will not be allowed to fall on the ground, I will catch it without causing harm to anyone.”

The said arrow, on coming down, cut the remaining half of the stalk of the mangoes without veering even a hair’s breath from it, in full view of the spectators, and fell downwards carrying the bunch of mangoes with it. Prince Asadisa clutched in midair the falling arrow with one hand and the mangoes with the other, not allowing them to fall to the ground.

The king and thousands of spectators marvelled at the astonishing and magnificent display and exclaimed: “We had never before witnessed such a wonderful demonstration.” They applauded and praised the prince by clapping their arms with open hands, snapping their fingers and throwing up into the air their turbans and headgear. The king’s audience, being pleased and delighted, lavished him with presents and rewards worth ten millions of money. The king showered on the archer prince much bounty and a large retinue which may be likened to a heavy downpour of rain.

In this manner, the Bodhisatta demonstrated his extraordinary and wonderful skill in archery also at the time when he was born as Prince Asadisa. In this last existence as Prince Siddhattha, he also demonstrated to the assembly not only the aforesaid skill in archery, namely, the twelve minor skills, the four major skills, the seven kinds of piercing through massive bodies, but all skills, dexterity and accomplishments which a prince should learn and master. Only then the doubts and suspicions of the 80,000 royal relatives, wondering: “Does he even have any manly accomplishments?” were cleared away.

In this manner, Prince Siddhattha displayed his skill in archery to dispel all distrust, disdain, slander and reproach heaped upon him by his royal relatives. His was a feat of skill which had no equal, it was so marvellous and rare to witness. Thereupon, all the royal relatives, being cleared of the doubts and misgivings which they had entertained earlier, joyously proclaimed: “Never before in the royal annals of the Sakyan dynasty had anyone witnessed such feats of mastery as we have witnessed now,” and thus showering praises on the prince. They were so fully delighted with such incomparable prowess and all-round accomplishments of the prince, that they willingly sent him their own royal daughters, who were beautifully dressed and adorned, for royal betrothal. The princesses of pure birth and matchless beauty sent to the royal court numbered 40,000.

The Beauty of Princess Yasodharā

Among the 40,000 Sakyan princesses, the crown, the crest, and the foremost was Princess Yasodharā whose maiden name was Bhaddakaccānā.

Yasodharā was one of the coevals of the prince. She was born out of the union of the Sakyan ruler Suppabuddha, the son of the prince's grandfather, King Añjana of Devadaha kingdom, and Princess Amittā, who was the younger sister of King Suddhodana. The princess earned the name of Yasodharā for being endowed with pristine fame and great retinue. [260]

Yaso = great retinue and high repute; dharā = bearer; hence, the princess who is endowed with a great retinue and high repute.

She was of a golden colour, always eye-catching and beautiful, like an image cast of solid gold or as if the natural flesh and body was made of gold. With her matchless, proportionate body, and of dazzling radiance, she was comparable in beauty and comportment to the victory flag-post erected in the scenic and delightful celestial Kīlāmaṇḍala amusement park of the Māra King named Manobhū.

Like that of the celestial Nymphs (Devaccharā), her bodily radiance could illuminate the whole of her private chamber which was otherwise shrouded in total darkness. She was also endowed with five feminine charms of a virtuous lady: 1) The beauty of skin (chavi-kalyāṇa); 2) the beauty of flesh (mamsa-kalyāṇa); 3) the beauty of veins (nhāru-kalyāṇa), 4) the beauty of bone structure (aṭṭhi-kalyāṇa), or the beauty of teeth formation (danta-kalyāṇa); 5) the beauty of hair (kesa-kalyāṇa); or, in other words, the beauty of bones, skin, hair, flesh and youth.

She also was pleasurable to touch (sukha-samphassa) like the feel of cotton ginned 100 times. She was free from the six blemishes, viz., being too dark or too light; being too fat or too thin; being too short or too tall; the sweet fragrance of choice sandalwood emanating from her faultless graceful body always pervading the air; her coral-coloured mouth was always fragrant with the scent of the blue lotus. Bhaddakaccānā, Yasodharā, was the noble “treasure of the woman” worthy to be the consort of a Universal Monarch ruling over the four continents.

The above description of the Princess Yasodharā gives only a few of the distinguishing features for easy portrayal. In fact, she was unique among human beings and excelling female deities too. She was enjoying the merits which had accrued finally and simultaneously from all the perfections she had fulfilled and the deeds of merit she had performed in the previous innumerable existences. Subsequently, she became a lady of excellence and great worth, endowed with the most admirable peerless beauty amongst ladies of virtue and nobility.

The Inauguration Ceremony

The 80,000 royal relatives headed by King Suddhodana, assembled at a grand and magnificent convention and celebrated the coronation of Prince Siddhattha, which included the raising of the royal white umbrella over his head, the sprinkling of cool water (abhiseka) and the formal ascension to the golden throne.

2: The Bodhisatta's Youth – 286

From among the 40,000 princesses presented by the Sakyan relatives, 10,000 princesses were assigned to Yasodharā to form her personal suite. The remaining 30,000 princesses were assigned to be resident attendants in the three palaces, 10,000 in each of them.

Prince Siddhattha, surrounded by young maidens of noble Sakyan origin, was like a youthful Deva being attended upon by Deva princesses or like Sakka, the Lord of the Devas; and he was entertained with very pleasant music played by all-female troupes. He lived amidst the great and magnificent luxury of royalty, comparable to that of a Universal Monarch. He took up residence in the three magnificent and elegant palaces of Ramma, Suramma and Subha in turn, according to the three seasons, leading a life of happiness and comfort. [261]

3: The Renunciation of the Prince

Visiting the Royal Garden

In this manner, Prince Siddhattha became a reigning prince in Kapilavatthu at the age of sixteen. When he attained the age of 29, after having enjoyed the comfort and luxury of a Universal Monarch, attended upon by a retinue of 40,000 Princesses headed by the chief Princess Yasodharā, one day, he became desirous, of visiting the Royal Garden. And so he sent for the charioteer and ordered him: “Charioteer, have the chariot ready! I will visit the royal garden.” – “Very well,” replied the charioteer and had the royal chariot, which was excellent and fit only for noble personages, adorned with ornaments and to it were harnessed four thoroughbred horses which were pure white like the full moon or the white lotus flower and as fast as the wind or Garuḍa, the king of birds. When informed by the charioteer that the chariot was ready, the prince rode in the chariot which was gorgeous like a celestial mansion and headed for the royal garden in a grand procession.

1. The Omen of an Old Man

When the prince had travelled some distance on his way to the royal garden, the Devas conferred: “The time for Prince Siddhattha to become a Buddha is drawing near. Let us show him omens which will cause him to renounce the world and become a recluse.” They asked a Deva to assume the appearance of an aged man, having grey hair, no teeth, stooping back, and trembling with a walking stick in his hand. This omen of an old man created by the Deva could be seen by no one but the prince and the charioteer.

On seeing the old man, the prince asked the charioteer: “Charioteer, the hair of that man is not like that of others; his hair is totally white. His body is also not like that of others; the teeth are all gone; there is little flesh on his body; with a stooping back, he is trembling all over. By what name is he known?” The charioteer replied: “Your majesty, he is called an old man.”

The prince, who had never even heard before the word “old man,” much less seen one, again asked the charioteer: “Charioteer, never before have I seen any one of such a nature; whose hair is white, who has no teeth, who is emaciated and trembling, with a stooping back. What is meant by an old man?” The charioteer replied: “Your majesty, one who cannot live for very much longer is known as an old man.”

He then asked: “Charioteer, how is it? Am I also subject to old age? Am I also one who cannot overcome the nature of ageing?” When the charioteer replied: “Your majesty, all of us, including you as well as I, are subject to old age; there is no one who can overcome the nature of ageing,” the prince said: “Charioteer, if all human beings, each and every one of them, including me, cannot overcome the nature of old age, please go no more to the royal garden and enjoy the pleasures therein. Turn back now, from this place where the old man is seen and drive me back to the palace.” – “Very, well, your majesty,” replied the charioteer who, instead of proceeding to the royal garden, turned the chariot around at the very place where the old man was seen and drove back to the golden palace.

It is the nature of lions, when shot by an arrow, not to seek primarily to remove the arrow which is the effect, but to seek the hostile hunter who has shot the arrow and who is the prime cause of the flight of the arrow. Of the two phenomena of cause and effect, Buddhas also do not seek to eliminate the effect, which is like the arrow, but they seek and find out through intelligence the cause, which is like the enemy hunter who shoots the arrow. Therefore, the Buddhas are like lions.

The charioteer had merely explained the [262] worldly nature of decay and old age (jarā) as far as he understood it, but the prince, as befitting one who desires to become a Buddha, knew distinctly on reflection that birth (jāti) was the prime cause of the process of ageing (jarā). After returning to the golden palace, he reflected with penetrative urgency (saṃvega): “Oh, birth is detestable indeed. To whoever birth is evident, to him ageing is also evident.” Having reflected thus, he became cheerless and morose; he remained gloomy and dejected.

King Suddhodana sent for the charioteer and asked him: “Charioteer, why did my son return in a hurry without proceeding to the garden?” The charioteer replied: “Your majesty, your son saw an old man, so he came back in haste.” King Suddhodana mused: “My son should become a ruler over the country. He must not renounce the world and become a recluse. The prediction of the court Brahmins that he would renounce the world and become a recluse must be proven wrong. O courtiers, why did you spoil my plans? Arrange quickly more palace attendants than before; then with more female attendants and dancing girls surrounding him, my son, while enjoying the five sensual pleasures, will no longer think of becoming a recluse.” So saying, he ordered an increase in the number of guards in the surrounding places at every couple of miles in all the four directions.

When the prince went to the royal garden for enjoyment, he was accompanied by a contingent of troops half a league in extent; as the chariot reached a place where it forged ahead, leaving the forces behind in the procession, the great Arahat Brahmas of the Suddhāvāsa abode, by dint of supernatural power, created the form of an old man in front of the chariot, to be visible only to the prince and the charioteer. The Arahat Brahmas of the Suddhāvāsa abode, considering: “The Bodhisatta Prince is now being mired in the slough of the five sensual pleasures like the bull elephant getting swamped in a quagmire. We should let him regain a sense of mindfulness,” showed him the form of an old man. The other omens which would appear later should also be understood in the same manner. This account is from the commentary on the Great Discourse about the Traditions (Mahāpadāna-sutta, DN 14).

2. The Omen of a Sick Man

Deceived and distracted by the five pleasures of the senses, increasingly provided and arranged for by his father to deter him from renouncing the world and becoming a recluse, Prince Siddhattha spent his time enjoying the pleasures and luxuries of the palace life. His sense of spiritual urgency, generated by the detestation of the nature of birth and old age, became somewhat diminished.

When four months had passed, after living such a life of luxury, the prince again rode to the royal garden in the chariot drawn by the thoroughbred horses, as before. On the way, the prince saw the form of a sick man, also created by Devas. The sick man was in great pain being oppressed by disease, and only when helped by others could he sit up or lie down. He was helplessly lying in a bed covered with his own filth.

Thereupon, the prince asked the charioteer: “Charioteer, the eyes of that man are not like the eyes of others; they are weak and unsteady. His voice is also unlike that of others; he keeps on crying with an unbearable lament. His body is also not like the bodies of others. It appears much worn out and exhausted. By what name is he known?” The charioteer replied: “Your majesty, he is known by the name of a sick man.”

2: The Bodhisatta's Youth – 290

The prince, who had never before seen a sick man or even heard of a “sick man” asked the charioteer again: “Charioteer, I have never come across such a person, who sits up and lies down only with the help of others, who sleeps mired in his own filth and keeps on shrieking unbearably. What is meant by a sick man? Explain the nature of this sick man to me.” The charioteer replied: “Your majesty, a sick man is one who knows not whether he will or will not recover from the illness afflicting him now.”

He then asked: “Charioteer, how is it? Am I also subject to illness? Am I also one who cannot avoid the nature of sickness?” When the charioteer replied: “Your majesty, [263] all of us, including you as well as I, are subject to illness. There is no one who can avoid the nature of sickness.” The prince said: “Charioteer, if all human beings, each and every one of them, including me, cannot avoid the nature of ailments, we shall go no more to the royal garden and enjoy the pleasures therein. Turn back now, from this place where the sick man is seen and drive me back to the palace.” – “Very well, your majesty,” replied the charioteer who, instead of proceeding to the royal garden, turned the chariot around at the very place where the sick man was seen and drove it back to the golden palace.

As has been said above, although the charioteer merely explained the painful, unbearable, oppressive worldly nature of illness (vyādhi), as far as he understood it, the prince, like the lion king and befitting one who desires to become a Buddha, knew distinctly on reflection that birth was the prime cause of illness, and of old age. Back at the golden palace, he reflected with penetrative urgency: “Oh, birth is detestable indeed! To whoever birth has become evident, to him old age is bound to become evident; illness is bound to become evident.” Having reflected thus, he became cheerless and morose; he remained gloomy and dejected.

King Suddhodana sent for the charioteer and questioned him as before. When the charioteer replied: “Your majesty, your son came back in a hurry because he had seen a sick man,” King Suddhodana thought to himself as before and ordered a further increase of guards to be placed every three miles in the four directions. He also arranged to appoint more palace attendants and dancing girls.

3. The Omen of a Dead Man

Deceived and distracted by the five pleasures of the senses, increasingly provided and arranged by his father, King Suddhodana, to deter him from renouncing the world and becoming a recluse, Prince Siddhattha spent his time enjoying the pleasures and luxuries of the palace life, and his sense of spiritual urgency generated by the detestation of the nature of birth, old age and illness became somewhat diminished.

When four months had passed after living such a life of luxury, the prince again rode into the royal garden in the chariot drawn by the thoroughbred horses, as before. On the way, he saw an omen created and shown by the Devas for the third time, namely, a crowd of people and a bier decorated with multi-coloured cloth. Thereupon, he asked the charioteer: “Charioteer, why are all these people gathering around? Why are they preparing a stretcher decorated with multi-coloured cloth?” The charioteer replied: “Your majesty, the people are gathering around and preparing the bier because someone has died.”<sup>109</sup>

The prince, who had never seen a dead person before or even heard of the dead, commanded the charioteer: “Charioteer, if they are assembled and engaged in making a stretcher, drive me to where the dead man lies.” The charioteer said: “Very well, your majesty,” and drove the chariot to where the dead man was lying. When the prince saw the dead man, he asked: “Charioteer, of what nature is this dead man?” The charioteer replied: “Your majesty, when a man dies, his relatives will never see him again nor will he see his relatives any more.”

Thereupon, the prince asked further: “Charioteer, how is it? Am I also subject to death like that man? Am I also one who cannot avoid the nature of death? Will my father, mother and relatives not see me again one day? Will I also not see them again one day?” The charioteer replied: “Your majesty, all of us, including you as well as myself, are subject to death. There is no one who can avoid death. It is certain that one day your royal father, mother and relatives will not see you anymore and it is equally certain that one day you will no longer see them.”<sup>110</sup>

<sup>109</sup> He had never seen a bier before; he had seen only a stretcher. He asked, therefore: “Why are all these people gathering around and preparing a stretcher?”

Thereupon, the prince said: “Charioteer, if all human beings, each and every one of them, including me, cannot overcome the nature of dying, please let us go no more to the royal garden and enjoy the pleasures therein. Turn back now, from this place where the dead man is seen and drive me back to the royal palace.” – “Very well, your majesty,” replied the charioteer who, instead of proceeding to the royal garden, turned the chariot around at the very place where the dead man was seen and drove it back to the golden palace.

As has been said above, although the charioteer merely explained the worldly nature of death (maraṇa) as far as he understood, that when a man died, the relatives who were left behind would never see him again, and nor would the man who passed away see again the relatives he had left behind, the prince, like the lion king and befitting one who desires to become a Buddha, knew distinctly on reflection that birth was the prime cause of the three phenomena: death, old age, and illness, which he had seen previously.

After his return to the golden palace, he reflected with penetrative urgency: “Oh, birth is detestable indeed! To whoever birth has become evident, to him old age is bound to become evident, illness is bound to become evident, death is bound to become evident.” Having reflected thus, he became cheerless and morose; he remained gloomy and dejected.

King Suddhodana sent for the charioteer and questioned him as before. When the charioteer replied: “Your majesty, the royal son came back in a hurry because he has seen somebody dead,” King Suddhodana thought to himself as before and said in the same manner and ordered a further strengthening of guards to be placed at every league in the four directions; he also arranged to appoint more palace attendants and dancing girls.

4. The Omen of a Recluse

Deceived and distracted by the five pleasures of the senses, increasingly provided and arranged by his father to deter him from renouncing the world

2: The Bodhisatta's Youth – 293

and becoming a recluse, Prince Siddhattha spent his time enjoying the pleasures and luxuries of the palace and the sense of spiritual urgency generated by the detestation of the nature of birth, old age, illness and death became somewhat diminished.

When four months had passed living such a life of luxury, the prince again rode to the royal garden in the chariot drawn by the thoroughbred horses as before. On the way, he saw the omen created by the Devas for a fourth time, a man, who had embraced the life of a recluse, with a clean shaven head and beard, wearing a bark-dyed robe. “Charioteer,” said the prince, “this man’s head is not like the heads of others; it is a clean-shaven head and also he has his beard shaved. His clothes are also not like those of others and are bark-dyed. By what name is he known?” The charioteer replied: “Your majesty, he is known as a recluse.”

The prince asked the charioteer again: “Charioteer, what is meant by a recluse? Explain the nature of a recluse to me.” The charioteer replied: “Your majesty, a recluse is a person who, bearing in mind that it is good to practise the ten courses of wholesome actions (kusala-kamma-patha), beginning with generosity (dāna), has gone forth from worldly life and put on the bark-dyed clothes. He is a man who, bearing in mind that it is good to practise the ten courses of wholesome actions which are in accord with righteousness, which are free from blemish, which are clean and pure, has gone forth from the worldly life and put on the bark-dyed clothes. He is one who, bearing in mind that it is good to refrain from ill-treating sentient beings, to work for the promotion of their welfare, has gone forth from the worldly life and put on the bark-dyed clothes.”

Here, although the charioteer had no knowledge of a recluse or his virtues since it was a time prior to the appearance of a Buddha and his teaching, he said through the supernormal powers of the Devas, that the man was a recluse, and explained the [265] virtues of a recluse. This account is taken from the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) commentary and the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra).

Those Bodhisattas with a much longer lifespan saw the four great omens, one after another, with the lapse of 100 years between each other. In the case of our Bodhisatta, however, appearing during a far shorter span of life, the intervening period between two subsequent omens was four months. According to the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya) reciters, however, the Bodhisatta saw all the four great omens in one day.

2: The Bodhisatta's Youth – 294

This note is based on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) commentary.

Thereupon, the prince said to the charioteer: “This man is truly admirable and noble for having gone forth from the world, bearing in mind that it is good to practise the ten courses of wholesome actions, which are in accord with righteousness, which are free from blemish, and which are clean and pure. That man is admirable and noble for having gone forth from the world bearing in mind that it is good to refrain from ill-treating sentient beings and to work for the promotion of their welfare. Just because he is admirable and noble, charioteer, drive the chariot to the place where that recluse is.

Saying: “Very well, your majesty,” the charioteer drove the chariot to where the recluse was. On reaching him, the prince asked the recluse, actually a supernatural form created by the Devas (iddhi-rūpa): “Man, what is that you are doing? Your head is not like the heads of others; your clothes are also not like those of others.” When he got a reply from the recluse, saying: “Your majesty, I am known as a recluse,” he asked him further: “What do you mean by a recluse?” The recluse, replied: “Your majesty, I am one who has gone forth from the household life, having shaved my hair and beard and wearing bark-dyed clothes, and bearing in mind that it is good to practise the ten courses of wholesome actions, beginning with generosity, which are also known by these four special epithets: for being righteous (dhamma), congruent (sama) for being in accordance with righteousness, skilful (kusala) for being blemish-free and meritorious (puñña) for being pure and clean both as to cause and effect; and also bearing in mind that it is good to refrain from ill-treating sentient beings and to work for the promotion of their welfare.”

Thereupon, the prince said in acknowledgement and approval: “You are indeed admirable and noble. You have gone forth from the household life, having shaved the hair and beard, and wearing the bark-dyed clothes, and bearing in mind that it is good to practise the ten courses of wholesome actions, which have the special epithets of righteous, congruent, skilful and meritorious, and also bearing in mind that it is good to refrain from ill-treating sentient beings and to work for the promotion of their welfare.”

The Date of the Renunciation

Before he renounced the world by going forth from the household life, the prince made four visits to the royal gardens. On his visit to the royal garden riding on the chariot drawn by thoroughbred horses on the full moon of July (Āsāḷha) in the year 535 BCE, he saw, on the way, the first omen, that of an old man. On seeing this omen, he discarded the pride arising from the exuberance of youthfulness (yobbana-māna).

2: The Bodhisatta's Youth – 295

Then, when the prince proceeded again to the royal garden as before on the full moon of November (Kattikā), he saw, on the way, the second omen, that of a sick man. On seeing this second omen, he discarded the pride arising from the exuberance of sound health (ārogya-māna).

On proceeding again to the royal garden, as before, on the full moon of March (Phagguṇa), he saw, on the way, the third omen, that of a dead man. On seeing the third omen, the prince discarded the pride arising from the exuberance of being alive (jīvita-māna).

Then again, on the full moon of July (Āsāḷha), in the year 534 BCE, the prince went out to the royal garden, as before. He saw, on the way, the omen of the recluse. The sight of this omen awakened in him a liking for the life of a recluse; and, making the resolution: "I shall become a recluse this very day," he proceeded on his journey to reach the garden the same day.

The Enumeration of Phenomena (Dhamma-saṅgaṇī, PTS 234) gives an exposition about spiritual urgency (saṃvega) [266] as follows: The fear of birth (jāti) or the knowledge that birth is a big fearsome danger is called the danger of birth (jāti-bhaya); the fear of old age (jarā) or the knowledge that old age is a big fearsome danger is called the danger of ageing (jarā-bhaya); the fear of sickness (vyādhi) or the knowledge that sickness is a big fearsome danger is called the danger of sickness (vyādhi-bhaya); and the fear of death (maraṇa) or the knowledge that death is a big fearsome danger is called the danger of death (maraṇa-bhaya). The group of these four kinds of knowledge is known as religious urgency (saṃvega).

Of the four kinds of great omens already described, the first three are known as omens which give rise to a sense of spiritual urgency (saṃvega-nimitta), because, if birth takes place, there is an unavoidable certainty of the manifestation of ageing, sickness and death. Because of the arising of birth, there is bound to be the arising of ageing, sickness and death. There is no escape from ageing, sickness and death for one who has been born. To one who looks upon these phenomenal dangers as fearsome, harsh and dreadful, they cause the arising of terrible fright and alarm in them.

The last omen, that of a recluse, is a manifestation to encourage the practice of the Dhamma, as a way to escape from the said dangers of ageing, sickness and death. Hence it is called the omen which gives rise to sense of meditational exertion (padhāna-nimitta).

Vissakamma helps the Prince Dress

The prince spent the whole day in the royal garden, playing and enjoying himself. After taking a bath, as the sun began to set, he sat elegantly on the auspicious stone slab. At that moment, he felt inclined to dress up. Sakka, becoming aware of his wish, dispatched Vissakamma, who, taking the guise of a barber in the service of the prince, went to him and dressed him with celestial attire and adornments.

Just while the musicians were entertaining him with the five kinds of musical instruments, and others were singing and dancing, and even while the Brahmins were extolling him in sweet words of praise: “May your majesty be crowned with success, free from all forms of danger and hostility; may you be blessed with glory and happiness,” the prince, thus dressed in five celestial adornments, ascended the royal chariot, decorated with precious ornaments, to return to the royal palace.

The Birth of Rāhula

At that moment, King Suddhodana, the royal father received the information that the prince's Chief Queen, Yasodharā, had given birth to a son. So he sent royal messengers to the prince with the glad tidings: “Go convey this good news to my son.” When Prince Siddhattha heard the news that a son had been born, he remarked, as befitting one who kept in mind the sense of spiritual urgency (saṃvega): “The Asura Rāhu,<sup>111</sup> who will seize and keep me captive, has been born; a great bondage has come into existence!”

When asked by King Suddhodana: “What has my son said?” the messengers related to him the remarks made by the prince. Thereupon, King Suddhodana announced the name and title of his grandson thus: “From now on, my grandson shall be known by the name of Prince Rāhula.”

2: The Bodhisatta's Youth – 297

The prince entered the royal capital of Kapilavatthu riding the chariot accompanied by a large retinue with majestic elegance at its height. As he was thus entering the royal city by chariot, a Sakyan Princess by the name of Kisā Gotamī, who was possessed of charm and beauty, and who was not of lowly birth but of high noble lineage, on seeing the physique (rūpa-kāya) of the prince from where she was, on the outer terrace of her mansion, and feeling delighted, uttered her feeling of joy as follow: [267]

Nibbutā nūna sā mātā, nibbutā nūna so pitā, nibbutā nūna sā nārī, yassāyaṃ īdiso patī.

Peaceful and happy will be the mind of the fortunate mother who has given birth to such a son possessing splendour like the rising sun, an extraordinary son of noble birth: first in beauty, superb in grace, foremost in intelligence. Reflecting meticulously on the twin attributes of her son's talent and beauty, her joyful satisfaction, day after day, will result in peace of mind.

Peaceful and happy will be the mind of the fortunate father who has given rise to such a son possessing splendour like the rising sun, an extraordinary son of noble birth: first in beauty, superb in grace, foremost in intelligence. Reflecting meticulously on the twin attributes of his son's talent and beauty, his joyful satisfaction, day after day, will result in peace of mind.

Peaceful and happy will be the mind of the fortunate woman who has become the wife of such a husband possessing splendour like the rising sun, an extraordinary husband filled with virility: first in beauty, superb in grace, foremost in intelligence. Reflecting meticulously on the twin attributes of her husband's talent and beauty, her joyful satisfaction, day after day, will result in peace of mind.

When oil is poured into a pot and when it is filled to the brim, oil overflows. In the same way, when someone feels intensely joyful and satisfied for some reason or the other, the said feeling of joy and satisfaction (pīti-somanassa) becomes, as if it were full in the stomach and spills out. The outburst of such feeling of joy and satisfaction expressed in the form of a verse (gāthā) or in the form of prose (cuṇṇa) is called an exalted saying (udāna), an expression of an intense feeling of joy.

Hearing the joyful utterance by the Sakyan Princess Kisā Gotamī, the prince reflected: “This cousin-sister of mine, the Sakyan Princess Kisā Gotamī, has made the joyful utterance that the sight of such an individual (atta-bhāva) will give delight and serenity to the mother, the father and the wife. Now, what is that which, when extinguished, will bring true peace of mind?” It then occurred to the prince, whose mind was already detached from defilements (kilesa), thus: “There is true peace only when the fire of passion (rāga) is extinguished; there is true peace only when the fire of hatred (dosa) is extinguished; there is true peace only when the fire of delusion (moha) is extinguished; there is true peace only when the heat of defilements, such as conceit (māna), wrong views (diṭṭhi), etc., subside. This Princess Kisā Gotamī has spoken pleasant words about the element of peace. And, I am one who is searching for Nibbāna, the Ultimate Reality, which is the true extinction of all suffering. Even as of today, I should renounce the world by going forth and become a recluse in the forest, to seek Nibbāna.”

With this thought of renunciation occurring to him, the prince, saying: “Let this pearl necklace be the teacher’s fee for the Princess Kisā Gotamī for reminding me to go in search of the element of extinction (nibbuta),” and he took off the pearl necklace, which was worth 100,000 from his neck and had it sent to Kisā Gotamī. The Princess was overjoyed with the thought: “This cousin of mine, Prince Siddhattha, has sent me the present because his mind is inclined towards me.”

The prince ascended the residential palace, which was dignified, elegant, marvellous encouraging delight in living, and reclined on the royal couch. The moment he reclined thus, all the female palace attendants and dancing girls who possessed a celestial beauty of form and complexion and who were adept in the art of singing, dancing and making music, gathered round him with five kinds of musical instruments in their hands and started playing them, dancing and singing so he could enjoy the five kinds of sensual pleasure. But being disgusted [268] with and wearied of activities which would kindle the fire of the defilements, he found no pleasure in such entertainments and fell asleep in a moment.

As the prince had fallen asleep instantly, the female palace attendants and dancing girls thought to themselves thus: “We dance, sing and play music for the prince but he has fallen asleep. Why should we now exhaust ourselves?” and they too fell asleep with their musical instruments pressed around and underneath them. The fragrant oil lamps kept alight inside the golden palace continued to illuminate the scene brilliantly.

The Resolve of the Prince

On waking up, the prince sat cross-legged on the couch and looked around. He saw the dancing girls asleep, some with their musical instruments pressed around and underneath them, and with saliva flowing out from their mouths, soiling their cheeks and bodies, some grinding their teeth, some snoring, some jabbering, some with their mouths open, some with no clothes on but with bodies bare, some with their hair loose and in confusion, they looked like a heap of loathsome dead bodies in a cemetery. Seeing the said detestable changes and transformations in the dancing girls, the prince became all the more detached from objects of sensual pleasures.

[A section here on the frightful nature of sensual desires has been moved to the Further Explanations.]

This royal palace of pomp and grandeur comparable to Vejayanta Palace, the residence of Sakka, is indeed like a cemetery where the dead are disposed of. The three planes of existences, namely, the sensual realm (kāmāvacara), the form realms (rūpāvacara) and the formless realms (arūpāvacara), are indeed like a big house burning in deep red, blazing flames. These sentient beings, humans, Devas and Brahmas, are bound to take conception, to grow old, to become sick and then to die; after death, they have to take conception again; then, to grow old, to become sick and to die again. Subjected to the repeated process of taking conception, growing old, becoming sick and dying, they undergo great suffering. And yet, they do not know the way to escape from birth, ageing, sickness and death. When will they know it?

Thus contemplating and realising the frightfulness of birth, old age, sickness and death, and the fact that the objects of, and desire for, sensual pleasures as well as the three realms of existences of the sensual realm, the form realms and the formless realms are less of happiness and pleasure, and more of pain, suffering and defects, he became entirely divested of delight in and attachment for the five objects of sensual pleasure, the prince then expressed his intense feeling by uttering: “How distressing it is! How oppressive it is!” (Upaddutaṃ vata bho, upassatṭham vata bho), and he became inclined to renounce the world and become a recluse.

Thinking to himself: “It is time for me, even today, to go forth from the household life,” the prince rose from the royal couch, approached the door and asked: “Who is here?” The charioteer Channa, who was sleeping with his head resting on the threshold of the door, replied: “Your majesty, I am, it is Channa.” The prince commanded him, saying: “I wish to renounce the world today, without letting anyone know. Go now quickly and saddle a thoroughbred Sindh horse which possesses great speed.” The charioteer Channa gave his assent, saying: “Very well, your majesty,” and carrying with him the necessary equipment for saddling the horse, he went to the royal stable. In the brilliant illumination of the fragrant oil lamps, he saw the royal steed Kanthaka, a victor over all foes, standing on the delightful ground of the stable under a canopy decked with jasmine flowers. Thinking: “I should prepare this auspicious steed Kanthaka for the prince to go forth tonight,” he proceeded to saddle Kanthaka with the complete equipment. [273]

While he was being saddled thus, Kanthaka came to realise: “I am being saddled rather tightly this time. On previous occasions, when going out to the royal garden, saddling was done differently. No doubt, the prince is going forth tonight riding on me to become a recluse.” Being greatly overjoyed, he neighed vehemently. The neighing of Kanthaka in his fit of great delight could have reverberated throughout the whole of Kapilavatthu but the Devas let nobody hear the neighing sound.

While his coeval mate, the charioteer Channa, was thus gone to prepare and fetch the royal steed Kanthaka, the prince, with intent to have a look at the royal baby before renunciation, went to the royal chamber of Rāhula's mother, Princess Yasodharā, and opened the door of the chamber. At that time, the chamber was brilliantly lit with scented oil lamps; and Rāhula's mother, Princess Yasodharā, was lying asleep on the bed strewn with jasmine flowers, with her hand resting on the head of her baby.

The prince stood at the door sill and, while looking, reflected: “If I remove the queen's hand and nestle my son in my arms, I will surely awaken the queen. If the queen wakes up, that will endanger my plan of renunciation which I am set on. So be it for now, I will not see him yet. Only after I have become a Buddha, will I come back and see my son.” Having contemplated thus, he descended from the royal palace and approached the royal steed to whom he said: “Kanthaka, my coeval, assist me for this one night. After attaining Buddhahood through your help, I will rescue the world of sentient beings including Devas, from the stream of Saṃsāra and convey them to the high ground of Nibbāna.” Then the prince jumped onto the back of the royal steed Kanthaka.

Kanthaka measured eighteen cubits from the neck and was of proportionate height. He possessed great power and speed as well. His whole body was snowy white; his physical appearance was as delightful and graceful as a newly polished conch. Sitting on the middle of Kanthaka's back, with his coeval charioteer Channa clutching the tail of the horse, the Bodhisatta rode out of the palace in the middle watch of the night on Monday, the full moon day of July (Āsāḷha) in the year 534 BCE, and arrived at the main gate of the royal city. As the Bodhisatta was departing from the palace riding the royal steed Kanthaka, Devas placed their hands under the steed's hoofs at every trot so that the sound of the hoofs could not be heard by anyone.

The prince, charioteer Channa, and the royal horse Kanthaka, each had their own plan. It was the time when the royal father, King Suddhodana, had taken precautions to prevent the prince from going forth by strengthening both sides of the main gate of the royal city so that each side could be opened only with the strength of 1,000 troops. He considered: “If it is so arranged, my son will not be able to go out unnoticed at any time through the main gate of the city.”

The prince was endowed with great strength; he had the strength of one billion Kāḷāvaka elephants; he had the strength equivalent of ten billion middle-sized male persons (majjhima-purisa). Accordingly, he thought to himself: “If the main gate will not open, I will escape today by making use of my own strength. Remaining seated on the back of the royal steed Kanthaka, I will clasp charioteer Channa who accompanies me by holding the horse's tail and the royal horse Kanthaka in between my two thighs and jump over the 18-cubit high city wall.”

Charioteer Channa also thought to himself: “If the main gate of the city will not open, I will keep my lord's son seated on my shoulder, clasp Kanthaka under my right armpit, and hugging him with my right hand, I will jump over the 18-cubit high wall of Kapilavatthu city and escape.”

The royal horse Kanthaka also thought to himself: “If the main gate of the royal city will not open, I will keep the royal son seated on my back as he is and along with the coeval charioteer Channa holding on to my tail, I will jump over the 18-cubit high wall of Kapilavatthu city and escape.” [274]

According to the commentary on AN 10.21 one elephant of Kālāvaka pedigree has the combined strength of 10 men of medium strength (majjhima-purisa); one Gaṅgeyya elephant has the combined strength of 10 Kālāvaka elephants, or 100 men of medium strength; one Paṇḍara elephant has the combined strength of 10 Gaṅgeyya elephants, or 1,000 men of medium strength; one Tamba elephant has the combined strength of 10 Paṇḍara elephants, or 10,000 men of medium strength; one Piṅgala elephant has the combined strength of 10 Tamba elephants, or 100,000 men of medium strength; one Gandha elephant has the combined strength of 10 Piṅgala elephants, or 1,000,000 men of medium strength; one Maṅgala elephant has the combined strength of 10 Gandha elephants, or 10,000,000 men of medium strength, one Hema elephant has the combined strength of 10 Maṅgala elephants, or 100,000,000 men of medium strength; one Uposatha elephant has the combined strength of 10 Hema elephants, or one billion men of medium strength; one Chaddanta elephant has the combined strength of 10 Uposatha elephants, or ten billion men of medium strength. The Bodhisatta has the combined strength of 10 Chaddanta elephants, or 100 billion men of medium strength.

The Deterrence by Vasavattī Māra

In this manner, the three of them were having similar intentions. Even if the main gate of the city would not open, any one of them would certainly act in fulfilment of his plan. Nevertheless, by virtue of the accumulated merits and glory of the prince, the Devas guarding the gates of the royal city were very glad to keep the main gate readily open for him to go out. Just as he rode out from the main gate of the royal city on the back of Kanthaka accompanied by his coeval charioteer Channa, Vasavattī Māra, who did not like, and had always opposed and obstructed the emancipation of sentient beings from the round of rebirths, went to the human world from his abode in the Paranimmitavasavattī world in a moment, as quickly as a strong man might stretch out his folded arm or fold his out-stretched arm back in, and appeared in front of the prince. His purpose was to deter him from renouncing the world by tricking him into believing that the deterrence was for his own good. Standing in the sky, he uttered (BvA, PTS 282):

2: The Bodhisatta's Youth – 303

Mā nikkhama Mahā-vīra ito te sattame dine, dibbam tu cakka-ratanam, addhā pātu bhavissati.

O very energetic Bodhisatta Prince, do not go forth and become a recluse.
On the seventh day from today, the celestial Wheel Treasure will certainly make its appearance to you.

He discouraged the prince also by telling him: “You will become a Universal Monarch, ruling over the four great continents surrounded by 2,000 small islands. Do turn back, your majesty.” Thereupon, the prince asked: “Who are you, speaking to me and discouraging me now?” Māra replied: “Your Highness, I am Vasavattī Māra.” Then the prince made this bold reply:

Jānāmahaṃ Mahā-rāja, mayhaṃ cakkassa sambhavam, anathkioham rajjena, gaccha tvaṃ Māra mā idha.

O powerful Māra, before you told me I already knew that the divine Wheel Treasure will certainly arise for me. As for myself, I do not have the least desire to become a Universal Monarch, ruling over the four continents. Go away from here now, O Māra; do not stand in my way.

Sakalam dasa-sahassam-pi, loka-dhātum-ahaṃ pana, unnādetvā bhavissāmi, Buddho loke vināyako. [275]

As for me, I will strive to become a Buddha to help and convey all sentient beings who are ready to listen to the Dhamma (veneyya) to the victorious land of Nibbāna, making the 10,000 world-element revolve and resound like the potter's wheel.

Thereupon, Māra threatened the prince with these words: “Friend Prince Siddhattha, keep your words constantly in mind. From this time on, I will make you know what I am, whenever your mind is filled with thoughts of sensual desires (kāma-vitakka), thoughts of malice (vyāpāda-vitakka), or thoughts of cruelty (vihimsā-vitakka).”

Thenceforward, he was constantly on the lookout for the occasion when the mental defilements (kilesa) would perchance arise in the mental continuum of the prince, following him closely like a shadow for a total period of seven years.

He followed closely behind the prince for a total period of seven years with intent to kill him outright at that very place if defilements would perchance arise in the mind continuum of the prince.

The Escort to the Bank of the River Anomā

At the age of 29 years, when he was about to acquire the glory and powers of a Universal Monarch, he forewent and spurned them as if they were spittle. At midnight, on the full moon day of July (Āsāḷha) when the constellation Āsāḷha and the moon were in conjunction, in the year 534 BCE, he left the royal palace which was comparable to the magnificent palace of the Universal Monarch. But while he was thus leaving, the desire to turn round and take in a view of the royal city of Kapilavatthu arose in his mind.

Immediately after that thought had arisen in the mind of the prince, the very locality where the thought occurred revolved round like a potter's wheel as if the earth was addressing him: "Noble Bodhisatta, your deeds of merit were such that you need not turn round to look at anything, the object you want to see will present itself in front of you." The prince thus viewed the royal city of Kapilavatthu from where he was, without having to turn around. The site where the royal horse Kanthaka halted was marked for the erection of a relic shrine (stūpa) to be named Kanthakanivattana, or the turning of Kanthaka. He then proceeded on his journey in a majestic manner on the back of the royal horse Kanthaka. Along the route taken by the prince, all the Devas and Brahmas marched along in front and rear, and on the left and right, some holding 60,000 lighted torches;<sup>112</sup> others came along honouring him with festoons of fragrant flowers, sandalwood powder, yak-tail fly-flaps, banners and streamers. They came along singing celestial songs and playing all kinds of celestial musical instruments.

The prince, who, as described above, had gone forth in such magnificence, passed through the three kingdoms of Sākiya, Koliya and Malla in one single night, covering a distance of 30 leagues, eventually arriving on the bank of the River Anomā.

The royal horse Kanthaka possessed the power of speed which enabled him to run around the mountains at the edge of the world-element in the early morning and arrive back in time for the morning meal, which was readily prepared for him. Nevertheless, it should be especially noted that at that time the garlands of scented flowers strewn by the Devas and Brahmas, Nāgas and Garuḷas, etc., from the sky were covering the ground up to the height of the horse's navel and so he had trudged along, struggling through the mass of garlands of flowers as though making his way through marshy ground and thus he was able to cover only 30 leagues in one whole night. [276]

4: The Early Days of the Renunciation

Crossing the River Anomā

Having reached the other bank of the river Anomā, the prince brought the royal horse to a halt at the edge of the river and asked charioteer Channa: “What is the name of this river?” When the charioteer replied that it was the Anomā, he took it as a good omen, saying: “My being a recluse will not be of poor quality; in fact, it will be a superior one (anomā).” Then by striking Kanthaka with the heel he gave it the signal for crossing the river, and Kanthaka jumped over to the other side of the very wide Anomā and stood there.

After alighting from Kanthaka, and while standing on the pearly sandbank, the prince addressed charioteer Channa: “Friend Channa, take Kanthaka together with my ornaments and return home. I will become a recluse.” When Channa said that he would also like to do the same, the prince forbade him three times saying: “You do have permission to become a recluse, friend Channa. Just go back to the city.” And he handed over Kanthaka and the ornaments to Channa.

Cutting His Hair

Thereafter, considering: “These locks of mine do not suit a recluse, I shall cut them with my sword,” the prince, with the sword in his right hand, cut off the hair-knot and seized it together with the diadem with his left hand. His hair of two finger-breaths in length that was left behind cuffed to the right and lay close to the head. The length of the hair remained two fingers long till the end of his life with no further cutting. The beard and the whiskers also existed for his whole life with their length good enough to look beautiful like the hair. There was no necessity for the Bodhisatta to shave them again.

The Bodhisatta, holding the hair-knot together with the diadem, made a solemn resolution thus: “If I am one who will become a Buddha, let this hair-knot stay in the sky. If not, let it fall to the ground,” and threw them up into the sky.

Thereupon, the hair-knot together with the diadem went as far up as one league and marvellously remained in the sky like a hanging festoon of flowers.

At that time, Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, saw the Bodhisatta’s hair by means of his divine eye; and he received it and the diadem with a jewel casket, one league in size, and took them to his abode of Tāvātimsa. He then enshrined them in the Cūḷamaṇi Cetiya which he erected and embellished with the seven kinds of precious gems and which was three leagues high.

The Requisites

Again, the Bodhisatta reflected: “These garments of mine, made in the country of Kāsi, are priceless. They are not proper for one who is an ascetic.” Then Brahma Ghaṭikāra, who happened to be an old friend in the lifetime of Buddha Kassapa, considered with his genuine and noble loving-kindness (mettā) that had remained throughout the whole aeon empty of Buddhas (Buddhantara-kappa): “Ah, today my friend the Bodhisatta, seeing danger in such miserable phenomena as birth, old age, etc., has gone forth on a great renunciation (mahābhikkhamaṇa). I shall go, taking the requisites of a recluse for this old friend of mine, the Bodhisatta Prince.” So he brought the eight requisites, namely, a double robe, an upper robe, a lower robe, a belt,<sup>113</sup> a needle and thread, an adze,<sup>114</sup> a bowl with its bag, and a water-strainer,<sup>115</sup> and offered them to the Bodhisatta.

The intervening period of time between the rise of one Buddha and another Buddha is called a period between Buddhas (Buddhantara-kappa). The period between Buddhas in this episode of the Brahma’s offerings was the intervening period between the time of Buddha Kassapa’s appearance and that of Buddha Gotama’s. After Buddha Kassapa appeared at the time when the lifespan of beings was 20,000 years, it gradually dwindled down to ten years and from that stage it rose again up to an immeasurable period (asaṅkhyeyya). On its decline, it went down to 100 years, and that is when Buddha Gotama appeared. Therefore, the intervening period in this case was more than one inclusive period (antara-kappa) long. [277]

Thereupon, the Bodhisatta assumed the appearance of a noble recluse by putting on the robes properly – the robes which may be termed the banner of the Arahant, which were offered by the Brahma. Then he threw up also his layman’s garments into the sky.

Though there was nobody who could instruct the Bodhisatta Prince how to use the robes, etc., it should be understood that he knew the manner of

4: The Early Days of the Renunciation – 308

using the requisites because he was experienced in so doing, as he was a monk in the presence of former Buddhas and as he was of great intelligence.

Thereupon, Brahma Ghaṭikāra seized the Bodhisatta's garments that were thrown up into the sky. He erected a shrine (cetiya), twelve leagues in size and finished with various kinds of gems, where he kept these garments in reverence. As the shrine contains the garments, it is called the Dussa Cetiya.

Here, in connection with the location and the height of the shrine, it is explicitly written by the Monywa Zetawun Sayādaw in the Light on the All-Seeing One (Samanta-cakkhu-dīpanī): “Since the garments were brought by Brahma Ghaṭikāra, who was of Akaniṭṭha Abode, it should be taken that the Dussa Cetiya exists in the same Abode.” And quoting the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra) and other works he adds: “The Dussa Cetiya, which is twelve leagues in height, should be considered to have existed in the Suddhāvāsa Akaniṭṭha Brahma world.”

With reference to the eight requisites offered by Brahma Ghaṭikāra, the first volume of the Traditions (Apadāna) commentary (PTS 115) explains it differently: The Bodhisatta became a recluse after accepting the eight requisites which, by the power of the meritorious deeds of the perfections, appeared in a lotus-heart on the mound of the Mahā Bodhi at the beginning of the world and were brought therefrom by the Brahma (Brahmunā ānīte iddhi-maye kappassa saṅṭhāna-kāle paduma-gabbhe nibbatte aṭṭha parikkhāre paṭiggahetvā pabbajitvā).

It is relying on this statement of the Traditions (Apadāna) commentary that the incident is versified in the Poem on Restraint (Samvara Pyo). In the Illustration of the Meaning of the Victor (Jinattha-pakāsānī) too, it is said: “These eight requisites appeared in a complete set in the lotus flower that blossomed as an omen when the world first came into existence.”

In the commentary on the Long Discourse on the Traditions (Mahāpadāna-sutta, DN 14), however, it is stated: “The region of the Mahā Bodhi disappears last, at the time of the dissolution of the world and rises first, at the time of its origination. When the world originates, a lotus-heart appears, as an omen, at the site of the Bodhi-maṇḍala. If Buddhas are to appear in that existing aeon, the lotus-heart blooms; if Buddhas are not to appear, it does not bloom. If it is an aeon of only one Buddha, a single flower blossoms; if it is an aeon of two Buddhas, two flowers blossom; if it is that of three, four or five Buddhas, three, four or five flowers blossom respectively from the same cluster. Thus mention is made only of whether flowers blossom or not, but there is no mention of the requisites readily borne in the flowers.

Although the robes offered by Brahma Ghaṭikāra are explained in the Traditions (Apadāna) [278] commentary as: The requisites which appeared by the power of the Bodhisatta's meritorious deeds (iddhi-maya-parikkharā), Ven. Buddhaghosa in his Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta) commentary (PTS 2.382), says: After putting on the robes offered by Brahma Ghaṭikāra and taking the earthen bowl, the Bodhisatta entered the city by the eastern gate and went round for alms from house to house (deva-dattiyam paṃsukūla-cīvaram pārupitvā mattikāpattam gahetvā, pācīna-dvārena nagaram pavisitvā, anugharam piṇḍāya acari).

Taking into consideration this statement of Mahā Buddhaghosa, it should be understood that the robes offered by Brahma Ghaṭikāra were not the robes that appeared by the power of the Bodhisatta's deeds of merit (iddhi-maya), but the robes given by a celestial being (deva-dattiya). All this is mentioned for pondering the question whether it is a fact or not that the requisites offered by the Brahma were those contained in the lotus-heart that appeared as an omen on the mound of the Mahā Bodhi at the beginning of the world.

After becoming a recluse, the Bodhisatta sent back the charioteer Channa, saying: "Friend Channa, convey to my mother Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī and my father King Suddhodana that I am in good health." Then Channa, after doing obeisance respectfully to the Bodhisatta and circumambulating him, took the bundle of the Bodhisatta's ornaments along with the horse and departed.

The Rebirth of Kanthaka

Since he overheard the Bodhisatta's conversation with charioteer Channa, Kanthaka the horse had been lamenting with the thought: "From now on, I shall have no opportunity of seeing my master." When he went out of sight of the Bodhisatta, he could not bear the grief that arose from the suffering of separation from one's beloved (piyehi vippayoga). As he was leaving behind the Bodhisatta, whom he loved so dearly, he died of a broken heart and was reborn in Tāvātimsa as a celestial being by the same name of Kanthaka. As for charioteer Channa, he had at first a grief caused by his separation from the Bodhisatta and now that Kanthaka had died, a second grief overcame him. Oppressed by the double sorrow, he made his way home to the city of Kapilavatthu, weeping and crying.

4: The Early Days of the Renunciation – 310

On his death, Kanthaka was reborn a Deva with the same name amidst great luxury and retinue in the realm of Tāvātimsa. Since he had been closely associated with the Bodhisatta and at his service in many existences, he died, being unable to withstand the misery of separation from the Bodhisatta. His rebirth in Tāvātimsa was not due to that sorrow. In the Bodhisatta's speech made to him while he was about to be mounted, immediately before his master's renunciation, he heard: "Kanthaka, I am giving up the world in order to gain omniscience." On hearing the words of the Bodhisatta's renunciation which had nothing to do with sensual pleasures, he became filled with joy and satisfaction that accompanied his clarity of mind, leading to the development of merit headed by faith. As a result of this merit, his rebirth as a deity took place in Tāvātimsa. Later on, when he visited the Buddha and listened to the Dhamma, he became a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna). All this is mentioned in the Stories about Mansions (Vimāna-vatthu) commentary. Those who wish to read a detailed account may refer to it (VvA, PTS 311ff).

The Bodhisatta's Visit to Rājagaha

After becoming a recluse, the Bodhisatta spent seven full days in bliss in the nearby Mango Grove called Anupiya, and travelled a journey of 30 leagues on foot in one single day and entered the city of Rājagaha. This is the statement made in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) commentary and the Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentary. According to the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta) commentary, however, the Bodhisatta, after becoming a recluse, observed the precepts with pure livelihood as the eighth (ājīvaṭṭhamaka-sīla), and journeyed to Rājagaha, 30 leagues away from the banks of the river Anomā in seven days. [279]

When he was about to visit the city of Rājagaha for alms food, he stood at the eastern gate of the city, then it occurred to him thus: "If I send a message to King Bimbisāra about my visit, he will know that Prince Siddhattha, the son of King Suddhodana, has come to my city and, with due regard and attention, he will send plenty of offerings. It is not proper for me as an ascetic to inform him and receive the four requisites. Right now, I should go on alms round." So, after putting on the rag robes (pāmsukūlika) offered by Brahma Ghaṭikāra and taking the bowl with his hand, the Bodhisatta entered the city by the eastern gate and went round from house to house for alms food.

4: The Early Days of the Renunciation – 311

For seven days before the Bodhisatta entered Rājagaha for alms, a festival was celebrated on a big scale and was enjoyed by all. The day the Bodhisatta entered the city, King Bimbisāra had the proclamation made to the people by beating the drum: “The festival is over. The people should now attend to their respective trades.” At that time, the citizens were still assembled in the palace ground. When the king opened the window, which was supported by a lion figure, and looked out to give the necessary instructions, he saw the Bodhisatta, who was entering Rājagaha for alms, with his sense-faculties well composed.

On seeing the incomparably graceful appearance of the Bodhisatta, the people of Rājagaha as a whole became wildly excited and the whole city turned into a state of commotion in the same way as it happened when Nālāgiri, the elephant, also known as Dhanapāla, entered the city, or in the same way as the male and female residents of celestial Tāvātimsa became agitated and perturbed when Vepacitti, the Lord of the Asuras, entered their abode.

When the noble Bodhisatta went round with the elegance of a king of the Chaddanta elephants for alms, from house to house in the city of Rājagaha, the citizens, seeing the incomparably graceful appearance of the Bodhisatta, were filled with strong feelings of joy and astonishment and became occupied with the sole intention of viewing the Bodhisatta’s unique demeanour.

One of the people then said to another: “Friend, how is it? Is it the lunar mansion that has come down to the human abode with all its radiance concealed in fear of Rāhu, the King of the Asuras?”

The second man ridiculed the first by saying: “What are you talking about, friend? Have you ever seen the full moon coming down to the human world? The fact is that Kāma Deva, the God of Desire, seeing the splendour of our king and his people, has come in disguise to play and have fun with us.”

Then the third person ridiculed the second by saying: “Friend, how is it? Are you crazy? Kāma Deva is one whose body is jet-black as he has been terribly burnt by the flame of arrogance and anger. The truth is that the person we are seeing now is Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, endowed with 1,000 eyes, who has come into our city mistaking it for his abode of Tāvātimsa.”

That third person was told in a rather smiling manner by the fourth: “How could you say so? Your words are self-contradictory. To name him Sakka, where are his thousand eyes? Where is his thunderbolt weapon? Why is he not riding elephant Erāvaṇa?<sup>116</sup> In fact, he is Brahma, who, knowing that Brahmins have forgotten their Vedas and all, has come to urge them not to forget their learning and to practise in accordance with them.”

Another man, a man of learning, reproached them and stopped them, saying: “This is neither the moon-disc, nor Kāma nor Sakka nor Brahma. As a matter of fact, he is the most extraordinary man, the chief among men, the leader and teacher of the three worlds.”

While the citizens of Rājagaha were thus talking among themselves, each from his own point of view, royal servants went to King Bimbisāra and reported thus: “Great King, a [280] wonderful person whom nobody knows whether he is a celestial being, a Gandhabba, a Nāga or a Yakkha, is going round for alms food in our city of Rājagaha.” Upon hearing their words, the king, who had already seen the Bodhisatta while standing on the upper terrace of the palace, was struck with wonder and sent his ministers with the order: “Go and make careful inquiries about this man; if he is a Gandhabba, he will go through the air; if he is a Yakkha, he will disappear when out of the city; if he is a Nāga, he will sink into the earth and disappear. If he is a real human being, he will go to a certain place and eat his alms food.”

With his sense-faculties and mind well-composed and in his unique elegance, with downcast eyes looking only a few feet in front of him, captivating the eyes of the Rājagaha people, he went round and collected food just enough for his sustenance. The food which he received included all kinds of edibles, coarse and fine, of various colours all mixed up together. Then he asked the people: “Where do those ascetics who come to this city usually stay?” The people answered: “They usually stay at the entrance of the cave, facing east, on top of Paṇḍava mountain.” And so the noble Bodhisatta left the city by the eastern gate, through which he had entered. Thereafter he sat facing east at the entrance of the cave on the mountain and tried to eat the mixed meal of coarse and fine food that he had received.

Having enjoyed kingly bliss, which was as great as that of a Universal Monarch, only a few days previously, he made an effort to eat a morsel of food which was a mixture of coarse and fine foods in assorted colours. As he was about to put the morsel into his mouth, he felt miserable and almost vomited with his intestines turning upside down, for he had never seen such kinds of food in his life and found it particularly disgusting.

<sup>116</sup> If he is really Sakka, he must have a thousand eyes, the thunderbolt as his weapon and Erāvaṇa as his conveyance. He has none of them.

4: The Early Days of the Renunciation – 313

Then he admonished himself by saying: “You, Siddhattha, in spite of the fact that you have been reigning supreme in a palace where food and drinks are available at your pleasure and where you have meals of three-year-old seasoned fragrant rice with different delicacies whenever you like, you, on seeing a recluse in rag robes contemplated: ‘When shall I eat the meals obtained by going on alms round from house to house after becoming a recluse like him? When will the time come for me to live on meals thus collected?’ and have you not renounced the world and become a recluse with such thoughts? Now that your dream has come true, why do you change your mind?” Then without the slightest revulsion, he took the meal that was so rough and coarse.

The three ministers, sent by King Bimbisāra to investigate, approached the Bodhisatta and explored all the facts concerning him. Then two of the three stayed behind while the third returned to the king and reported: “Great King, that recluse who had gathered alms food is still sitting peacefully at the entrance of the cave, facing east, on top of mount Paṇḍava absolutely without fear like a lion king, or a tiger king or a bull king, after eating, in a normal manner, the meal that he had obtained.” Thereupon, King Bimbisāra made haste and went in an excellent chariot to the Bodhisatta’s place on Mount Paṇḍava, as far as the chariot could go; and then leaving the chariot, he continued his journey on foot.

When he got near the Bodhisatta, with permission he sat down on the cold stone slab and being very much impressed with the Bodhisatta’s deportment, he gladly conversed with him. He said: “Friend, you are still young and tender in age. You are also endowed with a handsome physique and characteristics. I think that you are of good birth belonging to a pure ruling class. I offer you as much royal pleasure and wealth as you want in these two countries of Aṅga and Magadha which are under my rule. Be a king and reign! Please also tell me your lineage.” Thus the king asked about the Bodhisatta and offered kingship to him.

Then the Bodhisatta considered: “If I had the desire to be a king, such a Deva king as the Four Great Kings of the celestial world and others would have offered me their respective regal fortunes. Or, if I remained living a kingly life in my palace, it would have been certain that I would become a Universal Monarch. Not knowing this, this King Bimbisāra has made such a proposal to me saying in such a way. I will now let him know of my royal life.” So thinking he stretched out his right hand pointing in the direction whence he had come; and then he said in verse: (Snp 424-426, PTS 73) [281]

dhana-viriyena sampanno Kosalesu niketino.*

O, noble king, you who please your people with loving-kindness by ruling them with the four modes of support.<sup>117</sup> In the land of the Kosalan people near the mountains named the Himavanta, which is straight from here, in the direction of the north, exists the region of Kapilavattu, full of grain, food and drink and famed like the divine city of Amaravati. That region belongs to my father, Mahā Suddhodana, the excellent torch of the lineage of the sun that has long had an aristocratic ancestry since the beginning of the world. It is the place which is endowed with the seven kinds of treasure and men of valour, numbering 82,000, who have the ability of plucking a star at the end of the sky by means of their prowess.

Ādiccā nāma gottena, Sākiyā nāma jātiyā, tamhā kulā pabbajitomi, na kāme abhipatthayāmi.

O noble king, you who are recognized as a Deva! Because I am not a stranger but related to the Sun-god, I am Ādicca by clan, which is pure. I am Sākiya by birth, which is glorious, a new name which came about through the joyous utterance of King Ukkaka. Coming from the Ādicca clan and from Sākiya royal lineage, I have renounced the world with a view to becoming a Buddha, not because I aspire after objects of sensual pleasures.

Kāmesvādīnavam disvā, nekkhammam daṭṭhu khemato, padhānāya gamissāmi, ettha me rañjatī mano.

O noble king, you who are recognized as a Deva! With my insight wisdom, I saw clearly more of suffering and less of enjoyment in the material objects of sensual pleasures. I also saw renunciation of both the objects and the defilements of sensual pleasures as a haven, free from dangers. Having seen thus, I became a recluse with becoming a Buddha as my goal. I will proceed to strive for the attainment of Nibbāna, the ultimate reality that comes of renunciation and that excels all other states immensely in its quality of peace. My mind always yearns for that state called Nibbāna which is far superior to all other states.

With these three verses, the Bodhisatta told King Bimbisāra that he had come from the lineage of Sākiya and had taken up an ascetic life; that he had no desire at all for material pleasures; and that, having become a recluse with the aim of achieving Nibbāna, he would be retreating to the forest for the practice of the austerities (dukkara-cariyā) in order to speedily attain that very state of Nibbāna.

When told thus, King Bimbisāra replied: “Venerable sir, I have already heard that: “Prince Siddhattha, the son of King Suddhodana, after seeing the four omens with his own eyes, renounced the world to become a recluse, in order to attain Perfect Self-Awakening, the supreme leadership in the three worlds.” Having seen by myself your great aspiration after Nibbāna, I firmly believe that you will become a Buddha. Venerable sir, let me make a supplication to you. When you have become a Buddha, please visit my country first and foremost!” After thus solemnly extending his invitation, King Bimbisāra went back into the city. [282]

5: Practicing Meditation

The Bodhisatta's Meeting with Āḷāra

The Bodhisatta took instruction from and had discussion with sect-leaders Āḷāra and Udaka, and thereafter gained the eight mundane attainments.

Atha Rājagahaṃ vara-Rājagahaṃ, nara-rāja-vare nagaraṃ tu gate, giri-rāja-varo muni-rāja-varo, migi-rāja-gato sugato pi gato.

Then, when King Bimbisāra, the noble ruler of the people of the Magadha country, having spoken and extended his invitation to the Bodhisatta, returned and entered the city of Rājagaha, founded by that glorious Universal Monarch, Mahā Govinda, lord of the people and leader of humans and other powerful monarchs. The blessed Bodhisatta who was endowed with all excellent qualities like Meru, chief of mountains, who was the righteous monarch of ascetics, and whose graceful deportment was like that of the lion, lord of the beasts, also went to the sylvan palace in search of Nibbāna, the supreme peace.

In accordance with this verse that occurs in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) commentary (PTS 286) and the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra), when the righteous King Bimbisāra had gone back to the city of Rājagaha, the Bodhisatta set out on a journey in quest of the bliss of Nibbāna, which is known as sublime peace (santi-vara). On his way, he reached the place of a great religious teacher, Āḷāra by name and Kālāma by clan.

As the meetings of the Bodhisatta with the sect-leaders Āḷāra and Udaka have been dealt with elaborately in the Pāḷi text, the commentaries, such as those on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) and the Birth Stories (Jātaka), contain only a brief account of it. But for our readers, it may not be easy to have access to the text. Therefore the chapter on this incident will be treated with a few more details in this chronicle.

In this connection, it may be asked: “Why did the noble Bodhisatta go to Āḷāra and Udaka and not to the famous heretical teachers who claimed to be Buddhas, such as Pūraṇa Kassapa and others?” The reason was that the systems of practice of the heretical teachers were not substantial ones. The Bodhisatta himself had made investigations, for as long ago as 91 aeons, by personally following their courses, just to know whether they were of true value or not. From his personal experiences, he knew thoroughly that they were not. Therefore, he did not go to these heretical teachers; he approached the well-known teacher Āḷāra, who was leading a religious life surrounded by numerous followers.

When he reached the place of Āḷāra, the sect-leader, the Bodhisatta made a request saying: “Friend, you of the Kālāma clan, I wish to lead a holy life in this system of yours.” Then Āḷāra gave his permission and words of encouragement sincerely: “Noble friend, do practice in this system of ours! Ours is one that enables an intelligent practising person, in no long time, to realize the teacher’s view and to abide blissfully.”

As permitted by Āḷāra the sect-leader, the Bodhisatta soon underwent studies in the newly found system. Being a man of superb intelligence, the Bodhisatta could easily learn Āḷāra’s doctrine and practice. Just by repeating what the teacher uttered with slight lip movements, the Bodhisatta reached the stage of learning at which he could say: “I have understood!” In fact, he did declare: “I have understood! I have seen the course!” and the sect-leader and his other disciples also agreed to his declaration.

On considering the way the sect-leader Āḷāra had spoken with authority on the course of practice, which resulted in the realization of the absorption on the sphere of nothingness (ākhiñcaññāyatana-jhāna), he came to [283] know thus: “It does not appear that the sect-leader Āḷāra has just learnt by heart only through faith and without personal wisdom the course of practice leading to this absorption on the sphere of nothingness. Verily, this teacher must be one who has himself gained and realized the seven mundane attainments.” And so he approached the teacher again and asked him thus: “Friend belonging to the Kālāma clan, to what extent do you say that you yourself dwelt realizing this doctrine of yours?” As he had himself realized it, Āḷāra replied in the manner of those who had practical knowledge, not simply theoretical knowledge, by giving a full account of the seven attainments up to the absorption on the sphere of nothingness.

Thereupon, it occurred to the Bodhisatta thus: “Not only does the sect-leader Āḷāra possess faith, firm enough to attain the absorptions, I, too, have faith firm enough to attain the absorptions. Not only does he possess energy, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom strong enough to reach absorption (appanā-jhāna), I, too, have energy, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom strong enough to reach it. Āḷāra says that he has himself realized the seven mundane absorptions attainments up to the sphere of nothingness with super knowledges (abhiññā) and abides blissfully therein. It would be good if I, too, were to strive to realize like him the seven mundane absorption attainments.” With this intent, he strenuously practised the preliminary duties (kaṣiṇa-parikamma), and within two or three days he himself realized, like his teacher Āḷāra, the seven mundane attainments up to the absorption on the sphere of nothingness and dwelt blissfully therein.

Then the Bodhisatta went to the sect-leader Āḷāra and asked: “Friend Kālāma, do you say that through this much of practice you have yourself realized with the super knowledges these seven mundane absorptions and dwelt blissfully therein?” When Āḷāra replied in the affirmative, the Bodhisatta informed him thus: “Friend, through this much of practice, I, too, have myself realized with the super knowledges these seven mundane absorptions up to the absorption on the sphere of nothingness and dwelt blissfully therein.” Thereupon, as befitting a noble person free of the mental impurity of envy (issā) and selfishness (macchariya), Āḷāra the sect-leader spoke joyful words of altruism thus: “We have seen with our eyes a fellow recluse of sharp intelligence like your noble self. It is a great gain for us, friend!”<sup>118</sup>

In the wide world dominated by the evil thought of envy (issā), which is a jealous feeling caused by another’s welfare and good fortune, Āḷāra the sect-leader, being a true noble personage without envy, openly spoke words of praise to the Bodhisatta who was possessed of sharp, quick and incomparable intelligence. Being a person endowed with purely honest and Arahant desire (chanda) like that of Āḷāra the noble teacher, who has unblemished wisdom, is indeed exemplary and deserving of acclaim with the snapping of the fingers!

Āḷāra Offers to Share Leadership

Not only had the sect-leader Āḷāra spoken out words of praise, as has been said above, for he was a person free of such mental impurity as envy and selfishness, but he went further, saying: “Superb man, what I have, by myself, realized with super knowledges and taught, you have, by yourself, realized with super knowledges! What you have, by yourself, realized with super knowledges, I have, by myself, realized with super knowledges and taught. In this way, the doctrine I have discerned, you also have. The doctrine you have discerned, I also have. In this way, you are like me, and I am like you. Please come, friend, let us both take charge in harmony of this sect of such numerous followers.” He then gave a signal to his followers to assemble and said: “Disciples, I have gained the seven attainments, so has this superb man, like me. You disciples numbering this many should take instruction from this superb man; you disciples numbering this many should take instruction from me.” So saying he entrusted half of his disciples to the Bodhisatta. [284]

Not only did he equally share his followers but he also sent his male and female supporters, who came to wait upon him, bringing perfumes and flowers, to the Bodhisatta, saying: “Go and pay homage to the superb man!” As directed by the sect-leader, the male and female supporters first paid homage to the Bodhisatta and then paid homage to their master with what was left of the perfumes and flowers. When they went to offer costly couches and seats, they were asked to offer them to the Bodhisatta first and he would accept the remaining ones, if any. Wherever they went, he gave priority to the Bodhisatta in respect of excellent sleeping and living accommodations. In this way, as a man of magnanimity, Āḷāra treated the Bodhisatta, who was his disciple at the time, with high esteem and honour although he was the teacher.

The Bodhisatta Departs

Having put in effort and gained the seven mundane absorption attainments, as he had acquired absorption experiences in his previous existences and as he was highly intelligent, the Bodhisatta soon reflected on the nature and prospects of these attainments in the present life and the benefits to be derived therefrom in the next; and he came to know perfectly well the nature and prospects of the said seven attainments up to the absorption on the sphere of nothingness in the present life and his rebirth that would take place in the Brahma abode of the Sphere of Nothingness (Ākiñcaññāyatana) in the next. Thereupon, he came to the conclusion that these seven mundane absorptions fell within the cycle of suffering (vaṭṭa-dukkha). He also contemplated thus: “The aggregate of these attainments cannot lead to weariness in the cycle of suffering, to detachment, to the cessation of defilements such as lust (rāga), hatred (dosa), etc., to extinction of all these defilements, to knowledge of all that is to be known, to achievement of the knowledge of the four paths, to the realization of Nibbāna. In fact, these seven attainments result at most only in the Brahma abode of the Sphere of Nothingness (Ākiñcaññāyatana), where one lives for 60,000 great aeons (mahā-kappas), but they will not produce any benefit superior to that. The highest Brahma world of the Sphere of Nothingness in which the same absorption results is also only a realm which is not liberated from the dangers of birth, decay and death. It is, in fact, a region already encircled by the snares of the king of death.

A man, severely afflicted with hunger, at first eats with relish a big plateful of a delicious meal, but later on, he becomes fed up and feels repugnant at it, on account of derangement of the bile or the phlegm or of the falling of a fly onto the meal and he abandons it without the slightest thought of taking another morsel. In the same way, the Bodhisatta, after putting in effort and gaining the said seven mundane absorption attainments within two or three days without difficulty, at first dwelt in and enjoyed the said attainments; but from the moment he discerned the aforesaid defects, such as their being still within the cycle of suffering, etc., he entirely lost interest in exercising the seven attainments, even by means of one of the five kinds of mastery. He repeatedly abandoned the attainments, saying: “These seven attainments are of no use whatsoever! These seven attainments are of no use whatsoever!” And as he was wearied of them, he departed from the sect-leader Āḷāra.

The Bodhisatta’s Meeting with Udaka

Having departed from the sect-leader Āḷāra, and being desirous of seeking the bliss of Nibbāna, named sublime peace (santi-vara), the Bodhisatta went on searching until he came upon the leader of another sect, Udaka, the son of Rāma. Therefore, he asked the sect-leader Udaka for permission to study with him by saying: “Friend, I wish to lead a holy life in this system of yours.”

Then the sect-leader Udaka, the son of Rāma, replied thus in giving permission: “Friend, please practice in this system of ours! Our doctrine, if put into practice with effort by learned persons, will enable them, in a short time, to realize with the super knowledges the teacher's view (ācariya-vāda) and to live in happiness.”

Accordingly, the Bodhisatta lost no time to learn the doctrine and the course of practice of Udaka, the sect-leader. As with Āḷāra, the leader of the previous sect, the Bodhisatta, being highly intelligent, could easily learn the doctrine and the course of practice. Just by repeating what the teacher uttered with slight movements of the lips, the Bodhisatta reached the stage at which he could say: “I have understood!” In fact, he did announce: “I have understood! I have seen the course!” and this was confirmed by the sect-leader Udaka and his disciples. [285]

On considering the way Udaka explained, according to their traditional method he had learned from his father, the course of practice leading to the absorption on the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception (nevasaññā-nāsaññāyatana-jhāna), the Bodhisatta came to understand thus: “It does not seem that Rāma, the deceased father of Udaka, had merely learnt by heart, believing what others speak of the course of practice leading to the absorption on the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception. In fact, the teacher Rāma, the father of Udaka, must have been one who has personally gained and realized the eight mundane absorptions.”

When the sect-leader Udaka was having discussions with the Bodhisatta, he had not yet himself realized the eight attainments, he was then telling the Bodhisatta what had been told by his father Rāma. When the Bodhisatta had learnt from him and realized, within two or three days, the eight mundane absorptions up to the highest of them all, the absorption on the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception, he parted company with Udaka.

As for Udaka himself, only when the Bodhisatta had left him, he was greatly overcome by spiritual urgency (samvega) and made exertion to gain the attainments; as befitting one who had previous experiences in meditation, he realized the absorptions up to neither-perception-nor-non-perception. Direct mention of this point is made in the sub-commentary to MN 26. This accounts for the Bodhisatta's consideration with reference to Udaka's father, Rāma, and his question about the great teacher Rāma alone in his discussion with Udaka.

The Bodhisatta approached the sect-leader Udaka again and asked him directly: “Friend, to what extent did your father, Rāma the master, say that he himself dwelt realizing this doctrine of his?” Udaka replied that his father did so to the extent of the absorption on the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception.

Then it occurred to the Bodhisatta: “Not only did Udaka’s father, Rāma the master, possess faith firm enough to attain the absorption on the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception, I, too, have such faith leading to that absorption. Not only did he possess energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom strong enough to reach the absorption on the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception, I, too, have such energy, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom to get there.

Udaka’s father, Rāma the master, said that he had personally realized the eight mundane absorption attainments up to the absorption on the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception with the super knowledges (abhiññā) and dwelt blissfully therein. It would be good if I, too, were to strive to realize, like him, the eight mundane absorption attainments.” With this intent, he strenuously practised the preliminary duties (kaṣiṇa-parikamma), and within two or three days, he himself realized, like Udaka’s father, Rāma the master, the eight mundane absorption attainments up to the absorption on the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception and dwelt blissfully therein.

Then the Bodhisatta went again to the sect-leader Udaka and said: “Friend, did your father, Rāma the master, say that through this much of the practice, he had, by himself, realized with the super knowledges the eight mundane absorptions and dwelt blissfully therein?” When Udaka replied in the affirmative, the Bodhisatta informed him thus: “Friend, through this much of practice, I, too, have, by myself, realized with the super knowledges the eight mundane absorptions up to the absorption on the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception and dwelt blissfully therein.” Thereupon, as befitting a noble person free from the mental impurity of envy and selfishness, Udaka the sect-leader, like Āḷāra the leader of the previous sect, spoke joyful words of altruism thus: “We have seen with our own eyes a fellow recluse and spiritual companion of sharp intelligence like you. It is a great gain for us, friend!”

Udaka Offers Him Leadership

Not only had the sect-leader Udaka spoken congratulatory words, as has been said above, as befitting one who was free from the mental impurity of envy and selfishness, he went further, saying: “Superb man, what my father, Rāma the master, had, by himself, realized with the super knowledges and taught, you, superb man, have, by yourself, realized with the super knowledges. What you have, by yourself, realized with the super knowledges, my father, Rāma the master, had, by himself, realized with the super knowledges and taught. In this way, the doctrine my father had [286] discerned, you have also. The doctrine you have discerned, my father, Rāma the master, had. In this way, you are like my father, and my father is like you. Please come friend, please take charge of this great sect.” So saying, he entrusted the Bodhisatta with the whole sect. Thus Udaka appointed his fellow ascetic and spiritual companion, the Bodhisatta, as his own teacher. Not only did he entrust him with the entire sect but he honoured the Bodhisatta with reverence the way Āḷāra, the sect-leader, did, as has been mentioned before.

The Bodhisatta Departs

Having put efforts and gained the eight mundane absorption attainments, as he had acquired absorption experiences in his previous existences and as he was highly intelligent, the Bodhisatta soon reflected on the nature and prospects of the said eight absorption attainments, up to the absorption on the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception in the present life and the fruits that would accrue in the future. He came to know perfectly well the nature and prospects of these eight absorption attainments, up to the absorption on the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception in the present life and his rebirth that would take place in the Brahma abode of the Sphere of Neither-Perception-nor-Non-Perception (Nevasaññā-nāsaññāyatana) hereafter.

Therefore, he came to the conclusion that these eight mundane absorptions fell within the cycle of suffering, and he also contemplated thus: “The aggregate of these attainments cannot lead to weariness in the cycle of suffering, to detachment, to the cessation of the defilements such as lust (rāga), hatred (dosa), etc., to extinction of all these defilements, to knowledge of all that is to be known, to achievement of knowledge of the four paths, to realization of Nibbāna. In fact, these eight attainments result, at most, only in the Brahma abode of the Sphere of Neither-Perception-nor-Non-Perception where one lives for 84,000 great aeons (mahā-kappa), but they cannot produce any benefit superior to that. The highest Brahma world of the Sphere of Neither-Perception-nor-Non-Perception in which the same absorption results, is a realm which is not liberated from the dangers of birth, decay and death. It is, in fact, a region already encircled by the snares of the king of death.”

A man, severely afflicted with hunger, at first eats with relish a big plateful of a delicious meal, but later on, he becomes fed up and feels repugnant at it, on account of the derangement of the bile or the phlegm or of the falling of a fly onto the meal and he abandons it without the slightest thought of taking another morsel. In the same way, the Bodhisatta, after putting efforts and gaining the said eight mundane absorption attainments within two or three days without difficulty, at first dwelt in and enjoyed the said attainments; but from the moment he discerned the aforesaid defects, such as their being within the cycle of suffering, etc., he had entirely lost interest in exercising the eight attainments, even by means of one of the five kinds of mastery. He repeatedly abandoned the attainments, saying: “These eight attainments are of no use whatever! These eight attainments are of no use whatever!” And as he was wearied of them, he departed from the sect-leader Udaka. [287]

6: The Practice of Austere Striving

Austere Striving in Uruvelā

After his departure from the sect-leader Udaka, the Bodhisatta went about the Magadha country still with his mind set on Nibbāna and eventually arrived in the market town of Senā. Near Senā was Uruvelā forest. In the forest, the natural lay of the land was delightful enough for noble and virtuous men. The forest itself was pleasant. The river Nerañjarā had an attractive landing place, free of mud and mire, with a sand beach like silvery sheets spread out, with pleasingly clean and clear currents full of sportive fish and tortoises, and the river flowed continuously. There were also small villages where forest dwelling ascetics could easily receive alms food. When the Bodhisatta saw all these features, he noted them carefully and then decided: “This is an ideal place for sons of good families seeking Nibbāna to undertake meditation.” Accordingly, he built a small dwelling place with available dry firewood and leaves and stayed in the forest of Uruvelā to engage in meditation.

The Three Similes

Then there appeared in the mind of the Bodhisatta three similes. They are:

1. In order to make fire, however hard a man rubs with a fire-kindling stick, a big piece of wet firewood soaked in water, he cannot produce fire and will only become miserable.

In the same way, in this world, the so-called recluses and Brahmins, in whom the wet and slimy elements of sensual passion have not dried up and who do not stay away from sense objects also will not realize the paths and fruitions but will only become miserable, however hard they work to rid themselves of defilements. This was the first simile that manifested to the Bodhisatta.

In this simile, those in whom the slimy elements of sensual passion have not dried up are likened to the big piece of wet fig-tree wood. The act of keeping themselves in the water of sense objects is likened to the act of keeping in water the piece of wet fig-tree wood. The inability to secure the fire or the knowledge of the path however hard they work without giving up sense objects is likened to the non-producing of fire but the producing of misery however hard the big piece of wet fig-tree wood soaked in water is rubbed. This simile signifies the asceticism of those wandering ascetics all of whom are living a household life with a wife and children (saputta-bharyā-pabbajjā).

2. In order to make fire, however hard a man rubs with a kindling stick, a piece of wet firewood kept on land away from water, he still cannot secure fire because of the wetness of the wood; instead he will only become miserable.

In the same way, in this world, the so-called recluses and Brahmins in whom the slimy elements of sensual passion have not dried up will not realize the paths and fruitions but will only become miserable however hard they work, staying away from the water of sense objects physically as well as mentally. This was the second simile that manifested to the Bodhisatta.

In this simile, those in whom the slimy elements of sensual passion have not dried up are likened to the piece of wet fig-tree wood. The inability to secure the fire of the knowledge of the path, however hard they work, staying away from sense objects both physically and mentally, is likened to the non-producing of fire, but the producing of misery instead of fire because of the wetness of the wood, however hard the piece of wet fig-tree wood kept on [288] land away from water is rubbed. This simile signifies the asceticism of those Brahmins who, having renounced their wives and children (brāhmaṇa-dhammika-pabbajjā), devote themselves to the wrong practice (pāsaṇḍa).

3. In order to make fire, when a man rubs with a fire-kindling stick, a big piece of dry firewood kept on land away from water, he can secure fire easily as the wood has been kept on land away from water and is itself dry.

In the same way, in this world, those who are called recluses and Brahmins, in whom the wet and slimy elements of sensual passion have been destroyed and who stay away from sense objects physically as well as mentally, can realize the paths and fruitions when they practise the correct ascetic doctrine, whether with difficulty or with ease. This was the third simile that manifested to the Bodhisatta.

This simile signifies the asceticism of the Bodhisatta himself.

The Group-of-Five

The Group-of-Five recluses (pañca-vaggiya), who had already taken up an ascetic life just after the birth of the Bodhisatta, enquired whether the Bodhisatta Prince had renounced the world and had become a recluse or not. On hearing that the Bodhisatta had, they began to visit villages, market towns, etc., one after another, to look for the Bodhisatta and finally caught up with him in Uruvelā forest. Having strong hopes that: “In no time he will become a Buddha! In no time he will become a Buddha!” they waited upon the Bodhisatta who was engaged in austere striving (dukkara-cariyā) which would last for six years. They moved about with him, fulfilling their duties, such as sweeping the place, fetching hot and cold water and so on.

The Bodhisatta’s Strenuous Exertions

The austere striving of the fourfold determination: 1) “Let only the skin be left!” 2) “Let only the sinews be left!” 3) “Let only the bones be left!” and 4) “Let the flesh and the blood dry up!” is called the strenuous exertion (padhāna-viriya). The practices to be mentioned now are called the work of exertion (padhāna) as they are done with strenuous exertion. They are also called austere striving (dukkara-cariyā) as they are difficult for ordinary people to practise.

The first paragraph below is from the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra); the next six paragraphs are from the Long Discourse about Saccaka (Mahā-saccaka-sutta, MN 36).

Having repaired to the market town of Senā for alms round, the Bodhisatta spent a lot of days practising meditation for the development of loving-kindness (mettā-bhāvanā), and then it occurred to him: “What benefit will accrue from depending on this coarse and rough food, swallowed in morsels? By eating such food to my heart’s content and developing loving-kindness, I will not achieve omniscience which is my goal.” And so he gave up living on alms food and sustained himself by eating big and small fruits, which fell from the trees in the Uruvelā forest. Failing to achieve omniscience even in this way, he thought to himself: “This food consisting of big and small fruits is still coarse. Searching for fruit is also an impediment (paḷibodha).” Accordingly, he sustained himself only with the fruit which dropped from the tree he was using as a shelter.

Then the Bodhisatta considered: “It would be good if I, grinding my teeth and clicking my tongue, were to suppress unwholesome consciousness associated with wrong thoughts, such as sensual thoughts, with my wholesome consciousness associated with powerful right thoughts. It would be good if I were to eradicate it. It would be good if I were to remove it by means of the fire of energy.”

So, grinding his teeth and clicking his tongue, he suppressed unwholesome consciousness with wholesome consciousness. He did not let it arise but eradicated it. He removed it from his person by means of the fire of energy. Thereupon, sweat poured out from his armpits like the pouring down of sweat from the armpits of a feeble man when a man of strength held him by the head or the shoulders and pressed him down. At that moment, the Bodhisatta's effort was very vigorous – it was not slackened at all. His mindfulness was extremely distinct and steadfast; never did he lose his awareness. But his painful effort battered, as it were, the whole of his body, which was heated all [289] over and knew no relief. Although he was in such a miserable plight, his willingness to pursue the struggle remained unflinching.

Then it occurred to the Bodhisatta: “It would be good if I were to develop absorption on non-breathing (appānaka-jhāna) by restraint of out-breathing and in-breathing.” So, with unrelenting effort, he restrained exhalation and inhalation through his mouth and his nose so that the air could not go out or come in. Then the air accumulated and escaped through his ears, through his mouth and his nose. The sound produced by the wind escaping was forceful like that from the bellows of a blacksmith. At that moment, the Bodhisatta's effort was very vigorous. It was not slackened at all. His mindfulness was extremely distinct and steadfast. Never did he lose his awareness. But his painful effort battered, as it were, the whole of his body, which was heated all over and knew no relief. Although he was in such a miserable plight, his willingness to pursue the struggle remained unflinching.

Then it occurred to the Bodhisatta: “It would be good if I were to develop the absorption on non-breathing (appānaka-jhāna) again.” So with unrelenting effort, he restrained exhalation and inhalation through his mouth, his nose and his ears. Then, having no chance to escape through his mouth, his nose and his ears, the wind rushed up to his head, battering and piercing it. It was as if a man of strength was churning his head with a sharp and pointed drill. Even at that time, his energy was as vigorous as before, it was not slackened at all. His mindfulness also was still very distinct and steadfast. Never did he lose his awareness. But his painful effort battered, as it were, the whole of his body, which was heated all over and knew no relief. Although he was in such a miserable plight, his willingness to pursue the struggle remained unflinching.

Again, it occurred to the Bodhisatta: “It would be good if I were to develop the absorption on non-breathing (appānaka-jhāna) again.” So, with unrelenting effort, he restrained exhalation and inhalation through his nose and his mouth and his ears. Thereupon, a violent wind battered his head and as a result, he suffered from very severe headaches. It was like a great suffering caused by a man of tremendous strength who fastens a leather strap around the head and tightens it.<sup>119</sup> At that time, too, his energy was as vigorous as before, it was not slackened at all. His mindfulness was still very distinct and steadfast. Never did he lose his awareness. But his painful effort made the whole of his body battered, as it were, which was heated all over and knew no relief. Although he was in such a miserable plight, his willingness to pursue the struggle remained unflinching.

Still again, it occurred to the Bodhisatta: “It would be good if I were to develop the absorption on non-breathing (appānaka-jhāna) again.” So, with unrelenting effort, he restrained exhalation and inhalation through his nose, his mouth and his ears, as before. Thereupon, the air was of such great intensity that it injured his abdomen as if carving it up. It was as if a skilful butcher or his assistant cut up the abdomen with a sharp butcher’s knife. At that time, too, his energy was as strong as before, it was not slackened at all. His mindfulness was very distinct and steadfast. Never did he lose his awareness. But the painful effort made the whole of his body battered, as it were, which was heated all over and knew no relief. Although he was in such a miserable plight, his willingness to pursue the struggle remained unflinching.

Once more, it occurred to the Bodhisatta: “It would be good if I were to develop the absorption on non-breathing (appānaka-jhāna) again.” So, with unrelenting effort, he restrained exhalation and inhalation through his mouth, his nose and his ears, as before. Thereupon, the whole of his body suffered from a violent burning disease (dāha-roga). It was like a severe burn when a weak man was grilled over a big fire by two strong men, each on either side, holding him by the right arm and the left. At that time, the whole of the Bodhisatta’s body burned hot. At the same time, his energy was not slackened but remained as strong as before. His [290] mindfulness was extremely distinct and steadfast. On account of the trauma of his strenuous exertion (padhāna), he could not, however, get peace. Nevertheless, his willingness to pursue the struggle remained unflinching.

The Bodhisatta Faints

Afflicted thus with a great heat all over his body, the Bodhisatta fainted and fell down into a sitting position while walking.<sup>120</sup> When the Bodhisatta fell down in this manner, the Devas who were present near the walk made three different comments:

Some Devas said: “Ascetic Gotama is dead.” Others said: “Ascetic Gotama is not dead, he is dying.” Still others said: “Ascetic Gotama is neither dead nor dying, he has become an Arahāt. Such is the posture in which an Arahāt sits.”

Out of these Devas making their comments, those who said, “Ascetic Gotama is dead,” went to King Suddhodana and told him thus: “Your son is dead.” When the king asked, “Is my son dead before or after attaining Buddhahood?” they replied: “Your son did not get the chance to become a Buddha. While striving, he fell down and died there on the walk.” – “I do not believe you! Without attaining omniscience, death cannot occur to my son,” asserted the king emphatically.

The Bodhisatta Took Less Food

When he recovered from his faint, the Bodhisatta thought thus: “It would be good if I were to practise without eating food at all.” Thereupon, the Devas said to him: “Bodhisatta, noble ascetic! Do not cut off food altogether. O Bodhisatta, noble ascetic! If you cut off the food altogether, we shall have to inject divine food through the pores of your skin. And with that food you will be sustained.” Then it occurred to the Bodhisatta thus: “If I decide not to take food at all, and if these Devas give me divine food through the pores of my skin, and if I live on that despite my claim to fast completely, my sustenance with the aid of divine food will be deceptive and self-contradictory.” So he said to the Devas: “Devas, do not inject divine food through the pores of my skin. I shall take just enough food to sustain myself.”

Henceforth, the Bodhisatta did not cut off food altogether but took food just little by little. For one day's meal, sometimes he took a handful of lentil soup, sometimes a handful of bean soup, sometimes a handful of grain soup and at other times a handful of pea soup. Because of just taking a handful of bean soup, the physical frame of the Bodhisatta reached the stage of extreme exhaustion and emaciation.

Just because the Bodhisatta was taking very little food, his limbs, big and small, protruded at the joints of the bones and were thin and depressed at the places other than these joints, like the knots of the creepers named the Box-bean plant (Āṣītika) and the Necklace plant (Kāḷa).

The hips of the Bodhisatta were wrinkled all over like the big hoofs of a camel and the anus was depressed. The spine of the Bodhisatta protruded with depressed intervals like a string of big beads. The flesh between his ribs sank, causing unsightliness, inelegance and a bad shape like the rafters of an old shed, house or a recluse dwelling. His eye-balls sunk into his eye-sockets like the bubbles of water in a large deep well. The skin of his head wrinkled and withered like a little tender gourd plucked and dried up in the sun. As the skin of his belly was stuck to his spinal column, his spinal column was felt when the belly skin was touched, and his belly skin was felt when the spinal column was touched. [291]

When sitting to answer the call of nature, his urine did not come out at all as there was not enough liquid in his body to turn into urine. As for the excrement, just one or two hardened balls of the size of a betel nut were discharged with difficulty. Sweat trickled profusely from his whole body. He fell on the spot with his face downwards.

When the Bodhisatta rubbed his body with his hand in order to give it some slight soothing effect, his body-hairs, which were rotten at the base because of getting no nourishment from the flesh and blood due to its scarcity, came off from his body and stuck to his hand.

The natural complexion of the Bodhisatta was bright yellow like the colour of pure gold (siṅgī-nikkha). But of those who saw him during his engagement in austerity, some said: "Ascetic Gotama is of dark complexion." Others said: "Ascetic Gotama is not dark; his complexion is brown." Still others said: "Ascetic Gotama is neither dark nor brown; he has grey skin like that of a cat-fish."

The Bodhisatta took up this practice of austerities, which ordinary people would find difficult to do, not for a short period of days and months. In fact, he did it for six long years. Despite his six years long struggle, it never occurred to him thus: “I have not attained omniscience although I have practised this with difficulty. Well, in view of this situation, I will go back to my golden palace, and being pampered by 40,000 palace ladies headed by my Princess Yasodharā. I will happily take care of my step-mother Gotamī, father and 80,000 relatives who are still alive,” or “Having enjoyed excellent food which is like that of the Devas, I will rather stay comfortably in a luxurious bed.” There had never been the slightest thought in him for an easy-going and self-indulgent life. An ordinary man would not dare to think of practising these kinds of austerities, much less, actually practising it. Therefore, it is called a practice which is difficult to undertake by ordinary people (dukkara-cariyā).

Māra’s Visit to the Bodhisatta

Even at the time when the Bodhisatta was going forth, Māra discouraged him, saying: “Prince Siddhattha, on the seventh day from today, the Wheel-Treasure will arrive, do not go forth.” But the Bodhisatta replied with tremendous boldness: “Māra, I know that the Wheel-Treasure will come to me. I do not, however, wish to enjoy the bliss of a Universal Monarch. Go away! Do not stay here! I will endeavour to become a Buddha, thereby making the 10,000 world-element resound throughout.” Since then Māra had shadowed the Bodhisatta for six years looking for an opportunity to dispose of him, with the thought: “If thoughts of sensuality (kāma-vitakka), ill-will (vyāpāda-vitakka) or violence (vihimsā-vitakka) arise in his mental continuum, I will kill him right on the spot.” Since then, for six long years Māra could not find any of these thoughts in the Bodhisatta.

When six years had elapsed, it occurred to Māra thus: “Prince Siddhattha is of great energy. His austerity (dukkara-cariyā) is so strenuous. He may become a Buddha at one time or another soon. What if I approach him and give him some words of advice, thereby causing him to stop his practice.” Then he approached the Bodhisatta and told him of his intentions.

After his Awakening, the Buddha gave the monastics a discourse under the title of the Discourse on the Striving (Padhāna-sutta, Snp 3.2) explaining how Māra had come and persuaded him by feigning goodwill, and how he had boldly rebuffed him. The dialogue between Māra and the Bodhisatta will now be reproduced.

Having approached the Bodhisatta who had been repeatedly developing the absorption on non-breathing (appāṇaka-jhāna) in Uruvelā forest near Nerañjarā with the sole aspiration for Nibbāna, Māra said: “My friend Prince Siddhattha, the whole of your body is so emaciated with the loss of flesh and blood. Your beauty and complexion have much deteriorated. Your death is coming very close. The chance of your remaining alive is very faint. You have only one chance in 1,000 of staying alive. Prince Siddhattha! Please take [292] care of yourself so that you may live long. Longevity is excellent and commendable. If you live long, you can perform many deeds of merit. You can develop your merit by observing the precepts or by performing sacrificial rites. What is the use of living thus in the forest and practising austerity so miserably and feebly without knowing whether you will be dead or remain alive. In order to achieve your goal, Nibbāna, the old traditional path is very difficult to follow. It is also toilsome and hard. It is indeed not feasible to get on and realise such a goal.” Māra said this with a semblance of compassion, as though he had goodwill for the Bodhisatta and as though he had pity on him.

On being spoken to with a semblance of compassion by Māra, the Bodhisatta said boldly to Māra as follows: “Māra, you who bind up those unmindful sentient beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, so that they may not be liberated from Samsāra! You have come into my presence for your own benefit and with an ulterior motive to create harm and disturbance to others. I do not have an iota of desire for the kind of merit that leads to the cycle of suffering (vaṭṭa-gāmi). You should have spoken thus only to those who are yearning for merit.

With these words the Bodhisatta rejected Māra’s speech, saying: “If you live long, you can perform many deeds of merit. Māra, there are those who have no faith (saddhā) at all in Nibbāna; there are those who have faith but are of feeble energy (viriya); then there are those who have both faith and energy but are not endowed with wisdom (paññā), you should discuss with them and give encouragement to them to live long. As for me, I have absolute confidence that, if I strive enough, I shall realize, even in this life, Nibbāna, where my body ceases to exist. I have flaming energy that is capable of burning into ash the grassy rubbish of the defilements. I have an incomparable wisdom which is like an explosive which can crush the rocky mountain of dark ignorance (avijjā) into pieces.

I also have both mindfulness (sati) and concentration (samādhi). The mindfulness that will enable me to become a Buddha who does not at all forget what has been done and spoken of over the ages gone by and the concentration which, standing firm against the forceful wind of vicissitude, is like an engraved stone pillar that does not sway in a storm. Fully endowed with these five qualities that enable one to reach the other shore of Nibbāna, I am working hard even at the risk of my life. With a person like me, why do you want to discuss long life and why do you flatteringly encourage me to live on? In reality, it is not commendable to stay alive just for a single day in the human world for one who exerts with firm diligence and strong perseverance, who possesses insight through concentration (appanā-samādhi) and who discerns thoroughly the rise and fall of the physical and mental aggregates!” With these words, the Bodhisatta made a counter threat to Māra who had threatened him, saying: “Prince Siddhattha, your death is very close, the chance of your remaining alive is very faint, you have only one chance in 1,000 for staying alive.”

“Māra, this wind in my body, caused by the tempo of my exertion in practising the absorption on non-breathing (appāṇaka-jhāna) would be capable of drying up the water in the Rivers Ganges, Yamuna, etc. Why would it not be capable of drying up the little blood that is in me, whose mind has been directed to Nibbāna? Indeed, it is strong enough to dry it up. When the blood in my body, about five litres in capacity, has dried up on account of the oppressing wind which is generated by my exertion in practising meditation with a view to attain Nibbāna. The bile which is of two kinds, composed (baddha) and non-composed (abaddha); the phlegm that covers whatever is eaten and swallowed [293] so that no foul smell would come out; the urine and nutritive elements will certainly dry up too. If the blood, the bile, the phlegm, the urine and nutritive elements dry up, the flesh will certainly be depleted. When the blood, the bile, the phlegm, the urine and the flesh are all gone in this way, my mind becomes even clearer. Not only is my mind clear but my mindfulness, which is like the treasurer of a Universal Monarch, my wisdom which is like the diamond (vajirā) weapon of a thunderbolt, and my concentration which is like Mount Meru, are unshaken, it becomes even more developed and steadfast. Exhaustion will not make me retreat. Only because you do not know that my mind is so keen, you spoke words of ‘love for life’ (jīvita-nikanti) such as: ‘Prince Siddhattha, the whole body of yours is so emaciated with the loss of flesh and blood,’ and so on.

Although the blood and the flesh in me have all been exhausted, my mind remains cheerful and even becomes clearer and has reached the excellent stage which has been experienced by those noble Bodhisattas, who are great men (mahā-purisa) and banners of male folk. Though my whole body has dried up to the point of almost emitting flames and though I am thereby thoroughly exhausted, my mind is not at all inclined towards sensual objects, such as my royal city with its palaces, Yasodharā, Rāhula, 40,000 palace ladies and attendants and so on. Māra, observe and investigate for yourself the purity and uprightness of the incomparable heart of mine, of a man who has fulfilled the perfections.” With these words the Bodhisatta demonstrated the firmness of his spirit. The Bodhisatta then spoke of Māra’s ten armies:

Māra’s Ten Armies

1. “The objects of sensuality (vatthu-kāma) and the defilements of sensuality (kilesa-kāma) constitute the first army of Māra.

There are objects of sensuality (vatthu-kāma), animate or inanimate, and the defilements of sensuality (kilesa-kāma), which is craving for these sensual objects; both these forms of sensuality cause householders to become deluded so that they do not know the truth.

There are householders who die as worldlings (puthujjana) amidst their own worldly belongings (gihi-bhoga) because they cannot forsake them, though they know the rarity of the rise of a Buddha (Buddhuppāda-dullabha) and the rarity of the life of recluses (pabbajita-bhāva-dullabha).

As for recluses, the requisites, such as robes, bowls, monasteries, parks, beds, couches, bed sheets and coverlets, which may be craved and enjoyed by them, are all materials of sensuality. And there are recluses who die still as worldlings amidst the monastic materials of sensuality in the form of the four necessities: dwelling places, robes, alms food and medicine donated by lay people. They die in that manner because they cannot give them up, though they have learnt at the time of their ordination about using the foot of a tree as a dwelling place; using robes made of rags from a dust heap as clothing; using alms food as meals; and using putrid urine of a cow as medicine. These householders and recluses meet their hideous death on encountering Māra’s first army of sensuality (kāma).<sup>121</sup>

2. Aversion (arati) and dissatisfaction (ukkaṇṭhita) constitute the second army of Māra.

Although they have taken up an ascetic life after resolutely abandoning worldly belongings (gihi-bhoga), some tend to be disturbed and corrupted by such factors as aversion (arati) and dissatisfaction (ukkaṇṭhita) which are not taking delight in being a recluse, not taking delight in learning and practice, not taking delight in the seclusion of forest dwellings, and not taking delight in tranquillity (samatha) and insight (vipassanā). Some ascetics meet their death, being drowned in the sea of Māra’s second army.

3. Thirst and hunger (khuppiṭṭāsā) constitute the third army of Māra.

Although some recluses have overcome that second army, while observing practices of austerity and because of the very strict rules of the thirteen austerities (dhutaṅga), which compel them to eat only what is available such as food of all kinds mixed together, some cannot eat to their hearts’ content<sup>122</sup> [294] and are therefore not satisfied and become hungry again, suffering like a crazy earthworm which writhes at the touch of salt. As thirst and hunger sets in they lose interest in asceticism and are obsessed with the burning desire to take food.

4. Weariness (tandī) constitutes the fourth army of Māra.

When they are oppressed by hunger and thirst, some of them become physically and mentally weak and are at their wit’s end. They become disheartened, indolent and unhappy. As weariness sets in, they do not wish to carry on with the asceticism they are engaged in.

5. Sloth and torpor (thīna-middha) constitutes the fifth army of Māra.

With no progress in their spiritual work and becoming lazy and despondent, they begin to feel bored and fall into a state of dejection. From that day, as sloth

6: The Practice of Austere Striving – 337

and torpor set in, they take to sleeping in their monasteries, rolling from one side to the other, and lying face downwards.

6. Fear (bhīru) is the sixth army of Māra.

Excessive sleep through laziness causes drowsiness in their meditation and dullness in their minds. Overwhelmed by craving, they become weak and confused over this or that trifle. As fear sets in, they are shaken with fright and, with trembling hearts, they mistake a tree-stump for an elephant, a tiger for a Yakkha.

7. Doubt (vicikicchā) is the seventh army of Māra.

Although they pursue meditation after overcoming fear and regaining courage through practice, the path to the absorptions (jhāna) and the course of the paths (magga) have sunk deep. As doubt sets in, they are not certain whether they are positively on the path or not, both in practice and theory.

8. Arrogance and haughtiness (makkha-thambha) constitute the eighth army of Māra.

After getting rid of doubt, some keep on putting effort in uninterruptedly day and night. As unusual signs from meditation appear to them, they think highly of themselves. As arrogance and haughtiness set in, they do not accord others their rightful place; they destroy their good reputation; they give no respects to their elders; they display overbearingness to them.

9. Craving and conceit (taṇhā-māna) constitute the ninth army of Māra.

When they go on meditating, having eradicated arrogance and haughtiness, they see more unusual signs and become proud of their advancement. Various forms of craving and conceit are likely to appear as follows: They are pleased and elated to have an abundance of gifts; they are pleased and elated to witness the spread of their fame to all four quarters; they are pleased and elated to receive some marvellous gains that nobody else has ever come across; and they are pleased and elated with their fame and followers, wrongfully acquired from their teaching of false doctrines and unjust boastfulness, shown through evil desire and craving to increase their gains.

10. Self-praise and condemnation (attukkāmsana) constitute the tenth army of Māra.

Some recluses coming under the above ninth category practise self-praise and honour; they indulge in despising and condemning others (paravambhanā).

Māra, you who prevent by force the liberation of humans, Devas and Brahmas from the rounds of suffering and you whose forces are enormous! These ten factors, such as sensuality, aversion, etc., form your comrades-in-arm. You, Māra, whose heart is not white but totally black and whose craving is gigantic! They are also your guns, cannons, and explosives that kill every recluse or recluse in their way.

Those poor [295] worldlings, who possess no strong faith, will, energy and wisdom and who lack courage, are not capable of repelling your attacks and escaping from them. Only those extremely adventurous heroes, whose faith, will, energy and wisdom are great, do not reckon you even as a blade of grass; they can fight and put up resistance and escape. This escape after fighting and resisting can bring the bliss of the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna which are away from the dangers of the swords, spears and other weapons that belong to the troops of these ten armies of yours, wicked Māra.

Māra, I would like you to know me as follows: “This Prince Siddhattha, as befitting a noble man, a true hero, on arrival on the scene of a battlefield, never takes a single step backward; he is indeed a feathered commander who wears the flowers of courage on his head, the flowers of muñja grass which are taken to be a good omen and the truly heroic, victorious flag and banner.<sup>123</sup> If I have to withdraw from battle and to be defeated by you and remain alive in this world, it will be shameful, ruinous, disreputable and disgusting. Therefore regard me as one who firmly believes thus: “It is far better to die on the battlefield than to concede defeat to your force.”

Because in this world certain ascetics and Brahmins, who went to the battle against the defilements (kilesas) putting on the yellow robe and equipping themselves fully with the requisites as their martial harness, but who are without strength, are overpowered by your tenfold great army. Thus they are like those who, without the light of such virtues as morality happen to have entered into darkness. As they are oppressed by your tenfold army, Māra, they can by no means know the road of the jewelled Dhamma Wheel, namely, the seven factors of Awakening (Bojjhaṅga) which is the excellent path taken by Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas and other noble ones to attain Nibbāna. Therefore I would like you to take me as one who would fight and vanquish your tenfold army and raise the flag of victory.”

On hearing the valiant words spoken by the Bodhisatta, Māra departed from that place being unable to utter a word in reply.

Questionable Points

In this chapter on his austere striving (dukkara-cariyā), the points which may be raised are: “Was the Bodhisatta incapable of becoming a Buddha without practising austere striving?”<sup>124</sup> The answer is: “With or without austere striving, the Bodhisatta would become a Buddha because he had completely fulfilled the perfections, charity and good conduct.”

“If Buddhahood was possible without austere striving, why did he practise it laboriously?” Partly because he wished to demonstrate his incomparable energy to beings, including Devas and Brahmas and partly because he considered that his heart would be filled with joy on recalling the virtues of his energy some time after his becoming a Buddha, as such the Bodhisatta practised austere striving laboriously.

To give an example, a king who has earned kingship by virtue of customary succession, without warring with anybody but while remaining in the main palace, cannot rejoice as does a monarch who wins a kingdom after gathering his forces and fighting two or three battles and crushing his opponents. It is true, when he who ascends the throne after engaging in two or three wars and coming out triumphant, views his audience while enjoying the luxury of his kingship, reflects on his energetic deeds, he feels immensely happy, thinking: “I have acquired this royalty by doing such and such a thing at such and such a place and by killing such and such an enemy in such and such a manner.”

<sup>124</sup> That is to say: “Is Buddhahood attained only through the practice of austere striving (dukkara-cariyā)?” or “Is Buddhahood unattainable without the practice of austere striving (dukkara-cariyā)?”

6: The Practice of Austere Striving – 340

In the same way, the Bodhisatta practised austere striving laboriously because he wished to demonstrate his incomparable energy to beings, including Devas and Brahmas and because he had considered that his heart would be filled with joy on recalling the virtues of his energy [296] some time after his becoming a Buddha.

Austere striving was also practised out of kindness to help future disciples by setting an example. Those future disciples who come to know of the Bodhisatta's practice of austere striving would contemplate thus: "Even the Fortunate One attained omniscience only after undergoing the practice of austere striving though he had fulfilled the perfections for four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons. What to speak of us! We would perhaps attain the knowledge of the path (magga-ñāṇa) only if we could exert ourselves in meditation." Discerning the truth they would become convinced that strenuous exertion (padhāna-viriya) is something worth making.

When they are thus convinced and exert themselves, they will be able to put an end to birth, old age and death, and attain Nibbāna. Therefore, the Bodhisatta practised austere striving out of kindness to future disciples by setting an example to them.

It was usual for each and every Bodhisatta to practise austere striving at least for seven days in their last existence; our Buddha also was able to do it and accordingly practised it for six years. But he became a Buddha not because of his austere striving. In fact, he became a Buddha only through the middle practice (majjhima-paṭipatti). The Bodhisatta practised austere striving to show the world with its Devas, by way of contrast, at the outset that it was not the way leading to the knowledge of the path.

Though other Bodhisattas engaged in austere striving for a far shorter period of seven days at least or of a month or so at most, our Bodhisatta had to do so for six years as a result of a verbal misdeed committed by him when he was the Brahmin Jotipāla, who was very proud of his birth, during the lifetime of Buddha Kassapa. He uttered very harsh words then: "How can this shaven-headed one realize the knowledge of the path and omniscience? Awakening is something that is very difficult to achieve!"<sup>125</sup> [297]

7: The Attainment of Buddhahood

Changing the Mode of Practice

After the Bodhisatta had completed the austere striving (dukkara-cariyā) for six years, it was about the first waxing of May (Vesākha) following the month of April (Citta) of the year 528 BCE, that it occurred to him thus: “The ascetics (samaṇa) and Brahmins of the past, the future and the present in their practice of austerities, could have gone through only this much of pain and hardship at the most; they could not have gone through more hardship than what I am now enduring. What hardship I have endured will not be less, but may even be more than the pain and suffering undergone by the ascetics and Brahmins of the past, the future and the present. I have striven and practised the austerities strenuously for six long years. Although I have exerted so strenuously in this manner, I have not attained omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) and I have not become a Buddha. There may, perhaps, be another mode of practice, another path, to attain omniscience and to become a Buddha.”

Reflecting thus, he came to perceive that he had developed and entered upon the first absorption on breathing (ānāpāna-jhāna) while sitting under the shade of the rose-apple tree, at the time of the auspicious ploughing ceremony performed by his father King Suddhodana. He recognised then that the practice of the first absorption on breathing must certainly be the true path, the correct mode of practice for the attainment of omniscience, and to become a Buddha. He further reflected: “Why should I be afraid of the absorption bliss realizable from the meditation on the breath. It is the bliss that arises purely from renunciation (nekkhamma) and it is entirely detached from the desire for material objects and sensual pleasures. I am certainly not afraid of the absorption bliss of the meditation on the breath.”

Then again he continued to reflect: “I may not be able to exert and develop the said meditation on the breath with this body of mine which is so much exhausted and withered. It will be well if I take some solid, coarse food such as boiled rice to resuscitate and refresh this emaciated body before I endeavour to attain the said absorption through meditation on the breath.”

Having considered thus, the Bodhisatta took the alms bowl which he had laid aside, went round the market town of Senāgāma for alms food and sustained his withered, emaciated body with whatever food he received on his alms round.

Within two or three days, he regained strength and the major physical characteristics of a Great Man (Mahā-pūrisa-lakkhaṇa), which had disappeared at the time of the strenuous practice of austere striving, reappeared distinctly in their original forms. At that time, the physical body of the Bodhisatta looked fresh once again, like the colour of gold.

Here, it should be specially noted that at the time the Bodhisatta reflected on the correct path for the realization of omniscience, for becoming a Buddha, after discarding the practice of austere striving, he correctly considered that the eight mundane attainments of the absorptions that he achieved after meeting the sect-leaders Ājāra and Udaka were just the basis of the round of suffering (vaṭṭa-pādaka).

He also considered that the meditation on breathing, which was developed in the shade of [298] the rose-apple tree while his father, King Suddhodana, was performing the auspicious ploughing ceremony, was the correct path for the realization of omniscience and for his becoming a Buddha since the meditation on breathing was part of mindfulness meditation of the body (kāyagatā-sati), and the basis of insight meditation (vipassanā) for all Bodhisattas. See the sub-commentary on the Collection of the Middle Length Discourses (Majjhima-nikāya).

The Group-of-Five Leave the Bodhisatta

It is a natural law (dhammatā) that when a Bodhisatta is about to become a Buddha after having completed the austere striving, that either the attendant monastics abandon him for some reason or other or he himself leaves them behind. This being so, when the Bodhisatta began to sustain his body by taking whatever coarse food he received on his alms round, the said Group-of-Five became disgusted with him, grumbling: “The ascetic Gotama has become one who practises for the gain of material wealth. He has become one who has abandoned the practice of meditation, and reverted to material accumulation.” Following the natural course of events, they abandoned the Bodhisatta and went on their way to Isipatana, the Deer Park near Bārāṇasī, where the first discourse, the Dhamma Wheel, is taught by all the Buddhas.

It is a natural rule for the attendant monastics to abandon the Bodhisattas who are about to become Buddhas and to proceed to the Deer Park where every Buddha will teach without fail the First Sermon or the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka).

The Group-of-Five monastics left the Bodhisatta about the new moon day of April (Citta) and moved to Migadāya, the Deer Park.<sup>126</sup> When the attendant monastics had abandoned him, the Bodhisatta, living a solitary life, gained a considerable degree of solitude which was conducive to extraordinary progress and strengthening of his mental concentration. Thus, living in complete seclusion for fifteen days practising meditation and making progress in it, the noble Bodhisatta dreamed five great dreams after midnight, just approaching dawn on the fourteenth waxing day of the month of May (Vesākha) 528 BCE.

The Five Great Dreams of the Bodhisatta

The said five great dreams were as follows:

1. He dreamed that he was sleeping with the surface of the earth as his bed, with the Himālayas as his pillow, placing his left hand on the eastern ocean, his right hand on the western ocean and both his legs on the southern ocean.

This first dream presaged his realization of omniscience and becoming a Buddha among humans, Devas and Brahmas.

2. He dreamed that a species of grass (tiriyā) with a reddish stalk about the size of a yoke emerged from his navel and while he was looking on, it grew up, first half a cubit, then one cubit, one fathom, two fathoms, one mile, half of a league, one league and so on, rising higher and higher until it touched the sky, outer space, many thousands of leagues above and remained there.

This second dream presaged that he would be able to teach the path of eight constituents (aṭṭhaṅgika-magga), which is the middle way (majjhima-paṭipadā), to humans and Devas.

3. He dreamed that hordes of maggots, with white bodies and black heads, slowly crept up his legs covering them from the tip of the toe-nail right up to the knee-cap.

This third dream presaged that a great many people with black heads who wear pure white clothes would adore the Buddha and take great refuge (mahā-saraṇa-gamana) in him.

<sup>126</sup> This was after the Bodhisatta had completed the practice of austere striving.

4. He dreamed that four kinds of birds: blue, golden, red and grey in colour, came flying from the four directions and when they threw themselves down to prostrate at his feet, all the four kinds of birds turned completely white.

This fourth dream presaged that clansmen from the four assemblies of people: the princely class, the Brahmin class, the merchant class and the poor class, would embrace the teaching of the Buddha, become monastics and become Arahats. [299]

5. He dreamed that he was walking to and fro, back and forth on a large mountain of excreta without getting besmeared.

This fifth dream presaged a large acquisition of the four requisites of robes, alms food, dwelling places and medicines and that he would utilise them without any attachment and clinging to them.

The Four Causes of Dreams

Dreams occur through these four causes:

1. Due to a disturbance of metabolism, like the malfunctioning of bile, one dreams frightful dreams, for example, falling down from a mountain, travelling in the sky with a frightened heart, being followed closely by beasts of prey, such as wild elephants, horses, lions, leopards, tigers, etc., or by evil persons.
2. Because of experiences of the past, one dreams of seeing, hearing and using objects one had seen, heard or used before.
3. All kinds of illusory objects are made manifest by Devas in one's dream, a good vision if they want to do one a good turn, or a bad vision if they want to do one an ill turn. One sees all these objects through the supernormal powers of Devas.
4. When one experiences a dream giving an omen, one sees pleasant or unpleasant visions that predict coming events because of one's past good or evil deeds. Such dreams are like the dream of Mahā Māyā Devī which foretold the conception of a son or like that of King Kosala which presaged the sixteen great events or like the five great dreams of the Bodhisatta.

Of the four kinds of dream, those due to disturbance in metabolism and experiences of the past generally prove to be false. As for the dreams due to the deception by Devas, they may or may not turn out to be correct. The Devas, when angered, are apt to show visions in the dreams as a stratagem to cause ruin, as in the story below. The dreams which presage coming events invariably prove correct.

Wrong Visions in Dreams

At the Nāga monastery in the Rohana locality in Śrī Laṅkā the presiding monk ordered a large ironwood tree to be cut down without informing the Saṅgha. The tree Deva (rukkha-deva), who had his abode in the said ironwood tree, gave dreams to the presiding monk in order to trick him into believing them. After winning the monk's trust, the Deva told him in a dream: "On the seventh day from today, venerable sir, your lay supporter, the king, will die." The presiding monk, believing these words, informed the female palace attendants accordingly. Thereupon, they wept loudly in unison. When asked by the king, they told him what the presiding monk had said. With the king counting the days, the seven days had passed and the king, who was still alive, ordered the limbs of the presiding monk to be cut off for causing panic by giving out wrong information.<sup>127</sup>

The said four kinds of dream are experienced only by worldlings, the Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna), the Once-returners (Sakadāgāmi) and the Non-returners (Anāgāmi), because they have not divested themselves of hallucinations (vipallāsa). Arahats, who have discarded hallucinations, do not dream such [300] dreams.

PED renders vipallāsa as reversal, inversion, perversion, derangement, corruption, distortion. In the translation of Ven. Ledi Sayadaw's Light on Insight Meditation (Vipassanā-dīpanī), Sayadaw U Ṇyāṇa says: "Vipallāsa means hallucination, delusion, erroneous observation, or taking that which is true as being false, and that which is false as true. There are three kinds of vipallāsa, to wit: 1) Hallucination of perception (saññā-vipallāsa); 2) hallucination of thought (citta-vipallāsa); 3) hallucination of views (diṭṭhi-vipallāsa). Of these three, hallucination of perception is fourfold, thus it erroneously perceives impermanence as permanence; impurity as purity; ill as good; and no-soul as soul. The same holds good with regard to the remaining two vipallāsa, i.e., those of thinking and viewing."

According to the commentary on the Discourse about the Great Dreams (Mahā-supina-sutta, AN 5.196), as regards the time of the dreams, those dreamed during the day time, the first watch, the middle watch and the last watch of the night are usually not correct, whereas those dreamed at day break, when the food eaten has been digested and the resulting nutrients are absorbed by the body, are apt to be correct. A dream conveying good omens usually brings good fortune, whereas one with bad omens usually brings ill-luck.

7: The Attainment of Buddhahood – 346

The aforesaid five great dreams are not dreamed by worldlings, kings, Universal Monarchs, chief disciples, Paccekabuddhas or omniscient Buddhas. Only the Bodhisattas dream such dreams. Our Bodhisatta dreamed the said five great dreams after midnight, just before daybreak on the 14th waxing day of May (Vesākha) in the year 528 BCE.

The Bodhisatta, rising from sleep and sitting cross-legged, after having dreamed the five great dreams, thought to himself: “Had I dreamed the five great dreams at the time when I was living in the royal city of Kapilavatthu, I could have related them to my father, King Suddhodana. I could have related them also to my mother, if she were alive. But now, in Uruvelā forest, there is no one to listen to the five great dreams and interpret them for me. I, myself, will read these omens. And then he himself read the dreams thus: “This first dream presages the attainment of such and such a benefit; this second dream such and such a benefit,” and so on as has been said above.

After dreaming the five great dreams and having himself interpreted their meanings, the Bodhisatta concluded: “It is true that I will certainly become a Buddha this very day.”

The Offering of Milk-Rice

Then, when daybreak came on the morning of the full moon day, he cleansed his body and departed from that place and when he reached the banyan tree which was visited every year for worship by Sujātā, the daughter of a wealthy man, he stopped and sat at the base of the tree, facing east, waiting for the time to go for alms round. Thereby the whole banyan tree shone brilliantly with his bodily radiance.

At that time, in the market town of Senāgama, in the locality of Uruvelā, Sujātā, the daughter of a rich man by the name of Senānī, on coming of age, had prayed at the foot of the banyan tree thus: “Guardian Deva of the banyan tree, if I be married into a rich family of the same caste, I will pay homage to you with the offering of thick milk rice.” The prayer of Sujātā had been fulfilled. As a result, she had been paying homage to the guardian Deva of the banyan tree with thick milk rice on the full moon day of May (Vesākha) every year.

When reading the account of the offering of milk rice by Sujātā, readers are generally apt to think, if care is not taken, that Sujātā paid homage for fulfilment of her prayer to the guardian Deva of the banyan tree with the offering of milk rice for the first time on that full moon day of May (Vesākha), the day on which the Bodhisatta was to attain the state of a Buddha.

In fact, the prayer had been fulfilled and the guardian Deva of the banyan tree had been worshipped with an offering of milk rice for about 20 years before that day, for the said son of Sujātā was, in fact, the wealthy young man, Yasa. In the year when the Buddha was to appear, Yasa was already a married man, enjoying the luxury of a well-to-do family. In view of this fact, it should be noted that Sujātā, had been paying homage to the guardian Deva of the banyan tree with the offerings of thick milk rice every year on the full moon day of May (Vesākha) over the past 20 years when her prayer for a first born son had been answered.

The preparations that were made by lady Sujātā to make offerings to the guardian Deva of the banyan tree on that full moon day of May (Vesākha), when the Bodhisatta had completed six years practice of austere striving, were: She first let 1,000 milch cows graze in the [301] wood of liquorice; and the milk obtained from these 1,000 milch cows was fed to another 500 milch cows. The milk produced by these 500 cows was fed to another 250 cows. Again, the milk produced by the said 250 cows was fed to another 125 cows. Then the milk produced by these 125 cows was fed to another 64 cows. Then the milk from these 64 cows was fed to another 32 cows. Then the milk from these 32 cows was fed to another sixteen cows. Then the milk from these sixteen cows was fed to another eight cows. In this manner, lady Sujātā took the above step-by-step procedure of transferring milk in order to obtain a thick, savoury and nutritious cow's milk to prepare milk rice.<sup>128</sup>

According to the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra), lady Sujātā first let 100 milch cows graze in the wood of liquorice. Then she let 100 milch cows born of the first 100 cows graze in the same wood. Then again she let the 100 milch cows born of the said second 100, the third 100, the fourth

7: The Attainment of Buddhahood – 348

With the intention, “I will make the sacrificial offering of thick milk rice early today,” lady Sujātā rose early in the morning on the full moon day of May (Vesākha) and had the above said eight milch cows milked. The calves, without having to tie them with rope, did not come near the dugs of their mother milch cows. What was strange was that, even as the milk bowl was placed close under the udder, the milk flowed down continuously in profusion without being drawn. Lady Sujātā, on seeing such a wonderful event, personally conveyed the flowing milk and poured it into a new pot, and kindled the fire by herself to cook the thick milk rice.

When the thick milk rice was being cooked, froth appeared in a large quantity, turning clockwise, but not even a drop spilled out; smoke did not, in the least, rise above the oven; the Four Great Kings, the guardians of the world, came and stood guard at the oven; the Great Brahma provided an umbrella to cover over the pot of thick milk rice; Sakka arranged the faggots evenly and set fire to them to burn in a blaze; by their supernormal powers, Devas collected the nutrients, which were suitable for Devas and humans living in the four continents surrounded by 2,000 small islands. They did so as if they were gathering honey from honey combs hanging from branches. Then they poured the nutrients so collected into the pot of thick milk rice.

At other times, Devas put the aforesaid nutrients, suitable for Devas and humans, into each and every morsel of food as the Buddha was preparing to put it into his mouth. On two special occasions, however, the day the Buddha became a Buddha, and the day he passed into Parinibbāna, Devas poured the said nutrients into the pot.

Having seen in one single day many things of wonder at the place where the thick milk rice was being cooked, lady Sujātā, called the maid servant, Puññā by name and ordered her thus: “Dear Puññā, today our guardian Deva of the banyan tree appears to be in good mood. For the past 20 years, I have never seen such wonderful things. Make haste, go and clean up the banyan tree, the residence of the guardian Deva.” The maid servant thus made haste and was near the banyan tree when she saw the Bodhisatta sitting at its foot facing east and also the whole tree shining golden yellow with the radiance emitting from the Bodhisatta’s body. Frightened and thinking: “Today, the guardian Deva of the banyan tree has come down from the tree. It seems to me he is sitting there to receive the offering with his own hands,” she hurried back home and reported the matter to lady Sujātā.

On hearing the words of the maid servant, lady Sujātā felt very happy and saying: “From today, be an elder daughter of mine,” bestowed upon her all the apparel and ornaments befitting a daughter. [302]

It is a natural law (dhammatā) for a Bodhisatta to be offered the alms food of thick milk rice on the day he is to attain Buddhahood; and it is proper to receive that food only in a gold cup worth 100,000. The lady Sujātā, intending: “I shall put thick milk rice in a gold cup,” had one worth 100,000 taken out from her chamber. She then poured the cooked thick milk rice into the cup, tilting the pot. Thereupon, all the milk rice flowed into the cup to the last drop, like water drops gliding down from a lotus leaf. The entire thick milk rice was just enough to fill the cup to the brim, no more or less.

Lady Sujātā covered the gold cup full of thick milk rice with another gold cup and wrapped them up with a piece of clean white cloth. Then, having adorned herself in full attire and carrying the gold cup on her head, she went to the banyan tree with great pomp and grandeur. She was overjoyed on seeing the Bodhisatta and mistaking him to be the guardian Deva of the banyan tree, she proceeded in a respectful manner from where she saw him. She then lowered the gold cup from her head and opened it and carrying a golden jar of water perfumed with all kinds of fragrant flowers she approached the Bodhisatta and stood nearby.

The earthen alms bowls, which had been offered to the Bodhisatta by Brahma Ghaṭikāra at the time of the renunciation and which had remained with him during the whole six years of austere striving, disappeared inexplicably just at the time when the rich man’s wife Sujātā came to offer the alms food. Not seeing the bowl, the Bodhisatta spread out his right hand to receive the water. Lady Sujātā offered the alms food milk rice in the gold cup, placing it in his hands. He looked at lady Sujātā, who, understanding perfectly well the way the Bodhisatta looked, addressed him: “Venerable one, I have offered you the milk rice in this gold cup; may you accept it together with the gold cup and go anywhere you like.” Then uttering words of prayer: “My heart’s desire is fulfilled. So too, may your heart’s desire be fulfilled,” she departed without showing the least concern for the gold cup which was worth 100,000, as if it were a withered leaf.

The Bodhisatta also rose from his seat and, after circumambulating the banyan tree, proceeded to the bank of the river Nerañjarā carrying with him the gold cup containing the thick milk rice. At the river Nerañjarā there was a bathing ghat, by the name of Suppatiṭṭhita, where many Bodhisattas went down and took a bath on the day they were to become Buddhas. The Bodhisatta left the gold cup at the bathing ghat and, after taking a bath, came up and sat facing east under the cool shade of a tree. Then he prepared exactly 49 morsels of thick milk rice, each about the size of the seed of a ripe palmyra nut and ate the whole lot without water. The thick milk rice, which was taken after being made into 49 morsels, served as nutrient (āhāra) to sustain him completely for 49 days (sattasattāha), while he was residing in the vicinity of the Bodhi tree after his becoming a Buddha. During these 49 days, the Buddha passed the time absorbed in the peace of the absorptions and of fruition, without having any other meal, without taking a bath, without washing his face and without making his body and the limbs clean.

After he had partaken of the alms food of thick milk rice offered by Sujātā, the Bodhisatta made the resolution while holding the gold cup: “If I will become a Buddha today, may this gold cup float upstream; if I will not become a Buddha today, let it float downstream with the current.” He then let the gold cup float in the river Nerañjarā. The gold cup cut across the current and went straight to the middle of the river and then floated upstream from there with the speed of a fast running horse for about 80 cubits and sank in a whirlpool. On reaching the mansion of the Nāga King Kāḷa it hit all the three gold cups used by the three previous Buddhas, namely, Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana and Kassapa, on the day they were to attain Buddhahood, producing the metallic sound of kili, kili and came to rest under the said three golden cups.

On hearing the sound, the Nāga King Kāḷa said: “It was only yesterday that a Buddha appeared; today, another Buddha appears,” and then he rose uttering words of praise in many verses.

The period of time intervening between the appearance of Buddha Kassapa and our Buddha was so long that in the meantime the great earth had risen by one league and three miles. But as for the Nāga King Kāḷa it was so very short that he could say of these appearances [303] as happening “yesterday and today.”

Then the Bodhisatta rested for the day in the Sāla grove, on the bank of the Nerañjarā, which was replete with very fragrant flowers, verdant and delightful to everyone. He then proceeded to practise breathing meditation. After attaining the eight mundane absorptions (jhāna) and the five super knowledges (abhiññā), at twilight, in the coolness of the evening, he walked along the path decorated by Devas and Brahmas to the Nerañjarā and, after taking a bath, he headed towards the Mahā Bodhi tree by the same path. Thereupon, Nāgas, Yakkhas and Gandhabbas paid homage to him with offerings of celestial flowers, perfumes and scented paste. They also sang soft and sweet celestial songs. Then the whole of the 10,000 world-element were almost covered with celestial flowers and perfumes and also with wild acclaim by Devas and Brahmas.

Sotthiya Gives Sacred Grass

At that time, Sotthiya, a Brahmin grass-cutter, was coming from the opposite direction carrying grass. Sensing the wish of the Bodhisatta to have some grass, he offered him eight handfuls of grass. The Bodhisatta, carrying the eight handfuls of grass, went up the high ground of the Mahā Bodhi tree and stood at the south of it, facing north. At that moment, the southern part of the 10,000 world-element sank, so much so that it looked as if it would touch Mahā Avīci; and the northern part of the 10,000 world-element rose, so much so that it looked as if it would fly up to reach Bhavagga.

On seeing this phenomenon, the Bodhisatta considered thus: “This is not the place where the path-knowledge of an Arahat (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) and omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) can be realized,” and so, making a clockwise turn round the Mahā Bodhi tree, he proceeded to the west of the tree and stood there facing east. Just at that moment, the western part of world-element sank, so much so that it looked as if it would touch Mahā Avīci and the eastern part of it rose, so much so that it looked as if it would fly up to Bhavagga.

On seeing this phenomenon, the Bodhisatta considered again: “This is not the place where the path-knowledge of an Arahat and omniscience can be realized,” and so, making a clockwise turn round the Mahā Bodhi tree, he proceeded to the north and stood there facing south. Just at that moment, the northern part of the world-element sank, so much so that it looked as if it would touch Mahā Avīci; and the southern part of it rose, so much so that it looked as if it would fly up to reach Bhavagga.

7: The Attainment of Buddhahood – 352

The positions of the great earth, at the places in the south, the west and the north where the noble Bodhisatta had stood, was such that it sank at his back and rose in front of him, like the wheel of a cart resting flat on its central hub on the ground, it rocks or reels when trampled upon at the fringe.

On seeing this phenomenon, the Bodhisatta considered again: “This is also not the place where the path-knowledge of an Arahat and omniscience can be realized,” and so making a clockwise turn round the Mahā Bodhi tree, he proceeded to the east and stood facing west.

About this matter, the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) commentary mentions only this: “The noble Bodhisatta proceeded to the Bodhi tree, and circumambulating it three times, stood at the north-east corner scattering the eight handfuls of grass.” It does not mention the fact that the great earth tilted over to one side when he stood on the south, the west and the north. The Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra), however, states: “When the Bodhisatta stood on the south, the west and the north, the great earth trembled like a drop of water falling on a lotus leaf,” and that, standing at the north-east corner, he scattered the eight handfuls of grass.

The locality, where the unconquered (aparājita) throne would appear to the east of the Mahā Bodhi tree, stood unshaken and firm, being the place not to be abandoned (avijahitaṭṭhāna), where the thrones of all the Buddhas had appeared. Knowing: “This place is certainly the auspicious site of victory where all the Buddhas destroy the defilements,” and holding them up, the noble Bodhisatta scattered the eight handfuls of grass which he had brought.

The moment he scattered the eight handfuls of grass, they were transformed into a large jewelled throne, fourteen cubits in size, which was so magnificent that no painter or sculptor would be able to paint or carve the likeness of it, and they existed in this marvellous form of a jewelled throne. [304]

With the Mahā Bodhi tree as the backdrop, facing east and with a steadfast mind, the Bodhisatta declared: “Let only the skin remain, let only the sinews remain, let only the bones remain, let my whole body, and all the flesh and blood dry up, unless and until I attain Buddhahood, I will not, in anyway, change the cross-legged posture I have now assumed.”

Thus developing a firm resolution of four factors, he sat on the jewelled throne assuming the unconquered (aparājita) cross-legged posture, the posture for conquering the enemies, not for conceding defeat, which cannot be destroyed, though struck simultaneously by hundreds or thunderbolts.

Vanquishing Vasavatti Māra

When the Bodhisatta had taken his seat on the unconquered (aparājita) throne, at the foot of the Mahā Bodhi tree, for realization of omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa), Sakka came to pay homage and stood blowing the Vijayuttara conch, which was 120 cubits in length and when blown, its sound ceased only after four months. The Deva Pañcasikha came to pay homage and stood playing the harp made of Beluva wood, the Deva Suyāma stood waving the yak-tail fly-flap, the Deva Santusita stood waving the circular ruby fan, and Brahma Sahampati stood holding the white umbrella, three leagues in length.

The Nāga King Kāḷa arrived with a company of 80,000 female Nāga dancers and stood paying homage by chanting hundreds of verses in praise of the Bodhisatta. All the Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element arrived to pay homage with offerings of festoons of very fragrant flowers, perfumes, scented powder and incense sticks and singing thousands of songs in acclaim.

Vasavatti Māra, forsaking his celestial pleasures, had all the time been following closely behind the Bodhisatta during the whole six years of austere striving, waiting for the occasion when the Bodhisatta might have wrong or evil thoughts (micchā-vitakka) such as sensual desires (kāma-vitakka). But not finding the slightest sign of deviation from the right thoughts on the part of the Bodhisatta, Māra thought to himself: “Now, Prince Siddhattha had arrived at the Bodhi tree to become a Buddha. At present, he is striving to escape my domain,<sup>129</sup> I cannot concede to him the opportunity of escaping from the three worlds which are under my sway.”

With this thought, he went to the Vasavatti realm and, having assembled the fighting forces of the Māras, he commanded them: “Māras, transform yourselves into various frightening forms, and each holding a different weapon, proceed quickly to Prince Siddhattha like a huge torrent of water rushing down overwhelmingly.” He himself followed them, riding on Girimekhala elephant, which was 150 leagues in size and, creating 1,000 arms on his body, he held various weapons, each arm grasping a different one.

7: The Attainment of Buddhahood – 354

The Māra here was not the lawful ruler of the realm of Vasavatti. The Deva King lawfully ruling over Vassavatti was a different deity. Just like a rebel leader with many followers in the human world, rising in active revolt against the country, looting and committing acts of robbery, the Māra was in fact just a powerful inhabitant of the Paranimittavasavatti realm, leading an insurgency there with a large retinue of evil Devas, causing a great nuisance to humans, Devas and Brahmas in their performance of meritorious deeds.

The great hordes of Māras, advancing towards the Bodhisatta, were so enormous numerically that it was twelve leagues deep in front of Māra, twelve leagues wide to his right, twelve leagues wide to his left, and nine leagues high above him and in the rear it reached as far as the end of the 10,000 world-element. The frightening sounds of intimidation, shouting and exclamation of the great armies of Māra could be heard from a distance of 1,000 leagues, just like that caused by an enormous landslide. Māra, holding 1,000 various weapons in his 1,000 created arms, and his numerous troops each holding a different weapon, transforming themselves into hideous figures with [305] variegated faces, advanced towards the Bodhisatta in order to overpower and destroy him.

While the great armies of Māra were thus advancing towards the Mahā Bodhi tree, not a single one of the Devas headed by Sakka, who had been there hitherto paying homage to the Bodhisatta, could withstand them. They fled helter-skelter in all directions. Sakka ran away with his large Vijayuttara conch hung on his back and remained standing on the fringe of the 10,000 world-element. Mahā Brahma also, throwing away the white umbrella at the edge of the world-element, went back to the Brahma world. The Nāga King Kāḷa also, abandoning all the Nāga dancers dived into the earth, went to the Nāga mansion named Mañjerika, 500 leagues in size and slept covering his face with the hand. There was not a single Deva or Brahma who dared to remain standing in the neighbourhood of the Bodhisatta and the Mahā Bodhi tree. At that time, the Bodhisatta remained sitting all alone like a Great Brahma residing alone inside a secluded mansion.

Bad omens appeared distinctly in advance to portend the arrival of Māra. These omens were: A falling of thousands of very violent frightful meteors; a falling of total darkness with the rising of haze; a severe quaking of oceans and the great earth; an arising of mists in the oceans; a flowing of many rivers upstream; a falling of mountain tops to the ground; a toppling over of trees; a blowing of violent storms and winds; an appearance of fearful sounds from these violent storms and winds; a vanishing of the sun in the darkness and roaming about in the sky of headless bodies. When Māra arrived with the clear appearance of these ominous signs, the Bodhisatta remained seated courageously without the least fear, like a Garuḷa in the midst of birds or like the lion-king, Kesarāja, amidst beasts.

Even as the aforesaid inauspicious omens appeared, Māra arrived, but remained standing, being unable to enter the immediate vicinity (maṇḍala) of the Mahā Bodhi tree. Not daring to make an approach, Māra's great armies kept the Bodhisatta surrounded from all sides. Viewing his hordes, Māra could just give them the command: "Come on! Seize him!" but he himself was unable to go anywhere near the Mahā Bodhi tree, just as a fly is incapable of approaching a red hot iron. He said to his hordes: "Men, there is not a single person to match this Prince Siddhattha, the son of King Suddhodana. We are unable to make a frontal attack on him, we shall attack this Prince Siddhattha from the rear."

On surveying the three sides, the front and left and right of himself, the Bodhisatta did not see anything but emptiness, since all the Devas and Brahmas had fled. Then seeing Māra's troops advancing to overrun him from the northern side, he thought to himself: "Such an overwhelming number of Māra's troops are making great efforts with the sole object of attacking me. There is neither my mother nor father, nor my brother nor any other relatives of mine here at this place. Only the ten perfections – which I have so long developed and nurtured – will serve me as my companions and retinue. So relying only on these comrades of mine, the ten perfections, it will be proper to destroy these hordes of Māras by attacking them with my perfection-weapons." Then he reflected on the meritoriousness of the ten perfections.

Māra's Attack with Nine Kinds of Missiles

While the Bodhisatta was thus reflecting on the meritoriousness of his ten perfections, Māra was planning: "By discharging nine kinds of missiles, I will force the Prince Siddhattha to flee."

7: The Attainment of Buddhahood – 356

1. First, he let loose a violent cyclone. Immediately, the east wind, the west wind, the south wind and the north wind started rising in force and although they were capable of breaking and blasting away mountain tops of sizes measuring a half league, one league, two or three leagues, and uprooting trees and jungle bushes and also pulverising villages and towns in the surrounding area, they became powerless on coming near the Bodhisatta and were incapable of even ruffling the edge of his robe on account of the glory and power of the Bodhisatta's deeds of merit.
2. Māra expectantly looked about with the thought: "By this time, the ascetic Gotama should have been carried away by the storm missiles discharged by me and dashed against the Cakkavāḷa mountain range and broken into smithereens." He became much troubled in mind on seeing the Bodhisatta seated as he was, unshaken like a firmly erected gate post. So, thinking: "I will kill him by drowning him in the very strong currents of water," he made the rain clouds rise in a moment and a torrential rain fell. This great earth turned into a hollow depression by the force of the rainfall commanded by Māra. When this torrent of water, after eroding and overflowing the fringe of forests and hills and trees, reached the Bodhisatta, it was incapable of even wetting a single thread of his robe, it changed its course and flowed away elsewhere without touching him.
3. On seeing the said phenomenon, Māra, thinking: "I will turn this Prince Siddhattha into dust by hitting him with stones," caused to fall a rain of stones. Stones of very large sizes came falling through the sky like huge mountain tops, sending off fumes of dust. On nearing the Bodhisatta, they became big celestial garlands and balls of flowers.
4. Thereafter, with the thought: "I will cause death to this Prince Siddhattha, I will kill him, by making mince meat of him," Māra caused a rain of weapons to fall. All kinds of weapons, such as single-edged and double-edged spears and knives, etc., emitting fumes and flames and flying through the sky, only for them to fall in the form of jasmine flowers, etc., in the Mahā Bodhi tree area.
5. Although Māra had intended that: "Prince Siddhattha will become like a heap of minced meat," he was struck with wonder when he saw Prince

7: The Attainment of Buddhahood – 357

Siddhattha seated as before without being destroyed, like a huge diamond mountain. So he again caused burning coals to rain down. They came falling down smoking and blazing, but were transformed into jasmine flowers, etc., on coming near the Bodhisatta.

6. Thereafter, he caused hot ashes to rain down. The mass of ashes, very hot, like fire, came down from the sky but turned into celestial sandalwood powder as it reached the feet of the Bodhisatta.
7. Again, he caused hot sand to fall like rain. Sand, in the form of very soft fine powder, coming down through the sky, fell at the feet of the Bodhisatta as celestial flowers.
8. Thereafter, he caused a shower of hot mud to fall like rain. The mud, with fumes and flames, also coming through the sky, fell at the feet of the Bodhisatta after turning into celestial perfumed paste.
9. Thereafter, he caused a pall of great darkness to form, thinking: “I will make this Prince Siddhattha flee by frightening him with a pall of darkness.” The darkness created by Māra was like the great darkness resulting from four factors: a new moon night, a cloudy sky, midnight and the middle of a deep forest; but, on reaching the presence of the Bodhisatta, it disappeared like the darkness eliminated by sunlight.

Here, knowing that the Māra was creating a mass of great darkness, the Bodhisatta sent out from his body a network of radiance which was the size of the pore of a body-hair. It was this network of radiance which destroyed the massive darkness created by Māra and produced a great illumination.

Māra’s Mechanical Weapons

Although Māra launched his attacks by means of the above-mentioned nine kinds of weapons, which were ineffective, he continued to let meteors fall, as a consequence of which the whole 10,000 world-element was completely covered with fumes and smoke. The entire sky rumbled with thunder although there were no clouds, and thousands of lightning bolts struck frighteningly. When Māra was unable to cause any harm to the Bodhisatta, even with such aggressive actions, he renewed his offensive with evil intentions by launching mechanised weapons, saying: “Prince Siddhattha, I will have your head smashed into bits and fall to the ground.”

The might of that mechanical weapon was such that if it was thrown on the ground, no grass could grow for twelve years; if discharged into the sky, there would be drought and [307] not a single drop of rain would fall for a total period of twelve years. If directed at the top of mount Meru, the mountain would break into two and fall asunder. Such was the might of the said mechanised weapon. However, when it was launched by Māra, although it came down through the sky, roaring like thunder, it fell down helpless at the feet of the Bodhisatta curling like a rope-coil used as a foot-scraper, thereby humbling the pride of Māra.

Not knowing how to proceed further and being greatly agitated with wrath, Māra shouted out commands to his hordes: “Why are you just standing there! Don’t give this Prince Siddhattha any chance to attain his cherished wish of becoming a Buddha. Seize him! Kill him! Cut him up! Break him down! Don’t allow him to escape!” he himself approached the Bodhisatta, sitting on the back of the elephant Girimekhala, and brandishing an arrow with one hand, and said to him: “Prince Siddhattha, remove yourself henceforth from the jewelled throne.” At that time, the hordes of Māras manifested themselves in various hideous forms, acting in many frightening ways.

Here, the author inserted Taungdwin Sayādaw Khingyiphyaw’s verses of reverence relating the Bodhisatta’s vanquishing of the nine kinds of weapons launched by Māra together with their expositions. We have left them out from our translation.

The Bodhisatta’s Compassion

This episode of victory over Devaputta Māra is described in the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra) in greater detail and in a way which inspires more devotional piety than in the Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentary and the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) commentary. So most of what follows has been extracted from the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra).

Sapāda-mūle kīḷantaṃ passanto taruṇaṃ sutamī,
pitā vudikkhi taṃ Māraṃ mettāyanto dayāparo. [124]

The very compassionate father, to whom children are indebted, would not show anger in the least, if his young son, playing about at his feet, hit him with hands and feet or somehow offended him. Far from being angry with him, he would hug him by the neck and hold him to his chest to let him sleep with fatherly love and affection. In the same way, the noble Bodhisatta showed forbearance for all the wrongdoings on the part of the wicked Māra and was not in the least grieved; and he looked at Māra without any fear but with loving-kindness and compassion.

*Tadā so asambhivācam̐ sīha-nādam̐ nadī muni, na jānāti sayam̐ mayham̐, dāsa-bhāva-piyam̐ khaḷo. [125]
Yena kenaci kammaena jāto Deva-pure vare, sakaṃ gatim̐ ajānanto loka-jeṭṭho ti maññati. [126]*

When thus Māra advanced on him with his great armies and harassed him, he uttered these bold words: “This wicked Māra is not at all aware that he himself has become a servant of mine: Having been born in the Vasavatti realm just because of a few deeds of merit, but having not the slightest knowledge about his own lifespan, the time of his death and the realm of suffering which he is destined to after his death, he is thinking to himself: “I am permanent. I am the only one who rules over the whole world.” He does not reflect, nor is he aware, of his own plight and of the hazard of falling into the lower worlds. Due to such ignorance, he dares commit such wrongs.” [308]

*Ananta-loka-dhātumhi sattānam̐ hi kataṃ subham̐, mayheka-pāramiyā pi kalam̐ nagghati soḷasim̐. [127]
Tiracchāno saso hutvā disvā yācakam-āgataṃ, pacitvāna sakaṃ mam̐sam̐ patitoggimhi dātave. [128]*

If the accumulated deeds of merit performed by sentient beings in the whole of the infinite number of world-elements are placed on one side of the pair of scales of wisdom and weighed against the accumulated meritorious deeds of mine, in the form of the perfections (pāramī), placed on the other side of the scale, the accumulated deeds of merit of all sentient beings cannot come up to even one 256th part of the merit accruing from a single perfection of mine, out of the ten performed by me. Even in my existence as a small hare in the animal world, I had jumped into a heap of fire with great courage in order to be roasted and gave away my flesh in generosity with joy and delight, when I saw a recipient who had come to ask for it.

Ordinarily, the bold words spoken by the Bodhisatta: “If the accumulated deeds of merit performed by the beings in the whole of the infinite number of world-elements are compared with the merits accruing from only one out the ten perfections of mine, they would not come up to even 256th part of the merits of a single perfection.” would appear hyperbolic. In reality, it was not so, the words were very natural and true.

Persons other than the Bodhisatta generally performed meritorious deeds with a wish for human and celestial happiness.<sup>130</sup> Thus, the accumulated deeds of merit performed by others result in the round of suffering. It is as if these people spent their merit on the acquirement of human existence and human happiness, or celestial existence and celestial happiness. Therefore, like one who spends money on personal requisites each time he earns money and is unable to save any, all the sentient beings other than the Bodhisatta, who delight in the suffering of the round of existences (vattābhirata), are all paupers with no accumulated wealth from their meritorious deeds.

As for the Bodhisatta, he aspired only after omniscience every time he performed an act of merit in fulfilment of the perfections. As a result, all the meritorious deeds performed by the Bodhisatta remained intact, without losing momentum in his mind continuum as an endowment of merits (kamma-samaṅgi) as long as they have not yet produced the fruit of omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa). Therefore, just as one who does not squander and dissipate but saves his money and accumulates more and more wealth day by day, so the Bodhisatta, coming into possession of more and more wealth from meritorious deeds existence after existence, became a very rich person in respect of his merit.

A single rich person possessing billions of money cannot be equalled by a large number of poor and destitute persons in matters of wealth. They will indeed fail in this competition. Similarly, a Bodhisatta, who was immensely wealthy, possessing untold riches of meritoriousness derived from the perfections, cannot be rivalled [309] in terms of the wealth of meritoriousness, by sentient beings in the infinite world-elements. They are bound to be defeated because they are impoverished in respect of the wealth of meritoriousness as they have spent all of it as soon as they have earned it in pursuit of good life (bhava-sampatti), and enjoyment of pleasures (bhoga-sampatti). Therefore, the Bodhisatta's bold utterance is no exaggeration; it is natural and true.

<sup>130</sup> Even those Buddhists, who are born as human beings in the present Buddha dispensation, and who know that the act of generosity with the wish for further existences and pleasures (vaṭṭa-nissita-dāna), is not so beneficial and excellent as the act of abandoning with the wish for Nibbāna (vivaṭṭa-nissita-dāna), have in their subconscious mind the desire for a good existence with a happy life even though they do not express this explicitly when they perform alms-giving.

7: The Attainment of Buddhahood – 361

Evaṃ ananta-kālesu kataṃ dukkara-kārikam, ko hi nāma kareyyañño anumatto sacetano. [129]

Māra does not know what I really am; that I gain this personality of mine in this life as a result of the aforesaid infinite deeds of merit. And so he thinks I am just an ordinary man.

Nāham manussomanusso na Brahmā na ca devatā, jarā-maraṇam lokassa dassetuṃ panidhāgato. [130]

In fact, I am not an ordinary seven-days old human being; nor am I a Yakkha, a Brahma or a Deva. I have taken conception in the womb of a female human, even though I am not an ordinary seven-days old human being, in order to show all sentient beings the suffering of old age, sickness and death in the round of existences.

It cannot be said with certainty that the Bodhisatta was a man, a Yakkha, a Deva, a Māra or a Brahma because each of these beings has nothing of the kind of tasks undertaken by the Bodhisatta.

Then it may be asked why should the Bodhisatta be born of the female human, Queen Māyā? It has therefore been said that he had taken conception in the womb of a female human in order to show all sentient beings of humans, Devas and Brahmas, the suffering of old age, sickness and death in the round of existences.

There is no Deva, Māra, Brahma or self (atta) that can bring into existence or create any sentient being. In reality, it is only craving (taṇhā), which arises in the mind continuum of each individual that is responsible for the recurrence of rebirth (paṭisandhi). It is also the power of craving which brings about the commission of deeds of merit and demerit.

A deed (kamma) is like a field in a consciousness (viññāṇa), that which accompanies it, is like a seed; craving (taṇhā) or greed (lobha) is like water. It is through the combination of soil, seed and water that the sprout of a tree appears. In the same way, it is through the combination of the soil of the deed (kamma), the seed of consciousness (viññāṇa) and the moisture of craving or greed that a sentient being appears. In the absence of the moisture of craving or greed, even though there is the soil of the deed and the seed of consciousness, the sprout of the tree of existence would not come into being. Hence noble Arahats, who have eradicated the moisture of craving or greed, do not take rebirth in a new existence.

Thus, sentient beings who appear on account of the coming together of the three causes, are overwhelmed by the flood of various sufferings such as birth, etc. The Bodhisatta is one who wants to remove all these sufferings afflicting sentient beings.

The root cause of all the suffering, such as birth, etc., is craving (taṇhā). If craving is uprooted, birth does not take place. If birth does not take place, old age, death, etc., do not happen. Therefore, it is craving that should be eradicated first and [310] foremost; and from delusion (moha) springs that craving in sentient beings who long for happiness by perceiving the six sense objects (ārammaṇa), such as visible objects (rupārammaṇa), as being permanent (nicca-sañña), delightful (sukha-sañña), pleasant (subha-sañña) or durable (atta-sañña). And craving can be abandoned only if the defects of the six sense objects, the origin of craving, are made manifest.

Again, the defects of the six sense objects mean that the state of impermanence is inherent in them; the state of impermanence in turn, is discernable only when the nature of old age and death is seen; only when old age and death is seen, the defects of the six sense objects, such as the state of impermanence can be seen; and only when these defects of the six sense objects are seen can craving and greed, which cling to the six sense objects, be discarded. Only when craving and greed can be discarded will the suffering in Samsāra, such as birth, old age, etc., cease. This being the case, discernment of old age and death forms the basic and most essential factor in the cessation of the suffering in Samsāra. And so, the Bodhisatta came to this human world and took conception in the lotus-like womb of Queen Māyā in order to show all sentient beings the nature of old age and death which forms the basic and essential factor in the cessation of suffering in Samsāra.

If the Bodhisatta, having been born a Deva or a Brahma, were to teach the nature of old age and death and perform miracles, others would not believe him, thinking: “This Deva or Brahma, although being himself someone who enjoys happiness, who is permanent and durable, comes and teaches us the doctrine of impermanence, suffering and non-self, what kind of teaching is this?” They would not listen to him respectfully either. They would merely opine: “Can there be anything which a Deva or a Brahma cannot teach? There is nothing he cannot teach. And can there be any miracles which he cannot perform? Indeed he can perform all miracles. So his teaching of a doctrine or the performance of a miracle is nothing wonderful.”

As witnessed by many, the Bodhisatta was born of Queen Māyā; when he came of age, he enjoyed sensual pleasures; when a son was born to him, he forsook the son, renounced the world and became a recluse; after he had practised austere striving (dukkara-cariyā), he eventually achieved the knowledge of the path and omniscience and he became a Buddha. When, therefore, he started teaching the Dhamma, or making manifest the nature of old age and death, or explaining the three characteristics (anicca, dukkha, anatta), all the people would respectfully listen to his teaching, with the thought: “Even this noble person, endowed as he is with great power and wisdom, and knowing all aspects of Dhamma, cannot overcome old age, sickness and death, what about us?”

Our Buddha, who teaches us to do away with sufferings, such as birth, old age, etc., indeed thoroughly understands the real nature of all things! Indeed, Nibbāna, where there is no suffering, such as birth, old age, etc., is blissful!” With this faith, they follow the Bodhisatta’s teaching, applying intelligence to it and they came to discern this individual (atta-bhava), which in reality is the five aggregates of grasping (upadānakkhandha), as suffering (dukkha), and as the origin of suffering.

They also discern perfectly the defects of craving and greed which give rise to this body, which in reality are the five aggregates of grasping. Having discerned this, sentient beings will feel frightened, ashamed and disgusted with craving, which is the truth of the origin of suffering (samudaya-saccā); and also with the five groups of grasping, which is the truth of suffering (dukkha-sacca) arising through craving, and they will cause the complete cessation of craving. When they have done so, they will be qualified to attain final Nibbāna (anupāda-parinibbāna), the complete cessation of suffering. Hence the Bodhisatta said: “I came to this human world and took conception in the lotus-like womb of Queen Māyā, in order to show all sentient beings the suffering of birth, old age and death in the round of existence.” [311]

Anupalitto lokena jātonanta-jino ahaṃ,

Buddho bodhi-tale hutvā, tāremi janataṃ bahuṃ. [132]

Hey, Māra, although I have been born into this human world, I have not in the least been tainted with any of the conditioned states of beings. Having surmounted the infinite conditioned states of beings and infinite mental defilements, I have gained the title of “Infinite Conqueror” (Ananta-jina).

Even while I remain seated on this unconquered throne without moving from this cross-legged posture, I have burnt up and got rid of all the mental defilements, I have indeed truly become a Buddha amidst humans, Devas and Brahmas. And I will save all these beings from the stream of Saṃsāra and carry them over to the high ground of Nibbāna. You are not in any way capable of restraining me. It is no concern of yours.

Samantā dhajinaṃ disvā, yuddhaṃ Māraṃ savāhanaṃ, yuddhāya paccugacchāmi, mā maṃ ṭhānā acāvayi. [133]

Hey, Māra, seeing your great armies advancing from all sides with flags flying, and you on Girimekkhala's elephant, I have advanced facing you with the wisdom to do battle with you valiantly.<sup>131</sup> You cannot make me rise or move from this unconquered throne. I will see that you will not be able to do so.

Yan-te taṃ nappasahati senaṃ loko sadevako, tan-te paññāya gacchāmi, āmaṃ pattāṃ va asmanā. [134]

Hey, Māra, in the same way a strong man breaks and destroys, with a large stone, all the baked or unbaked pots and cups made by a potter, I will repulse and smash single handedly, without rising from this place and by the power of wisdom, your ten great armies of sensual passions (kāma-rāga), to which the whole world concedes defeat with repugnance; or I will drive away your armies, your great armies, which measure twelve leagues each, in front on the right and left, nine leagues in height and reach as far as the walls of the world-elements so that not a single soldier of yours is left behind. Even in a moment from now, I will make you, as well as your hordes, flee like a flock of crows is made to fly away by throwing a stone.<sup>132</sup>

<sup>132</sup> Verses 9 and 10 are those delivered by the Buddha in the Discourse on the Striving (Padhāna-sutta, Snp 3.2). Verses 1 to 8 and those following hereafter were composed by Buddhārakkhita Thera, the author of the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra), taking extracts from Pāḷi discourse texts which are in accordance with the teaching of the Buddha.

Ichchanto sāsape gabbhe caṅkamāmi ito cito, icchanto loka-dhātumhi, attabhāvena chādayi. [135]

Hey Māra, indeed, if I want to be small, I can walk to and fro inside a mustard seed. If I want to be big, I can keep even the whole of the world-element covered with my individuality (atta-bhava). [312]

Ete sabbe gahetvāna, cuṅṅhetum accharāya pi, atthi thāmaṃ balaṃ mayhaṃ pāṇa-ghāto na vaṭṭati. [136]

Hey Māra, I have the power to seize and pulverise you together with all your hordes just by snapping my fingers; but I do not take the slightest delight in taking another’s life, which is a wrong doing.

Imassa gaṇḍuppādassa āyudhena balena kiṃ, mayhaṃ hi tena pāpena, sallāpo pi na yujjati. [137]

What benefit will accrue if I make use of a weapon or physical strength against this Māra who is just the size of an earthworm? True, I dislike even to engage this much in conversation with this wicked Māra.

Before the Bodhisatta uttered these bold words, Māra had questioned: “Prince Siddhattha, why are you occupying this unconquered throne which belongs to me?” The Bodhisatta replied: “Who is the witness to prove that the unconquered throne belongs to you?” Māra stretched out his hands, saying: “What is the use of producing others as my witness, all the Māra troops, who are now in your presence, are my witnesses.” At that moment millions of his hordes appeared simultaneously making an uproar as if there was a landslide, shouting: “I am the witness, I am the witness.” So the Bodhisatta, restraining the hordes of Māra, recited the following verse with the intention of producing his witness.

Pallaṅkaṃ mama bhāvāya, kim-atthaññena sakkhinā, kampitā maddiyā dānā, sakkhi hoti ayaṃ mahī. [138]

Hey Māra, because of my wish for this unconquered throne, there was no gift (dāna) which I have not given; no morality (sīla) which I have not observed; no austerity (dukkara) which I have not practised throughout many existences in many worlds.

Hey Māra, let alone the perfections of generosity, morality, etc., performed by me in my many existences in many worlds, even in just one existence as Vessantara, when I performed great charities seven times, reaching the height of my generosity with the giving away of Queen

Maddī, this great earth trembled a total of seven times. Now that I am sitting on this unconquered throne, in order to conquer the whole world, and your great Māra armies came to make war upon me, why does this great earth remain quiet without trembling?

Hey Māra, you have made your hordes give false evidence but this great earth, having no volition, is just and fair to you as well as to me, this great earth is impartial to you and me, and having no volition at all, will now be my witness.” So saying, the Bodhisatta brought his glorious right hand from inside the robe and pointed towards the great earth like a streak of lightning flashes from a cloud-opening.

At that very moment, the great earth revolved swiftly like a potter’s wheel and rolled around violently. The sound from the earth caused the whole stretch of the sky to resound loudly, like the rumbling of thunder. The seven mountain ranges, encircling Mount Meru as well as the Himālayas, made a deep, continuous sound. The whole of the 10,000 world-element rolled with frightening and fierce sounds, crackling and exploding like a bamboo grove on fire. The entire cloudless sky was rumbling frighteningly as if parched rice-grains were crackling with loud retorts in a red hot pan; burning sparks rained down profusely like a cascade of red hot embers; and thunderbolts crashed intermittently.

Māra, finding himself caught between the earth and the sky with continuous din and clamour, [313] greatly frightened with no refuge or help, laid down his battle-banner and, discarding his 1,000 weapons at that very place, fled in confusion at full speed without being able to glance back at his elephant, Girmekhala. Even as Māra fled, his great armies broke down in disorder and fled, being scattered in disarray in all directions, like ashes blown away by a storm; they eventually returned to the Vasavatti realm.

In this manner, with the victory over Vasavatti Māra before sunset on the full moon day of May (Vesākha), in the year 528 BCE, the Bodhisatta became the conqueror of the whole world of sentient beings and reached the harmless, blameless, fearless state.

At that moment, on seeing the great armies of Māra breaking up in disorder, the Devas and Brahmas who had fled out of fear on the arrival of Māra and who had been watching to find out: “Who will emerge the victor? Who will be the loser?” proclaimed simultaneously in profound praise the good news: Māra has been vanquished. Prince Siddhattha has emerged the victor. We will celebrate and honour his victory (jayo hi buddhassa sirimato ayam). It was transmitted by one Nāga to another Nāga, one Garuḷa to another Garuḷa, one Deva to another Deva, one Brahma to another Brahma. Carrying perfumes and fragrant flowers, etc., in their hands, they congregated at the Mahā Bodhi throne where the Bodhisatta was residing.

*Jayo hi Buddhassa sirīmato ayam,

This unique victory, acclaimed by this inanimate earth and sky that rumbled as if animate, belongs only to the Buddha, who by means of omniscience, without leaving out even the tiniest detail, possesses the knowledge of all the truth worthy of knowing; who is the depository of the incomparable glory of glories in the whole of the 10,000 world-element.

This victory is celebrated by the humans, Devas and Brahmas resounding throughout the sky. And it is the vile and wicked Māra who suffers utter defeat, a complete rout and total retreat, fearing the power of the Buddha, and who is blinded by ignorance and marched with his great armies as if it would cause upheavals in the eight quarters of the earth's surface, and started the offensive with intimidation trying to capture the Bodhi-crested throne (Bodhi-makuṭa-pallaṅka).

Thus, on this day of the great victory, the full moon day of May (Vesākha), in the year 528 BCE, at the site of the unconquered throne where omniscience was attained by the Buddha, all the hosts of divine Nāgas, happy and delighted with the victory of the Buddha, who has cultivated such extraordinary attributes as the aggregates of moral conduct (sīlakkhanda), proclaim the victory resoundingly, and so loud as to reach the whole of the 10,000 world-element.

All the Devas and Brahmas, who had their abodes in the other 10,000 world-elements beside this one, also congregated in the presence of the Bodhisatta, prostrating before him, paying homage with flowers, perfumes and scented paste, singing auspicious words of praise and eulogies in many and various ways.

7: The Attainment of Buddhahood – 370

In describing the route taken by the Bodhisatta on his journey and his activities on the full moon day of May (Vesākha), in the year 528 BCE, the commentaries to the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa), the Introduction to the Birth Stories (Jātaka-nidāna) and the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra) generally agree in the purport of their accounts. They differ slightly only in their presentation, some stating things briefly and others more elaborately.

However, in depicting the midday rest taken by the Bodhisatta in the Sāla forest, the commentaries to the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) and the Introduction to the Birth Stories (Jātaka-nidāna) make no mention of the attainment of absorption (jhāna-samāpatti) and of the super knowledges (abhiññā). The Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra), on the other hand, states that the Bodhisatta attained the eight mundane absorptions and the five mundane super knowledges (abhiññā) while spending the day in the Sāla forest.

It also states that at the time of his arrival at the Mahā Bodhi tree, the noble Bodhisatta was already endowed with the physical strength equal to that of 1,000 billion average men (majjhima-purisa) and the strength of the super knowledges (abhiññā). The said statement by the author of the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra) is in accord with his other statements, namely: “When Māra advanced on him to do battle, the noble Bodhisatta said: ‘If I wish, I can keep the whole of the world-element covered with my body frame,’ and also: ‘Pointing out as witness the great charities performed in his existence as Vessantara,’ ” which could be known only through the knowledge of former existences (pubbe-nivāsānussati-abhiññā). It is therefore faultless.

According to the author of the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra), the Bodhisatta had already acquired the eight mundane absorptions and the five mundane super knowledges at the time he met the sectarian leaders, Āḷāra and Udaka. Not having made use of them during the whole of six years practice of austere striving (dukkara-cariyā), they became as if defiled just as gold cups kept unused become tarnished; the Bodhisatta re-purified them while in the Sāla forest as though polishing the stained cups. What is meant apparently is that, only after vanquishing Māra, the Bodhisatta made full use of the already acquired knowledge of past existences (pubbe-nivāsa-abhiññā), and the divine power of sight (dibba- cakkhu-abhiññā), in order to reach the stage of penetrating the truths. These observations are made here because the view of the author of the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra) appears to be unusual and worthy of note.

Realization of the Three Knowledges

Having won his victory over Vasavatti Māra also known as Devaputta Māra, before sunset on the full moon of May (Vesākha), in the year 528 BCE, the Bodhisatta realised the three understandings (vijjā), in succession, as follows: the knowledge of past existences (pubbe-nivāsānussati-ñāṇa) in the first watch of that night; knowledge of the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu-ñāṇa) in the middle watch of the night and knowledge of the extinction of the pollutants (āsavakkhaya-ñāṇa) in the last watch of the night, and became a Buddha in the very last watch of the night of the May (Vesākha) full moon.

Knowledge of Past Existences

The physical and mental processes which had taken place in the past: Nibbāna, which becomes known from these physical and mental processes, one's personal names, clan names etc., which are merely conventional terms – all this belonging to the past is called past existences (pubbe-nivāsa). The super knowledge (abhiññā) accompanying the remembrance of [316] past existences is the knowledge of past existences (pubbe-nivāsānussati-abhiññā). The Buddha taught it as the first of the three understandings (vijjā-ñāṇa).

The following is an account in detail as to how the first understanding was realized by the Bodhisatta: When the noble Bodhisatta was sat on the unconquered throne, delighted and happy after being victorious over Vasavatti Māra, many Devas and Brahmas dwelling in the 10,000 world-element including the earth-bound spirits (bhumma-deva), went to the Bodhisatta simultaneously and assembled, shouting and exclaiming: “Come, friends, Devas and Brahmas, the victory of the noble Bodhisatta and the defeat of Māra have been made clear. Let us hold together an auspicious celebration in honour of the victory of the noble Bodhisatta and the coming attainment of his Buddhahood.”

At that time, the sun disc, 50 leagues in size, magnificent with a thousandfold radiance, was about to disappear like a gold wheel of a cart being held by the rim and dipped into the whirlpool of the great ocean. The moon chariot, 40 leagues in size, giving out cool, shining beams of light, brightening up the entire universe, was just rising up slowly from the milky ocean in the east, as if the silvery wheel of a cart being thrown into the sky by someone holding it by the rim.<sup>133</sup>

In the middle of this golden palace, the Bodhisatta looked very graceful, the golden colour of his body made the high ground around the Mahā Bodhi tree and all the animate and inanimate objects in the surrounding area appear as if immersed in a stream of liquid gold. The Bodhisatta, so graceful in this manner, sitting cross-legged on the unconquered throne at the foot of the Mahā Bodhi tree which may be likened to an umbrella of precious sapphire stones, was reflecting on the Dhamma.<sup>134</sup>

At that time, standing in the Tāvātimsa realm, Sakka sounded the Vijayuttara conch which was 120 leagues long, to summon the Devas and Brahmas. The sound of his conch could be heard from all over the realm, 10,000 leagues in width. Even while blowing the conch continuously, Sakka was running fast to reach the Bodhi tree. It was not only the Sakka of this universe, but all the Sakkas of the other 10,000 world-elements went blowing conches into the presence of the Bodhisatta.

Mahā Brahma arrived and paid homage by holding the white umbrella, which had been left behind on top of the mountains called Cakkavāḷa, and sheltered the Bodhisatta with it from above; and all the Mahā Brahmas from the other 10,000 world-elements arrived and stood holding their white umbrellas, touching one another so as to leave no gap between them.

Suyāma, King of the Yama abode of Devas, also arrived and stood near the Bodhisatta, paying homage by fanning him with the yak-tail fan which was three miles in size; and all the Suyāma Devas from the other 10,000 world-element also arrived and paid homage, each holding a yak-tail fan, crowding the whole of this world-element.

Santusita, King of the Tusita abode of Devas, also arrived and paid homage by fanning the Bodhisatta with a circular ruby fan, three miles in size; and all the Santusita Devas from the other 10,000 world-element also arrived and paid homage, each holding a circular ruby fan, crowding the whole of this world-element.

Pañcasikha arrived, carrying the celestial harp, Beluva, accompanied by a group of celestial dancers, and paid homage by dancing, singing and making music; and all the celestial dancers dwelling in the other 10,000 world-elements also arrived and paid homage by dancing, singing and making music.

Furthermore, all male and female deities dwelling in the 10,000 world-elements gathered together in this world-element and paid homage, taking their positions in the vicinity. Some of them standing and holding a jewelled archway, others stood around in various groups of their own, some carrying offerings made of the seven kinds of jewels, some holding golden plantain plants, some holding mansions of splendour, some holding yak-tail [317] fans, some holding goads for driving elephants, some holding pairs of carp, some holding primrose flowers, golden circular platforms, bowls filled with water, jars filled with water, conches, fire-stirrers, oil lampstands with rubies, golden mirrors, stone-studded mirrors, mirrors with the seven jewels, oil lamps finished with rubies, bunting and streamers, and wish-fulfilling trees. All the Devas dwelling in the 10,000 world-element arrived, assumed the appearance of celestial dancers, and paid homage, dancing celestial dances, singing celestial songs, offering celestial flowers, perfumes and scented powder. At that time, the whole sky was full of cascades of celestial flowers and celestial perfumes as if the whole environment was filled with the rain drops and rain water of a heavy downpour.

This tremendous ovation and ceremonious homage was made with such grandeur by all the Devas and Brahmas because they were exulted with the belief: “When this noble Bodhisatta becomes a Buddha, we will certainly get the opportunity to listen to the Dhamma from him and thereby receive the immortal supermundane Dhamma of the paths and fruitions and Nibbāna; and we will have delightful satisfaction (pīti), by applying our mind to the nine supermundane Dhammas of the four paths, four fruitions and Nibbāna. We will also witness all kinds of miracles which will be objects of delight for the eye. The Buddha, by teaching us the deathless Dhamma, will bring about our emancipation and safety from the difficult journey of birth (jāti), ageing (jarā), sickness (vyādhi), death (maraṇa), grief (soka), lamentation (parideva), pain (dukkha), distress (domanassa) and despair (upāyāsa).”

7: The Attainment of Buddhahood – 374

Although the Devas and Brahmas paid him homage with great joy and respect, crowding the whole 10,000 world-element for the aforesaid reason and although he saw clearly, with his own eyes, these extraordinary acts of reverence performed in numerous ways, the Bodhisatta had no feeling of attachment and enjoyment at all; and he paid no attention to them. He dwelt reflecting only on the Dhamma which he relied upon as his support.

The mountains called Cakkavāḷa, which protected the Bodhisatta who was so positioned, was like a curtain and the open sky above him with its stars and constellations, was like a canopy studded with gold and silver stars. The 10,000 world-element, with its seven planes of happy existences (sugati-bhūmi), was like a great seven-tiered palace. The high ground of the Bodhi tree was like a great audience hall, the unconquered throne was like a great audience throne and the Mahā Bodhi tree was like a great umbrella finished with precious emeralds – all inside this seven-tiered palace of the 10,000 world-element.

While he remained sitting on the unconquered throne, which resembled a great audience throne, on the high ground of the Mahā Bodhi tree, which resembled a great audience hall, covered from above by the Mahā Bodhi tree, 100 cubits high from bottom to top and 100 cubits in circumference, which resembled a great umbrella decorated with precious emeralds, the Bodhisatta was oblivious of the Devas and Brahmas around him, crowding the whole of the 10,000 world-element and paying homage to him. Since he had been reflecting only on the Dhamma, his energy (virīya) was undiminished and very keen; his mindfulness (sati) was steadfast and clear, and he was physically and mentally very calm and peaceful. He, therefore, achieved and remained absorbed again in the first form absorption (rūpāvacara-jhāna).

The mind continuum of the Bodhisatta, who was thus absorbed in the first absorption, was entirely free from the hindrances (nīvaraṇa) and being detached from sensual objects (vatthu-kāma) and sensual desires (kilesa-kāma), delightful satisfaction (pīti) and happiness (sukha) arose in him profusely.

And again, when the Bodhisatta achieved and remained absorbed in the second form absorption, his mind continuum was free of agitation and disturbance from thoughts (vitakka-vicāra); there was internal purity and clarity and his concentration was uniquely firm. On account of that concentration, his delightful satisfaction and happiness increased.

And again, when the Bodhisatta achieved and remained absorbed in the third form absorption, even delightful satisfaction, which had manifested itself in his mind continuum, disappeared and [318] he dwelt only with the feeling of happiness (sukha-vedanā). Fully detached even from that feeling of happiness at its height, he became imbued with the mental state of specific neutrality (tatra-majjhataṭṭā) or equanimity (jhānupekkhā). His mindfulness became pellucid and his insight-wisdom greatly sharpened.

And again, when the Bodhisatta achieved and remained absorbed in the fourth form absorption, since he had already dispelled both physical and mental pain and pleasure from his mind continuum, he dwelt in the state of viewing sensual objects calmly and with equanimity (upekkhā-vedanā). By virtue of this equanimity and the mental state of specific neutrality (tatra-majjhataṭṭā), his mental concomitants, such as mindfulness, etc., which were part and parcel of the fourth absorption, were pellucid like the light of the moon.

The Eight Mind Qualities of the Bodhisatta

If a review is now made of the mind continuum of the Bodhisatta out of devotion, it will be found that, at the time when he was practising austere striving for six years, his mind continuum was exceedingly pure, undefiled by the three wrong thoughts (micchā-vitakka), namely, sensual thought (kāma-vitakka), malevolent thought (vyāpāda-vitakka) and cruel thought (vihimsā-vitakka), so that Māra could not find any opportunity of censuring him.

Again, while he was spending the day in the Sāla forest on the full moon day of May (Vesākha), the day he was to attain Buddhahood, his mind continuum was worthy of veneration, for it was highly purified with the attainment of eight mundane absorptions. Moreover, when all the Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element assembled, crowding this universe, and paid him homage while he was sitting on the unconquered throne after his victory over Devaputta Māra, he remained oblivious of them, concentrating his attention on the practice of the Dhamma only. And so the mind continuum of the Bodhisatta, who had once again achieved and remained absorbed in the fourth form absorption (rūpāvacara-jhāna), a feat for those of sharp intelligence, he had his power of concentration greatly enhanced by the concentration of the fourth form absorption as follows:

7: The Attainment of Buddhahood – 376

1. By virtue of the very pure mental state of the fourth form absorption (rūpa-jhāna-cittuppāda), the mind continuum was completely pure throughout its entire process.
2. On account of such purity, it appeared glittering like polished, newly-refined gold.
3. Having discarded happiness and joy (sukha-somanassa), which is the cause of greed (lobha), and also having discarded sorrow and distress (dukkha-domanassa), which is the cause of hatred (dosa), it was free from the mental defilements of greed and hatred.
4. Freedom from the defilements and taints of the mind leads to freedom from impurities which soil and oppress the mind (upakkilesa).
5. Being controlled by the fivefold mastery over his mind (vasī-bhāva), and being tamed and trained in fourteen ways, the mind continuum of the Bodhisatta became pliable, gentle so as to be amenable to his wishes, like a well-tanned piece of leather or like the well-treated block of lac.
6. Being soft and tender, like the newly refined, polished pure gold, which was ductile and malleable easily made into desired ornaments, it became amenable to the wishes of the Bodhisatta, enabling him to accomplish effectively and easily all kinds of feats, such as recollecting, discerning the events of previous existences, or seeing as if with the divine eye, distant objects, hidden objects and very fine, microscopic objects.
7. Having been well developed and trained so as not to become deprived of the aforesaid qualities, the mind continuum remained firmly established in the qualities; or being pliable and malleable for effective accomplishment of anything desired, the mind continuum remained amenable to the wish of the Bodhisatta.
8. Being thus firmly and securely established, his mind was completely unshaken; or, being established thus, the mind continuum was very strong in respect of faith (saddhā), energy (virīya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi) and the light of wisdom (paññā). There was, therefore, no shaking of the mind at all which occurs owing to faithlessness, laziness, heedlessness, restlessness, ignorance and gloom arising from the mental defilements. In other words, faithlessness, laziness, etc., could not make [319] even the slightest inroad into the mind continuum of the Bodhisatta.

Alternatively:

1. The mind continuum of the Bodhisatta was well-established in the concentration of the fourth absorption.
2. It was entirely pure, being free from the hindrances (nīvaraṇa).
3. Having gone beyond the grosser factors of the absorptions (jhānaṅga), such as thought (vitakka), and so on, which agitate and disturb the mind, the mind continuum was shining pure, as if about to glitter.
4. It was free from such defilements as pride (māna), deception (māyā), treachery (sātheyya), etc., apt to be generated through attainment of the absorptions.
5. It was also free from covetousness (abhijjhā), etc., which forms the cause of the minor defilements (upakkilesa).
6. It was malleable, having gained the fivefold mastery (vasī-bhāva).
7. Having become the basis of all kinds of supernormal powers (iddhi), it was in a position to accomplish whatever was desired by the Bodhisatta.
8. Having been perfected by mental development (bhāvanā), his mind continuum remained unshaken and firmly established.

The mind of the Bodhisatta, which was thus endowed with these eight attributes, finds it easy, needing only an inclination, for realization of the Dhamma which should be realized by means of the super knowledges (abhiññā). When the mind was bent towards the object of the super knowledges, the super knowledge thought moments (abhiññā-javana) arise quite easily.

1. The attainment of the super knowledge of former existences (pubbe-nivāsānussati-abhiññā) was the first understanding (viññā-ñāṇa).

The mind continuum, endowed with the aforesaid eight attributes and very pure and pellucid, being in such a perfect state in which the super knowledge thought moment (abhiññā-javana) arose easily when the mind was inclined to the object of the super knowledge, the Bodhisatta inclined it towards the super knowledge of former existences (pubbe-nivāsānussati-abhiññā), which could recollect past activities, events and experiences. Thereupon, the super knowledge of former existences arose in him easily. Through that super knowledge, he recollected and saw all his past activities, the events and experiences of his past existences, going back from his previous life right up to the existence when he was the recluse Sumedha. He recollected, also in backward order, many existences and aeons prior to them, and recollected, in forward order, his existences up to that of Setaketu the Deva in the Tusita realm, just before the present one.

This super knowledge was achieved in the first watch of the night. Here, there can be doubt as to how it was possible to know all the happenings and experiences in so many existences with one single thought-moment (abhiññā-javana), which arises only once in one thought-process (vīthi). Although there arose only one single thought moment in one thought process, ignorance (moha), which kept the happenings and experiences in those existences hidden, was done away with through that thought-moment. All kinds of happenings and experiences of those existences were recollected only thereafter, through the successive processes of reflection (paccavekkhaṇa-vīthi), which followed the processes of the super knowledge (abhiññā-vīthi).

The noble Bodhisatta, who recollected successive existences of the past through the super knowledge of former existences (pubbe-nivāsānussati-vijjā-ñāṇa), also acquired super knowledges which could assure him of the attainment of the supermundane (lokuttara) paths and fruitions with penetrative insight thus: “There were only the phenomena of mind and matter (nāma-rūpa) throughout the countless rounds of existence; the beginning of which is not known. On all three occasions of birth, living and death, there were only these two phenomena of mind and matter. Indeed in all abodes and at all times, the phenomena of mind and matter are in a continuous state of flux, like the flame of an oil lamp or like the current of a river, and through a succession of causes and effects, it is only the continuum of mind and matter which fulfils the various functions concerned, such as seeing the sight, hearing the sound, etc., at the six doors of eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind, thus giving rise to various modes of intimating one’s intention (viññatti) by bodily movement and verbal expression, etc. In reality there is no sentient individual at all to be called ‘I,’ ‘he,’ ‘she,’ ‘man,’ etc. Indeed, there is not [320] a single Deva, Māra or Brahma who can create such a sentient being.”

This being the case, the Bodhisatta had, through the super knowledge of former existences, temporarily put away to a distance (vikkhambhana-pahāna) the 20 wrong views of self-belief (atta-vāda), which are the four wrong views of self-belief relating to the aggregates of corporeality, namely: form is self, self has form; form exists in self, self exists in form and similarly, each set of these four wrong views relating to the remaining aggregates of feeling, perception, volitions and consciousness. In a similar manner, he had also discarded delusion (moha) which had taken place in the distant past.

2. Attainment of the super knowledge of divine sight (dibba-cakkhu-abhiññā), which is the second understanding (vijjā-ñāṇa).

After the noble Bodhisatta had realised the attainment of the super knowledge of former existences in the first watch of that night, he recollected many past events and existences through that super knowledge; and, having temporarily put away, to a distance, the 20 wrong views (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) together with delusion (moha) which had taken place in the distant past, he directed his mind continuum, which was endowed with the aforesaid eight attributes, towards acquiring the knowledge of seeing the deaths and births of sentient beings (cutūpapāta-ñāṇa), and towards acquiring the knowledge of analysing the deeds which cause rebirth (yathā-kammūpaga-ñāṇa).

The knowledge of analysing the deeds which cause rebirth is the same as the knowledge of divine sight. When the knowledge of divine sight is developed, the knowledge of analysing the deeds which cause rebirth and knowledge of foreseeing the future (anāgataṃsa-ñāṇa) also become developed.

When the mind was thus inclined to acquire the super knowledge of divine sight the second understanding (vijjā-ñāṇa) arose quite easily. Through that super knowledge, he could see sentient beings on the verge of death or just after taking conception; those who were low-born or high-born by lineage, caste, etc., those who were beautiful or not beautiful, and attain a happy existence or a miserable existence. In other words, he saw those who were rich and prosperous because of their past deeds of merit based on absence of greed (alobha) and those who were indigent and poverty-stricken because of their past deeds of demerit based on greed (lobha).

After seeing, through the super knowledge of divine sight, the denizens of the downfall (apāya) suffering misfortune, he reflected: “What kind of deeds have these beings of the lower realms done to suffer such awful miseries?” Thereupon, the super knowledge of analysing the deeds which cause rebirth which enabled him to see the deeds of demerit done by these beings arose in him.

Likewise, after seeing, through the super knowledge of divine sight, immense happiness enjoyed by sentient beings of the realms of humans, Devas and Brahmas in a progressively higher and better manner, he reflected: “What kind of deeds have these humans, Devas and Brahmas done to enjoy such progressively magnificent bliss in their respective realms?” Thereupon, the super knowledge of analysing the deeds which cause rebirth which enabled him to see the deeds of merit done by these beings arose in him.

By means of the knowledge of analysing the deeds which cause rebirth, he reviewed in detail the past deeds of merit and demerit done by beings and came to know them as they really were: “These denizens of the lower realms had, in their past existences, committed evil by deed, word and thought; they had maligned, abused and reviled the noble ones (ariyas). They held wrong views and with these wrong views they themselves committed, and also caused others to commit, various demeritorious deeds. After death and dissolution of their bodies, they reappeared in the lower realms, in the downfall (apāya), namely, the realm of continuous suffering (avīci), the realm of animals (tiracchāna), the realm of Petas and the realm of the Asuras.

He knew that: “These beings in good existences had performed good deeds bodily, verbally and mentally; they did not malign, abuse or revile the noble ones (ariya); they held right views and with right views, they performed various kinds of meritorious deeds and they caused others to do so. After death and dissolution of their bodies, they were reborn in the happy destinations of humans, Devas and Brahmas.” [321]

This super knowledge of divine sight, the second understanding was achieved by the noble Bodhisatta at midnight of that day. By virtue of this second understanding, the mind continuum of the Bodhisatta became devoid of the element of ignorance and delusion (avijjā-moha-dhātu) which was apt to keep hidden the passing away and arising of sentient beings. Then with the super knowledge of analysing the deeds which cause rebirth, which has the super knowledge of divine sight as its basis, he was able to review and became enlightened as to the true facts of the past deeds of sentient beings; and having done away with the sixteen kinds of doubt (kaṅkhā) the Bodhisatta attained the stage of purity by the removal of doubt (kaṅkhā-vitaraṇa-visuddhi).

Sixteen kinds of doubts are caused by wondering: Have I been in the past? Have I not been in the past? What have I been in the past? How have I been in the past? From what state into what state did I change in the past? Shall I be in the future? Shall I not be in the future? What shall I be in the future? How shall I be in the future? From what state to what state shall I change in the future? Am I? Am I not? What am I? How am I? Whence has this being come? Whither will it go?

3. The attainment of the knowledge of the extinction of the pollutants, (āsavakkhaya-ñāṇa), the third understanding (vijjā-ñāṇa) and becoming a Buddha.

The noble Bodhisatta attained the path-knowledge of an Arahata (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa), also called the knowledge of the destruction of the pollutants (āsavakkhaya-ñāṇa), in the last watch of the night thereby realising omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa).

Then to become a Buddha among humans, Devas and Brahmas, he inclined his mind continuum, which was endowed with the aforesaid eight attributes, to attain the path-knowledge of an Arahata; then letting it dwell on the doctrine of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) which is made up of twelve factors: ignorance (avijjā), volitions (saṅkhāra), consciousness (viññāṇa), mind and matter (nāma-rūpa), the six sense spheres (saḷāyatana), contact (phassa), feeling (vedanā), craving (taṇhā), attachment (upādāna), continuation (bhava), birth (jāti), old age (jarā), and death (maraṇa). Going over this doctrine of dependent origination in forward and reverse order repeatedly, he attained the noble path (ariya-magga), which is also known as knowledge and insight into things as they really are (yathā-bhūta-ñāṇa-dassana).

This knowledge of the four paths (magga-ñāṇa) did not appear in the mind continuum of such individuals as Sakka and Brahma who were very mighty in the world and the noble recluses, Kāḷadevila and Nārada, who were highly accomplished in the absorptions (jhāna) and super knowledges (abhiññā). So, it may be asked: “Why did this knowledge of the four paths which was so subtle and profound, which was not even dreamed of throughout the beginningless Saṃsāra, and never realised before, appear in the mind continuum of the Bodhisatta who had no teacher and who had entered the ascetic life by his own volition?”

The noble Bodhisatta had, during the period spanning four immeasurable periods and 100,000 world aeons, been passing through existences – so numerous that they could not be counted in hundreds, thousands and hundreds of thousands – and he had accumulated meritorious deeds of the perfection of generosity (dāna-pāramī), which were performed on the basis of the four modes of development, even to the extent of risking his own life. And in every existence, he had conducted himself to completely eradicate or lessen the defilement of greed that arose whenever he gave attention to this or that object. This led him to reach the stage at which others started remarking: “Is there no defilement of greed in the mind continuum of this noble person?”

Similarly, by virtue of the perfection of morality, forbearance and loving-kindness, which were [322] developed through the whole period of four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, he prevented the arising of anger (kodha) and faults (dosa), and by pouring the cool water of loving-kindness over a long period of time, he had extinguished the fires of anger and also done away with its company of jealousy (issā), stinginess (macchariya) and remorse (kukkucca).

By means of the perfection of wisdom (paññā-pāramī), which was well developed and accumulated throughout his many existences and aeons, he had dispelled the element of darkness which is delusion (moha). He had also discarded wrong views; he was therefore a great man of very pure wisdom. He had also approached all the Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, and noble disciples, as well as other learned individuals whom he happened to encounter and asked them such questions as: “Which Dhamma is faulty and which Dhamma is faultless? Which Dhamma is defiled and which Dhamma is pure?” Because of such enquiries, he had eliminated doubts in matters of Dhamma and had progressed in wisdom, existence after existence.

In the house of his relatives, he showed respect to those older than himself, such as mother and father, maternal uncles, etc., by bowing, by adoring, by honouring, by offering seats, by rising from the place in advance and by extending a welcome to them. He also showed respect to learned persons of virtuous conduct. He had thereby removed conceit (māna) and distraction (uddhacca) and became free from arrogance, like a snake with broken fangs, or a bull with broken horns, or a rope coil used as a foot-scraper. He was in the habit of praising the virtues of forbearance, the virtue of wishing for the welfare of others, and the virtue of being helpful to others with compassion.

By renouncing the world, the Bodhisatta had abandoned the luxuries of his domain and kingship, and became a recluse. After achieving the absorptions in the forest, he discarded the five hindrances and did away with sensuality (kāma-rāga) and delight in womenfolk (itthi-rati) whenever they appeared in each and every existence. With the perfection of truthfulness, he also abstained from false speech (micchā-vaca) which tends to mislead the world; with the perfection of energy, he also removed displeasure (arati) and indolence (kosajja) in concentration and insight meditations which are practices of extraordinary merit, by keeping his mind continuously active and diligent in performing meritorious deeds. In the aforesaid manner, he had endeavoured to make his mind continuum purer and purer one existence after another.

The noble Bodhisatta, who had thus removed the moral defilements (kilesa) by means of the accumulated merit which was accrued from the meritorious deeds of the perfections, such as generosity, morality, etc., had to go through, even in a single existence, the process of repeated purification because the defilements which he had removed would reappear soon. He would then remove them, only to find them making their appearance again since they had not yet been completely eradicated (samuccheda-pahāna) by means of the path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa). The Bodhisatta, however, would not concede defeat and would not give up but put them away temporarily to a distance (tad-aṅga-pahāna) and through putting away to a distance (vikkhambhana-pahāna) by means of deeds of great merit (mahā-kusala) and supernormal deeds of merit (mahāggata-kusala).

The following notes, based on the Manual of Insight (Vipassanā-dīpanī) of Ledi Sayadaw are provided here for further elucidation of this paragraph. Moral defilements arise in common worldlings in three stages: When the defilements are very active and violent producing evil deeds (vītikka-mabhūmi). The defilements of this stage can be got rid of or put away by the meritorious deeds of the perfection of morality but only temporarily. Therefore, the putting away by morality, etc., is called a temporary putting away (tad-aṅga-pahāna).

The defilements at the next stage come into existence as mental properties at the mind door when any object which has power to wake them up produces perturbances at one of the six doors (pariyuṭṭhāna-bhūmi). The defilements which appear thus can be subdued only by the cultivation of the absorptions through the practice of concentration. The putting away of defilements by concentration (samādhi) is called putting away to a distance (vikkhambhana-pahāna). The absorptions can dispose of the defilements for a considerable time so that they do not rise again.

But there still remain the defilements of the third stage which do not come into existence as mental properties but lie latent surrounding the life-continuum (anusaya-bhūmi). They cannot be removed by morality and concentration and are left undisputed by them. Only the knowledge of the path (magga-ñāṇa) attained by development of insight meditation which produces wisdom (paññā) can get rid of these defilements leaving nothing behind. This putting away of defilements by means of wisdom so that they will never rise again is called abandoning by cutting off (samuccheda-pahāna).

Here, the fulfilment of the perfections and the practice of morality which put away the defilements temporarily (tad-aṅga-pahāna) come under the great deeds of merit (mahā-kusala); practice of concentration meditation to develop concentration, which puts away defilements to a distance is regarded as great deeds of merit (mahāggata-kusala). The practice of insight meditation to produce wisdom, the path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa), which completely cuts off by abandoning (samuccheda-pahāna), is a supermundane deed of merit (lokuttara-kusala). [323]

In this manner, throughout the period of four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, he had eradicated the aggregates of impurities which defiled his mind, and also eliminated ignorance and delusion (avijjā-moha) which act as a general of the army leading the hordes of defilements (kilesa), accompanying him. At the same time, he made the five faculties: faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom, grew stronger, existence after existence. Thus, he had travelled through the difficult journey of Saṃsāra, continuously engaged in developing and fulfilling the perfections (pāramī) with fiery zeal till the time when, as King Vessantara, he gave away Queen Maddī in generosity, as the final act of merit which would enable him to become a Buddha. Thereafter, he spent his life in the Tusita realm, enjoying the celestial pleasures and awaiting the time when he would become a Buddha.

Since he was one who had thus reached the pinnacle of wisdom, having done away with the factors of defilements, such as greed, hatred, etc., by means of accumulated merits of the perfections such as generosity, morality, etc., the fourfold knowledge of the path (magga-ñāṇa), which is very deep and subtle, arose unaided in the mind continuum of the Bodhisatta.

Furthermore, beginning from the time when he prostrated himself at the feet of Buddha Dīpaṅkara, he had endeavoured to develop and accumulate merit through fulfilment of the perfections, such as generosity, morality, etc., which are difficult to accomplish by ordinary men without making any wish for the pleasures of any realm of existence whatsoever as the fruits of his meritorious deeds. For all the deeds of merit, such as generosity, morality, etc., performed by him, the Bodhisatta made only this wish: “Let the accumulated merits of these deeds become sufficing conditions (upanissaya-paccaya) for the arising in me of omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa).”

As for others, they pray for the pleasures of Devas and humans after performing deeds of merit. And, in accordance with their wishes, they gain the pleasures of the Devas and human worlds as the fruits of their good deeds. It is like spending and squandering whatever wealth of merit they have accumulated from their good deeds. Unlike these people, the Bodhisatta, after the manner of one who fills his granary with paddy and always keeps guard over it without making use of it, properly stores up the merit acquired from every performance of his good deeds, wishing: “Let this deed be the sufficing condition only for the realisation of knowledge of the path (magga-ñāṇa) with omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) as its pinnacle.”

Such being the case, the accumulation of merits from the perfections and good deeds, over the long period of four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, found an occasion to bear fruit, of which his becoming a Buddha was the greatest in this last existence as Siddhattha. But, as there were countless merits still to come to fruition all in one existence that very existence appeared congested with fruit-bearing merits.

By virtue of the aspiration, solely for becoming a Buddha, the merits of his good deeds that would come to fruition in a great rush in this last existence were very powerful. Consequently, it was only in the mind continuum of the noble Bodhisatta that the knowledge of the four paths which are so subtle and deep arose unaided. [324]

The Development of Insight by the Bodhisatta

Having done away with the factors of defilements, such as greed, hatred, etc., by means of the merits accumulated through the fulfilment of the perfections, such as generosity, morality, etc., the Bodhisatta – who had also eliminated delusion (moha), the general of the defilements, together with its concomitants, which is apt to hinder and conceal the way to Nibbāna – practised and developed the great diamond insight (mahā-vajira-vipassanā) in the last watch of the night, on the full moon of May (Vesākha).

The method of practice and development in brief is as follows: There are 1,000 billion world-elements known as the field of authority (āṇā-khetta) of a Buddha.

The field of authority of a Buddha: There are three fields (khetta) concerning a Buddha according to the sub-commentary on the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra) and the Expulsion (Pārājika) commentary: 1) the field of birth limited by the 10,000 world-element that quaked on the Fortunate One's taking re-birth linking (jāti-khetta); 2) the field of authority (āṇā-khetta), limited by the 1,000 billions of world-elements where the following safeguards (paritta), are efficacious: the Discourse about the Treasures (Ratana-sutta), the Safeguard of the Constituents (Khandha-paritta), the Safeguard through the Top of a Banner (Dhajagga-paritta), the Āṭānāṭiya Safeguard (Āṭānāṭiya-paritta) and the Peacock's Safeguard (Mora-paritta); 3) the field of scope (visaya-khetta) is boundless and immeasurable in which the Buddha-knowledge can exercise omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa), knowing anything anywhere that he wishes.

When the Bodhisatta contemplated the true nature of those beings living in each universe and belonging to the three passages of time: past, present and future, he came to know full well that, no matter how numerous humans, Devas and Brahmas were in a single universe, they could be reduced to the twelve factors of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) as the ultimate reality, past factors as cause: ignorance (avijjā) and volitions (sāṅkhāra); present factors as effect: consciousness (viññāṇa), mind and matter (nāma-rūpa), the six sense spheres (saḷāyatana), contact (phassa), feeling (vedanā); present factors as cause: craving (taṇhā), attachment (upādāna) and productive deeds (kamma-bhava); future factors as effect: birth (jāti), old age (jarā) and death (maraṇa).

When he contemplated the true nature of humans, Devas and Brahmas living in the remaining world-elements and belonging to the three passages of time, he came to know full well that, as in the case of the beings of this universe, the same twelve factors of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) form objects of insight (vipassanā), ranging from ignorance to birth, old age and death.

Summing up the number of the objects of insight (vipassanā), as there are 1,000 billion world-elements, there are also 1,000 billion each of the twelve factors. The total number of these objects will then become 1,200,000 billion.

Like a man, who cut and cleared a thick jungle with tangled bushes and undergrowth, sharpened his sword again and again on the whetstone, the Bodhisatta also, in order to clear away the thick jungle and bushes of the defilements (kilesa) numbering 1,500, repeatedly sharpened the sword blade of great diamond insight knowledge (mahā-vajira-vipassanā-ñāṇa), his personal weapon, on the whetstone of the fourth absorption on breathing (ānāpāna-jhāna) attainment. After which, he contemplated each of the factors of dependent origination, numbering 1,200,000 billion by reflecting on their characteristics of impermanence (anicca-lakkhaṇa), suffering (dukkha-lakkhaṇa) and non-self (anatta-lakkhaṇa).

As each of the factors of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda), numbering 1,200,000 billion, promotes three insight knowledges: insight knowledge of impermanence (anicca-vipassanā-ñāṇa); insight knowledge of suffering (dukkha-vipassanā-ñāṇa) and insight knowledge of non-self (anatta-vipassanā-ñāṇa), there arose altogether 3,600,000 billion great adamantine insight knowledges.<sup>135</sup> [325]

It is the usual practice of every Bodhisatta on the eve of his becoming a Buddha to reflect on the doctrine of dependent origination in forward and backward orders. Our Bodhisatta, like the previous Bodhisattas, also reflected on the doctrine of dependent origination in both orders. Thereupon, all the 10,000 world-element that form the field of birth (jāti-khetta) quaked, the effect of which reached to the limit of the bordering oceans.

After the Bodhisatta had cultivated the knowledge of conditioned things (sammasana-ñāṇa) of the 3,600,000 billion great adamantine insight knowledges by reflecting on the twelve factors of the doctrine of dependent origination as was usual for all the Bodhisattas, he again entered upon the fourth absorption on breathing (ānāpāna-jhāna) in order to sharpen the sword blade of the higher insight knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa) such as the knowledge of arising and passing (udayabbaya-ñāṇa),<sup>136</sup> on the whetstone on the fourth absorption on breathing. Having thus entered upon the fourth absorption on breathing, and having sharpened the sword blade of the higher insight knowledge, he rose from it and realised, with ease, the higher insight knowledges such as the knowledge of rising and falling (udayabbaya-ñāṇa).

It should be noted here that the Bodhisatta realized the higher insight knowledges with ease because, as he had entered the Saṅgha in the presence of past Buddhas and learnt the Three Baskets and practised insight meditation, he cultivated and developed even to the extent of attaining the knowledges of rising and falling (udayabbaya-ñāṇa), dissolution (bhaṅga-ñāṇa), fear (bhaya-ñāṇa), danger (ādīnava-ñāṇa), cooling (nibbidā-ñāṇa), desire for deliverance (muccitukamyatā-ñāṇa), reflecting-knowledge (paṭisaṅkhā-ñāṇa) and equanimity about formations (saṅkhārupekkhā-ñāṇa); and also because his insight knowledge had developed and grown immensely by virtue of the aforesaid 3,600,000 billion great adamantine insight knowledges of conditioned things (mahā-vajīra-vipassanā-sammasana-ñāṇa).<sup>137</sup>

<sup>137</sup> This is according to the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra) and the sub-commentary to the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya).

Just as a man who, on reaching the eaves of his house after taking a long journey, did not halt at all at the threshold but went straight into the house on finding the door wide open, so the noble Bodhisatta having realized higher and higher insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) with ease by successively passing through the series of the eight stages of knowledges, such as the knowledge of rise and fall (udayabbaya-ñāṇa), and so on, finally reached the last stage which was the knowledge of conformity (anuloma-ñāṇa), and did not stop there. Instead of stopping at the knowledge of conformity to the truth (saccānuloma-ñāṇa), which is like the gateway to the city of Nibbāna, he immediately proceeded to clear away the clouds and darkness of ignorance and delusion (avijjā-moha), which conceal the four truths, namely, the truth of suffering (dukkha-sacca), the truth of the origin of suffering (samudaya-sacca), the truth of the cessation of suffering (nirodha-sacca), and the truth of the path leading to the cessation of suffering (magga-sacca) by means of the three kinds of conformity to the truth (saccānuloma-ñāṇa): preliminary impulsion (parikamma), access impulsion (upacāra), and conformity (anuloma) which are included in the mind-process (magga-vīthi).<sup>138</sup>

Having thus dispelled the thick murk that hides the truth, he clearly saw, as one sees the moon clearly in the cloudless sky, and realized the great light of Nibbāna through the knowledge of the first path of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga-ñāṇa), which immediately follows the knowledge of the overcoming of worldly ties and changing over to noble lineage (gotrabhū-ñāṇa).

The thought moment of Stream-entry path-knowledge (Sotāpatti-magga-ñāṇa) appeared once and ceased. This was [326] immediately followed by the appearance and cessation three times of impulsion (javana) to Stream-entry fruition (Sotāpatti-phala) which is the effect of the said Stream-entry path, in accordance with the attribute of the Dhamma known as immediate fruition (akālika), then followed the flow of the life-continuum consciousness (bhavaṅga-citta).

Because the Stream-entry path had been attained thus, the mind continuum of the Bodhisatta was completely rid of the three defilements: personality view (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), doubt (vicikicchā) and adherence to practices and vows (sīlabbata-parāmasa). These defilements would never rise again in the Bodhisatta's mind continuum.

Doubt or wavering (vicikicchā) of mind about: 1) the Buddha; 2) the Dhamma; 3) the Saṅgha; 4) the training rules (sikkha); 5) the past; 6) the future; 7) both past and future, and 8) dependent origination (paṭiccasamuppāda). Adherence to practices and vows (sīlabbata-paramāsa); the misleading belief that there are paths, other than the Noble Eightfold Path, that can liberate one from suffering (dukkha).

The Awakening

After realizing Stream-entry and fruition, the Bodhisatta, reviewed 1) The Stream-entry path (Sotāpatti-magga); 2) the Stream-entry fruition (Sotāpatti-phala) which was the result of the path; 3) Nibbāna which was their object; 4) the defilements destroyed by means of the Stream-entry path; and 5) the defilements not destroyed yet by means of the said path. This fivefold reflective knowledge is known as the fivefold reflection-knowledge (paccavekkhaṇa-ñāṇa).

Having thus reviewed the fivefold reflective knowledge, the Bodhisatta again cultivated and developed the series of insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa), such as the knowledge of rise and fall (udayabbaya-ñāṇa), and so on. Soon he realized the second stage of the Once-returning path (Sakadāgāmi-magga) and the Once-returning fruition (Sakadāgāmi-phala). By the Once-returning path he uprooted the grosser defilements, namely, sense-desires (kāma-rāga) and ill-will (vyāpāda). Henceforth, the mind continuum of the Bodhisatta had become completely rid of the latent elements of the grosser defilements of sense-desires and ill-will, the way seeds are burnt up in fire.

Having realized the Once-returning path and fruition, the Bodhisatta, with the occurrence in him of impulsive thought moments (javana-vāra) of the fivefold reflective knowledge (paccavekkhaṇa-ñāṇa), contemplated the Non-returning path (Anāgāmi-magga), and the Non-returning fruition (Anāgāmi-phala), their object, Nibbāna, the defilements so far already destroyed and the remaining defilements. Again he developed the series of insight-knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa), such as the knowledge of rise and fall (udayabbaya-ñāṇa), and so on. Soon he realized the third stage of the Non-returning path and the Non-returning fruition.

By the Non-returning path he completely discarded the subtle defilements of sense-desires and ill-will. Henceforth, the mind-continuum of the Bodhisatta had become completely divested of the tendencies of the past lingering in the mind (vāsanā) as well as the latent elements of the subtle defilements of the sense-desires and ill-will.

Having realized the Non-returning path and the Non-returning fruition, the Bodhisatta, with the occurrence in him of impulsive thought moments (javana-vāra) of the five reflective knowledges (paccavekkhaṇa-ñāṇa), contemplated the Non-returning path and fruition, and their object, Nibbāna, the defilements destroyed, and the remaining defilements.

Again he developed the series of insight-knowledges, such as the knowledge of rise and fall, and so on. Soon he realized the fourth stage of the Arahata path (Arahatta-magga) and the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala). By the Arahata path, the Bodhisatta completely uprooted all the remaining defilements, namely, craving for existence in the material realm (rūpa-rāga), craving for existence in the immaterial realm (arūpa-rāga), pride (māna), restlessness (uddhacca) and ignorance (avijjā), without leaving the slightest trace of the tendencies of the past. Henceforward, the mind continuum of the Bodhisatta had become entirely rid of the 1,500 defilements together with the tendencies of the past (vāsanā) and the seven kinds of latent elements (anusaya).

Having realized the Arahata path (Arahatta-magga) and fruitions, there occurred impulsive [327] thought moments (javana-vāra) of the reflective knowledges (paccavekkhaṇa) which reflected on the Arahata path and fruitions, their object, Nibbāna, and the defilements which had been eradicated. There are altogether nineteen reflective knowledges: five each arising after the attainments of Stream-entry path and fruit, Once-returning path and fruit, Non-returning path and fruit and four arising after the attainment of Arahata path and fruit. These nineteen reflection-knowledges are also known as the insight and knowledge of freedom (vimutti-ñāṇa-dassana). After the attainment of the Arahata path, there were no defilements remaining and hence there was no reflection on it; therefore there are only four reflection-knowledges after the attainment of the Arahata path and fruit.

When the Bodhisatta realised the Arahata fruition immediately after the realisation of the Arahata path, his mind continuum was very clear and he attained the state of a Perfectly Self-Awakened One (Sammā-sambuddha), the Lord of the Three Worlds, by gaining omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) along with the four noble truths, the four analytical knowledges (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa), the sixfold unique wisdom (asādhāraṇa-ñāṇa), making up the fourteenfold wisdom of a Buddha, and the eighteen special qualities (āveṇika-dhamma) and the fourfold valorous wisdom (vesārajja-ñāṇa). Simultaneously with the attainment of omniscience came the dawn.

The Seven Purifications of a Buddha

In this connection, we propose to insert in this chronicle an account of the seven purifications of a Buddha (visuddhi) for brief information.

1. Purity of morality (sīla-visuddhi). At the time the Bodhisatta stopped at the banks of the river Anomā and put on the robes of a recluse, he began to observe moral restraint (saṃvara-sīla).

The practice of the precepts (sīla) varies in accordance with the mode of life adopted by the disciple, whether as a monastic or a lay person. The discourses give extensive explanations of the practice of the precepts, the type of moral training which necessarily precedes meditation. The Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga) explains the moral training in general under four heads: 1) The restraint according to the Monastic Rules (Pāṭimokkha-saṃvara); 2) the restraint of the senses (indriya-saṃvara); 3) purity of livelihood (ājīva-pārisuddhi); and 4) dependence on the requisites (paccaya-sannissita). The restraint according to the Monastic Rules is meant for observance by the monastic disciples of the Buddha; hence it is not mentioned in this account of the purity of the Bodhisatta's morality.

Moral restraint is the eight precepts with right livelihood as the eighth (ājīvaṭṭhamaka-sīla). These are restraint from taking life; restraint from stealing, or taking things not given in deed or in word by the owner; restraint from sexual misconduct, or restraint from improper sexual acts whether major or minor; restraint from telling lies; restraint from slanderous talks; restraint from using harsh and abusive language; restraint from frivolous and unbeneficial talk; restraint from wrong livelihood. With the observance of these precepts, the Bodhisatta also accomplished the observance of the purity of livelihood (ājīva-pārisuddhi-sīla).

Secure restraint of the six doors of the senses (indriya-saṃvara-sīla). Unlike ordinary worldlings, the Buddha required no special effort to develop a new restraint of the six doors of the senses since restraint of the senses was, for him, already an innate and accomplished fact.

It was also not necessary for him to especially exert himself for observance of moral conduct in respect of the requisites (paccaya-sannissita-sīla) to keep away the defilements which may arise because of the four requisites.

Even at the time when he was about to renounce the world, he had already discarded temporarily a number of unwholesome defilements headed by greed and craving. But the [328] latent tendencies (anusaya) are eradicated only by the Arahat path. This was the Bodhisatta's purity of morality (sīla-visuddhi).

2. Purity of mind (citta-visuddhi). The eight attainments of the absorptions and the five mundane super knowledges (abhiññā), acquired during his stay with the sect leaders Āḷāra and Udaka, had turned unclean and dim, as if stained with impurities, like unused large gold vessels through neglect of practice and development throughout his six years of austere striving (dukkara-cariyā). On the day he was to become a Buddha, he partook of the thick milk rice offered by lady Sujātā and spent the daytime in the Sāla forest. While he was staying there, he purified the eight attainments and the five super knowledges by developing them once again, like washing and cleaning the stained gold vessel. These eight attainments and five super knowledges constituted the Bodhisatta's purity of mind (citta-visuddhi).

3. Purity of views (diṭṭhi-visuddhi). Thereafter, the noble Bodhisatta proceeded to the high ground of the Mahā Bodhi tree in the evening and remained seated on the unconquered throne. He vanquished Devaputta Māra before sunset. In the first watch of the night, he developed the knowledge of past existences. He perceived well the phenomena of mind and matter (nāma-rūpa) and destroyed the 20 wrong beliefs in regard to personality (sakkāya-diṭṭhi). This was the Bodhisatta's purity of views (diṭṭhi-visuddhi).

4. Purity of overcoming doubts (kaṅkhā-vitarāṇa-visuddhi). Then in the middle watch of the night, he discerned sentient beings reaching different destinations according to their deeds, by means of the knowledge of analysing the deeds which cause rebirth (yathā-kammūpaga-ñāṇa) which had knowledge of the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu-ñāṇa) as its basis. On seeing them, he realised distinctly the law of productive deeds (kamma) and because of this realisation, he became free of doubts. This was the Bodhisatta's purity of overcoming doubts (kaṅkhā-vitarāṇa-visuddhi).

5. Purity of knowledge and insight into the right and wrong paths (maggāmagga-ñāṇa-dassana-visuddhi).<sup>139</sup> In the last watch of the night, the Bodhisatta dwelt on the twelve factors of the doctrine of dependent origination; and beginning with the contemplation of mind and body (kalāpa-sammasana) on the basis of the seven contemplations such as contemplation of impermanence (aniccānupassanā), suffering (dukkhānupassanā), non-self (anattānupassanā), he realised the knowledge of rise and fall (udayabbaya-ñāṇa) of all mental and material phenomena (nāma-rūpa). At that time, there arose in the Bodhisatta the defilements of insight (vipassanūpakilesa) such as illumination, etc. [329]

A yogi practising insight meditation, at a certain stage of advancement, contemplates again and again the rising and falling of all mental and physical phenomena and attains the initial stage of the knowledge of rise and fall (udayabbaya-ñāṇa). “At this stage, he generally beholds a supernormal light (obhāsa), feels a thrill of zest (pīti), calmness (passaddhi), determination (adhimokkha), great energy (paggaha), happiness (sukha), knowledge (ñāṇa), intensity of mindfulness (upatthāna), equanimity (upekkhā), and a mild desire for this state (nikanti).”<sup>140</sup> These states arising in a yogi at the stage of knowledge of rise and fall (udayabbaya-ñāṇa) in ten phases are termed the defilements of insight.

Bhikkhu Ñāṇamoli, in The Path of Purification translates it as “imperfections of insight” and enumerates them, ten in number, as follows: 1) illumination, 2) knowledge, 3) rapturous happiness, 4) tranquillity, 5) bliss, 6) resolution, 7) exertion, 8) assurance, 9) equanimity and 10) attachment. “The yogi, arriving at this stage, is liable to these defilements and his mind may be seized by ‘spiritual excitement’ or ‘agitation about higher states’ (dhamma-uddhacca). For example, he may, on having an illumination, feel that this constitutes path-experience and so inhibits his further progress through deceiving himself. When an illumination appears, the meditator thinks: ‘Never indeed has such illumination as this arisen in me before. Surely, I have reached the path; I have reached the fruition. Thus he takes what is not the path for the path, and what is not the fruition for the fruition. Through this mistake, the progress of insight (vipassanā) is checked; leaving the original subject of meditation, he lingers, delighting in the illumination.”<sup>141</sup>

The illumination of the Buddha, unlike that of others, was not confined to one spot, one area, or one portion of a region. The Bodhisatta, by means of the very sharp, penetrating aforesaid great adamantine insight knowledge, contemplated the aggregates of phenomena (dhammā) in his own mind continuum, as well as the mind continuum of the inestimable number of sentient beings throughout the three passages of time. In a summary manner, he reduced them into the twelve factors of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda); and again dividing these twelve factors into two groups of mind and matter (nāma-rūpa) when he contemplated them by means of the knowledge of rise and fall (udayabbaya-ñāṇa).

His energy was very strong, his mindfulness very steadfast, his mind very composed and so his insight wisdom was very sharp. His faith very strong, his physical and mental happiness and tranquillity were developing incessantly. The mental factors of specific neutrality (tatra-majjhatattā-cetasika) also called equanimity-insight (vipassanūpekkha), which views with even-mindedness all conditioned states, was also very strong.

The mind continuum of the Bodhisatta, thus supported and assisted by happiness (sukha) and tranquillity (passaddhi) was suffused with five kinds of zest: 1) Joy that makes the hairs stand on end (khuddaka-pīti); 2) the joy that occurs off and on like a flash of lightning (khaṇika-pīti); 3) the joy flooding the body and then receding like waves breaking the sea shore (okkantika-pīti); 4) the joy so strong as to transport one up into the air (ubbega-pīti); and 5) the joy that pervades the whole body, as soft cotton wool soaked in oil. His blood, heart and sense faculties were also very lucid.

Therefore, illumination from the Bodhisatta flooded the earth, the mass of air and the mass of water of the lower regions, and made them golden yellow. It then plunged into the boundless space below as well as in the upward direction to the highest abode of beings, Bhavagga, turning everything into golden yellow. The illumination then continued to penetrate further into the upper boundless space. It also light up the whole of the 10,000 world-element, and rapidly extended throughout the infinite world-elements.

When such defilements of insight appear, inexperienced meditators mistake them for the paths and fruitions. They abandon the original subject of meditation and dwell taking delight in defiling elements. When, however, these defilements of insight appeared in the mind continuum of the Bodhisatta, he reflected: “These are not the path which will lead to the path-knowledge of an Arahāt (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) and omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa), they merely defile insight. Only the knowledge of rise and fall in my original meditation forms the true path to the path-knowledge of an Arahāt and omniscience.” He did not allow his mind to hover over these defilements of insight and to become attached to them. Instead, he made it incline to the object of insight.

When thus the defiling elements of insight appeared in the Bodhisatta’s mind continuum, as in the case of others, he did not allow the subtle craving and greed, known as attraction (nikanti) that longed for those defiling elements to arise. He had lucid, extraordinary knowledge, which discerned clearly that this group of defiling elements was not the proper path to Awakening but just led to the defilement of insight. Only the knowledge of rise and fall and so on form the right path leading to Awakening. This was the Bodhisatta’s purity of knowledge and insight into the right and wrong path (maggāmagga-ñāṇa-dassana-visuddhi). [330]

6. Purity of knowledge and insight into the path (paṭipadā-ñāṇa-dassana-visuddhi).

7. Purity of knowledge and insight (ñāṇa-dassana-visuddhi).

The set of nine knowledges of insight (vipassanā-ñāṇa), beginning with the knowledge of rise and fall (udayabbaya-ñāṇa) and ending with the knowledge of conformity (anuloma-ñāṇa) which arose in the mind continuum of the Bodhisatta, is known as purity of knowledge and insight of the path. The four noble paths (ariya-magga) are known as the purity of knowledge and insight (ñāṇa-dassana-visuddhi).

7: The Attainment of Buddhahood – 397

The nine knowledges of insight are, according to the Path of Purification (Visuddhi-magga): 1) Knowledge of contemplation of rise and fall (udaya-vayānupassanā-ñāṇa), which is free from imperfection and steady on its course; 2) knowledge of the contemplation of dissolution (bhaṅgānupassanā-ñāṇa); 3) knowledge of appearance as terror (bhayānupassanā-ñāṇa); 4) knowledge of contemplation of danger (ādīnavānupassanā-ñāṇa); 5) knowledge of contemplation of dispassion (nibbidānupassanā-ñāṇa); 6) knowledge of desire for deliverance (muñcitukamyatā-ñāṇa); 7) knowledge of contemplation of reflection (paṭisaṅkhānupassanā-ñāṇa); 8) knowledge of equanimity about formations (saṅkhārupekkhā-ñāṇa); and 9) knowledge in conformity with truth (anuloma-ñāṇa).<sup>142</sup>

It should especially be noted that the Stream-entry path (Sotāpatti-magga) attained by the Buddha was the first absorption-path (jhāna-magga) with the five factors of initial application (vitakka), sustained application (vicāra), joy (pīti), happiness (sukha), and one-pointedness (ekaggatā). The Once-returning path (Sakadāgāmi-magga) was the second absorption-path with the three factors of joy, happiness, and one-pointedness. The Non-returning path (Anāgāmi-magga) was the third absorption-path with the two factors of happiness and one-pointedness. The Arahāt path (Arahatta-magga) was the fourth absorption-path with the two factors of equanimity (upekkhā) and one-pointedness.<sup>143</sup>

In this manner, the series of the seven purities, described above, constitute the right and proper way to Nibbāna. Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas and noble disciples of the past, present and future, realise Nibbāna only through the series of these seven purities; and, to say the least, so do the noble individuals who attain the noble path by developing at least the skin as the fifth (taca-pañcaka) meditation or by hearing a Dhamma discourse in verse delivered by a Buddha through the projection of his image while he remained behind at the monastery. They attain the noble path (ariya-magga), going through these seven purities successively.

The skin as the fifth (taca-pañcaka) meditation is meditation on the first five features of the body with skin (taca) as the fifth, the other four being hair on the head (kesa), hair on the body (loma), nails (nakha) and teeth (dantā). It is part of the mindfulness meditation of the body (kayagatāsati bhāvanā).

A question may be raised thus: If all the Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas and disciples of the three passages of time realise Nibbāna only through the series of the seven purities, should not all these noble persons be alike in every respect? Why should there be such differences as: He was a Buddha, a Paccekabuddha, a chief disciple (agga-sāvaka), a great disciple (mahā-sāvaka), an ordinary disciple (pakati-sāvaka)?

The answer is: Although Nibbāna is realised by all the Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas and noble disciples only through the series of the seven purities, they are originally different in wisdom (paññā), in practice (paṭipadā), in faith (saddhā) and in inherent disposition (ajjhāsaya-dhātu).

Therefore, the noble individuals who realise the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala) through knowledge acquired by hearing the Dhamma from others (suta-maya-ñāṇa), after having developed the perfections (pāramī) according to the strength of his faith (saddhā) and wisdom (paññā) throughout a period of around 100,000 aeons are designated ordinary disciples (pakati-sāvaka) and great disciples (mahā-sāvaka).

The noble individuals who realise the Arahata fruition through knowledge based on hearing (suta-maya-ñāṇa) after having developed the perfections throughout one immeasurable period and 100,000 aeons, or slightly less, are designated chief disciples (agga-sāvaka).

The noble individuals who realise the Arahata fruition through knowledge independently acquired, without being taught by others (sayambhū-ñāṇa), but after having developed [331] the perfections throughout a period of two immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons but are incapable of teaching others the Dhamma which will enable them to attain the paths (magga), fruitions (phala) and Nibbāna, are designated Paccekabuddhas.

The noble, peerless individuals, who after valiantly fulfilling their perfections for the minimum period of four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons and performing the five great acts of abandoning, which are not the concern of Paccekabodhisattas and Sāvakabodhisattas, attain the Arahata fruition with omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) without being taught by others (sayambhū-ñāṇa).

Superbly skilled in the use of words, they give Dhamma discourses with four profundities: the profundity of the deep and subtle text, the profundity of meaning, the profundity of the teaching, and the profundity of penetrating wisdom. They do so in many ways to suit the inherent dispositions of sentient beings. They are able to convey all teachable beings (veneyya) to the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna and thus become their refuge. They are designated Perfectly Self-Awakened Ones, omniscient Buddhas, lords of the three worlds. Since our noble Bodhisatta was also of such a nature, he too is a Perfectly Self-Awakened One, Lord of the Three Worlds, and an incomparable Buddha.

Many Miracles

When the Bodhisatta attained omniscience and became a Buddha in the three worlds of beings at daybreak, he thereby caused all the 10,000 world-element to vibrate and resound, and reached the height of beauty with such decorations as follow: The colours of cylindrical streamers set up on the edge of the universe in the east reached the edge of the universe in the west; and the coloured cylindrical streamers set up on the edge of the universe in the west also reached the edge of the universe in the east. Similarly, the coloured cylindrical streamers set up on the edge of the universe in the south reached the edge of the universe in the north; and the coloured cylindrical streamers set up on the edge of the universe in the north reached the edge of the universe in the south. The coloured cylindrical streamers set up on the surface of the earth reached the Brahma world; and the coloured cylindrical streamers set up in the Brahma world reached the surface of the earth.

All kinds of flowering trees in the 10,000 world-element blossomed simultaneously, irrespective of the season. All kinds of fruit-bearing trees also bore fruit in bunches and clusters simultaneously, irrespective of the season. Flowers also blossomed strangely on the trunks, branches and creepers. Flowers dangled from invisible plants in the sky. Lotus flowers on leafless stems bloomed strangely, each in seven layers, coming out and breaking through big slabs of rock which formed the lower stratum of the earth. This being the case, the 10,000 world-element of the realm of birth of a Bodhisatta (jāti-khetta), quaked gently at that moment and looked like huge spheres of flowers flown up or like well-arranged flower-beds. Besides these miracles, the 32 great omens, described in the chapter on the birth of the Bodhisatta, also made themselves manifest.

The Exalted Utterance

The Bodhisatta, who had thus attained omniscience and became endowed with all the attributes and glories of Buddhahood, reflected thus: “I have been emancipated indeed from the enormous suffering of Saṃsāra. I have achieved indeed the most exalted state of a Perfectly Self-Awakened One, a teacher of the three worlds. I have achieved indeed a great victory. I am one who can liberate all sentient beings from the fetters of the three worlds by teaching the Dhamma.”

When he thus reflected, there arose in the mind continuum of the Buddha exulting joy (pīti). With the tempo of the joy thus appearing, the Buddha uttered forth, as was the established practice with all the omniscient Buddhas after achieving Buddhahood, the following two verses of intense joy (Dhp 153-4):

Aneka-jāti-saṃsāraṃ, sandhāvissaṃ anibbisam, gahakāraṃ gavesanto, dukkhā jāti punappunam.

Unable to cut off the root of repeated existences in Saṃsāra, taking conception in four ways: egg-born, womb-born, moisture-born and spontaneously-born, is a great misery, for a body from rebirth is followed and oppressed inexorably by ageing, sickness and death, it is no happiness at all but toilsome and distressing. Therefore, as a Bodhisatta, searching the diligent builder of this house of the aggregates (khandha), and not finding him because I had then not yet acquired the great omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) which discerns clearly the real culprit, namely, craving, the carpenter, as the cause of suffering (dukkha), I had to wander restlessly, revolving with the wheel of Saṃsāra although I had no liking for, and was in constant fear of, the generator of suffering, comprising the five aggregates.

Gaha-kāraka diṭṭhosi, puna gehaṃ na kāhasi, sabbā te phāsukā bhaggā, gaha-kūṭaṃ visaṅkhataṃ, visaṅkhāra-gataṃ cittaṃ, taṇhānaṃ khayam-ajjhagā.

You! Craving, the carpenter, the wicked cause of suffering, diligently building up the house of the five aggregates which are enmeshed in suffering! Now, having become a Buddha and being endowed with omniscience, I clearly discern you, craving, the house builder! You shall not build again the house of the five aggregates intertwined with suffering, because your legs, your hands and your life have been cut off four times with the axe of the path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa) and you are like an uprooted stump. All the rafters of the defilements firmly fixed in the decorated house of the aggregates have now been broken to pieces without leaving even a slight trace of past tendencies and inherent inclinations. Ignorance (avijjā), the king of the house, which keeps the four truths and Nibbāna hidden from view and which keeps them far, far away has been pulverised. My mind, which is free from the dirt-like defilements, has reached Nibbāna, the palace of peace, out of the scope of the conditioned (saṅkhāra) and all suffering of Saṃsāra. I, the supreme Buddha of the three worlds, have realised the fourth (Arahatta) path and fruit, the extinction of the 108 forms of craving to the delight and encomium of the Devas and Brahmas of the 10,000 world-element.

The 108 forms of craving (taṇhā) are the chief root of suffering and the cause of the ever-continuing cycle of rebirths. They are synonymous with greed (lobha or rāga). It is of three aspects: sensual craving (kāma-taṇhā); craving for rebirth, especially in higher realms (bhava-taṇhā); craving for annihilation of the self (vibhava-taṇhā).

Corresponding to the six sense objects, each of these aspects of craving multiplies into six forms of craving, viz. craving for visible objects (rūpa-taṇhā), for sounds (sadda-taṇhā), odours (gandha-taṇhā), tastes (rasa-taṇhā), bodily impressions (phoṭṭhabbha-taṇhā), mental impressions (dhamma-taṇhā), thus totalling eighteen forms of craving.

Again, taking into consideration the three periods of time, as present, past and future, which apply to each of these eighteen forms of craving, one can distinguish 54 different forms of craving. Finally, these 54 forms of craving can arise in the mind continuum of one's own or of others; thus 108 forms of craving are enumerable in all.

There are two kinds of exalted utterance (udāna): that which is uttered only mentally (manasā-udāna) and which is uttered verbally (vacasā-udāna). The exalted utterance beginning with Aneka-jāti-saṃsāraṃ, “unable to cut off the root of repeated existences in Saṃsāra,” etc., was recited by the Buddha only mentally and thus should be deemed as uttered mentally (manasā-udāna). The exalted utterances in the Udāna text beginning with (Ud 1.1): Yadā have pātu bhavanti dhammā, “when the nature of things becomes really manifest,” etc., were uttered verbally by the Buddha. So the exalted utterances in the Udāna text should be regarded as uttered verbally (vacasā-udāna).

7: The Attainment of Buddhahood – 402

The categories of Dhamma mentioned in this chapter on his becoming a Buddha, namely, dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda), the fourfold analytical knowledges (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa), the sixfold unique knowledges (asādhāraṇa-ñāṇa), [333] the ten strengths (dasa-bala-ñāṇa), the fourteenfold Buddha knowledges (cuddasa-buddha-ñāṇa), the eighteen special qualities (āveṇika-guṇa) and the fourfold valorous wisdom (vesārajja-ñāṇa) will be described later, neither too briefly nor too elaborately, in the chapter on the Dhamma Jewel. [334]

The Buddha Treasure

8: The Buddha's Stay at the Seven Places

1. The Week on the Unconquered Throne

After becoming a Buddha in this way, as the first waning day of the month of May (Vesākha) newly broke, the Buddha breathed forth an exalted utterance (udāna), and while sitting cross-legged on the unconquered (aparājita) throne, he conceived an idea thus: “In order to win this unconquered throne, I have moved from one birth to another over four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, fulfilling the ten perfections several times in a unique manner.

For four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, in order to possess this unconquered throne, many a time have I cut off and given away my ornamented head; many a time have I taken out and given away my two eyes and my heart; many a time have I given away my son such as Jāli, my daughter such as Kaṇhājinā and wife such as Maddī to those who asked for them as slaves. This is the throne on which I have completely overcome the fivefold Māra. It is also a highly auspicious and glorious seat. While remaining on this seat, all my wishes, including the one to become a Buddha, have been fulfilled. I will not get up yet from this throne to which I owe so much.”

Thus the Buddha spent seven days on the throne engaged in the fourth absorption (jhāna) that led up to the fruition of Arahantship, the attainments of which numbered more than 1,000 billion.

Engaging thus in the absorption for the whole first waning day of the month of May (Vesākha), the Buddha enjoyed the bliss of emancipation (vimutti) or Awakening. During the first watch of the night of the first waning May (Vesākha) moon, he contemplated the doctrine of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) thus: Avijjā-paccayā saṅkhārā, “because of ignorance (avijjā), the three kinds of volitions (saṅkhāra), namely, wholesome volitions (puññābhisāṅkhāra), unwholesome volitions (apuññābhisāṅkhāra) and imperturbable volitions (āneñjābhisāṅkhāra) arise.”

Beginning in this way, the Buddha went on contemplating in forward order the process in which the round of suffering arose. Again he contemplated: Avijjāya tveva asesa-virāga-nirodho saṅkhāra-nirodho, “because of the complete cessation of ignorance by not arising through the path of Awakening, the three kinds of volitions: wholesome, unwholesome and imperturbable, cease by not arising.” Beginning thus, the Buddha went on contemplating in backward order the process in which the round of suffering ceased.

Here it should be particularly noted that, though the Buddha had clearly understood all the doctrines, he contemplated only the doctrine of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) both in forward and backward orders because, when he took up insight meditation, he did so by initially reflecting on this doctrine and also because this doctrine is very subtle, deep and hard to discern.

When the Buddha repeatedly reflected on this Doctrine in both forward and backward order, he understood more and more clearly, the process of the arising of suffering in Saṃsāra in forward order that, on account of the causes, such as ignorance, there arose volitions and so on. In like manner, the Buddha also understood the process of the cessation of suffering in backward order, that because of the cessation of ignorance, and so on, there ceased volitions, and so on. This led to the continuous appearance in the Buddha of a series of such mental impulsions that were unprompted and joined with knowledge and happiness (somanassa-sahagata-ñāṇa-sampayutta-asaṅkhārika-javana) preceded by joy (pīti) in the heart.

When a vessel is filled with butter or oil up to its brim, the surplus will overflow; similarly, when the vessel of the Buddha's heart was filled with the oil of rapture preceded [335] by the increasingly distinct knowledge of the Dhamma, the Buddha uttered an exalted utterance (Ud. 1.1) as though it overflowed his heart:

*Yadā have pātu-bhavanti dhammā,
ātāpino jhāyato brāhmaṇassa;
athassa kaṅkhā vapayanti sabbā,
yato pajānāti sahetu-dhammaṃ.*

When the 37 constituents of Awakening (Bodhi-pakkhiya-dhamma) appear vividly in the mental continuum of an Arahat, who has rid himself of all that is evil, who is endowed with the right exertion to burn up the 1,500 defilements, whose meditation is steadfast and keen to the extent of reaching the path of the absorptions (appanā-jhāna), by reflecting on the characteristics of impermanence, suffering and non-substantiality of various tranquillity (samatha) objects such as breathing-out and breathing-in and of both the material and mental aggregates; then on account of the vivid appearance of the 37 constituents of Awakening, he thoroughly knows the aggregate of suffering comprising ignorance as the causes, and volitions as the effects. On discerning clearly this doctrine of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda), all the doubts regarding the doctrine, or all the sixteen doubts regarding mind and matter, that would occur in the three phases of time: past, present and future, owing to ignorance of the doctrine of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) disappear in the mental continuum of that Arahāt just as dewdrops vanish with the onset of the heat of the sun.

In the middle watch of night, the Buddha contemplated dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) repeatedly in forward and backward orders throughout the watch. When he was contemplating, his knowledge of Nibbāna, the cessation of the cause, became clearer and clearer. This led to the continuous appearance in the Buddha of a series of such mental impulses that were unprompted and joined with knowledge and happiness preceded by wisdom and rapture. Since he was unable to control that rapture, again he uttered another exalted utterance (Ud. 1.2) on account of that rapture preceded by wisdom as though the rapture spilled over:

*Yadā have pātu-bhavanti dhammā,
ātāpino jhāyato brāhmaṇassa,
athassa kaṅkhā vapayanti sabbā,
yato khayaṃ paccayānaṃ avedī.*

When the 37 constituents of Awakening appear vividly in the mental continuum of an Arahāt, who has rid himself of all that is evil, who is endowed with right exertion to burn up 1,500 defilements, whose meditation is steadfast and keen to the extent of reaching the path of the absorptions, by reflecting on the characteristics of impermanence, suffering and non-substantiality of various tranquillity objects such as breathing-out and breathing-in and of both the material and mental aggregates; then, on account of this vivid appearance of the 37 constituents of Awakening, he penetrated the unconditioned Nibbāna, the cessation of all the causes such as ignorance, volitions, etc. On discerning clearly the unconditioned ultimate Nibbāna called the destruction of causes (paccayakkhaya), all the doubts that would occur owing to ignorance of Nibbāna disappear in the mental continuum of that Arahāt, just as dewdrops vanish with the onset of the heat of the sun.

In the last watch of the night, the Buddha contemplated the doctrine of dependent origination repeatedly in forward and backward orders throughout the watch. When he was thus contemplating, his knowledge of the noble path that sees thoroughly the incessant arising and cessation of the cycle of suffering became clearer and clearer. [336]

This led to the continuous appearance in the Buddha of a series of such mental impulses that were unprompted and joined with knowledge and happiness preceded by wisdom and rapture. Since he was unable to contain that rapture, still again he uttered a third exalted utterance (Ud. 1.3) on account of that rapture preceded by wisdom, as though the rapture spilled over:

*Yadā have pātu-bhavanti dhammā,
ātāpino jhāyato brāhmaṇassa,
vidhūpayam tiṭṭhati Māra-senam, sūriyo va obhāsayam-antalikkham.*

When the 37 constituents of Awakening appear vividly in the mental continuum of an Arahāt, who has rid himself of all that is evil, who is endowed with right exertion to burn up 1,500 defilements, whose meditation is steadfast and keen to the extent of reaching the path of the absorptions, by reflecting on the characteristics of impermanence, suffering and non-substantiality of various tranquillity objects such as breathing-out and breathing-in, and of both the material and mental aggregates; then, just as the sun that rises and stands on the top of Mount Yugandhara, illuminating the whole vault of heaven with its own light, even so that Arahāt by means of the 37 constituents of Awakening crushes the ten Māra armies, such as sensuality, aversion, etc., and remains in the brilliance of the torch of his wisdom resembling the sun.

In the exalted utterance (udāna) it is stated that during the first watch of the night, the doctrine of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) was reflected on in forward order; during the middle watch it was reflected on in backward order, and during the last watch it was reflected in both forward and backward orders. This statement refers to the Buddha's reflection on the seventh night that completed his week-long stay on the unconquered throne.

After reflecting on the doctrine of dependent origination in forward and backward orders throughout the three watches of the night of the first waxing moon of May (Vesākha), the Buddha uttered the aforesaid three exalted utterances; on the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh days too, he remained on that unconquered throne, enjoying the bliss of being an Arahāt.

2. The Week of the Unblinking Gaze

The seven days during which the Buddha was gazing steadfastly at the Mahā Bodhi tree and the undefeated (aparājita) throne without closing his eyes are known as the seven days without blinking (animisa-sattāha).

After becoming a Buddha and enjoying the bliss of being an Arahāt, and without changing his cross-legged position throughout the whole sitting, the Buddha remained on the unconquered throne for seven days. In the mental continuum of some ordinary Devas and Brahmas, partially because they had the experience of attaining the paths and fruitions in the time of former Buddhas, doubts arose as they wondered: “The Buddha has not yet got up from the throne even up till now. Apart from the attributes he has already, are there still other attributes that would enable him to attain Buddhahood?”

Then on the eighth day, the eighth waning moon, the Buddha got up from his enjoyment of Awakening. Knowing about the doubts of the Devas and Brahmas, he rose up into the sky and performed the twin miracle of water and fire in order to eradicate their doubts.

The twin miracle displayed here at the Mahā Bodhi tree, at the congregation of his relatives in the city of Kapilavatthu, and at the gathering formed because of the heretic Pāthikaputta in the city of Vesālī, were the same as that performed near the mango tree of Kaṇḍamba. The detailed description of the last will be described later in chapter 24: The 6th Rains Retreat (Miracles).

Having removed the doubts entertained by the Devas and Brahmas by performing the twin miracle of water and fire, the Buddha descended from the sky and stood erect like a golden-post on the spot to the north-east of the unconquered throne, pondering: “I have indeed attained omniscience.” He spent [337] seven days without closing his eyes but gazing at the throne and the Mahā Bodhi tree where he had attained the path-knowledge of an Arahāt (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) and omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) as a result of the perfections fulfilled by him throughout the period of four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons. That spot is known as the Unblinking Shrine (Animisa-cetiya).

3. The Week on the Walkway

In the third week, the Buddha spent seven days walking up and down on the jewel walkway created by Devas and Brahmas and stretching from east to west between the unconquered throne and the Unblinking Shrine, while at the same time he was reflecting on the Dhamma and was absorbed in fruition attainment (phala-samāpatti). That place is called the Jewelled Walkway (Ratana-caṅkama-cetiya).

4. The Week at the Treasure House

In the fourth week, the Buddha reflected on the supreme doctrine of the Abhidhamma while sitting cross-legged in the Treasure House (Ratana-ghara), created by Devas and Brahmas, at the north-west corner of the Mahā Bodhi tree.

According to the sub-commentary on the Ornaments of the Victor (Jinālaṅkāra), when the Buddha sat cross-legged in the Treasure House and reflected on the Dhamma, as well as surveying the beings worthy of teaching, he discerned perfectly the course of practice composed of morality, concentration and wisdom (sīla-samādhi-paññā). He saw that humans, Devas and Brahmas would attain the noble state of the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna by establishing themselves in morality (sīla), by concentrating their minds (samādhi) and by putting efforts in their attempts at wisdom (paññā). Therefore the Buddha reflected first on the Basket of Discipline (Vinaya-piṭaka) which teaches morality, then on the Basket of Doctrine (Sutta-piṭaka) which teaches concentration and lastly on the Basket of the Abstract Teaching (Abhidhamma-piṭaka) which teaches wisdom.

When he reflected on the Basket of the Abstract Teaching, he tackled first the six lower treatises of the Enumeration of Phenomena (Dhamma-saṅgaṇī), the Analyses (Vibhaṅga), the Discussion about Elements (Dhātu-kathā), the Designation of Persons (Puggala-paññatti), the Debates (Kathā-vatthu) and the Pairs (Yamaka), but there occurred no radiance at that time because his omniscience was comparatively vast and the doctrinal methods in those treatises are comparatively limited. But when he contemplated the seventh treatise of the all-embracing Causal Relations (Paṭṭhāna) with an unlimited number of methods (ananta-naya-samanta), his omniscience found the opportunity to display its extensive brilliance, just as the giant fish, Timiᅅgala, which was 1,000 leagues in size, only got a chance to play about when in the great ocean.

As the Buddha applied his mind to the most subtle and profound points in the all-embracing Causal Relations (Paᅇᅇhāna) with an unlimited number of methods, there arose in his mental continuum great rapture. Because of this rapture, his blood became clearer; because of the clearer blood, his skin became cleaner; because of the cleaner skin, the radiance of the size of a house or a mountain radiated from the front part of his body and spread out, shooting through the countless world-elements in the east, just like Chaddanta, the king of elephants, flew across the sky.

In the same way, the radiance appeared from the rear part of the Buddha and rushed to the countless world-elements in the west; the radiance appeared from the Buddha's right side and rushed to the countless world-elements in the south; the radiance appeared from the left side and rushed to the countless world-elements in the north; and from the soles of the feet the coral-coloured radiance appeared, plunging into the space below after penetrating the mass of earth, the mass of water, and the mass of air, just as a sapphire-studded chain was made to turn round and round; balls of blue radiance arose one after another from his head, reaching the space above, after passing through the six Deva abodes and 20 Brahma abodes of the sense spheres (kāᅇāvacara). At that time, countless beings in the countless world-elements shone with a golden radiance.

The radiance emanating from the body of the Buddha, on the day he contemplated the doctrine of the Causal Relations (Paᅇᅇhāna), is still moving towards the countless world-elements even today as a continuous chain of temperature-conditioned [338] matter (utuja-rūpa).

Verses on the Six Rays

In this connection, the verses eulogizing the six radiances of the Buddha and their translations written by Mahāvisuddhārāma Sayādaw will be reproduced here for the benefit of those seeking knowledge (suta-kāᅇī).

Satta-sattāha-majjham-pi, Nātho yo sattā sammasi, patvā samanta-Paᅇᅇhānaᅇ, okāsaᅇ labhate tadā.

The noble Buddha, lord of the three types of beings, reflected on the seven books of the Abstract Teaching (Abhidhamma), namely, the Enumeration of Phenonema (Dhamma-saṅgaṇī), the Analyses (Vibhaṅga), the Discussion about Elements (Dhātu-kathā), the Designation of Persons (Puggala-paññatti), the Debates (Kathā-vatthu), the Pairs (Yamaka) and the Causal Relations (Paṭṭhāna), while staying in the Ratanaghara in the middle of the seven weeks or during the middle seven days of the 49 days he spent on the throne (pallaṅka-sattāha), one week each at the unblinking gaze (animisa-sattāha), the walkway (caṅkama-sattāha), the jewelled house (ratana-ghara-sattāha), the Ajapāla (Ajapāla-sattāha), the Mucalinda (Mucalinda-sattāha) and the Royal Tree (Rājāyatana-sattāha). He reflected by means of his omniscience that is incomparably deep, subtle and powerful owing to the variety of glorious perfections which were fulfilled aeons after aeons. Then by applying his wisdom, he reached the all-embracing Causal Relations (Paṭṭhāna) which, with its various new methods, is even larger and deeper than the ocean which is 84,000 leagues in size and surrounded by the range of rocky mountains. Having reached the Causal Relations thus, his omniscience, that is incomparably deep, subtle and powerful owing to the variety of glorious perfections, which were fulfilled aeons after aeons, has an opportunity to display its brilliance.

Yojanānaṃ satāyāmo pañca Timira-piṅgalo, kiḷokāsam samuddeva gambhīre labhate yathā.

To give an illustration for the purpose of comparison: The gigantic fish named Timirapiṅgala, 500 leagues long, gets the chance to swim and play, flapping his tail, only in the ocean, 80,000 leagues in depth and fringed by mountains. Similarly, the Buddha's omniscience, uniquely profound, subtle and powerful owing to the variety of glorious perfections, which were fulfilled through successive aeons, had the occasion to display its brilliance only when reflecting on the Causal Relations (Paṭṭhāna).

*Samma-santassa taṃ<sup>144</sup> tadā Satthu sarīrato,

When he had the occasion to display the radiance of six colours from his body of eighteen cubits height of the blue, gold, white, red, pink and glittering colours, all these assorted colours spread overwhelmingly to all places: left and right, front and rear, above and below, because of the clear and shining state of his blood and so on, which arose while reflecting on the doctrine of the Causal Relations (Paṭṭhāna) which was subtle like atomic particles. He is the Teacher who poured out his words of advice from his cheerful, golden heart to those of the three worlds of humans, Devas, and Brahmas. [339]

Nīlāyo nīlaṭṭhānehi pītodātā ca lohitā, tamhā tamhā tu mājeṭṭhā nikkhamimsu pabhassarā.

From the blue-black parts of the Buddha's physical body, such as the hair and the pupil of the eye, emanated a blue-black radiance about the size of a house or a mountain. Shining brightly, the radiance – that was somewhat greyish, somewhat bluish and somewhat greenish like butterfly-peas, blue lotus and blue collyrium – making the whole sky and the earth blue, or like blue fans of rubies and cloths that were swinging gently and smoothly, has been spreading since the day the Buddha reflected on the Causal Relations (Paṭṭhāna) up till now.

From the yellow and golden parts of the Buddha's person such as the skin, emanated the yellow and golden radiance about the size of a house or a mountain. Shining brightly, the radiance, that covered the ten directions, making them all yellow like cloth of gold sprinkled with liquid gold and spread out and placed in the vicinity, or like powders of saffron and realgar and golden Kaṇikāra flowers filling up the sky, has been spreading since the day the Buddha reflected on the Causal Relations (Paṭṭhāna) up till now.

From the white parts of his body, such as the bones, the teeth and the white portions of the eyes, emanated the white radiance about the size of a house or a mountain. Shining brightly, the radiance, that is like a stream of milk poured from a silver jar, or like a silver canopy completely covering the sky, or like silver fans swinging gently and smoothly from the high clouds in the sky, or like silvery jasmine, Maghya, white lotus, jasmine (sumana) and Muggara mixed together, has been spreading since the day the Buddha reflected on the Causal Relations (Paṭṭhāna) up till now.

From the red parts of his body, such as the eyes, the flesh and the blood, emanated the red radiance about the size of a house or a mountain.

Shining brightly, the red radiance, that is like the powder of red-lead, molten lac, China Rose, the flower of the noon flower (bandhu-jīvaka), the flower of the Indian coral tree (pārijāta), making the surface of land and water and the whole sky red, has been spreading since the day the Buddha reflected on the Causal Relations (Paṭṭhāna) up till now.

Besides, from the various unascertainable spots of the Buddha's body emanated the radiance of light and dark colours (mañjeṭṭha) resulting from a mixture of black, red and blue and the radiance of sparkling, flaming and glittering hues (pabhassara) about the size of a house or a mountain. Shining brightly, the radiance, like the lighting in the sky during the month of May (Vesākha) or like the skin of playful insects, or sparks of a blazing fire, has been spreading since the day the Buddha reflected on the Causal Relations (Paṭṭhāna) up till now.

*Evam chabbaṇṇa-ramsiyo etā yāvajja-vāsarā
sabbā disā vidhāvanti pabhā nassanti tatthikā.*

Thus the six radiances of blue, gold, white, red, pink and glittering colours shine in the directions of all ten quarters at the same time as the Buddha's teaching still shines forth. The radiance of the body and the glory of those Devas and Brahmas, that happened to be at the wish-fulfilling trees (kappa-rukka), gardens and mansions which were along the course of the Buddha's six radiances and which could illuminate the entire 10,000 world-element, only by means of their ten fingers, disappeared as they were not capable of outshining the radiance from the Buddha. [340]

Iti chabbaṇṇaram sittā Aṅgīraso ti nāmaso, loke patthaṭa-guṇam taṃ vande Buddhaṃ namassiyaṃ.

To the Buddha, lord of the world, who has earned the name Aṅgīrasa because he possessed the radiance of six colours in the aforesaid manner, who is endowed with a good reputation spreading throughout the three worlds, who is worthy of the honour done to him by the whole world, who knows the four noble truths thoroughly as though they were written on the palm of his hands, like a lively ruby, the so-called 'I,' whose body on contemplation is found to be composed of 32 portions of a dirty, disgusting nature, that 'I' pays homage repeatedly in full faith with my head bowing, recalling the time when the Lord was still alive.

The Causal Relations (Paṭṭhāna) teaching has an unlimited number of methods, like the sky; it is extensive, like the mass of the earth; it is deep, like the mass of water in the ocean. And yet its survey by the Buddha was completed within seven days because omniscience is vast and quick in its application. The place where the Buddha contemplated this Dhamma Treasure for seven days came to be known as the Treasure House (Ratana-ghara-cetiya).

5. The Week at the Ajapāla Banyan Tree

After spending the four weeks, or 28 days, near the Mahā Bodhi tree, in the fifth week, the Buddha proceeded to the foot of the Ajapāla banyan tree, situated to the east of the Mahā Bodhi tree and stayed for seven full days at the foot of this tree reflecting on the Dhamma and absorbed in fruition attainment (phala-samāpatti).

The banyan tree was so-called because it was there that goatherders (ajapāla) gathered together; therefore, it is the banyan tree where the goatherds took shelter (ajapāla-nigrodha).

At that time, a Brahmin of unknown clan and name, one seemingly violent and haughty by nature, approached the Buddha and had a pleasant and joyful conversation with him. Having finished the pleasant and joyful conversation, which was worthy of lifelong remembrance, the haughty Brahmin stood at a suitable distance and asked the Buddha: “Venerable Gotama, what virtues make a true Brāhmaṇa in this world? What does it take to become a noble one?”

The haughty Brahmin could not penetrate the four truths even if the Buddha made him a disciple and taught him. Those who heard the Buddha's utterance of Dhamma verses prior to his teaching of the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse would get benefit only as an impression on the mind, like the taking of the refuges by the merchant brothers, Tapussa and Bhallika, who would never realize the paths and fruitions through the penetration of the four truths. Such is a natural law (dhammatā) according to the Light on the Essence of Meaning (Sārattha-dīpanī). Since the haughty Brahmin could not absorb the Dhamma as he was not a person capable of discerning the four truths, the Buddha did not make him a disciple. But being aware of the meaning of the Brahmin's question, the Buddha breathed forth this exalted utterance (Ud. 1.4):

Yo brāhmaṇo bāhita-pāpa-dhammo, nihuṃhuṅko nikkasāvo yatatto,

vedantagū vūsita-brahma-cariyo, dhammena so Brahma-vādaṃ vadeyya, yassussadā natthi kuhiñci loke.

An Arahāt, called a Brahmin, is he who has rid himself of all that is evil. He is free from violence and haughtiness; he is free from the stains of defilements; he is intent on developing meditation, or he has a heart restrained with morality; or he has reached Nibbāna, the true cessation of the conditions, by realising it through the fourfold path-knowledges (magga-ñāṇa); or he has reached the stage of the Arahāt fruition (Arahatta-phala), the climax of the fourfold path-knowledges. [341]

He has accomplished the noble practice of the path which leads to Nibbāna. In this world, where things rise and fall, there is absolutely nothing of the five evil prominences (ussada) in any of his sense objects, namely, the prominences of passion (rāgussada), hate (dosussada), delusion (mohussada), conceit (mānussada) and wrong view (diṭṭhussada). That Arahāt, who is called a Brahmin, should fearlessly declare, properly and correctly: “I am indeed a true Brahmin!”

What is meant here is this: A Brahmin is one who is endowed with the seven virtues, namely, he is: 1) Rid of evils; 2) free from violence and haughtiness; 3) free from the stains of defilements; 4) he has restraint of heart through morality; 5) he has realization of Nibbāna; 6) he has completed the noble practice of the path; and 7) he has the non-occurrence of the five evil prominences (ussada).

Māra's Concession of Defeat

Māra had been following the Buddha for seven years to get a chance of finding fault with him, but had not come across the slightest opportunity to do so. He therefore approached the Buddha who was still at the foot of Ajapāla Banyan tree and said in verse: “Ascetic Gotama, are you brooding here in this forest because you are overwhelmed by grief? Have you incurred loss of property worth hundreds and thousands? Or, are you brooding here because you want to have property worth hundreds and thousands? Or, are you brooding here, in this forest, because you have committed a serious wrong deed in a village or a town and do not dare to face others? Why do you not make friends with the people? You have absolutely no friendship with anybody!”

The Buddha replied: “Māra, I have uprooted and destroyed all the causes of grief. I have not even an iota of evil. Being completely free from worry, I remain absorbed in two absorptions. I have cut off desire for existence (bhava-taṇhā). I have no attachment whatever. I remain blissful in the two forms of absorption.”

Māra: “Ascetic Gotama, in this world, some men and some recluses are attached to their objects, such as gold and silver, etc., and their requisites, such as robes and bowl, etc., saying: “This is mine.” If your mind is attached, like these men and recluses, to that gold and silver, etc., and to that robe and bowl, etc., you will never escape from my domain in the three existences.”

Buddha: “Māra, I have no attachment at all to the objects, such as gold and silver, etc., nor to the requisites, such as robes and bowl, etc., saying: “This is mine.” Unlike others, I am not one who says: “This is mine.” Māra, take me as such a one! Since I have abandoned the three existences, you will never see my path in your domains, such as the three existences (bhava), the four ways of rebirth (yoni), the five courses (gati), the seven consciousness states (viññāṇa-ṭhiti), and the nine abodes of sentient beings (sattāvāsa).”

Māra: “Ascetic Gotama, if you know the good, secure path leading to Nibbāna, go alone. Why do you want to teach others and convert them?” [342]

Buddha: “Māra, however much you try to hinder me, I shall keep teaching them the noble path leading to Nibbāna, if I am asked about the good path and Nibbāna, which is free from death, by humans, Devas and Brahmas, who are desirous of reaching Nibbāna, the other shore of existence.”

When this was said, Māra, being at his wit's end, like a crab whose thumb had been broken by village children, uttered the two following verses to concede his defeat (SN 4.34):

Meda-vaṇṇañ-ca pāsāṇaṃ, vāyaso anupariyagā, apettha muduṃ vindema, api assādanā siyā.

Buddha, Gotama by name, a descendent of the great elected monarch Mahā Sammata! A simile says that a starving foolish crow jumped about in the eight directions, encircling a stone that has the semblance of a lump of fat and tearing it apart by piercing it with its beak, for he thought that he would get a soft piece of fat together with some flesh out of it and that its taste would be really delicious and pervade his whole body.

Aladdhā tattha assādam, vāyasetto apakkame, kāko va selam-āsajja, nibbijjāpema Gotama.

Failing to get the delicious taste from that stone, the foolish crow left it. Like that foolish crow, having failed to relish the slightest taste, though it had tried to tear apart the stone resembling a lump of fat, and departed from it, we give up, feeling sad and despondent almost to the point of heartbreak, being unable to accomplish anything desired after annoying, offending and deterring you, Lord.

Thereafter Māra mused thus: “Though I have all along followed the Buddha to find fault with him, yet I could not find even the slightest amount of wrongdoing which is worthy of blame. Now, this Prince Siddhattha has escaped from my domain in the three worlds.” Thus he brooded and was so dejected that he sat, squatting alone on the main road not far from the Buddha and scratched sixteen lines on the ground pondering over sixteen events. The sixteen lines meant:

1. “Unlike this Prince Siddhattha, I have not fulfilled the perfection of generosity in my former existences. On this account, I cannot be the equal of the prince.” With this thought Māra drew the first line.
2. “Unlike this Prince Siddhattha, I have not fulfilled the perfection of morality in my former existences. On this account, I cannot be the equal of the prince.” With this thought Māra drew the second line.
3. “Unlike this Prince Siddhattha, I have not fulfilled the perfection of renunciation in my former existences. On this account, I cannot be the equal of the prince.” With this thought Māra drew the third line.
4. “Unlike this Prince Siddhattha, I have not fulfilled the perfection of wisdom in my former existences. On this account, I cannot be the equal of the prince.” With this thought Māra drew the fourth line.
5. “Unlike this Prince Siddhattha, I have not fulfilled the perfection of energy in my former existences. On this account, I cannot be the equal of the prince.” With this thought Māra drew the fifth line.
6. “Unlike this Prince Siddhattha, I have not fulfilled the perfection of forbearance in my former existences. On this account, I cannot be the equal of the prince.” With this thought Māra drew the sixth line. [343]

7. “Unlike this Prince Siddhattha, I have not fulfilled the perfection of truthfulness in my former existences. On this account, I cannot be the equal of the prince.” With this thought Māra drew the seventh line.
8. “Unlike this Prince Siddhattha, I have not fulfilled the perfection of resolution in my former existences. On this account, I cannot be the equal of the prince.” With this thought Māra drew the eighth line.
9. “Unlike this Prince Siddhattha, I have not fulfilled the perfection of loving-kindness in my former existences. On this account, I cannot be the equal of the prince.” With this thought Māra drew the ninth line.
10. “Unlike this Prince Siddhattha, I have not fulfilled the perfection of equanimity in my former existences. On this account, I cannot be the equal of the prince.” With this thought Māra drew the tenth line.
11. “Unlike this Prince Siddhattha, I have not fulfilled the ten perfections in my former existences to acquire the knowledge of the thoughts and intentions of others (indriya-paro-pariyatti-ñāṇa), which is not common to others. On this account, I cannot be the equal of the prince.” With this thought Māra drew the 11th line.
12. “Unlike this Prince Siddhattha, I have not fulfilled the ten perfections in my former existences to acquire the knowledge of the inclinations and disposition of others (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa), which is not common to others. On this account, I cannot be the equal of the prince.” With this thought Māra drew the twelfth line.
13. “Unlike this Prince Siddhattha, I have not fulfilled the ten perfections in my former existences to acquire the knowledge of the attainment of great compassion (mahā-karuṇā-samāpatti-ñāṇa), which is not common to others. On this account, I cannot be the equal of the prince.” With this thought Māra drew the thirteenth line.
14. “Unlike this Prince Siddhattha, I have not fulfilled the ten perfections in my former existences to acquire the knowledge of the performance of the twin miracle (yamaka-pāṭihāriya-ñāṇa), which is not common to others. On this account, I cannot be the equal of the prince.” With this thought Māra drew the fourteenth line.
15. “Unlike this Prince Siddhattha, I have not fulfilled the ten perfections in my former existences to acquire the unobstructed knowledge (anāvaraṇa-ñāṇa), which is not common to others. On this account, I cannot be the equal of the prince.” With this thought Māra drew the fifteenth line.

16. “Unlike this Prince Siddhattha, I have not fulfilled the ten perfections in my former existences to acquire omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa), which is not common to others. On this account, I cannot be the equal of the prince.” With this thought Māra drew the sixteenth line.

The Daughters of Māra

At that time, Māra's three daughters, Taṇhā, Arati and Ragā, looked around, thinking: “We do not see our father, Māra, where is he now?” and they saw him brooding, squatting and scratching lines on the ground. So they approached him quickly and asked: “Father, why do you look so sad and dejected?” – “Dear daughters,” replied Māra, “this ascetic Gotama has escaped my domain in the three worlds. Though I have been shadowing him for this period of seven years to find faults with him, yet I could not find the least chance to blame him for any wrong. Therefore, I am sad and dejected.” – “Father, please do not be worried at all. We shall entice this ascetic Gotama and bring him into your presence,” promised the three daughters.

Then Māra said: “Dear daughters, nobody in the world is able to entice this ascetic Gotama. He is well established in his unshaken faith.” – “Father, we are womenfolk. We shall bind him in the snares of passion and bring him to you quickly. Please do not be disappointed and worried.” Saying thus, the three female deities approached the Buddha and said to him enticingly: “Venerable recluse, permit us to attend on you, sitting respectfully at your feet and satisfying all your needs.” The Buddha, however, ignored them, and remained enjoying the bliss of Nibbāna, absorbed in fruition attainment (phala-samāpatti) without opening his eyes. [344]

The three daughters of Māra discussed among themselves: “Menfolk have different tastes. Some love young and tender females, others like women in the first phase of life. Still others prefer those of the middle phase. So let us assume various ages and allure this recluse.” Accordingly, each of them created 100 ladies: 1) Under the guise of young women; 2) under the guise of prenatal ladies; 3) under the guise of those having given birth but once; 4) under the guise of those having given birth twice; 5) under the guise of middle-aged women; and 6) under the guise of older ladies – each and every one of them was made beautiful.

Then they approached the Buddha six times and said alluringly as before: “Venerable recluse, permit us to attend on you, sitting respectfully at your feet and satisfying all your needs.” As on the previous occasions, the Buddha ignored them and remained enjoying the bliss of Nibbāna, absorbed in fruition attainment, without opening his eyes.

Thereafter, the Buddha said: “Go away, deities. What benefit did you think to have by tempting me like this? Such a thing should be done to those who are not free yet from passion (rāga), hatred (dosa) and delusion (moha). As for me, I have absolutely done away with passion; I have absolutely done away with hatred; I have absolutely done away with delusion.” Then the Buddha uttered the following two verses as mentioned in the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, DhP 179-180):

*Yassa jitaṃ nāvajjīyati, jitaṃ yassa no yāti koci loke,
taṃ Buddham-ananta-gocaraṃ,
apadaṃ kena padena nessatha?*

The Buddha, having overcome the defilements, has nothing to conquer again. No defilement that has been conquered follows the Buddha. That Buddha, who has an infinite range of sense perception through all-embracing wisdom, who is devoid of such factors as passion, by which way will you lead him away?

*Yassa jālinī visattikā, taṅhā natthi kuhiñci netave,
taṃ Buddham-ananta-gocaraṃ,
apadaṃ kena padena nessatha?*

The Buddha is devoid of such factors as craving, which like a net would ensnare him in any existence, which has the nature of a violent poison; or which is particularly able to cling or adhere to things. The Buddha, who has an infinite range of sense perception through all-embracing wisdom, who is devoid of such factors as passion, by which way will you lead him away?

After speaking in praise of the Buddha among themselves: “Our father has told us the truth. This ascetic Gotama, being endowed with such attributes as Arahat and Well-gone, cannot be easily enticed by means of passion,” and they returned to their father, Māra.

The Buddha Honours the Dhamma

While the Buddha was staying during the week at the Ajapāla Banyan tree, he pondered: “It is miserable indeed to live without showing respects to others, having nobody to respect. Who should be approached and held by me in high esteem. One who has rid himself of all defilements, who has removed evils?” Then he pondered thus: “I should live near someone who is superior to me in morality, concentration, wisdom and emancipation so that my morality, concentration, wisdom and emancipation which are still incomplete and inadequate will become complete and adequate.” Then he made a survey with his omniscience to find someone superior to him in morality, concentration, wisdom and emancipation. Seeing no such person in the three worlds, he thought: “It will be good if I live paying respects only to the Dhamma that I have penetrated.”

At that moment, knowing the Buddha's intention, Brahma Sahampati arrived instantly in [345] the presence of the Buddha and having put his shawl on his left shoulder and touched the ground with his right knee he raised his folded hands in adoration and said: “Exalted Buddha, what you have thought of is correct. Fortunate One, those Buddhas, who appeared in the past, lived honouring only the Dhamma. Those Buddhas, who will appear in the future, will also live honouring only the Dhamma. Exalted Buddha, as a present Buddha you should live honouring only the Dhamma.” He also added the following three verses (SN 6.173):

Ye ca atītā Sambuddhā, ye ca Buddhā anāgatā, yo cetarahi Sambuddho, bahūnaṃ sokaṇāsano.

Lord, glorious, there exist those Buddhas who appeared in the past, those who will appear in the future, and he, who is appearing now, who removes or destroys the thorn of worry for many humans, Devas and Brahmas.

Sabbe Saddhamma-garuno, vihaṃsu viharanti ca, tathāpi viharissanti, esā Buddhāna' dhammatā.

All these Buddhas, of the three phases of time, lived paying respect to the Dhamma, are living and will live in the same manner. Such a living with respect paid to the Dhamma is a natural law of omniscient Buddhas.

Tasmā hi attakāmena, mahattam-abhikaṅkhatā, Saddhammo garukātabbo, saraṃ Buddhāna' sāsanaṃ.

Therefore, he, who wishes for benefits and who is desirous of being a highly honoured person, should pay respect, day and night, to the Dhamma-jewel which is the property of the virtuous, bearing in mind the three aspects of the teaching.

After uttering these three verses, Brahma Sahampati saluted the Buddha respectfully, circumambulated him and disappeared from that very place and appeared in his Brahma abode. Then knowing thoroughly that the request made by Brahma Sahampati was quite appropriate for him, the Buddha lived paying respect only to the Dhamma that he had realized.

Later on the Saṅgha became complete with the four greatnesses (mahatta) in number: 1) Greatness in elders (rattaññu-mahatta); 2) greatness in members of the Saṅgha (vepulla-mahatta); 3) greatness in number of teachings (brahma-cariya-mahatta); and 4) greatness in number of material gains (lābhagga-mahatta).

At that time, the Buddha showed respects to the Saṅgha also. For that reason, when his aunt Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī offered him a pair of cloths meant for robes, the Buddha said: “Dear aunt, give it to the Saṅgha. Giving to the Saṅgha would mean giving to me as well as to the Saṅgha.” Thus the Buddha clearly displayed his respect and adoration for the Saṅgha.

6. The Week at Mucalinda Lake

After spending seven days reflecting on the Dhamma under the Ajapāla Banyan tree, the Buddha left it for the Mucalinda<sup>145</sup> tree, towards the east of the Mahā Bodhi tree. There, at the foot of the Mucalinda tree, the Buddha spent seven days sitting cross-legged and enjoying the bliss of being an Arahat.

At that time, a great untimely rain fell for seven days. Such rain falls only on two occasions: one, when a Universal Monarch appears and when a Buddha appears. When the great rain fell, a very powerful Nāga King, Mucalinda, who ruled the Nāga abode underneath the lake thought thus: “This great unseasonal rain fell as soon as the Buddha took shelter in my abode. It will be good if a dwelling place for the Buddha can be found.”

The Nāga King was powerful enough to create by himself a big mansion with the seven kinds of jewels but he considered: “It will not be of great benefit if I were to create a big mansion of jewels and offered it to the Buddha. I shall render my service to him by means of my body.” So he assumed a huge physical frame and coiled round the Buddha with his body seven times and covered the Buddha's head with his expanded hood so that he would not be harmed by the cold, heat, gnats, mosquitoes, flies, etc. [346]

The inside of the coils was as vast as the lower storey of the Iron Palace (Lohapāsāda) built by King Duṭṭhagāmani in Śrī Laṅkā. It was the intention of the Nāga King to let the Buddha stay in the four attitudes of lying, sitting, standing and walking as he pleased. That was why the Nāga King created such a vast place with his coils. The Buddha, however, spent seven days in sitting position. Inside of the coils, at the centre, was placed a bejewelled throne. Above the throne was a canopy from which fragrant festoons of flowers, exquisite with golden stars, were hanging. In the four corners were scented oil lamps which were burning brightly. Caskets containing sandalwood were left open in the four directions. On the bejewelled throne, at the centre of the coils, the Buddha sat enjoying the bliss of fruition attainment.<sup>146</sup>

In this manner, the Buddha stayed inside the seven coils of Mucalinda, the Nāga King, and spent seven days enjoying the bliss of being an Arahat as though he was passing time in a scented chamber of not too narrow a size. When the Nāga King looked up very high into the sky and saw it was free of clouds, and it was no longer necessary to cover the Buddha with his body and hood, he discarded the Nāga form and assumed the guise of a handsome young man standing with his hands clasped in front of the Buddha.

Then reflecting and realizing the fact that: “To him who enjoys the bliss of Nibbāna happiness occurs wherever he sojourns.” The Buddha breathed forth the following two solemn exalted utterances as he was not able to contain his joy (Ud. 2.1):

Sukho viveko tuṭṭhassa, suta-dhammassa passato, abyāpajjam sukham loke, pāṇa-bhūtesu saṃyamo.

Nibbāna, which is seclusion from the four substrata of rebirth (upadhi), is bliss. With no display of anger, but only loving-kindness towards humans, Devas and Brahmas by him, who is content with his accomplishment through the four knowledges of the path, who has realized the Dhamma by means of his eyes of wisdom, or who has penetrated the Dhamma, and who has seen through his eyes of wisdom, Nibbāna, which is devoid of the four substrata of rebirth and the Dhammas that are worth-knowing, is bliss in this world. Development of compassion, a practice of Brahmas, free of violence and cruelty, is bliss.

Sukhā virāgatā loke, kāmānaṃ samatikkamo, asmimānassa yo vinayo, etaṃ ve paramaṃ sukhaṃ.

The noble Non-returning path, which gives rise to the knowledge of detachment from passion, which resists and escapes by eradicating sensual pleasures, is bliss in this world. There exists the fruition of Arahantship that completely eliminated the egoistic idea, “I am.” That fruition of Arahantship is indeed the best happiness of all conditioned things.

7. The Week at the Rājāyatana Tree

After spending seven days enjoying the bliss of being an Arahāt at the foot of Mucalinda tree, in the seventh week, the Buddha moved from that place to the Rājāyatana<sup>147</sup> tree to the south of the Mahā Bodhi tree and sat at the foot of that tree enjoying the bliss of being an Arahāt for seven days.

In this way, or 7x7 (satta-sattāha) days = 49 days had been completed. During these 49 days, the Buddha did not do any of the following: rinsing the mouth, washing the face, cleansing the body; bathing, taking meal, drinking water, or lying down. He spent the time entirely enjoying the bliss of the absorptions and fruition.

When the 49 days were complete, on Wednesday, the fifth waxing moon of [347] July (Āsāḷha), while staying at the Rājāyatana tree, Sakka appeared and offered the medicinal fruit of myrobalan (Terminalia citrina) as he knew of the Buddha's desire to wash the face and clean himself. The Buddha ate the fruit. As soon as he had eaten the fruit, he answered the call of nature. Thereafter, Sakka gave a tooth-cleaner from the Nāga abode, and the water from Lake Anotatta to him. The Buddha used the tooth-cleaner, rinsed his mouth and washed his face with the Anotatta water, and remained sitting under the Rājāyatana tree.

Tapussa and Bhallika

The two merchant brothers, Tapussa and Bhallika, were travelling with 500 carts from their home in the state of Ukkalā to the Middle Country (Majjhima-desa) for trading. As they were travelling along the main road and approaching close to the Rājāyatana tree, their carts stopped suddenly, as if they were stuck in the mud, but the ground was even and free from water. Just while they were asking: “What is the cause?” and were discussing between themselves, a male deity, who happened to have been closely related to them in a past existence, revealed himself clearly in his physical form from the fork of a tree and said: “Young men, not long after Awakening, the Buddha, absorbed in the bliss of being an Arahāt, is staying at the foot of the Rājāyatana tree at present, without having taken any food for the whole duration of 49 days. Young men, adore and honour the Buddha with an offering of alms food. This will bring you welfare and happiness for a long time.”

On hearing this, they became much delighted and considering that: “It will take time to cook rice,” they went to the Buddha taking with them rice-cakes and balls of honey which they had brought along with them. Having approached the Buddha, they respectfully paid respects to him, and stayed at a suitable distance and said: “May the Fortunate One accept our rice-cakes and balls of honey. Your acceptance will be the cause for our welfare and happiness for a long time.”

Thereupon the Buddha wondered: “My Buddha predecessors had never received alms food with their hands. So, with what shall I now receive these rice-cakes and balls of honey being offered by these merchant brothers?” The earthen bowl, given by Brahma Ghaṭikāra at the time of his renunciation, had disappeared on the day he received Sujātā's milk-rice. Knowing the thought of the Buddha, the Four Great Kings of the four directions, namely, Dhataratṭha, Virūlhaka, Virūpakkha and Kuvera, respectfully handed him four bowls of blue stone. The Buddha, however, refused to take them. Again, the Four Great Kings gave the Buddha four bowls of natural stone, having the colour of green gram (Phaseolus mungo). These four bowls the Buddha accepted, and out of compassion and goodwill towards the Deva kings, he placed one bowl upon another and resolved thus: “Let there be only one bowl.” No sooner had the Buddha resolved thus, than the four bowls reduced themselves to just one bowl with four rims.

The Buddha then received the rice-cakes and balls of honey-food with that alms bowl and partook of them and then delivered a discourse of appreciation which was suitable to the merchant brothers. Then the two brothers took refuge in the Buddha and the Dhamma only, as the treasure of the Saṅgha had not come into existence at that time, and thereby they became devotees who had only to pronounce the two-sentence refuge (devācika-saraṇa) with reference to the Buddha and the Dhamma, saying: Ete mayāṃ bhante, Bhagavantāṃ saraṇāṃ gacchāma Dhammañ-ca, “we take refuge, sir, in the Fortunate One and the Dhamma.” These two were the first devotees in whom the two-sentence refuge formula was established.

Thereafter, the two merchant brothers made a request saying: “Blessed Buddha, give us something, out of compassion for us, that we can worship forever.” The Buddha then rubbed his head with the right hand and gave them his hair, acceding to their request. Obtaining the hair, the brothers were very much delighted, as if ambrosial waters were poured on them. After finishing their trading, they returned and arrived back at their native town of Pukkaravatī in the district of Ukkalā where they built a shrine (cetiya), enshrining in it the hair-relics kept in a golden casket. [349]

9: The Buddha Reflects on the Dhamma

Thereafter, on Thursday, the sixth waxing moon of July (Āsāḷha), which was 50 days after his becoming a Buddha on Wednesday, the full moon day of May (Vesākha), having passed the 49 days (satta-sattāha), the Buddha rose from his seat under the Rājāyatana tree, and again he proceeded to the foot of Ajapāla Banyan tree and remained there, sitting cross-legged.

Thereupon, the Buddha, in solitary quietude, reflected thus: “This Dhamma aggregate, the four noble truths, discerned by me distinctly with self-born knowledge (sayambhū-ñāṇa) is indeed profound, like the mass of water sustaining the solid earth below. It is indeed difficult to see, like a mustard seed covered by the great Mount Meru. It is indeed difficult to know, as difficult as hitting directly the tip of an animal’s tail hair split into 100 threads with the tip of another such hair-thread. It is indeed peaceful, it is indeed noble. These two attributes refer to supermundane things (lokuttara-dhamma). It is not the Dhamma which is for the logicians to delve into through reasoning (vitakka). It is the Dhamma to be resorted to and accepted by means of knowledge and wisdom (ñāṇa-paññā). It is indeed subtle, it is a Dhamma discerned only by the wise who practice correctly.

All these sentient beings, however, find delight in two forms of attachment, namely, attachment to the five objects of sensual pleasure (kāmālaya) and attachment to the enjoyment of the five sensual objects (taṇhālaya). Those sentient beings, who take delight in these two forms of attachment, are in fact unable to discern this doctrine of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda), the relationship of cause and effect. It will be even more difficult for them to discern Nibbāna, which is the extinction of all conditioned things (saṅkhāra), the total rejection of all the substrata of sensuality (kāma-upadhi), aggregates (khandha-upadhi), defilements (kilesa-upadhi) and of formations (abhisāṅkhāra-upadhi), which is the drying up of the 108 kinds of craving (taṇhā); which is the exhaustion of the 1,500 forms of defilement and passion (kilesa-rāga) and which is the cessation of all suffering. Also, if I were to teach the Dhamma of such profundity, those Devas and humans, who are of immature faculties (indriya), who are not fully developed yet for emancipation, will not see or understand the Dhamma. To teach the Dhamma to such Devas and humans will only mean weariness and exhaustion for me.”

Moreover, two exceedingly marvellous verses, which had never been heard of before, appeared distinctly in the mind continuum of the Buddha. They were (Pāsarāsi-sutta, MN 26):

Kicchena me adhigataṃ, halaṃ dāni pakāsituṃ, rāga-dosa-paretehi, nāyaṃ Dhammo susambudho.

It is not opportune yet to teach Devas and humans the Dhamma of the four noble truths, which has been achieved by me, through much effort, while developing the perfections (pāramī). At this very moment, when there is only my feeling of compassion, which is the internal cause [350] (ajjhattika-nidāna) but there is not yet the request by Brahma, who is respected by the world (loka-garu), which is the external cause (bāhira-nidāna) for my teaching. This Dhamma of the four noble truths is not easy to know and comprehend clearly by those who are overcome by the evil influence of greed and hate.

Paṭisotagāmiṃ nipuṇaṃ, gambhīraṃ duddasaṃ aṇuṃ, rāga-rattā na dakkhanti, tamokhandhena āvuṭṭā.

All Devas and humans, who being covered by the darkness of ignorance (avijjā), so much so that they have no eye of wisdom, crave for sensual pleasure (kāma-rāga), continued existence (bhava-rāga), and false doctrines (diṭṭhi-rāga), will not be able to see the Good Dhamma of the four noble truths, which is subtle, profound, like the mass of water sustaining the solid earth from below, difficult to see, like a mustard seed covered by the great Mount Meru, fine as an atom; and which leads to Nibbāna by going against the stream of Saṃsāra.

This thought is in fact a natural law (dhammatā) which happens to all the Buddhas. The Buddha, who had thus reflected, was inclined not to make an effort to teach the Dhamma forthwith, for the following three reasons: 1) The minds of sentient beings were full of defilements; 2) the Dhamma was very profound and 3) the Buddha held the Dhamma in high esteem.

The Buddha's thought process may be likened to that of a physician who, having given treatment to a patient afflicted with various kinds of illness, would reflect: "In what way and with what medicine should this patient be treated for recovery from his illness?" So too the Buddha, being aware of all sentient beings afflicted with various ailments of the defilements (kilesa) on the one hand and of the Dhamma being immensely profound and not easily discernible on the other, reflected: “What Dhamma should be taught to these beings and what method should be employed in teaching them.”<sup>148</sup>

Another explanation is that there are two causes (nidāna) for the Buddhas to teach the Dhamma: 1) The feeling of compassion for sentient beings generated in the mind continuum of the Buddhas, i.e., the great compassion (mahā-karuṇā), which is the internal (ajjhattika) cause; and 2) the act of asking by the world-respected Brahma for the Buddha’s teaching of the Dhamma, i.e., the request by Brahma (Brahma-yācana), which is the external (bāhira) cause.

At the time when the Buddha thus reflected on the profundity of the Dhamma and on the abundance of the defilements (kilesa) in sentient beings, the great compassion (mahā-karuṇā) of Buddha, the internal cause, had already arisen, but the external cause was still lacking as Brahma had not made the request yet. The Buddha was inclined to teach the Dhamma only when Brahma had made the request, thereby fulfilling the external cause.

The teaching of the Dhamma, only when requested by Brahma, was a natural law (dharmatā) for every Buddha. The reason for the teaching of the Dhamma, only when thus requested by Brahma, was this: Outside the Buddha’s Dispensation, before the appearance of the Buddha, those who were considered virtuous, whether laymen, wanderers, ascetics or Brahmins, worshipped and revered only Brahma. If the world-respected Great Brahma showed reverence to the Buddha by bowing before him, the whole world would do likewise, and develop faith in the Buddha. For this reason, it was usual for the Buddhas to teach the Dhamma only when requested by Brahma. Thus only when the external cause, the request of Brahma, had been made, did the Buddha teach the Dhamma.

The Great Brahma Sahampati’s Request

The great Brahma Sahampati was previously a noble elder (thera) by the name of Sahaka at the time of Buddha Kassapa’s Dispensation. In that capacity, he attained the first form absorption and when he died without having fallen from the absorption, he was reborn on the first absorption

---

<sup>148</sup> It was not that the Buddha had entirely given up his intention thus: “I will not at all teach the Dhamma to sentient beings.” For details, see the Questions of King Milinda (Milinda-pañha) [no further reference given].

plane of existence and became a Mahā Brahma with a lifespan of 64 inclusive periods (antara-kappa) which is equal to one immeasurable aeon. He was called Brahma Sahampati by the [351] Brahmas of the said plane of existence.<sup>149</sup>

When the mind continuum of the Buddha was such that he was still inclined not to exert himself for teaching the Dhamma, this thought occurred to Brahma Sahampati: Nassati vata bho loko! Vinassati vata bho loko! “Friends, the world is going to perish! O friends, the world is going to perish!” Then the Buddha, who is worthy of special veneration by Devas and humans because of his fully and truly penetrating knowledge of all things in the world, is inclined not to exert himself for teaching the Dhamma! Then, as instantly as a man of great physical and mental strength might stretch out his bent arm or bend his outstretched arm, Brahma Sahampati vanished from the Brahma world along with 10,000 fellow Mahā Brahmas and appeared in front of the Buddha.

At that time, Brahma Sahampati had a scarf placed over his left shoulder and kneeling with his right knee on the ground, sitting in the way of a Brahma, he made obeisance to the Buddha by raising his clasped hands and addressed him: “Exalted Buddha, may the Buddha kindly teach the Dhamma to all sentient beings, humans, Devas and Brahmas. Exalted Gracious One, may the Buddha kindly teach the Dhamma to all sentient beings, humans, Devas and Brahmas. There are many beings who have just a little dust of the defilements in their eyes. If these beings do not get the chance to listen to the Dhamma of the Buddha, they will suffer a great loss by not acquiring the extraordinary Dhamma of the paths and fruitions which they deserve. Venerable Buddha, there will appear those who can comprehend the Dhamma taught by you.”

Then again, having addressed the Buddha in plain prose, Brahma Sahampati made the request also in verse:

“Exalted Buddha, in the past, before your appearance, there existed in the Magadha country the impure, false doctrine sponsored by the six heretical teachers, such as Purāṇa Kassapa, who were stained by the dirt of the defilements.

Kindly open the great doorway of the path for entry into the deathless Nibbāna, which has remained closed since the disappearance of the Buddha Kassapa's Dispensation (Sāsana). Let all sentient beings listen to the Dhamma of the four noble truths as discerned by you, free as you are from the dust of the defilements.

Noble and wise Buddha, the possessor of the eye of wisdom that is capable of seeing all around! As a man of keen eyesight stands on the top of a rocky hill and surveys all the people in the surroundings, so you, venerable Buddha, being already free from sorrows, go up to the bejewelled tower of wisdom and look at all sentient beings, humans, Devas and Brahmas, who have fallen into the abyss of sorrow and are oppressed by birth, old age, sickness, death, etc.

Venerable Buddha of great, noble and courageous diligence, who knows only victory, not defeat, in all battles! Arise! Venerable Buddha, free from the debt of sensual desire, who is wont to set free all sentient beings who are eager to listen and follow the Buddha's teaching, from such difficult journeys as birth, old age, etc. and, like unto a caravan leader, convey them to the safety of Nibbāna! Kindly wander in the world to proclaim the Dhamma. Exalted Buddha, kindly teach the four noble truths to all sentient humans, Devas and Brahmas. Venerable Buddha, there will appear those who can discern and understand the Dhamma to be taught by you.”

The fact that the Brahma came and made the request to teach the Dhamma at the time when the Buddha was reflecting on the profundity of the Dhamma and on the abundance of the defilements in sentient beings and was still mentally inclined not to exert himself to teach the Dhamma is a natural law (dhammatā) for every Buddha. See the exposition on the 30 natural things in the commentary to the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa). [352]

The Buddha Surveys the World

When Brahma Sahampati thus made the request for teaching the Dhamma; the two conditions for doing so, namely, the external cause and the internal cause were fulfilled; and so he surveyed the world of sentient beings with the pair of Buddha's eyes (Buddha-cakkhu): Knowledge of the latent desire or inclination of beings (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa) and knowledge of the maturity or otherwise of the sense faculties (indriya-paro-pariyatta-ñāṇa).

On thus surveying, he saw distinctly different types of beings comparable to four kinds of lotuses: there are in the pond blue, red or white lotuses. Of these four kinds of lotuses, there are: 1) The kind of lotuses which come into being in the water, grow and develop in the water but remain submerged; 2) the kind of lotuses which come into being in the water, grow up in the water and stand level with the surface of the water; 3) the kind of lotuses which come into being in the water, grow up in the water and stand aloft, above the water and without the water wetting and adhering to them.

Of the said three kinds of lotuses, the 3rd lotus which stands aloft above the water would bloom forth that very day; the 2nd lotus which stood level with the surface of the water would bloom forth the next day; and the 1st lotus which developed but remained submerged would bloom forth on the third day.

Apart from the three kinds of lotuses, there is the fourth kind of lotus which will neither appear at all above the water nor bloom forth; the lotuses of this kind are diseased and will eventually become food for fish and tortoises. Like these four kinds of lotuses, there are beings who have little or no dust of the defilements in their eyes of knowledge; beings who have much dust of the defilements in their eyes of knowledge; beings in whom the five faculties of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom are sharp and mature; beings in whom the said five faculties are dull and immature; beings whose disposition, such as faith, energy, etc., are good or are not good; beings who would easily understand the Dhamma taught and beings who would not; beings who view all mundane matters, such as the aggregates, all forms of defilements, wrong deeds, volitions and actions that would cause further existences as a dreadful group of dangers just like an enemy wielding a two-edged sword prepared for an assault; and beings who have no such view.

When the Buddha surveyed the world of beings with his Buddha's eyes, he saw four groups of individuals thus: 1) The individuals who understood the Dhamma of the four noble truths, even if taught in a brief outline (mātikā-uddesa), and became converted, just as the lotuses standing aloft above the water would bloom forth that very day with the rising of the sun (ugghāṭitaññū-puggala); 2) the individuals who could not yet be converted by just hearing the Dhamma in a brief outline but would understand and become converted only when the four noble truths were taught and explained in detail (vitthāra-niddesa-pada-bhājanī), just as the lotuses standing level with the surface of the water would bloom forth the next day (vipañcitaññū-puggala); 3) the individuals who could not yet be converted by listening to the Dhamma both briefly and in detail at one sitting but would understand the four noble truths and become converted after a day or a month or a year with the help of their friends and by persistently applying themselves to the realisation of the Dhamma, just as the lotuses remaining submerged would bloom forth on the third day (neyya-puggala); 4) the individuals who would not realise path and fruit however much they listened to and practised the Dhamma in the present life (pada-parama-puggala) but had the benefit of acquiring an inclination (vāsanā) for the Dhamma in future existences. They would end their lives by becoming the food for the fishes and tortoises of the defilements, just as the lotuses, which were diseased, neither rose from the water nor bloomed forth, would eventually become the food for fishes and tortoises.

On thus seeing the four kinds of individuals and reflecting on the Dhamma which would be of benefit to them, the Buddha developed an ardent desire to teach the Dhamma. Then he proceeded to separate all beings into two categories: individuals fit for higher truths and liberation called capable people (bhabba-puggala) and individuals not fit for higher truths and liberation called incapable people (abhabba-puggala). Of these two [353] categories, incapable people were set aside and not taken into consideration, he took only capable people into the fold of his omniscience (sabbaññutā-nāṇa) and divided them into six groups, saying: “The beings full of passion (rāga) are this many. The beings full of hatred (dosa) are this many. The beings full of delusion (moha) are this many. The beings who are thoughtful (vitakka) are this many. The beings replete with faith (saddhā) are this many. The beings replete with wisdom (paññā) are this many.” And then he expressed his intention by saying: “I shall indeed teach the Dhamma!”

After thus reflecting and discerning, the Buddha gave his assent to Brahma Sahampati in verse (MN 26):

*Apārutā tesam amatassa dvārā, ye sotavanto pamuñcantu saddham, vihimsa-saññī paḅuṇam na bhāsim,
Dhammam paṅṅtam manujesu Brahme.*

O Brahma Sahampati, I do not keep the eight portals of the paths (magga), for entering into the deathless Nibbāna, closed to Devas and humans who are fit for emancipation, they are kept permanently open. Let Devas and humans with good hearing (sota-pasāda) show faith in me.

O Brahma Sahampati, to humans, Devas and Brahmas I have not in days past taught the noble Dhamma which I have acquired. It was because at that time the two causes (nidāna) for teaching the Dhamma had not yet been fulfilled and as such I knew well that, even though the Dhamma was taught, it would be of no benefit to them, but would be merely exhausting for me.

What is meant here is only those with good hearing will be able to listen to the Dhamma taught by the Buddha. Also only if they have faith in him, will they exert themselves to practice the Dhamma with faith, and the door of Nibbāna will be opened. If they have no faith in the Buddha, even though they have good hearing, they will not have faith also in the Dhamma and will not exert themselves and practise it and in that case, the door of Nibbāna will not be opened. So, beings having good hearing should show faith in the Buddha and listen to the Dhamma.

Alternatively we can say that since the time of the disappearance of the Dispensation (Sāsana) of Buddha Kassapa up to the present time, a genuine Buddha and his genuine Dhamma could not be found and so there had not been genuine faith in the mind continuum of beings, the gem of faith which should be packed and clutched in their fists. Devotion to heretical teachers in the meantime was not genuine faith. It was only an arising of unwholesome consciousness (akusala-cittuppāda) which mistook what was wrong for right (micchādhimokkha). Now that a genuine Buddha had appeared, let the Devas and humans who have good hearing open their fists and unpack the gem packets which had been kept close-fisted, as it were, since the time of the disappearance of the Dispensation (Sāsana) of Buddha Kassapa.

Thereupon, Brahma Sahampati felt jubilant and exclaimed: “The Buddha has given me the word of assent for teaching the Dhamma!” Then, after paying respect to the Buddha and circumambulating him, he vanished from that very place and reappeared in the Brahma world.

The Buddha Proceeds to the Deer Park

After Brahma Sahampati had left, the Buddha reflected: “To whom should I first teach the Dhamma? Who will quickly understand the Dhamma to be taught by me?” Then it occurred to him: “The sect-leader, Āḷāra of the Kālāma clan, is one endowed with the three wisdoms (paññā): wisdom about birth (jāti-paññā), wisdom about meditation (bhāvanā-paññā), and wisdom about preservation (pārihārika-paññā). He is also an individual whose eye of wisdom was free from the dust of the defilements (apparajakkha-puggala) for a very long time. It would be good if I were to teach him the Dhamma first. He will quickly [354] discern the Dhamma taught by me.”

Thereupon, one Deva, without making himself visible, addressed the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, it has now been seven days since the sect-leader Āḷāra of the Kālāma clan died.” The Buddha, however, without readily accepting the mere words of the Deva, looked with his omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) and confirmed that Āḷāra had indeed died seven days ago as he had been informed by the Deva, and that he had been reborn since in the sphere of nothingness (ākāñcaññāyatana), the third of the four formless planes.

After musing: “It was indeed a great loss for the sect-leader Āḷāra of the Kālāma clan to miss the opportunity of realising path and fruit which he deserved; if he could have listened to the Dhamma to be taught by me, he would have quickly discerned the four noble truths,” the Buddha again reflected further: “To whom should I then teach the Dhamma? Who will quickly understand the Dhamma to be taught by me?” Then it occurred to him: “The sect-leader Udaka, the son of Rāma, is one endowed, like Āḷāra, with the three wisdoms. He is also someone with little dust in his eyes, his eye of wisdom having been free from the dust of the defilements for a very long time. It would be good if I were to teach the Dhamma first to him, he will quickly discern the Dhamma to be taught by me.”

Thereupon, another Deva, without making himself visible, addressed the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, the sect-leader Udaka, the son of Rāma, has already died at about midnight yesterday.” The Buddha, however, without readily accepting the mere words of the Deva, looked by means of his omniscience and confirmed that the sect-leader Udaka had died in the middle of the previous night, as informed by the Deva, and that he had been reborn since in the Sphere of Neither-Perception-nor-Non-Perception (Nevasaññā-nāsaññāyatana) which is the fourth of the four formless planes, which is also called Bhavagga.

Thereupon, musing: “It was indeed a great loss for the sect-leader Udaka, son of Rāma, to miss the opportunity of realising the paths and fruitions which he deserved. If the sect-leader Udaka could have listened to the Dhamma taught by me, he would have quickly discerned the four noble truths.”

He again reflected further: “To whom should I teach the Dhamma first? Who will quickly understand the Dhamma to be taught by me?” Then the Buddha thought: “The Group of five ascetics (pañca-vaggiya) have been very helpful to me. They stayed with me and attended to my needs when I was practising austere striving (dukkara-cariyā) for six long years in the Uruvelā forest. So, it would be good if I were to teach the Dhamma first to the Group-of-Five.” On reflecting, “Where are the five ascetics living at present?” with his super knowledge of divine sight (dibba-cakkhu-abhiññā), he saw them dwelling in the huge Deer Park also called Isipatana, near Bārāṇasī city.

In this connection, the Buddha took into consideration and reflected on the services rendered by the Group-of-Five ascetics because he was especially mindful of the gratitude he owed to them. It was not that he did not want to teach the Dhamma to those who had not rendered service to him.

After making the intention: “I will proceed to the Deer Park and deliver the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse,” he went round for alms near the Bodhimaṇḍala and stayed there till the fourteenth day of the waxing moon of the month of July (Āsāḷha), and then on the full moon day of the month, quite early in the morning, after arranging and carrying his robes and alms bowl and thinking: “I will proceed to Bārāṇasī city,” he began the journey of eighteen leagues on foot.

The distance between the Mahā Bodhi and Gayā (Buddhagaya) was three miles. The distance between Mahā Bodhi and Bārāṇasī was eighteen leagues. The Buddhas of the past travelled to the Deer Park, by the power of their absorptions, to deliver the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse. As for our Buddha, he went eighteen leagues on foot, as he foresaw that an ascetic, Upaka, was soon to become a Non-returner (Anāgāmi) by virtue of his past meritorious deeds. He knew thus: “Upaka is now travelling the same route. That Upaka will meet me, converse with me and go on his way. Later on, being weary of the world, he will come back to me to listen to the Dhamma and become a noble Non-returner (Anāgāmi) in the present life and also become an Arahāt in his second existence after reaching Avihā, the twelfth Brahma realm.” [355]

The Buddha Meets the Ascetic Upaka

When the Buddha went from the Mahā Bodhi to Bārāṇasī on foot, the ascetic Upaka, who was travelling between the Mahā Bodhi and Buddhagayā, approached the Buddha, and on seeing him, asked: “My friend, your organs of eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind are so clear; your complexion is also clean and radiant; my friend, under which teacher have you gone forth? Who is your teacher? Whose teaching do you like?” the Buddha thereupon gave the reply to the ascetic Upaka in verse (MN 85 and elsewhere):

Sabbābhībhū sabba-vidūham-asmī, sabbesu dhammesu anūpalitto, sabbañjaho taṇhākkhaye vimutto, sayam abhiññāya kamuddiseyyam.

Upaka, I have mastered all things in the three worlds and possess perfect and complete knowledge of them all; I am one who is free from the stain of the defilements, such as greed, wrong-doing, delusion, etc., with regard to the three forms of existence (tebhūmaka-dhamma). I have abandoned all the three forms of existence. I am also one established securely in Nibbāna where craving is extinct. Being one who has penetrated all things by myself, without being taught by others, whom should I point out saying: “This is my teacher?” In fact, there is none.

Na me ācariyo atthi, sadiso me na vijjati, sadevakasmim lokasmim, natthi me paṭipuggalo.

Upaka, for me, there is no teacher, not to speak of a teacher superior to me, there is no one who is even my peer. There is no one in the world of sentient beings, including Devas, who can compare with me in respect of such qualities as morality, concentration, etc.

Ahañ-hi Arahā loke, aham Satthā anuttaro, ekomhi Sammā-sambuddho, sīti-bhūtosmi nibbuto.

Upaka, I am indeed the Arahāt in the world, one deserving of special veneration: I am also the incomparable and most excellent teacher of Devas and humans in the world. Since I can discern with self-arisen knowledge (sayambhū-ñāṇa) all things without perversion, I am the supremely Self-Awakened One. I am also one who has extinguished the fire of the defilements.

Dhamma-cakkaṃ pavattetuṃ, gacchāmi Kāsināṃ purāṃ, andhī-bhūtasmiṃ lokasmiṃ, āhañchaṃ amata-dundubhiṃ.

Upaka, I will go to the Isipatana Deer Park, near Bārāṇasī, in Kāsi, to set in motion the Dhamma Wheel. I will beat the large deathless drum for all Devas and humans who, without the eye of wisdom, are groping around like the blind.

Thereupon, the ascetic Upaka said: “My friend, if what you claim is true, you must be one who possesses infinite wisdom (ananta-ñāṇa) and who has conquered the five kinds of death (māra).” [356]

The Buddha replied thus:

Mādisā ve Jinā honti, ye pattā āsavakkhayaṃ, jitā me pāpakā dhammā, tasmāham-Upaka jino.

Upaka, the Buddhas who are of the same nature like myself are named Conquerors (Jina) since they have attained the path-knowledge of an Arahant (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa), the extinction of the four pollutants (āsava), and have got rid of the unwholesome factors (akusala-dhamma). I am also known by the name of Conqueror, for, like these Buddhas, I have attained the knowledge of the extinction of the pollutants (āsavakkhaya-ñāṇa), and abandoned the unwholesome factors.

Thereupon, the ascetic Upaka saying, “My friend, what you have said may be true!” nodded his head and took another route to go to Vañkahāra district. The opportunity of having such a dialogue and discussion with the Buddha proved to be a helpful factor in his renouncing the world later on. True! Upaka was in fact one who possessed extraordinary merit (adhikāra). For this very reason, the Buddha had taken the journey on foot to meet him on the way.

Those who listened to the Buddha’s words of the Dhamma before he delivered the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse did not attain the paths and fruitions. They just acquired a tendency (vāsanā) for applying themselves to the realisation of the Dhamma. It is a natural law (dhammatā); and so Upaka did not attain the paths and fruitions although he had listened to such profound words of the Dhamma relating to the qualities of the Buddha. He just enjoyed the benefit of having an inclination to become a monastic afterwards.

The Story of Upaka in Brief

The ascetic Upaka lived in a small hermitage in a hamlet of hunters in Vaṅkahāra and was held in high esteem and looked after by the leading hunter of the hamlet. As there were plenty of wild gnats in the said county, Upaka was made to spend his time inside a large pitcher. As the hunter wanted to go to a distant deer-forest, he left word with his daughter Cāpā: “Daughter, look after and serve well our reverend teacher who is an Arahat. Don’t fail to do so!”<sup>150</sup> And then he left for the forest in company of his sons and younger brothers.

Cāpā, the daughter of the chief hunter, had pleasant, beautiful looks. She possessed perfect bodily form with features becoming to a woman. The day after her father left, the ascetic Upaka went to the chief hunter’s house. On seeing the hunter’s daughter Cāpā as she approached close to him to offer alms food which she had prepared, he became overwhelmed by lust. So, without even being able to take the food, he went back to his place carrying the alms food in a dish. Keeping the dish of alms food in a suitable place, and thinking, “I will remain alive only if I can have Cāpā! I will die if I cannot get her!” he lay down without taking food.

On the seventh day, when the chief hunter returned home, he enquired from Cāpā about teacher Upaka. On being told by Cāpā: “Father, your teacher Upaka came to the house only one day and had not come again,” he went straight to teacher Upaka without even changing his clothes, in the very guise that he had on from the forest, and asked him: “What ails you, venerable sir?” feeling and massaging his legs at the same time. The ascetic Upaka, without giving an answer, remained lying, rolling to the left and to the right and groaning. When the hunter pressed him for an answer, saying: “Just tell me sir. I will do everything I can possibly do for you.” The ascetic Upaka replied: “I can live only if I can have Cāpā. If not, it is better for me to die here.”

When the hunter asked: “Venerable sir, do you possess any skill?” the ascetic Upaka replied: “I possess none.” Again, when the hunter said: “Venerable sir, one who is not skilled in anything will not be able to manage domestic affairs,” the ascetic Upaka replied: “I am not skilled in anything. Nevertheless, I will carry the carcass obtained by you. I will [357] also sell its meat.”

Saying: “We also like the idea of you carrying and selling meat,” the hunter gave him an outer garment and let him change into a layman’s clothings and, bringing him home, he gave his daughter Cāpā in marriage to Upaka. The son born of the union of Upaka and Cāpā as husband and wife was given the name of Subhadda. When the child cried, Cāpā used to nag, taunt and ridicule Upaka by singing this lullaby<sup>151</sup> to hurt and disparage him indirectly:

Son of a meat vendor, ascetic and ex-monk! That son of a foolish ex-monk, a hunter’s hanger-on, fell in love with me. Mother is coaxing you to sleep, stop crying! I wish you would sleep. In a cradle finished with emerald and diamond, sleep, my son of pure gold. Mother will sing and rock the cradle to lull you to sleep. Stop crying! Gold nugget! I wish you to sleep. Your father, last in the file of men! His way avoid; in future for liberation strive. Mother is advising you, my pretty son, my garland of gold!

Thereupon, Upaka said: “Wife, do you think of me as one who has nobody to turn to for help and refuge? I have a very good friend by the name of Ananta Jina. I will go to that good friend Ananta Jina.” Realising “This Upaka is unbearably hurt if I taunt and insult him in this way,” Cāpā would sing the lullaby again and again. One day, Upaka departed for the Middle Country (Majjhima-desa) without informing Cāpā.

At that time, the Buddha happened to be dwelling in Jetavana monastery in Sāvattthī; and he had earlier given word in advance to the monks: “Ascetics, if someone comes and enquires after Ananta Jina, point him out to me.” Upaka enquired from every one he met all along the way: “Where is Ananta Jina staying?” and in due course he reached Sāvattthī; and, standing in the centre of Jetavana monastery, he asked the ascetics: “Venerable Sirs! Where is Ananta Jina staying?” The ascetics took him to the presence of the Buddha. On seeing the Buddha, Upaka immediately addressed him: “Exalted Buddha! Do you still remember and know me, your disciple?” When the Buddha said: “Yes, Upaka, I do. Where are you living at present?” Upaka replied: “Exalted Buddha! I am living in Vaṅkahāra.” Thereupon, the Buddha asked him: “Upaka, you are advanced in age. Can you enter the order of ascetics?” Upaka replied: “Yes, Exalted Buddha, I will.” Thereupon, the Buddha permitted him to enter the order of ascetics and taught a suitable form of meditation. Upaka practised the meditation with great exertion and attained the Non-returner fruition (Anāgāmī-phala). When he died, he was reborn in Aviha which is the lowest in the five planes of the Suddhāvāsa Brahma world; and, before long, he became an Arahat (Arahatta-phala).

After she was abandoned by the ex-monk Upaka, Cāpā became weary of the world of humans; so, after entrusting her young son Subhadda to his grandfather, she took the same [358] journey taken by Upaka. On reaching Sāvattihī, she became a nun in the presence of other female monastics. There, she practised and developed insight (vipassanā) meditation strenuously and becoming an Arahat after going through the four paths in succession, she was known by the name of Ven. Cāpā with the pollutants extinguished.<sup>152</sup>

The Buddha Arrives at the Deer Park

The Buddha proceeded on his journey by successive stages until he came upon the Group-of-Five ascetics in Isipatana, and the Migadāya Forest near Bārāṇasī in the cool evening of the full moon day of July (Āsāḷha) in the year 528 BCE. Seeing the Buddha approaching from a distance, the five ascetics made an agreement among themselves: “Friends, the monk Gotama is approaching. The monk Gotama is one who has given up meditation practices. He has become one who strives for the acquisition of the four requisites. He is one who has reverted to the acquisition of the four requisites. Let us not make obeisance to the monk Gotama. Let us not greet him. Let us not take the alms bowl from his hands. However, we will prepare a seat for him to sit on if he wants to.”

Being aware of the mood of the five ascetics, the Buddha developed loving-kindness specially directed towards them (odhissaka-mettā). As the Buddha came nearer and nearer and touched with the splendour and might of the Buddha (Buddha-tejānubhāva), as well as the splendour and might of his loving-kindness (mettā-tejānubhāva), they found themselves unable to keep the agreement they had made and all five went to welcome the Buddha; one took the alms bowl from his hands, another prepared a seat for him, another set out water, another placed a plank and another took a pot for washing his feet.

The Buddha took his seat and washed his feet as arranged by the ascetics. Although they showed due respect with physical actions regardless of their agreement, they spoke to him as their equal by addressing him by the name Gotama and by calling him, friend (āvuso). They entered into a friendly talk with the Buddha, addressing him by the name “Gotama” and as friend as though he were their equal: “Friend Gotama, at the time when you were engaged in meditation practices in Uruveḷā Forest, we carried your alms bowl and robes and went round for alms. We offered you water and tooth cleaner. We swept the precincts of the hermitage. Who looked after you by attending to such duties, big and small, after we had left? Were you not in a state of confusion when we left you?”

Thereupon, the Buddha said: “Group of five (Pañca-vaggī)! Do not address me by my name Gotama and by the term “friend” as though I were your equal. Group of five! I have become an Awakened One who, being possessed of completely true, penetrating and clear knowledge of all cognizable truths (sacca-ñeyya-dhamma) is deserving of special veneration.

Ascetics, listen attentively, I have realised the deathless Nibbāna (amata-Nibbāna). I will instruct you. I will teach you the Dhamma. If you follow and practise in accordance with the instructions given by me, you will soon realise, even in this present life and through direct knowledge the happiness of the Arahat fruition which is aspired to by two kinds of noble men: Men noble by birth (jāti-kula-putta) and men made noble by virtue of good conduct (ācārā-kula-putta) who renounce the world, abandoning family life, and become recluses in the service of the Dispensation (Sāsana).”

But the Group-of-Five ascetics being sceptical replied, albeit in good faith: “Friend Gotama! Even though you practised and attained the absorptions (appānaka-jhāna), which are difficult to achieve by ordinary individuals, at the time you practised austere striving (dukkarā-cariya) for six long years, you could not realise the path-knowledge of an Arahat (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) and omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) which could make you a noble one (ariya). At that time, you started striving for the acquisition of the four requisites, and you gave up the meditation practices, now that you have reverted to the acquisition of the four requisites, how could you have attained and realised the path-knowledge of an Arahāt and omniscience which can make one a noble one, and which is superior to the ten modes of virtuous action (kusalā-kamma-patha) of ordinary individuals?”

On being spoken to thus, the Buddha addressed the Group-of-Five: “Ascetics, I am not one who [359] strives for the acquisition of the four requisites. I am not one who has given up the practice of meditation. I am not one who has reverted to the acquisition of the four requisites. Ascetics, I have become an Awakened One who, being possessed of complete, genuine, penetrating and clear knowledge of all the cognizable truths (sacca-ñeyya-dhamma), am deserving of special veneration, ascetics! Listen attentively. I have realised the deathless Nibbāna. I will instruct you. I will teach you the Dhamma. If you follow and practise in accordance with the instruction given by me, you will soon realise, even in this present life, through direct knowledge, the happiness of the Arahāt fruition, which is aspired to by these two kinds of noble men, namely, men noble by birth and men noble by virtue of good conduct, who renounce the world, abandoning family life, and become recluses in the service of the Dispensation (Sāsana).” But the five ascetics still remaining sceptical, and replied as before for the second time.

Although the Buddha told them for the third time as before, “I am not one who strives for the acquisition of the four requisites, and so on,” the five ascetics still remaining sceptical, and replied as before for the third time.

Thereupon, the Buddha, changing his tactics, addressed them thus: “Ascetics, do you recollect whether, when I was previously engaged in meditation practices in Uruvelā forest, I came and spoke to you, by way of giving encouragement and to keep you from being bored and also in order to make you form a high opinion of myself, thus: ‘My friends, do not be confused and think of leaving for another place. I have begun to see lights and signs in meditation (kammaṭṭhāna-nimitta).’ The five ascetics then reflected: “At the time when this monk Gotama was practising meditation, we would have readily believed him if he had said: ‘I have become an Arahāt!’ But, this Monk Gotama did not brag nor deceive us at that time. At present he is only speaking of the qualities (guṇa) truly possessed by him.” With this one single utterance of the Buddha, they were reassured and regained faith and held him in high esteem. And, fully convinced that: “This Monk Gotama has truly become an Awakened One,” they replied in acknowledgement: No hetamī Bhante, “venerable Buddha, we cannot recollect that you have spoken such words.”

The Buddha was able to make the five ascetics understand that he had become an Awakened One. Thereupon, the five ascetics listened to the words of the Buddha with respect. They gave rapt attention to him. They directed their minds towards achievement of the Arahāt fruition. Having made the Group-of-Five ascetics know perfectly well that he had no doubt he had become genuinely Awakened, the Buddha, for the first time, delivered the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, beginning with the words: Dve me bhikkhave ante ... “there are these two extremes, monks ... ” and so on, on the cool evening of Saturday, the full moon day of July (Āsāḷha) in the year 528 BCE. At that time, the sun was just setting in the west after dispelling darkness with its light and the moon, and it was in conjunction with the constellation of Uttarāsāḷha, was just rising in the east and vanquishing the darkness with its radiance.

No sooner had the Buddha uttered: Dveme bhikkhave ante ... than the sound that appeared spread all over the 10,000 world-element, reaching Bhavagga, the highest of the formless worlds above and Avīci, the lowest of the hells below. Even at that time, 180 million Brahmas, who were of mature meritorious roots and who had performed deeds of extraordinary merit (adhikāra-kusala) in order to comprehend the four truths, had already assembled there.

When the Buddha thus delivered the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, Ven. Koṇḍañña followed the teaching, concentrating his mind on the discourse through its course and developed his knowledge (ñāṇa), so that he became established in Stream-entry fruition (Sotāpatti-phala) along with the 180 million Brahmas by the time the delivery of the discourse came to an end.

The 32 awesome and extraordinary great omens appeared when the Buddha delivered the discourse, as on the occasions of his conception, birth and becoming a Buddha.

When Ven. Koṇḍañña was thus established in Stream-entry fruition, the Buddha exclaimed with joy: Aññāsi vata bho Koṇḍañño! Aññāsi vata bho Koṇḍañño! “Ah! [360] Koṇḍañña has penetratingly discerned the four noble truths indeed! Ah! Koṇḍañña has penetratingly discerned the four noble truths indeed!” so that Devas and humans of the 10,000 world-element might hear. Because the Buddha had thus made his joyous utterance beginning with “Koṇḍañña has penetratingly discerned (aññā) ...” Ven. Koṇḍañña became renowned by the name of “Aññā Koṇḍañña.”

On thus becoming a Stream-enterer, Ven. Aññā Koṇḍañña asked the Buddha for ordination, saying: “Exalted Buddha, may I, in your presence, become a novice and then a fully-ordained monastic.” Thereupon, the Buddha stretched out his golden right hand from beneath the robe and addressed him in a voice like that of a Brahma: Ehi bhikkhu svākkhāto Dhammo, cara brahma-cariyaṃ sammā dukkhassa anta-kiriyāya, “come, monk, receive the ordination you had prayed for; the Dhamma has been well-taught by me; strive for the accomplishment of the noble practice constituting the three upper paths in order to put an end to the round of suffering.” The ordination of Ven. Aññā Koṇḍañña as a monastic came to a successful completion just as the first of the three sentences uttered by the Buddha ended.

As the Buddha summoned Ven. Koṇḍañña with “Come, monk,” immediately his original appearance vanished and he was transformed into a monastic, with his head shaved, and his body donned in the robes. He was already equipped with the eight requisites each in its proper place, one robe at the waist, another robe of a single layer (ekacci) covering the body, the double robe resting on the shoulder and the alms bowl hung over the left shoulder. The deportment (iriyā-patha) he carried was worthy of devotion and was like that of an elder with 60 years of monkhood who was 80 years old; and his posture was that of paying respect to the Buddha, who was his preceptor (upajjhāya).

The requisites received by the summoned monastics (ehi-bhikkhu) are known as requisites created by supernormal powers (iddhi-mayā-parikkhāra). If a certain person gave away in generosity the eight requisites, such as robes, bowl, etc., if he could not afford to give a full set to a noble individual (ariya-puggala), such as a Stream-enterer, Once-returned, etc., or to an ordinary but virtuous monastic and aspired earnestly saying: “Let this gift of requisites be the supporting cause (paccaya) for becoming a summoned monastic in the future,” the said gift, provided it is of extraordinary merit, could be of help to that person to acquire the requisites created by supernormal powers in the presence of the Buddhas, and become a summoned monastic.<sup>153</sup>

The Buddha took up residence in the Deer Park for the rainy season; and, on the following day, the 1st waning moon of the month of July (Āsāḷha) he remained in the monastery without going round for alms and spent time giving instruction to Ven. Vappa. The remaining four monastics went on alms round. Ven. Vappa became a Stream-enterer in the morning of that very day. Similarly, the Buddha remained only in the monastery without going round for alms and spent the time giving instruction to Ven. Bhaddiya on the following day, to Ven. Mahānāmā on the day following that, and to Ven. Assaji on the day following that. These monks also attained Stream-entry fruition, on the day concerned and all became summoned monastics in the presence of the Buddha. [361]

[The following two sections are moved here from the chapter on the Dhamma Jewel to complete the story.]

The Turning of the Dhamma Wheel

Before the advent of the Buddha, there appeared in India some leaders of religious sects who called themselves ascetics (samaṇa). Some of them practised and taught a sensuous way of life as the conduct of ascetics while others practised and taught a self-tormenting mode of life as the conduct of ascetics. During the time when the world was thus shrouded with the darkness of the two extreme doctrines of self-indulgence and self-torment, each claiming to be the true good practice. On the full moon of May (Vesākha) at dusk in the year 528 BCE, the Buddha delivered the Discourse about the Turning of the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakkappavattana-sutta, SN 56.11).

The Buddha began the discourse with the words: “Monastics these two extremes should not be followed by one who has renounced the world.” And as soon as these words were uttered by the Buddha, due to the Buddha’s powers, they echoed throughout the 10,000 world-element which constitute the birth sphere of the Buddha, and filled the entire world, from the Avīci realm at the bottom and the Bhavagga Brahma realm at the top. By that time Brahmas numbering 180 million who had a matured root of merit as sufficing condition to perceive the four truths had already assembled at the Deer Park, Isipatana, where the discourse was to be delivered. When this first discourse was delivered by the Buddha, the sun was setting in the west and the moon was appearing on the eastern horizon.

The theme of the Discourse about the Turning of the Dhamma Wheel is this: The Buddha exhorted the Group-of-Five ascetics to avoid the two extremes of self-indulgence and self-mortification and pointed out to them the middle way, which consists of eight factors, as the proper course of practice. Then he briefly expounded the four truths. Next, he declared the essential features of Buddhahood which requires three stages of knowledge regarding each of the four truths and proclaimed that he was the Buddha because he has fulfilled those requirements.

As the discourse continues, Koṇḍañña “entered the stream of knowledge” and became the first Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna), a disciple established in the first path. Thus, the Wheel of the Dhamma was set rolling and the noble truth became established in the world. The great event was cheered by the terrestrial Devas whose loud applause spread among celestial Devas and Brahmas. The great earth quaked in joyous approval. A wondrous light emanating from the Buddha, caused by his mind and arising from temperature arose, infinitely superior to the personal effulgence of the greatest of the Devas or Brahmas thanks to his all-knowing wisdom.

At the end of the discourse, the delightful satisfaction that had begun to arise at the start of the discourse could not be contained by the Buddha who made the joyous utterance (udāna): “Koṇḍañña has seen the truth. Indeed Koṇḍañña has seen the truth.” This joyous utterance also spread to the 10,000 world-element. Then Koṇḍañña requested the Buddha to make him a monastic. The Buddha summoned him: “Come monastic,” and at that very instant, Ven. Koṇḍañña became a monastic who had the distinction of being ordained by the Buddha himself. [1169]

What is it that is termed the “Dhamma Wheel?” The Dhamma Wheel is a term referring to two kinds of the knowledge of the Buddha: the penetrative knowledge (paṭivedha-ñāṇa), of the four path-knowledges (magga-ñāṇa), and the exposition-knowledge (desanā-ñāṇa).

The four path-knowledges, consisting of the twelve aspects of the four truths, that arose in the Bodhisatta who was about to attain Perfect Awakening is the Dhamma Wheel; and the power of exposition on the self-same twelve aspects of the four truths, which was made clear to the Group-of-Five is also the Dhamma Wheel. They are called the Wheel of Dhamma or Righteousness, because these two kinds of Buddha-knowledge destroy all the defilements just as a powerful missile destroys all enemies.

Both knowledges arose in the heart of the Buddha. By means of them the Buddha caused the wheel of the Dhamma to turn, caused it to happen. This wheel is said to be turning up to the moment when Ven. Koṇḍañña and the 180 million Brahmas attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). That is because the function of the Wheel did not end till that precise moment. From that moment, when the first fully-fledged Stream-enterers (Sotāpatti-phala) in Koṇḍañña and the 180 million Brahmas appeared in the world, the Wheel of the Dhamma is said to have been turned, the kingdom of Dhamma became established. This is because since the time when the teaching of Buddha Kassapa became extinct, up to this point under Buddha Gotama, nobody had been able to turn this Wheel through the above-mentioned two Buddha-knowledges.<sup>154</sup>

In the matter of penetration of the four truths, the truth of cessation is penetrated or perceived through having Nibbāna as the object of mind. The remaining three truths are perceived in their respective functions. It means that the four truths are simultaneously revealed at the instant path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa) dispels bewilderment or ignorance that has concealed the four truths.

The Characteristics of Non-Self

After the Buddha had established Koṇḍañña in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala), he taught spiritual development to the Group-of-Five ascetics like they were children. From the first waning day of May (Vesākha), he did not go on the alms round but, instead, remained back to teach them his doctrine. On the first waning day, and on the second waning day Ven. Vappa and Ven. Bhaddiya attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) respectively, both of them being ordained by the Buddha himself with the summons: “Come, monastic.”

Then the Buddha let Ven. Koṇḍañña, Ven. Vappa and Ven. Bhaddiya to go on the alms round, and he taught the doctrine to Ven. Mahānāma and Ven. Assaji. The Buddha and his five disciples sustain themselves on the alms food collected by the three monastics. Then on the third and fourth waning day of Vesākha

(May) Ven. Mahānāma and Ven. Assaji were established in Stream-entry, both being ordained by the Buddha himself with the summons: “Come, monastic.”

After all five ascetics became established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala), the Buddha, on the fifth waning day, decided to expound the doctrine further so as to lead them to Awakening. And accordingly on that day he taught them the Discourse on the Characteristics of Non-Self (Anatta-lakkhaṇa-sutta, SN22.59).

The Buddha introduced the discourse with the statement: “Corporeality, monastics, [1170] is not self,” and explained this fact with the suffering characteristic (dukkha) of corporeality. Then he put questions to the five monastics: “Is corporeality permanent or impermanent?” The monastics, pondering on the question, gave the reply: “Impermanent, venerable sir.”

By this similar question and answer method, the Buddha drew out from his hearers the impermanent character of the five aggregates, one by one. Likewise, he drew out the fact of suffering (dukkha) and non-self (anatta) from the disciples. This method of dialogue in which the disciple comes to his own conclusion of the three characteristics of the five aggregates is technically termed by the commentators as the triple-round discourse (teparivaṭṭa-dhamma-desanā). In this matter, what the Buddha wishes to establish is the character of not-self (anatta), after first establishing the impermanent character (anicca) and the suffering character (dukkha) of the five aggregates.

We shall explain this further: In some of the discourses the Buddha expounded on the impermanent nature of the five aggregates with regard to their impermanent character.<sup>155</sup> In some discourses, he makes the not-self character clear through the fact of its suffering (dukkha) character. The earlier part of the present discourse is a case in point. In some discourses, he makes the not-self character evident after having first established the fact of the impermanent and suffering character. In this present discourse, the latter part makes this clear.<sup>156</sup> The Buddha takes this approach because the impermanent and suffering nature of things is evident to all whereas the not-self nature is not so evident.

To explain this further: When somebody, by accident breaks some utensil, he or she would remark: “Ah, it’s impermanent!” but not: “Ah, it is unsubstantial, or not-self.” When a sore afflicts one, or one is pricked by a thorn, one would remark: “Ah, it’s suffering,” but not: “Ah, it is not-self.” Non-self (anatta) is not uttered in these cases because the nature of not-self is somewhat remote to one’s thinking. Therefore, the Buddha teaches not-self through impermanence or through suffering, or through a combination of impermanence and suffering. This latter method is employed in the latter part, the triple-round discourse, of the present discourse.

Next, the Buddha explains: “Therefore, monastics, whatever corporeality there is, whether in the past, future or present, whether internal or external, whether gross or subtle, lowly or lofty, far or near, all corporeality should be regarded as it really is, by right insight and wisdom of path-knowledge: “This is not mine,” “This is not I,” “This is not myself.” Thus the Buddha points out the falsity of the ego when one gains insight into the five aggregates and when one decides for oneself on gaining path-knowledge.

In meditating for insight, if one concentrates on the impermanence of phenomena, one can dispel the illusion of conceit. If one concentrates on suffering, one can give up craving. If one concentrates on unsubstantiality, one can dispel the illusion of wrong view.

In the present case, considering the five aggregates as: “This is not mine,” leads to the destruction of craving, and is the same as concentrating on suffering in insight meditation. Considering the five aggregates as: “This is not I,” leads to the destruction of conceit and is the same as concentrating on impermanence. Considering the five aggregates as: “This is not myself,” leads to the destruction of wrong view, and is the same as concentrating on unsubstantiality (anatta).

At the conclusion of the discourse, the Buddha sums up the result that is achieved by a person of right view, culminating in the Arahāt fruition. “On gaining this right view, the well informed becomes a noble disciple (ariya).” In a logical sequence of events following the correct perception as detailed above, he attains sufficient insight into the five aggregates to attain path-knowledge and its fruition, and the reviewing-knowledge (paccavekkhaṇa-ñāṇa). [1171] The discourse then ends with a short description about the attainment of Awakening by the five monastics in the course of the exposition.

From this discourse, it is clear that the Group-of-Five ascetics gained Awakening through meditating on the impermanence, suffering and unsubstantiality of the five aggregates. Therefore, all followers of the Buddha would do well to reflect on the following verses rendered in English prose on the five aggregates:

9: The Buddha Reflects on the Dhamma – 450

The aggregates of corporeality do not last long:

It arises and perishes in no time. Woeful, dreary, painful it is to be subjected to risings and failings, continuously on and on. Unsubstantial is corporeality, with nothing of real essence. To the discerning eye, it is impermanent by nature, and hence is just suffering and not-self.

The aggregates of sensation, perception, volitions and consciousness, too, do not last long.

It arises and perishes in no time. Woeful, dreary, painful it is to be subjected to risings and failings, continuously on and on. Unsubstantial is consciousness, with nothing of real essence. To the discerning eye, it is impermanent by nature, and hence is just suffering and not-self.

10: The Story of Sātāgiri and Hemavata

The Buddha delivered the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse just before sunset on the full moon day of the month of July (Āsāḷha), in the year 528 BCE. At midnight, he taught the Discourse concerning Hemavata (Hemavata-sutta), sometimes called the Discourse concerning Sātāgiri (Sātāgiri-sutta, Snp 1.9).

The reason, in detail, for teaching the said discourse was as follows: In this Fortunate Aeon (Bhadda-kappa) with the human lifespan running upto 20,000 years, Buddha Kassapa appeared, and he entered Parinibbāna after living for 16,000 years, which was four-fifths of the life-span (āyu-kappa). The cremation of his remains was carried out with great reverence. The corporeal relics of the Buddha did not break up into pieces but remained as a big solid mass of gold. This was a natural law (dhammatā) with all long-lived Buddhas.

As for short-lived Buddhas, they attain Parinibbāna even before many people had the opportunity of seeing them. And so, being considerate and merciful, and being desirous that: “The many people living in such and such towns and villages should gain merit by worshipping the relics, even after I attain Parinibbāna,” they made a resolution thus: “Let my relics break up to pieces and be scattered.” This being the case, the relics of the short-lived Buddhas, like those of our Buddha, broke into pieces and were scattered like gold dust.

The people built a large relic shrine (stūpa), one league in height and also one league in circumference, and enshrined the one and only relic of Buddha Kassapa in it. Each side in one direction measuring one mile in length, and each side had a large entry gate so that the intervening distance between one gate and the next was one mile.

King Kiki of Bārāṇasī donated one gate; his son, Prince Pathavindhara, donated another; the officials, led by the army general, donated the third; and the public, led by a rich man, donated the last. The bricks used for building the large shrine were only of gold and precious stones; and each brick was worth 100,000 pieces of money. In building the shrine, realgar was used for cement and fragrant butter oil was used for water. After the large shrine had thus been built, two friends of good families renounced the world and entered the monkhood in the presence of senior disciples who had followed the Buddha during his lifetime.

10: The Story of Sātāgiri and Hemavata – 452

It is to be noted especially that in the Dispensation of long-lived Buddhas, only such senior disciples were qualified to perform ordination of novices and of monastics and to give guidance to them. Those who became disciples only after the Parinibbāna of the Buddha were not qualified to undertake such tasks.

Then the said two monk-friends of good family asked the senior disciples: “Sir, what are the tasks of monks to be undertaken in the Dispensation of the Buddha?” Thereupon the senior disciples (sāvaka) addressed them in reply: “Monks, there are two duties for monks to fulfil in the Dispensation of the Buddha: 1) The practice of insight meditation (vāsa-dhura) and 2) the learning or teaching of the scriptures (pariyatti-dhura). Of these two a monk of good family stays with his preceptors for five years, attending to their needs, learning and mastering the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) and two or three sections (bhāṇavāra) of the discourses (sutta) and taking proper training in insight (vipassanā) meditation and also cutting off attachment to his company of fellow monks, as well as to his male and female supporters. And, after entering a big forest, away from people, he practises meditation for the realization of Awakening. This is the monastic duty, the practice of insight meditation (vāsa-dhura). Or he should, according to his ability, learn and become skilled in one collection (nikāya) of the baskets (piṭaka), or two, three, four or five collection of the baskets and should strive for the development of the correct and pure learning (pariyatti-sāsana) in the letter and the spirit. This is the duty of the monk, to learn or teach (pariyatti-dhura).” [362]

Saying: “Of the two duties that monks should fulfil, the practice of insight meditation (vāsa-dhura) is superior and more praiseworthy,” the two monk friends nevertheless agreed: “We are still young. We should fulfil the practice of insight meditation only when we grow older. Before we become old, we shall practise for the fulfilment and completion of the duty of learning or teaching of the scriptures (pariyatti-dhura).” Intelligent by nature, they became well-versed in all three baskets (piṭaka) within a short period of time and were also very skilled in making decisions on questions of the Discipline (Vinaya). By virtue of their knowledge of the scriptures, the two monk-friends became renowned in the Dispensation (Sāsana) and they came to always have a large retinue and plenty of gifts and offerings. Each of them had as many as 500 monk followers. The two elders remained giving exhortation (ovāda) to the four assemblies of people who came to their presence. This being the case, the Dispensation prospered and shone as if the Buddha had reappeared.

Dhamma and Not Dhamma

At that time, there lived two monks, one who taught Dhamma (Dhamma-vādī) and one who taught what was against Dhamma (adhamma-vādī), in a monastery near a village. Of the two, the monk who taught what was against Dhamma was cruel and harsh in speech. One day, when the monk who taught Dhamma came to know clearly about the other monk's offence against some disciplinary rule (sikkhāpada), he rebuked the latter thus: "My friend, your conduct is unbecoming of the Dispensation (Sāsana)!" Thereupon the monk who taught what was against Dhamma, in order to disrupt the original trend of speech, retorted by saying: "My friend, what do you see of me? What do you hear of me? Don't make any rash accusation!" The monk who taught Dhamma replied: "My friend, the noble elders who are upholders of the Discipline (Vinaya-dhāra) will know best."

The monk who taught what was against Dhamma, thinking: "If the elders who uphold the Discipline are to decide this matter according to the Vinaya, I will certainly have no support to resort to in the Dispensation (Sāsana)," and he went instantly to the two elders who uphold the Discipline. He approached them with certain requisites as presents in order to beguile and persuade them to favour him. He respectfully made obeisance and offered what he had brought to them and tried to receive their guidance. He pretended to be one who had due respect for them and was desirous of staying near them at their service.

One day the monk who taught what was against Dhamma went to the meeting place of the elders who uphold the Discipline and after paying respects to them remained standing obstinately even though elders asked him to leave. The elders asked him: "Friend, do you have anything special to tell us?" and he replied: "Yes, sirs, there is. I have had a dispute with another monk over a breach of a precept. If he, the complainant (codaka) monk, comes to you and reports this matter, please do not decide according to what is deemed suitable." When the elders replied: "In the matter that has been brought before the Saṅgha, it is not fit and proper not to give a decision according to what is deemed right," he begged them, saying: "Venerable sirs, if such a decision is made, there will be no support for me to resort to in the Dispensation (Sāsana). Let this misdeed be my own. I shall bear its consequences in Saṃsāra. Just do not come to a decision in that matter, please!”

Being persistently and unavoidably pressed by the monk who taught what was against Dhamma, the elders who uphold the Discipline finally gave in and said: “All right, monk!” After obtaining the consent of the elders who uphold the Discipline, the monk who taught what was against Dhamma went back to the village monastery; and, thinking: “I have done everything I wanted to do with the elders who uphold the Discipline,” and he became more domineering, repressive, contemptuous, harsh and adamant in dealing with the monk who taught Dhamma.

The monk who taught Dhamma, thinking: “This monk who taught what was against Dhamma has in fact no fear indeed!” instantly departed from the monastery and went to the thousand monks who were the followers of the elders who uphold the Discipline and addressed them: “Brethren, should not the matter coming up to the Saṅgha be decided in accordance with the Discipline? Or, without allowing the matter to come up to the Saṅgha, should not the complainant (codaka) monk and the accused (cuditaka) monk be made to admit their own faults and have their dispute amicably settled? But now, these elders who uphold the Discipline neither decide the matter by themselves nor allow it to be amicably settled by us through compromise. What does [363] this mean?” On hearing the words of the monk who taught Dhamma and thinking: “There must have been some irregular thing already known to the elders who uphold the Discipline,” the thousand monastic disciples of the elders who uphold the Discipline did not give any reply but remained silent.

Taking advantage of this, the monk who taught what was against Dhamma said in repressive terms: “My friend, you have said previously that the elders who uphold the Discipline would know. Well, you had better report that matter now to them.” He then departed after saying harshly: “From now on, you are totally ruined! Don’t come back to the village monastery where we dwell!”

Thereafter the monk who taught Dhamma went to the elders who uphold the Discipline and bewailed loudly: “Venerable sirs, thinking: “This monk who taught what was against Dhamma attends to our needs and pleases us,” you have no consideration for the Dispensation (Sāsana) of the Buddha but have consideration only for an individual; you give no protection to the Dispensation (Sāsana) but only give protection to a shameless immoral individual (alajjī- dussīla-puggala). Sirs, from today onwards you ought not to decide any matter coming under the Vinaya. On this day does Buddha Kassapa attain Parinibbāna indeed!” he then departed from the elders who uphold the Discipline, and wept grumbling: “The Dispensation (Sāsana) of Buddha Kassapa has in fact been irreparably ruined!”

10: The Story of Sātāgiri and Hemavata – 455

Thereupon the two elders who uphold the Discipline were deeply agitated and became remorseful (kukkucca), saying: “Showing regard and giving protection only to that shameless immoral individual, we happen to have thrown away the solid jewel of the Dispensation (Sāsana) into the deep waters of a chasm.” Injured and oppressed in mind and heart by remorse, they were not reborn in any higher realm upon their death.

Of the two elders, one was reborn as a Yakkha by the name of Hemavata on Mount Hemavata of the Himavanta, and the other was reborn also as a Yakkha by the name of Sātāgiri on Mount Sāta in the Middle Country (Majjhima-desa). The thousand monk followers of these two elders were not reborn in any higher celestial abode either. Since they had followed the same practice as that of the two elders, they were reborn as followers, 500 to each of the two Yakkhas. The supporters of the four requisites of the elders who uphold the Discipline, however, took rebirth on some higher planes of Deva existence.

Both Hemavata and Sātāgiri were Devas of great power and glory and included in the list of 28 Deva generals. It was the custom of the Devas to hold meetings to make decisions in judicial proceedings eight times each month at the pavilion called Nāgavatī,<sup>157</sup> on the flat realgar rock-surface in the Himavanta forests. These two Yakkhas usually participated in the meetings.

Sātāgiri and Hemavata, seeing each other in the said meetings of Devas and remembering their past lives in the human world, asked each other regarding the place of their present existence thus: “Friend, in which place have you been reborn? As for you, friend, what is your place of rebirth?” And they were afflicted with great anguish when recounting their fate: “Friend, we have in fact been irreparably ruined! Even though we had practised the Dhamma for the whole period of 20,000 years during the Dispensation (Sāsana) of Buddha Kassapa in the past, we were reborn as Yakkhas because of our shameless, immoral and wicked friend. Our supporters of the four requisites have, however, been reborn in the higher realms of sensual pleasures.”

The Mutual Promises

Thereafter, Sātāgiri told Hemavata: “My friend Hemavata, the Himavanta where you are living is said to be a marvellous and extraordinary place. So, in case you see and hear anything strange and irregular, kindly come and let me know.” Hemavata also told Sātāgiri: “My friend Sātāgiri, the Middle Country, where you are living, is a region where noble personages appear or live, and is said to be a marvellous and extraordinary country. In case you see and hear anything strange and irregular, please come and inform me.” In this manner the two friends, Sātāgiri and Hemavata had made a mutual promise, and lived on without being able to discard their lives as Yakkhas; even one immeasurable period between the appearance of one Buddha and that of another (Buddhantara-kappa) had passed in the meantime. During this period the [364] great earth had also risen as much as one league and three miles.

At that time, our Bodhisatta had been practising and developing the ten perfections (pāramī) during the whole period of four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, from the time he received the definite prophecy from Buddha Dīpaṅkara about his becoming a Buddha to the time of his life as King Vessantara. He was then reborn in Tusita realm and lived through the full lifespan of a Deva. At the request made by the Devas who had come from the 10,000 world-element, after making the five great investigations, he gave his assent to them to become a Buddha. He next took conception in the lotus-like womb of Queen Mahā Māyā in this human world, causing the 10,000 world-element to tremble while the 32 great omens were appearing.

These two friends, Sātāgiri and Hemavata, were aware of the appearance of the 32 great omens at the time when the Bodhisatta took conception; but it so happened that they did not take notice of them. They failed to reflect: “These great omens appear on account of the Bodhisatta being conceived.” The 32 great omens distinctly appeared also on the occasion of the Bodhisatta’s birth, on the occasion of his renunciation of the world and on the occasion of his becoming a Buddha. Although they were aware of the appearance of these great omens, they did not ponder and realize: “These great omens appear on account of these events.”

When the Buddha summoned the Group-of-Five monks and taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, which is of three phases and twelve aspects, there was the distinct occurrence of a severe earthquake as well as that of the marvellous and extraordinary 32 great omens. This was first taken notice of only by Sātāgiri of the two Devas, and, knowing that the Buddha was then teaching the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, the primary cause of the omens, he went into the presence of the Buddha together with his retinue of 500 Yakkhas and listened to the teaching of the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka). But he was unable to attain any significant path and fruition.

The reason was that Sātāgiri, while listening to the Dhamma Wheel discourse, remembered his friend, Hemavata, and surveyed the audience, wondering: “Has my friend Hemavata come to this Dhamma assembly? Or, has he not come?” Not finding Hemavata, his mind became distracted: “How could my friend Hemavata be so late! He might not be able to listen to the Buddha’s teaching of the Dhamma Wheel, which is so wonderful and splendid in letter and in spirit!” For this very reason, he was unable to realise any important path and fruition.

The Buddha had not yet concluded the teaching of the Dhamma Wheel discourse even by sunset. Thereupon, thinking: “I will go and bring my friend Hemavata to listen to the Dhamma Wheel discourse,” Sātāgiri created vehicles of elephants, horses, Garuḷas, etc. and travelled through the air in the direction where Hemavata and his retinue of 500 Yakkhas were.

The Meeting of Sātāgiri and Hemavata in the Sky

Even though the 32 great omens appeared on the occasions of the Bodhisatta’s conception, birth, renunciation, becoming a Buddha and Parinibbāna, they did not last long but disappeared in a moment. At the time when the Buddha taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, however, not only were the 32 great omens of awesome, marvellous and extraordinary nature but they did not disappear in a moment. In fact, they remained for quite a long time before disappearing. Seeing the marvellous and extraordinary appearance of the 32 great omens while inside the Himavanta forests, Hemavata also thought thus: “Ever since my birth in this forest, this great mountain has never been so marvellously and extraordinarily delightful and perfect. It has so happened now. Therefore, in accordance with our promise I will go and bring my friend, Sātāgiri, right away, to luxuriate in these marvellous flowers of the Himavanta forests.” And, as in the case of Sātāgiri, he also created vehicles of elephants, horses, Garuḷas, etc. and made an aerial journey in the direction of the Middle Country, accompanied by his retinue of 500 Yakkhas.

10: The Story of Sātāgiri and Hemavata – 458

The two Yakkhas met each other in the sky above Rājagaha city. When asked by the other [365] as to the reason for his visit, Hemavata said: “My friend, Sātāgiri, ever since I became a Yakkha in the Himavanta forests, this great Hemavata mountain has never had such a delightful appearance with trees blossoming unseasonally. So, I have come to call on you, with the intention of enjoying these marvelous flowers of the Himavanta forests together with you.”

When Sātāgiri asked Hemavata: “My friend, Hemavata, do you know why these flowers blossom unseasonally and so marvellously?” The latter replied: “I do not know, my friend, Sātāgiri.” Sātāgiri then told Hemavata: “My friend, Hemavata, this marvellous and extraordinary feature has happened not only in this Himavanta. In fact, the same has happened everywhere in the 10,000 world-element. My friend, Hemavata, a Buddha has appeared in the three worlds of humans, Devas and Brahmas. The Buddha is at present teaching the Dhamma Wheel discourse in the Deer Park called Isipatana, near Bārāṇasī city. Because of the teaching of the Dhamma Wheel discourse by the Buddha, the 32 marvellous, unprecedented and extraordinary great omens have distinctly appeared all over the world.”

Lady Kāḷī Becomes a Stream-Enterer

It was the day in which the grand festival of the month of July (Āsāḷha) was being celebrated. At that time, like a divine damsel enjoying divine luxury in the divine city of Tāvātimsa, which was adorned with ornaments everywhere, a lady, by the name of Kāḷī who was pregnant, residing in Rājagaha city which she had returned to to have her baby in her parent’s home, having gone up to the upper terrace of her parents’ mansion and having opened the lion-adorned window, was standing and getting some air, to ease the pains of her impending labour.

Lady Kāḷī hailed from Rājagaha city. On coming of age, she was married in [371] Kuraraghara in Avantī. When she was close to giving birth, she had gone back to her parents’ home for confinement. She went up to the terrace of the mansion and while taking air to alleviate her suffering from the coming childbirth, she overheard the attributes of the Buddha being spoken of by the two Yakkhas.

Overhearing the whole conversation between the two Yakkhas generals, relating to the attributes of the Buddha, Lady Kālī became attentive to them and thought: “The Buddhas are indeed thus endowed with marvellous and extraordinary qualities!” and so thinking, she was overwhelmed with joy and delight. Even while standing at that very place in the state of joy, and removing the hindrances by means of that joy, she practised insight meditation and thereby realised the fruition of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti). Lady Kālī, being the first Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) and noble female disciple (ariya-sāvika) established amongst women was, as it were, the eldest sister of womankind. On that very night, she gave birth to a son who later on became Ven. Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa. After staying in her parents’ house for as long as she liked, she returned to her Kuraraghara home.

Thus, without even encountering and beholding the Buddha in the past and just by overhearing, she came to have absolute faith in the attributes of the Buddha and was established in the Stream-entry fruition (Sotāpatti-phala), like one who effortlessly takes a meal already prepared and laid out for someone else. On this very account, when the Buddha was later sitting in the midst of the Saṅgha, holding a convocation to confer titles of pre-eminence to the female devotees (upāsikā), he declared: “Dear monks, Lady Kālī of Kuraraghara is the most noble and excellent of all the laywomen (upāsikā) who had absolute faith in the Three Treasures just by hearing!” and designated her foremost among those having faith through hearing (anussava-pasāda).

The Discourse about Hemavata

Praising the Buddha

Sātāgiri told his friend, Hemavata, that the Buddha had definitely appeared and, being desirous of taking him to the Buddha, he addressed him thus (Snp 1.9, Hemavata-sutta):

Ajja pannaraso uposatho, dibbā ratti upaṭṭhitā, anomanāmaṃ Sathhāraṃ, handa passāma Gotamaṃ.

My friend, Hemavata, today is in fact the full moon Observance Day (Uposatha) of the fifteenth lunar day! Tonight is a very pleasant night in which the whole of Jambudīpa appears as if it were most beautifully decorated by the bodily light of the Devas and Brahmas who have come from the 10,000 world-element to listen to the discourse, for it is the day the Buddha teaches the Dhamma Wheel discourse, by the shining colours of their attire and celestial mansions, by the light of the moon, the stars and the lunar mansions and also by the bodily light of Visuddhi Deva and the Buddha himself. My friend Hemavata, do not be confused with doubt whether he is the Buddha or not. Come! Let us even now go and worship the Buddha Gotama, who is endowed with undiminished qualities, who possesses such special epithets as Buddha, Fortunate One, etc., and who is the teacher of humans, Devas and Brahmas.

On hearing the words of Sātāgiri, Hemavata pondered and thought thus: “This Sātāgiri boldly asserts that the personage, whom he has met and seen, is a genuine omniscient Buddha, saying: “Let us even now go and worship the Buddha Gotama, who is endowed with undiminished qualities, who possesses such special epithets as Buddha, Fortunate One, etc.” Omniscient Buddhas are in fact rare and hardly accessible in the world. Such persons as Pūraṇa Kassapa and others, who claimed to be omniscient Buddhas ruined many people by imparting wrong knowledge to them. If the monk Gotama, whom Sātāgiri has seen, is a genuine omniscient Buddha, he ought to be one genuinely endowed with the quality of being undisturbed or unshaken by the favourable and unfavourable conditions of the world (tādi-guṇa). Therefore, I will first find out whether he is or is not one endowed with unshakability which is possessed only by Buddhas.” And, desiring to question about the signs of unshakability (tādi-lakkhaṇa), he recited this verse:

Kacci mano supañihito, sabba-bhūtesu tādino, kacci iṭṭhe aniṭṭhe ca, saṅkappassa vasī-katā? [366]

My friend Sātāgiri, what is he like? Is the mind of the Buddha, whom you have seen, naturally and entirely free from love and hate for all beings and steady as befitting one endowed with unshakability? What is he like? Is Buddha Gotama, whom you have seen, capable of freeing himself from or overcoming sensual thoughts (kāma-vitakka), malevolent thoughts (vyāpāda-vitakka), and violent thoughts (vihiṃsā-vitakka) which are apt to generate love and hate for desirable objects and undesirable objects respectively?

Thereupon Sātāgiri, having been absolutely convinced that the Buddha was certainly an omniscient Buddha and being desirous of replying to the questions put by Hemavata regarding the entire set of attributes of the omniscient Buddha, answered by reciting this verse:

Mano cassa supañihito, sabba-bhūtesu tādino, atho iṭṭhe aniṭṭhe ca, saṅkappaṣa vaṣī-katā.

My friend Hemavata, the mind of the Buddha, whom I have seen, is naturally and entirely free from love and hate for all beings, as befitting one endowed with unshakability.

Even at the time when the perfections were being practised and developed for his becoming a Buddha, the Bodhisatta was endowed with unshakability, not to speak of his unshakability at present when he has become a Buddha!

In his life as the Chaddanta elephant king, he entertained no animosity towards the hunter Soṇuttara who deliberately killed him, but, instead, he cut off his tusks himself and gave them to Soṇuttara in generosity.

In his life as the monkey king also, he had no hatred even for the hostile Brahmin who struck his head with a stone in order to kill him, but, instead, he showed the Brahmin the way out from the forest without anger.

In his life as Vidhura the wise also, he had no hatred for the Yakkha Puṇṇaka who dragged him by the two legs and very cruelly threw him upside down or headlong into the ravine at the foot of Mount Kāḷa which measured 60 leagues; he even taught the Dhamma to him.”

That was why Sātāgiri boldly gave the answer: “The mind of the Buddha whom I have seen is naturally and entirely free from love and hate for all beings, as befitting one endowed with unshakability.”

My friend Hemavata, the Buddha whom I have seen is capable of freeing himself from or overcoming sensual thoughts (kāma-vitakka), malevolent thoughts (vyāpāda-vitakka), and violent thoughts (vihiṃsā-vitakka) which are apt to generate love and hate for desirable objects and undesirable objects respectively.

Thus, when Hemavata put the question, first with regard to the mind-door or thought (manodvāra), whether or not the Buddha was fully endowed with unshakability, he got the affirmative reply from Sātāgiri. Being desirous of questioning again, in order to be more certain whether or not there was, in the Buddha, purity of the three doors (dvāra) of actions at present, or in other words, after hearing the affirmative reply given by Sātāgiri to the question, first put briefly, whether or not the Buddha was endowed with unshakability with regard to the three doors, and being desirous of questioning again in detail in order to make the answer firmer, Hemavata asked again by reciting this verse:

Kacci adinnaṃ nādiyati, kacci pāṇesu saññato, kacci ārā pamādamhā, kacci jhānaṃ na riñcati?

My friend Sātāgiri, what is the Buddha, whom you have seen like? Is he one who is free from taking another's property without being given by the owner physically or verbally? Is he one who completely abstains from the evil act of killing beings? Is he free from [367] attachment to the five objects of sensual pleasures and far from unmindfulness which consists of sexual conduct, and unchastity? Is he one who has discarded the five hindrances but who has not allowed attainment of the absorptions (jhāna) to become extinct?

The Buddha abstains from taking what is not given (adinnādāna) and other forms of wrongdoing not only in his last life as a Buddha but also during the whole long period in the past he abstained from these evils. By virtue of his meritorious act of abstinence from such evils is he endowed with the marks of a Great Man (Mahā-purisa-lakkhaṇa).

The whole world also spoke in praise of the Buddha thus: "Gotama abstains from the crime of theft, and so on," hence Sātāgiri, being desirous of replying in clear and bold terms, recited this verse:

Na so adinnaṃ ādiyati, atho pāṇesu saññato, atho ārā pamādamhā, Buddhō jhānaṃ na riñcati.

My friend Hemavata, the Buddha, whom I have seen, is one who is free from taking another's property without being given by the owner physically or verbally. He is one who completely abstains from the evil act of killing beings. He is free from attachment to the five objects of sensual pleasures and far from unmindfulness such as acts of sexual misconduct and unchastity. He is also one who has discarded the five hindrances and who has not allowed the attainment of the absorptions (jhāna) to become extinct.

After thus hearing the affirmative reply as regards the purity of deeds (kāya-dvāra) and being desirous of questioning whether or not there was purity of speech (vacī-dvāra), Hemavata asked by reciting this verse:

Kacci musā na bhaṇati, kacci na khīṇa-byappatho, kacci vebhūtiyaṃ nāha, kacci samphaṃ na bhāsati?

My friend Sātāgiri, what is he like? Is the Buddha you have seen, one who does not speak lies? Is he one who does not speak harsh words that tend to make beings upset and depressed? Is he one who does not speak words that mischievously destroy friendship between two persons? Is he one who does not indulge in frivolous talks which are unsubstantial and worthless like undeveloped paddy?

The Buddha abstained from verbal misconduct not only in his last life as a Buddha but also during the whole long period in the past he abstained from telling lies and from other verbal misdeeds. By virtue of his meritorious deeds of abstinence from misbehaviour in words, he is endowed with such signs of a Great Man as a single hair growing in each pore, the hair between the two eyebrows (uṇṇa-loma) and others. The whole world also spoke in praise of the Buddha: “Gotama abstains from misconduct such as telling lies,” and so on.

Hence, Sātāgiri, being desirous of replying in clear and bold terms recited this verse:

Musā ca so na bhaṇati, atho na khīṇa-byappatho, atho vebhūtiyaṃ nāha, mantā atthaṃ ca bhāsati.

My friend Hemavata, it is true that the Buddha, whom I have seen, is one who does not tell lies. It is also true that he is one who does not speak harsh and nasty words. It is also true that he does not speak mischievous words. He speaks only words which are discreet and beneficial. [368]

Hemavata, after hearing the positive reply as regards the purity of speech and being desirous of questioning whether or not the Buddha had, at present, purity of consciousness; had overcome ignorance and was endowed with the five eyes, asked by reciting this verse:

Kacci na rajjati kāmesu, kacci cittaṃ anāvilāṃ, kacci mohāṃ atikkanto, kacci dhammesu cakkhumā?

My friend Sāgāri, what is he like? Is the Buddha, whom you have seen, truly one free from covetousness (abhijjhā) for the five material objects of sensual pleasures? Is the mind of the Buddha, whom you have seen, free from the unhealthy mental condition agitated by hate (vyāpāda)? Is the Buddha, whom you have seen, truly one who has overcome the fourfold delusion (moha), which is the basic cause of wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi)? Is he truly one who is endowed with the eye of wisdom penetrating all things without hindrance?

Bearing in mind that: “One is not yet a Buddha merely on account of the purity of the three sense spheres, but one becomes a Buddha only if he is endowed with omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa), or the five eyes,” he asked: Is he truly one who is endowed with the eye of wisdom, penetrating all the things without hindrance?

Even before realising the Arahat fruition (Arahatta-phala) and while still at the moment of his attainment of the Non-returning path (Anāgāmī-magga), the Buddha became free from the defilement of craving for sensual objects and also free from the defilement of ill-will, an unhealthy mental state, since he had already discarded the defilement of sensual pleasure (kāma-rāga-kilesa) and the defilements of ill-will (vyāpāda-kilesa). Even at the moment of his attainment of Stream-entry, he was already one who had overcome ignorance since he had already discarded delusion which conceals the four truths (sacca-paṭicchādaka-moha), which is the cause of wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi).

He had already earned the title Buddha, and realised insight knowledge as well, since he had discerned the four truths unaided and with self-born knowledge (sayambhū-ñāṇa). Hence, Sātāgiri, being desirous of boldly proclaiming the fact that the Buddha possessed purity in respect of his consciousness and having attained omniscience, was a genuine Buddha, replied by reciting this verse:

Na so rajjati kāmesu, atho cittaṃ anāvilāṃ, sabba-mohaṃ atikkanto, Buddho dhammesu cakkhumā.

My friend Hemavata, the Buddha, whom I have seen, is truly one free from covetousness for material objects or sensual pleasures. The mind of the Buddha, whom I have seen, is also free from ill-will. The Buddha, whom I have seen, is truly one who has overcome the entire fourfold delusion, which is the basic cause of wrong view. Since he has penetratingly discerned all things with self-born knowledge, he has earned the title Buddha and has also been endowed with the five eyes.

In this manner Hemavata was greatly delighted and rejoiced in hearing and knowing that the Buddha possessed purity in respect of the three sense spheres and was a genuine omniscient Buddha. Being himself one endowed with the auspiciousness of great learning (bāhu-sacca-maṅgala) in his past life during

Buddha Kassapa’s Dispensation, and being therefore a fluent, learned and effective speaker with very pure knowledge and wisdom, and desiring again to hear the further marvellous and extraordinary qualities of the Buddha, he asked by reciting this verse: [369]

kaccissa āsavā khīṇā, kacci natthi punabbhavo?*

My friend Sātāgiri, is the Buddha, whom you have seen, truly one endowed with the eye of understanding (vijjā) which all the Buddhas should be endowed with? Is he truly one who possesses the fifteenfold pure conduct, resembling good legs used for walking up to Nibbāna? Is the Buddha, whom you have seen, already devoid of the four pollutants (āsava)? Is the Buddha, whom you have seen, free from the possibility of appearing in a new existence, or being reborn?

Thereupon, Sātāgiri, since he had profound and decided faith in the Buddha’s genuine omniscient Buddhahood and a desire to affirm that the Buddha was fully endowed with all the qualities asked about by Hemavata, answered by reciting this verse:

Vijjāya ceva sampanno, atho saṃsuddha-cāraṇo, sabbassa āsavā khīṇā, natthi tassa punabbhavo.

My friend Hemavata, the Buddha, whom I have seen, is truly one endowed with the eye of understanding which all the Buddhas should be endowed with. He is also truly one who possessed the fifteenfold pure conduct, resembling good legs used for walking to Nibbāna. The Buddha, whom I have seen, is already devoid of the four pollutants. The Buddha, whom I have seen, is free from the possibility of appearing in a new existence.

Hemavata then became free from doubt about the Buddha, thinking thus: “The Buddha, whom Sātāgiri has now seen, is a genuine Buddha, Perfectly Self-Awakened (Sammā-sambuddha) and supreme in the three worlds.” Even while still remaining in the sky, therefore, he recited this verse in order to praise the Buddha and delight Sātāgiri:

Sampannaṃ Munino cittaṃ, kammunā byappathena ca, vijjā-caraṇa-sampannaṃ, dhammato naṃ pasāṃsati.

My friend Sātāgiri, the mind of the Buddha, whom you have seen, is endowed with unshakability. He is endowed with purity of deeds, words and thoughts. My friend Sātāgiri, you have rightfully spoken in praise of the Buddha who is endowed with the three understandings (vijjā), the eight understandings and the fifteen ways of good conduct (caraṇa).

Thereupon, Sātāgiri, with the intention of gladdening Hemavata once again, recited this verse meaning: My friend Hemavata, what you have said is perfectly true. Now you, my friend, know the qualities of the Buddha fully well and are greatly delighted:

*Sampannaṃ Munino cittaṃ, kammunā byappathena ca,
vijjā-caraṇa-sampannaṃ, dhammato anumodasi.*

My friend Hemavata, the mind of the Buddha whom I have seen is endowed with unshakability. He is endowed with purity of deeds, words and thoughts. My friend Hemavata, you have rightfully rejoiced in the Buddha who is endowed with the three understandings, the eight understandings and the fifteen ways of good conduct.

And so saying and intending to urge Hemavata to go along with him to the Buddha, [370] Sātāgiri asked with this verse:

Sampannaṃ Munino cittaṃ, kammunā byappathena ca, vijjā-caraṇa-sampannaṃ, handa passāma Gotamaṃ.

My friend Hemavata, the mind of the Buddha, whom I have seen, is endowed with unshakability. He is endowed with purity of deeds, words and thoughts. Let us even now go and respectfully behold the Buddha, who is endowed with the three understandings, the eight understandings and the fifteen ways of good conduct.

Thereupon, Hemavata, as one who had acquired the power of great learning since his previous existence, wished to speak in praise of the qualities of the Buddha which appealed to him and to invite Sātāgiri to go along with him and behold the Buddha. Thus, he recited the following verses:

Eṇi-jaṅghaṃ kisaṃ vīraṃ, appāhāraṃ alolupaṃ, muniṃ vanasmim̐ jhāyantaṃ, ehi passāma Gotamaṃ.

Come, Sātāgiri, let us go. Let us behold the Buddha of the Gotama lineage whose calves are round and graceful like those of an antelope (eṇī) living in the upper reaches of the forest; whose limbs and other parts of the body, big and small, are appropriately long in five features, short in four, small in four, tall in six, and round where they should be round; who is diligent and capable of resisting and fighting the dangers from within and without the body; who takes only one meal a day just to sustain his body; who has done away with excessive craving (loluppa-taṇhā) with regard to food; who is in full possession of the knowledge of the four paths; and who usually dwells in the absorptions in a secluded forest.

Sīhaṁveka-caraṁ nāgaṁ, kāmesu anapekkhināṁ, upasaṅkamma pucchāma, maccupāsappa-mocanaṁ.

My friend Sātāgiri, let us go into the presence of the Buddha, who, like the Kesara lion king, cannot be easily approached by ordinary persons; who can forbear the vicissitudes of the world; who is fearless; who is the one and only Buddha appearing in a universe; who, like the Chaddanta elephant king, is endowed with great physical and intellectual power; and who is free from any desire and passion for all the material objects of sensual pleasures. Let us ask him about Nibbāna, which will surely deliver us from the round of suffering in the three planes of existence, the snare of the King of Death.

In this way Hemavata urged Sātāgiri and the retinue of 1,000 Yakkhas to go along with him and worship the Buddha and listen to the discourse.

The Two Yakkhas Go to the Buddha

Sātāgiri and Hemavata, accompanied by their 1,000 Yakkha followers, reached the Deer Park at Isipatana in Bārāṇasī city at midnight. And, after approaching and paying respects to the Buddha, who had not changed his posture but who was still sitting cross-legged as he did at the time when he taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, they recited this verse to extol the Buddha and to request permission to question him:

Akkhā-tāraṁ pavattāraṁ, sabba-dhammāna' pāraguṁ, Buddhaṁ vera-bhayātītaṁ, mayāṁ pucchāma Gotamaṁ.

To the Buddha Gotama, who preaches the four noble truths, both briefly and in detail; who is fully endowed with the knowledge of all things (dhamma) in six ways: via super knowledge (abhiññā), analysis (pariññā), abandoning (pahāna), meditation (bhāvanā), realisation of Nibbāna (sacchikiriya), and attainment of the absorptions (jhāna-samāpatti); who has awakened from the slumber of delusion (moha); and who has freed himself from the five wrong ways, such as taking life (pāṇātipātā), etc., may we have your permission to question you on what we do not know?

After asking for permission, Hemavata, who had the greater power and wisdom between the two, questioned him on things that were unknown to themselves, by reciting the following verse:

Kisimīṃ loko samuppanno, kisimīṃ kubbati santhavaṃ, kissa loko upādāya, kisimīṃ loko vihaññati?

Exalted Buddha, when what clearly comes into existence, do the two worlds: [372] the world of sentient beings (satta-loka) and the world of conditioned things (saṅkhāra-loka) come into existence? In what do all beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, intimately associate themselves with craving and wrong view (taṇhā-diṭṭhi), thinking ‘I’ and ‘mine.’ After what are the world of sentient beings and the world of conditioned things so-called? When what clearly appears do all beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, become miserable?

Thereupon the Buddha, intending to answer the question put by Hemavata on the strength of the six internal organs of sense: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind (ajjhattikāyatana) and of the six external objects of sense: form, sound, smell, taste, touch and ideas formed in the mind (bāhirāyatana), replied by reciting this verse:

Chasu loko samuppanno, chasu kubbati santhavaṃ, channam-eva upādāya, chasu loko vihaññati.

Hemavata, when the six internal organs and the six external objects come into existence, the two worlds, the world of sentient beings and the world of conditioned things, come into existence.

In terms of absolute reality (paramattha-dhamma), the world of sentient beings, meaning the aggregate of beings, i.e., humans, Devas and Brahmas, is just a compound of these twelve bases, namely, the six internal: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind; and the six external: form, sound, smell, taste, contact and idea formed in the mind. Without these twelve bases, there can be no such thing as a being, whether human, Deva and Brahma. In terms of absolute reality, the world of conditioned things, meaning such things as farms, land, gold, silver, paddy, etc., only consists of six external bases. Without these six, there can be no the world of inanimate conditioned things. Hence the Buddha's answer: Chasu loko samuppanno ..., "when the six internal and six external bases come into existence, the two worlds, the world of sentient beings and the world of inanimate conditioned things, come into existence."

10: The Story of Sātāgiri and Hemavata – 469

Hemavata, in the six internal and the six external bases do all beings, i.e., humans, Devas and Brahmas, intimately associate themselves with craving and wrong view through the notion of 'I' and 'mine.'

All beings, i.e., humans, Devas and Brahmas, who, in close friendship with craving and wrong view, take "I," "another," "man," "woman," "farm," "land," etc. to be "I" and "mine," are a composition of the same six internal and six external bases in terms of absolute reality. This is true. Taking the eye to be "I" and "mine," beings make friends with craving and wrong view; taking the ear to be "I" and "mine," they make friends with craving and wrong view; likewise they do so with regard to the nose, the tongue, the body, the mind and also with regard to forms, sounds, smells, tastes, touches, such as hardness or softness, heat or cold, etc., and the ideas conceived in the mind. Hence the Buddha's answer: Chasu kubbati santhavam ... "In the six internal and the six external bases do all beings, humans, Devas and Brahmas, intimately associate themselves with craving and wrong view through the notion of 'I' and 'mine.'"

Hemavata, the six internal and the six external bases are the so-called world of sentient beings and the world of conditioned things.

With reference to the aforesaid twelve bases, the names, such as: "Humans," "Devas," "Brahmas," that is, the world of sentient beings and the names, such as "farm," "land," "rice," "paddy," etc., the world of inanimate conditioned things came into existence.

Hemavata, when the six internal and the six external bases clearly appear all sentient beings, i.e., humans, Devas, and [373] Brahmas, become miserable.

According to the Instruction about Burning (Āditta-pariyāya-sutta, SN 35.28), the twelve bases are ablaze with the eleven fires of lust, hate, and delusion (rāga-dosa-moha), etc. From the point of view of the highest truth, the world of sentient beings, consisting of humans, Devas and Brahmas, is also just these twelve bases, six internal and six external. The bases are also perpetually and severally ablaze with the eleven fires. Because there are bases, there is burning; because there is burning, there is misery. If there were no bases, there would have been no burning; if there were no burning, there would have been no misery. That is why the Buddha answered thus: Chasu loko vihaññati ... “when the six internal and the six external bases clearly appear all beings, i.e., humans, Devas and Brahmas, become miserable.”<sup>158</sup>

Thereafter Hemavata, being unable to remember clearly the answer given in brief by the Buddha to the question put by him on the round of suffering, and being desirous of knowing the enumeration of the bases as well as their opposites, as contained in the Buddha’s answer, recited the following verse in order to ask about the round of suffering (vaṭṭa) and the cessation of the round of suffering (vivaṭṭa), respectively:

Katamaṃ taṃ upādānaṃ, yattha loko vihaññati, niyyānaṃ pucchito brūhi, kathaṃ dukkhā pamuccati?

Exalted Buddha, if, according to the answer: Chasu loko vihaññati ... ‘sentient beings i.e., humans, Devas and Brahmas, become miserable from the existence of the six bases,’ how are these six the cause of misery for beings?

By this the truth of suffering (dukkha-sacca) is directly asked; by asking about the truth of suffering, the truth of the cause of suffering (samudaya-sacca) is also asked.

What is the factor that brings about release from the round of suffering (Samsāra-vaṭṭa)? In what manner can release from the round of suffering be realised? May the Buddha, who has thus been asked about release from the round of suffering, favour us with the answer.

By the latter half of this verse is the truth of the path leading to the cessation of suffering (magga-sacca) is directly asked; and by asking the truth of the path leading to the cessation of suffering, the truth of the cessation of suffering i.e., Nibbāna (nirodha-sacca), is also asked.

When Hemavata asked about the four noble truths, mentioning the truth of suffering and the truth of the path leading to the cessation of suffering explicitly, and the truth about the arising of suffering and the truth about the cessation of suffering implicitly, the Buddha delivered the following verse in order to answer the questions asked by Hemavata:

Pañca kāma-guṇā loke, mano-chaṭṭhā paveditā, ettha chandaṃ virājetvā, evaṃ dukkhā pamuccati.

Hemavata, I have clearly shown the five sensual pleasures of form, sound, smell, taste and contact with mind as the sixth in the world (kāma-guṇa).

By the word “mind” in the first half of this verse the mental-sphere (manāyatana) is directly taught; and by teaching the mental-sphere, the mind-object (dhammāyatana) is also taught. By the five sensual pleasures (kāma-guṇa) of form, sound, smell, taste and contact are the five objects (āyatana) [374] directly taught: form-object, sound-object, smell-object, taste-object and contact-object; and by teaching these five sense objects, their five recipients are also taught about eye, ear, nose, tongue and body. Therefore, by the first half of this verse, the six internal bases (ajjhittikāyatana) and the six external bases (bāhirāyatana), totalling twelve in all, are taught; these bases may be referred to as graspings (upādāna), which form the suffering of the world of sentient beings.

Hemavata, craving and desire (taṇhā-chanda) for the aggregate of these twelve bases, the round of suffering and the truth of suffering, must be completely eliminated and destroyed.

For their elimination and destruction, they should first be distinguished either as aggregates, or as bases, or as elements, or briefly, as mind and matter. They should be meditated on to gain insight (vipassanā) by putting them to the test of the three characteristics. Their elimination and destruction eventually comes by means of insight which culminates in the path of the Arahāt fruition. By eliminating and destroying them, one becomes free from the round of suffering.

By the second half of the verse, the question on cessation (vivaṭṭa) is answered, and the truth of the path (magga-sacca) is also shown. The truth of arising (samudaya-sacca) and cessation (nirodha-sacca) are deemed as answered as they have been briefly stated in the previous answer in verse.

In other words, by the first half of the verse is shown the truth of suffering: by the term desire and passion (chanda-rāga) in the second half of the verse is shown the arising of suffering. From the word “having removed” (virājetvā) is derived dispassion (virāga) which is Nibbāna, the cessation of craving, as well as the truth of cessation (nirodha-sacca). By the word “thus” (evaṃ) is shown the truth of the path (magga-sacca), for it means the course of practice in the eightfold path leading to freedom from the suffering of Saṃsāra. In this way, the four truths are proclaimed by the Buddha in this verse.

The Buddha thus showed the excellent way out (niyyāna), which is the eightfold path as a means of escape from the round of births and deaths (Saṃsāra-vaṭṭa). And again, as he desired to conclude his answer on the way out (niyyāna-dhamma) in natural language, he recited the following verse:

Etaṃ lokassa niyyānaṃ, akkhātaṃ vo yathā-tathaṃ, etaṃ vo aham-akkhāmi, evaṃ dukkhā pamuccati.

Hemavata, I have truthfully taught you this means of the eightfold path, which can bring about escape from the conditioned world of the three elements (tedhātuka-saṅkhāra-loka), such as the element of sensual pleasures (kāma-dhātu), the element of materiality (rūpa-dhātu), and the element of immateriality (arūpa-dhātu). Since there can be no escape from suffering in the round of births and deaths (Saṃsāra-vaṭṭa-dukkha), except by way of this eightfold path and since there is no other way of escape even though you might ask 1,000 times, I will only say to you, that this eightfold path is the only excellent Dhamma for escape from the round of births and deaths (Saṃsāra-vaṭṭa). Or, since there can be emancipation from the suffering in the round of births and deaths except through the eightfold path and since there is no other way of emancipation, I will only speak of the eightfold path as the only excellent Dhamma which leads to emancipation from the round of births and deaths to enable you, who have already realised the lower path and fruition, to realise the higher ones.

The Yakkhas Became Stream-Enterers

In this manner, the Buddha concluded the Dhamma discourse perfectly well that had built up to the Arahatta fruition (Arahatta-phala) at its pinnacle. At the end of this discourse, the two Devas, Sātāgiri and Hemavata, were established in Stream-entry fruition (Sotāpatti-phala) along with their retinue of [375] 1,000 Yakkhas.<sup>159</sup>

Thereafter Hemavata, being one who had, by nature, due respect and devotion for the Dhamma and who was now established as a noble Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna), was not content with the Buddha's wonderful Dhamma which was perfect in letter and in spirit. Therefore, desirous of knowing the two causes: the cause of becoming lower noble ones (sekkha-bhūmi-dhamma) and the cause of becoming Arahats (asekkha-bhūmi-dhamma), he addressed the Buddha by reciting the following verse:

Ko sūdha tarati oghaṃ, kodha tarati aṇṇavaṃ, appatiṭṭhe anālambe, ko gambhīre na sīdati?

Exalted Buddha, who is endowed with virtuous conduct in the world, who is able to cross over the rough expanse of waters of the four floods? Who, being endowed with virtuous conduct in this world, is able to cross over the wide and deep ocean of Saṃsāra? Who can remain safe and sound without being drowned in the fathomless ocean of Saṃsāra with nothing below to stand on and nothing above to hang on to?

The cause of becoming lower noble ones was asked about in the first half of this verse, and the cause of becoming Arahats in the latter half.

Thereupon the Buddha recited the following verse as he desired to answer about the cause of becoming lower noble ones:

Sabbadā sīla-sampanno, paññavā susamāhito, ajjhatta-cintī satimā, oghaṃ tarati duttaraṃ.

Hemavata, a monk who is endowed with morality at all times, without breach of precepts, but with care to observe them even at the risk of his life; who is also endowed with mundane and supermundane knowledge; who is also steadfast with neighbourhood concentration (upacāra-samādhi) and full concentration (appanā-samādhi); who by means of insight knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa) repeatedly meditates on the mental and physical aggregates known internally as one's own (niyakajjhatta), by applying the three characteristics; who also possesses mindfulness (sati) which enables him to take up incessantly the threefold training (sikkhā), i.e., virtue, concentration and wisdom (sīla-samādhi-paññā); he, who is thus endowed with these threefold trainings is able to cross over the rough expanse of the four floods, which is hard for ordinary persons to do.

After the Buddha had thus given the answer concerning the cause of becoming lower noble ones, he now recited the following verse in order to give an answer about the cause of becoming Arahats:

Virato kāma-saññāya, sabba-saṃyojanātigo, nandī-bhava-parikkhīno, so gambhīre na sīdati.

Hemavata, a monk, who has accomplished complete abstinence from all the perceptions accompanied by the craving for material objects of sensual pleasures; who has also broken and discarded the long thong of the ten attachments by means of the four paths; in whom the three [376] types of craving and the three states of existence, all collectively called rejoicings (nandī), have completely dried up; who is the Arahata, fully endowed with these qualities, is one not drowned in the vast and fathomless ocean of Saṃsāra with nothing below to stand on and nothing above to hang on to.

He has now reached, with utmost ease, the highland of Nibbāna with a residue remaining (sa-upādisesa-nibbāna) as his craving is exhausted and he is on the edge of Nibbāna without residue remaining (anupādisesa-nibbāna) on account of the cessation of existence. Thus his landing is of utmost ease and comfort, and he is one who is not drowned.

The Two Yakkhas Sing Eulogies

Thereafter Hemavata eyed his friend Sātāgiri as well as the retinue of 1,000 Yakkhas with delight and satisfaction, and spoke the following five verses eulogizing the Buddha. Along with his friend Sātāgiri and the retinue of the thousand Yakkhas, he made obeisance to the Buddha with due respect and devotion and returned home. The five verses of eulogy and veneration were:

*Gambhīra-paññaṃ nipuṇattha-dassinaṃ, akiñcanaṃ kāma-bhave asattaṃ,
taṃ passatha sabbadhi vip̐pamuttaṃ, dibbe pathe kamamaṇaṃ Mahesiṃ.*

O honourable fellow Devas, behold with your own clear eyes the Buddha Gotama, who is endowed with analytical wisdom with regard to such deep things as the aggregates (khandha), the sense-spheres (āyatana), etc.; who thoroughly sees the significance of the questions presented by those of subtle intelligence; who is devoid of the most minute particle of the sevenfold evil of greed, hate, delusion, conceit, wrong view, bad conduct and defilements; who has no attachment for the twofold sensuality and threefold existence; who has full deliverance from the bonds of desire and passion for all sense objects such as the aggregates, the sense-spheres, etc.; who is able to walk up and down on the divine road of the eight attainments; and who has sought such noble qualities as the observance of the code of moral precepts (sīlakkhandha).

*Anoma-nāmaṃ nipuṇattha-dassiṃ, paññā-dadaṃ kāmālaye asattaṃ,
taṃ passatha sabba-viduṃ sumedhaṃ, ariye pathe kamamānaṃ Mahesiṃ.*

O honourable fellow Devas, behold with your own clear eyes the Buddha Gotama, who has extraordinary epithets through undiminished attributes, such as being a Perfectly Self-Awakened One (Sammā-sambuddha); who thoroughly sees the significance of the questions presented by those of subtle intelligence; who disseminates extraordinary knowledge by giving instruction in a sweet and pleasant voice so that others may be moral and knowledgeable; who has no clinging with passion and wrong view such as ‘I’ and ‘mine,’ to the various sensual objects craved for through passion and wrong view; who analytically knows all; who is endowed with knowledge of the perfections that forms the foundation of omniscience; who is able to walk up and down on the divine road of the eight attainments; and who has sought noble qualities such as the observance of the code of moral precepts.

Sudiṭṭhaṃ vata no ajja, [377] suppabhātaṃ suhuṭṭhitāṃ, yaṃ addasāma Sambuddhaṃ, ogha-tiṇṇam-anāsavaṃ.

O honourable fellow Devas, as we have had the good fortune of beholding the Buddha with our eyes that has culminated in the attainment of the paths and fruitions; the Buddha who has crossed over the rough waters of the fourfold flood and who has eliminated the fourfold pollutants (āsava). Our sight of the Buddha, our opportune beholding of his person, has happened today indeed! Such an arrival of the dawn, such a daybreak leaving behind all gloom and blemishes has taken place indeed! Getting up from deep slumber, being wide awake from a sleep without greed, hatred and delusion, has indeed now occurred!

Ime dasa-satā Yakkhā, iddhimanto yasassino, sabbe taṃ saraṇaṃ yanti, tvaṃ no Satthā anuttaro.

Venerable Buddha of sun-bright glory, all these divine Yakkhas, who are endowed with supernormal powers, derived from their past meritorious deeds; who possess plenty of excellent gains and retinue; whose number is 1,000, with their bodies infused with the spirit of the great supermundane refuge, approach together with us to seek protection, believing you to be a shelter. You are our supreme teacher beyond compare, who helps and advises us, giving instruction so that we are able to build the first exquisitely decorated palace of the noble ones.

Te mayam vicarissāma, gāmā gāmaṃ nagā nagaṃ, namassamānā Sambuddhaṃ, Dhammassa ca Sudhammataṃ.

Venerable Buddha of sun-bright glory, from today onwards we will move from one divine village to another, from one divine mountain to another, to proclaim like town-criers, exhorting people to walk the path to Nibbāna and singing in praise of the respective glories of the Three Treasures; we shall proclaim, paying respects to the state of the Buddha, with our clasped hands placed on our heads and our joyous devotion meant for the genuine Buddha, the Lord of the Three Worlds, and full of immeasurable attributes and also to the state of the Dhamma, the way out from the round of suffering, of the teaching which is tenfold, its constituents being the four paths, the four fruitions, Nibbāna and the mass of Dhamma parts.

11: The Discourse about Nālaka

Every time a Buddha appears, there emerges a monk who cultivates the practice of moral perfection (moneyya).<sup>160</sup> At the time when our infinite and supreme Buddha, the Lord of the Three Worlds appeared, the monk who asked the Buddha about the practice of moral perfection and who cultivated it was the monk Nālaka, the nephew of the recluse Kāḷadevila. The account of the young man, Nālaka, having become an ascetic monk even before the appearance of Buddha has been given above.

[I include the relevant part of that chapter first here as a reminder: When the courtiers saw Kāḷadevila laughing and weeping, it occurred to them thus: “Our venerable recluse laughed first, and later he wept, which is strange indeed.” So they enquired: “Venerable sir, is there any danger that might befall our master’s son?” – “There is no danger for the prince. In fact, he will become a Buddha.” – “Then why do you lament?” the people asked again. “Because I shall not get an opportunity to see the attainment of Awakening by an extraordinary man who is endowed with such wonderful qualities, and this will be a great loss to me. So thinking, I lament,” he replied.

Having answered thus, the recluse Kāḷadevila pondered: “Though I will miss the prince’s becoming a Buddha, I wonder whether somebody among my relations will have an opportunity of witnessing it.” Then he foresaw that his nephew, Nālaka, would. So he visited his sister and summoned his nephew and urged him, saying: “My dear nephew, Nālaka, the birth of a son has taken place in the palace of King Suddhodana. He is a Bodhisatta. He will attain Buddhahood at the age of 35. You, my nephew, are somebody deserving of meeting the Buddha. Therefore, you had better become a recluse immediately.”

Though born to the parents who had 870 millions worth of wealth, the young Nālaka had confidence in his uncle, and thought: “My uncle would not have urged me to do what is not beneficial. He did so because it is of benefit indeed.” With this conclusion, he had the robes and the alms bowl bought and brought immediately from the market, thinking: “I have become a recluse with dedication to the Buddha, the noblest personage in the world.”

11: The Discourse about Nālaka – 478

Having said this, he faced the direction of Kapilavatthu where the prince was and made obeisance by raising his clasped hands in veneration. Thereafter, he put his bowl in a bag, slung it on his shoulder and entered the Himālayas. Waiting for the Buddha there in the forest, he devoted himself to asceticism.]

The Buddha taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse on the full moon day of July (Āsāḷha) and caused the 180 million Brahmas along with Ven. Koṇḍañña to enter the path of emancipation. On the fifth waxing moon of the said month, he taught the Group-of-Five the Discourse about the Characteristics of Non-Self (Anatta-lakkhaṇa-sutta, SN 22.59) whereupon they realised the Arahat fruition. On the seventh waxing moon of the month of July (Āsāḷha), the Devas, who had been in the audience listening and who wished for the welfare of Ven. Nālaka, reported to him that the Buddha had appeared and had delivered the discourse on the Dhamma Wheel, by saying: “Ven. Nālaka, the Buddha has already delivered the first discourse of Dhamma Wheel at the Deer Park in Isipatana! The Buddha has, in fact, visibly appeared among humans, Devas and Brahmas!”

Ever since he became a recluse 35 years previously, Ven. Nālaka had been waiting for the appearance of the Buddha. He had even abandoned the hereditary practice of immersion in water, bearing in mind: “If there is too much of immersion in water, the ears will get damaged. If the ears are damaged, the words of the Dhamma cannot be heard, thereby depriving me of the chance of hearing the Dhamma.”

On hearing the news given by the Devas, he was delighted and said to himself: “The time has indeed arrived that my uncle Kāḷadevila advised me about.” Then on the seventh waxing moon of the month of July (Āsāḷha), he left Himavanta and proceeded to the Deer Park in Isipatana. On arrival there, he saw the Buddha sitting cross-legged on the eminent Buddha-seat, awaiting and expecting him: “Nālaka will arrive today. I will teach him the path to moral perfection (moneyya).” Nālaka was very much overwhelmed with faith and devotion, so he respectfully made obeisance to the Buddha and questioned him, reciting these two verses:

Aññātam-etam vacanam, Asitassa yathā-tatham, tam tam Gotama pucchāmi, sabba-dhammāna' pāraguṃ.

Exalted Buddha of the Gotama lineage! Now that I can see the Buddha in person, with my own eyes, I have personally found that the words spoken to me 35 years ago by my uncle Asita Kāladevila are perfectly true. And so, in order to learn and practise please allow me to question you, as Buddha, who has crossed to the other side, and is accomplished in all things [379] in six ways.

According to the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) commentary the six ways are: 1) The super knowledges (abhiññā); 2) knowing with full comprehension (pariññā); 3) abandoning (pahāna); 4) development (bhāvanā); 5) realization (sacchikiriya); 6) attainment (samāpatti).

*Anagāriyupetassa, bhikkhācariyaṃ jigīsato,
Muni pabrūhi me puṭṭho, moneyyaṃ uttamaṃ padaṃ.*

Venerable Buddha, Great Sage (Mahā-muni), you are many times superior in attributes to the six sages (muni)! Please be kind enough to teach the noble path leading to the realisation of the four path-knowledges (magga-ñāṇas) by the recluse who has renounced worldly life and maintains himself on alms food.

Six kinds of sages (muni): 1) lay people having faith in the teaching of the Buddha (agāra-muni); 2) monastics (anāgāra-muni); 3) seven kinds of noble disciples who have realised one of the stages of the four supermundane paths and the three lower fruitions (sekha-muni); 4) Arahats (asekha-muni); 5) Independent Buddhas (Pacceka-muni); 6) Buddhas (Muni-muni). See also the Further Explanations.

Thereupon, the Buddha taught Ven. Nālaka the path to moral perfection in detail, by means of 23 verses beginning with: Moneyyaṃ te upaññissam, “I will teach and make you understand clearly the path to moral perfection.”

Here, moral perfection (moneyya) means the four path-knowledges (magga-ñāṇa). Especially, the path-knowledge of an Arahata (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) is called moral perfection (moneyya). So, it should be noted carefully that the noble and genuine practice leading to the realisation of the four path-knowledges is called the path to moral perfection (moneyya-paṭipadā).

The 23 verses of the path to moral perfection thus taught are given below with the Pāli verses and an English paraphrase.

11: The Discourse about Nālaka – 480

Moneyyam te upaññissam, dukkaram durabhisambhavam, handa te nam pavakkhāmi, santhambhassu dalho bhava.

My dear son Nālaka, I will teach and make you understand clearly the path to moral perfection which is not only difficult to put into practice even with great effort, but also difficult of plunging into.

My dear son Nālaka, I, will teach you the path to moral perfection in detail. So you, my son, exert and practise with steadfastness and unrelenting zeal, keeping yourself firm by means of diligence (virīya) to do what is difficult to do.

What is meant is this: Nālaka, my dear son! The path to moral perfection, which you asked about, is the kind of practice which is difficult to practise and to accomplish, since it has to be practised without the arising of the defilements (kilesa) in one's mind and with steadfast zeal, starting from the time when one is still an ordinary worldling (puthujjana).

Samāna-bhāgam kubbetha, gāme akkuṭṭha-vanditam, mano-padosam rakkheyya, santo anuññato care.

My dear son Nālaka, you should endeavour to treat all people in towns, [380] villages and rural areas impartially, with no dislike or hatred and with no love, whether they hurt you by abusing you in anger, or whether they make obeisance to you with due respect and devotion. One who is virtuous should guard against bearing ill-will because of being hurt and abused. You should endeavour not to become conceited, in the least, because of being treated with due respect and devotion.

What is meant is this: You should check your anger, when the people of towns, villages and rural areas offend and abuse you. You should not become elated with pride, even when a king bows before you respectfully. In this manner, you should treat them all evenly without dislike and without love, whether they abuse you or treat you with respect. With this verse, the Buddha taught the abandoning of the defilements which arise in relation to towns and villages.

Uccāvacā niccharanti, dāye aggi-sikhūpamā, nāriyo munim palobhenti, tāsu tam mā palobhayum.

My dear son Nālaka, in the forest various objects of sense burning like flames are apt to appear.<sup>161</sup> Likewise, there are, in a forest, sense objects: some fearful, some pleasant, some detestable and some perplexing, such as humans, Yakkhas, lions, leopards, tigers, various kinds of birds, various sounds or noises produced by them, fruits, flowers and buds.

Of these various kinds of sense objects which appear, women who have come for merry-making in the parks and forests, women collecting firewood, plucking flowers, plucking vegetables and gathering fruits, are likely to allure the solitary monk with smiles, taunts, tears and by wearing their garments in disorder. Do not let such women tempt you, my son.

What is meant is this: Endeavour to conduct yourself so that such women cannot entice you. With this verse, the Buddha taught the abandoning of defilements which arise in relation to the forest:

Virato methunā dhammā, hitvā kāme paropare, aviruddho asāratto, pāṇesu tasa-thāvare.

Yathā ahaṃ tathā ete, yathā ete tathā ahaṃ, attānaṃ upamaṃ katvā, na haneyya na ghātaye.

My dear son Nālaka, besides discarding all kinds of sensual objects (kāma-ārammaṇa), good or bad, you, dear son, should also be one who avoids and stays away from sexual intercourse. You should not entertain the least ill-will towards those belonging to another faction and you should not have the least liking and attachment to those belonging to your own faction; and, make yourself an example by having fellow-feeling thus: “Like myself, these beings desire to live long, not to die; they desire happiness, not suffering. Like them, I also desire to live long, not to die; desire happiness, not suffering.” You should not, by yourself, kill or hurt worldlings (puthujjana), Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna), Once-returners (Sakadāgāmin) and Non-returners (Anāgāmi) who are not yet free [381] from craving who are known as frightened beings (tasa-sattas) and Arahats who are already free from craving and greed, who are known as beings who are not frightened (thāvara-satta). Neither should you employ others to kill or hurt.

---

<sup>161</sup> Or, a forest fire spreads out flames of varied forms, such as flames with and without smoke, flames of blue, yellow and red colours, big or small, etc.

In these verses, the Buddha taught the moral practice of restraint (indriya-saṁvara-sīla) by means of the phrase: Hitvā kāme paropare ... “discarding all kinds of sensual objects, good or bad.” The Buddha taught the restraint according to the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha-saṁvara-sīla) laid down for monks, by means of the remaining words beginning with abstinence from sexual intercourse and abstinence from taking life.

Hitvā icchāñ-ca lobhañ-ca, yattha satto puthujjano, cakkhumā paṭipajjeyya, tareyya Narakaṁ imaṁ.

My dear son Nālaka, the worldly remain attached to the four requisites of robes, alms food, lodgings and medicines which are the objects of sensual pleasure for ascetics. You, dear son, should abandon the desire (icchā) for the four requisites of robes, alms food, lodgings and medicines which are the objects of sensual pleasure for ascetics before they are obtained. If they are already acquired, you should do away with greed (lobha) which hinders the wish to give them away in generosity. Being one possessing the eye of wisdom, you should endeavour to cultivate the noble practice of moral perfection (moneyya-paṭipadā), which has already been taught, is being taught and is to be taught. If you thus endeavour to practise, you can overcome the craving for the four requisites which leads to wrong livelihood (micchā-ājīva) which is named after the Naraka abyss because of the difficulty in filling it in.

With this verse, the Buddha taught the moral practice of living a life of purity (ājīva-pārisuddhi-sīlā) with special reference to the removal of attachments and craving for the four requisites.

Ūnūdarō mitāhāro, appicchassa alolupo, sadā icchāya nicchāto, aniccho hoti nibbuto.

My dear son Nālaka, an ascetic desirous of cultivating the path to moral perfection should have a lean stomach by eating four or five morsels less of the alms food received (dhamma-laddha). It is not enough merely eating four or five morsels less, but you should also be one who eats the food only after due reflection on the advantages and disadvantages of the food eaten (paccavekkhaṇa).

Still it is not enough, you should also be one who is endowed with the four kinds of contentment, which is desiring little or nothing (appiccha): 1) Having little or no greed concerning the four requisites (paccaya- appiccha); 2) having little or no desire to let others know that you are engaged in the ascetic practices (dhutaṅga-appiccha); 3) having little or no desire to let others know that you possess wide knowledge and learning of the teaching (pariyatti-appiccha); 4) having little or no desire to let others know that you have realised the extraordinary paths and fruitions (adhigama-appiccha).

Still it is not enough: By means of the Arahat path (Arahatta-magga) you should strive for the total removal of craving (taṇhā). When you have become one who is thus free from greed and craving (loluppa-taṇhā) you will become one with no desire and [382] excessive craving (icchā-lobha-taṇhā) for the four requisites, unlike one who is perpetually afflicted with extreme hunger you are then devoid of the defilements of hunger (kilesa). With no such affliction, you emerge as an individual in whom all the heat of the defilements has been extinguished.

With this verse the Buddha taught the precepts regarding dependence on requisites (paccaya-sannissita-sīla) or, precepts regarding the use of requisites (paccaya-paribhoga-sīla) beginning with moderation regarding food (bhojane mattaññutā).

Sa piṇḍa-cāraṃ caritvā, vanantam-abhihāraye, upaṭṭhito rukkha-mūlasmim, āsanūpagato muni.

My dear son Nālaka, the ascetic, who practises the path to moral perfection (moneyya-paṭipadā), should go only to his place in the forest after going round for alms and after eating his meal, without staying long to talk to the people and so on. The monk, who practises the path to moral perfection, should remain sitting at the foot of a tree or in his own place on reaching the forest.

Here, by means of the words: “After going round for alms,” the ascetic practice (dhutaṅga) of taking only alms food is indicated. The monk who practises the special ascetic practice of taking only alms food has also to practise the other ascetic practices also, such as going systematically from house to house, eating only in one sitting, eating only from the bowl, not taking late offerings, wearing only the three robes, and wearing only robes made from cemetery rags, so these six ascetic practices are also being indicated thereby.

By means of the words: “Should go only to his place in the forest,” the ascetic practice (dhutaṅga) of living alone in the forest is indicated. By means of the words: “Should remain sitting at the foot of a tree or in his own place,” the practice of living at the root of a tree, and being one who never lies down is indicated. Since these ten ascetic practices are taught in regular order, the three other ascetic practices, namely the ascetic practice of living in an open space, sleeping in any bed, and living in a charnel ground, are also indicated. This being so, the Buddha taught Ven. Nālaka the thirteen ascetic practices (dhutaṅga)<sup>162</sup> by means of this verse.

*Sa jhāna-pasuto dhīro, vanante ramito siyā,

My dear son Nālaka, the monastic who is engaged in the thirteen ascetic practices and practises the noble the path to moral perfection strives hard to realise the mundane absorption (jhāna) which is not yet realised and to exercise control, with the fivefold mastery (vasi-bhāva), over the mundane absorption that he has already acquired. Attaining thereby absorption concentration (appanā-samādhi), he should take delight in the quietude of the forest, away from human noise. It will not do to merely cultivate the mundane absorptions only. He should dwell at the foot of a tree in the forest also, delighting himself with absorption in the supermundane absorptions associated with Stream-entry, etc.

By means of this verse, the Buddha taught the joy of living in the forest, dwelling and strenuously cultivating mundane and supermundane absorption (jhāna) as well as the Arahāt fruition (Arahatta-phala).

Ven. Nālaka, on hearing this discourse became exceedingly enthusiastic to enter the forest and practise the path (paṭipadā) even without taking food. It is not, however, possible to devote oneself to the practice of the Dhamma without taking food, for he who practises the Dhamma without taking food cannot live long. Rather, one should search for food without causing defilements to develop. Thus, searching for food without developing [383] the defilements is a proper act in the Dispensation (Sāsana). So, being desirous of teaching Ven. Nālaka the practice of going round for alms food and with a view to assure him: “In the days to follow, you can enter towns and villages and go round for alms; but you should not let defilements develop,” the Buddha recited the following six verses, which would finally enable him to realise the Arahat fruition.

Tato ratyā vivasāne, gāmantam-abhihāraye, avhānaṃ nābhinandeyya, abhihāraṅ-ca gāmato.

My dear son Nāḷaka, when the practice of the path to moral perfection (moneyya-paṭipadā) by going only to the forest after collecting food is over, in the days that follow too, the ascetic should proceed to the village for collecting alms food. After nighttime has passed and day time sets in, prior to going on alms round, he should attend to duties such as those to be performed in his dwelling place or concerned with the shrine precincts, etc., and observing physical (kāya) and mental (citta) seclusion (viveka),<sup>163</sup> he should cultivate meditation on the way to and from the village on his alms round.

On arrival in the village, he should not delight in and accept the meal offered by invitation: “Venerable sir! Kindly come and have alms food in our house.”<sup>164</sup> If, in case the supporters offer alms food by snatching the alms bowl and filling it to the full, you may take such alms food to sustain your practice of the Dhamma. It will not affect the ascetic practices (dhutaṅga). But you should not enter the village with the expectation of receiving such alms food.

The alms food, with a variety of dishes brought by supporters and offered to the ascetic practising for moral perfection, without inviting him to their houses after he enters the village, and even before he goes round for alms from house to house, is called food that is offered (abhihāra).

Not a single particle of such alms food should be accepted even though it is offered with many hundreds of dishes. What is meant is that the alms food should be obtained only by going round from house to house.

Na munī gāmam-āgamma, kulesu sahasā care, ghāsesanaṃ chinna-katho, na vācaṃ payutaṃ bhaṇe.

My dear son Nāḷaka, when the ascetic practising the path to moral perfection has entered the village, he should not mix in weal or woe with

---

<sup>164</sup> I.e. the alms-food received while thinking and doubting: “Will this house offer or not offer alms-food to me? Will good food or bad food be offered?”

the male and female supporters as that is not compatible with the Dispensation (Sāsana). He should behave like a dumb person and should not give hints, or speak indirectly with signs and tricks in order to gain alms food.

Alattham yad-idaṃ sādhu, nālattham kusalam itī, ubhayeneva so tādī, rukkham vupanivattati.

My dear son Nālaka, when the ascetic practising the path to moral perfection enters the village and goes round for alms, he should consider: “It is good,” if he receives even a small quantity of food, and that: “It is not bad,” if no food is received; he should not be affected by receiving or not receiving [384] alms. Being possessed of unshakability (tādi-guṇa), or the quality of being like the earth, namely, having endurance or forbearance and the quality of being like a mountain, namely, steadiness or fortitude, he should depart from the supporter’s house with equanimity and entertain neither hatred nor love for receiving or not receiving alms, in the same way as a man, looking for fruit, approaches a tree and departs from it without liking or disliking it for getting or not getting fruit.

Sa patta-pāṇi vicaranto, amūgo mūga-sammato, appam dānaṃ na hīleyya, dātāraṃ nāvajāniyā.

My dear son Nālaka, the ascetic practising the path to moral perfection going round for alms, holding the alms bowl, should behave in such a way that the people will think he is dumb although he is not and should not make random talk. When only a little is given in generosity, it should not be despised and the supporter should not be condemned for giving merely a little.

Uccāvacā hi paṭipadā, samaṇena pakāsītā, na pāraṃ diguṇaṃ yanti, nayidaṃ eka-guṇaṃ mutaṃ.

My dear son Nālaka, when the ascetic practising the path to moral perfection becomes fully accomplished in the mode of conduct of receiving alms he should not be content with this much, but he should endeavour and become accomplished in the practice which is exceedingly noble. The Buddha has taught the noble practice leading to the path (magga) in two ways, superior and inferior.

The Dispensation (Sāsana) has, as its essence, practice. What is meant is:
The path of practice (paṭipadā) is the essence of the Dispensation (Sāsana).

Only when the path is practised can the essence of the Dispensation (Sāsana) be attained.

To elucidate: the period, from the moment the ascetic Dhamma is first developed and practised, up to the moment the five hindrances (nīvaraṇa) are removed, is called the domain of the path of practice (paṭipadā-khetta). If, in this period, the five hindrances are removed with ease and without trouble, it is called an easy path of practice (sukha-paṭipadā). If the hindrances have to be removed after practising strenuously and with difficulty, it is called a difficult path of practice (dukkha-paṭipadā).

The period from when the five hindrances have been removed to the moment path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa) is realised, is called the domain of supernormal power (abhiññā-khetta.) or, wisdom and knowledge arising from insight (vipassanā-ñāṇa-paññā). The knowledge arising from insight which realises the path-knowledges quickly after the five hindrances have been removed is called the super knowledges gained quickly (khippābhiññā). If path-knowledge is realised rather slowly or tardily, the said path-knowledges are called the super knowledges gained slowly (dandhābhiññā).

1) Some individuals practise the ascetic Dhamma, and realise path-knowledge quickly, after having removed the five hindrances without trouble and with ease. The path of practice of such individuals is called the super knowledges gained quickly and with an easy path (sukha-paṭipadā-khippābhiññā); 2) some, however, realise path-knowledge tardily, after having removed the five hindrances with ease. The path of practice of such individuals is called the super knowledges gained slowly and with an easy path (sukha-paṭipadā-dandhābhiññā); 3) some realise path-knowledge quickly, after having been able to remove the five hindrances by practising strenuously and with difficulty. Their path of practice is called the super knowledges gained quickly and with a difficult path (dukkha-paṭipadā-khippābhiññā); 4) some realize path-knowledge tardily, after removing the hindrances by practising strenuously and with difficulty. Their path of practice is called the super knowledges gained slowly and with a difficult path (dukkha-paṭipadā-dandhābhiññā).<sup>165</sup>

My dear son Nālaka, in reaching the other shore, which is Nibbāna, by [385] means of these two superior and inferior types of path-knowledges, it is not that Nibbāna is achieved twice through a single path-knowledge.

Just by realising path-knowledge once, the defilements which it should eradicate are completely removed; and therefore those defilements will not again occur in the continuum of the aggregates (khandā-santāna), hence the Buddha’s teaching: “It is not that Nibbāna is achieved twice through a single path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa). Nor is Nibbāna the kind of Dhamma which can be completely realised only once by means of a single path-knowledge.

All the defilements (kilesa) cannot be totally removed by means of a single path-knowledge; they can be removed separately and respectively only by means of the four path-knowledges, each annihilating its own share of defilements, leaving nothing unannihilated. Hence the Buddha means to say: “Nibbāna, together with the realization of the Arahāt fruition (Arahatta-phala), cannot be attained once and for all, by means of one single stroke of the path-knowledge. This can be accomplished only by means of the fourfold path-knowledges.

Yassa ca visatā natthi, chinna-sotassa bhikkhuno, kiccākiccappahīnassa, pariḷāho na vijjati.

My dear son Nālaka, a certain ascetic practising the path to moral perfection, who has practised the path which is appropriate for him out of the two types already stated, up to the attainment of the Arahāt fruition, is free from 108 kinds of expansive, wide ranging cravings (taṇhā) having completely removed them by means of the Arahāt path (Arahatta-magga). In the mind continuum of the ascetic practising the path to moral perfection, who has thus completely cut off the current of the defilements through the Arahāt path and who has also done away with all deeds of merit and demerit, there is not the slightest heat generated by lust (rāga) or by hatred (dosa).<sup>166</sup>

On hearing these verses, Ven. Nālaka thought thus: “If the path to moral perfection (moneyya-paṭipadā) is only this much, it is quite easy and not difficult. I might perhaps be able to fulfil it without difficulty, without discomfort but with ease.” Therefore, the Buddha, who was desirous of letting Ven. Nālaka know that it is otherwise, said: “My dear son Nālaka, the practice to moral perfection is not as easy as you have thought. It is a practice which is really difficult,” and recited this verse:

Moneyyam te upaññissam, khura-dhārūpamo bhava, jivhāya tālum-āhacca, udare saññato siyā.

My dear son Nālaka, I will let you know more about the path to moral perfection. The ascetic, practising the path to moral perfection, should be one comparable to the blade of a razor.

The meaning is: As a person licking the honey smeared on the blade of a razor has to be careful and guard himself against the risk of his tongue being cut, the ascetic practising the path to moral perfection, who makes use of the four requisites righteously acquired by him, should guard his mind against the danger of being overcome by defilements. True! It is difficult to acquire the four requisites by pure means. Having acquired them, it is also difficult to make use of them in a blameless manner. So, the Buddha repeatedly taught the precepts regarding dependence on requisites (paccaya-sannissita-sīla).

My dear son Nālaka, the ascetic, practising the path to moral perfection, should restrain his stomach by pressing his tongue against his palate, making a clicking sound with his tongue, doing away with the desire for taste (rasa-taṇhā) and not using the four requisites obtained by any wrongful mode of [386] livelihood (micchā-ājīva).

It means to say that if alms food that is to be acquired righteously (dhamma-laddha) is not available for the stomach, he should forbear by avoiding the desire for taste by grinding his teeth and making a clicking sound with the tongue. But by no means should he make use of requisites that were obtained in a wrong way.

Alīna-citto ca siyā, na cāpi bahu cintaye, nirāmagandho asito, Brahma-cariya-parāyaṇo.

My dear son Nālaka, the ascetic practising the path to moral perfection should be one who is diligent, engaging himself incessantly in deeds of merit. He should not trouble his mind with diverse problems relating to friends and relatives and towns and villages. Without the foul odour of the defilements (kilesa) and without being attached to various existences through craving and wrong view, he should be one who leans and relies on the noble path of practice which consist of the three trainings (sikkha)<sup>167</sup> in morality, concentration and wisdom taught by the Buddha.

Ekāsanassa sikkhetha, samaṇūpāsanassa ca, ekattaṃ monam-akkhātaṃ, eko ce abhiraṃsasi, atha bhāhisi dasa-disā.

My dear son Nālaka, the ascetic practising the path to moral perfection should endeavour and practise to live quietly in solitude, without any companion, and to contemplate repeatedly and strenuously the objects for meditation (kammaṭṭhāna-ārammaṇa) of the ascetics.

Here, the Buddha taught physical seclusion by staying alone (kāya-viveka), and mental seclusion by contemplating the meditation objects (citta-viveka).

The subjects of meditation are given as 40 in the Baskets (Piṭaka) namely: 10 meditation devices (kaṣiṇa), 10 on unattractiveness (asubha), 10 recollections (anussati), 4 sublime states (brahma-vihāra), 4 formless spheres (arūpāyatana), the perception of the disgusting nature of food (aharepaṭikūlasaññā), and the delimiting of the four elements (catu-dhātu-vavatthāna).

Thus I teach that staying alone by maintaining physical seclusion and mental seclusion is the true path to moral perfection. My dear son Nālaka, if you can take delight in staying alone, without any companion, maintaining physical seclusion and mental seclusion, you will become renowned in all ten directions.

Sutvā dhīrānaṃ nigghosaṃ, jhāyīnaṃ kāma-cāgīnaṃ, tato hiriṇ-ca saddhañ-ca, bhīyyo kubbetha māmaḥko.

My dear son Nālaka, if and when you hear the cheers and praises of the wise and noble people, who have done away with the material objects of sensual pleasure (vatthu-kāma) and the defilements of sensual pleasure (kilesa-kāma) by repeated contemplation of objects (arammaṇūpanijjhāna) and close observation of their characteristics (lakkaṇūpanijjhāna), you, dear son, should not be distracted by these cheers and praises but should, more strenuously than before, develop a moral sense of conscience (hiri)

and should also have absolute faith (saddhā) in this path of practice to moral perfection as the noble practice for complete freedom from Samsāra and develop the practice leading to final emancipation (niyyānika). If you do so, you will become a genuine son of mine. [387]

Taṃ nadīhi vijānātha, sobbhesu padaresu ca, saṇantā yanti kusobbhā, tuṅhī-yanti mahodadhī.

My dear son Nālaka, you should know that the subject matter of the exhortation that: “You should not be distracted by the cheers ... ” as already taught by me, must be understood by the examples of large rivers and by small creeks and streams. The water in small creeks and stream flows noisily. The water in such large rivers as the Ganges, however, flows silently without making any noise.

What is meant is that one who is not a genuine son of the Buddha, like small creeks and streams is agitated and excited: “I am one who practises the path of practice to moral perfection.” One who is a genuine son of the Buddha, however, cultivates these two: conscience (hiri) and faith (saddhā), and like large rivers, remains silent, humble in mind.

Yad-ūnakam taṃ saṇati, yaṃ pūram santam-eva taṃ, aḍḍha-kumbhūpamo bālo, rahado pūro va paṇḍito.

My dear son Nālaka, I should like to give one more example and point this out in another way: A jar, which is not full with water and is deficient, makes noise with the water splashing from side to side. That which is full with water is quiet without making noise. A foolish person is like the jar making noise with half-filled water. A wise man is like a large jar full of water.

Here, there is the likelihood of the question being raised thus: “If a foolish person is not quiet and makes a lot of noise like a jar not full with water and if a wise man does not make noise and is quiet like a large jar full of water, why is it that the Buddha talks so much in his endeavour to teach the Dhamma?” and so, the Buddha delivers these last two verses:

Yaṃ samaṇo bahum bhāsati, upetaṃ attha-saṅghitam, jānaṃ so Dhammaṃ deseti, jānaṃ so bahu bhāsati.

My dear son Nālaka, I, noble ascetics as I am, speak mostly words which are full of sense and meaning and that are beneficial. It is not that these words are spoken with a fickle mind which is distracted (uddhacca). In fact, I, a noble ascetic, discerning through knowledge and wisdom what is profitable and what is not, teach only the profitable Dhamma.<sup>168</sup> In teaching the Dhamma, it is done only by knowing distinctly: “This Dhamma is for the benefit and welfare of this person. That Dhamma is for the benefit and welfare of that person.”<sup>169</sup> [388]

Yo ca jānaṃ samyatto, jānaṃ na bahu bhāsati, sa munī monam-arahati, sa munī monam-ajjhagā.

My dear son Nalaka, the ascetic practising the path of practice to moral perfection, is deserving of the practice only if, understanding the Dhamma analytically, discerned and taught by me as the means of knowledge and wisdom capable of breaking up the defilements (nibbedha-bhāgiya-ñāṇa-paññā) and taking care to keep it well guarded, he does not talk too much speaking words which he knows cannot be of benefit to beings. In fact, the ascetic practising the path of practice to moral perfection can surely realise the path-knowledge of an Arahat (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa).

In this manner, the Buddha concluded the delivery of the noble Dhamma teaching concerning the path of practice leading to moral perfection (moneyya-paṭipadā) which has the Arahat fruition (Arahatta-phala) as its ultimate achievement.

Upon hearing the Buddha’s discourses on the path to moral perfection (moneyya-paṭipadā) which has the Arahat fruition as the ultimate achievement, Ven. Nalaka became one who had but little desire to engage in three matters: 1) Seeing the Buddha; 2) hearing the Dhamma; and 3) asking questions concerning the path to moral perfection. To elaborate:

1. At the end of his hearing of the Dhamma teaching concerning the path to moral perfection, Ven. Nālaka was very much pleased and delighted and, after paying respects to the Buddha to his heart’s content, he entered the forest. After entering the forest, such a wish as: “It will be good if I can once again see the

<sup>169</sup> What is meant is: It is not that the Buddha utters unsubstantial words just because he is by nature talkative.

Buddha!” did not occur in his mind continuum even once. This is the instance of him having little desire to see the Buddha.

2. In the same way, such a wish as: “It will be good if I can once again listen to the Dhamma!” did not occur in the mind continuum of Ven. Nālaka even once. This is the instance of him having little desire to listen to the Dhamma.

3. Likewise, such a wish as: “It will be good if I can once again address and question the Buddha on the path to moral perfection!” did not occur in the mind continuum of Ven. Nālaka even once more. This is the instance of him having little desire to question on the path to moral perfection.

Being the one and only individual of distinction (puggala-visesa) and disciple of distinction (sāvaka-visesa) who emerges with the appearance of each Buddha, he was content and his wish was fulfilled even with seeing the Buddha just once, with hearing the Dhamma just once and with asking about the path to moral perfection also just once; and so he had no more wish to see the Buddha, to listen to the Dhamma and to ask questions again. It is not for want of faith that he had no more wish to see the Buddha, to listen to the Dhamma or to ask questions.

Ven. Nālaka Becomes an Arahat

In this manner, Ven. Nālaka, being endowed with the three instances of having little desire, entered the forest at the foot of the mountain and stayed in one grove only for one day, not remaining there for two days; stayed at the foot of a tree also only for one day, not for two days; and went round for alms in a village only for one day, not repeating the round the next day. In this way he wandered about from one forest to another forest, from the foot of one tree to the foot of another tree; and from one village to another village and practised the path to moral perfection, suitable and appropriate for him; and before long he attained the Arahat fruition (Arahatta-phala).

There are three kinds of individuals practising the path to moral perfection, namely: 1) The prominent person (ukkaṭṭha-puggala) practising the path (paṭipadā) with the greatest effort; 2) the middling person (majjhima-puggala) practising it with medium effort; and 3) the mild person (mudu-puggala) practising it with only little effort.

Of these three kinds: 1) The prominent person (ukkaṭṭha-puggala) practising the path with the greatest effort lives only for seven months; 2) the middling person

11: The Discourse about Nālaka – 494

(majjhima-puggala) practising it with medium effort lives only for seven years; and 3) the mild person (mudu-puggala) practising it with only little effort lives for sixteen years. [389]

Of the said three kinds of person, Ven. Nālaka was a prominent person who practised the path with the greatest effort. Reflecting and knowing that he would live only for seven months and that his will to live (āyu-saṅkhāra) and the continuum of the life vitality (jivitindriya) would soon come to an end he took a bath to keep his body clean.

Then wearing the lower robe correctly and neatly and girdling it with the waist-belt and then putting on the upper robe together with the double robe, he faced the direction of Rājagaha where the Buddha was dwelling and made obeisance to him with the two hands, the two knees and the forehead touching the ground. And then raising his joined hands in adoration, standing erect and leaning against the mountain by the name of Hīṅgulaka, he attained Parinibbāna which was the cessation and the end of his existence.

Thereupon, the Buddha, knowing of Ven. Nālaka's attainment of Parinibbāna, proceeded to Hīṅgulaka in a company of monastics and had the remains cremated under his personal supervision. And then, after supervising the collection of the relics and the construction of a shrine over them, the Buddha returned to Rājagaha. [390]

12: Yasa, His Family and Friends

When the Buddha took up his residence at the Deer Park at Isipatana near Bārāṇasī for his Rains Retreat observance, he taught the Discourse about the Turning of the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakkappavattana-sutta, SN 56.11) and the Discourse about the Characteristics of Non-Self (Anatta-lakkhaṇa-sutta, SN 22.59) to the Group-of-Five (pañca-vaggiya) monks; and the Discourse to Nālaka (Nālaka-sutta, Snp 3.11) to Ven. Nālaka and brought about their emancipation.

In Bārāṇasī there lived one Yasa of high birth, son of Sujātā of Senānigama, who had given the thick milk rice to the Bodhisatta, the wife of a rich merchant of Bārāṇasī. Besides being gentle and tender in deed, speech and thought, Yasa possessed a large amount of wealth and a great number of followers.

The rich merchant's son, Yasa, owned three mansions: One residence for the winter, another for the summer and the third for the rainy season. As it was then the rainy season when the Buddha was staying in the Deer Park, Yasa was residing in the mansion suitable for that period. During the whole of the four rainy months, he was surrounded by dancers skilled in music, dancing and singing. There was not a single male person in the whole mansion! All the inmates, the door-keepers and entertainers included, being women, he indulged in the exceedingly grand luxury of sensual pleasures inside the mansion, without even going downstairs.

His wealthy father thinking: “My son who is enjoying the luxury of this much grandeur should not become afraid and frightened by the sight of a male person,” appointed and assigned only women to attend to the many and diverse duties inside that huge mansion.

One day, while thus indulging with relish the grand luxury of sensual pleasures, only with womenfolk who were playing the five kinds of musical instruments, singing and dancing, Yasa fell asleep. Since there was no need for them to entertain and comfort him while he was asleep, the dancers themselves also went to sleep, some embracing or hugging their respective instruments and others using them as pillows. The inside of the main theatrical hall was illuminated brilliantly with the light from the oil-lamps which were kept ablaze throughout the night.

When Yasa woke up from his sleep before others, he saw his retinue of dancers fast asleep most abominably, as if in a graveyard, some hugging the harps, some with drums slung over their shoulders, some embracing the drums, some with their hair dishevelled, some with saliva trickling out from their mouths and the rest mumbling deliriously. On seeing them, the dangerous nature (ādīnava) of sensual pleasures (kāma-guṇa) became apparent to him. Thus, he felt increasingly repulsed by such pleasures.

Thereupon, being very much overcome with a feeling of spiritual urgency (saṁvega), he breathed forth all by himself the exalted utterance (udāna) thus: Upaddutaṃ vata bho! Upassatthaṃ vata bho! “All kinds of defilements (kilesa) are hurting and oppressing the wretched body, this large source of suffering (dukkha) for all, including myself. All kinds of defilements are tormenting and oppressing the wretched body, this large source of suffering for all, including myself!”

Yasa, being tired of his own experience with sensual objects, rose from his sleeping couch without letting anyone know, put on his golden footwear and left his residence. On reaching the door of the house, he quite easily took his departure from the house as Devas had kept the door open in advance, thinking: “Let no one obstruct Yasa’s way to monkhood.” In the same manner, the guardian Devas of the town had kept the town-gate open, so that Yasa could quite easily leave the town without any trouble or hindrance and proceed on his journey and eventually arrive early at the Deer Park near Bārāṇasī. Yasa, approaching from a distance, left the walk and sat in the place suitably prepared for the Buddha. Thereupon, on getting close to the Buddha, Yasa again breathed forth the very words of the urgent and exalted utterance (saṁvega-udāna) he had uttered before.

Thereupon, the Buddha addressed him with words of welcome and of encouragement [391] thus: “My dear son Yasa, this Dhamma concerning Nibbāna, which I already know is the Dhamma which is not tormented and oppressed by any kind of defilements (kilesa). My dear son Yasa, come! Sit here. I will teach you the Good Dhamma leading to Nibbāna.” Thereupon, Yasa was pleased and delighted that: “This Dhamma of Nibbāna, realised by the Buddha, is the Dhamma free of torment and oppression from any kind of defilements (kilesa).” So, taking off his golden footwear from his feet, he approached the Buddha respectfully, made obeisance and took his seat at an appropriate place.

The Gradual Path

Thereupon, the Buddha taught Yasa, the course of moral practices leading to the paths and fruitions: 1) The Dhamma relating to generosity (dāna-kathā); 2) the Dhamma relating to morality (sīla-kathā); 3) the Dhamma relating to a happy destination such as a celestial abode (sagga-kathā); and 4) the Dhamma relating to the good path and line of conduct for the realization of the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna (magga-kathā).

1. The Dhamma concerning generosity (dāna-kathā): A good deed of generosity is the cause of happiness in the present existence, in the next existence and of the bliss of Nibbāna. It is the primary cause of all kinds of pleasures of Devas and humans. It is also the source of material sense objects (ārammaṇa-vatthu) and the well-being resulting from the use of these objects. For beings endangered by misfortune, it is also a good guardian, a place of safety, a resort and refuge. In the present existence, as well as in the next, there is nothing like generosity to lean on, stand on, cling to, as a good guardian, a place of safety, a resort and refuge. Truly, this deed of generosity is like the gem-studded lion throne, for it is to lean on; like the great earth, for it is to stand on; like the rope for the blind to hold on as a support, for it is to cling to.

This meritorious act of generosity is like the ship for crossing over the bad destiny of the lower worlds (apāya-bhūmi-duggati). It is like an army commander of valour in the battle-field since it can ward off or give relief from the danger of the enemies such as greed (lobha) and stinginess (macchhariya), etc. It is like a well-guarded city since it can give protection from the danger of poverty. It is like a lotus-flower (paduma) since it is not smeared with the dirt of unwholesomeness (akusala) such as jealousy and stinginess. It is like fire since it can burn the rubbish of unwholesomeness such as jealousy and stinginess. It is like a poisonous snake since it is of difficult access to the unwholesome enemies.

It is like a lion king since it can free one from fear, and the supporter has no need to be afraid of any enemy in the present existence, much less so in the next. Being of enormous strength, it is like a large elephant, and the supporter is blessed with good friends and associates in the present existence. He is also one who will have great physical and mental strength in the next existence. It is like a bull (usabha) of pure white colour since it is considered by learned persons as a sign of auspiciousness auguring extreme and particular prosperity both here and hereafter, it is also like a king of aerial horses (valāhaka-sindhava) since it can transport one from the evil ground of the four misfortunes (vipatti) to the danger-free good ground of four good fortunes (sampatti).

“This generosity is also the good and true path which I have walked on. It is also the one, with which I have been related to. I have performed great deeds of generosity, such as those of Velāma, Mahā Govinda, Mahā Sudassana and Vessantara, when I was practising and fulfilling the perfections (pāramī). In my existence as the virtuous hare I had completely won the hearts of the recipients by giving away in generosity my own body in the blazing heap of fire.”

Here, Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, in the guise of a begging Brahmin, had his mind fixed continually on the courage shown by the wise hare, the Bodhisatta, in his performance of a generous act without any distraction. Hence the Buddha’s words: “I had completely won the hearts of the recipients,” is a rhetorical way of saying indirectly (vañka-vutti) that politely implies Sakka’s contemplation of the Bodhisatta’s boldness in generosity. Here, by means of the words: “By giving away in generosity my own body,” the Buddha gave the advice thus: “The Bodhisattas, knowing too well about the merit of generosity, even gave away their lives in generosity. In view of this, should the wise have attachment to an external object (bāhira-vatthu)? Certainly they [392] should not.”

“Furthermore, the merit of generosity (dāna) is capable of bringing the luxury of a Sakka, Māra, Brahma and of a Universal Monarch (Cakka-vatti) in the mundane world. It is also capable of bringing the Awakened knowledge (Bodhi-ñāṇa) of a disciple (sāvaka), a Paccekabuddha and the Supreme Buddha in a supermundane world.”

In this manner, the Buddha taught the rich merchant’s son, Yasa, the Dhamma concerning generosity (dāna).

Since only those who are generous can observe morality, the Buddha taught morality (sīla-kathā) immediately after talk about generosity (dāna-kathā). Generosity is the giving away of one’s own property for the welfare of the recipients or in order to honour them. This being so, he who practises generosity is a noble individual who really desires the welfare of beings and there can be no reason at all for him to kill another or to steal another’s property. And so, since only he who practises generosity can, in fact, observe morality, the Buddha’s teaching of morality immediately follows the talk about generosity.

12: Yasa, his Family and Friends – 499

2. Dhamma words concerning morality (sīla-kathā): “The good deed of morality is for beings to lean on, stand on, cling to, to be well guarded by, shielded by, to approach, and to take refuge in. This good deed of morality (sīla) is the one, with which I have been concerned with. I have observed and guarded it without any breach and interruption in the endless and infinite number of existences, such as the existence in the Birth Story about Saṅkhapāla the Nāga King (Saṅkhapāla-jātaka, Ja 524), the Birth Story about Bhuridatta the Nāga King (Bhūridatta-jātaka, Ja 543), the Birth Story about Campeyya the Nāga King (Campeyya-jātaka, Ja 506), the Birth Story about King Sīlava (Mahāsīlava-jātaka, Ja 51), the Birth Story about Mātuposaka the Elephant King (Mātuposaka-jātaka, Ja 455), the Birth Story about Chaddanta the Elephant King (Chaddanta-jātaka, Ja 514), and others.”

Truly, for the welfare in this present existence and in the next, there is nothing like morality for leaning on, standing on, clinging to, for being guarded by, shielded by, and for taking refuge in. There is no ornament like the ornament of morality, no flower like the flower of morality, and no perfume like the perfume of morality. Furthermore, all humans, together with Devas, are never tired of seeing one bedecked with the flowers of morality, scented with the perfume of morality and adorned with the ornaments of morality.

In this manner, the Buddha taught the rich merchant’s son, Yasa, the Dhamma concerning morality (sīla).

In order to show that the happiness in the abode of the Devas is the result of the good deeds of morality, the Buddha taught the Dhamma concerning heaven (sagga-kathā) immediately after the talk about morality (sīla-kathā).

3. Dhamma words concerning heaven (sagga-kathā): The abodes of Devas are desired by everybody. It heartens and exhilarates all. In the abode of Devas, one can have constant joy and bliss. The Cātumahārājika Devas enjoy divine bliss for nine million years, calculated in human terms and Tāvatiṃsa Devas enjoy it for 36 million years.

In this manner, the Buddha taught Yasa, the rich merchant’s son, the Dhamma concerning the bliss of the abode of Devas. In fact, divine bliss is so enormous that Buddhas could not do full justice to it when describing it.

4. After teaching the bliss of the divine abodes, the Buddha immediately taught the Dhamma concerning the noble path (ariya-magga), in order to show that even divine bliss is perpetually oppressed by the defilements (kilesa) such as lust (rāga), and to show that since the noble path (ariya-magga) is entirely free from the defilements (kilesa), it cannot be oppressed by it. So, for teaching the noble path, the Buddha taught initially the Dhamma, describing the defects of sensual pleasures (kāmānaṃ ādīnava-kathā) together with the Dhamma describing the advantages of renunciation (nekkhamme ānisaṃsa-kathā), beginning with monkhood that leads to freedom from sensuality (kāma-guṇa) and ending with Nibbāna, as both the defects of sensual pleasures and [393] the advantages of renunciation form the means of realisation of the paths (magga).

The Buddha, after having enchanted the rich merchant's son, Yasa, with the Dhamma relating to divine bliss, taught him like a man who decorates a large elephant to make it most beautiful and then cuts off its trunk abruptly as follows: "This so-called bliss of the abode of Devas also has the nature of impermanence (anicca). It has the nature of instability (addhuva). One should not have desire and attachment for such bliss. The material objects of sensual pleasure are, in fact, more of misery than of pleasure. These material objects of sensual pleasure are made up of pleasure, which is the size of a small seed, but they are full of defects which is similar to the size of Mount Meru."

As already reflected upon and realized by him at the time of his renunciation of the world, the Buddha elaborated thus on the defects of sensual pleasure, on the vulgar state of things adhered to by ignoble persons but avoided by noble ones, and on the way beings were oppressed and made miserable by sensual pleasure.

And then, inasmuch as there was an abundance of defects in sensual pleasure, the Buddha also elaborated on the merit of the absence of defects and the paucity of suffering in renunciation (nekkhamma) beginning with monkhood and ending in Nibbāna.

Yasa Becomes a Stream-Enterer

Having taught the Dhamma on generosity and other virtues, the Buddha knew that Yasa's mind had become firm, adaptable, soft, free from hindrances, elated, gladdened, and pellucid, so he taught the Dhamma distinctive to him (sāmukkamsikā Dhamma) of the four truths: the truth of suffering (dukkha-sacca), the truth of the origin of suffering (samudaya-sacca), the truth of the cessation of suffering (nirodha-sacca) and the truth of the path leading to the cessation of suffering (magga-sacca).

It means to say that after the Buddha had taught Yasa the teachings in series beginning with generosity, and the mind continuum of Yasa became free from the mental blemishes such as lack of faith, indolence, unawareness, restlessness and doubt, and that he was therefore in a frame of mind receptive to the profound Dhamma of the four truths. Being free from the defilements of views (diṭṭhi), conceit (māna), etc., his mind became soft and pliable like pure gold. It was devoid of the five hindrances. It was accompanied by great joy and gladness (pīti-pāmojja) in the excellent path to Nibbāna. Being endowed with faith (saddhā) his mind was very clear. Only then did the Buddha teach him the profound Dhamma of the four truths of suffering, arising, cessation and the path by the method of approach employed only by Buddhas in accordance with the desires and dispositions of beings, and it enabled him to realize the paths and fruitions.

On being thus taught, to cite a worldly example, as the cloth washed and thoroughly cleansed of dirt would well absorb the laundryman's dye in yellow, red, etc., and turn bright, so the understanding of the Dhamma (Dhamma-cakkhu-vijjā), which is the insight knowledge of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga), arose instantly and clearly in the mind continuum of Yasa, for he had paid attention presently to the truth of cessation (nirodha-sacca), Nibbāna, and eradicated the dust of the defilements, such as lust (rāga) and so on; for he had completely eliminated the defilement of views (diṭṭhi), doubt (vicikicchā) and the defilements (kilesa) that lead to suffering states; for he had understood with strong conviction, which could not be reversed by others, that all conditioned things are subject to destruction and disappearance, and because he was endowed with quick insight knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa), sharp intelligence, easy practice and ability to have rapid realization (sukha-paṭipadā-khippabhiññā). All this means that Yasa was established as a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna).

Herein, if the laundryman dyed the soiled and dirty cloth in yellow, red, etc., there would be no effect because the dye would not remain fast on such cloth. In the same way, though the minds of beings stained with the dirt of the hindrances, such as sensual desire, malice, etc., were dyed with the dye of the four noble truths, there could not be the desired effect, or lasting result.

If the laundryman, only after cleaning the dirty cloth, by placing it [394] on the surface of a stone slab, dousing it with water, and applying soap, cowdung and ash to the stains and rubbing and washing, can he give it any colour he wants, and the result will be the bright colour of the cloth newly dyed.

In the same way, the Buddha, the laundry-master of the four truths (sacca), so to say, also made the mind continuum of Yasa which had been soiled like the cloth with the dirt of the defilements, clean and free from the hindrances (nīvaraṇa-kilesa) by placing it on the surface of the stone slab of successive Dhamma discourses (anupubbi-kathā) and by dousing it with the pure water of his faith (saddhā) and rubbing and washing it with his mindfulness, concentration and wisdom (sati-samādhi-paññā).

Thereafter, when the cloth of his mind continuum was given the colour of the Dhamma of the four noble truths, that is, when the Dhamma of the four noble truths was taught, the knowledge of the path to Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga-ñāṇa) arose in Yasa's mind. That is to say, the dye of the Dhamma of the four noble truths became so fast in Yasa's mind that nobody could undo it.

Yasa's Father Becomes a Stream-Enterer

Sujātā, Yasa's mother and the wife of the rich merchant, rose from her bed early in the morning and went to Yasa's mansion, and looked around. Not seeing her son, she became worried and reported to Yasa's father: "Sir, I do not see your son Yasa!" Thereupon, his father hurriedly sent out skilful horse-men in the four directions, as for himself, he set out in the direction of Isipatana Deer Park and, finding, on the way, the prints of the golden footwear worn by his son, he followed the trail of these prints.

The Buddha saw Yasa's father from a distance, and thinking: "It would be good to have Yasa hidden by my supernatural power so that the father cannot see him," he kept Yasa out of his father's sight.

The rich merchant came to the presence of the Buddha and addressed him: "Exalted Buddha, have you seen Yasa the young man of good family?" Thereupon, the Buddha replied: "Rich merchant, if you want to see your son, you just sit here. Even while sitting here, you will be able to see your son seated close by." Thereupon, the rich merchant was delighted with the thought: "I am going to see my son Yasa seated close by, even while I am sitting here!" After paying respects to the Buddha with due respect and devotion, he sat down in an appropriate place.

When he was thus sitting, the Buddha taught him progressively in the same way as aforesaid: 1) the Dhamma relating to generosity (dāna-kathā); 2) the Dhamma relating to morality (sīla-kathā); 3) the Dhamma relating to heaven (sagga-kathā); and 4) the Dhamma relating to the good path and line of conduct for realization of the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna (magga-kathā). When the Buddha knew that the merchant's mind had become adaptable, soft, hindrance-free, elated, gladdened, and pellucid, he taught the Dhamma of the four truths originally discovered by him, and the rich merchant became a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna).

Then Yasa's father addressed the Buddha thus: "So delightful is it, exalted Buddha! So delightful is it, exalted Buddha! As though what is placed downward has been turned over, so goes a worldly simile, as what is covered has been disclosed, as a man losing his way has been guided in the right direction; as a lamp that has been lighted in the dark with the thought: 'Those who have eyes may see the various shapes of things,' so the Buddha has clearly taught me the Dhamma in manifold ways. Exalted Buddha, I recognize and approach the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Saṅgha for refuge and shelter. May you, exalted Buddha, take me as a devotee with the threefold refuge from today onwards till the end of my life!" Thereafter, he took supermundane refuge.

Yasa's father, the wealthy man, was the first layman to become a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna), a noble disciple, in the Dispensation of the Buddha, and he was the first Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) among lay noble devotees with the full set of the three-worded refuge (te-vācika-saraṇa-gamaṇa) in the world.

Yasa Becomes an Arahāt

Even while the Buddha was teaching the Dhamma to his father, Yasa realised the three higher paths and became an Arahāt by reflecting on the four noble truths in accordance with the course of practice that had already been known to him since his attainment of Stream-entry. Thus Yasa became entirely free from attachment for anything through [395] craving and wrong view (taṇhā-diṭṭhi) as "I," or "mine" and became completely emancipated from the pollutants (āsava) which ceased by way of non-arising.

Thereupon, the Buddha put an end to what he had created by his supernatural power by not letting the son and the father see each other, thinking: “With the pollutants (āsava) extinct, the man of good family Yasa has indeed become an Arahāt. He will not slip back to the world of householders or in any way indulge in sensual pleasures as formerly. This being so, it would be good if I withdraw the miracle that has prevented the son and the father seeing each other!” and he made the resolve that they should now see each other.

Suddenly, seeing his son sitting near him, the father was very much delighted and told him thus: “My dear son Yasa! Your mother has fallen into a state of anxiety and grief and is crying from not seeing you. Save your mother’s life!”

Thereupon, without replying to his father, Yasa looked up at the Buddha who questioned the rich merchant thus: “Rich supporter, how will you consider the question I am going to ask you now? He who has embraced the four truths with the intelligence of a learner (sekkha-ñāṇa), as you have done yourself, attains the Stream-entry path (Sotāpatti-magga); and after reflecting upon and realizing the four truths through the course of practice that has been known to him since his attainment of Stream-entry reaches the three higher paths successively and becomes an Arahāt with his pollutants destroyed. Will he, having become an Arahāt, ever slip back to the household-life and indulge in sensual pleasures as he had done before?” The rich merchant replied: “He will not, Venerable Buddha.”

Again, in order to make his words even more explicit the Buddha addressed the rich merchant: “Rich supporter, your son Yasa, who has understood the four truths with the intelligence of a learner (sekkha-ñāṇa), as you have done yourself, attained the path of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga) even before you came here; and after reflecting upon and realizing the four truths through the course of practice that has been known to him since his attainment of the Stream-entry path, he has reached the three higher paths successively and became an Arahāt with his pollutants gone. Rich supporter, the man of good family Yasa will never slip back to the household-life and indulge in sensual pleasures as he had done before.”

Thereupon, the rich merchant said: “Exalted Buddha! Since the mind of Yasa has been entirely freed from attachment for anything through craving and wrong view as ‘I,’ or ‘mine’ and is emancipated from the pollutants, he has well availed himself of happiness and gain; and he has also had the full benefit of his existence as a human. Exalted Buddha! In order that I may gain merit and have delight, may you kindly accept my offering of a meal with the man of good family Yasa as a companion following behind you.” On thus being invited, the Buddha remained silent, signifying his acceptance of the rich merchant’s invitation to the morning meal.

Thereupon, knowing very well that the Buddha had accepted his invitation the rich merchant rose from his seat and returned to his house, after paying respects to the Buddha with due respect and circumambulation.

Yasa Becomes a Monk

Then, soon after the rich merchant had left, Yasa made obeisance to the Buddha respectfully and requested ordination: “Exalted Buddha! May I receive the going forth (pabbajjā) and higher ordination (upasampadā) in your presence.” And, the Buddha stretched out his golden hand and called out: Ehi bhikkhu! Svākkhāto Dhammo, cara brahma-cariyaṃ sammā dukkhassa, anta-kiriyaṃyā, “come, monk! receive the admission and ordination you have asked for. The Dhamma has been well-taught by me. Strive to take up the noble practices which form the moral training in my Dispensation, till you reach your last thought moment and dying consciousness in total emancipation (Parinibbāna-cuti-citta).” No sooner had the Buddha uttered this than Yasa was transformed into a full-fledged monk, like a monk of 60 years’ standing, readily dressed and equipped with the eight requisites created by supernatural power (iddhi-maya-parikkhāra), each in its proper place; he was then in a posture of respectfully paying homage to the Buddha.

The utterance by the [396] Buddha: Ehi bhikkhu, served as ordination for Ven. Yasa. There was no need to undergo the now normal ordination procedure involving a boundary hall (sīma).

At the time when Ven. Yasa became a monk, there were seven venerable Arahats in the world, namely: the Buddha, the Group-of-Five monks and Ven. Yasa himself.

Yasa’s Mother and Ex-Wife Become Sream-Enterers

After he had ordained the rich merchant’s son, Yasa, as a summoned monastic, the Buddha proceeded in the following morning to the house of his father, the rich merchant. After adjusting his robe and carrying his alms bowl, and with

12: Yasa, his Family and Friends – 506

Ven. Yasa as a follower-monk, and upon arrival the Buddha sat cross-legged in the place already prepared. Thereupon, the rich merchant's wife Sujātā, who was the mother of Ven. Yasa, together with Yasa's ex-wife, approached the Buddha and, after paying respects to him with due respect and devotion, took their seats in the appropriate places.

While they were seated there, the Buddha taught Yasa's mother and his ex-wife the gradual course of practice leading to the paths and fruitions: 1) The Dhamma relating to generosity (dāna-kathā); 2) the Dhamma relating to morality (sīla-kathā); 3) the Dhamma relating to a happy destination (sagga-kathā); and 4) the Dhamma relating to the good path, and the line of conduct for the realization of the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna (magga-kathā). Then he showed the demerits of sensual pleasures and the merits of renouncing the household life. Thereafter, when the Buddha knew that the mind of both of them had become adaptable, soft and free from hindrances, eager, gladdened, purified and pellucid, he taught the Dhamma that was which was originally discovered by him (sāmuikkamsikā Dhamma-desanā) of the four truths. Then Yasa's mother and his ex-wife became established in the fruit of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).

Thereupon, Yasa's mother, Sujātā, and his ex-wife received the supermundane refuges (lokuttara-saraṇa-gamana), by addressing the Buddha thus: "So delightful is it, exalted Buddha! So delightful is it, exalted Buddha! As though what was placed downward has been turned over, so goes a worldly simile, as what is covered has been disclosed, as a man losing his way has been guided in the right direction, as a lamp that has been lighted in the dark with the thought, "Those who have eyes may see the various shapes of things," so the Buddha has clearly taught us the Dhamma in manifold ways. Exalted Buddha, the two of us approach the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Saṅgha for refuge and shelter. May you, exalted Buddha, take us as female lay-disciples from now on till the end of our lives."

The rich merchant's wife, Sujātā, and Yasa's ex-wife were the noble disciples (ariya-sāvaka) who were the first female lay-devotees to be established in the three-worded refuge (te-vācika-saraṇa-gamana) in the world.

Then the mother, the father and the ex-wife of Ven. Yasa served the Buddha and Ven. Yasa with hard and soft food of excellent quality with their own hands (sāhatthika) and, on knowing that the Buddha had finished the meal, they took their appropriate seats, which were free from the six faults. Thereupon, the Buddha rose from his seat after teaching the Dhamma to the mother, the father and Yasa's ex-wife, and left for the Deer Park at Isipatana.

Here, according to the sub-commentary Diamond Intelligence (Vajira-buddhi), it should be noted that the Buddha first taught the Dhamma to the mother and the ex-wife of Ven. Yasa before taking the alms food because otherwise they would not have been able to perform the alms giving (dāna) joyfully, with the spite of sorrow piercing their bodies caused by Yasa's joining the monkhood: and also because this would have caused their displeasure with the Buddha to the point of being unable to gain the paths and fruitions. The Buddha accordingly took the alms food after first teaching them the Dhamma in order to allay their sorrow.

Yasa's 54 Friends Enter the Monkhood

In Bārāṇasī, there were four rich merchants' sons, by the names of Vimāla, Subāhu, Punnaḥji and Gavampati, who were descendants of rich ancestors and were old friends of [397] Ven. Yasa while he was a layman. On hearing that their friend Yasa had become a monk after relinquishing his enormous wealth and property, these four rich merchants' sons reflected and considered thus: "Our friend Yasa has given up family life and the world and entered the monkhood by shaving his head and beard and putting on robes. Therefore, the Doctrine and Discipline (Dhamma-Vinaya) of the Buddha cannot be inferior, it will certainly be superior. Nor can the state of monkhood be inferior, it will certainly be superior." And so, they went and approached Ven. Yasa and, after paying respects to him with due respect and devotion, they remained standing at an appropriate distance.

Thereupon, Ven. Yasa took his old friends to the Buddha and after paying respects to him with due respect and devotion and taking a seat at an appropriate place, he requested the Buddha: "Exalted Buddha! These four rich merchants' sons, by the names of Vimāla, Subāhu, Punnaḥji, and Gavampati, are of high birth and are descendants of rich ancestors in Bārāṇasī. They are also my old friends from when I was a layman. Exalted Buddha! May you kindly instruct and exhort these four old friends of mine."

Then the Buddha taught them in the way aforesaid, the course of moral practice leading to the paths and fruitions: 1) The Dhamma relating to generosity (dāna- kathā); 2) the Dhamma relating to morality (sīla-kathā); 3) the Dhamma relating to a happy destination (sagga-kathā); and 4) the Dhamma relating to the good path and the line of conduct for the realization of the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna (magga-kathā). Thereafter, when the Buddha knew that the minds of all four of them had become adaptable, soft and free from hindrances, eager, gladdened, purified and pellucid, he delivered the Dhamma which was originally discovered by him (sāmuḅkaṁsika Dhamma-desanā) of the four truths; and the four rich merchants' sons, who were the old companions of Ven. Yasa, became established in the fruition of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).

12: Yasa, his Family and Friends – 508

After the four rich merchants' sons had been established in the fruition of Stream-entry, they requested the Buddha that they may be ordained as monks thus: “Exalted Buddha! May we receive the going forth (pabbajjā) and the higher ordination (upasampadā) in your presence.” And, the Buddha stretched out his golden hand and called out thus: Etha bhikkhave, etc., “come, monks! Receive the admission and ordination you have asked for, my dear sons! The Dhamma has been well taught by me. Strive to practise for the three higher paths in order to bring about the end of the round of suffering.” No sooner had the Buddha uttered this, than the four rich merchant's sons turned into fully fledged monks, like senior monks of 60 years standing, readily dressed up and equipped with the eight supernaturally-made requisites (iddhi-maya-parikkhāra), each in its proper place, paying homage to the Buddha with due respect. The signs of being laymen disappeared miraculously and they were transformed into the forms of monks.

Just the utterance by the Buddha of the words: Etha bhikkhave ... served as the ordination for the four of them. There was no need to be ordained in a boundary hall (sīma).

After they had been ordained as summoned monastics, the Buddha instructed and exhorted them with words of Dhamma. On being thus instructed and exhorted with words of Dhamma, the four monks, before long, became Arahats with their pollutants being destroyed. At the time when the four rich merchants' sons had become Arahats, there were altogether eleven Arahats among men in the human world, namely, the Buddha, the Group-of-Five monks, Ven. Yasa, Ven. Vimala, Ven. Subāhu, Ven. Punnaji and Ven. Gavampati.

Yasa's 50 Friends Become Monks

Then the 50 companions of Ven. Yasa, while he was a layman, who were descendants of noble ancestors and who were living in rural areas, on hearing that their friend Yasa had become a monk after relinquishing his enormous wealth and property, reflected and considered thus: “Our companion Yasa has given up family life and the world and become a monk by shaving his head and beard and putting on the robes. It cannot [398] therefore be that the Doctrine and Discipline (Dhamma-Vinaya) of the Buddha will be inferior or ignoble, it will certainly be superior and noble. It cannot be that the state of monkhood will also be inferior and ignoble, it will certainly be superior and noble.” And so, the 50 companions approached Ven. Yasa and, after paying respects to him with due respect and devotion, they remained standing at an appropriate distance.

Thereupon, Ven. Yasa took the 50 men of the countryside and of high birth, who were his old companions while he was a layman, to the Buddha and, after paying respects to him with due respect and devotion and taking his seat at an appropriate distance, he addressed the Buddha thus: “Exalted Buddha! These 50 residents of the countryside are descendants of rich ancestors. They were also my old companions while I was a layman. Exalted Buddha! May you kindly instruct and discipline these 50 sons of high birth who are my old companions.”

The Buddha taught them in the way as aforesaid, the course of moral practice leading to the paths and fruitions: 1) The Dhamma relating to generosity (dāna-kathā); 2) the Dhamma relating to morality (sīla-kathā); 3) the Dhamma relating to a happy destination (sagga-kathā); and 4) the Dhamma relating to the good path and line of conduct for realization of the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna (magga-kathā) as well as the dangers of sensuality (kāmānaṃ ādīnava) together with the advantages of renunciation (nekkhamma-ānisaṃsa) in a progressive manner. Thereafter, when the Buddha knew that the minds of the 50 sons of high birth had become adaptable, soft and free from the hindrances, eager, gladdened, purified and pellucid, he delivered the Dhamma which was originally discovered by him (sāmuikkamsikā Dhamma-desanā) of the four truths; and the 50 sons of noble birth, who were the old companions of Ven. Yasa, became established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).

After they were established in Stream-entry, they requested the Buddha that they may be ordained as monks thus: “Exalted Buddha! May we receive the going forth (pabbajjā) and the higher ordination (upasampadā) in your presence.” And, the Buddha stretched out his golden hand and called out in the same way as before: Etha bhikkhave, etc., “come, monks! Receive the admission and ordination you have asked for. My dear sons! The Dhamma has been well taught by me. Strive to practise for the three higher paths in order to bring about the end of the round of suffering.” No sooner had the Buddha uttered this than the 50 men of noble birth instantly turned into full-fledged monks, like senior monks (thera) of 60 years standing, readily dressed and equipped with the eight supernaturally-made requisites (iddhi-maya-parikkhāra), each in its proper place, paying homage to the Buddha with due respect. The signs of being laymen disappeared miraculously and they were transformed into the forms of monks.

Just the utterance by the Buddha of the words: Etha bhikkhave ... served as ordination for the 50 clansmen. There was no need to be ordained in a boundary hall (sīma).

After they had been ordained as summoned monastics (ehi-bhikkhu), the Buddha instructed and exhorted them with words of Dhamma. On being thus instructed and exhorted with words of Dhamma, the 50 monks of noble birth, before long, became Arahats with their pollutants (āsava) destroyed. At the time, when the 50 sons of high birth became Arahats, there were altogether 61 venerable Arahats, including the previous eleven in the human world.

Meditation on Impurity in the Past

Once upon a time in the distant past, 55 companions formed an association of volunteers for performing deeds of merit. They carried out the work of cremating, free of charge, the dead bodies of those who died in destitution. One day, finding the dead body of a pregnant woman who had died in destitution, they took her to the cemetery for cremation. Out of the 55 volunteer companions, 50 of them went back to the village after asking the other five companions to take up the duty, saying: “You do the cremation.”

Thereupon, as the young man, the future wealthy son Yasa, who was the leader of the remaining five, carried out the cremation by piercing and rending the corpse with a pointed bamboo pole and causing it to turn over. In so doing, he gained the perception of the impure and loathsome nature of the body (asubha-saññā). The young man, the future Yasa, advised the remaining four companions thus: “Friends, look at this unclean, and disgusting [399] corpse.”

The four companions also gained the perception of the impure from the corpse (chava) by following Yasa's advice.

When the five companions returned to the village after having finished the work of cremation and related what they had found and had understood of the loathsome nature (asubha) to the 50 associates who had returned to the village, the latter also gained the perception of the impure and loathsome nature of the body (asubha-saññā).

Besides relating the matter to the companions, the young and leading man, the future Yasa, recounted the facts regarding the loathsome nature also to his parents and his wife on reaching home; and so his benefactors, his parents and his wife, also gained the perception of the impure and loathsome nature of the body (asubha-saññā).

These 58 persons, headed by the future wealthy son Yasa, continued to practise and develop meditation on the impurity and loathsomeness of the body (asubha-bhāvanā) based on the perception they had gained. These, in fact, were the past deeds of merit of these 58 persons.

By virtue of the past deeds of merit, in the present existence as the son of the rich merchant of Bānārasī, there appeared to Ven. Yasa the perception of the impure and loathsome nature of the body (asubha-saññā), and the impression of a cemetery on seeing the conditions of the dancers. The realisation of the paths and fruitions by the 58 persons was due to their possession of the supporting (upanissaya) merit resulting from developing the perception of the loathsome (asubha-bhāvanā) and having practised and developed it in a previous existence.

13: The Buddha Sends Out the 60 Arahats

The Buddha observed the first rains-residence after his becoming a Buddha at the Deer Park at Isipatana. While staying there till the full moon of the month of October (Assayuja), the Buddha, one day, sent for the 60 venerables and asked them to go on missionary work thus: “Monastics I have achieved complete freedom from all the snares of impurities such as craving (taṇhā) and greed (lobha), namely, the snare of craving and greed for the sensual pleasure of Devas and the snare of craving and greed for the sensual pleasure of humans. Monastics, you also have achieved complete freedom from all the snares of impurities such as craving and greed, namely, the snare of craving and greed for the sensual pleasure of Devas and the snare of craving and greed for the sensual pleasure of humans.

Monastics, go out in all eight directions for the mundane and supermundane welfare, prosperity and happiness of many beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas covering a distance of one league a day at the most. Let not two of you travel together on each journey, for if two take the same route, while one is teaching, the other will remain idle, just sitting in silence.

Monastics, teach the Dhamma that is full of virtuous qualities in all its three phases: the beginning, the middle and the end; and endowed with the spirit and the letter. Give the Devas and humans, the threefold training of morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā), which is perfect in all aspects and free from the stain of wrong conduct (duccarita).

Monastics, there are many beings, such as humans, Devas and Brahmas, who have but a little dust of impurity in their wisdom-eyes. Through not hearing the Dhamma, they will suffer a great loss of the extraordinary Dhamma which gains the paths and the fruitions. There will appear clearly some Devas and humans who will realize the nature and meaning of the Dhamma perfectly and thoroughly.

Monastics I too will not remain in this Deer Park, which has excellent dwellings built for me, and receiving the treatment and comfort with the four requisites given by my attending supporters, but will proceed to Uruvelā forest of Senānigama to teach the Dhamma and to convert the reclusive brothers and their 1,000 ascetics.”

13: The Buddha sends out the Sixty Arahats – 513

In the above paragraph of the Buddha's speech, the words: "The Dhamma that is full of virtuous qualities in all its three phases: the beginning, the middle and the end," refers to two good qualities (kalyāṇa), the good quality of the Dispensation (Sāsana) and the good quality of the teaching (desanā).

Of the two categories of good qualities, morality (sīla) forms the quality at the beginning of the Dispensation (Sāsana); concentration (samatha), insight (vipassanā) and fourfold path (magga) form the quality at the middle of the Dispensation (Sāsana); the fourfold fruition and Nibbāna form the quality at the end of the Dispensation (Sāsana).

Alternately, we can take morality and concentration as the beginning, insight-knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa) and path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa) as the middle and fruition (phala) and Nibbāna as the end qualities.

Another alternative is morality, concentration and the path-knowledges are the beginning, the fourfold paths are the middle and the fourfold fruitions and Nibbāna are the end qualities.

As regards the good qualities of the teaching (desanā), in a four line verse, the first foot is the beginning, the second and the third feet are the middle and the fourth foot at the end are the qualities. If a verse has five or six feet, the first foot as the beginning, the second, third and fourth foot are the middle and the final fifth or the sixth feet are the end. [401]

In a discourse with only one contextual connective (anusandhi), the introduction (nidāna) of the discourse is the beginning, the group of words, Idam avoca... and so on, are the end and the remaining group of words are the middle qualities.

In a discourse with many contextual connectives, the introduction is the beginning, the group of words, Idam avoca... and so on are the end, and the group of words with many contextual connectives are the middle. By discourse (sutta) is meant that which shows one or two or three of the good qualities of the teaching.

Māra's Visit and Deterrence

When the Buddha was thus addressing and sending out the 60 Arahats as missionaries, Māra thought to himself: "As if planning to wage a big war, this monk Gotama is sending out 60 Arahats, the military commanders of the Dispensation (Sāsana), by saying: "Do not travel in twos on each journey.

13: The Buddha sends out the Sixty Arahats – 514

Disseminate the Dhamma.” I feel uneasy even if anyone of these 60 messengers preaches the Dhamma. How will I be if all 60 Arahats preach the Dhamma as planned by the monk Gotama? I shall now deter the monk Gotama from doing so!” So he approached the Buddha and tried to discourage him by saying thus:

Baddhosi sabba-pāsehi, ye dibbā ye ca mānusā, mahā-bandhana-baddhosi, na me samaṇa mokkhasi.

O Monk Gotama! You are bound and caught in all the snares of impurities such as craving (taṇhā) and greed (lobha), namely, the snare of craving and greed for the sensual pleasure of Devas and the snare of craving and greed for the sensual pleasure of humans. You are tied down in the bondage of defilements (kilesa) in the prison of the three existences. O Monk Gotama! For that reason you will not be able to escape, in any way, from my domain in the three existences.

Māra said this with the hope: “On my speaking thus, the great monk will not endeavour to emancipate other beings from Saṃsāra.”

Thereupon, the Buddha, in order to show that what Māra had spoken and the actual reality were far apart, as is the sky and the earth and that they were directly opposed to each other as fire and water, addressed Māra in these bold words:

Muttāhaṃ sabba-pāsehi, ye dibbā ye ca mānusā, mahā-bandhana-muttomhi, nihato tvam-asi antaka.

You evil Māra, heretic and murderer! I am one who has been completely freed from all the snares of such impurities as craving (taṇhā) and greed (lobha), namely, the snare of craving and greed for the sensual pleasure of Devas and the snare of craving and greed for the sensual pleasure of humans. I am also truly one who has escaped, once and for all, from the bondage of the defilements (kilesa) in the prison of the three existences. I have totally vanquished you in this battle with the defilements. You have, in fact, suffered total defeat.

Thereupon, Māra again repeated prohibitory words thus:

Antalikkha-carō pāso, yvāyaṃ carati mānaso, tena taṃ bādhayissāmi, na me samaṇa mokkhasi.

O monk Gotama! Such a snare as passion (rāga) is generated in the minds of beings and is capable of inescapably binding down even the individuals

13: The Buddha sends out the Sixty Arahats – 515

[402] who possess the supernormal powers (abhiññā) and can fly through the air. I shall bind you and kill you by means of that snare of passion. O monk Gotama! In no way will you escape from my domain in the three existences.”

Thereupon, the Buddha addressed Māra in these bold words:

*Rūpā saddā rasā gandhā, phoṭṭhabbā ca manoramā;
ettha me vigato chando, nihato tvam-asi antaka.*

You, evil Māra, heretic and murderer! In this world, there are clearly evident the five objects of sensual pleasure: various sights, sounds, tastes, odours and contacts, which can delight and give pleasure to Devas and humans. Your snare of passion will be able to bind down only those who are not free from craving and greed for attachment and enjoyment of the said five objects of sensual pleasure. I am entirely free from craving, greed, desire and passion for attachment and enjoyment of these five objects of sensual pleasure. In this battle of the defilements therefore, I have totally vanquished you. You have, in fact, suffered total defeat.

Māra was at first trying to dissuade the Buddha and hoping: “Maybe he will give up thinking that a powerful Deva has come and dissuaded him,” but since the Buddha had addressed him saying: “Māra! I have totally vanquished you.” He became sad and dejected, and saying: “The exalted Buddha has known me for what I am! The Gracious One has known me for what I am,” and he disappeared from that very place.

The Buddha’s Permission to Ordain

At the time of the first rainy season (Vassa) when the Buddha sent the monks on missionary work, he had not yet enjoined the monks to observe the Rains Retreat. And so the monks brought to his presence persons who were eager to be admitted as novices and ordained as monks from various places and various districts with the thought that: “These prospective persons will be admitted as novices and ordained as monks by the Buddha himself,” when they were brought, the monks as well as these prospective candidates suffered much trouble and fatigue.

When the missionary monastics taught the Dhamma, not only those who were endowed with past meritorious deeds to become summoned monastics (ehi-bhikkhu) but also those who were not so endowed with such deeds, would aspire after admission and ordination. The Buddhas usually did not confer monkhood on those of the latter kind. But when there were mixed crowds of aspirants, both deserving or not deserving the summoned monastic proclamation, the Buddha, being desirous of laying down the procedure for ordination of those persons not deserving of the summoned monastic ordination, considered thus: “At the present moment, the monks are bringing to my presence prospective persons wishing for admission, wishing for ordination, from various places and various districts as they are under the impression that these candidates will be admitted and ordained by the Buddha himself and thereby the monks, as well as the prospective persons, suffer much trouble and fatigue.” It would be good if I give permission to the monastics thus: “Monks! You yourselves may now admit, may now ordain prospective persons at any place and in any district.”

Thereafter, the Buddha emerged from seclusion and gave the monks a Dhamma talk, introductory to his consideration. He related fully what had occurred to him while he was remaining alone in the day time: “Monastics! You yourselves may now admit, may now ordain prospective persons willing to become novices and monastics at any place and in any district. I allow admission and ordination yourselves, my dear sons, at any place and in any district.

Monastics! You should admit, and ordain a candidate in this manner: First his hair and beard should be shaved. Then he should don the monk’s robe. And then let him cover one [403] shoulder with the robe and make obeisance at the senior monk’s feet; let him squat down and raise his hands joined together, and ask him to repeat after you the three refuges:

*Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi,
Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi,
Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi.
Dutiyam-pi Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi,
Dutiyam-pi Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi,
Dutiyam-pi Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi.
Tatiyam-pi Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi,
Tatiyam-pi Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi,
Tatiyam-pi Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi.*

I go for refuge to the Buddha,
I go for refuge to the Dhamma,
I go for refuge to the Saṅgha.

For a second time ...

For a third time ...

Monastics! I, allow you to confer admission and ordination by the three refuges.”

Here, conferment of admission and ordination consists in these three: 1) The shaving of the candidate’s hair and beard (kesacchedana); 2) the donning of the monk’s robe on him (kāsāyachhādana); and 3) the taking of the three refuges.

Māra’s Second Visit

After the Buddha had taken residence for four months of the rainy season until the full moon of the month of November (Kattikā), in the Deer Park at Isipatana, he assembled the monks and addressed them thus: “Monastics, my dear sons! I have attained the incomparable and supreme Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala) through right and proper mindfulness, as well as through right and proper effort. I have been absorbed in the attainment of the Arahata fruition without interruption. Monastics! You also endeavour to gain and achieve the incomparable and supreme Arahata fruition through right and proper mindfulness, as well as through right and proper effort. Realise the incomparable and supreme Arahata fruition. Be absorbed in the attainment of the Arahata fruition without interruption.”

The Buddha gave this advice with these objects in view: Not to let them falter on account of the underlying tendency (vāsanā) which had taken root ever since the time of their existence as worldlings (puthujjana-bhāva) thinking: “We are now Arahats with the pollutants dried up. What benefit will accrue to us by the practice of meditation? There will be none!” And to make them spend their time developing the attainment of fruition (phala-samāpatti) in forest-dwellings on the outskirts of towns and villages; and thus to make other monastics see and follow their example (diṭṭhānugati) of being absorbed in the attainment of fruition.

Thereupon, Māra came to where the Buddha was and spoke to deter him:

Baddhosi Māra-pāsehi, ye dibbā ye ca mānūsā, mahā-bandhana-baddhosi, na me samaṇa mokkhasi.

Monk Gotama! You are bound and caught in all the snares of impurities such as craving (taṇhā) and greed (lobha), namely, the snare of craving and greed for the sensual pleasure of Devas and the snare of craving and greed for the sensual pleasure of humans. You are tied down in the bondage of the defilements (kilesa) in the prison of the three existences. Monk Gotama! You will not for that reason be able to escape in any way from my domain in the three existences.

13: The Buddha sends out the Sixty Arahats – 518

Thereupon, the Buddha, in order to show that what he had spoken and the actual reality [404] were quite far apart, as the sky and the earth and that they were directly opposed to each other, as fire and water, addressed Māra in these defiant words:

Muttāhaṃ Māra-pāsehi, ye dibbā ye ca mānusā, mahā-bandhana-muttomhi, nihato tvam-asi antaka.

You, Wicked Māra! I am one who is completely freed from all the snares of impurities such as craving (taṇhā) and greed (lobha), namely, the snare of craving and greed for the sensual pleasure of Devas and the snare of craving and greed for the sensual pleasure of humans. I am also truly one who has escaped once and for all from the bondage of the defilements (kilesa) in the prison of the three existences. I have totally vanquished you in this battle with the defilements. You have, in fact, suffered total defeat.

Whereupon, Māra became sad and dejected, saying: “The Exalted Buddha knows me for what I am. The Fortunate One knows me for what I am,” and he disappeared from that very place.

The Auspicious Group-of-Thirty

Buddhas dwelling in any one place never felt uneasy and unhappy because of it being devoid of shady spots and water, of its miserable living conditions, and of the people there having little or no virtues such as faith and so on. When they have stayed in a place for a long time, it was not because there were enough shelters and water and the inhabitants had faith, so that they found joy and comfort there, thinking: “We can live in this place happily!”

The Buddhas stay at a certain place because they would like to have beings established in the welfare and prosperity of the refuges, morality, the monastic life and the paths and fruitions, provided they were prepared to take the refuges, to observe the eight and ten precepts, to enter the monastic life, and provided they had past acts of special merit to serve as supporting conditions (upanissaya-paccaya) for their realization of the paths and fruitions. It was the usual way of Buddhas to emancipate beings worthy of emancipation and, if there were no more to emancipate, they make the departure for another place.

The Buddha remained at the Deer Park at Isipatana, near Bārāṇasī, until his desire to emancipate the Group-of-Five monks and others had been fulfilled, he then set out all alone, carrying his alms bowl, to Uruvelā forest. On the way he entered a wood by the name of Kappāsika and remained seated at the foot of a certain tree.

At that time, the 30 princely brothers known as the Auspicious Group (Bhaddavaggiya), who were so-called because they possessed grace and beauty, and good temperament, and habitually went on tours in a group, happened to be indulging in love-making in the Kappāsika woodland, accompanied by their respective spouses. One of the princes, however, brought a prostitute as he had no wife. While the princes were carelessly enjoying themselves with drinks, etc., the prostitute stole their belongings and ran away.

Then the princes, in order to help their companion, wandered about the woodland in search of the prostitute and came upon the Buddha sitting under a tree. They went up to him and without being yet able to make obeisance to the Buddha, addressed him thus: “Exalted Buddha! Has the blessed Buddha seen a woman?”

The Buddha asked them: “Princes! What do you want with this woman?” They replied: “Exalted Buddha! We, the 30 princely companions, happen to be amusing ourselves inside this Kappāsika woodland in company with our respective spouses. One of our companions has no wife and so he has brought a prostitute. But while we were carelessly enjoying ourselves, the prostitute stole our belongings and ran away. In order to help him out, we are going about this Kappāsika woodland looking for this woman.” [405]

Thereupon, the Buddha asked: “Princes! What, in your opinion, is better for you, seeking a missing woman or seeking your own self?” They replied: “Exalted Buddha! It is better for us that we seek ourselves.” The Buddha then said: “Princes! Then sit down. I will teach you the Dhamma,” and the princes replied: “Yes, exalted Buddha!” And then, after paying respects to the Buddha with due respect and devotion, the Auspicious Group-of-Thirty companions remained seated at an appropriate distance which was free from the six faults.

13: The Buddha sends out the Sixty Arahats – 520

The Buddha taught them the course of moral practice leading to the paths and fruitions: 1) Generosity (dāna-kathā); 2) morality (sīla-kathā); 3) the way to heaven (sagga-kathā); and 4) the path (magga-kathā), as well as the dangers of sensuality and the advantages of renunciation in succession. Thereafter, knowing that the 30 princes' minds had become adaptable, soft and free from hindrances, eager, gladdened, purified and pellucid, the Buddha taught the Dhamma which was originally discovered by him (sāmuḍḍhāsiḍḍhā Dhamma-desanā) of the four truths, and, as a result, the Auspicious Group-of-Thirty princely companions became established, some in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala), some in Once-returning (Sakadāgāmi-phala) and others in Non-returning (Anāgāmi-phala). Not a single one of them remained worldlings (puthujjana).

After the Auspicious Group-of-Thirty princely companions had been established severally in Stream-entry, Once-returning and in Non-returning they requested the Buddha that they be ordained as monastics: “Exalted Buddha! May we receive the going forth (pabbajjā) and higher ordination (upasampadā) in your presence?” And the Buddha stretched out his golden hand and called out in the same way as before thus: Etha bhikkhave, and so on, meaning: “Come, monks! Receive the admission and ordination you have asked for. The Dhamma has been well taught by me. You must strive to engage in the practice of the higher paths in order to bring about the end of the round of suffering.”

Instantly the Auspicious Group-of-Thirty princes turned into fully fledged monastics like senior monks of 60 years' standing, readily dressed and equipped with the eight supernaturally created requisites each in its proper place, paying homage to the Buddha with due respect. Their signs of being laymen disappeared miraculously, and they were transformed into monastics.

The very utterance by the Buddha: Etha bhikkhave, meant a process for the 30 princes to become accomplished summoned monastics. There was no need to be ordained in an ordination hall (sīma).

Here, the 30 princes had been the 30 drunkards in the Tuṇḍila-jātaka (Ja 388). At that time, they properly observed the five precepts after hearing the words of admonition given by Mahā Tuṇḍila the Boar King, who was the Bodhisatta. Their observance of the five precepts was the cause in the past of their simultaneous discernment of the four noble truths in the present existence.

13: The Buddha sends out the Sixty Arahats – 521

Besides, having observed the five precepts together in unison, they had obviously done many meritorious deeds with a view to be free from dependence on the round of rebirths (vivaṭṭa-nissita) by listening to the Good Dhamma, taking the three refuges, performing deeds of generosity, observing the precepts and practising concentration and insight meditation severally during the Dispensations of the former Buddhas. For these reasons, they had such good fortune as the realization of the lower paths and the lower fruitions and of becoming summoned monastics on the very day they met the Buddha.

The Auspicious Group-of-Thirty monastics were the half brothers of King Kosala, having the same father but different mothers. As they usually lived in Pāveyya city, in the western part of Kosala country, they were known by the name of the Pāveyyaka monks in the texts. It is in connection with these monks that the Buddha, at a future date, permitted the making and offering of the Cloth (Kaṭhina). The 30 Pāveyyaka monks became established in the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala) after hearing the Discourse on the Round of Existences which have no Beginning while the Buddha was dwelling in Veḷuvana monastery in Rājagaha (see SN 15.13, Anamatagga-saṃyutta). [407]

14: Conversion of the Kassapa Brothers

The Miracles

After having established the Auspicious Group-of-Thirty princes in the three lower paths and fruitions (magga-phala) and ordaining them, the Buddha continued on his journey and arrived at Uruvelā.

At that time, there were three recluse brothers: 1) Uruvelā Kassapa, who was the eldest brother and leader and teacher of 500 recluse disciples; 2) Nadī Kassapa, who was the middle brother and leader and teacher of 300 recluse disciples; and 3) Gayā Kassapa, the youngest brother, the leader and teacher of 200 recluse disciples.

The First Miracle

The Buddha went to the hermitage of Uruvelā Kassapa and made a request thus: “If it is not too much of a burden to you, O Kassapa, I would like to stay in your fire-house for one night.” – “It is no burden for me,” replied Uruvelā Kassapa, “but what I want to tell you is that, at this fire-house, there is a very savage and powerful Nāga (serpent), having highly poisonous and instantly harmful venom. I do not like it that the Nāga King may harm you, monk.” The Buddha made the request for the second time, and also for the third time, and Uruvelā Kassapa gave the same reply. When the Buddha requested for the fourth time saying: “The Nāga King, O Kassapa, cannot do any harm to me, the Buddha. I am only asking you to let me stay at the fire-house.” Uruvelā Kassapa finally gave his assent by saying: “Stay happily, O monk, as long as you desire!”

When permission had been given by Uruvelā Kassapa, the Buddha entered the fire-house, spread the small grass mat and sat cross-legged on it, keeping his body upright and directing his mind intently on the object of meditation. When the Nāga saw the Buddha entering the fire-house, he was very angry and blew forth fumes incessantly towards the Buddha with intent to destroy him and turn him to ashes.

Then the Buddha thought: “What if I overwhelm the Nāga’s power with mine, without injuring his skin or hide, flesh or sinews, bones or marrow!” and then he blew forth fumes which were far more violent than the fumes of the Nāga by exerting his supernatural power, but not to harm or hurt any part of its body. Being unable to contain his anger, the Nāga sent out blazing flames again. By developing the absorption (jhāna) of the fire meditation device (tejo-kasiṇa), the Buddha produced more violent flames. The whole fire-house appeared to be blazing because of the enormous flames of the Buddha and the Nāga.

Then the recluses, led by their teacher Uruvelā Kassapa, gathered round the fire-house and in fear Uruvelā Kassapa said: “Friends! The immensely handsome great monk has been harmed by the Nāga!” When the night had passed and the morning came, the Buddha, having overwhelmed the Nāga by his power without touching or hurting any part of its body, placed him inside his alms bowl and showed him to Uruvelā Kassapa, saying: “Kassapa! Is this the Nāga you spoke of? I have overwhelmed him with my power.”

Thereupon, Uruvelā Kassapa thought: “The monk is indeed very mighty and powerful since he is able to overwhelm the savage and powerful Nāga King who has highly poisonous and instantly harmful venom. But, even though he is so mighty and powerful, he is not yet an Arahant like me, whose pollutants (āsava) have been destroyed.”

Being very much impressed by this first performance of a miracle (pāṭihāriya) by taming the Nāga, Uruvelā Kassapa extended his invitation to the Buddha, saying: “Do take up residence just here O, great monk, I will offer you a constant supply of food.” [408]

The Second Miracle

Thereafter, the Buddha lived in a wood near the hermitage of Uruvelā Kassapa. When the first watch of the night was over and midnight came, the Four Great Kings of the four regions (Cātu-mahā-rājika), in their very pleasing splendour, illuminating the whole forest with their bodily radiance, went into the presence of the Buddha, made obeisance to him with due respect and devotion, and stood at a proper distance like four big bonfires in the four quarters.

When the night had passed and at daybreak, on the following morning, Uruvelā Kassapa came and asked the Buddha: “It is meal time, O, great monk! The meal is ready. Please come and have it. O, great monk! Who were they, with very pleasing splendour, who came into your presence, illuminating the whole forest with their bodily radiance after the night had well advanced up to midnight, and after paying respects with due respect and devotion, stood like four big bonfires in the four quarters?” When the Buddha replied: “They were the Four Great Kings of the four regions, O, Kassapa! They came to me to listen to the Dhamma.” Uruvelā Kassapa thought: “Even the Four Great Kings of the four regions come to this monk to listen to the Dhamma. This monk is indeed very mighty and powerful. But, even though he is so mighty and powerful, he is not yet an Arahāt like me, whose pollutants have been destroyed.”

At that time, although the Buddha was aware of what was in the mind of Uruvelā Kassapa, he restrained himself and remained patient, waiting for the maturing of the ascetic’s sense faculties, and he stayed on in the wood, accepting and taking the food offered by Uruvelā Kassapa.

The Third Miracle

On the next night when the first watch of the night was over and midnight came, Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, with very pleasing splendour, illuminating the whole forest with his bodily radiance that was more pleasing and even greater in brightness than those of the previous Four Great Kings of the four regions, came into the presence of the Buddha, made obeisance to him with due respect and devotion, and stood at a proper distance like a big bonfire.

When the night was over, on the following morning, Uruvelā Kassapa went and asked the Buddha; “It is meal time, O, great monk! The meal is ready. Please come and have it. O great monk! Who was he, in very pleasing splendour, who came into your presence after the night had well-advanced up to midnight, illuminating the whole forest with his bodily radiance that was more pleasing and even greater in brightness than those of the previous Four Great Kings of the four regions, and who, after paying respects to you with due respect and devotion, stood at a proper distance like a big bonfire?”

When the Buddha replied: “That was Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, O, Kassapa; he came to me to listen to the Dhamma,” Uruvelā Kassapa thought: “Even Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, has to come to this monk to listen to the Dhamma. This monk is indeed very mighty and powerful. But, even though he is so mighty and powerful, he is not yet an Arahāt like me, whose pollutants have been destroyed.”

At that time, although the Buddha was aware of what was in the mind of Uruvelā Kassapa, he restrained himself and remained patient, waiting for the maturing of the ascetic’s sense faculties, and he stayed on in the wood, accepting and taking the food offered by Uruvelā Kassapa.

The Fourth Miracle

Again the next night, when the first watch of the night was over and midnight came, Brahma Sahampati, with very pleasing splendour, illuminating the whole forest with his bodily radiance, that was more pleasing and even greater in brightness than those of the Four Great Kings and Sakka, came into the presence of the Buddha, made obeisance to [409] him with due respect and devotion, stood at a proper distance like a big bonfire.

Then when the night had passed, at daybreak, on the following morning, Uruvelā Kassapa went and asked the Buddha: “It is meal time, O, great monk! The meal is ready. Please come and have it. O great monk! Who was he, in very pleasing splendour, who came into your presence after the night had well-advanced up to midnight, illuminating the whole forest with his bodily radiance that was more pleasing and even greater in brightness than those of the Four Great Kings and Sakka, and who, after paying respects to you with due respect and devotion, stood at a proper distance like a big bonfire.”

When the Buddha replied: “That was Brahma Sahampati, Kassapa! He came to me to listen to the Dhamma,” again Uruvelā Kassapa thought thus: “Even Brahma Sahampati has to come to this monk to listen to the Dhamma. This monk is indeed very mighty and powerful. But, even though he is so mighty and powerful, he is not yet an Arahat like me, whose pollutants have been destroyed.”

At that time, although the Buddha was aware of what was in the mind of Uruvelā Kassapa, he restrained himself and remained patient, waiting for the maturing of the ascetic’s sense faculties, and he stayed on in the wood, accepting and taking the food offered by Uruvelā Kassapa.

The Fifth Miracle

It was the custom of the people of the Aṅga and Magadha countries to pay homage to Uruvelā Kassapa in a monthly alms giving festival, which was held on a grand scale. While the Buddha was staying in Uruvelā forest, the day for holding the festival approached. On the festive eve, people were making arrangements to prepare food and dishes and to go to Uruvelā Kassapa the following morning for making their obeisance. Then Uruvelā Kassapa thought: “The great festival of paying homage to me is now underway. The entire populace of Aṅga and Magadha will come to my hermitage at daybreak, bringing with them large quantities of food, hard and soft. When they arrive and assemble, if the great monk, possessing great psychic power displays miracles in the midst of those people, they will show much devotion to him. Then his gains would increase day by day. As for myself since their faith in me would become less, gifts and offerings will decline day after day. It will be good if the great monk obligingly refrains from coming to my hermitage for his meal the next day.”

The Buddha, knowing the thought of Uruvelā Kassapa by his super knowledge of reading others’ minds (ceto-pariyāya-abhiññā), proceeded to the northern continent, Uttarakuru, and, after gathering alms food there he ate it near Lake Anotatta in the Himālayas and passed the day in the sandalwood grove by the lake. Then on the following day, even before dawn, he returned to Uruvelā forest and stayed there.

According to the Mahāvamsa, at this time the Buddha proceeded to Laṅkādiipa (Ceylon) all alone in the evening knowing that this would be the place where the Dispensation (Sāsana) would flourish in the future, and after the Yakkhas had been subdued and tamed, he gave a handful of his hairs to Sumana Deva to be worshipped forever.

On the next day, when it was time for his meal, Uruvelā Kassapa went into the presence of the Buddha and spoke to him courteously: “It is meal time, O, great monk! The meal is ready, please come and have it. O, great monk! Why did you not come yesterday? We were wondering why you did not show up. A portion of food had been kept aside for you.”

The Buddha said: “Yesterday, Kassapa! Did it not occur to you, thus: ‘The great festival of paying homage to me is now underway. The entire populace of Aṅga and Magadha will come to my hermitage at daybreak, bringing with them large quantities of food, [410] hard and soft. When they arrive and assemble, if the great monk possessing great psychic power displays miracles in the midst of those people, they will show much devotion to him. Then his gains would increase day by day. As for myself since their faith in me would become less, gifts and offerings will decline day after day. It will be good if the great monk obligingly refrains from coming to my hermitage for his meal the next day.’ O, Kassapa! Knowing your thought by the power of reading others’ minds (ceto-pariyāya-abhiññā), I proceeded yesterday morning to the northern continent, Uttarakuru, and, after gathering alms food there I ate it near Lake Anotatta in the Himālayas and passed the day in the sandalwood grove by the lake.”

Again Uruvelā Kassapa thought thus: “The great monk can indeed read my mind. This monk is indeed very mighty and powerful. But, even though he is so mighty and powerful, he is not yet an Arahāt like me, whose pollutants have been destroyed.”

At that time, although the Buddha was aware of what was in the mind of Uruvelā Kassapa, he restrained himself and remained patient, waiting for the maturing of the ascetic’s sense faculties, and he stayed on in the wood, accepting and taking the food offered by Uruvelā Kassapa.

The Sixth Miracle

One day, when a merchant’s slave girl of Senānigama, by the name of Puññā, died, her corpse (utuja-rūpa) was wrapped in a hemp fibre cloth and abandoned in the graveyard. After gently getting rid of a great load of maggots, the Buddha picked up the hemp fibre cloth to be worn by him as robe made of rags taken from a rubbish heap (paṃsukūla).<sup>170</sup>

The great earth then shook violently with a roaring sound by way of acclamation. The whole sky also roared with thundering sounds and all the Devas and Brahmas applauded by calling out: Well done! The Buddha went back to his dwelling in Uruvelā forest thinking: “Where should I wash these rags?” Sakka, being aware of what the Buddha was thinking, created by means of his supernormal power a four-sided pond by just touching the earth with his hand and addressed him: “Exalted Buddha! May you wash the rags in this pond.”

The Buddha washed the rags in the pond created by the Sakka. At that time also the earth shook, the entire sky roared and all the Devas and Brahmas applauded by calling out: Well done! After the Buddha had washed the rags, he considered: “Where should I dye these rags?” Sakka, being aware of what the Buddha had in mind, addressed him thus: “Exalted Buddha! May you dye the cloth on this stone slab,” and he created a large stone slab by his supernatural power and placed it near the pond.

After the Buddha had dyed the cloth on the stone slab created by the Sakka, he considered: “Where shall I hang up this cloth to dry?” Then a deity living on an Indian laurel (Kakudha)<sup>171</sup> tree near the hermitage, being aware of what the Buddha had in mind, addressed him: “Exalted Buddha! May you hang the rags to dry on this Indian laurel tree,” and he caused the branch of the tree to bend down.

After the Buddha had hung up the cloth to dry on the Indian laurel branch, he considered: “Where should I spread it out to make it flat and even?” Sakka, being aware of what the Buddha had in mind, addressed him: “Exalted Buddha! May you spread out the cloth on this stone slab to make it flat and even,” and he placed a large stone slab there.

When the morning came, Uruvelā Kassapa approached the Buddha and asked him: “It is [411] meal time, O, great monk. The meal is ready. Please come and have it. How is it, great monk? This four-sided pond was not here before. But now, here lies this pond! These two large stone slabs were not placed here by us. Who has placed them? This Indian laurel branch was not bent before, why is it now bending?”

Thereupon, the Buddha related all that had happened beginning with his picking up the rags. Uruvelā Kassapa thought thus: “Even Sakka, the ruler of Devas, has to come and do all the sundry tasks for this monk. This monk is indeed very mighty and powerful. But, even though he is so mighty and powerful, he is not yet an Arahāt like me, whose pollutants have been destroyed.”

At that time, although the Buddha was aware of what was in the mind of Uruvelā Kassapa, he restrained himself and remained patient, waiting for the maturing of the ascetic’s sense faculties, and he stayed on in the wood, accepting and taking the food offered by Uruvelā Kassapa.

The Seventh Miracle

When the morrow came, Uruvelā Kassapa approached the Buddha and invited him, saying: “It is meal time, O, great monk! The meal is ready. Please come and have it!” Then the Buddha sent him away by saying: “You go ahead, O, Kassapa I will follow.” The Buddha went thereafter to the rose-apple (Jambu) tree at the tip of Jambudīpa and, bringing with him a rose-apple fruit, came back ahead of Uruvelā Kassapa and sat down in Uruvelā Kassapa’s fire-house.

Uruvelā Kassapa, on seeing the Buddha, who had come after him but who had arrived at the fire-house before him sitting there, he asked the Buddha thus: “Monk! Even though I have come ahead of you and you have come after me, you have arrived at the fire-house before me and are sitting here. By what route did you come, monk?” the Buddha replied: “Kassapa, after I told you to go ahead, I went to the rose-apple tree at the tip of Jambudīpa and, bringing with me a rose-apple fruit, I came back ahead of you and sat down in the fire-house. This rose-apple fruit O, Kassapa has good colour, smell and taste. Eat it, if you so desire.” Uruvelā Kassapa then replied: “Great monk! Enough! You are the one who deserves the fruit. You should eat it.”

Again, Uruvelā Kassapa thought thus: “After telling me to go ahead, this monk went to the rose-apple tree at the tip of Jambudīpa and, bringing with him a rose-apple fruit, came back ahead of me and sat down in the fire-house. This monk is indeed very mighty and powerful. But, even though he is so mighty and powerful, he is not yet an Arahat like me, whose pollutants have been destroyed.”

At that time, although the Buddha was aware of what was in the mind of Uruvelā Kassapa, he restrained himself and remained patient as before, waiting for the maturing of the ascetic’s sense faculties, and he stayed on in the wood accepting and taking the food offered by Uruvelā Kassapa.

The Eighth, Ninth, Tenth and Eleventh Miracles

The following morning, when Uruvelā Kassapa went into the presence of the Buddha and invited him saying: “It is meal time, O, great monk! The meal is ready. Please come and have it!” the Buddha sent him away saying: “Kassapa! Go ahead. I will follow,” and then:

1. Going to the mango tree which was near the rose-apple tree, at the tip of Jambudīpa and bringing with him a mango fruit the Buddha came back ahead of Uruvelā Kassapa and sat down in Uruvelā Kassapa’s fire-house ...
2. Going to the emblic myrobalan<sup>172</sup> tree which was near the rose-apple tree, at the tip of Jambudīpa and bringing with him an emblic myrobalan fruit the Buddha came back ahead of Uruvelā Kassapa and sat down in Uruvelā Kassapa’s fire-house ...

3. Going to the yellow myrobalan<sup>173</sup> tree which was near the rose-apple tree, at the tip of Jambudīpa and bringing with him a yellow myrobalan fruit the Buddha came back ahead of Uruvelā Kassapa and sat down in Uruvelā Kassapa's fire-house ...

4. Going to the Tāvatiṃsa Deva realm and bringing with him a coral flower, the Buddha came back ahead of Uruvelā Kassapa and sat down in Uruvelā Kassapa's fire-house.

On seeing the Buddha, who had followed him but who had arrived at the fire-house ahead of him and was sitting there, Uruvelā Kassapa asked the Buddha thus: “Even though I came ahead of you, monk, you who came after me arrived at the fire-house ahead of me and are sitting here. By what route have you come, monk?”

The Buddha replied: “After I told you to go ahead, O, Kassapa, I went to the mango tree ... the emblic myrobalan tree ... the yellow myrobalan tree ... Tāvatiṃsa and, bringing with me a coral flower, came back ahead of you and sat down in the fire-house. This coral flower, O, Kassapa has good colour and scent. Take it if you so desire,” and Uruvelā Kassapa replied: “Enough! O, great monk! You are the one who deserves the coral flower. You should take it.”

Again, Uruvelā Kassapa thought thus: “After telling me to go ahead, this monk went to the Tāvatiṃsa Deva realm and, bringing with him the coral flower, came back ahead of me and sat down in the fire-house. This monk is indeed very mighty and powerful. But, even though he is so mighty and powerful, he is not yet an Arahat like me, whose pollutants have been destroyed.”

The Twelfth Miracle

On one occasion, the 500 recluses, being desirous of performing fire-worship, made efforts to split firewood into pieces but were unable to do so. Thereupon they thought: “Our inability to split firewood must certainly be due to the supernormal power of the monk.”

When Uruvelā Kassapa reported the matter to the Buddha, the Buddha asked: “Do you want O, Kassapa to have the logs split?” and Uruvelā Kassapa replied: “We want, O, great monk, to have them split.” By means of the supernormal power of the Buddha, the 500 logs of firewood were at once split into pieces making cracking sounds simultaneously.

Again Uruvelā Kassapa thought thus: “This monk is capable of splitting at once the logs which my disciples could not do. This monk is indeed mighty and powerful. But, even though he is so mighty and powerful, he is not yet an Arahat like me, whose pollutants have been destroyed.”

The Thirteenth Miracle

On another occasion, the 500 recluses were unable to make fire burn for the performance of fire-worship despite their attempts. Thereupon, they thought: “Our inability to make fire burn must certainly be due to the supernormal power of the monk.”

When Uruvelā Kassapa reported the matter to the Buddha, he asked: “Do you want, Kassapa, to have the fires blazing?” and Uruvelā Kassapa replied: “We want, great monk, to have the fires blazing!” By means of the supernormal power of the Buddha, 500 big bonfires marvellously blazed forth all at once.

Again Uruvelā Kassapa thought thus: “This monk makes the 500 bonfires to blaze forth simultaneously, which my disciples could not do. This monk is indeed mighty and powerful. But, even though he is so mighty and powerful, he is not yet an Arahat like me, whose pollutants have been destroyed.” [413]

The Fourteenth Miracle

Again on another occasion, the 500 recluses were unable to put out the blazing fires after the performance of the fire-worship. Thereupon they thought: “Our inability to put out the blazing fires must certainly be due to the supernormal power of the monk.”

When Uruvelā Kassapa reported the matter to the Buddha, he asked: “Do you want, Kassapa, to have the flames extinguished?” and Uruvelā Kassapa replied: “We want, O great monk, to have them extinguished.” By means of the supernormal power of the Buddha, the 500 big bonfires marvellously became extinguished all at once.

Again Uruvelā Kassapa thought thus: “This monk can simultaneously put out the 500 big bonfires which could not be extinguished by my disciples. This monk is indeed mighty and powerful. But, even though he is so mighty and powerful, he is not yet an Arahat like me, whose pollutants have been destroyed.”

The Fifteenth Miracle

Still on another occasion, the 500 recluses went down into the river Nerañjarā during the winter nights called the eight-in-between (antaraṭṭhaka),<sup>174</sup> when there was very heavy snowfall and when it was terribly cold. Some of the recluses wrongly believing that: “By emerging from the water once, evil deeds can be cleansed,” climbed up the bank after submerging their whole bodies and emerging from water only once. Many were those who entertained such a belief. They submerged themselves just because there could be no emergence without submergence. Some of the recluses wrongly believing that: “By submerging once, evil deeds can be cleansed,” plunged but once with their heads under water and came up on the bank as soon as they rose from the water, but only a few entertained such belief.

Some of the recluses wrongly believing that: “If a bath is taken by repeatedly immersing and emerging evil deeds can be cleansed,” bathed in the river, constantly immersing and emerging from it. There were many of them who held such a belief.

Thereupon, the Buddha created 500 braziers. The recluses warmed themselves at the 500 braziers when they came out of the water. Thereupon, the 500 recluses thought: “The creation of these 500 braziers must certainly be due to the supernatural power of the monk.”

And Uruvelā Kassapa thought thus: “This great monk can indeed create these braziers which number 500. This monk is indeed mighty and powerful. But even though he is so mighty and powerful, he is not yet an Arahāt like me, whose pollutants have been destroyed.”

The Sixteenth Miracle

One day, there was a great downpour of unseasonal rain in Uruvelā forest, where the Buddha was residing; a torrential stream of water flowed incessantly. The place where the Buddha was staying was low-lying and therefore liable to be inundated. Thereupon, it occurred to the Buddha thus: “It would be good if I ward off the flow of water all around and walk to and fro on the bare ground encircled by water and thickly covered with dust.” Accordingly, he warded off the flow of water all around and walked to and fro on the bare ground encircled by water and thickly covered with dust.

<sup>174</sup> Antaraṭṭhaka: here it means the eight days which fall between the end of one month and the beginning of the following month. At the end of this fifteenth miracle the author had a long discussion, on which of two months should be considered in this context, quoting numerous authorities including Sanskrit texts, Pāli commentaries and sub-commentaries. We have left out this portion from our translation.

At that time, Uruvelā Kassapa, thinking: “Let not the monk be hit by the torrent and [414] carried away,” went rowing in a boat with many of the recluses to the place where the Buddha was staying. Much to his astonishment, he saw that the flow of water all around had been warded off and that the Buddha was walking to and fro on the bare ground encircled by the water and thickly covered with dust. Not believing what he saw, he asked: “Great monk! Is it indeed you walking to and fro on the bare ground encircled by water and thickly covered with dust?” The Buddha replied: “Yes, Kassapa, it is I.” and he rose into the sky even while the recluses were looking on and came to rest on their boat.

Again, Uruvelā Kassapa thought: “Even the torrential stream rushing down with great force cannot carry away the monk. This monk is indeed mighty and powerful. But, even though he is so mighty and powerful, he is not yet an Arahāt like me, whose pollutants have been destroyed.”

Uruvelā Kassapa and His Disciples Become Monastics

In the former days as the recluses’ faculties were still immature, the Buddha had been patiently bearing their disdain and waiting the time when their faculties would reach maturity. Nearly three months had passed since then. Now that their faculties had matured, the Buddha would address them candidly and instruct them in a way leading to their liberation.

Although the Buddha had thus shown the miracle of not being overwhelmed by the flood, the great recluse thought wrongly as before that only he himself was an Arahāt without pollutants and that the Buddha was not yet an Arahāt whose pollutants were completely destroyed.

While he was so thinking, it occurred to the Buddha thus: “Should I continue to keep on disregarding him, this vain man, Uruvelā Kassapa, who is too remote from the paths and fruitions, will continue thinking wrongly for a long time: ‘This monk is indeed mighty and powerful! But, even though he is so mighty and powerful, he is not yet an Arahāt like me, whose pollutants have been destroyed.’ What if I should instill in him a sense of spiritual urgency?”

Having thought thus, the Buddha candidly spoke to Uruvelā Kassapa these three sets of words: “Kassapa, 1) you are not an Arahāt with the pollutants destroyed; 2) you are not one who has attained the Arahāt path; 3) not to speak of such an attainment, you have not even the least practice of the right path for the attainment of the Arahāt paths and fruitions.”

Thereupon, Uruvelā Kassapa, feeling a strong sense of spiritual urgency, prostrated himself with his head on the feet of the Buddha and made the request: “Exalted Buddha, may I receive the going forth to the order and ordination as a monastic in your presence.”

The Fortunate One, knowing the maturity of their faculties, said to him: “Kassapa, you are the leader, chief, and principal of 500 recluses, it would not be proper if you do not inform them. You should first seek their permission, then these 500 disciples of yours may do whatever they think fit.”

So Uruvelā Kassapa went to his 500 disciples and told them: “I want to lead the holy life, O recluses, under the great monk. You may do whatever you think fit.” – “Great teacher, we have long had faith in the great monk, since the taming of the Nāga,” replied the recluses. “If you lead the holy life under him, all of us 500 disciples will do likewise.”

Then Uruvelā Kassapa and the 500 recluses took their hair, their matted locks, their requisites, and the paraphernalia of the fire sacrifice such as shoulder yokes and fire-stirrers and set them adrift in the current of the river Nerañjarā. Then they went to the Buddha and prostrated themselves with their heads at the feet of the Buddha, and made the request: “Exalted Buddha, may we receive the going forth and higher ordination as monastics in your presence.” [415]

Thereupon, the Fortunate One said: Etha bhikkhave, etc. meaning: “Come, monks. Receive the going-forth and higher ordination you have asked for. The Dhamma has been well taught by me. Strive to undergo the noble trainings in its three higher aspects so as to bring about the end of the round of suffering.” Instantly, when: Etha bhikkhave ... was spoken by the Buddha, who stretched out his golden right hand, Uruvelā Kassapa and his 500 recluses turned into fully fledged monastics, like senior monks of 60 years’ standing, readily dressed up and equipped with the eight supernaturally created requisites, each in its proper place, paying homage to the Buddha with due respect. Their signs of being recluses disappeared miraculously, and they were transformed into monastics.

The very utterance by the Buddha: “Come, monks ...” meant those recluses became accomplished monastics. There was no need to be ordained with the procedure in an ordination hall.

Nadī Kassapa and his Disciples Become Monastics

When Nadī Kassapa, who lived downstream, saw the requisites of the recluses set adrift by Uruvelā Kassapa and his 500 disciples, he thought: “I hope no harm has befallen my older brother.” He sent ahead with one or two of his disciples, saying: “Go and find out about my brother,” and he went himself with the rest of his 300 disciples to where Uruvelā Kassapa was dwelling. Approaching his eldest brother, he asked: “Brother Kassapa, is this state of a monastic noble and praiseworthy?”

Upon being replied to by Uruvelā Kassapa: “Indeed, brother, this state of a monastic is noble and praiseworthy,” Nadī Kassapa and his 300 disciples, as previously Uruvelā Kassapa and his followers had done, took their recluses’ requisites and paraphernalia of fire sacrifice, and set them adrift in the current of the river Nerañjarā. Then they went to the Buddha and prostrated themselves with their heads at the feet of the Buddha, and made the request: “Exalted Buddha, may we receive the going forth and the higher ordination as monastics in your presence.”

Thereupon, the Buddha said: Etha bhikkhave, etc. meaning: “Come, monks. Receive the going forth and the higher ordination you have asked for. The Dhamma has been well taught by me. Strive to undergo the noble training in its three higher aspects so as to bring about the end of the round of suffering.” Instantly, when: Etha bhikkhave ... was spoken by the Buddha, who stretched out his golden right hand, Nadī Kassapa and his 300 recluses turned into fully fledged monastics, like senior monks of 60 years’ standing, readily dressed and equipped with the eight supernaturally created requisites, each in its proper place, paying homage to the Buddha with due respect. The signs of being recluses disappeared miraculously as they were transformed into monastics.

Gayā Kassapa and his Disciples Become Monastics

When Gayā Kassapa, who lived downstream, saw the requisites of the recluses set adrift by Uruvelā Kassapa and his 500 disciples and those by Nadī Kassapa and his 300 disciples, he thought: “I hope no harm has befallen my older brothers, Uruvelā Kassapa and Nadī Kassapa.” He sent ahead two or three of his disciples, saying: “Go and find out about my two brothers, and he went himself with his 200 disciples to where Uruvelā Kassapa was dwelling. Approaching his eldest brother, he asked: “Brother Kassapa, is this state of a monastic noble and praiseworthy?”

On Uruvelā Kassapa replying: “Indeed, brother, this state of a monastic is noble and praiseworthy,” Gayā Kassapa and his 200 disciples, as previously Uruvelā Kassapa and his followers had done, took their recluse’s requisites and paraphernalia of the fire sacrifice, and set them adrift in the current of the river Nerañjarā. Then they went to the Buddha and prostrating themselves with their heads at the feet of the Buddha, made the request: “Exalted Buddha, may we receive the going forth to the order and higher ordination as monastics in your presence.” [416]

Thereupon, the Buddha said: Etha bhikkhave ... etc. meaning: “Come, monks. Receive the going forth and the higher ordination you have asked for. The Dhamma has been well taught by me. Strive to undergo the noble training in its three higher aspects, so as to bring about the end of the round of suffering.” Instantly, when: Etha bhikkhave ... was spoken by the Buddha, who stretched out his golden right hand, Gayā Kassapa and his 200 recluses turned into fully fledged monastics, like senior monks of 60 years’ standing, readily dressed and equipped with the eight supernaturally created requisites, each in its proper place, paying homage to the Buddha with due respect. The signs of being recluses disappeared miraculously as they were transformed into monastics.

In this account of the display of miracles, such as the recluses inability to split the logs, the simultaneous and marvellous splitting of logs, their inability to make the fires, the simultaneous and marvellous blazing of fire; their inability to put out fires, the simultaneous and marvellous extinction of fires; the creation of 500 braziers; all these unusual events were due to the Buddha’s resolve.

The number of miracles, performed by the Buddha in this manner in order to liberate the Kassapa brothers and their 1,000 recluses, mentioned directly in the Pāḷi Canon is sixteen and those not mentioned directly is 3,500, thus totalling 3,516.

The Fire Discourse

After staying at Uruvelā for as long as he wished, and having liberated the brothers and their 1,000 followers, the Buddha set out for Gayāsīsa, where there was a stone slab looking like an elephant’s forehead near Gayā village, together with 1,000 monastics who were formerly recluses. The Buddha took his seat on the stone slab together with the thousand monastics.

Having taken his seat, the Buddha considered: “What kind of discourse will be appropriate for these 1,000 monastics?” and decided thus: “These people worshipped fires every day and every night, if I were to teach them the Instruction about Burning (Āditta-pariyāya-sutta, SN 35.235) describing the continuous burning of the twelve sense spheres (āyatana), by the eleven fires, they could attain the Arahāt fruition.”

Having so decided, the Buddha taught the Instruction about Burning which describes in a detailed manner how the six sense doors, the six sense objects, the six forms of consciousness, the six forms of contact, the eighteen kinds of feeling, arising through contact (phassa-paccaya-vedanā), are burning with the fire of lust (rāga), hatred (dosa) and delusion (moha), the fires of birth, ageing and death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief and despair.

While the discourse was thus taught by the Buddha, the 1,000 monastics attained the knowledge of the four paths in successive order and became Arahats in whom the pollutants (āsava) were extinguished. Therefore, the minds of the 1,000 monastics were completely released from the pollutants that had become extinguished with no chance of reappearance as they had absolutely eradicated grasping through craving (taṇhā) and wrong view (diṭṭhi) of anything such as: “This I am, this is mine.” They were completely emancipated from the pollutants (āsava), attaining cessation through not arising. [417]

15: The Buddha's Visit to Rājagaha

When the Buddha had stayed at Gayāsīsa for as long as he desired, in order to liberate the 1,000 former recluses by making them attain Arahāt fruition, he set out for Rājagaha, accompanied by those Arahats. The visit to Rājagaha was to comply with the request made by King Bimbisāra, whom he met as he started his going forth, saying: “Venerable Sir, may I make this request? When you have gained Awakening, let my country be the first you bless with a visit.”<sup>175</sup> Eventually, he arrived at the large Palmyra Sapling Grove near Rājagaha. He stayed at the foot of the Suppatiṭṭha Banyan tree which offered an expansive shade and which was regarded as a shrine by people who made their worship there.

After his Awakening, the Buddha spent his first Rains Retreat (Vassa) at the Deer Park at Isipatana; at the end of the Rains Retreat, after conducting the Invitation ceremony, in which monastics invite criticism from their brethren in respect of what has been seen, heard or suspected about their conduct, he went to Uruvelā forest. While he stayed there for fully three months, he instructed and taught the brothers and their 1,000 followers till they attained the Arahāt fruition. Then on the full moon of January (Phussa), the Fortunate One, accompanied by the 1,000 Arahats, went to Rājagaha where he stayed for full two months.<sup>176</sup>

At that time, King Bimbisāra heard from the royal gardener the good news of the arrival of the Buddha at Rājagaha: “Friends, the Buddha Gotama, the prince of the uninterrupted Sakyan descendants, who went forth into homelessness from his Sakyan clan, has come to Rājagaha and is living at the foot of the Suppatiṭṭha banyan tree, in the Palmyra Sapling Grove.

The fame and good name of the Buddha Gotama has spread and arisen as far as the Highest Realm (Bhavagga): the Fortunate One is endowed with nine attributes beginning with that of being an Arahāt and ending with that of possessing the six great glories (Gracious One); he makes known to the world of sentient beings with its Devas and Brahmas, the Dhamma which he has himself realised through his super knowledges (abhiññā).

15: The Buddha's Visit to Rājagaha – 539

The Buddha Gotama teaches the Dhamma which is good in the beginning, good in the middle and good in the end, complete with the spirit and the letter. He explains to Devas and humans the noble practice of morality, concentration and wisdom (sīla-samādhi-paññā) which is perfect and pure, being free from the defilement of wrong deeds. It is extremely good and beneficial to go and see such an accomplished one who is worthy of veneration.”

Then accompanied by 120,000 Magadhan Brahmin householders, King Bimbisāra went to the Fortunate One, and after paying homage to him, sat at a place which is free from the six faults of location, viz., not too far, not too near, not at the front, not at the back, not at a high site and not on the leeward side. Of the 120,000 householders who had accompanied the king:

1. Some paid homage to the Fortunate One and sat at a site free from the six faults.
2. Some exchanged greetings with him, entered into courteous and memorable talk with him and sat down at a site free from the six faults. [418]

These two categories of Brahmins belonged to the group which held right view.

3. Some raised their palms together inclining them towards the Fortunate One and sat down at a faultless site.

They were sitting on the fence, not committing themselves to the side holding wrong views, nor with those holding right views. Their thinking was: Should those holding wrong view blame us for paying homage to the monk Gotama, we would say: “How could mere raising of hands with palms together amount to paying homage?” and should those holding right view find fault with us saying: “Why did you not pay homage to the Fortunate One?” we would reply: “How is that? Is worshipping made only when the head touches the ground? As a matter of fact raising of the palms joined together also constitutes formal worship.” With this thought of sitting on the fence, they took their respective seats.

4. Some pronounced their names in the Fortunate One's presence: “Friend Gotama, I am Datta, son of so and so; I am Mitta, son of so and so,” and took their seats at a faultless place. Some pronounced their clan in the Fortunate One's presence: “Friend Gotama, I am of the Vāseṭṭha clan; I am of the Kaccāyana clan,” etc. and sat down at a place which was free from the six faults.

15: The Buddha's Visit to Rājagaha – 540

These Brahmins were poor and undistinguished people. By announcing their names and clan amidst the assembly, they had hoped that they would become known and recognised.

5. Some wealthy Brahmins just sat down without a word. These Brahmins were the crafty and the fools. Their crafty thought: “A word or two with them will lead to friendliness, when one becomes friendly one will have to feed them once or twice.” Fear of friendliness with them and of having to feed them caused their silent, quiet sitting. Just because they were ignorant and foolish, they sat down where they were like big lumps of earth dumped on the ground.

The Brahmins' Doubt

When thus seated, these 120,000 wealthy Brahmins felt uncertain and wondered: “Does the great monk lead the noble life under the great teacher Uruvelā Kassapa as a disciple; or does Uruvelā Kassapa lead the noble life under the great monk?” Knowing what was in the mind of these Brahmins, the Buddha questioned Ven. Uruvelā Kassapa in verse:

Kim-eva disvā Uruvela-vāsī, pahāsi aggim̐ kisako vadāno, pucchāmi taṃ Kassapa, etam-atthaṃ, kathaṃ pahīnaṃ tava aggi-huttaṃ?

O dear son, Kassapa, a resident of Uruvelā forest, being a great teacher yourself, instructing the lean recluses,<sup>177</sup> seeing what fault did you give up fire-worship? I ask you, Kassapa, what made you abandon fire-worship?

Ven. Uruvelā Kassapa replied to the Buddha in verse also:

*Rūpe ca sadde ca atho rase ca, kāmitthiyo cābhivadanti yaññā.
“Etaṃ malan”-ti upadhīsu ñatvā, tasmā na yiṭṭhe na hute araṇjīm̐.*

Exalted Buddha, it is said by the teachers of the sacrifice that through sacrifice one can enjoy the five sense-pleasures: sight, sound, smell, taste and touch, as well as womenfolk, especially the kind of women who resemble the tiger preying and devouring by means of its sensuality-like claws. Seeing and knowing well that the sense-pleasures and women serve only as defilements of the five aggregates, I no longer enjoy offering sacrifices. I no longer take delight in the daily practice of fire-worship.

---

The Buddha then asked him again in verse: [419]

*Ettheva te mano na ramittha, rūpesu saddesu atho rasesu,
atha ko carahi Deva-manussa-loke, rato mano Kassapa, brūhi metam.*

Dear son Kassapa, if your heart finds no delight in the five sense pleasures of sight, sound, smell, taste and touch and in women, what sense object in this world of Devas and humans delights you? Answer me that, Kassapa.

Ven. Uruvelā Kassapa replied in verse:

Disvā padam santam-anūpadhikam, akiñcanam kāma-bhave asattam, anaññathā-bhāvim-anañña-neyyam, tasmā na yiṭṭhe na hute arañjīm.

Exalted Buddha, because I have distinctly perceived Nibbāna which has the characteristic of peace, which is free from the four attachments (upadhi),<sup>178</sup> which cannot be made known by others and which can be achieved only through the path (magga) developed by oneself, which is not subject to change, being free from birth, old age, and death, and which is forever free from lust of life and attachment to existence. I no longer enjoy offering sacrifices. I no longer take delight in the daily practice of fire-worship.

Having given this reply, in order to make it known that he himself was a disciple of the Buddha, Ven. Uruvelā Kassapa rose from his seat, arranged his robe on the shoulder, prostrated himself with his head at the feet of the Buddha, saying: “Exalted Buddha, you, the exalted Buddha, are my teacher. I am but a disciple of yours.” Then he rose into the sky, first up to the height of a palm tree.

Descending from it, he made obeisance to the Buddha. Then he rose up to a height of two palm trees in his second display, and subsequently, to a height of three palm trees in his third attempt, and so on. In this way, he rose up, in his seventh display, to a height of seven palm trees. Then, descending from there, he made obeisance to the Buddha and sat at a place free from the six faults.

Having observed these miracles, many of the wealthy Brahmins acclaimed, speaking in praise of the qualities of the Buddha: “Oh, how mighty and powerful the Buddha is. Even the recluse teacher, Uruvelā Kassapa, whose wrong view was so strong and firm and who believed himself to be an Arahāt, has been tamed by the Buddha, by destroying the net of his wrong views.”

Hearing the words of praise being spoken by the Brahmins, the Buddha addressed them: “Brahmins, taming this Uruvelā Kassapa when I have achieved omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) is really not so wonderful. In a former existence as a Bodhisatta, not yet free from passion (rāga), when I was a Brahma named Nārada, I destroyed the net of wrong views of King Aṅgati, who later became Uruvelā Kassapa in the present time.” At the request of the Brahmins, the Buddha recounted to them the story of Mahā Nārada Kassapa (Ja 544).

Through the personal acknowledgement of Ven. Uruvelā Kassapa, the 120,000 Brahmins became convinced that: “It is the great teacher, Uruvelā Kassapa, who, having become a disciple, lives the holy life under the great monk Gotama!” When the Buddha became aware, through his knowledge of others' minds (ceto-pariyāya-abhiññā), that their minds had now become free from doubt, he taught the audience of 120,000 monks and Brahmins, headed by King Bimbisāra, the course of moral practice leading to the realization the paths and fruitions: 1) The discourse on generosity (dāna-kathā); 2) the discourse on morality (sīla-kathā); 3) the discourse on a happy destination (sagga-kathā); and the discourse on the good path and the line of conduct for the [420] realization of the paths, fruitions and Nibbāna, as well as the dangers of sensuality (kāmānaṃ ādīnava-kathā) together with the advantages of renunciation (nekkhamma-ānisaṃsa-kathā) in a progressive manner. Thereafter, when the Buddha knew that the minds of King Bimbisāra and the 120,000 Brahmins had become firm and imperturbable, soft and malleable, free from hindrances, eager, gladdened, purified and pellucid, he taught the Dhamma which was originally discovered by him (sāmuḍakkāṃsīkā Dhamma-desanā), the four truths. The 110,000 Brahmins, headed by King Bimbisāra, became established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala); the remaining 10,000 Brahmins became lay devotees and were established in the threefold refuge.

King Bimbisāra's Five Aspirations

Bimbisāra, King of Magadha, who had now become a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna), addressed the Buddha: “Lord, formerly when I was a young prince, I had five aspirations. Now they are fulfilled.

Lord, when I was a young prince, I wished: ‘If only the people of Magadha anointed me as king.’ Exalted Buddha, this was my first aspiration and it has now been fulfilled.

Lord, when I was a young prince, I wished: ‘If only the Arahāt Buddha would come to this kingdom when I became king.’ Exalted Buddha, this was my second aspiration and it has now been fulfilled also.

Lord, when I was a young prince, I wished: ‘If only I could pay homage and do honour to that Buddha, when he visited my kingdom.’ Exalted Buddha, this was my third aspiration and it has now been fulfilled also.

Lord, when I was a young prince, I wished: ‘If only the Buddha, who visited my kingdom, taught me the Dhamma which would lead to Nibbāna.’ Exalted Buddha, this was my fourth aspiration and it has now been fulfilled also.

Lord, when I was a young prince, I wished: ‘If only I might thoroughly understand the Dhamma taught by the Buddha.’ Exalted Buddha, this was my fifth aspiration and that too has now been fulfilled also.

Exalted Buddha! It is indeed very wonderful! Exalted Buddha! It is indeed very wonderful! To cite worldly examples, just as one turns up what lies upside down, just as one holds up a lamp in the darkness for those with eyes to see various visible objects, even so has the Buddha revealed the Dhamma to me in many ways. Exalted Buddha! I take refuge in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha. Exalted Buddha! May you take me as a lay disciple established in the threefold refuge from now on till the end of my life. Exalted Buddha! In order that I may gain merit, may you kindly accept my invitation to a meal, together with the community of monks.” On thus being invited, the Buddha remained silent, signifying his acceptance of King Bimbisāra's invitation to the morning meal. Thereupon, knowing quite well that the Buddha had accepted his invitation, King Bimbisāra rose from his seat and returned to his golden palace after paying respects to him with due respect and circumambulating him.

15: The Buddha's Visit to Rājagaha – 544

It is to be noted here that King Bimbisāra took the threefold refuge only after becoming established in the Stream-entry (Sotāpatti) path and fruit. Although taking refuge in the Three Treasures was accomplished on realizing Stream-entry, at that time he was only making up his mind that the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha are truly the refuge, shelter and support. Now he took the refuges by actually uttering the words accordingly by devoting himself to the refuges (atta-sanniyyātana-saraṇa-gamana).

There are various kinds of refuges: 1) The refuge taken by worldlings (puṭhujjana) by contemplating the attributes of the Buddha, Dhamma and Saṅgha, the Three Treasures (lokiya-saraṇa-gamana). It is insecure, impermanent and perishable; 2) the refuge in which the noble ones (ariya) are established simultaneously with their realisation of the path with Nibbāna as their object (lokuttara-saraṇa-gamana); 3) taking two refuges, like that taken by Tapussa and Bhallika uttering Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi, Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi, at the time when there was not yet the community of monastics (dve-vācika saraṇa-gamana); 4) taking three refuges, like that taken by Yasa's father, mother, ex-wife, and others uttering: Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi, Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi, Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi after the formation of the order (te-vācika saraṇa-gamana).

There are four formulae for taking refuge. 1) Devoting oneself to the refuges (atta-sanniyyātana-saraṇa-gamana): in order to escape from the round of Saṃsāra, I entrust myself to the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha and take refuge in them, starting from today (ajjādiṃ katvā ahaṃ attānaṃ Buddhassa niyyātemi); 2) relying on that as refuge (tapparayāṇa-saraṇa-gamana): starting from today, I have only the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha to rely on, to depend on (ajjādiṃ katvā ahaṃ, Buddhassa parayāṇo ... Dhammassa parayāṇo ... Saṅghassa parayāṇo); 3) the disciple for life refuge (sissa-bhāvūpagamana-saraṇa-gamana): starting from today, I am a disciple of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha (ajjādiṃ katvā ahaṃ Buddhassa antevāsiko ... Dhammassa antevāsiko ... Saṅghassa antevāsiko); 4) The prostration refuge (paṇipāta-saraṇa-gamana): starting from today, kindly regard me as one who pays homage, who stands up in welcoming, who reveres the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha (ajjādiṃ katvā ahaṃ, Buddhassa abhivadānaṃ paccuppaṭṭhānaṃ añjalī kammaṃ, samici-kammaṃ karomi ... Dhammassa ... Saṅghassa ... karomi). [421] gamana). It was because he wanted to declare to others his establishment in the fixed refuge by word of mouth and also because he wanted to take upon himself the prostration refuge (paṇipāta-saraṇa-gamana) that he addressed the Buddha by actually uttering the words of refuge.

Through realisation of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga) King Bimbisāra became one who was established in the fixed refuge (niyata-saraṇa-

The Buddha Enters Rājagaha for the Meal

After the night had passed and the new day dawned, having sumptuous meals of hard and soft food prepared ready in his palace, King Bimbisāra sent messengers to inform the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, it is time for the meal. The alms food is ready.”

As the time drew near for the Buddha to enter Rājagaha for alms food, the citizens of Rājagaha, those who had seen and those who had not seen the Buddha, numbering 180 million, left the city very early in the morning. Wishing to see the Buddha they made their way, in groups, to the grove of young palms. The road leading to it, which was three miles in length, was choked with people. The whole of the palm grove also was so densely crowded with people that there was hardly any space among them. People did not feel satisfied with watching and admiring the personality of the Buddha rendered so graceful by the 32 major marks, 80 minor characteristics and six-coloured radiance emanating from his body.

The entire Palm Grove and the whole length of the road were so jammed with people that even a single monastic would find it impossible to find a way out of the Palm Grove and it appeared as if the Buddha would miss his meal for the day. As if to intimate that this should not happen, the orange-coloured ornamented stone (paṇḍu-kambala) which served as Sakka's throne, became warm. Pondering upon the cause of this manifestation, Sakka came to realise the difficult situation in the Palm Grove. Assuming the guise of a youth, Sakka instantly appeared in the presence of the Buddha, singing the praises of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha. Through his supernormal powers, he carved a way for the monastics headed by the Buddha and acted as usher for them, announcing the entry of the Buddha into the city in the following verses:

Danto dantehi saha purāṇa-jaṭilehi, vip̐pamutto vip̐pamuttehi, siṅgī-nikkhasa-vaṅṅo, Rājagahaṃ pāvīsi Bhagavā.

Countrymen, the exalted Buddha, possessing the yellow colour of the best refined gold, at the request of the King of Magadha, with his two feet moving like the sun and the moon has entered the city of Rājagaha together with 1,000 Arahats, former recluses whom the Buddha himself has tamed by giving the deathless elixir: whom the Buddha, the leading bull – himself released from the three states of existences and the three cycles of sufferings – has released from these states of existences and cycles of suffering by teaching the essence of Dhamma.

The three cycles of suffering (tivaṭṭa): 1) The cycle (round) of defilements comprising ignorance (avijjā), craving (taṇhā) and clinging (upadāna) (kilesa-vaṭṭa); 2) the productive deeds or rebirth producing volitions (saṅkhāra) and mental phenomena associated therewith (kamma-vaṭṭa); 3) the resultant rebirth-process comprising consciousness (viññāṇa), mind and matter (nāma-rūpa), the sense spheres (āyatana), contact (phassa) and feeling (vedanā) (vipāka-vaṭṭa).

The three states of existence (tibhava): 1) The sense world (kāma-bhava); 2) the form worlds (rūpa-bhava); and 3) the formless worlds (arūpa-bhava).

The three rounds of suffering (tivaṭṭa) are: 1) The rounds of defilements comprising ignorance, craving and clinging (kilesa-vaṭṭa); 2) comprising rebirth producing volitions and mental phenomena associated therewith (kamma-vaṭṭa); and 3) the resultant rebirth-process comprising consciousness, mind and matter, the sense spheres, contact and feeling (vipāka-vaṭṭa).

Countrymen, the exalted Buddha, possessing the yellow colour of the best refined gold, at the request of the King of Magadha, with his two feet moving like the sun and the moon, has entered the city of Rājagaha together with the 1,000 Arahats, former recluses whom the Buddha himself emancipated from Māra's snare in the cycle of 1,500 defilements, has emancipated them from that snare of Māra by showing them the way-out; whom the Buddha, the leading bull – himself released from the three states of existences and the three cycles of suffering – has released from those states of existences and cycles of suffering by teaching the essence of Dhamma.

Countrymen, the exalted Buddha, who is endowed with the ten deportments of the noble ones, the tenfold physical strength, and the tenfold cognitive strength, who perfectly comprehends the ten ways of accomplishing deeds (kamma-patha), who is possessed of the ten characteristics of Arahats, at the request of the Magadha King, with his two feet moving like the sun and the moon, has entered the city of Rājagaha, being accompanied by the 1,000 Arahats, former recluses.

15: The Buddha's Visit to Rājagaha – 548

Singing these verses of praise melodiously, Sakka walked ahead of the monastics, led by the Buddha, announcing their approach to the crowd. The citizens of Rājagaha, on seeing Sakka in the guise of a youth, discussed among themselves: “Friends, this youthful person is extremely handsome; this youthful person is so good looking; this youthful person inspires deference,” and they wondered: “Whose personal attendant he happens to be?”

Overhearing their remarks about him, Sakka replied to them:

*Yo dhīro sabbadhi danto, suddho appaṭipuggalo;
Arahaṃ Sugato loke, tassāhaṃ paricārako.*

Countrymen, under the disguise of a youth, I am simply a servant and supporter to him, who is richly endowed with marvellous virtue; he is the one who in this world is a great wise personality having omniscience, who concerning the six sense-faculties and the six sense spheres has tamed himself so that he may be free of the blemishes of wrongdoings; who is pure and untainted by the dust of the 1,500 defilements; who is peerless throughout the entire three existences of the universe; who is worthy of unique homage and offering from humans, Devas and Brahmas; who speaks only two kinds of words whether people like them or not; words which are beneficial and lead one to the paths and fruitions, and words which are truthful and subject to no change at all.

King Bimbisāra's Dedication of the Veḷuvana

The Buddha, accompanied by 1,000 monastics, entered the city of Rājagaha along the route cleared by Sakka, the Lord of the Devas. King Bimbisāra conducted the monastics, headed by the Buddha, to his palace, and served them hard and soft food of excellent quality with his own hands. After which, he sat down in an appropriate place, free from the six faults, and then this thought occurred to him: “At which place would the Buddha take up his residence? It should have the following five characteristics: 1) Being not too far from the city; 2) being not too near the city; 3) having roads for going to and coming from; 4) having easy access to it for everybody at any required time; 5) being devoid of the noise of the city, village and people clamouring for the five sense [424] objects.”

The King's Veḷuvana monastery was complete with these five characteristics. Having considered that it would be excellent to donate it to the community of monastics headed by the Buddha, the King addressed the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, I cannot keep away from the Three Treasures, as I wish to come into the presence of the Buddha on all occasions, appropriate or not. The Palm Grove where you at present residing is too far from the city, our Veḷuvana is neither too far, nor too near the city. There are also great roads leading to and coming from it. It is an accommodation worthy of the blessed Buddha. May you therefore kindly accept my offering of this Veḷuvana.”

Having thus addressed the Buddha, and wishing to make a gift of the Veḷuvana, King Bimbisāra poured flower-scented clear water onto the hand of the Buddha from a golden pitcher while saying these words of presentation: “Exalted Buddha, I offer this Veḷuvana to the community of monastics headed by the Buddha” (etāhaṃ, bhante, Veḷuvanaṃ uyyānaṃ Buddhappamukhassa Bhikkhusaṅghassa dammī). When the Buddha accepted the Veḷuvana, the great earth quaked, swaying from side to side, and rocking to and fro, like a damsel who, being carried away by joyous emotions, breaks out into dancing.

According to the commentary to the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddhavamsa) and others, in the whole of Jambudīpa there was no Park the acceptance of which by the Buddha occasioned a tremor of the earth except for the acceptance of the Veḷuvana.

The Ten Verses of Appreciation

Having accepted the gift of the Veḷuvana, the Buddha delivered a discourse to King Bimbisāra, King of Magadha, in appreciation of the gift of a dwelling as follows:

Āvāsa-dānassa panānisaṃsaṃ, ko nāma vattuṃ, puriso samattho, aññatra Buddhā pana loka-nāthā, yutto mukhānaṃ nahutena cāpi.

Great King! Apart from the omniscient Buddha, lord of the world, what man, even if he is strangely equipped with 10,000 mouths, could fully reveal and explain completely the advantages that would accrue from giving a dwelling-place in generosity?<sup>179</sup>

---

15: The Buddha's Visit to Rājagaha – 550

*Āyuñ-ca vaṇṇañ-ca sukhañ balañ-ca, varam pasattham paṭibhānam-eva,
dadāti nāmāti pavuccate so,
yo deti Saṅghassa naro vihāram.*

Great King! A person, who builds and generously offers a monastery to the community of monastics as a dwelling place for them, may be said to have bestowed on them in joyous faith, the boon of longevity, beauty, happiness, strength and admirable higher intelligence.

Dātā nivāsassa nivāraṇassa, sītādino jīvitupaddavassa, pāleti āyumuṃ pana tassa yasmā, āyuppado hoti tam-āhu santo.

Great King! A person, who builds and generously offers a monastery as a dwelling place which wards off dangers, such as heat and cold, etc., that may cause harm to life, may be said to have given protection to the life of the [425] community of monastics residing there. All good, virtuous people, headed by the Buddha, speak in praise of such a monastery supporter as one who makes a gift of life.

*Accuṇha-sīte vasato nivāse, balañ-ca vaṇṇo paṭibhāna hoti,
tasmā hi so deti vihāra-dātā, balañ-ca vaṇṇam paṭibhānam-eva.*

Great King! A monastic, living in a place of extreme cold or extreme heat such as an open space, etc., is oppressed by the severity of the climate due to a lack of supporting conditions (upanissaya-paccaya), his strength, beauty, high intelligence cannot steadfastly exist. Such existence is possible only in a secure dwelling place. That supporter of monastic buildings may be said to be one who makes a gift, in joyous faith, of strength, beauty and intelligence.

Dukkhassa sītuṇha-sarīsapā ca, vātātapādippabhavassa loke, nivāraṇā nekavidhassa niccam, sukhappado hoti vihāra-dātā.

Great King! A person, who donates a dwelling place, may be said to be a giver of happiness and well-being, because the dwelling place wards off all the suffering in the world which are caused by the hostile elements of heat, cold, reptiles, scorpions, fleas and various kinds of troubles due to wild winds and extreme intensity of heat.

*Sītuṅha-vātā-tapa-ḍaṃsa-vuṭṭhi, sarīsapāvāḷa-migādi-dukkhaṃ,
yasmā nivāreti vihāra-dātā, tasmā sukhaṃ vindati so parattha.*

Great King! A person, who donates a dwelling place, wards off, through his dwelling place, the suffering caused by cold, heat, wind, sun, gnats, mosquitoes, unseasonal rain, poisonous snakes, scorpions, fleas, wild beasts, etc. Therefore, that residence supporter can, without any vestige of doubt, acquire happiness of both mind and body in his future existence.

Pasanna-citto bhava-bhoga-hetuṃ, manobhirāmaṃ mudito vihāraṃ, yo deti sīlādi-guṇoditānaṃ, sabbaṃ dado nāma pavuccate so.

Great King! A person, having pious devotion caused by faith and with joy in his heart, builds and gives away, in generosity, a pleasant, delightful dwelling-place, which would cause the attainment of a happy existence and prosperity, to be used as a monastery by noble monastics who are possessed of the five virtuous qualities, such as morality (sīla), and so on. All the former Buddhas had successively spoken in praise of such a supporter as one who makes a gift of these four things: strength, beauty, happiness and intelligence. As it said: So ca sabba-dado hoti, yo dadāti upassayaṃ, “one who gives all of these is one who gives a residence.” (SN 1.42)

Pahāya macchera-malaṃ salobhaṃ, guṇālayānaṃ nilayaṃ dadāti, khitto va so tattha parehi sagge, [426] yathābhatāṃ jāyati vīta-soko.

Great King! A person, having abandoned the defilements of stinginess together with greed which is craving and attachment, builds and gives away, in generosity, a monastery as a residence to noble monastics who are possessed of virtuous qualities, such as morality (sīla), etc. Just as labourers who transport and deliver goods to the desired destination, so the carrier of the volitions, convey that faithful supporter to a happy destination; consequently he is reborn in the realms of Devas where pleasant objects having five sensual pleasures abound and where no trouble arises for one's food or shelter.

15: The Buddha's Visit to Rājagaha – 552

Vare cāru-rūpe vihāre uḷāre, naro kāraye vāsaye tattha bhikkhū, dadeyyanna-pānañ-ca vatthañ-ca nesam, pasannena cittena sakkacca niccam.

Great King! A wise man, therefore, who cares for his own interest, should have a splendid monastery built which is praiseworthy, delightful and commodious. He should then request monastics who possess much knowledge and experience to take up residence in his monastery. He should always have devotional faith, regarding the resident monastics and deference and make joyous offerings to them of various kinds of food, drinks and robes.

*Tasmā Mahā-rāja bhavesu bhoge, manorame paccanubhuyya bhiyyo, vihāra-dānassa phalena santam,
sukham asokam adhigaccha pacchā.*

Great King! As a result of this donation of the monastery in pious faith, you will, therefore, repeatedly enjoy in various happy existences more and more delightful wealth. After which, you will, through realisation of the four paths and fruitions, attain the bliss and peace of Nibbāna and be entirely free of sorrow.

Having thus blessed King Bimbisāra with the discourse appreciating the dedication of the monastery, the Buddha rose from his seat and, accompanied by 1,000 monastics moved to the Veḷuvana monastery to take up residence.

This narrative of King Bimbisāra's donation of the Veḷuvana to the community of monastics, headed by the Buddha, mentions his offering by way of naming what is most essential and what is most important, which, in this case, was the Park. As a matter of fact, the king's donation included dwellings with tiers and other buildings for the monastics to dwell in. The Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) commentary describes the Veḷuvana as a site adorned with pleasant spired buildings (pasāda), flat-roofed buildings (hammiya), mansions (vimāna), abodes with roofs on four sides (vihāra), those with roofs on two sides (aḍḍha-yoga), pandals (maṇḍapa) and the like.

Having given the Dhamma talk on the offer of the Veḷuvana by King Bimbisāra, the Buddha addressed the monastics thus: Anujānāmi bhikkhave ārāmaṃ, “I allow you, monastics, to accept an offer of a Park.”

The Beyond the Walls Discourse

The day after accepting the Veḷuvana, the Buddha delivered the Beyond the Walls Discourse (Khp 7, Tiro-kuṭṭa-sutta). The following is the detailed account of it from the commentary.

Counting back from this world, 92 aeons ago, King Jayasena ruled over the [427] country of Kāsi.<sup>180</sup> King Jayasena's Chief Queen, Sirimā, gave birth to a Bodhisatta named Phussa. In due course, the Bodhisatta Phussa gained Awakening and became a Buddha.

King Jayasena, saying: “My elder son has become a Buddha after renouncing the world and leading an ascetic life,” developed adoration and became obsessed with such an idea, as: “My Buddha,” “My Dhamma,” “My Saṅgha,” so much so that he made attendance upon the community of monastics, headed by the Buddha, his exclusive privilege and denied all others any opportunity to serve. He had bamboo walls set up on both sides of the road, all the way from the gate of the monastery to his golden palace; canopied ceilings fixed overhead and adorned with stars of gold; and festoons of flowers hung from them; underneath, silvery white sand was spread out and all kinds of flowers were scattered over so that the Buddha might come along this route.

Buddha Phussa re-arranged his robe at the monastery and accompanied by his community of monastics had to take this walled and covered way to the palace. After finishing the meal, they had to take the same screened-off route back to the monastery. Not a single inhabitant of the city was given an opportunity to offer alms food.

<sup>180</sup> In the Story about Sāriputta (Sāriputta-vatthu) of the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada) commentary [DhpA 1.8, PTS 1.83] and in the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) commentary [PTS 1.297], it is mentioned that the King was named Mahinda.

15: The Buddha's Visit to Rājagaha – 554

Many of the citizens expressed their reproach saying: “Although a Buddha has appeared in the world, we get no opportunity to gain merit by honouring him. As the moon and the sun make their appearance to confer light on all people; so, Buddhas emerge for the happiness, and well-being of all sentient beings. But this king has monopolized for himself the great field of merit meant for all.”

Then three princes who were Buddha Phussa's half-brothers, also thought: “Buddhas appear for the well-being of all sentient beings, not for the benefit of any individual alone. Our royal father has denied others the right to attend upon the Buddha and honour him. How could we gain an opportunity to do so?”

The citizens who had the same thought as the princes discussed the situation with them and they agreed to adopt a ruse. They decided therefore to arrange the arising of a sham insurgency in the border areas of the kingdom. Hearing that administration had broken down in the remote provinces, the king despatched his three sons to subdue the rebellion. On their return from the disturbed regions, after a successful campaign against the insurgents, their royal father, King Jayasena, was so pleased with them that he offered to reward them, saying: “Dear sons, you may ask for any reward you wish.” Thereupon, the princes replied: “Royal father, we wish no other reward. We want only royal permission to attend upon the Buddha and honour him.”

“Dear sons,” said the king, “you may ask any reward other than this.” The princes replied: “Royal father, we do not wish to get any other reward.” – “In that case you may do so for a certain portion of time.”

Thereupon, the princes requested permission for a period of seven years. The king refused to grant it, saying it was too long a time. In this way, the princes made their request reducing the duration to six years, five, four, three, two years, one year and to seven months, six, five and four months. When the king turned down all these requests, the princes finally asked for three months' permission to attend upon the Buddha. To this the king assented, saying: “All right, you may have it.”

When they received the king's approval to attend upon the Buddha and pay homage to him for three months, they joyously approached Buddha Phussa and after paying respects to him, addressed him: “Exalted Buddha, we wish to wait on and serve you for the whole three months of the Rains Retreat. May you accept our invitation to stay in our rural district for the whole three months of the Rains Retreat.” By remaining silent, the Buddha signified his acceptance.

15: The Buddha's Visit to Rājagaha – 555

When they knew that the Buddha had accepted their request, the three princes sent a [428] message to their chief minister, commanding: “Chief minister, for the whole three months of the Rains Retreat, we wish to support the 90,000 monastics headed by our elder brother Buddha Phussa, with four requisites and wait on them, making our obeisance. You must immediately make arrangements to build and finish the construction of monasteries, etc., for the Buddha and his community of monastics to reside in.”

The chief minister, having accomplished the construction of monasteries as commanded by the princes, reported the matter, saying: “The construction of the required monasteries, etc., has been completed as requested.”

Then the three princes, together with 1,000 soldiers, wearing bark-dyed clothes, conveyed the community of monastics, headed by the Buddha, to their rural district. 2,500 attendants were organised to serve the Saṅgha with the four requisites and to render service for their comfort and convenience. Then the princes presented the Buddha and his monastics with monastic buildings to take up their residence in.

The Treasurer and His Wife Endowed with Faith

The princes' wealthy treasurer and his wife had profound faith in the Three Treasures. On behalf of the princes he took out things for the monastics, headed by the Buddha, from the princely storehouses in turn and faithfully handed them to the minister. The minister took them and with 11,000 people, residents of the district, managed to turn them into choice food which they offered daily to the Buddha and his Saṅgha.

The three princes and their 1,000 soldiers, all in bark-dyed garments, stayed at the monastery, observing the precepts, listening to the sermons and fulfilling their major duties to the Saṅgha led by the Buddha.

Out of the 11,000 people doing sundry jobs at the minister's command, some of his relatives were wicked and ill-natured. So they created various disturbances to the alms giving; they personally plundered and devoured the food prepared for the Buddha and his Saṅgha and fed it to their children; they also set fire to the alms distribution pavilions.

When the rains-residence was over and the monastics had attended the Invitation (Pavāraṇā) ceremony, the three princes held a huge ceremony in honour of the Buddha. And, in fulfilment of the original agreement made with their royal father, they conveyed the Buddha in a procession headed by him to the king's country. Soon after the arrival in the capital city of Kāsi where King Jayasena resided, Buddha Phussa passed into Parinibbāna.<sup>181</sup>

The royal father, Jayasena, as well as the three princes, their chief minister, and the royal treasurer passed away one after another. They were reborn together with their respective attendants in the Deva realms. The wicked and ill-natured relatives of the chief minister were reborn in the Niraya realms of intense suffering.

At the Time of Buddha Kassapa

For the duration of 92 aeons, the first group which reached the Deva realm passed on from one Deva realm to another in the cycle of rebirths, whereas the second group was reborn in one realm of misery after another. Then in the present Fortunate Aeon (Bhadda), when Buddha Kassapa made his appearance in the world, the wicked and ill-natured relatives of the chief minister were reborn in the Peta realm. At that time, people shared their merits after performing deeds of generosity, with their old relatives who happened to be reborn in the Peta realm, saying: Idaṃ amhākaṃ ñātināṃ hotu, “let this deed of merit be for the benefit of our relatives.” Thereby the Petas who were their former relatives attained happiness and well-being.

Seeing other Petas having happiness and well-being, they approached Buddha Kassapa and enquired of him: “Exalted Buddha, is it likely that we will ever enjoy such prosperity?” – “Petas,” said Buddha Kassapa, “it is not yet time for you to enjoy such prosperity. After [429] a lapse of one inclusive period (antara-kappa), Buddha Gotama will make his appearance in the world. At that time there will be a king named Bimbisāra. Ninety-two aeons ago, counting from this Fortunate Aeon (Bhadda-kappa), the King named Bimbisāra was the chief minister, and a close relative of yours. That old relative of yours, King Bimbisāra, after making a great offering to Buddha Gotama, will share his merit with you. At that time, you will all enjoy such prosperity.”

The hopeful words of Buddha Kassapa filled the Petas with intense joy as if he had told them: “You will gain happiness tomorrow.”

<sup>181</sup> According to the Collection of the Thematic Discourses (Saṃyutta-nikāya) commentary, Buddha Phussa passed away while he was still staying with the princes.

At the Time of Buddha Gotama

Then, when the long duration of time between the appearance of one Buddha and another had elapsed, our Buddha Gotama appeared in the world. The three princes, together with their 1,000 attendants, passed away from the Deva realm and took rebirth in a Brahmin clan of Magadha country. In due time, they renounced the household life and became the three recluse brothers at Gayāsīsa with their 1,000 recluse disciples.

The former chief minister of the three princes had now become King Bimbisāra, ruler of Magadha. The treasurer of the three princes had become now the rich man Visākha, his wife then had now become Dhammadinnā, the daughter of another rich man. The rest of the former assemblage formed now the royal attendants of King Bimbisāra.

As has been stated above, when our Buddha Gotama of unimaginable majesty (acinteyya), Lord of the Three Worlds, arrived at Rājagaha, he caused King Bimbisāra and his retinue of 110,000 rich Brahmins to be established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). On the next day, with Sakka acting as his usher, he went to the golden palace to accept the great generosity made by King Bimbisāra.

All the Petas who were the old relatives of King Bimbisāra went too and stood surrounding him, hoping: “Our former relative, King Bimbisāra will share his merits with us. He will presently make the announcement of his merit-sharing.” But, having performed the great meritorious deed, King Bimbisāra was only thinking: “Where would the blessed Buddha reside?” and failed to share the merits. They expressed their indignation by making a terrible outcry of groans in the king's palace at the dead of night.

Thoroughly shaken, frightened and alarmed by the uproar, King Bimbisāra went to the Buddha in the morning and paying respectful homage to him asked: “Exalted Buddha, last night I heard such a frightful noise. What would be their effect upon me?” – “Have no fear, your majesty,” replied the Buddha, “those noises will have no ill effects upon you at all. As a matter of fact, your former relatives have been reborn in the realm of Petas and are roaming about and waiting for you, your majesty, throughout the innumerable aeons that intervened between the appearance of one Buddha and another with the hope of receiving the fruits of merits shared by you. You failed to share your merits with your former relatives after your meritorious deeds yesterday. Deprived of any hope of receiving a share of your merits, they caused that frightful din.”

On hearing the Buddha's reply, the king addressed the Buddha again: “Exalted Buddha, if I perform a deed of generosity again and share my merits gained thereby, will they be able to receive them?” – “Yes, your majesty, they will be able to receive them.” – “This being so,” the king requested the Buddha, “may you accept the great alms meal (dāna) to be performed by me today? I will announce my sharing of my merits with my old relatives.” The Buddha signified his acceptance by remaining silent.

The king went back to the palace and caused arrangements to be made for the performance of a magnificent alms meal and when all the arrangements had been made, he had information sent to the Buddha that it was time for him to come and accept the king's offering. The Buddha went to the palace and sat down at the prepared seat together with his community of monastics. All the Petas, who were the king's former relatives, also went to the palace, saying: “Today, we are surely going to receive the share of merits,” and stood waiting from outside the walls.

The Buddha exercised his supernormal powers in such a way that the king saw all the Petas who were his former relatives. The king, pouring water on the hands of the Buddha, said: Idaṃ me ñātināṃ hotu, “may this alms meal given by a pouring of clear water be for the [430] well-being of my relatives.”

At that very moment, his former relatives received their share of merits and there appeared suddenly ponds with five kinds of lotus for their enjoyment. All his relatives drank the water of the ponds, and took a bath in them; freed from miseries, worries, weariness and thirst; they acquired a golden complexion.

Again, the king offered various edibles in succession such as rice gruel, hard food and soft food, to the community of monastics headed by the Buddha, and announced a distribution of merits to his old relatives. At that very moment, various kinds of celestial food appeared for their consumption. Partaking of these divine meals voraciously, which more than made up for the ravenous hunger they felt before, they assumed a fresh, healthy physical appearance, complete with all the sense faculties of eye, ear, nose, tongue, and body.

Then the king proceeded to offer robes, sleeping and dwelling places to the community of monastics headed by the Buddha and as before made known the distribution of his merits; and at that moment too, there appeared for use by the Petas, divine garments, divine carriages and celestial mansions complete with beds, beddings, bed spreads and various kinds of ornamental clothing. The Buddha made the resolution wishing that King Bimbisāra could see the happiness and prosperity being enjoyed by his old relatives. On seeing them thus enjoying King Bimbisāra was overjoyed.

According to the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada) commentary on the story of Ven. Sāriputta, those Peta relatives of the king abandoned their Peta appearance and assumed divine appearances.

Having finished his meal, the Buddha, in order to bless the king with an appreciation of all his good deeds, gave the discourse entitled Beyond the Walls (Khp 7, Pv 1.5, Tiro-kuṭṭa-sutta) made up of twelve verses:

[The original translation had only the first verse in Pāḷi, here I give the whole discourse in my own translation.]

Tiro-kuḍḍesu tiṭṭhanti, sandhi-siṅghātakesu ca, dvāra-bāhāsu tiṭṭhanti, āgantvāna sakam̐ gharam̐.

They stand beyond the walls, and at the junctions and crossroads, they stand at the door-posts, having come to their former homes.

Pahūte anna-pānamhi, khajja-bhojje upaṭṭhite, na tesam̐ koci sarati sattānam̐ kamma-paccayā.

But when abundant food and drink, both staple and non-staple, is prepared, no one remembers these beings, because of their past unwholesome deeds,

*Evaṃ dadanti ñātīnam̐ ye honti anukampakā, suciṃ paṇītam̐ kālena, kappiyam̐ pāna-bhojanam̐.
“Idam̐ vo ñātīnam̐ hotu, sukhitā hontu ñātayo!”*

Thus those who are compassionate give to their departed relatives, at the right time, pure, excellent, suitable drink and food, thinking: “May this go to our relatives, may our relatives be happy!”

Te ca tattha samāgantvā, ñāti-petā samāgatā pahute anna-pānamhi, sakkaccam̐ anumodare:

Those who have gathered, the departed relatives who have assembled around the food and drink, respectfully offer their thanks, saying:

“Ciram̐ jīvantu no ñātī! Yesam̐ hetu labhāmase, amhākañ-ca katā pūjā, dāyakā ca anipphalā!”

“May our relatives live long! Those to whom we owe this gain, for we have been honoured, those who give are not without reward!”

Na hi tattha kasī atthi, gorakkh' ettha na vijjati, vañijjā tādisī natthi, hiraññaena kayakkayam.

For in that place there is no ploughing, and cattle-rearing is not found there, similarly there is no trading, or buying and selling of gold.

*Ito dinnena yāpenti, petā kālakatā tahiṃ.
Unname udakam vaṭṭam, yathā ninnam pavattati,
evam-eva ito dinnam, petānam upakappati.*

The departed in that place, who have died, have to subsist on gifts. Just as water that rains on the highlands, flows down to the lowlands, so too what has been given here is of benefit to the departed.

*Yathā vāri-vahā pūrā paripūrenti sāgaram,
evam-eva ito dinnam, petānam upakappati.*

Just as rivers that are full flow and fill up the ocean, so too what has been given here is of benefit to the departed, thinking:

“Adāsi me, akāsi me, ñāti-mittā sakhā ca me,” petānam dakkhiṇam dajjā, pubbe katam-anussaram.

“He gave to me, he worked for me, he was my relative, my friend, my companion,” he should give gifts for the departed, remembering what they have done before.

Na hi ruṇṇam va, soko vā, yā caññā paridevanā, na tam petānam-atthāya, evam tiṭṭhanti ñātayo.

For no tears, or grief, or any other lamentations, are of any use to the departed, as long as their relatives continue grieving in this way.

Ayam kho dakkhiṇā dinnā, Saṅghamhi suppatiṭṭhitā, dīgha-rattam hitāyassa, ṭhānaso upakappati.

But that gift that has been given, and well placed in the Sangha, is of benefit to them for a long time, immediately it is of benefit.

So ñāti-dhammo ca ayam nidassito - petāna' pūjā ca katā ulārā, balañ-ca bhikkhūnam-anuppadinnam, tumhehi puññam pasutam anappakam!

15: The Buddha's Visit to Rājagaha – 561

This then is the definition of a relative's duties - and by this great honour has been done to the departed, strength has also been given to the monks, and no little merit has been produced by you!

At the end of this Beyond the Walls discourse, 84,000 sentient beings became aware of the frightful disadvantages of rebirth in the Peta realm through the vivid descriptions by the Buddha, which generated in them a sense of spiritual urgency (samvega). Thereupon they readily practised the Dhamma and, perceiving the noble truths, achieved emancipation.

On the second day also, the Buddha repeated the same discourse to Devas and humans. He continued to give the same discourse for seven days and on each occasion, 84,000 beings perceived the four noble truths and achieved emancipation. [431]

16: The Arrival of Upatissa and Kolita

The Two Friends

The time was about the first waxing moon of February (Māgha) when the Buddha had been in Rājagaha for about half a month. At that time, the great teacher of the wandering ascetics, Sañjaya, was residing at Rājagaha with 250 followers. During this period, the wandering ascetic Upatissa, the future chief disciple Ven. Sāriputta, and wandering ascetic Kolita, the future chief disciple Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, happened to be undergoing training in the ascetic practices under this great teacher Sañjaya.

The two ascetics, Upatissa and Kolita, who were childhood friends, found out on completion of the course of training within two or three days that the ascetic teacher's doctrine did not contain any elements of the deathless Nibbāna. "My friend, this ascetic teacher's doctrine is fruitless, it is without essence. We will make a solemn vow that, from now on, the one who realises first the deathless Nibbāna should speak about it to the one who is still seeking it."

On that day of about the first waxing moon of March (Phagguṇa), Ven. Assaji, one of the Group-of-Five (pañca-vaggiya) monks, after rearranging his robe and taking his alms bowl and upper robe, set out for Rājagaha to receive alms food. His deportment was dignified and inspired confidence, whether in going forward or back, looking forward or sideways, with eyes cast down confining the range of vision to a radius of four hands' lengths.

When ascetic Upatissa, the future Sāriputta, saw Ven. Assaji entering Rājagaha, deporting himself with such dignity and grace, he thought to himself: "I am certain this monastic must be one of those in the world who has attained the Arahat path and fruit. It might be well to approach him and ask: "Friend, under whom have you gone forth? Who is your teacher? Whose teaching have you accepted?"

But then he considered thus: "This is not the proper time to ask this monastic; he is on his alms round in the city. We two friends have so desired the deathless state of Nibbāna after having deduced that: 'If there is death, there must also be the state of deathlessness.' For me, who has been seeking to realize this inferred objective of Nibbāna, it would be well to follow in the footsteps of this monk." Accordingly he followed closely behind Ven. Assaji.

16: The Arrival of Upatissa and Kolita – 563

When Ven. Assaji had finished his alms round, Upatissa sensed his desire to take a seat for his meal. He therefore laid out a short-legged stool, which he had carried all along the way, and offered some water from his jug when the monk had finished his meal.

Having thus fulfilled the duties that a pupil would do to a teacher, he entered into courteous, cordial conversation with the monk and said: “Friend, your faculties are fully clear and serene; your complexion is clear, [432] bright and unblemished. Friend, under whom have you gone forth? Who is your teacher? Whose teaching have you accepted?”

Ven. Assaji replied: “Friend, I have gone forth under the Perfectly-Self Awakened Buddha, a scion of the unbroken Sakya dynasty, who renounced the world and became a recluse. He is my teacher and I am one who has accepted his teaching.” Upatissa then asked: “Friend, what does your teacher Buddha profess? What does he teach?”

Ven. Assaji contemplated: “These wandering ascetics hold views which are antagonistic to the Dispensation (Sāsana); and I must show this wandering ascetic Upatissa clearly the deep and subtle nature of the teaching,” and so gave this reply: “Friend, I am but a junior member of the Saṅgha, having come into the Dispensation (Sāsana) quite recently. I will not be able to explain the Dhamma extensively. I will be able to tell you in brief its essential meaning only.”

The wandering ascetic Upatissa, the future Sāriputta, thought of informing Ven. Assaji: “I am Upatissa, a wandering ascetic and an intellectual, please teach me to the best of your ability either little or in extension. It is my responsibility to try and understand your discourse by extending it in 100 or 1,000 ways,” but he only said: “So, be it, friend. Please teach me a little or much; and in doing so please teach me only the essential meaning. I wish to listen only to the essential meaning for what avails it to me, if you teach many matters concerning letters, versification, and other such things?”

Thereupon, Ven. Assaji, taught the Dhamma which is complete with the essential meaning of the four noble truths:

Ye dhammā hetuppabhavā, tesam̐ hetum̐ Tathāgato āha, tesañ-ca yo nirodho, evaṃ-vādī Mahā-samaṇo.

Our teacher, the Awakened One has told the truth of suffering (dukkha-sacca) and the truth of the origin of suffering (samudaya-sacca). He has also taught the truth of the cessation of suffering (nirodha-sacca) and the truth of the path leading to the cessation of suffering (magga-sacca). Such is the pure doctrine held by the Great Samaṇa, our master, who expounds these four noble truths in analytical detail.

After hearing the first half of the above discourse, the wanderer Upatissa attained the path stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga), when he had heard the remaining half of the discourse he had already become a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna). The future Sāriputta then said:

*Eseva dhammo yadi tāvad-eva, paccabyattha padam-asokaṃ,

This is the very teaching, the truth we two friends have been searching for, even though it has enabled me to attain personally and realise only the fruition of the first path (Sotāpatti-phala). You, venerable sir, have attained and realised the state where there is no sorrow, Nibbāna. Because we have not seen this truth, Nibbāna, we have suffered a great loss, wasting our lives in innumerable aeons.

After saying thus, it occurred to Upatissa that there should be some things more special in this supermundane matter, even before he had achieved the higher stages of it. He therefore requested Ven. Assaji: “Let things stand where they are for the time being; do not continue to teach the higher stages of the doctrine. Let me beseech you to tell [433] me where our teacher, the Awakened One, is now residing.” – “Friend, the Realised One is residing at the Veḷuvana monastery,” replied Ven. Assaji. Thereupon, Upatissa said: “If so, venerable sir, please go ahead, I have a friend to whom I have the bounden duty to share the knowledge of the deathless, which I have acquired before him. After fulfilling my promise to him, I shall follow with my friend in your wake to the presence of the Fortunate One.” He then respectfully made obeisance to the monk, circumambulated him three times as a gesture of gratitude and made his way towards the wanderers’ residence.

When Kolita saw Upatissa coming, even from a distance, it occurred to him: “My friend’s face looks entirely different from previous days. It seems certain that he has realised the deathless Nibbāna.” So he asked Upatissa: “Friend, your sense faculties are fully clear and serene; your complexion is clear, bright and unblemished. How is that, my friend? Have you acquired knowledge of the deathless Nibbāna?” – “Yes, friend, I have indeed realized the deathless Nibbāna.” On being asked by Kolita under what circumstances he had attained the deathless Nibbāna, Upatissa told him in detail what had transpired during his meeting with Ven. Assaji and repeated the verse: Ye Dhammā hetuppabbhavā, etc. After hearing the verse in full length, Kolita also attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) and asked: “Friend, Upatissa, where is our master, the Fully Awakened One now residing?” Upatissa replied: “Our master, the Realised One, is residing at the Veḷuvana monastery, according to Ven. Assaji.” Upon this, Kolita, being an impulsive person said: “If so, friend, let us go to the Realised One right away; the exalted Buddha, the Awakened One is our master, our benefactor.”

Sañjaya and His Disciples

Upatissa, the future Sāriputta, who, with a kindly disposition, had regard for the feelings of their followers, suggested patiently and with foresight: “Friend, those 250 wandering ascetics have been depending on us, have always looked up to us, and have lived in the hermitage, always watching our behaviour and disposition. Let us also inform these 250 wanderers. If we inform them, they can act as they wish!”

As one who always had profound respect for teachers, he went on to point out: “Let us also acquaint our teacher Sañjaya what we have learnt about the deathless Nibbāna. If he is intelligent and wise, he will believe us and surely come along with us to meet the Realised One. On hearing the teaching by the Realised One, he might also realise the paths and fruitions through penetrative knowledge.” So saying, the two friends first went to the 250 followers and told them: “We are going to the Realised One, the exalted Buddha, the Awakened One, who is our master, our benefactor.”

All 250 disciples responded: “All of us have been living here depending solely upon you and watching your behaviour and disposition. Should you decide to go to the Realised One and practise the holy life in the presence of the Fortunate One, all of us will also do so.”

Then the two friends went to the great teacher Sañjaya and made three unsuccessful attempts to persuade him to go to the Realised One with them. Finally the great teacher asked: “Young men, in this world, are there many who are unwise, or many who are wise?” When they replied: “Master, in this world there are many who are unwise and few who are wise,” the great teacher Sañjaya made this final remark: “Young men, if that be the case, wise men will go to the ascetic Gotama, the wise; and those who are unwise will come to me, the unwise. You may go ahead, I cannot, in any case, accompany you.” So the two friends, accompanied by their 250 followers, made their way to the Veļuvana monastery where the Fortunate One was residing.

As Upatissa and Kolita led away the 250 wandering ascetics to the Veļuvana monastery, the entire precincts of the great teacher Sañjaya became absolutely lifeless and silent. His followers had dispersed, and looking upon the silent and deserted scene, the lonely teacher Sañjaya felt so desolate that under pressure at the raging flame of [434] grief within, boiling blood bubbled forth from his mouth.

At that time the Buddha was sitting in a stately manner amidst an audience of the Saṅgha and was delivering a discourse. When he saw from a distance the two ascetic friends and their 250 followers coming towards the Veļuvana monastery, he drew the attention of the monastics who were listening to his discourse, saying: “Monastics, yonder come Kolita and Upatissa, the two boyhood friends. These two are destined to become the pair of chief disciples on my left and right.” The two friends and their 250 followers approached the Fortunate One, bowing their heads at his feet in profound respect.

Kolita, Upatissa and Their Followers Ordained

Having made their obeisance to the Fortunate One, they requested the Buddha that they be ordained as monks, saying: “Exalted Buddha! May we have the lower and higher ordinations in your presence.” The Buddha stretched out his golden hand and called out in the same way as before thus: Etha bhikkhave, etc., “come, monks. Receive the lower and higher ordinations you have asked for, my dear sons. The Dhamma has been well taught by me; strive to undergo the noble training in its three aspects so as to bring about the end of the round of suffering.”

No sooner had the Buddha uttered thus, than the two friends, together with their 250 disciples, were instantly transformed into fully fledged monastics, like senior monks (thera) of 60 years’ standing, readily robed and equipped with eight supernaturally created requisites, each in its proper place, paying homage to the Buddha with due respect. The appearance of laymen vanished miraculously as they were transformed into monastics.

After they had thus become summoned monastics (ehi-bhikkhu), the Buddha proceeded to expound an appropriate discourse, in harmony with the intellectual level and disposition of the 250 followers of the two friends. With the exception of the two chief disciples (agga-sāvaka), these 250 monastics became Arahats at that sitting.

As regards the two chief disciples, they had not yet become accomplished in the three higher paths, because, of the three types of disciple, the conditions for the attainment of chief disciples (agga-sāvaka-pāramī-ñāṇa) surpass those of great disciples (mahā-sāvaka) and ordinary disciples (pakati-sāvaka) and are more extensive.

Ven. Moggallāna and Ven. Sāriputta Attain Arahantship

After his ordination, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna started to practise earnestly the holy life in a forest, depending for his sustenance on a small village, called Kallavālamutta, in the country of Magadha. Making a strenuous effort in his practice, walking up and down the path for full seven days, he felt tired and weak on the seventh day and sat down at the end of the path dozing, being overcome by torpor. The Buddha roused him from the fit of torpidity with teaching and instruction and he eventually overcame it. On hearing the Buddha's instruction on the meditation on the elements (dhātu-kammaṭṭhāna) he became perfected in the three higher paths and achieved the height of knowledge of a disciple (sāvaka-pāramī-ñāṇa).<sup>182</sup>

Half a month from the date of his ordination, on the full moon day of February (Māgha), Ven. Sāriputta, while staying with the Buddha in the Sūkarakhatā cave, which was dug by pigs on mount Gijjhakūṭa in Rājagaha, heard the Buddha's Discourse concerning Dīghanakha (Dīgha-nakha-sutta, MN 74) [435] given to Ven. Sāriputta's own nephew, the wanderer Dīghanakha. While following the discourse intently, Ven. Sāriputta practised the meditation on feeling (vedanā-kammaṭṭhāna) thereby developing penetrating insight. As a result, he became an

Arahat, achieving the height of knowledge of a disciple (sāvaka-pāramī-ñāṇa). He may be likened to one who enjoys the food laid in readiness for another person. He also penetratingly discerned the sixteen states of knowledge.

Herein, a question might arise: Why did Ven. Sāriputta, who was possessed of great wisdom, become an Arahat after Ven. Mahā Moggallāna? The answer in brief is: The preliminary steps taken by Ven. Sāriputta, in the matter of meditation practices, were wider or greater than those of Ven. Mahā Moggallāna. Here is an example: When ordinary common people contemplate travelling, they can do so quickly because they have a limited amount of kit or paraphernalia to carry, whereas kings cannot set out so quickly because arrangements have to be made for regiments of elephants, horse-men, charioteers, infantry, etc., to accompany them on a grand scale, so, as the saying goes: “It takes the cooking time of a boat load of white beans for a king to appear before his audience.”

Further explanation: future Buddhas or Bodhisattas (Sammā-sambodhisatta), future Independent Buddhas (Pacceka-bodhisatta), and future disciples of a Buddha (sāvaka-bodhisatta) all have, as their object of insight meditation, the aggregate of conditioned formations or mental and physical phenomena. This aggregate which forms the object of insight meditation is known as the practising ground (samma-sanacāra) for the development of the knowledge of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and non-self (anatta). It is also called the ground of insight (vipassanā-bhūmi) meaning the aggregate of mental and physical phenomena which form the basis of developing insight (vipassanā-ñāṇa).

Of these Bodhisattas,

1. Bodhisattas who will become Sammā-sambuddhas (Sammā-sambodhisatta) contemplate the impermanence, suffering and non-self characteristics of the internal aggregate of conditioned existence, that is to say, mental and physical phenomena occurring continuously in sentient beings, as well as of external inanimate objects that have no power of sense-perception, that exist within the compass of one billion universes.
2. Bodhisattas who will become Paccekabuddhas (Pacceka-bodhisatta) contemplate the impermanence, suffering and non-self characteristics of conditioned mental and physical phenomena occurring in themselves, of those in the continuum of sentient beings in the middle region as well as of external inanimate objects that have no power of sense-perception.

3. Bodhisattas who will become future chief, great and ordinary disciples (sāvaka-bodhisatta) contemplate the impermanence, suffering and non-self characteristics of conditioned mental and physical phenomena without distinguishing, as occurring in the continuum of themselves or in those of others, taking them as one whole external phenomena.

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna did not contemplate to the fullest extent the impermanent, unsatisfactory, insubstantial characteristics of each and every conditioned phenomenon occurring in his own continuum and in those of others; he selected only some of the conditioned phenomena for his contemplation. Ven. Sāriputta, however, in contemplating the three characteristics of conditioned phenomena developed insight by being more thorough than Ven. Moggallāna, attending individually to each of the phenomenon.

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna may be likened to a person who touches the earth only with the tip of his walking stick as he walks along. He has only touched a negligibly small area of ground leaving a greater portion untouched. This implies that the time he utilized in contemplating the object of insight meditation and attaining the Arahat fruition after seven days, he had meditated on only a portion of the aggregates of conditioned phenomena.

Ven. Sāriputta, on the other hand, during the fifteen days before he attained the [436] Arahat fruition, took the complete course of mastering (sammasana) the practice reserved for the disciples not giving attention to those reserved for the Sammāsambodhisattas and Paccekabodhisattas so that there was nothing left untouched in the matter of contemplating the salient features of conditioned phenomena. Having realized the Arahat fruition, he perceived with dauntless confidence that, excepting the Fully Awakened Buddhas and Paccekabuddhas, there was no one who could rise to the intellectual level that he had systematically attained. He found none his equal.

Here is an analogy: There were two men who wanted bamboo staffs. The first man, having found a cluster of bamboos, thought it would take time to clear the bushes to get a good staff. So he cut a length of bamboo within reach of his hand, by thrusting his hand to his arm's length into the cluster of bamboos. Although this man acquired the bamboo staff first, he did not get a good, straight, strong one.

16: The Arrival of Upatissa and Kolita – 570

The second person, who also found the cluster of bamboos thought he would not get a staff of his choice unless the binding clusters and creepers were removed. He then girded his loins and with a sharp knife removed the tangled growth and then cut a straight, strong staff of his choice for himself and went off. Although this person acquired a bamboo staff later, he got a good, strong straight one.

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna may be likened to the first person who cut and acquired a bamboo staff first, but not a good, straight strong one; Ven. Moggallāna also became an Arahat first, but not the highest stage of the knowledge of a disciple (sāvaka-pāramī-ñāṇa).

Ven. Sāriputta may be likened to the second person who patiently took pains to get a staff that was straight and strong. Ven. Sāriputta attended patiently to his meditation for fifteen days to attain the Arahat fruition later but he reached the pinnacle of the knowledge of a disciple (sāvaka-pāramī-ñāṇa).

Ven. Moggallāna's practice (paṭipadā) for the three lower paths was of the easy practice but slow in super knowledge (sukha-paṭipadā-dandha-abhiññā) type – after having removed the hindrances (nīvaraṇa) easily, the insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) were tardily developed to attain the three lower stages (magga-ñāṇa).

His practice (paṭipadā) for the attainment of the Arahat path (Arahatta-magga) was of the difficult in practice and quick in super knowledge (dukkha-paṭipadā-khippa-abhiññā) type – after having been able to remove the five hindrances (nīvaraṇa) by practising strenuously and with difficulty, the insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) were developed sharply and quickly to attain the Arahat path.

The practice (paṭipadā) of Ven. Sāriputta, the general of the Dhamma, for the three lower paths was of the easy in practice, but slow in super knowledge (sukha-paṭipadā-dandha-abhiññā) type, which is the same as that of Ven. Mahā Moggallāna.

But his practice (paṭipadā) for the attainment of the Arahat path was of the easy in practice and quick in super knowledge type (sukha-paṭipadā-khippa-abhiññā) – after having removed the five hindrances (nīvaraṇa) without trouble and with ease, the insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) were developed sharply and quickly to attain the Arahat path. This is the difference between the practice (paṭipadā) of the two disciples.<sup>183</sup>

The Single Occasion of the Disciples' Meeting

After delivering the discourse entitled the Discourse concerning Dīghanakha (Dīgha-nakha-sutta, MN 74), the Buddha descended from mount Gijjhakūṭa before dusk and went to the Veḷuvana monastery. There occurred then the great event of the Disciples' meeting (sannipāta), which was characterised by four features:

1. It was the full moon of the month of February (Māgha).
2. The Congregation took place without an invitation, as a natural course of events, with the coming together of 1,250 monastics made up of 1,000 monastics headed by the Kassapa brothers and 250 belonging to the two chief disciples' group.
3. All the 1,250 participants were summoned monastics (ehi-bhikkhu).
4. All these participants had achieved the sixfold super knowledges (chaḷ-abhiññā).

It was in this congregation of the disciples (sāvaka-sannipāta), that the Buddha named the two chief disciples, Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, as chief disciples (agga-sāvaka). On the [437] same day, the Buddha gave the instructions known as the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha), which no Buddha fails to offer.

Three Occasions of the Buddha's Teaching

As described in chapter IX, on the 24 Buddhas, the three great occasions in which Buddhas of the past delivered great sermons, also took place in the time of our supremely Awakened Buddha Gotama. These memorable occasions are:

1. The Buddha, after his attainment of Awakening, taught, for the first time, the Discourse about the Turning of the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakkappavattana-sutta, SN 56.11) in the Deer Park where Ven.

Koṇḍañña and 180 million Brahmas became established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).

This is the first occasion (Dhammābhisamaya), at which the four noble truths were made known to humans, Devas and Brahmas.

2. Then on the great auspicious (mahā-maṅgala) day, the Buddha taught the Discourse on the Blessings (Maṅgala-sutta, Khp 5, Snp 2.4) amidst the assembly of Devas and humans from the 10,000 world-element; innumerable Devas and humans discerned the four noble truths and attained emancipation.

This is the second occasion (Dhammābhisamaya) at which the four noble truths were made known to humans, Devas and Brahmas.

3. Again, when the Realised One taught the Short Discourse giving Advice to Rāhula (Cūḷa-Rāhulovada-sutta, MN 147) to Ven. Rāhula, thousands of Devas together with Ven. Rāhula, came to understand the four noble truths and attained emancipation.

This is the third occasion (Dhammābhisamaya) at which the four noble truths were made known to humans, Devas and Brahmas.

The Two Forms of the Rules

The brief exhortation and code of discipline laid down by the Buddhas is the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha), those who observe and follow them stay away from the danger of falling into states of woe. The Rules are in two forms: 1) The Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha) and 2) the Monastic Rules (Āṇā-Pātimokkha).

Of those two forms, the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha) is taught by fully Self-Awakened Buddhas exclusively. The Advisory Rules consists of three verses beginning with: Khantī paramaṃ tapo titikkhā, “forbearing patience is the most excellent moral practice.”

Every Buddha gave this exhortation only with these three verses; there has been no deviation among them. However, as regards the occasions and time intervals when they were delivered, there had been differences as is explained below: Buddha Vipassī taught the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha) once every seven years; the exhortation held good for seven years. Buddhas Sikhī and Vessabhū taught it every six years, Buddhas Kakusandha and Koṇāgamana, every year and Buddha Kassapa every six months, as his exhortation lasted for six months. This is as mentioned in the Introduction to the Story of Ānanda's Questions (Ānandatthera-pañhā-vatthu) of the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada) commentary (DhpA IV.9).

We will describe here also what is mentioned in the Introduction to the Section on Verañjā, in the first volume of the Vinaya commentary regarding these Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha):<sup>184</sup> All the Buddhas of the past taught the Advisory Rules only, but they [438] were not taught every half month. To explain further, Buddha Vipassī taught the Advisory Rules once every six years and he recited it himself. The male monastic disciples did not recite the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha) within the precincts of their own monastery. All the monastics within the entire region of Jambudīpa gathered together to hold the Observance Day (Uposatha) service only in the precinct of the monastery where Buddha Vipassī resided. The monastery was situated in Khemā's garden, a sanctuary for animals near the capital Bandhumatī.

During the days of Buddha Vipassī, there used to be 84,000 monasteries, and within each monastery there dwelt 10,000 to 20,000 monastics who were keeping themselves pure by staying away from individuals with whom they have nothing in common (visabhāga-puggala). They also observe more austere practices. Devas, who had taken up the duty of announcing the Observance (Uposatha) days, went round the monasteries where monastics resided once every year to address them: “Your reverences, who have a peaceful life, a year is past, two years, three years, four years, five years have past. This is the sixth year and the coming full moon day is the day when you should all approach the Buddha to pay homage and to hold the Observance (Uposatha) day. It is now time for you all to assemble in the presence of the Buddha.”

Monastics, who were possessed of supernormal powers, found their own way to the monastery in the Khemā Sanctuary where the Buddha Vipassī was residing. Monastics who possessed no supernatural power went to that monastery with the assistance of the Devas in this manner: The powerless monastics were then living in monasteries situated near the shores of the east, west, north and south oceans. Before they proceeded to the assembly, they performed the bounden duties of setting beds and dwelling places in order, then taking their bowls and robes, they willed: “Let us be off,” and instantaneously they found themselves, with the aid of the Devas, sitting in the presence of Buddha Vipassī, in the Observance Hall, and paying respects to him.

When the full assembly of monastics had congregated, Buddha Vipassī, recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha) as follows (Dhp 184-183-185):

Khantī paramaṃ tapo titikkhā, Nibbānaṃ paramaṃ vadanti Buddhā, na hi pabbajito parūpaghātī, na samaṇo hoti paraṃ viheṭṭhayanto.

Forbearing patience (adhivāsana-khanti) is the most excellent moral practice. Buddhas proclaim: “Nibbāna, which is freedom from craving, is supreme.” He who injures or kills others is not one who has gone forth. One who harms others is not a noble monastic who has extinguished all the defilements.

Patience (khanti) means exertion or putting forth energy to bear patiently the blames and accusations made by others, forbearance to withstand cold and heat without the slightest sign of discomfort (adhivasana-khantī).

Sabba-pāpassa akaraṇaṃ, kusalassa upasampadā, sacitta-pariyodapanaṃ, etaṃ Buddhānasāsaṇaṃ.

Not to do anything evil, to cultivate faultless meritorious deeds pertaining to the four realms, to purify ones mind by discarding the fivefold hindrances which defile it – these are the instructions, exhortations, advice given by each and every Buddha.

One should endeavour to refrain from demeritorious deeds by observing moral precepts; to perform meritorious deeds pertaining to the four realms through practice of concentration and insight meditations of both mundane and supermundane levels; and bring about complete purification of one’s mind [439] through attainment of the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala). This is the express exhortation, instruction laid down by all the Buddhas.

Anūpavādo anūpaghāto, Pātimokkhe ca saṃvaro, mattaññutā ca bhattasmim, pantañ-ca sayanāsaṇaṃ, adhicitte ca āyogo, etaṃ Buddhānasāsaṇaṃ.

Not to accuse others or cause others to accuse, meaning vocal restraint; not to ill-treat others or cause others to kill or ill treat others, meaning bodily restraint, to observe the chief moral precepts and guard them from being stained or blemished meaning observance of the restraint according to the Monastic Rules (Pātimokkha-saṃvara-sīla) and restraint of the senses (indriya-saṃvara-sīla). Knowing the right measure in the matter of food referring to purity of livelihood (ājīva-pārisuddhi-sīla) and the dependence on requisites (paccaya-sannissita-sīla), dwelling in places of seclusion (sappāya-senāsana), constant application to develop the eight attainments (samāpatti) which serve as the basis of insight knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa) – this set of six precepts constitute the exhortation, instruction and advice of all the Buddhas.

16: The Arrival of Upatissa and Kolita – 575

This verse gives an abridged exposition of the three trainings, namely, higher morality (adhisīla), concentration (adhicitta) and wisdom (adhipaññā).

In this manner only, Buddha Sikhī and all other Buddhas taught and recited the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha); there are no differences, such as a special teaching in the verses recited by them. As stated above, the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada) commentary mentions only differences in the time factor.

Only these three verses form the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha) which were recited by all the Buddhas. Buddhas with longer lifespans recited them throughout their lifetime; Buddhas of shorter lifespan recited them in the earlier portion after their Awakening (paṭhama-bodhi), from the time they started laying down the training rules till they stopped teaching. Only their disciples recited the Vinaya disciplinary rules, also called the Monastic Rules (Āṇā-Pātimokkha), once every fortnight.<sup>185</sup>

Therefore, our own Buddha Gotama, the Awakened One, taught the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha) only in the first 20 years of his Buddhahood, known as the first period after Awakening (Paṭhama-bodhi).

17a: Buddha's Journey to Kapilavatthu

King Suddhodana Invites the Buddha

[The first two sections of this chapter were attached to the end of the previous chapter, but better belong with the story that follows.]

It was during the waning moon of January (Phussa), in the year 528 BCE, the Buddha was then residing at the Veḷuvana monastery in Rājagaha administering the deathless elixir of Dhamma to humans, Devas and Brahmas who were in his presence. He had helped some sentient beings become established as firm believers in the Three Treasures; others were able to gain the paths and fruitions in accordance with their aspirations and resolve; while some people of good families from Aṅga and Magadha countries were granted ordination and gained attainment of the paths and fruitions. While this great festival of emancipation was being held daily, King Suddhodana heard the news that his son was now the most exalted Buddha, after undergoing a strenuous course of practice for six years and that, having taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, he was residing in great and noble glory at Veḷuvana monastery, Rājagaha, like the moon amidst the stars in the sky.

Hearing this news, the king sent for a minister and said to him: “Minister! Go now with 1,000 attendants to the city of Rājagaha and address my son, the [440] Awakened One, in these words: ‘Exalted Buddha, your father, King Suddhodana, is desirous of paying homage to you,’ and invite him to come here.”

“Very well, your majesty,” replied the minister and he set off without delay, carrying the royal message and in the company of 1,000 attendants to Rājagaha which was 60 leagues from Kapilavatthu. He arrived there at a time when the Buddha was teaching Dhamma in the midst of an audience at the Veḷuvana monastery.

The minister thought to himself: “I may as well listen to the discourse before delivering the king’s message.” While standing and listening to the discourse from the far end of the audience, he and his 1,000 attendants, as a consequence, became Arahats. They therefore approached the Buddha and made the request: “Exalted Buddha, may we receive the going forth to the Saṅgha and higher ordination as monastics in your presence.” Thereupon, the Fortunate One stretched out his hand as before and said: Etha bhikkhu, etc. Instantly, the minister and the 1,000 royal attendants transformed into fully fledged monastics like senior monks (thera) of 60 year's standing, readily robed and equipped with the eight supernaturally created requisites, each in its place, paying homage to the Buddha with due respect. Their state of minister and royal attendants miraculously disappeared as they were transformed into monastics.

From the moment of attainment of the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala), noble persons, as a matter of course, become indifferent to mundane affairs, as such, and so the minister did not convey the king's message to the Buddha but simply passed his time enjoying the bliss of the Arahata fruition.

Finding that the minister whom he sent did not return in due time and no news was even heard from him, the king was anxious to know the reason for their silence. So he sent again another minister on the same mission and in the same manner. This minister, too, having gone to Veḷuvana monastery in Rājagaha with his attendants, became an Arahata after hearing the discourse given by the Buddha and they all became summoned monastics (ehi-bhikkhu). They neither conveyed to the Buddha the royal message nor did they send back any report to the king. They remained there enjoying the Arahata fruition.

King Suddhodana sent altogether nine ministers, each with 1,000 royal attendants on the same mission. All the nine ministers, with their attendants, became Arahats after hearing the discourse given by the Buddha and became summoned monastics. They neither conveyed to the Buddha the royal message nor did they send back any report to the king. They remained there enjoying the fruits of the Arahata fruition.

Sending Kāḷudāyī to the Buddha

When King Suddhodana understood that none of the ministers and attendants had returned or come into his presence to tell him anything, he thought: "So many, 9,009 persons, have not come back to my presence even to give a report, because they have no close affection and regard for me at all." He wondered: "Who will carry out my orders with due speed and without delay." His searching mind began to work and after scrutinising carefully, at last he saw his minister Kāḷudāyī. As an administrative official, he was charged with managing general affairs at the court and he was also one near and dear to the royal family. Thus, as a trustworthy confidant, the king picked out Kāḷudāyī, who was also his son's birth-mate, as he was born on the same day. They were playmates since their infancy and had been intimate friends.

Therefore, the king told Kāḷudāyī: “My son, Kāḷudāyī, being desirous of paying homage to my son, the Buddha, I have sent nine ministers each accompanied by 1,000 attendants but not even one of them has returned with any news. One cannot know with certainty what danger there is to one's life. I wish to see and pay homage to my son while I am still living. Dear son Kāḷudāyī, will you be able to strive your utmost to undertake this task so that I may see my son?”

Kāḷudāyī replied: “Your majesty, it would be possible for me to do so if I am granted permission to become a monk afterwards.”

Then the king replied: “Dear son Kāḷudāyī, whether you enter monkhood or not, do try your utmost to undertake the task so that I may see my son.” – “Very well,” promised [441] Kāḷudāyī, who then set out for Rājagaha accompanied by 1,000 attendants, carrying the king's message for the Buddha. They arrived there while the Buddha was teaching a discourse, and stood listening to it from the far end of the audience. As a consequence, Kāḷudāyī and his 1,000 attendants became Arahats and became summoned monastics too.

After his Awakening, the Buddha spent his first Rains Retreat at the Deer Park at Isipatana. At the end of the retreat and having performed the Invitation (Pavāraṇā) ceremony, he set out for the Uruvelā forest where he stayed for the whole of three months teaching and instructing the three recluse brothers and their 1,000 followers till they became Arahats. Then, accompanied by the 1,000 Arahats who were former recluses, the Buddha made his way to Rājagaha where he arrived on the full moon day of January (Phussa) and resided there for the entire two months. The Buddha taught and instructed more than 10,000 young men of good families from Aṅga and Magadha countries until they became Arahats and ordained as monastics. Thus five months had passed since the Buddha departed from Bārāṇasī; the cold winter months were over and it was spring, the full moon day of March (Phagguṇa). And it was a week after Kāḷudāyī had arrived into the presence of the Buddha.

On that full moon day, Ven. Kāḷudāyī thought to himself: “The cold season is over and spring has arrived. Cultivators and farmers have finished gathering their harvests and they have opened up pathways leading to all destinations. The great earth is verdant, covered with the luxurious growth of green grass. In the surrounding woods, forest trees have shed their old leaves and look resplendent in their new leaves, bearing flowers and fruits. Neither too cold nor too hot, it is a good time for travelling, it is time now for the Buddha to visit his royal relatives and give them his blessings.” Having thought thus, he approached the Buddha and addressed him with the following 64 verses, supplicating him to make a visit to the royal city of Kapilavatthu.

*1. Aṅgārino dāni dumā Bhadante, phalesino chadanaṃ vippahāya, te accimanto va pabhāsayanti,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānaṃ.*

Lord and great benefactor, winter has gone and spring has set in, all the trees have shed their decayed leaves and as if to acquire fresh fruits, have sprouted tender leaves and flower buds of glowing ember-red. Stimulated by the changing weather, these colourful trees are shining bright.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*2. Dumā vicittā suvirājamānā, rattaṅkureheva ca pallavehi, ratanujjala-maṇḍapa-sannibhāsā,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānaṃ.*

Lord and great benefactor, all the trees, wearing their coral-red sprouts and tender emerald-green leaves, are wondrously and delightfully beautiful, resembling pavilions shining with jewel-like brilliancy.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*3. Supupphitagga kusumehi bhūsitā, manuñña-bhūtā suci-sādhu-gandhā,
rukkhā virocanti ubhosu passesu,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānaṃ. [442]*

Lord and great benefactor, on either side of the roadway, all kinds of trees and seasonal plants are crowded with blossoms to the very top. Adorned with flowers in full bloom, every tree stands lovely; the clear air is filled with fragrant odour and the environs are amazingly beautiful to behold.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

4. *Phalehinekehi samiddhi-bhūtā, vicitta-rukkhā ubhatovakāse, khuddam pipāsam-pi vinodayanti,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānam.*

Lord and great benefactor, on either side of the roadway, all kinds of trees have borne assorted fruits; wayfarers, both monastics and laity alike, can satisfy their hunger and quench their thirst.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

5. *Vicitta-mālā suci-pallavehi, susajjitā mora-kalāpa-sannibhā,
rukkhā virocanti ubhosu passesu,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānam.*

Lord and great benefactor, now that on either side of the road-way, seasonal shrubs and plants are adorned with the most fascinating sprigs and decoratively set with delicate leaves free from dirt and dust, looking like bouquets of peacock's tails, they make all the environs seem a splendid and wonderful scene.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

6. *Virocamānā phala-pallavehi, susajjitā vāsa-nivāsa-bhūtā, tosenti addhāna-kilanta-satte,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānam.*

Lord and great benefactor, seasonal trees and plants are adorned with young fruits and delicate leaves; the whole environs not only present a fascinating sight at every turn, but also, like welcoming home and rest houses they refresh and delight the heart of weary travelling monastics and laymen.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

7. *Suphullitaggā vana-gumba-nissitā, latā anekā suvirājamānā,
tosenti satte maṇi-maṇḍapā va,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānam.*

Lord and great benefactor, numerous species of creeping plants in full bloom, enveloping the bushy plants, afford a fine and splendid sight. Assuming the form of a big pavilion studded with a variety of precious jewels, it gladdens the heart of travellers, monastics and laity alike. [443]

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*8. Latā anekā dumanissitā va,
Piyehi saddhim̐ sahitā vadhūva,
Palobhayantī hi sugandha-gandhā,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānam̐.*

Lord and great benefactor, like the daughters and daughters-in-law of good birth embracing their beloved husbands, just so numerous species of beautiful creeping plants cling to the trees and emit sweet odours and seem to be seductively attracting the delight of both monastics and laity.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*9. Vicitta-nīlādi-manuñña-vaṇṇā, dijā samantā abhikūjamānā, tosenti mañjussa-ratā ratīhi,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānam̐.*

Lord and great benefactor, from all directions, multifarious birds, strangely beautiful with bright darkly bluish plumage, can be seen flying, dancing, singing sweet and loud, mingling among themselves in couples in jubilant celebration, much to the joy and delight of the travelling monastics and laity.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*10. Migā ca nānā suvirājamānā, uttuṅga-kaṇṇā ca manuñña-nettā, disā samantā-m-abhidhāvayanti,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānam̐.*

Lord and great benefactor, numerous species of beasts, gambolling and running, can be seen trotting joyfully to and fro in groups or pairs with pricked-up ears and lovable wide eyes.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*11. Manuñña-bhūtā ca mahī samantā, virājamānā haritā va saddalā, supupphi-rukkhā moḷini-valaṅkatā,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānaṃ.*

The Burmese word-by-word translation (nissaya) translates this as:

Lord and great benefactor, Mother Earth, on all sides, everywhere covered with lush Bermuda grass, affords a fine and delightful scene. The trees, richly adorned with lovely blossoms, are like a maiden's well-embellished tapering coiled hair.

Alternatively we could translate:

Stretches of land everywhere afford a delightful scene. These stretches of land are covered with green Bermuda grass. The trees, with flowers and full blossom atop them, resemble a charming maiden wearing a well-embellished curled hair. [444]

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*12. Susajjitā mutta-mayā va vālukā, susaṅṅhitā cāru-suphassa-dātā, virocayanteva disā samantā,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānaṃ.*

Lord and great benefactor, fine silvery sands, resembling brilliant white pearls of even size, orderly arranged by skilful smiths, lie in stretches for travellers to tread upon with ease and comfort and bind colour and beauty to the environs.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*13. Samaṃ suphassaṃ suci-bhūmi-bhāgaṃ, manuñña-pupphodaya-gandha-vāsitaṃ, virājamānaṃ sucimaṅ-ca sobhaṃ,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānaṃ.*

Lord and great benefactor, Mother Earth is free from dirt, the whole stretch of land is void of knoll and trench, unbroken and even, affording a smooth and gentle sense of touch. The air is charged with sweet scents from lovely flowers. The whole spectacle is beautiful, all is clean and pleasant, making travelling most enjoyable and appropriate.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*14. Susajjitam nandana-kānanam va, vicitta-nānā-duma-saṇḍa-maṇḍitam, sugandha-bhūtam pavanam surammam,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānam.*

Lord and great benefactor, beautified by the presence of fascinating trees and an atmosphere laden with sweet and exotic scents of flowers, the woodland passage between Rājagaha and Kapilavatthu has the appearance of Nandana garden as if Devas have transformed it into a stage for a tumultuous celebration of the festival of the Devas.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*15. Sarā vicittā vividhā manoramā, susajjitā paṅkaja-puṇḍarīkā, pasanna-sītodaka-cāru-puṇṇā,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānam.*

Lord and great benefactor, the ponds along the route are full of clear, clean and cool water, and decorated with the five varieties of lotus thriving from the silt, they are wonderfully beautiful to the view and fill the heart with delight.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth. [445]

*16. Suphulla-nānā-vidha-paṅkajehi, virājamānā suci-gandha-gandhā,
pamodayan-teva narāmarānam,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānam.*

Lord and great benefactor, fully bloomed lilies, dancing on the surface of the ponds, afford scenes of beauty, they are fragrant with the clean sweet smell of the flowers. The lovely ponds greatly delight the approaching Devas and humans.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*17. Suphulla-paṅkeruha-sannisinnā, dijā samantā-m-abhinādayantā, modanti bhariyāhi samaṅgino te,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānaṃ.*

Lord and great benefactor, birds of varying hue, drunk with nectar from the proudly-blooming fully-bloomed lilies on which they have alighted, sing loud and melodiously from all round. Together with their true and lovely mates, they fly about in joyous delight.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*18. Suphulla-pupphehi rajaṃ gahetvā, alī vidhāvanti vikūjamānā, madhumhi gandho vidisaṃ pavāyati,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānaṃ.*

Lord and great benefactor, the bees and bumble bees buzz noisily and ceaselessly as they swarm about sipping the sweet and juicy nectar from the flowers in full bloom. These bees, big and small, fly about the entire area, diffusing the whole region with the sweet scent of nectar.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*19. Abhinna-nādā madavāraṇā ca, girīhi dhāvanti ca vāri-dhārā, savanti najjo suvirājītā va,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānaṃ.*

Lord and great benefactor, huge elephants in must trumpet with voices as clear as those of singing cranes; great volumes of water rushing down from the hills and majestic rivers flowing swift and strong are beautiful to behold.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

20. Girī samantā va padissamānā, mayūra-gīvā iva nīla-vaṇṇā, *disā rajindā va virocayanti,

samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānaṃ.*

Lord and great benefactor, in all eight directions, everywhere we look, ranges of towering mountains, dark green and distinct as the colourful [446] ring round the neck of a peacock, resembling the grand spectacle of Erāvata, one of the eight species of royal<sup>186</sup> elephants.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*21. Mayūra-saṅghā giri-muddhanasmim, naccanti nārīhi samaṅgi-bhūtā, kūjanti nānā-madhurassarehi,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānaṃ.*

Lord and great benefactor, on all hilltops on either side of the road, many peacocks, each with its own true and dear mate, strut about back and forth, with their tails raised fan-wise gorgeously, wings outstretched, and heads uplifted, dancing in emulation of humankind. With melodious voices and varying notes, in Magadha they joyously crow and sing: “Oway, Oway.”

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*22. Suvādikā neka-dijā manuññā, vicitta-pattehi virājamānā, girimhi ṭhatvā abhinādayanti,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānaṃ.*

Lord and great benefactor, numerous lovely birds, each with the variegated and exotic plumage of its species, are perching on the hill-tops on either side of the route and singing sweet songs.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*23. Suphulla-pupphākaramābhikiṇṇā, sugandha-nānā-dala-laṅkatā ca,
girī virocanti disā samantā,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānaṃ.*

Lord and great benefactor, on either side of the route, there are ranges of mountains with flowering trees of rare specimens emitting sweet-scents and presenting a delightful scene.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*24. Jalāsayā neka-sugandha-gandhā, surinda-uyyāna-jalāsayā va,
savanti najjo suvirājamānā,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānam.*

Lord and great benefactor, all the lakes and ponds, like those in the gardens of Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, are permeated with sweet scents and the rivers flow swiftly with strong currents and make the whole scene fascinating.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth. [447]

*25. Vicitta-titthehi alaṅkatā ca, manuñña-nānā-miga-pakkhi-pāsā, najjo virocanti susandamānā,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānam.*

Lord and great benefactor, rows of fascinating riverine towns adorn the rivers along their course, and, like traps, these rivers attract various delightful birds of passage. Flowing swiftly and ceaselessly, they are beautiful to behold.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*26. Ubhosu passesu jalāsayesu, supupphitā cāru-sugandha-rukkhā, vibhūsitaggā sura-sundarī ca,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānam.*

Lord and great benefactor, the trees on the banks of lakes and ponds, on either side of the route, are in full blossom and the whole region is permeated with sweet scents. With the fresh and decorative sprigs and leaf shoots gorgeously adorning their tops, they look like gracious maidens in the world of celestial beings.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

*27. Sugandha-nānā-duma-jāla-kiṇṇaṃ, vanam vicittam sura-nandanam va, manobhirāmam satatam gatīnam,
samayo Mahā-vīra Aṅgīrasānam.*

Lord and great benefactor, the woody section of the road, permeated with the sweet scent from the fragrant trees, is wonderful like the Nandana garden in the celestial world; it is a perpetual source of joy, a locality of peace and tranquillity for the travelling monastics and the laity.

Lord of mighty diligence, Great Hero, of the lineage of Aṅgīrasa, the time is opportune to pay a visit to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

Most exalted chief of the sages, a farmer ploughs the field many times with the expectation of securing crops and grains. Having furrowed the field repeatedly, he proceeds to sow the seeds with great effort, with the [456] expectation of procuring a good harvest. People in the world of commerce carrying their goods in big ships across the ocean which is rife with dangerous fish, tortoises, huge crabs, etc., do so at the risk of their lives and with the expectation of securing wealth. So also I, Kāḷudāyī, your birth-mate, have arrived at your feet in the Veḷuvana monastery with the good wish and expectation that you will visit the royal city and grant your gracious permission to the royal family to pay homage to you. May my good and sincere wish be fulfilled without delay.

64. Nāti-sītaṃ nāti-uṇhaṃ, nāti-dubbhikkha-chātakaṃ, saddalā haritā bhūmi, esa kālo Mahā-muni.

Most exalted chief of the sages, at this transitional period from winter to summer, the weather is neither very cold nor very hot. At this time of harvesting and fair weather, food is abundant and there is no problem because of hunger and privation. The whole earth is emerald-tinted and verdant with tender Bermuda grass and this special period of the late winter-early summer is the most opportune time to travel to Kapilavatthu, the city of your birth.

This is how Ven. Kāḷudāyī addressed the Buddha with 60 beautifully composed verses of praise, persuading him to visit the royal city of Kapilavatthu.

Herein it should be noted especially that, although the actual total number of verses is 64, the commentaries and sub-commentaries count them as 60; thus there is a slight difference of four verses as in the case of the sub-commentary on the first book of the Abhidhamma, the Abundance of Meaning (Aṭṭha-sālinī, DsA) where defilements (kilesa) are counted in like manner, allowing such negligible numbers to go unheeded on the strength of the saying: Appakañ-hi ūnam-adhikaṃ vā gaṇanūpaḡaṃ na hoti, “such small shortage or excess should be neglected.”<sup>187</sup>

On such a presentation being made by Ven. Kāḷudāyī, the Buddha responded: “Friend Kāḷudāyī, why do you urge me to visit Kapilavatthu by presenting such words of praise and in such a sweet tone?” Ven. Kāḷudāyī answered: “Most Fortunate One, your old father, King Suddhodana, wishes so much to pay homage to you and the Saṅgha. I pray that you may do honour to the royal relatives by your visit.”

<sup>187</sup> [See the Light on the Essence of Meaning (Sārattha-dīpanī). In other words, the figures are rounded up or down].

Then the Buddha granted his request in these words: “Your request is granted, son, Kāḷudāyī. You may give intimation to the Saṅgha of my forthcoming visit to Kapilavatthu to do honour to the royal relatives, and they will perform the usual, formal rites as demanded by this occasion.” – “Very well, my lord,” replied Ven. Kāḷudāyī and he duly informed the monastics as he was bid. [457]

The Buddha left Veḷuvana monastery in Rājagaha for Kapilavatthu accompanied by 20,000 Arahats, which was made up of 10,000 Arahats who came from the good families of Aṅga and Magadha and 10,000 Arahats who came from the good families of Kapilavatthu. They set off on the waning moon of March (Phagguṇa), 528 BCE, travelling at the rate of one league per day and hoping to cover the distance of 60 leagues to Kapilavatthu within two months. Such a mode of travel is not too fast (aturita), and not too slow.

As the Buddha left for the royal city of Kapilavatthu adopting the not too fast (aturita) mode of travelling, Ven. Kāḷudāyī thought to himself: “I might go ahead to inform King Suddhodana of the Buddha's departure for Kapilavatthu,” and using his supernormal power (iddhi-vidhābhīṇṇa), he instantaneously appeared in the royal palace. King Suddhodana was moved with joy when he saw Ven. Kāḷudāyī and greeted him with words of warm welcome: “Welcome, beloved Kāḷudāyī, take your seat on the royal throne,” a seat befitting noble personalities, and he offered Ven. Kāḷudāyī a bowl of especially delicious food prepared for himself, filling the alms bowl to capacity.

When Ven. Kāḷudāyī showed signs of preparing for departure, King Suddhodana said: “Please take your meal on the throne.” Ven. Kāḷudāyī replied: “Noble King, I will take this food only in the presence of the Buddha.” Then the king inquired: “Beloved Kāḷudāyī, where is the Buddha?” Ven. Kāḷudāyī replied: “The Buddha, accompanied by 20,000 Arahats, is on his way to see you.” The king was extremely glad to hear this welcome news and said: “I pray thee then, take your meal which I have just offered in the palace and please do come every day to fetch food for the Buddha until his arrival here.” Ven. Kāḷudāyī gave his assent by keeping silent.

17a: Buddha's Journey to Kapilavatthu – 600

soft and hard food and handed it to Ven. Kāḷudāyī, saying: “Please offer it to the Buddha.” Ven. Kāḷudāyī sent up the bowl into the air ahead of him, and rising up himself, he made his way through the air while the officials and courtiers were looking on. He then made his offering of the alms bowl to the Buddha who partook of the meal brought thus by Kāḷudāyī from his royal father. Throughout the whole journey, Ven. Kāḷudāyī went every day to the king's palace and brought food, offered by the king, for the Buddha.

Ven. Kāḷudāyī announced every day after his meal at the golden palace of Kapilavatthu, saying: “The Buddha has covered this much of the journey today.” With this preface, he told the whole royal family about the glorious attributes of the Buddha. He did this with the object of sowing the seed of devoted faith in the hearts of his royal relatives even before they got the chance of seeing him.

It is this reason that that Buddha, at a subsequent confirmation ceremony, said: Etad-aggam, bhikkhave, mama sāvakaṇaṃ bhikkhūnaṃ kulappasādakānaṃ yad-idaṃ Kāḷudāyī, “monastics, Kāḷudāyī excels others in the matter of promoting faith and devotion of the royal relatives towards me.” [See chapter 43.32 for more on Ven. Kāḷudāyī.]

This was how the Buddha and 20,000 Arahats arrived at the city of Kapilavatthu, safe and sound, in two months' time, on the first waxing moon of May (Vesākha) in the year 528 BCE after covering a distance of 60 leagues by adopting the not too fast (aturita) method of travelling one league per day. [458]

Buddha's Display of the Twin Miracle

All the members of the Sakyan clan headed by King Suddhodana gathered together to consider how they should pay respect to the Buddha, their noble blood relative, on his arrival at the city of Kapilavatthu. The first item on the agenda was to consider the question of accommodation for the Buddha, and they eventually came to the unanimous decision that the Park of the Sakyan Prince Nigrodha was delightful and the most suitable place because it was replete with every convenience, such as shady trees, sources of water, proximity to the town, with an adequate and easy means of communication, and above all, it was secluded. These were the five necessary provisions which would please Buddhas. As such, they reserved the Park for the accommodation of the Buddha. When all the preparations had been made, they left in the following order, each holding flowers to welcome the Buddha.

17a: Buddha's Journey to Kapilavatthu – 601

1. Fully dressed boys and girls, sons and daughters of the common town people, took the lead in the procession.
2. They were followed by the princes and princesses in their full ceremonial dresses.
3. The rest of the Sakyan clan came next, holding offerings of flowers and aromatic powder, which they took for the Buddha.

The long procession of welcome headed for the Nigrodha Park. On arrival at the Nigrodha Park accompanied by 20,000 Arahats, the Buddha seated himself on the Dhamma throne, prepared and kept in readiness for him.

Being stern and haughty through pride of birth, the Sakyan family members thought to themselves: "Prince Siddhattha is very junior to us in respect of age, being our younger brother, nephew, son or grandson," so they told the young princes: "You, young folks, may pay homage. As for us, we will sit behind you."

On seeing this, the Buddha realized the inner feeling and strong pride of birth of the Sakyans and thus considered and decided: "My haughty relatives have grown old in years profitlessly and thus do not make reverence to me. My conceited relatives are totally ignorant of the real nature of a Self-Awakened Buddha; the might and glory of Buddhas. They do not know such is the nature of a Self-Awakened One, and such is the might and glory of the Buddhas."

Now I will let them know the real might and glory of a Buddha by the demonstration of the twin miracle, which involves simultaneous streaming forth of water and fire from various parts of my body, and, at the same time, I will create a walk in the sky, extending to the 10,000 world-element. On which I shall walk to and fro, pouring down the Dhamma rain on those beings who are gathered here according to the varying degrees of their inner disposition." For this decision of the Buddha, all the Devas and Brahmas in the 10,000 world-element proclaimed instantly: Well done! Well done! in praise of the exalted Buddha.

Immediately after the thought and decision, the Buddha attained the fourth absorption which had white colour (odāta-kasiṇa) as its object of meditation. And arising therefrom, he willed that: "The 10,000 world-element be illuminated," and the 10,000 world-element became illuminated instantly, much to the delight of humans, Devas and Brahmas. While they were thus exulting, the Buddha went up into the sky through supernormal power which was derived from the fourth absorption attainment and demonstrated the twin miracle of streaming alternately water and fire from twelve different parts of the body: 1) upward and downward; 2) front and back of the body; 3) left and right eyes; 4) ears; 5) nose; 6) shoulders; 7) hands; 8) sides of the body; 9) legs; 10) fingers and toes and spaces in between them; 11) every hair of the body; 12) every pore of hair of his body.

The twin miracle of fire-water, in pairs, springing from those parts or limbs of the body and producing alternately different patterns, was a matter for endless praise and admiration and it looked as if showers of particles from the soles of the Buddha were scattered on the heads of the Sakyan royalty – a strange and wonderful spectacle witnessed by humans, Devas and Brahmas. [459]

Third Obeisance by King Suddhodana

When King Suddhodana saw this strange and awesome spectacle of the twin miracle, he bowed solemnly and addressed the Buddha: “Glorious, exalted son, on the day of your birth, as I tried to raise the clasped hands towards the recluse Kāḷadevila so as to show him respect, I saw your pair of feet being raised up and placed firmly on the head of the recluse. That was the occasion when I made obeisance to you for the first time. And on the day of performing the Ploughing Ceremony, we kept you in an excellent spot under the cool shade of a rose-apple tree which protected you without changing position with the passage of time. That was when I paid homage at your feet for the second time. Now that I have witnessed the never-before seen extraordinarily strange spectacle of the twin miracle, I bow at your feet in homage for the third time.”

When his royal father, King Suddhodana, made obeisance to the Buddha, all the members of the royal family without exception could not help but pay homage to him too.

Teaching the Dhamma on the Jewelled Walk

After subduing the pride of the royal relatives with the demonstration of the twin miracle in the sky and after duly considering the workings of their mind, the Buddha desired to teach them the Dhamma according to their mental dispositions, while he walked to and fro, on the Jewelled Walk he had created, which was finished with all kinds of gems, and extended from east to west, even beyond the 10,000 world-element.

17a: Buddha's Journey to Kapilavatthu – 603

The following is a brief description of the magnitude of the walk. With this universe as the centre, 10,000 Meru mountains belonging to the 10,000 world-element formed the mainstay of the entire structure of the walk and the whole file of posts was made to shine golden yellow like golden posts. Above this was created the clean and broad surface of the Jewelled Walk. The eastern perimeter of the walk rested on the eastern edge of the eastern-most universe, and in the same way the western perimeter rested on the edge of the western-most universe.

The bordering surfaces on either side of the walk were golden in colour. The middle portion of the entire walk was filled with earth of rubies, and the rafters, beams, purloins were finished with various kinds of shining gems. The roofing was of gold and the balusters lining the walk were of gold. Ruby and pearl grains were spread like sand on the entire surface of the structure. The walk resembled sun rising up and lighting all ten directions.

The Buddha, with peerless grace and glory which was the characteristic of Self-Awakened Buddhas, paced slowly up and down the walk. The Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element gathered together bringing Mandāra flowers, Paduma lilies and flowers of the Indian Coral tree (Erythrina indica) and scattering them on the walk, made their offerings and homage.

As regards the Indian Coral tree, it should be mentioned here that while the 33 virtuous youths headed by the youthful Māgha were performing meritorious deeds in the human world, they planted such a tree so that people might take shelter with ease and comfort. As a result of that good deed, an Indian Coral tree appeared in the Tāvātimsa Realm where they were reborn. The sweet fragrance of its seasonal flowers permeated the whole of the 10,000 leagues of that celestial world.

As the Buddha walked to and fro on the Jewelled Walk, some celestial beings paid homage from their abodes, while others, out of joy, gathered at various places. All those in the world of humans, Devas and Brahmas, together with Nāgas, Garuḷas and Kinnaras joyously worshipped the Buddha who was walking to and fro on the Jewelled Walk, looking like a moon at full waxing. With the exception of the unconscious (asaññasatta) Brahmas and the formless (ārūpa) Brahmas, all the Brahmas in the fifteen form realms, in their immaculately white garments, paid homage with clasped hands uttering such words of [460] praise as: “Victor over the five kinds of death (māra), promoter of the well-being of all beings, protector of the interests of all beings, one who has compassion for all beings.” Flowers of brown, yellow, red, white, and dark-green colour, mixed with powdered sandal wood were thrown into the air in worship. Like pennants flown in the sky, they also briskly waved their scarves as an act of worship.

There were 20 verses uttered by the Brahmas in praise of the Buddha. For particulars, readers may refer to the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddhavaṃsa).

17b: The Chronicles of the Buddhas

The Arrival of Ven. Sāriputta

After the demonstration of the twin miracle and the creation of the Jewelled Walk, while Devas and Brahmas were paying homage to the Buddha as he walked to and fro on the walk, Ven. Sāriputta and his 500 disciples were residing on the slopes of Mount Gijjhakūṭa in Rājagaha. Ven. Sāriputta, saw, through his divine eye (dibba-cakkhu-abhiññā) the Buddha taking his walk on the Jewelled Walk in the sky above the city of Kapilavatthu. He thought of approaching the Buddha immediately and supplicating him to reveal in full the life story of a Bodhisatta, his many existences and stages of development before his last birth and Awakening.

He immediately assembled around him the 500 co-resident Arahats and said: “Venerable sirs, the exalted Buddha is performing the twin miracle together with the demonstration of the supernatural power of unveiling the world (loka-vivaraṇa-abhiññā) which is to be admired and revered by the whole world. We will go to see the demonstration of these miraculous powers as well so as to pay homage to him. Come, venerable sirs, we will all go to the Buddha and request him to recount the course of practices for Awakening undertaken in the past as a Bodhisatta so as to dispel any doubt we may have regarding this matter.”

With regard to the words of Ven. Sāriputta: “So as to dispel any doubt, (kaṅkham vinodayissāma),” it might be asked: “Why should Ven. Sāriputta say so, as it is a fact that Arahats who have rid themselves of all pollutants (āsava) are free from doubts anyway?” The answer is: Sixteen forms of doubt (vicikicchā) are completely eradicated at the stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga). Therefore Arahats no longer entertain any doubt about the Buddha, Dhamma and Saṅgha or about their own past, present or future lives.

The doubt (kaṅkhā) mentioned here by Ven. Sāriputta, does not refer to the mental concomitant (vicikicchā). He means here the lack of knowledge in full about the previous existences of the Bodhisattas who had become Awakened Buddhas during the past four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, details concerning the aeon in which they made their appearances, their names, clans, families, the order of their appearance, and the duration of their Dispensations, etc. To state further, Ven. Sāriputta wanted to request the Buddha for an account of the whole lineage, clan, family, tradition, etc., i.e., the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) which could be given only by a Buddha; it is the province of a Buddha only, not of a Paccekabuddha, nor of a disciple. Not being within his province, Ven. Sāriputta said: “Let us dispel the doubt by approaching the Buddha with this request.”

On being urged thus by Ven. Sāriputta, the 500 co-resident Arahats quickly gathered round him, carrying robes and alms bowls in readiness. Then Ven. Sāriputta, accompanied by the 500 Arahats, travelled through the air by means of their supernatural psychic powers (iddhi-vidhābhiñña) and, upon arrival, paid homage to the Buddha who was still pacing up and down the Jewelled Walk. The 500 Arahats also paid homage in silence without coughing or sneezing but with deep veneration. Along with Ven. Sāriputta were Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, Ven. Mahā Kassapa, etc., who also remained in the sky paying respects to the Buddha.

Buddha’s Exposition of His Own Attributes

As the Buddha was aware of the intense enthusiasm and devotional faith springing up in the 500 Arahats headed by Ven. Sāriputta, he proceeded to expound his own attributes and attainments, beginning with the verse:

*Cattāro te asaṅkheyyā, koṭi yesaṃ na nāyati, satta-kāyo ca ākāso, cakka-vāḷā canantakā,
Buddha-ñāṇaṃ appameyyaṃ, na sakkā ete vijānitum.*

Dear son, Sāriputta, there are four immensities which are innumerable, incalculable; their beginning and the end are unknowable, unfathomable. They are: 1) beings in general; 2) wide open spaces; 3) universes; 4) and the omniscience (sabbaññutā-ñāṇa) of Fully-Awakened Buddhas.

At this time, the minds of Devas and humans were full of wonder of the Buddha’s miraculous creation. As if he were urging the Devas and humans: “There are still things that excel the wonderful miracles I have just created. Listen also to the revelation of those exceedingly wonderful miracles,” the Buddha went on to elaborate.

Kim-etaṃ acchariyaṃ loke, yaṃ me iddhi-vikubbanāṃ, aññe bahū acchariyā, abbhutā loma-haṃsanā.

Sāriputta, besides the foregoing miraculous creations, there are many exceedingly wonderful things which have never occurred before, and which, when revealed, will surely cause your hair to stand on end. To recount them briefly:

Yadāhaṃ Tusite kāye, Santusito nāmaḥaṃ tadā, dasa-sahassī samāgamma, yācanti pañjalī mamaṃ.

After my death as King Vessantara, having fulfilled the perfections (pāramī), charity (cāga) and good conduct (cariyā), while I was waiting for the time for his becoming a Buddha as a celestial being named Santusita, enjoying the divine bliss in the Tusita Deva realm for 576,000,000 years reckoned in terms of human life, Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element gathered in my presence and made the supplication:

Kālo kho te Mahā-vīra, uppajja mātu-kucchiyaṃ, sadevakaṃ tārayanto, bujjhassu amataṃ padaṃ.

Great Hero, freed from all suffering, you have already fulfilled the ten perfections extended into 30 categories,<sup>188</sup> the three kinds of practice<sup>189</sup> and the ten kinds of charity,<sup>190</sup> not with the desire to gain the bliss of a Wheel-turning Monarch, or of a Sakka, the ruler of Devas, or of Māras or of Brahmas; you fulfilled these perfections aspiring only to become a Buddha in order to liberate the multitude of sentient beings. Great Hero, freed from all suffering, the propitious time you have longed for to become a Buddha has come! Great Hero, the time is now ripe for you to become an omniscient Buddha. May you take conception in the womb of the royal mother Māyā. Rescue all beings, including Devas, from the dangerous currents of Saṃsāra. May you realize the deathless Nibbāna.”

Thus they made their supplication. I did not, however readily give my consent to their supplication. I first made five great investigations as following: 1) The appropriate time for the appearance of a Buddha; 2) the appropriate island continent for the appearance of a Buddha; 3) the appropriate country for the appearance of a Buddha; 4) the clan or family into which the Bodhisatta would be reborn; and 5) the span of life of the Bodhisatta.

dasa-sahassī-loka-dhātu, kampittha dharaṇī tadā.*

I gave my consent only after making these five great investigations: “My friends, Devas and Brahmas, the time is indeed ripe for me to become a Buddha as you have said.” Having lived the full life-term in the Tusita realm, I entered the womb of my royal mother, Mahā Māyā, a descendant of the unbroken line of the Sakyan rulers.

Yadāhaṃ mātu-kucchito, sampajāno va nikkhamiṃ, sādhukāraṃ pavattenti, dasa-sahassī pakampatha.

As I took conception in the womb of my mother with mindfulness and comprehension, the 10,000 world-element trembled and quaked. [462] Without forsaking mindfulness and comprehension, I came out of my mother’s womb, standing erect, with arms and legs stretched straight, like a monastic descending from the Dhamma throne or a man coming down the stairway at the entrance of a relic shrine (stūpa), without any trace of unwholesome filth besmearing my body. At that time also, the 10,000 world-element trembled and quaked as if to cheer the occasion.

This was on Friday, the full moon of May (Vesākha), in the year 563 BCE.

Okkantim me samo natthi, jātito abhinikkhame, sambodhiyaṃ ahaṃ seṭṭho, Dhamma-cakkappavattane.

My son, Sāriputta, there is none to equal me as a Bodhisatta, in the manner of taking conception and of emerging from the mother’s womb. Therefore, in the matter of attainment of the path-knowledge of an Arahat (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa), there is none my equal. As regards teaching-knowledge (desanā-ñāṇa) also, I am supreme, from when I set rolling the Dhamma Wheel.”

At the moment of descending into the mother’s womb, during ten months in the mother’s womb, and at the moment of birth, on all the three occasions, he remained mindful with full comprehension; hence he made such an utterance.

Again the path-knowledge of an Arahat (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) of certain disciples results in the Arahat fruition (Arahatta-phala-ñāṇa) only; that of some disciples gives rise to the three understandings (vijjā) only; and that of some others produces six forms of supernormal power (abhiññā); whereas some disciples achieve analytic knowledge (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa) through the Arahat path (Arahatta-magga), others gain only the knowledge of a disciple (sāvaka-pāramī-ñāṇa); and Paccekabuddhas attain only Independent Buddha knowledge (Pacceka-bodhi-ñāṇa) for their achievement of the Arahat path. The Arahat path of all Buddhas, however, brings the advantage of being instantaneously accomplished in all the attributes of Fully-Awakened Ones.

17b: The Chronicles of the Buddhas – 609

Thus the Buddha gave an exhaustive exposition of his own attributes. At that time, there occurred a violent earthquake which was similar to that as at the moment of taking conception. The 10,000 world-element trembled and quaked in the following six modes: 1) The earth's surface rose in the east and sank in the west; 2) it rose in the west and sank in the east; 3) it rose in the north and sank in the south; 4) it rose in the south and sank in the north; 5) it rose in the centre and sank along the circumference; and 6) it rose along the circumference and sank in the centre. A great expanse of light, beyond the power of Devas and Brahmas, was shining with unsurpassed brilliance.

Devas and Brahmas, witnessing the awesome phenomena and also coming to know from the Buddha's teaching that these phenomena only occurred on such occasions as the taking conception of the Bodhisatta, recited a verse in praise thereof:

Aho acchariyam loke, Buddhānam guṇa-mahantatā, dasa-sahassī-loka-dhātu, chappakāraṃ pakampatha, obhāso ca mahā āsi, accheraṃ loma-hamsanam.

Friends, Devas and Brahmas, the glories and attributes of Buddhas have caused earth tremors to rock the 10,000 world-element and the surface of the earth rises and falls in alternating directions: east-west, north-south, the centre and at the edges. A broad ray of light surpassing the power of the Devas and Brahmas has also illuminated these worlds. The wonder of this awesome phenomenon has made us snap our fingers in awe and praise and our hairs to stand on end. Oh, the greatness of the many attributes of the Buddha indeed warrants us snapping our fingers in wonder and admiration.

At that time, the Buddha was displaying the twin miracle and walking to and fro on the Jewelled Walk by means of his psychic power. And while he was thus pacing to and fro on the walk, he was expounding the Dhamma like a mighty lion king roaring, seated on a slab of red orpiment, like a thundering sky, like a man swimming across the river of the sky. With a voice of eight features, in various ways and minute details, he taught the discourse of the four noble truths leading to seeing the salient characteristics of impermanence, suffering and non-self.

Although the Jewelled Walk covered the whole length of the 10,000 worlds, the Buddha walked to one end of it quickly and then turned back from it as if he was making [463] the walk on a path measuring only four cubits. He actually walked on the Jewelled Walk from end to end, not turning round without reaching the end.

Here it might be asked: Did the Buddha, through his power, cause the shortening of such an immensely long walk or did he create his own body to a size corresponding to that of the walk? That is, was it a work of supernormal psychic power (iddhi-visaya)? No, it is not a creation by means of supernormal psychic power (iddhi-visaya). The power possessed by the omniscient one (Buddha-visaya) is inconceivable, beyond human imagination. It being so, the Buddha could walk to and fro on the Jewelled Walk as he would do on a walk measuring four cubits.

It was due to this inconceivable power of the Buddhas that the whole spectacle could be witnessed right from the Akaniṭṭha realm to the Avīci plane of miseries without any obstruction whatsoever. All the world-elements involved became as a vast open plain, adjoining one another uninterrupted, so that humans could see Devas and Brahmas and vice versa. They all could see the Buddha walking to and fro on the long walk as they would see him walking on a simple ordinary walk. The Buddha taught as he walked, and having complete mastery over the mind (cittissariya), he was absorbed in fruition attainment (phala-samāpatti) during the infinitesimal fraction of time intervals while the audience was saying: Sādhu, Sādhu.

Ven. Sāriputta's Request

Ven. Sāriputta, after paying homage to the Buddha who was walking to and fro with peerless grace, teaching the discourse of the four noble truths to the gathering of humans, Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element to his heart's content, thought to himself: "Such a united gathering of humans, Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element is an unprecedented one; it should be an occasion for a great Dhamma exposition. A discourse on the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) especially would be greatly beneficial, promoting faith and devotion towards the Buddha. It would be well if I should request the Buddha for an exposition of his life story and the perfections he had fulfilled from the time of receiving the definite prophecy of becoming a Buddha.” He then approached the Buddha, and with his robe over the left shoulder and his hands raised, he made this request in three verses beginning with: Kīdiso te mahā-vira, etc., reproduced below to expound the full discourse on the Chronicles of the Buddhas together with an account of the practices, which had been cultivated in the past.

*Kīdiso te Mahā-vīra, abhinīhāro naruttama,
kamhi kāle tayā dhīra, patthitā Bodhim-uttamā.*

Homage to the Great Hero, who has exercised the four great exertions (sammappadhāna), one who is nobler than men, superior to Devas and excels the Brahmas, the crown of the three worlds! In what world-cycle and in what aeon, did you aspire for and resolve to attain Perfect Self-Awakening which excels Independent and disciple Awakening?

Dānaṃ sīlañ-ca nekkhammaṃ, paññā-vīriyañ-ca kīdisaṃ, khanti-saccam-adhiṭṭhānaṃ, mettupekkhā ca kīdisā.

Homage to the exalted, omniscient one, the Lord of the Three Worlds; how should we understand and regard your perfections, such as the perfection of generosity, morality, renunciation, wisdom and energy? How should we understand and regard [464] your perfections of forbearance, truthfulness, resolution, loving-kindness and equanimity?

Dasa pāramī tayā dhīra, kīdisī loka-nāyaka, kathaṃ upapāramī puññā, paramattha-pāramī kathaṃ.

Homage to the exalted, omniscient one, the Lord of the Three Worlds; may you enlighten us as to how you have fulfilled these perfections, how you have acquired higher and higher stages of these perfections and attained full maturity thereof? Likewise, with the ten higher perfections (upapāramī) and the ten supreme perfections (paramattha-pāramī) in what way, in what manner have you cultivated them to acquire their maturity at the higher level of development?

With regard to the perfection of generosity (dāna-pāramī), the gift of external property is an ordinary perfection of generosity (dāna-pāramī); the gift of one’s own limbs, big and small is a higher perfection of generosity (dāna-upapāramī); the gift of life is a supreme perfection of generosity (dāna-paramattha-pāramī).

The same principle of classification applies to the nine other perfections. Thus, observance of morality at the sacrifice of external property is an ordinary perfection of morality (sīla-pāramī); observance of morality regardless of loss of one's limbs is a higher perfection of morality (sīla-upapāramī); and observance of morality regardless of losing one's own life is a supreme perfection of morality (sīla-paramattha-pāramī). This is how they should be differentiated and noted. [See the Further Explanations for more information on these matters.]

For innumerable existences, the Bodhisatta had fulfilled generosity and other perfections, of which the following are of special interest:

1. When he was born as a wise hare, he mistook Sakka, who was in the guise of a Brahmin, as a genuine Brahmin going round collecting alms. So he caused a blazing bonfire to be made and offered himself by jumping into it. Such generosity is a supreme perfection of generosity (Vidhura-pañḍita-jātaka, Ja 545).
2. When he was born as Nāga King Saṅkha-pāla, he endured the agony of wounds, which were caused by a ruthless attack by sixteen hunters with spears at eight places on his body, after being impaled on a stake. Without showing resentment, he offered his life and maintained the observance of his precepts. Such morality comes under the category of a supreme perfection of morality (Saṅkha-pāla-jātaka, Ja 524).
3. When he was King Cūḷa Sutasoma, he abdicated the throne of the country of Sudassana, ancient Bārāṇasī, without fear of danger to his life and without attachment to the luxury of kingship and abnegated himself. Such an act of renunciation is called a supreme perfection of renunciation (Cūḷa-sutasoma-jātaka, Ja 525).
4. When he was born as a wise man by the name of Senaka, he saved the life of a Brahmin by revealing, as if he had seen with his eyes, the presence of a cobra in the leather bag which contained the Brahmin's food. Such an exhibition of wisdom, which had saved the life of the owner of the leather bag, comes under the category of a supreme perfection of wisdom (Sattu-bhastā-jātaka, Ja 402).

5. When he was born as a prince, named Janaka, his undaunted effort to swim across the ocean in the face of odds and without despair, while his fellow travellers were perishing and meeting with destruction, reflects Prince Janaka's great perseverance. Such a remarkable persevering effort belongs to the category of a supreme perfection of energy (Mahā-janaka-jātaka, Ja 539).
6. When he was a recluse, named Khantivādī, King Kalābu of the country of Kāsi, cut off his hands and feet with a sharp axe. He was unmoved and bore the suffering as though he were a piece of log that lacked sensation and consciousness. He also showed no resentment to the king. Such an act of forbearance comes under the category of a supreme perfection of forbearance (Khantivādī-jātaka, Ja 313). [465].
7. When he was King Mahā Sutasoma, he gave his word of honour: "I will certainly return tomorrow," to the cannibal Porisāda. He stood by his word, regardless of his own life, thereby saving the lives of 101 kings. Such a righteous and truthful vocal deed (vāci-sacca) comes under the category of a supreme perfection of truth (Mahā-suta-soma-jātaka, Ja 537).
8. When as a Bodhisatta Prince Temiya he pretended to be deaf and mute and persisted with this practice at the risk of his life, up to the time of his renunciation. Such an act of resolution comes under the category of a supreme perfection of resolution (Mūga-pakkha-jātaka, Ja 538).
9. When he was a recluse by the name of Suvaṇṇasāma, he cultivated loving-kindness (mettā) at the risk of his life. Such an act of loving-kindness comes under the category of a supreme perfection of loving-kindness (Sāma-jātaka, Ja 540).
10. When he was an ascetic practicing austerities, he did not allow himself to be swayed either by the perverted, corrupted demeanour of young villagers or by the various deeds of reverence and homage done by the wise, thereby safe-guarding himself entirely from ill-will and greed. Such equanimous attitude of the Bodhisatta exemplifies a supreme perfection of equanimity (Loma-hamsa-jātaka, Ja 94).

For full particulars of this category of supreme perfection (paramattha-pāramī), reference may be made to Basket of Conduct (Cariyā-piṭaka) commentary and other relevant Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentaries.

On such a supplication being made by Ven. Sāriputta, the Buddha expounded two verses as if he was pouring the elixir of deathlessness to keep the minds of all sentient beings in peace, urging them: First, to listen with reverent attention to the discourse on the Chronicles of the Buddhas which will cause joy and gladness to the audience of Devas and humans, eradicate the pricking sorrow in their disturbed minds and letting them achieve various attainments, and second, to strive earnestly to follow and practice the noble path to becoming a Buddha which will destroy all forms of pride and vanity, which will remove various kinds of grief and sorrow, and which will save beings from the cycle of rebirths and extinguish all suffering.

Then, in order to encourage the assembled Devas and humans to become enthusiastic to aspire after Perfect Self-Awakening, the Buddha gave a discourse on the Chronicles of the Buddhas, adorned with 951 verses beginning with:

*Kappe ca sata-sahasse, caturo ca asaṅkhiye,
Amarāṃ nāma nagaraṃ, dassaneyyaṃ manoramāṃ.*

The discourse was well received and highly appreciated by the great audience of Devas and humans. By the end of the discourse on the Chronicles of the Buddhas, 100,000 billion humans, Devas and Brahmas became Arahats, having eliminated all traces of the pollutants (āsava); and innumerable beings became established in the lower stages of the path.

Here, it should be noted that there are 951 verses which deal wholly with the Chronicles of the Buddhas. In the Introduction (Nidāna-kathā), there are 81 verses comprising a mixture of words of the elders who participated in the Council (Saṅgīti-kāraṇa), words of Ven. Sāriputta and those of the Buddha; and 38 verses in the Miscellaneous (Pakiṇṇaka) section and the Distribution of the Relics (Dhātu-bhājaniya-kathā), being words of the elders who participated in the Council, thus totalling 1,070 verses in the whole Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa). [466]

The Chronicle of Gotama Buddha in Verse

We have so far described the name, clan, family, etc., of the 24 Buddhas, from Buddha Dīpaṅkara to Buddha Kassapa in chapter IX as mentioned in the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-varṇsa) and relevant commentaries in chronological order.

For the Chronicle of Gotama Buddha, which we are dealing with presently, also an attempt has been made to compile it as complete as possible on the basis of the Chronicles of the Buddhas and its commentary, as well as relevant extracts from other Pāḷi texts and commentaries.

Concerning this Chronicle of Gotama Buddha, the learned readers may wish to read the chronology that deals exclusively with the Buddha Gotama as he originally delivered it. We will therefore render those 24 verses in plain English.

Buddha Gotama on the request made by Ven. Sāriputta, having expounded exhaustively the part of the Chronicles of the Buddhas concerning the 24 Buddhas from Dīpaṅkara to Kassapa, pouring forth the discourse like the sky river overflowing, proceeded to expound the facts concerning himself, from the Jewelled Walk in the sky, in 24 verses as follows:

The First Great Assembly of the Dhamma Teaching

1. Aham-etarahi Sambuddho, Gotamo Sakya-vaḍḍhano, padhānaṃ padahitvāna, patto Sambodhim-uttamaṃ.

Dear son, Sāriputta, I, a descendent of the Gotama lineage which has made the Sakya royalty thrive, after six years of energetic effort at meditation (padhāna) attained the exalted state of omniscience.

2. Brahmunā yācito santo, Dhamma-cakkaṃ pavattayim, aṭṭhārasannaṃ koṭṭinaṃ, paṭṭhamābhisamayo ahu.

Dear son, Sāriputta, at the request of Brahma Sahampati in the eighth week after my Awakening, I had delivered the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse in the Deer Park at Isipatana, Bārāṇasī. On that occasion, for the first time 180 million Brahmas, who were headed by Ven. Koṇḍañña realised the four noble truths and achieved liberation.

The Second Great Assembly of the Dhamma Teaching

3. Tato parañ-ca desente, nara-deva-samāgame, gaṇanāya na vattabbo, dutiyābhisamayo ahu.

Dear son, Sāriputta, subsequent to my teaching of the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse, when I delivered the discourse on the Blessings (Maṅgala-sutta, Snp 2.4), at the assembly of Devas and humans who were debating the question on what constitutes a blessing (maṅgala), it was the second occasion of innumerable humans, Devas and Brahmas who came to realize the four noble truths and achieved liberation.

This second great occasion of Dhamma teaching will take place subsequent to the discourse on the Chronicles of the Buddhas. This also applies to the verses that follow. [467]

The Third Great Assembly of the Dhamma Teaching

4. Idhevāhaṃ etarahi, ovaḍiṃ mama atrajaṃ, gaṇanāya na vattabbo, tatiyābhisamayo ahu.

Thirteen years after my becoming a Buddha, I will exhort my son, the young monastic Rāhula, by delivering the discourse of the Short Discourse giving Advice to Rāhula (Cūḷa-rāhulovāda, MN 147) in the Blindman's Grove (Andhavana) at Sāvattihī. At that time also, innumerable humans, Devas and Brahmas will come to realize the four noble truths and achieve liberation.

The First Occasion of the Disciples' Meeting

5. Ekosi sannipāto me, sāvakānaṃ mahesinaṃ, aḍḍha-teḷasa-satānaṃ, bhikkhūnāsi samāgamo.

Dear son, Sāriputta, a congregation of disciples had been held on the last full moon day of February (Māgha) for the first time; it was an assemblage of 1,250 monastic Arahats who had done away with the pollutants (āsava).

This refers to the Buddha's teaching of the Advisory Rules (Ovāda-Pātimokkha), instructions on the obligation of a monastic at the congregation of disciples, characterised by the four features.<sup>191</sup> It was the day on which Ven. Sāriputta gained Awakening.

Services Rendered by the Buddha

6. Virocamāno vimalo, bhikkhu-saṅghassa majjhago, dadāmi patthitaṃ sabbam, maṇīva sabba-kāmado.

Dear son, Sāriputta, also like the previous Buddhas, being replete with the infinite grace characteristic of the Buddhas, and free from the taints of the defilements (kilesa), stand becomingly in the midst of the Saṅgha and, like the wish-fulfilling (cintāmaṇi) ruby capable of fulfilling every wish, have been fulfilling the wishes of humans, Devas and Brahmas for special mundane and supermundane happiness.

7. Phalam-ākaṅkhamānānaṃ, bhavacchanda-jahesinaṃ, catu-saccaṃ pakāsemi, anukampāya pāṇinaṃ.

Dear son, Sāriputta, for the benefit of humans, Devas and Brahmas who wish to attain the four fruition stages of the path and do away with attachment to sensuous existence, I have, out of compassion, expounded the four noble truths to enable them achieve their wish.

This is an instance of how Buddha brings about the benefit of all beings by way of expounding the four noble truths.

8. Dasa-vīsa-sahassānaṃ, dhammābhisamayo ahu, eka-dvinnāṃ abhisamayo, gaṇanāto asaṅkhiyo. [468]

Dear son, Sāriputta, as the result of such expositions of the four noble truths sentient beings, numbering 10,000 after one session; or 20,000 after another, have become emancipated. In other instances of beings gaining freedom in twos or threes, the number is incalculable.

9. Vitthārikaṃ bāhu-jaññaṃ, iddhaṃ phūtaṃ suphullitaṃ, idha mayhaṃ Sakyamunino, Sāsanaṃ suvisodhitaṃ.

Dear son, Sāriputta I am a descendent of Sakyan royal family, I have renounced the world to become a recluse and have taught the Dhamma. This teaching of mine, the Dispensation (Sāsana), shall spread in the three worlds of humans, Devas and Brahmas and many beings discerning it clearly shall thrive exceedingly, pure and radiant.

10. Anāsavā vīta-rāgā, santa-cittā samāhitā, bhikkhūneka-satā sabbe, parivārenti maṃ sadā.

Dear son, Sāriputta, I am at all times surrounded by a great number of monastics who are free from the pollutants (āsava), having given up passion (rāga), and who with tranquilised mind possess serene concentration like an oil lamp burning steadily in the still air.

11. Idāni ye etarahi, jahanti mānusaṃ bhavaṃ, appatta-mānasā sekhā, te bhikkhū viññu-garahitā.

Dear son, Sāriputta, there are certain monastics who, even in my life time, have to depart life as mere trainees (sekkha) without having become an Arahat. They are reproached by the wise.

12. Ariyañ-ca santhomayantā, sadā Dhamma-ratā janā, bujjhissanti satimanto, Saṃsāra-saritaṃ gatā.

Dear son, Sāriputta, those mindful people, who extol the virtues of the noble eightfold path and take delight in the Dhamma day and night, will be able to cross the ocean of Saṃsāra within a limited number of existences and gain emancipation through realisation of the four noble truths.

Particulars of Buddha Gotama

13. Nagaraṃ Kapilavatthu me, rājā Suddhodano pitā, mayhaṃ janettikā mātā Māyā Devī ti vuccati.

Dear son, Sāriputta, my place of birth is Kapilavatthu, my father is King Suddhodana and my royal mother is Māyā Devī.

14. Ekūna-tiṃsa-vassāni, agāraṃ ajjhahaṃ vasiṃ, Ramma Suramma Subhako, tayo pāsādam-uttamā. [469]

Dear son, Sāriputta, I had been a ruler of the Kapilavatthu country for fully 29 years, residing in three palaces: Ramma, the winter palace with nine-tiered spire; Suramma, the summer palace with five tiers, and Subha, the seven-tiered palace for the rainy season.

15. Cattārīsa-sahassāni, nāriyo samalaṅkatā, Bhaddakañcanā nāma nārī, Rāhulo nāma atrajo.

Dear son, Sāriputta, during the period of my reign, there used to be 40,000 well ornamented and beautified female attendants; my Chief Queen was Bhaddā Kañcanā and my son was called Rāhula.

16. Nimitte caturo disvā, assayānena nikkhamiṃ, chabbassaṃ padhāna-cāraṃ, acarim dukkaraṃ ahami.

Dear son, Sāriputta, having seen the four great omens of an old man, a sick man, a dead man and a recluse, I went forth riding my horse Kanthaka. In the remote forest of Uruvelā, I spent six years practising severe austerities (dukkara-cariyā) that were beyond the capability of ordinary persons.

17. Bārāṇasiyaṃ Isipatane, Cakkaṃ pavattitaṃ mayā, ahaṃ Gotama-sambuddho, saraṇaṃ sabba-pāṇinam.

Dear son, Sāriputta, in the Deer Park at Isipatana, near Bārāṇasī, I had turned the Dhamma Wheel; indeed I have become the refuge of all beings, the Perfectly Awakened Buddha with the family name of Gotama.

*18. Kolito Upatisso ca, dve bhikkhū agga-sāvakā, Ānando nāmuṇḍhāko, santikāvacarō mama,
Khemā Uppalavaṇṇā ca, bhikkhunī agga-sāvikā.*

Dear son, Sāriputta, my chief disciples are the pair of monastics, Kolita or Moggallāna and Upatissa or Sāriputta; my permanent monastic attendant, who is always close at hand for more than 20 years to attend to my needs, is Ānanda. The female chief disciples are the pair of female monastics, the elders Khemā and Uppalavaṇṇā.

19. Citto Hatthāḷavako ca, aggupaṭṭhākupāsakā, Nandamātā ca Uttarā, aggupaṭṭhikupāsikā.

Dear son, Sāriputta, noble lay devotees rendering me close service are Citta, a wealthy householder residing at Macchikāsaṇḍa in the Kosala country, and Hattha Āḷavaka, the pious son of King Āḷavī of Āḷavī country; female [470] attendants closely attending upon me are the female devotee Nandamātā, a Non-returner (Anāgāmī) resident of Veḷukaṇḍaka, a town in Dakkhinagiri province near Rājagaha and the noble lay devotee Khujjuttarā, a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna), and bearer of the Three Baskets (Piṭaka), possessor of the title of pre-eminence (etad-agga) who was conceived in the womb of a maid servant of a rich man, Ghosaka of Kosambī, and who became, when she came of age, a female attendant of Queen Sāmāvatī.

20. Ahaṃ Assattha-mūlamhi, patto Sambodhim-uttamaṃ, byāmapabhā sadā mayhaṃ, soḷasa-hattham-uggatā.

Dear son, Sāriputta, I attained the knowledge of the Arahat path (Arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) and achieved omniscience, at the foot of the 100 cubits tall Bodhi tree. Light radiance from my body spreading over a radius of 80 hand-lengths shines brilliantly at all times. My height is sixteen hand-lengths.

21. Appaṃ vassa-sataṃ āyu, idānetarahi vijjati, tāvataṃ tiṭṭha-mānohaṃ, tāremi janataṃ bahuṃ.

Dear son, Sāriputta, the present lifespan of humans is very short, limited to only 100 years. I will live for four-fifths of this lifespan, for 80 years, and for 45 years I shall be saving sentient beings from the ocean of Saṃsāra and conveying them to the shore of Nibbāna.

22. Ṭhapayitvāna Dhammukkaṃ, pacchimaṃ jana-bodhanaṃ, aḥam-pi nacirasseva, saddhiṃ sāvaka-saṅghato, idheva Parinibbissaṃ, aggī vāhāra-saṅkhayā.

Dear son, Sāriputta, I have lit and set up the torch of Dhamma burning, in order that the coming generations may understand the four noble truths. At no distant date, in the company of my monastic disciples, I will come to the final end, like a torch extinguished with fuel expended, in this very world at Kusinārā, dropping the curtain on the drama of existence.

Two Verses of Spiritual Anxiety

23. Tāni ca atula-tejāni, imāni ca dasa-balāni, ayañ-ca guṇa-dhāraṇo deho, vattiṃsa-vara-lakkhaṇa-vicitto.
24. Dasa disā pabhāsetvā, sata-raṃsī va chappabhā, sabbam tam-antarahissanti, nanu rittā sabba-saṅkhārā.

Dear son, Sāriputta, my peerless glory and power, the ten physical strengths and this person of mine, comely and wonderful to behold, embodying, like a golden mountain, the 32 major characteristics of a superior person together with the sixfold unique wisdom (asādhāraṇa-ñāṇa) the ten mental strengths (dasa-bala-ñāṇa), the six-hued radiance emanating from my body, and illuminating all directions like the radiance of the sun, all these things just spoken [471] about will all perish and disappear. Are they not conditioned things, life or lifeless, vain and devoid of the essence of permanence, genuine happiness and substance? This being so, I urge you to cultivate insight meditation (vipassanā) by contemplating the three salient characteristics of conditioned phenomena, and strive hard for the attainment of Nibbāna. Such is the usual instruction for you all, given by the fully Self-Awakened Buddhas. With heedfulness, exert yourself to fulfil these instructions.

With this ends the exposition connected with major events as laid down in the (Chronicles of the Buddhas Buddha-varaṃsa) and the commentary.

17b: The Chronicles of the Buddhas – 621

But U Nu, Prime Minister of the Union of Burma, at the time of requesting me to write a chronicle of the Buddhas, said, among other things: “Please supervise the compilation of a treatise on the lives of the Buddhas. In so doing, please include everything about the Buddha, not leaving out even minor details. If one volume is not enough, make it two; if two is not enough, make it four, eight and so on. It is important that the work should be exhaustive.”

In consideration of his earnest request, the treatise on Great Chronicles of the Buddhas (Mahā-buddha-vaṃsa) will not end here. Its scope will be extended to include the events that took place after the delivery of the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vaṃsa) by the Buddha and it will be entitled The Great Chronicles of the Buddhas. To this end, an attempt will be made, to the best of my ability, to add a series of chapters on the significant events concerning Buddha Gotama and his disciples. [472]

18: The Buddha and His Immediate Family

The Buddha descended from the Jewelled Walk in the sky, near the city of Kapilavatthu, after subduing the pride and haughtiness of his royal relatives by delivering the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) and took his seat on the Dhamma throne which was exclusively set up for him.

All the members of the royal family had by then assembled before the Buddha and seated themselves after becoming calm and collected; then it happened that showers of lotus-leaf rain (pokkhara-vassa) fell heavily.

The lotus-leaf rain means, according to the Light on the Essence of Meaning (Sārattha-dīpanī), rain which has the colour of lotus leaves. Other teachers have explained it as rain which falls from the mass of rainclouds which, at the beginning, have the size of a lotus leaf appearing in the middle of the sky, and build up into thousands of layers and then fall down as torrential rain.

As the great rain fell, rushing streams of ruby-coloured rain water were falling on the ground. While the rain water wetted those who wished to be soaked, not a drop of rain fell on those who did not want to get wet.

All the members of the royalty were struck with wonder at the sight of this miraculous scene and uttered: “Oh, a marvellous thing! To be cheered by the snapping of the fingers! This is an unprecedented phenomenon, indeed!” On hearing such utterances, the Buddha made this remark: “This is not the first time that the lotus-rain (pokkhara-vassa) had fallen on the assembly of the royal relatives. There was an occasion in the past when such a rain fell in a similar manner.” The Buddha then continued by expounding the Vessantara story (Ja 547) which was composed in 1,000 verses.

[This is another instance where numbers are being rounded up. The Birth Story about Vessantara (Vessantara-jātaka) in the Chaṭṭha Saṅgāyana edition is actually 785 verses long.]

After hearing the story of Vessantara, all the members of the royalty departed and not a single person extended the invitation, such as: “Please come and receive the alms food which we shall offer tomorrow,” to the Buddha.

King Suddhodana thought, and took it for granted, that: “There is no place other than my royal palace for my son to visit, he is certain to come to my palace.” Being convinced thus, he returned to his palace without extending a specific invitation. At the palace, he ordered arrangements for the preparation of rice-gruel, and so on, and temporary accommodation for the 20,000 Arahats headed by the Buddha.

The Buddha Goes on Alms-Round

When the Buddha entered the royal city the next day for alms round, in the company of 20,000 Arahats, not a single member of the royal family came forward to greet and welcome him. There was no one to take his alms bowl and carry it for him.

The moment the Buddha had set foot on the gateway of Kapilavatthu, he began to reflect on the way in which previous Buddhas went round for alms food in the capital city of their royal fathers: “Was it characterised by receiving alms exclusively from the selected homes of the rich, the elite, or by going round for alms from door to door, rich or poor alike?” He understood it by way of psychic power which gave the knowledge of past existences (pubbe-nivasa-abhiñña). Thus he came to realize that not a single Buddha in the past had received their alms food only from the selected homes of rich; none of them had deviated from the practice of going for alms food from door to door.

So he decided to adopt the time-honoured traditional practice of collecting alms food from door to door. He thought: “Only by setting such an example myself would my disciples emulate my practice and fulfil the duty of a monastic to go for alms round to each and every house without any [473] breach.” Having made this decision, he started to go on the alms round beginning with the first house nearest the city gate, stopping at every house one after another.

The following is a brief description of the magnificent scene of the Buddha’s visit to the royal city as mentioned in the Collection of the Middle Length Discourses (Majjhima-nikāya) commentary (PTS 3.20 ff):

When the Buddha entered the royal city, the earth quaked with mild intensity. He walked gently, not treading upon even the tiniest insects such as ants and the like. He stepped forth first with the right foot which possessed the major mark of the level soles of feet like golden footwear (suppatiṭṭhita-lakkhaṇa); the delicate soles of his feet, being level and smooth, touched the ground evenly, fully and squarely without collecting the tiniest particles of dirt or dust. As he walked along, the low-lying areas of the earth raised themselves spontaneously to an even level and the mounds lowered to the level of the plain, forming an even surface all over; all the stones and pebbles, stumps and thorns had removed themselves from the route beforehand. He walked at a normal pace, neither too fast nor too slow, his stride neither too long nor too close, without the ankles and knees knocking against each other. Being a person of great concentration, he looked straight forward, limiting the range of vision to within four-hand's length, looking neither up nor down, nor sideways. He walked with the grace of a Chaddanta elephant fully and richly caparisoned.

When the Buddha was on his round of receiving alms food from door to door in the city, those living in two and three-storey buildings came out on the balconies which rested on lion image supports, to pay homage to the Buddha, uttering: “Here comes our good lord, Prince Siddhattha, to receive alms food.”

Princess Yasodharā, mother of Rāhula, thought to herself: “In former days, my glorious Lord used to travel in kingly power and luxury, carried on a golden palanquin but now, it is said, he goes about the city for alms food with shorn head and beard, in dyed clothes, with bowl in hand. Would it be seemly or would it appear uncomely?” So thinking, she opened the balcony window which rested on the supports of lion images and saw for herself that the main roads as well as the lanes were brilliantly illuminated by the beams of light from the Buddha's body as he was walking round majestically, and adorned with the 32 major characteristics and 80 minor ones, which were peculiar to the Buddhas and the six-hued aura of light surrounding him. Pointing her fingers towards the Buddha, she drew the attention of Rāhula and uttered the ten Lion of a Man (Narasīha) verses in praise of the glorious personality of the Buddha from his forehead to his soles.

Ten Verses in Praise of the Buddha

1. Siniddha-nīla-mudu-kuñcita-keso, sūriya-nimmala-talābhina-lāṭo, yutta-tuṅga-mudu-kāyata-nāso, raṁsi-jāla-vitato nara-sīho.

His hair is jet black and bright like the colour of a bumble bee with a tapering tip curling softly clock-wise; a shining, serene forehead resembling a clear rising sun; a delicate, proportionately prominent slender nose like a goad; a lustrous radiant body, the lion of a man, and an extraordinary, exalted individual indeed!

2. *Cakka-varaṅkita-ratta-supādo, lakkhaṇa-maṇḍita-āyata-paṇhi, cāmari-hattha-vibhūṣita-paṇho,
esa hi tuyhaṃ pitā nara-sīho.*

My eyes' delight, dear Rāhula, there comes the lion of a man, an [474] extraordinary person! The soles of his feet are ruby-red and distinguished by the characteristic marks; noble characteristic marks adorn the slender heels and his pair of feet have impressions of white umbrellas and golden yellow yak-fans, he is a lion of a man. That exalted reverential person receiving alms, surrounded by 20,000 Arahats, like the full moon amidst stars and planets, was your father when he was a layman.

3. *Sakya-kumāro varado sukhu-mālo, lakkhaṇa-vicitta-pasanna-sarīro, loka-hitāya āgato nara-vīro,
esa hi tuyhaṃ pitā nara-sīho.*

My bosom son, Rāhula, he is a gentle noble prince, a descendant of the unbroken, peerless Sakya lineage, one who has a full handsome body with noble major and minor characteristic marks; one who has been born into this world for the welfare of the three spheres of existence, one whose industry excels that of all others, an extraordinary person and a lion of men. That exalted lion of a man, receiving alms in the company of 20,000 Arahats, like the full moon amidst stars and planets, was your father when he was a layman.

4. *Āyata-yutta-susaṅghita-soto, gopa-khumo abhinīla-netto,
inda-dhanu-abhinīla-bhamuko,
esa hi tuyhaṃ pitā nara-sīho.*

My sweet son, Rāhula, possessing a pair of handsome ears of proportionate size, soft eye-lashes like that of a new-born calf, a pair of eyes dark like the onyx, and dark-brown eyebrows shaped like the curve of Sakka's bow. That exalted lion of a man, receiving alms in the company of 20,000 Arahats, like the full moon amidst stars and planets, was your father when he was a layman.

5. *Puṇṇa-canda-nibho mukha-vaṇṇo,
Deva-narānaṃ piyo nara-nāgo,*

*matta-gajinda-vilāsita-gāmī,
esa hi tuyhaṃ pitā nara-sīho.*

My darling Rāhula, the serene face of that exalted monastic resembles a moon in full bloom on the fifteenth day of the month, who is worthy of deep veneration and true affection by all beings in the three worlds of humans, Devas and Brahmas, who may be likened to a great and powerful bull elephant with the elegant gait of an elephant king in must, he is a lion of a man. That exalted reverential person, receiving alms in the company of 20,000 Arahats, like the full moon amidst stars and planets, was your father when he was a layman.

*6. Siniddha-sugambhīra-mañjusa-ghoso, hīngula-vaṇṇa-ratta-sujivho, vīsati-vīsati-seta-sudanto,
esa hi tuyhaṃ pitā nara-sīho.*

My darling, dear Rāhula, one with a voice, deep, harmonious and exceedingly sweet, a tongue vermilion-red like the colour of the Chinese Rose (Rosa sinensis), two rows of clean white teeth, each consisting of 20 teeth, the lion of a man and an extraordinary person. That exalted reverential person, receiving alms in the company of 20,000 Arahats, like the full [475] moon amidst stars and planets, was your father when he was a layman.

*7. Khattiya-sambhava-agga-kulindo, Deva-manussa-namassita-pādo, sīla-samādhi-patiṭṭhita-citto,
esa hi tuyhaṃ pitā nara-sīho.*

My darling, dear Rāhula, one of truly noble and royal ancestry, before whose feet beings of the three worlds bow in deep reverence, one with firm morality, concentration and tranquil state of mind which is imperturbable, the lion of a man. That exalted reverential person, receiving alms in the company of 20,000 Arahats, like the full moon amidst stars and planets, was your father when he was a layman.

*8. Vaṭṭa-suvaṭṭa-susaṅghita-gīvo, sīha-hanu-miga-rāja-sarīro, kañcana-succhavi-uttama-vaṇṇo,
esa hi tuyhaṃ pitā nara-sīho.*

Dear son, Rāhula, one with a full round neck, shapely like a golden mayo drum, a rounded, well-developed jaw resembling the magnificent jaws of a lion king, and as if about to smile, like the twelfth-day waxing moon; a full-chested body like the fore part of a lion, the king of beasts; a radiant skin of the colour of the purest gold, and an unparalleled nobility of appearance; the lion of a man. That exalted reverential person, receiving alms in the company of 20,000 Arahats, like the full moon amidst stars and planets, was your father when he was a layman.

*9. Añjana-sama-vaṇṇa-sunīla-keso, kañcana-paṭṭa-visuddha-nalāṭo, osadhi-pañḍara-suddha-su-uṇṇo,
esa hi tuyhaṃ pitā nara-sīho.*

My darling, dear Rāhula, having hair of dark shining greenish-black, an even, clear forehead like a plate of gold and like the morning star and a single strand of pure white hair growing, coiled between the eye brows, the lion of a man. That exalted reverential person, receiving alms in the company of 20,000 Arahats, like the full moon amidst stars and planets, was your father when he was a layman.

*10. Gacchanto nila-pathe viya cando, tārā-gaṇa-parivaḍḍhita-rūpo, sāvaka-majjha-gato samaṇindo,
esa hi tuyhaṃ pitā nara-sīho.*

My darling, dear Rāhula, just as the chariot of the moon magnificently travels along the triple route through the air, so too the leader of monks, the King of Dhamma walks majestically amidst Arahats disciples; the lion of a man. That exalted reverential person, receiving alms in the company of 20,000 Arahats, like the full moon amidst stars and planets, was your father when he was a layman.

Having thus intimated the glory, the grace of the person of the Buddha to her son Rāhula, she approached King Suddhodana and said: “Your majesty, O father, your royal son, the Buddha, is reported to be going round for alms food in the company of 20,000 Arahats.” [476]

King Suddhodana Attains the First Path

King Suddhodana was shocked and agitated when he heard what Princess Yasodharā had said and with one hand holding up his nether garment, he rushed out of the palace to see the Buddha and stood in front of him and made this remark: “Most Fortunate One, why do you put us to shame by going round for alms food? Do you think that enough food for such a large number as 20,000 Arahats cannot be provided by your royal father?”

The Buddha said in reply: “Royal father, such a practice of receiving alms from door to door (sapadāna-cārika) is the precedent set by an unbroken line of Buddhas.”

King Suddhodana replied in these words: “My son, are we not descents of a noble (khattiya) lineage, great elected rulers in unbroken succession from the beginning of the aeon? And amongst this long line of great noble rulers, there was never anyone who went round begging for alms.”

The Buddha then made this reply: “Royal father, the lineage of noble rulers is your lineage; my ancestors are the Buddhas, in successive order of the Chronicles of the Buddhas (Buddha-vamsa) from Dīpaṅkara, Koṇḍañña, Maṅgala down to Kassapa. Beginning with Dīpaṅkara and ending with Kassapa, my preceding elder brethren Buddhas, 24 in number, and with all the thousands of Buddhas, as many as the sands in the Ganges, have always gone to each house successively to receive alms. This very practice of receiving alms from one door to the next had always been our means of livelihood.”

And while stopping on the route for a moment, he uttered the following verse (Dhp 168):

*Uttiṭṭhe nappamajjeyya, Dhammaṃ sucaritaṃ care,
Dhamma-cārī sukhaṃ seti, asmim loke paramhi ca.*

Royal father, a monastic, on receiving alms food after standing with seemly propriety at the door of each supporter, should be mindful of the receipt of the food; he should not receive or seek alms by improper means. He should practice going round for receiving alms in a commendable manner. A monastic, who cultivates this practice unfailingly in such a manner, will live in peace in this life and in the future life as well.

18: The Buddha and his Immediate Family – 629

At the conclusion of this verse, King Suddhodana attained the stage of the Stream-entry fruition (Sotāpatti-phala).

After his attainment of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti), King Suddhodana himself took the alms bowl from the hands of the Buddha and holding it, invited the Buddha and the 20,000 Arahats to his palace where he offered seats of honour which were especially arranged in anticipation. On arrival at the palace, the Buddha uttered the following verse (Dhp 169):

*Dhammaṃ care sucaritaṃ, na naṃ duccharitaṃ care,
Dhamma-cārī sukhaṃ seti, asmim̐ loke paramhi ca*

Royal father, an improper or irregular way of seeking alms food should be avoided and a correct mode of receiving alms should be practised. A monastic who cultivates this practice unflinchingly in such a manner will live in peace in this life and in the future life as well.

Abodes of old maids, eunuchs, liquor-shops, prostitutes, a divorced or widowed woman, female monastics: these places are regarded as not proper places to receive alms from (agocara-ṭhāna), and should be avoided.

At the conclusion of this second verse, King Suddhodana became a Non-returner (Anāgāmī) and Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī, a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna). [477]

Yasodharā's Loyalty

When the food-offering was over, all the courtiers and maids of honour excepting Rāhula's mother, Princess Yasodharā rallied at the feet of Buddha and paid their reverential respects to him.

Although her female attendants had requested her thus: "Your majesty, please do come out of the royal chamber and pay homage to the Buddha," she gave the maids of honour this reply: "If I had ever rendered any special service worthy of gratitude, his reverence will come to me himself. Then and then only will I give homage to him," and she remained unmoved and sedately stayed in her chamber.

With King Suddhodana carrying his alms bowl and accompanied by his two chief disciples the Buddha went into the parlour of the queen. At that time, 40,000 dancers were waiting upon her, of whom 1,090 were maiden princesses. On being told that the Buddha was on his way to her parlour, she ordered her 40,000 dancers to be dressed in dyed cloth and they did as they were told.

18: The Buddha and his Immediate Family – 630

On arrival at Princess Yasodharā's chamber, the Buddha said: "Let no one utter any word to hinder or restrain Princess Yasodharā while she is paying me homage to her heart's content," and then he took his seat at a place specially prepared for him in advance.

Princess Yasodharā came quickly into the presence of the Buddha and seizing his pair of insteps with both hands and with all her strength she held them close and tightly in her arms. She rested her forehead upon them, alternately left and right, and again and again made obeisance to him to her heart's content, with deep, profound esteem and respect.

Whereupon, King Suddhodana addressed the Buddha: "Exalted Buddha, noble son, my daughter has worn dyed clothes ever since she heard that you were wearing dyed robes; when she heard that you lived on a single meal a day, she too subsisted on a single meal. Since she heard that you had given up luxurious beds, she slept on a couch of flat matted ropes; since she heard that you had given up flowers and scents, she went without anointing herself with fragrant paste and not wearing flowers. When you renounced the world, kindred princes sent messages proposing their honourable intentions to love and cherish and keep her under their tender care, to none of which did she ever cast a lustful glance. Such wonderful, praiseworthy and extraordinary virtues my daughter is replete with." Thus did King Suddhodana make known to the Buddha the virtues and consistency of Princess Yasodharā's love for him.

Whereupon the Buddha responded: "Royal father, it is not to be wondered that Yasodharā, mother of Rāhula, has maintained her loyalty and dignity now, because apart from the protection given by you, the mother of Rāhula is now ripe in wisdom and capable of protecting herself. More admirable still is the fact that the mother of Rāhula, Princess Yasodharā in a past existence, protected herself, when she was roaming all by herself at the foot of Canda mountain, even while still immature in wisdom and without a protector like your good self."

Then, after relating the events in the past existence with the story of Canda-Kinnarī (Ja 485), the Buddha returned to the Nigrodha monastery accompanied by 20,000 Arahats.

The Ordination of Prince Nanda

Prince Siddhattha's step-mother, [478] Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī, gave birth to Prince Nanda two days after the royal mother, Mahā Māyā, had given birth to Prince Siddhattha. Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī entrusted her own son to the care of nurses and she took the responsibility of nursing and looking after her nephew the Bodhisatta by feeding him with her own milk. Prince Nanda was only two or three days younger, and about four finger breaths shorter than Prince Siddhattha in height.

18: The Buddha and his Immediate Family – 631

On the third day after the arrival of the Buddha in the royal city of Kapilavatthu, King Suddhodana made the five auspicious ceremonial rites and rituals to be performed in honour of Prince Nanda:

1. The ceremony of the uncoiling of the youthful coiffure to make way for another, befitting an heir to the throne (kesa-vissajjana-maṅgala).
2. The ceremony of placing around the forehead of the prince a gold frontlet bearing the inscription Crown Prince (paṭṭa-bandha-maṅgala).
3. The ceremony of bestowing a residential palace on the Crown Prince (gharappavesana-maṅgala).
4. The ceremony of his marriage to his cousin Princess Janapadakalyāṇī (āvāha-maṅgala).
5. The ceremony of bestowing and erecting the royal white umbrella of the Crown Prince (chattussāpana-maṅgala).

On that occasion the Buddha went to the royal palace and after teaching a discourse on the virtues of meritorious deeds, as he wished to have Prince Nanda ordained, he purposely gave his bowl to Nanda and left for the monastery.

Because he had exceedingly great respect for his elder brother, the Buddha, Prince Nanda, dared not say a word about the bowl which was unexpectedly left in his care, though he had in mind to request: “Exalted elder brother, may you take back your bowl.” He had but to follow the Buddha up to the top of the stairs, thinking that he would be relieved of the burden there, but the Buddha did not do so.

Holding the bowl, he thus followed the Buddha to the foot of the stairway, but he still did not take back the bowl. He had to follow him, much against his will, thinking and hoping the bowl would be taken back and he eventually reached the open space outside the palace. The Buddha continued on his way without relieving him of the bowl. Prince Nanda, following unwillingly, wishing to turn back, but his extreme respect kept him silent, and hoping against hope that the bowl would be taken back at one place or another, he had to go along with the Buddha.

At that juncture, the female attendants of the Princess Janapadakalyāṇī brought the matter to her notice, saying: “Your Highness, the Buddha has taken away Prince Nanda to keep him separated from you.” When she heard this Janapadakalyāṇī was washing her hair. She hurried to the door of the balcony, her hair dripping wet and only half-combed, and made an earnest appeal: “Your Highness, may you come back quickly,” which weighed heavily in the mind of Prince Nanda.

The Buddha went on without taking the bowl from Prince Nanda, and on arrival at the monastery, he asked Nanda: “Would you like to receive ordination and become a monastic? Out of fear and respect, he could not express his unwillingness, saying: ‘No, I cannot,’ but had to give his assent, saying: ‘Very well, exalted brother, I will receive ordination.’ ” – “If that be the case: Monastics, you should see to it that my younger brother is ordained,” said the Buddha and the monastics did as they were told.

Events leading to the Venerable Nanda’s attainment of the Arahat fruition will be related when we come to the chapter 43 on The Sangha Jewel.

Rāhula’s Going Forth

Seven days after this event, the Buddha, accompanied by 20,000 Arahats, visited his royal father’s palace to partake of a meal. Princess Yasodharā had her 7-year old son, Rāhula, [479] tastefully dressed and confided to him: “My darling son, look at that gracious monastic, attended by 20,000 monastics, with a golden appearance and a body as graceful as that of a Brahma, he is your father. Before his renunciation, and becoming a monastic, there used to be four golden pots, named: Saṅkha, Ela, Uppala, Puṇḍarīka, which disappeared simultaneously with his renunciation. So approach your father and ask for your inheritance, saying: “Father, I am a young prince and I will, in due course, be crowned a Universal Monarch of the four islands and, as such, I am in need of wealth and treasures befitting such a king. I pray that those four golden pots may be given to me as my inheritance, in keeping with the tradition of a son always inheriting from his father.” She then sent the young prince to the Buddha.

When Prince Rāhula came close to the Buddha, he felt the warmth of the affectionate love of a father. Overwhelmed with joyousness, he addressed him:

18: The Buddha and his Immediate Family – 633

“Exalted father, the sphere of your protection is, indeed, so peaceful, calm and comfortable,” and after a moment of sweet childish chatter, he sat close to the Buddha. After finishing the meal, the Buddha gave a discourse on the merits of the provision of alms food and left the palace for the Nigrodha monastery, in the company of 20,000 Arahats.

Prince Rāhula immediately went along behind the Buddha, making the request: “Exalted father, may you give me my inheritance,” and repeating it all along the way to the monastery. The Buddha did not say a word to him, such as: “Beloved son, go back home,” and none of the king’s personnel dared hinder him as it was a matter of a son following his father. In this way, Prince Rāhula arrived at the monastery together with the Buddha, asking for his inheritance all the way.

On arrival at the monastery, the Buddha thought it over: “Prince Rāhula wants to inherit his father’s property. Worldly wealth and property simply leads to suffering as they are the cause of suffering in the round of rebirths. I shall give my royal son Rāhula the inheritance of the seven supermundane treasures of the noble ones: faith (saddhā), morality (sīla), conscience (hirī), concern (ottappa), learning (suta), charity (cāga) and wisdom (paññā) which I have won by vanquishing the five internal and external enemy forces of Māra. I shall make my royal son, Rāhula, the owner of these supermundane inheritances.” So deciding, the Buddha bade Ven. Sāriputta to him and said: “Sāriputta, Prince Rāhula has come to ask for his inheritance from me. Make arrangements for the going forth of Rāhula as a novice.”

According to AN 2.398, the seven treasures of the noble persons (ariya), as expounded by the Buddha are:

Saddhā-dhanam̐ sīla-dhanam̐, hirī ottappiyam̐ dhanam̐, suta-dhanañ-ca cāgo ca, paññā ve sattamam̐ dhanam̐.

In his Kokhan pyo, sacred verses in nine sections, Ven. Mahā Ratthasāra illustrated these seven supermundane treasures of the noble ones (ariya), side by side with corresponding worldly properties:

1. Conscience (hirī) = silver.
2. Concern (ottappa) = gold.
3. Learning (suta) = coral.
4. Faith (saddhā) = emerald.

5. Morality (sīla) = pearl.
6. Abandonment (cāga) = precious stones.
7. Wisdom (paññā) = diamonds.

In compliance with the express instructions of the Buddha, Ven. Sāriputta took the role of the preceptor (upajjhāya), whereas Ven. Mahā Moggallāna acted as the [480] instructor (pabbajjācariyā) attending to the shaving of the head, the offering of the robes and the administering of the three refuges, while Ven. Mahā Kassapa served as his advisor (ovādācariyā). Thus, Prince Rāhula was given the going forth and became a novice. Although the three great monks (mahā-thera) took individual roles in the procedure for the admission, the preceptor (upajjhāya) is the dominant figure in bringing about the going forth of Prince Rāhula; the functions undertaken by the instructor and the advisor are the bounden duties of the preceptor (upajjhāya); they are merely functioning as his deputies. Therefore the text says: Atha kho Āyasma Sāriputto Rāhulam kumāram pabbājesi, “then Ven. Sāriputta gave Prince Rāhula the going forth,” as if he had attended to all the various tasks necessary for the ceremony.

A Training Rule about Permissions

King Suddhodana was greatly disturbed and suffered intense mental and physical agony when he heard of the news that Prince Rāhula had been given the going forth.

A note of explanation is required here for clarification: Just as the court astrologers had made confident predictions that: “This prince is destined to become a Universal Monarch,” after the birth of Prince Siddhattha, so also they made the identical predictions on subsequent occasions when birthday celebrations were held in honour of Prince Nanda and Prince Rāhula.

While entertaining high hopes of seeing the grace and glory of his son, Prince Siddhattha, as a Universal Monarch, King Suddhodana only witnessed Siddhattha renounce the world and become a monastic, greatly to his disappointment, and he had suffered great mental and physical distress for the first time.

Again, after he had braced himself thus: “Only when my younger son, Nanda, becomes a Universal Monarch shall I see his grace and glory,” Prince Nanda was ordained as a monastic by the Buddha. King Suddhodana had suffered extreme weariness of heart and mind for the second time.

He had, however, observed great patience on these two previous occasions by consoling himself: “My last hope is to witness with full satisfaction the grace and glory of my grandson when he becomes a Universal Monarch.” He had set his mind on this. Now that Rāhula had been made a novice by the Buddha, it occurred to him: “Now the continuity of the dynasty of the Sakya monarchy has been severed. Wherefore can there be the glory and grace of a Universal Monarch?” King Suddhodana naturally suffered a misery more intense than ever before.

This is because the king was still at the stage of a Once-returner (Sakadāgāmi) who had yet to eradicate the defilement of anger (dosa), hence his extreme sadness.

The pressing mental and physical agony grew beyond his power of endurance, so much so that he went to the Buddha and after paying homage and taking a seat at an appropriate place, he addressed the Buddha: “Most Exalted Buddha, my royal son, I would like to request a favour from you.” Whereupon, the Buddha responded: “Royal father of the Gotama clan, Fully Awakened Buddhas are past the stage of granting favours.”

Granting of favours and giving rewards is not the business of recluses who themselves live on food received from generous supporters. As such, if someone makes requests for favours from them, it is not befitting for them to say off-hand: “Ask for any favour you wish.” It is also not the practice of the Buddhas.

Whereupon the king said: “I will only make a request which is fit and proper as well as faultless.” Only then did the Buddha allow him to make the request, saying: “Royal father of the Gotama clan, you may ask for any favour you wish.”

“Most Revered son, when you first renounced the world I suffered infinite sorrow and I suffered with the same intensity when my son, Prince Nanda, received ordination, and lastly, when Rāhula, my grandson, was made a novice, my misery was immeasurable. Most exalted son, the love of parents and grandparents for their sons and grandchildren penetrates from the delicate film of the outer skin through to the thick inner [481] skin, sinews, nerves and bones and even up to the marrow.”

When King Suddhodana left the monastery after hearing a discourse, the Buddha, in consideration of King Suddhodana's request, made a proclamation of a training rule at the assembly of the Saṅgha: Na, bhikkhave, ananuññāto mātā-pitūhi putto pabbājetabbo. Yo pabbājeyya, āpatti dukkaṭassa, “monastics, a child who has not the consent of both his parents should not be given the going forth nor higher ordination. For whoever should let such a person receive the going forth or higher ordination, there is an offence of wrong-doing.”

King Suddhodana Becomes a Non-Returner

On a certain day after this incident, when the Buddha went to the royal palace for meals in the company of 20,000 Arahats, King Suddhodana served him and his Arahats with gruel and sweet-meats before the main meal. During the interim period, the king enthusiastically recounted his experience with the Devas thus: “Most glorious son, when you were engaged arduously in austerity practices, certain Devas appeared in the sky and told me: ‘Your son, Prince Siddhattha, has died for not having sufficient food.’” Whereupon, the Buddha asked the king: “Royal father, did you believe the words of the Devas then?” The king replied: “No, I did not. I rejected the words of the Devas in the sky by saying: ‘It is impossible for my son to enter Nibbāna until and unless he attains omniscience on that pleasant plain under the Mahā Bodhi tree.’”

Then the Buddha said: “My royal father not only in this life, but also in a previous existence, when you were the chieftain of Mahā Dhammapāla village, you have rejected the words of a far-famed teacher, Disāpāmokkha, who told you: “Your son, the young Dhammapāla is dead. These are the bones of your son,” exhibiting the bones of a goat as evidence. You had then refuted him by saying: “In our Dhammapāla clan, there is none who dies while still young.” You did not believe him at all. Now at the last lap of your transient existence, why should you believe the words of the Devas? You certainly would not.” Then at the request of his royal father, the Buddha delivered extensively the discourse telling the story, the Long Birth Story about Dhammapāla (Mahā-dhammapāla-jātaka, Ja 447).

After delivering the Birth Story, the Buddha continued to expound the main Dhamma points of the four noble truths (catu-sacca-dhamma-kathā). At the conclusion of this exposition, King Suddhodana was firmly established as a Non-returner (Anāgāmi).

Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī Offers Robes to the Buddha

As stated above, the day after the arrival of the Buddha and his Arahats at Kapilavatthu, King Suddhodana, after having expressed his reasons for his intolerable displeasure and disapproval to the Buddha and his Arahats in the middle of their round for alms food, invited them to the royal palace.

When Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī witnessed the grace and splendour of the physical appearance of the Buddha on the latter's arrival at the royal palace, she could not help thinking: "How exceedingly comely is my son's appearance!" and her mind was filled with the powerful feelings of exceeding joy.

Then again, she continued considering: "For fully 29 years when he was a layman, it was I who was solely responsible for my son's well-being, regarding his food, clothing and residence, even to the extent of peeling off the skin of a banana for him. Now that he has blossomed forth as a Fully Awakened Buddha, it is right and proper that I weave a set of robes to offer him."

She had a weaving house set up in the precincts of the royal palace, and bought fine quality cotton from the market. She undertook the work of ginning and spinning cotton into fine threads. She summoned expert weavers to the palace and asked them to weave a cloth for a set of robes, providing them with delicious soft and hard food from her own table, and paid them handsome rewards. She visited the place of work, in the company of her maids of honour and personally took part in the weaving of the cloth for the robes [482] as and when opportunity presented.

When the fine cloth had been woven and the weavers were given suitable rewards, she placed the cloth in a casket of sweet scents so that it might be infused with the sweet fragrance and when everything was set, she approached the king and said: "Your majesty, I wish to offer this newly woven fine cloth for a set of robes to your exalted son personally in the monastery."

King Suddhodana caused the roadway between the palace and the monastery to be swept clean; every street was swept, pots filled with water were placed along the road, which was lined with decorative pennants and streamers. From the palace gate to the Nigrodha monastery the whole route was strewn with flowers.

With great pomp and ceremony, Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī, bedecked with ornaments and in full ceremonial dress, proceeded to the monastery in the company of her maids of honour, carrying on her head the fragrant casket containing the piece of cloth for making robes and on arrival addressed the Buddha: “Most exalted glorious son I, your step-mother, intending it for you, have myself ginned and spun and woven a cloth for a set of robes. I pray that you accept this piece of cloth which I have woven and offered to you, out of compassion and sympathetic regard for me.”

18: The Buddha and his Immediate Family – 638

The detailed story of the royal step-mother weaving the cloth for a set of robes and offering it to the Buddha is provided in the Analysis of Offerings (Dakkhiṇā-vibhaṅga-sutta, MN 142).

The commentary to that discourse states: “The Buddha’s step-mother had a mind for the offering of robes to the Buddha during his first visit to Kapilavatthu, etc.” In the text it is mentioned that the Buddha advised her to offer it to the Saṅgha instead of to an individual so that she may gain exceedingly greater merit. Then Ven. Ānanda supplicated on her behalf for the Buddha to accept the offer of the robes in consideration of the mutually beneficial services rendered.

Here arises a point that deserves to be taken into account. Ven. Ānanda was not yet a monastic during the Buddha’s first visit to Kapilavatthu. He was ordained only on arrival at Anupiya Mango Grove, in the Malla country, on the return journey from Kapilavatthu. The Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentaries also only mention the fact that the Buddha returned from Kapilavatthu after establishing King Suddhodana in the three lower fruition stages.

Therefore, in order to reconcile this discrepancy, it would be appropriate to take it that Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī conceived the idea of weaving the cloth for a set of robes for the Buddha and went about translating her idea into action during the Buddha’s first visit, and that she made the offering with great pomp and ceremony only on his next visit to Kapilavatthu. [483]

19: The Ordination of 1,000 Sakyan Princes

Having thus established his father, King Suddhodana in the three lower fruition stages of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala), Once-returner (Sakadāgāmi-phala) and Non-returner (Anāgāmi-phala), the Buddha left Kapilavatthu in the company of 20,000 Arahats and journeyed towards Rājagaha. On arrival at the Anupiya Mango Grove of the country of Malla, the Buddha broke the journey for some rest.

At that time, King Suddhodana summoned an assembly of all the members of the royal Sakyan clan and addressed them: “You members of the royal Sakyan clan, if my son had chosen to remain as a sovereign ruler, seven treasures would have appeared and he would certainly have become a Universal Monarch ruling over the four island continents. And my grandson Rāhula, befitting the eldest son treasure of the seven treasures would have accompanied the Universal Monarch together with all the noble rulers on earth, attending to administrative matters wherever the wheel treasure rolled on.

When a sovereign ruler observed the moral precepts in fulfilment of the noble duties required of a Universal Monarch, there appeared to him the mighty wheel treasure. At that time he comes to possess seven precious treasures: the wheel treasure, the elephant treasure, the horse treasure, the gem treasure, the queen treasure, the rich-man treasure, and the eldest son treasure.

After being anointed as a Universal Monarch, he held a gold pitcher in his left hand, sprinkled water with his right hand on the wheel treasure, making the resolution: ‘May the august wheel treasure turn and roll on! May the august wheel treasure be triumphant.’ The wheel treasure rolled on towards the four island continents, in the four directions. The Universal Monarch followed it with his great army commanded by his eldest son treasure. Where the wheel came to rest, the Universal Monarch encamped with his great army. The rival kings of each region came to him, paid him homage and became vassals to the Universal Monarch.

All you Sakyan rulers are well aware of this. Now that my noble son has become a Buddha, the crown of the three worlds, he being a Buddha of royal descent, let only princes of royal blood attend upon him. I would urge you, therefore, that each and every royal household present me a prince. I will arrange for their ordination in the presence of my son the Buddha.”

They all readily signified their assent by saying: “Very well, your majesty,” and 1,000 princes of the royal families spontaneously went along with the king to the Anupiya Mango Grove and received ordination from the Buddha.

The Six Princes

At the ceremony of the palm-reading, after the birth of the Bodhisatta, all the members of the 80,000 royal families had made the promise: “Whether he becomes a Universal Monarch or a Buddha, we will see to it that he goes about duly attended on exclusively by the royal princes.” Although quite a number of Sakyan princes had received ordination, six princes: 1) Prince Bhaddiya, the one taking his turn to rule at the time, 2) Prince Anuruddha, 3) Prince Ānanda, 4) Prince Bhagu, 5) Prince Kimila, and 6) Prince Devadatta were discovered by other Sakyan families as not honouring the promise. They censured and expressed their disapproval saying: “We all have had our sons ordained but these six princes have behaved as if they are strangers and not relatives; how dare they remain without receiving ordination?”

Whereupon, Prince Mahānāma went to his younger brother, Anuruddha and consulted with him saying: “My dear brother Anuruddha, no member of our family has yet received ordination, and it will be right and proper for either of us to receive ordination.” It is [484] to be stated here that Prince Anuruddha was an extremely gentle person, born and brought up in great wealth and luxury. Anuruddha was a prince who had not heard of the term “have not,” and was ignorant of its meaning, as we see in the following story.

Prince Anuruddha

One day, these six princes played a game of marbles with a stake that the loser should provide cakes. Anuruddha eventually lost the game and as previously promised he was obliged to send an attendant to his mother for a supply of cakes. His mother arranged to provide the cakes as requested.

The six princes happily enjoyed the cakes and went on playing, game after game. Anuruddha was the loser every time and his mother had to fulfil his request three times in succession. But when he sent his attendant for the fourth time, his mother was compelled to give the answer: Pūvā natthi, meaning “There are no cakes.”

As Prince Anuruddha did not understand the meaning of the word natthi, he thought it to be a cake of some sort, so he sent the attendant back with instructions to bring the natthi cakes. His mother, being well aware of the fact that his son was totally ignorant of the term natthi, considered that she would teach him the meaning of natthi. So, she expediently put one empty gold cup as a cover upon another and sent them to her son.

Whereupon, the guardian Devas of the city remembered the meritorious deeds of Anuruddha in a previous existence: “As Annabhāra, a poor person, he liberally offered his hard earned quota of a meal to a Paccekabuddha named Upariṭṭha, making this wish: ‘May I be free from want, not ever hearing the words ‘there are none (natthi),’ not knowing even the source of cooked rice.” The Devas were aware that they might not be allowed to attend the assembly of celestial beings should they let Anuruddha see the empty cups; above all their heads were liable to be split into seven pieces for such an act of omission. Therefore, they filled the empty gold cups with celestial cakes.

At the game pitch, as soon as the cup full of celestial sweet-meats was opened, the atmosphere of the whole city became laden with its fragrance; and the flavour of the ambrosia permeated 7,000 palatal nerves of Anuruddha as he placed a bit of it in his mouth.

Anuruddha thought to himself: “For such a long time my mother has not cooked me this natthi cake. She does not seem to love me. From now on, I will eat no other kind of cake except this kind.” On his arrival at the palace, he asked his mother: “Mother do you really love me or not?” His mother replied: “My dear son, Anuruddha, just as a man who has only one eye values and cherishes it most, so I love you more than anything else; more than my heart.” Then Anuruddha asked again: “Mother, why, though loving me so, have you never prepared such a natthi cake for me even over such a long period of time?”

When his mother heard this curious question, she summoned the young attendant and asked him: “Young man, was there anything in the cup?” he replied: “Dear mother, the cup was filled to its brim with a sort of sweetmeats which we have never seen before.” His mother then realised that her son must be a man of power and glory, who had accumulated much merit from his past good deeds. She rightly considered the truth of the matter that celestial beings must have put celestial sweetmeats in the cup and sent it to the prince.

Then Anuruddha told his mother: “Mother, from now on I shall not eat any edibles except these natthi cakes. Just cook only these natthi cakes for me.” Since that time, his mother simply sent an empty cup covered with another whenever a request came from her son for a supply of edibles. Before his ordination, all through his layman’s life, it was the celestials who sent the cakes to him. How then could Anuruddha, who did not even [485] understand the term natthi, understand the state of monkhood or ordination?

Such being the case, Anuruddha asked his eldest brother, Mahānāma: “Brother, what do you mean by ordination, what is it like?” Mahānāma replied: “Dear brother, one who receives ordination is required to have his hair and beard clean shaven, wear dyed clothes, sleep on a wooden bedstead, or a couch of cane or bamboo, go on rounds for alms food; this is the life of one who receives ordination.” Anuruddha then made this reply: “Elder brother, I am a gentle and delicate person; I cannot lead the life of one who receives ordination.”

Mahānāma said in reply: “My dear Anuruddha, if that is the case you had better learn the business of human affairs and stay back to manage our household because it is imperative that between we two brothers, one must receive ordination.” Anuruddha then enquired: “Elder brother, what is meant by the business of human affairs?” How would a man of high birth like Anuruddha, who had no knowledge of the source of his daily meals, understood the business of human affairs?

This will be clarified: three princes, namely, Kimila, Bhaddiya, and Anuruddha happened to discuss the source of food during a conversation. Prince Kimila had only seen the grains taken out of the king’s granaries; he had never seen the rice fields, and he maintained that a granary is the source of food! Prince Bhaddiya rejected his statement by saying: “You really do not know the actual source of food,” he had only seen food in the process of being cooked in a pot; he had never seen paddy being harvested in the fields or being taken out of the granaries, so he said: “A cooking pot is the actual source.” Prince Anuruddha had never seen paddy being taken out from the granaries, nor rice being cooked in a pot and ladled out from it, he had only seen a gold cup filled with cooked rice which was previously removed from the pot. He had therefore the fixed idea that food spontaneously appears in the cup when he feels like eating, so he took his turn saying: “Both of you are ignorant of the source of food; its source is a gold dish studded with fine jewels.”

These three princes were totally ignorant of the source of food and so Anuruddha asked his brother: “Elder brother, what is this business of human affairs?” in honest simplicity.

Elder brother Mahānāma said: “My dear younger brother, Anuruddha, come, I will teach you the work and business of human affairs:

1. One must plough the land at the break of the rains.
2. Ploughing must be followed by sowing seeds.
3. After sowing, the field must be watered having due regard to the appropriate time.
4. Water must be led off or drained at the appropriate time.
5. After draining off the water, there must be a constant removal of weeds.
6. After frequent clearing away of weeds, crops must be harvested as soon as they are matured and ripened.
7. After harvesting, standing sheaves of paddy must be thrashed on the threshing floor.
8. The sheaves of paddy must be spread and piled for threshing.
9. After spreading the sheaves, threshing must be done thoroughly.
10. After threshing, stalks must be removed with thorough shaking.
11. Then the undeveloped grains must be sorted out.
12. Winnowing must be done after removing the undeveloped grains. [486]
13. After winnowing, the paddy must be stored in granaries.
14. When everything is done as described above, the same work must be carried out routinely year after year.

On hearing this, Anuruddha told his brother: “Elder brother, all this business of human affairs is inexhaustible and never ending. When can all these worldly affairs be exhausted, when can we see the end to all these affairs? When shall we be able to enjoy the five sensual pleasures with ease and comfort, without having to encounter the anxieties of worldly life?” He muttered this with dismay and weariness.

His elder brother then told him: “Quite so, dear brother Anuruddha, worldly affairs are inexhaustible and without an end. Our fathers and grandfathers died before these human affairs could be exhausted or ended.” Whereupon Anuruddha said: “Elder brother, if this be so, since you understand the ways of human affairs, you had better remain and take charge of their management. I shall renounce the household life and lead the homeless life of a recluse,” thus he gave his assent to receive ordination.

Anuruddha then approached his mother and asked: “Mother, I wish to receive ordination; kindly grant me your permission to do so.”

Then the Queen Mother replied: “My dear son, Anuruddha, I love both my sons, you two brothers, with an exceedingly great love. Even when death separates us, it will be without my consent. How can I, while still alive, give both you brothers my permission to receive ordination, it is impossible.” Anuruddha made a second attempt to get his mother’s permission, but received the same answer. Again, for the third time, he requested his mother’s permission for his ordination.

At that time, the Sakyan Prince, Bhaddiya, was holding the reins of government over the Sakyan clan. King Suddhodana, who was by then approximately 90, was merely a guide and figure head. The ruling king, Bhaddiya, was Prince Anuruddha’s intimate friend. The Queen Mother thought to herself: “At present, my son Anuruddha’s friend, the Sakyan King, Bhaddiya, is still ruling over the Sakyan royal clan. That King Bhaddiya cannot, by any means, receive ordination, at least for the time being.” So she told Anuruddha: “My dear son, Anuruddha, you have my permission to receive ordination, if your playmate the Sakyan King, Bhaddiya, is also prepared to receive ordination.”

Anuruddha then approached his friend and requested: “My dear friend Bhaddiya, my receiving ordination is connected to you.” Bhaddiya then said in response: “Dear friend Anuruddha, if there is a relationship between your ordination and myself, let it no longer exist. You and I ...” Here, what Bhaddiya actually meant to say readily with love for his friend, was: “You and I, both, will receive ordination together,” but being restrained by attachment to the luxury of kingship, he stopped short with: “You and I ... ” and said: “You may happily receive ordination as you please.” Nevertheless, Anuruddha made a fresh request: “Come, my dear friend, let us receive ordination together.” Whereupon Bhaddiya gave his frank answer: “My dear friend, Anuruddha, I cannot receive ordination, but I am prepared to do whatever I can, in matters concerning a friend, other than receiving ordination. As regards ordination, do please receive it by yourself.”

Whereupon, Anuruddha asserted: “My friend, my mother had said: ‘If your friend, King Bhaddiya, is prepared to receive ordination, you may do so.’ Friend Bhaddiya, you said: ‘Friend Anuruddha, if there is a relationship between your ordination and myself, let that relation no longer exist. You and I ... you may happily receive ordination as you please.’ Almost at the point of gratifying my wish you prevaricated and you have spoken evasive words to escape commitment. Friend, Bhaddiya, do let us go ... let us both receive ordination.” Anuruddha thus persistently made refusal impossible.

People of that time spoke the truth; they admired the truth. They were noted for being as good as their words; they always stood by their words.

King Bhaddiya said: “My dear Anuruddha, please wait for seven years and we will both receive ordination then.” – “My dear Bhaddiya, seven years is too long; I cannot wait for such a long time,” replied Anuruddha. Bhaddiya said in reply: “Please wait for six years,” and then successively five, four, three, two, one year reducing a year each time. “At the [487] end of one year, we will both receive ordination.” But Anuruddha insisted: “My dear friend, Bhaddiya, one year is too long a time; I cannot wait for that long.”

Bhaddiya then asked Anuruddha to wait for seven months; they would then both receive ordination. Anuruddha again replied that the period of seven months was a long time; he could not wait for such a long time. Bhaddiya eventually reduced the period of grace from seven to six, five, four, three, two, one and lastly half a month, but Anuruddha would not give in and again said fifteen days too was still a very long time and he could not wait that long.

At last King Bhaddiya as a final proposal asked for seven days grace to enable him to relinquish the duties of a king and hand over the affairs of the state to his son, elder and younger brothers. Anuruddha was satisfied and said: “My dear Bhaddiya, seven days is not too long a time; I will wait for seven days,” and they came to a mutual agreement.

Six Sakyan Princes and Upāli the Barber

The Group-of-Six princes comprising: 1) King Bhaddiya, 2) Prince Anuruddha, 3) Prince Ānanda, 4) Prince Bhagu, 5) Prince Kimila, 6) Prince Devadatta, the Buddha’s brother-in-law enjoyed earthly pleasures to the fullest, like Devas enjoying celestial luxuries, for full seven days before they went out of the city, as though going out for joyful garden sports, escorted by regiments of elephants, cavalry, chariots and infantry.

On arrival at the border, the four regiments of the army were ordered to return while they went into the neighbouring country of Malla. Once inside the country of Malla, the six princes took off their ornaments, wrapped them up with outer garments and handed the bundle to their barber Upāli, by way of a parting gift, saying: “My dear friend Upāli, you may return home. This should keep you going to an advanced age.”

Upāli, the barber, wept, rolling on the ground at the feet of the princes, as he was loath to part from his masters but he dared not disobey their command. So he was obliged to make his way home carrying the bundle of gifts. When Upāli parted from his masters, there was a loud and fearsome noise, as if the large, thick forest wailed and the great earth quaked and trembled in lamentation.

A little while after Upāli had separated from the princes he stopped and thought to himself: “The Sakyan royal families are harsh and ruthless. They might misjudge and wrongly conclude: ‘This barber, Upāli, has dispatched the six princes,’ and they might order me to be killed. If even these princes could abandon kingly luxuries and splendour to receive ordination, discarding priceless ornaments as they would spittle, why would a lowly, wretched person like me not be able to receive ordination?” So thinking and realising, he took out the precious things he had brought and hanging them on a tree, said: “I have given up these properties through generosity. Anyone who finds them is free to take them as he pleases.”

As soon as the six princes saw the barber, Upāli, coming from a distance, they questioned: “Friend Upāli, why have you returned to us?” Then he explained all that had occurred to him and what he had done. Then the princes told him: “Upāli, not going back to the royal city<sup>192</sup> is very good indeed! As you have thought, members of the royal Sakyan family are harsh and ruthless. Supposing you had returned, they might have had you executed under the false impression that you had done away with the six princes.”

The six princes took Upāli along with them to Anupiya Mango Grove where the Buddha was residing. On arrival, they respectfully paid homage to the Buddha, took their seat at places free from the six faults, and addressed him thus: “Most exalted Buddha, we Sakyan royalty, are harsh and stern with pride of birth! This man Upāli has been our servant for the many years past. We beseech you to give him priority in receiving ordination before anyone of us. By ordaining him in this way the rest of us would have to make homage to him, greet him when he approaches, and pay our respects with raised hands. By so doing, our Sakyan pride of birth, so harsh and stern, and our vanity, will be broken.” [488]

Then the Buddha had Upāli,<sup>193</sup> the barber, ordained first as requested and that was followed by the six princes.

The Buddha, accompanied by over 20,000 monastics, left the Anupiya Mango Grove, near the village of Anupiya, in Malla country, for Veḷuvana monastery, in Rājagaha, where he observed the second Rains Retreat together with 20,000 monastics.

Rains Retreat (Vassa): variously translated as Monsoon Retreat, Rains Retreat and Rains Residence. The Rains Retreat has to be observed for three out of the four months of the rainy season.

The Attainments of the Six Princes

[This section is moved here from the beginning of chapter 20, so as to keep the story together.]

The Buddha kept the second Rains Retreat (Vassa) at Veḷuvana monastery, Rājagaha. It was during this period that Ven. Bhaddiya became established as an Arahant accomplished in the three understandings (tevijja): knowledge of previous existences (pubbe-nivāsa-ñāṇa), knowledge of divine sight (dibba-cakkhu-ñāṇa) and knowledge of the destruction of the pollutants (āsavakkhaya-ñāṇa).

Ven. Anuruddha achieved the eight mundane meditation attainments (jhāna-samāpatti) during the first Rains Retreat after his ordination. Based on these attainments, he further developed divine sight (dibba-cakkhu-abhiññā), the supernatural power that enabled him to see the 1,000 world-elements. One day, he went to Ven. Sāriputta and told him (AN 3.130):

1. “Friend Sāriputta, in this Buddha’s Dispensation (sāsana), I can see the 1,000 world-elements by means of divine sight (dibba-cakkhu-abhiññā).
2. My effort is vigorous and resolute, not flagging. My mindfulness is clear and intent, wholly free from forgetfulness; my body is also calm and collected, completely free from anxiety; my mind is serene, fixed on a single object.
3. In spite of all this, my mind, though void of craving (taṇhā) and wrong view (diṭṭhi), is still not free from the grip of the pollutants (āśava).”

Meaning, he has not yet achieved Awakening. Whereupon, Ven. Sāriputta said: “Friend Anuruddha, 1) when you are preoccupied with the thought as described in your first statement, it is a case of pride (māna) arising in your mental continuum; 2) regarding the preoccupation described in your second statement, it is a case of distraction (uddhacca) arising in your mental continuum; 3) as regards your third statement, it means that you are being assailed by worrying over past commissions and omissions (kukucca). Let me beseech you, friend Anuruddha, to get rid of these three states of pride, distraction and worry, and to occupy your mind only with the thought of Nibbāna, the deathless state (amata-dhātu).” He then gave Ven. Anuruddha a discourse on the practice of meditation.

Having learnt the technique of meditation from Ven. Sāriputta, Ven. Anuruddha took leave of the Buddha and left for Ceti country and in the bamboo grove which lay east of where the Buddha was residing, he started practising meditation. He began practising in a walking posture for fifteen successive days without lying down. The strain was so severe that he became tired and weak. He could not help sitting down under a bamboo grove where he continued his meditation, contemplating on the eight thoughts of a great being (Mahā-purisa-vitakka). Having acquired seven of them, he became exhausted through strain at the eighth stage. When the Buddha knew of his distress, he came personally to the bamboo grove and helped him complete the eighth stage, by expounding the Discourse on Anuruddha’s Great Thoughts (Anuruddha-mahā-vitakka-sutta, AN 8.30) together with the Discourse on the Lineage of the Noble Ones (Ariya-vamsa-sutta, AN 4.28). Foreseeing that the very same forest would serve as a sufficing condition (upanissaya-paccaya) for the attainment of Awakening, the Buddha instructed him: “Anuruddha, carry on with your work during the next Rains Retreat also at this place.” After this, the Buddha left by means of psychic power (iddhi-vidha-abhiññā), and arrived immediately at the forest of Bhesakalā near the town of Susumāgiri in Bhagga country. On arrival there, the Buddha taught the discourse on the Discourse on Anuruddha’s Great Thoughts to the monastics residing in the forest there.

Ven. Anuruddha kept the next two Rains Retreat (Vassa) in the Bamboo Grove as instructed by the Buddha, and continued to practise meditation and eventually he attained the Arahāt fruition stage. [492]

Ven. Ānanda listened to the discourse given by Ven. Puṇṇa, son of a Brahmin woman named Mantāṇī, who explained the arising of the “I-concept” based on the five aggregates (khandha) with the illustration of a reflection of one’s own face from the clear surface of a mirror or a cup of water. He also taught Ānanda the triple-round discourse (teparivaṭṭa-dhamma-desanā) concerning the three characteristics of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and non-self (anatta) of the five aggregates. As a result of hearing these discourses from Ven. Puṇṇa and reflecting on them, Ven. Ānanda became a Stream-enterer (SN 22.83).

After all the elders (thera), as described above, had gained Awakening, the great elders Bhagu and Kimila also practiced insight meditation (vipassanā) and eventually they also became Arahats.

Ven. Devadatta also engaged himself in meditation practices but he was able to achieve only the eight mundane absorption (jhāna) attainments with the supernormal powers (iddhi) which is possible to those who are yet of the world (puthujjanika-iddhi). He was not a noble one but only an ordinary monastic with meditational power.

[A section here on the Rains Retreats observed by the Buddha has been moved to chapter 35a, where it summarises the 20 retreats up to that time, and the more steady Rains Retreats after that time, which were all spent in Sāvattihī.]

20a: Teaching Ven. Rāhula

[I have removed a fairly large section of text from here, as it was repeated in mostly the same words in chapter 31 below.]

When the Buddha was residing at Veḷuvana monastery in Rājagaha during the second Rains Retreat (Vassa), Rāhula, then a young novice, was residing in Ambalaṭṭhika meditation monastery and living a life of solitude (viveka). It was so-called because it was built near a mango sapling at the far edge of Veḷuvana monastery.

Just as a thorn naturally has a sharp point from the beginning of its growth, young Rāhula practiced physical solitude (kāya-viveka) and mental solitude (citta-viveka) since he was a youthful novice at the age of seven, without having been exhorted by anyone.

At that time, one cool evening, the Buddha, after rising from fruition attainment (phala-samāpatti), went to Ambalaṭṭhika meditation monastery and the novice Rāhula. When Rāhula saw him coming from a distance, he arranged the seating place for him and placed in readiness the water for washing his feet. The Buddha sat on the reserved seat after washing his feet, which was merely as a gracious acceptance of service rendered by a dutiful disciple, because his feet were always free from dust. Novice Rāhula seated himself at a spot free from the six kinds of fault, after making respectful homage to him.

1. The Buddha left a small amount of water in the basin after washing his feet and asked Rāhula: “My son Rāhula, do you see the small amount of water I have left in the basin?” – “Yes, my Lord,” replied Rāhula. Then he exhorted him: “Just as the water left in the basin is small, so the good and noble ascetic’s life, which should be practised to eradicate the defilements, is hopelessly small in the physical and mental continuum of persons who knowingly speak lies without any sense of shame.”

This was the first exhortation given by the Buddha.

2. The Buddha then poured away the little water he had left in the basin, and asked: “Son Rāhula, do you see I have thrown away the small amount of water?” – “Yes, my Lord,” replied Rāhula. Then he exhorted him: “Just as I have thrown away the little water in the basin, so persons, who knowingly speak lies without any sense of shame, throw away the good and noble ascetic’s life which eradicates defilements.”

Thus the Buddha gave the second exhortation.

3. The Buddha then overturned the basin placing it with its opening downwards, and asked Rāhula: “Do you see that I have overturned the basin?” – “Yes, my Lord,” replied Rāhula. Then he exhorted him: “Son Rāhula, just as the basin has been overturned, so persons who knowingly speak lies without any sense of shame have already repudiated the good and noble ascetic’s life which eradicates defilements.”

Thus the third [494] exhortation was given by the Buddha.

4. Then again the Buddha turned up the overturned basin, but by that time there was not a drop of water in the basin, and he said to Rāhula: “Son Rāhula, do you see this basin is without a single drop of water in it and it is altogether purposeless?” – “Yes, my Lord,” replied Rāhula. He then exhorted him: “Like this water basin without a drop of water in it which is altogether purposeless, so too within the shameless persons who knowingly tell lies, all is vain, and there is not a drop of the good and noble ascetic’s life which eradicates defilements.”

The Buddha, thereafter, proceeded to expound the discourse that follows: “My son Rāhula, take the worldly example of the performances of a warring elephant of a king. It worked with its fore legs as well as with its hind legs in a battlefield; it killed and destroyed all enemies coming within its reach by striking with its fore legs or by kicking with its hind legs. It worked with the fore as well as with the hind part of its body; as the opportunity arose, it smashed the enemy’s roofed wooden defence barricades with its fore or hind part of its body.

It also worked with its forehead, preparing to charge or stampede in any direction it gauged and took position moving backwards to muster strength and then stared intently. The very sight of the immense warrior elephant glaring thus struck terror into thousands of enemy troops and they fell into disarray. It also made use of its ears; it struck off the enemy arrows with its ears and made them fall to the ground. It also worked with the pair of its tusks; it gored the enemy elephants, horses, elephanteers, cavalry and infantry with its pair of tusks. It used its tail too; it cut and hacked the enemy with knives and maces tied to its tail with creeping vines. However, it still protected its trunk by coiling it into its mouth.

20a: Teaching Ven. Rāhula – 652

Reflecting on these performances of the king's warring elephant, the thought occurred in the mind of its rider: "This warrior elephant of the king, on the battlefield, works with both its pair of fore legs and hind legs, and with the fore part of its body as well as with its hind part. It also works with its forehead, its pair of ears, pair of tusks and also with its tail. However it protects its trunk by thrusting it into its mouth. This warrior elephant has no mind yet to sacrifice its life.

Son Rāhula, at another time, the king's great warrior elephant on the battlefield as stated above worked with its fore legs as well as with its hind legs ... it fought also with its tail. With its trunk also it worked, holding aloft iron or wooden maces, and striking and demolishing targets eighteen cubits high.

On seeing this behaviour of the warrior elephant, it occurred to the mind of the rider: "The king's great warrior elephant in battle has worked with its fore legs as well as with its hind legs ... it has worked with its tail. It has also worked with its trunk. The king's warrior elephant has given up its life. Now there is nothing the mighty warrior elephant would not do." Son Rāhula, I say unto you, in like manner for the shameless person who knowingly tells lies, there is no act of demerit which he dares not do.

Therefore Rāhula, you should resolve: 'I will not speak lies, even jokingly or even for fun,' and strive to observe the three training rules (sikkhā)."

The Buddha had thus profoundly stressed the importance of refraining from telling lies. He went on: "Son Rāhula, what do you think of what I am about to ask you? Answer me as you please. What are the benefits of a mirror?" Rāhula replied: "One can benefit from it by improving one's facial appearance when one sees black moles and pimples reflected in it."

"In like manner, son Rāhula, one's physical, verbal and mental activities should be performed after due observation and consideration with one's eye of wisdom." With this brief preface to serve as a table of contents, the Buddha taught the discourse dealing elaborately on how one should do bodily actions, how one should speak, and how one should exercise the mind with great care and only after careful consideration use one's intellectual faculty.

The full elaboration of the discourse should be read in the text or its translation. But a [495] brief account of it is given below.

When an intention arises to perform a physical, verbal or mental act, before doing any of them, one should deliberate first: “Would my intended physical, verbal or mental action prove to be harmful to myself, to another person or to both? Would they become demeritorious deeds which would cause increased suffering?” If, after deliberation, the intended actions would prove harmful to oneself, to another or both; or would become demeritorious deeds which would cause increased suffering, one should strive to avoid performing such physical, verbal and mental deeds. On the other hand, after deliberation, if these intended actions prove not to be harmful to oneself, to another or to both; or would become meritorious deeds which would promote happiness (sukha), then such physical, verbal and mental deeds should be performed.

Likewise, while in the process of performing a physical, verbal or mental deed, one should deliberate thus: “Is what I am doing, saying or thinking harmful to myself, to another or to both? Are they demeritorious deeds causing increased suffering?” If, after deliberation, they are found to be so, one should, with moral aversion, cease performing any such deeds without proceeding any further. On the other hand if, after deliberation, they are found to be not harmful to oneself, to another or to both, but are meritorious deeds furthering the cause of happiness and well-being, they should be pursued with vigour, again and again.

When any physical, verbal or mental act has been performed, one should deliberate as in the foregoing manner thus: “Have my physical, verbal or mental actions been harmful to myself, to another or to both? Have they been demeritorious deeds that have caused increased suffering?” If they proved to be so, with regard to demeritorious physical and verbal deeds, admission must be made before the Buddha or a wise and knowledgeable fellow disciple, frankly, clearly and without reservation that such wrong physical and verbal acts have been committed. Then one must discipline oneself that such wrong deeds will not recur in future.

With regard to demeritorious mental activities that have been committed, one should be weary of such mental acts, be ashamed of them and loath them. One must also exercise restraint and discipline oneself so that such misdeeds will not recur in future.

If, after such retrospection and deliberation, one finds that one’s physical, verbal or mental deeds have not harmed oneself or another or both but have contributed to promote happiness and well-being, then night and day, one may dwell in the joy and satisfaction associated with such meritorious deeds and one must further strive in the observance of the three trainings (sikkhā).

All the Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas and noble disciples (ariya-sāvaka) of the past, the future and the present had lived, will live and are living in this manner, deliberating and retrospecting on their physical, verbal and mental deeds and they have purified, will purify and are purifying all their physical, verbal and mental actions.

The Buddha concluded the discourse with these words of exhortation: “Dear son Rāhula, you should bear in mind always to strive for the purity of your bodily actions, verbal actions, and mental actions by way of deliberation and reviewing them and develop the observance of the three trainings.”

Herein a question may arise as to when and where such physical, verbal and mental actions may occur and how they should be purified and absolved.

No time should be lost. The physical and verbal actions, which are done in the morning, should be purified and absolved immediately after the meal, as one sits down at the very place where one would spend the day.

A monastic is required to review any offensive physical and verbal act he has done against anyone from dawn to the time of his arrival at the place where he is sitting to spend the day. If he recollects that he has done anything wrong against someone, either by physical or verbal action, he should make a confession to fellow monastics, by way of informing them or making them clear [496] about his offence. In case he is free from such taints of wrong deeds, he will actually feel great personal joy and satisfaction and should remain in that state of ease and happiness.

As regards mental activities, he should seek to be purified and absolved from them while still going on the alms round, by retrospecting thus: “While going on the alms round today, has there arisen in me, because of visual objects, etc., any mild or stronger form of greed, any offensive anger or any kind of delusion?” If he should find that some such thought has indeed arisen in him, he should resolve: “I will not allow such thoughts of greed, anger or delusion to arise again.” If no wrong thoughts have arisen in him he should feel joy and satisfaction for himself and he should continue to dwell in that serene state of mind.

20b: Ven. Nanda's Story

[This story was originally after that of the Wealthy Man Anāthapiṇḍika, but as it continues the story of the Buddha's relatives, has been moved to here.]

While the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana monastery, his younger brother, Ven. Nanda, being unhappy as a member of the Saṅgha, told his associates: "Friends, I am not happy living the life of a monastic in this Dispensation (Sāsana), I am practising the three training rules reluctantly. I am unable to continue observing these noble precepts. I intend to give up the practice and return to a layman's life."

When the Buddha heard the news, he sent for Ven. Nanda and asked: "Have you told your monastic companions: 'Friends, I am not happy living the life of a monastic in this Dispensation (Sāsana), I am practising the three training rules reluctantly. I am unable to continue observing these precepts. I intend to give up the practice and return to a layman's life.' " Whereupon, Ven. Nanda admitted: "It is true, my Lord."

The Buddha then asked him again: "Dear younger brother Nanda, why have you been observing the three noble precepts against your will? Why can you not continue to observe these training rules? Why do you want to give up the life of a monastic and revert to that of a layman?"

Ven. Nanda said: "Most exalted elder brother, when I left the royal palace carrying your alms bowl on my shoulder, my sister and betrothed, the Sakyan Princess Janapadakalyāṇī came dashing to the window with her hair half-dressed, and said to me: "Your highness, please come back quickly." I keep thinking of these words of my betrothed ever since I left the palace, and that is the reason why I have to practise the three training rules against my will and pleasure, and I am no longer capable of observing the precepts. I shall now give up the life of a monastic and revert to a layman's life." Nanda gave this simple and honest answer.

The Buddha then, taking along Ven. Nanda, went to the Tāvātimsa Realm by his supernormal powers as though lifting him by the arms. On the way, he showed Ven. Nanda an aged female monkey sitting on a burnt stump of a tree, with her ears, nose, tail and other parts of the body, big and small, burnt and tattered. On arrival at Tāvātimsa, he drew Ven. Nanda's notice to 500 celestial maids whose feet were as tender-red as pigeons' feet, who had come to wait upon Sakka and who were standing and worshipping him. He said: "Dear younger brother Nanda, what do you think of this question? Who looks prettier and lovelier when your sister, your fiancée, the Sakyan Princess Janapadakalyāṇī is judged in comparison with the 500 celestial maids whose feet are as tender-red as pigeons' feet?"

The beautiful delicate feet of these maids, with the colour of pigeons' feet, was the result of their offering of emollient oil for the feet of monastics who were disciples of the Buddha Kassapa.

A question might arise here as to why the Buddha had aroused the sensual passion of Ven. Nanda by showing him the celestial maids when his mind was already affected with lust.

The answer is: "The Buddha had done so with the object of easily removing the defilements from Ven. Nanda's mind." To explain further, a wise and experienced physician, in an attempt to cure a patient suffering from a disease caused by excessive phlegm, bile and wind, usually gives doses of oily medicine to enhance the existing symptoms; that is followed by an emetic to remove the phlegm with ease and speed, through the mouth or by purging with doses of purgative.

In the same way, the greatest of all the physicians, who has no equal [511] to match his skill, in admonishing worthy beings, showed the fair celestial maids to Ven. Nanda, who was affected by the defilements (kilesa), in order to let his mental defilements grow and reach the climax preparatory to eradicating it by means of the noble path (ariya-magga) which serves as an emetic to throw out the defilements, as a purgative to purge the defilements.

Whereupon, Ven. Nanda gave this reply: "Most exalted elder brother, the old female monkey which you have shown me on the way, with her ears, nose, tail tattered through being burnt, can in no way be considered as lovely and pretty. And likewise, my sister and fiancée, the Sakyan Princess Janapadakalyāṇī, too, when compared to the 500 fair maids of the celestial world, can no longer be regarded as a model of beauty; indeed the 500 celestial maids are far more pretty and lovely than the princess."

Then the Buddha gave him this assurance: "Dear younger brother, Nanda, take delight in the practice of the three training rules; take delight in the holy practice of the precepts which are my instructions. If you actually take delight in the noble practice, I assure you of acquiring the 500 celestial maids whose dainty feet are as tender-red as pigeons' feet.”

When the Buddha gave such an assurance, Ven. Nanda responded: “Most exalted elder brother, if you assure me of the 500 fair maids whose feet are as tender-red as pigeons' feet, I shall undertake to observe the three noble training rules of the Dispensation (Sāsana) with delight.”

It might be asked here why the Buddha had assured Nanda of the 500 fair maids for the gratification of sensual pleasure, which is a mode of ignoble living (abrahma-cariya-vāsa) while he wanted Nanda to observe the three noble practices.

The answer is: Ven. Nanda's carnal attachment to Princess Janapadakalyāṇī was intense; and the Buddha had therefore diverted his attention to the fair celestial maids as a measure of temporary relief before he could relieve him totally of the prime trouble by means of the noble path (ariya-magga); hence the use of the ploy of ignoble living.

Then the Buddha, together with Ven. Nanda, vanished from Tāvātimsa and appeared in the Jetavana monastery instantaneously. When Ven. Nanda took leave of him and had gone to his chamber to spend the time, the Buddha explained all that had transpired to the monastics who assembled to listen to his teaching.

Having informed the assembled monastics of what had happened, the Buddha gave the following instructions to them: “Go ye now, monastics, to rebuke Ven. Nanda, by calling out to him: “You big servant who wants something for his service. You are a great buyer who buys something at a fixed price in exchange.”

In giving these instructions the Buddha was making use of a practical method employed in the world. A skilful person extracts an old nail, left firmly fixed to a post or a plank, by hitting it with another nail but smaller to cause it to vibrate before it could be loosened by hand and removed. In the same way, Ven. Nanda's intense attachment, deeply rooted in the person of Princess Janapadakalyāṇī, was first given a loosening jolt and then removed by the temporary diversion to the more attractive celestial maids. Then, in order to do away with the new object of sense-pleasure and put Ven. Nanda back on the path of noble practice, the Buddha gave the above instructions to the assembled monastics.

In obedience to the Buddha's instructions, these monastics went about spreading the news that the son of step-mother Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī, and younger brother of the Buddha, Ven. Nanda, had been observing the noble precepts out of desire for the 500 celestial maids, and that the Buddha had also assured him of acquiring the 500 celestial maids whose feet are as tender-red as pigeons' feet. On hearing this, Ven. Nanda's friends went and heaped reproaches on him. [512]

“It is being said by the people: ‘Ven. Nanda is a big servant; Ven. Nanda is a great buyer.’ He has been observing the precepts because he desires the 500 fair maids of the Deva realm; and the Buddha has also assured him of getting the 500 maids whose feet are as tender-red as pigeons' feet.”

Being called “big servant” and “great buyer” by his monastic associates, Ven. Nanda was filled with unbearable shame and disgust. He retired to a secluded place and strove with mindful and earnest diligence in the observance of the monastic training rules with his mind inclined towards Nibbāna and soon drained off all the pollutants (āsava), and attained full-fledged Awakening. He became recognised as one of the 80 great disciples (asīti-mahā-sāvaka).

Whereupon an Arahāt Brahma approached the Buddha at night and, standing at a suitable distance, joyfully informed him of the Ven. Nanda's attainment of Awakening. Immediately after hearing the tidings, the Buddha, on contemplating: “How fares he?” became aware of Ven. Nanda's attainment of Awakening through his omniscience.

As stated above, because of reproaches and jeers heaped upon him by his associates, Ven. Nanda developed a sense of spiritual urgency through shame and remorse: “Having entered the Dispensation with a well-expounded teaching and disciplinary rules (Dhamma-Vinaya), I have held the Buddha responsible for assuring me of getting the 500 celestial maids; as such I have committed a grave misdeed.” Accordingly, he strove hard relentlessly until he became an Arahāt.

He then considered that it would be well to go to the Buddha and relieve him from the responsibility of the assurance he had made. He therefore approached the Buddha early the following morning and made the following address: “Most exalted elder brother, you have assured me of the hands of 500 celestial maids with feet as tender-red as pigeons' feet. Most exalted elder brother, I now absolve you from that responsibility.”

The Buddha said in reply: “Dear younger brother, Nanda, I have already known, by judging the state of your mind analytically with my own, that you have become an Arahat. An Arahat Brahma also informed me earlier of your attainment to the exalted state of an Arahat. I have been absolved from that responsibility from the very instant your mind became free of the pollutants (āsava).”

The Realised One was greatly pleased and made the following utterance of exultation (Ud 3.2):

Yassa nittinño paṅko, maddito kāma-kaṇṭako, mohakkhayaṃ anuppatto, sukha-dukkhesu na vedhatī sa bhikkhu.

A noble one (ariya) has crossed the slough of wrong view, in other words, the slough of Samsāra, by way of the bridge of the noble path to the shore of Nibbāna. The thorn of sensual passion that pierced the heart of all sentient beings has been crushed to dust with the cudgel of wisdom. Such a noble person has traversed the fourfold path (magga) and reached Nibbāna, attaining Awakening, the point of the cessation of delusion (moha). That Arahat monk, who has thus destroyed the darkness of the defilements, is no longer affected by joy or sorrow. He remains unshaken and indifferent to worldly vicissitudes.

Soon afterwards, a number of monastics asked Ven. Nanda: “Friend Nanda, you said in the past that you were not happy within the Dispensation (Sāsana) as a monastic; what is the state of your mind these days?” Ven. Nanda replied: “Friends, at present, I have no mind at all to revert to the life of a layman.”

On hearing these words of Nanda, monastics rebuked him, saying, [513] “Ven. Nanda is telling lies; he is talking about the Arahat fruition (Arahatta-phala). He had quite recently been saying that he was not happy in this Dispensation (Sāsana) and now he is saying that he has no mind at all to revert to the life of a layman.”

They then went to report the matter to the Buddha, who explained to them: “Monastics, in the immediate past, Nanda's corporeality was just like a badly roofed house, but now, it is like a house which is properly roofed. True, this Ven. Nanda strove for the highest level of attainment of a monastic after he had seen the fair maids of the world of the Devas, with the result that he has now reached that highest level of attainment and is an Arahat.”

The Buddha then gave a discourse by reciting the following two verses (Dhp 13-14):

Yathā agāraṃ ducchannaṃ, vuṭṭhī samati-vijjhati, evaṃ abhāvitaṃ cittaṃ, rāgo samati-vijjhati.

Monastics, just as rain-water can penetrate and flood a badly roofed house, so the mind, which has not been trained through tranquillity and insight meditation, is liable to be inundated with defilements, that is, to be flooded with the rain waters of lust, malice, delusion, conceit, etc.

Yathā agāraṃ succhannaṃ, vuḍḍhī na samati-vijjhati, evaṃ subhāvitaṃ cittaṃ, rāgo na samati-vijjhati.

Monastics, just as rain-water cannot penetrate and flood a properly roofed house, so the mind, which has been trained through tranquillity and insight meditation, cannot be inundated with defilements, that is, cannot be flooded with the rain waters of lust, malice, delusion and conceit, etc.

By the end of this discourse, a large number of monastics attained the fruition stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga). Thus this discourse was of great benefit to many persons.

The Story of Kappaṭa

Some time after, the monastics were gathered at the Assembly Hall for discussion of the Dhamma and speaking in praise of the Buddha thus: “Friends, Buddhas are really great and worthy of praise with the snapping of fingers. Even Ven. Nanda, who had almost lost interest in the life of a monastic, has been disciplined by employing the fair Deva maids as an allurement.”

At that moment, the Buddha entered the hall and asked: “Monastics, what kind of discussion are you engaged in as I came into the hall?” – “We are assembled here, discussing the marvellous way in which the Buddha has disciplined Ven. Nanda.”

Whereupon the Buddha said: “Monastics, it is not only on this occasion that I have exhorted Ven. Nanda, by employing a female as an enticement, I also won him over by using the same tactic in the past,” and at the request of the monastics, he expounded the Birth Story about Kappaṭa (Kappaṭa-jātaka) that follows (from DhpA 1.9, Nandatthera-vatthu):

“Monastics, once upon a time, there was a trader by the name of Kappaṭa in the city of Bārāṇasī during the reign of King Brahmadaṭṭa. He had a donkey that could carry a load weighing one third of a cart load and could travel seven leagues in a day.

Once, he went to the city of Takkaṣilā accompanying a caravan of merchants [514] carrying merchandise for sale. He set his donkey free to seek for pasture and graze while his goods were being disposed of. As the donkey wandered around grazing on the soft ground near the palace moat, he espied a female donkey and approached her. He eventually became engaged in conversation with the female donkey and the two exchanged words of love:

Female: Where do you come from?

Male: I come from Bārāṇasī.

Female: On what business have you come?

Male: I have come for trading purposes.

Female: What is the weight of the goods that you have to carry?

Male: I have to carry goods weighing one third of a cart load.

Female: How many leagues have you got to cover carrying such a load in a day?

Male: I have to cover seven leagues a day.

Female: Have you someone to look after you wherever you go?

Male: No, I haven't anybody.

Female: It's a pity you have to go about unattended. You must be undergoing great hardships, aren't you?

She spoke with seductive insinuations to win his heart. On hearing these seductive words from the female donkey, the male donkey lost interest in his work and became listless.

After disposing of his merchandise, the trader, Kappaṭa, went to his donkey and said: “Come, dear son, let's be off.” The animal replied: “You may go by yourself, I cannot follow.” When the trader had made several vain attempts to persuade the donkey to obey him, he decided to use threats to make him obey:

Patodaṃ te karissāmi, sāḷasaṅguli-kaṇṭakaṃ, sañchindissāmi te kāyaṃ, evaṃ jānāhi gadrabha.

You mean and wicked donkey, I shall have to goad and beat you with a sixteen-inch long cane, tipped with iron spikes. I shall have to lacerate your body until it is broken and torn into tatters. Take heed of that.

When the donkey heard this threat, he retorted by saying: “If that should be the case I too, have to mind as to how I should retaliate.”

Patodaṃ me karissasi, soḷasaṅguli-kaṇṭakaṃ, purato paṭiṭṭhahitvāna, uddharitvāna pacchato, dantaṃ te pātayissāmi, evaṃ jānāhi Kappaṭa.

O merchant Kappaṭa, if you will actually goad and beat me with a sixteen-inch long cane, tipped with iron spikes, I shall stand firmly on my forelegs and raising my hind legs, kick you with all my strength to break and knock out your teeth. You might as well know that.

When the trader Kappaṭa heard this bold and aggressive retort of the donkey, he wondered what caused it, and looking round, he saw a maiden donkey nearby. Then he thought to himself: “This maiden donkey must have taught him to speak like this. It would be wise to allure him away and tell him: ‘My son, I will get you such a maiden donkey.’” [515]

Catuppadim saṅkha-mukhim, nāriṃ sabbaṅga-sobhinim, bhariyaṃ te ānayissāmi, evaṃ jānāhi gadrabha.

My big son, I will find a young, beautiful, well-formed maiden donkey with a face as fair as a conch-shell to be your wife soon after our arrival back at Bārāṇasī. My son, you can take my word for it.

The donkey was very pleased with the encouraging words of his master and replied:

*Catuppadim saṅkha-mukhim, nāriṃ sabbaṅga-sobhinim,
bhariyaṃ me ānayissasi, evaṃ jānāhi Kappaṭa,
Kappaṭa bhiyyo gamissāmi, yojanāni catuddasa.*

My benefactor and master, Kappaṭa, if it is really true that a beautiful well-formed youthful maiden donkey with a face as fair as a conch-shell will be obtained for me soon after we have returned to Bārāṇasī, I, your good son, am prepared to work with redoubled zeal, breaking a journey of fourteen leagues a day. You can take my word for it.

Trader Kappaṭa then took the donkey with him to his home town of Bārāṇasī. A few days after their arrival, the donkey went to Kappaṭa and asked him to fulfil his promise: “My benefactor and master, Kappaṭa, have you not promised me a beautiful, well-formed, youthful, maiden donkey as my wife?” Then trader Kappaṭa replied: “Yes, it is true I have said so; I will not fail to fulfil my promise. I will find you a beautiful, well-formed, youthful, maiden donkey; but I will be able to provide food for you only, not for your wife. It is up to you to think if the food that I offer you will or will not be sufficient for both of you. And another thing, I wish to emphasise is that, in due time, you will have offspring to look after, and here again, it is for you to consider whether the food which I provide you will be sufficient for your growing family. It is not my responsibility. Think about it, my son.” As the trader Kappaṭa was giving this sound advice, the donkey's attachment to the female donkey was severed.

Recounting the Birth Story about Kappaṭa (Kappaṭa-jātaka) in his discourse, the Buddha revealed: “Monastics, the Sakyan Princess Janapadakalyāṇī then was the maiden donkey, Ven. Nanda then was the donkey, and I was then the trader Kappaṭa. I had thus, at a time long past, also disciplined Ven. Nanda with the lure of a female,” and he brought the discourse to a conclusion.

20c: The Wealthy Man Anāthapiṇḍika

How Anāthapiṇḍika Met the Buddha

The Buddha granted permission to monastics to make use of the monastery as a requisite, in compliance with the request by the wealthy man of Rājagaha,<sup>194</sup> who made it through the monastics while he was residing there during the second Rains Retreat.

The wealthy man of Rājagaha and the wealthy man, Anāthapiṇḍika of Sāvattḥī, were brothers-in-law because they married each other's sister. On the occasions when the wealthy man of Rājagaha found the prices of goods in Rājagaha were far below those currently at Sāvattḥī, he would buy the goods and go to Sāvattḥī with 500 carts loaded with such goods for sale. One league before his arrival at Sāvattḥī, he would send intimation of his arrival to Anāthapiṇḍika who would then arrange a grand reception for his brother-in-law, and the two would enter the city together in the same carriage. If the goods found a ready market in Sāvattḥī, the rich man of Rājagaha disposed of them at once. In case they did not find a ready market, he left them in the house of his sister and went back. The wealthy man, Anāthapiṇḍika, also did likewise at Rājagaha.

At the time when the Buddha was observing his second Rains Retreat (Vassa) in Rājagaha, the wealthy man, Anāthapiṇḍika of Sāvattḥī, had 500 carts loaded with products at Sāvattḥī and left for Rājagaha. He sent a written intimation of his arrival to the wealthy man of Rājagaha from a distance of one league, as on the many previous occasions.

The wealthy man of Rājagaha could not, however, give any heed to his intimation for he had just returned from the remote monastery of Sītavana where he had listened to a discourse by the Buddha and having invited him and his Saṅgha to partake of alms food the following day, he was busily engaged with the work, making the necessary arrangements for the reception and provision of food.

Anāthapiṇḍika approached the city thinking all the way that a grand reception would await his arrival as on previous occasions, but he found no reception, even on his reaching the door of the house of the rich man of Rājagaha. On entering the house, there was not much of an effusive speech of welcome on the part of his host, but only: “Wealthy man of Sāvattḥī, how are your children? Are they in good health? I hope you have had an easy and comfortable journey.” And he kept himself busy with the work in hand.

As stated above, the wealthy man of Rājagaha could only extend these few words of welcome to Anāthapiṇḍika. He was giving priority to the ceremonial functions and he went on giving instructions to his men: “Mind that you get up early on the morrow and get busy with boiling the broth, cooking rice and curry, and preparing mixed salad dishes, all replete and in time for the Buddha and his Saṅgha.”

It crossed the mind of Anāthapiṇḍika: “The wealthy man of Rājagaha used to leave aside all other business and talk with me enthusiastically on previous occasions, but now he is full of anxiety about holding a grand feast for one reason or the other. Is he doing all this with his servants to bring someone’s daughter here to get married to his son (āvāha) or [497] give away his daughter in marriage to some one’s son (vivāha) or else, has he invited King Bimbisāra and his retinue of soldiers to a feast tomorrow?”

When everything had been arranged, the wealthy man of Rājagaha came to Anāthapiṇḍika and engaged himself in conversation with him enthusiastically as ever before. Whereupon, Anāthapiṇḍika asked him: “Wealthy man, you used to leave aside cares of business and speak with me joyfully on all previous occasions. But now you seem to be anxious about holding a food-offering ceremony, giving priority to making arrangements with your men in preparation for the ceremony to be held tomorrow. Is it for a ceremony to bring someone’s daughter to your house for marriage to your son, or a ceremony to give away your daughter in marriage to someone else’s son? Are you preparing for a great alms giving ceremony, or have you invited King Bimbisāra and his retinue of soldiers to a feast tomorrow?”

The wealthy man of Rājagaha replied: “Wealthy man, I will not be holding ceremonies to give or take in marriage. Nor have I invited King Bimbisāra and his retinue to a feast. I have been making the necessary arrangements for a grand alms giving ceremony. I have invited the Buddha and his Saṅgha so I can do a meritorious deed tomorrow.”

When Anāthapiṇḍika heard the word ‘Buddha’ uttered enthusiastically by the wealthy man of Rājagaha, his entire body was pervaded throughout with the five grades of joyful satisfaction (pīti): a slight sense of interest (khuddaka-pīti), momentary joy (khaṇika-pīti), an absorbing interest with a flood of joy (okkantika-pīti), interest amounting to a thrilling point (ubbega-pīti) and fully developed, intensive rapture or zest suffusing the whole body and mind (pharaṇa-pīti).

Anāthapiṇḍika experienced this fivefold rapturous joy which overwhelmed him from head to toe and again from toe to head; they spread from the side of his body to the middle and from the middle to the sides. Feeling these five kinds of ecstasy without intermission, he asked the wealthy man of Rājagaha: “Wealthy man, did you say ‘Buddha’?” Thrice he asked and thrice he received the same reply: “Yes, I did say ‘Buddha’.”

Anāthapiṇḍika then inquired about the Buddha: “In this world, it is rare indeed even to hear the word ‘Buddha’. Would it be possible for me now to go and pay homage to the Buddha, the Arahāt, the Perfectly-Self Awakened?”

The wealthy man of Rājagaha deliberated: “It is as difficult to approach the Buddha as it is to get close to a venomous snake. The Buddha’s remote monastery where he is residing is close to the cemetery and it would be impossible for him to go there late in the evening.”

He therefore made this reply: “Wealthy man, there is no time now for you to go and pay homage to the Realised One, the Arahāt, the Perfectly Self-Awakened. You will be able to go and pay homage to the Realised One only early tomorrow morning.”

Upon hearing this, Anāthapiṇḍika thought to himself: “I shall be able to pay homage to the Buddha only early in the following morning,” and he went to sleep with no other thought or object in mind except that of the Buddha.

Anāthapiṇḍika was no longer interested in the merchandise that he had brought and the attendants at his service from the moment he heard the word ‘Buddha’. Forgoing his dinner, he went up to the topmost chamber of the seven-storey mansion and laid himself down on a well-laid out and decorated bed and fell asleep, muttering: ‘Buddha, Buddha.’

When the first watch of the night was over, Anāthapiṇḍika got up to contemplate the attributes of the Buddha time and again. His sense of deep devotion towards him became exceedingly great (balava-saddhā), so much so that his body emitted a radiance through joy (pīti). It was as if 1,000 oil lamps were lit or the sun or the full moon rose in the sky, thereby dispelling the darkness of the night. He then thought to himself: “I have been so forgetful of the passing of time. Even the sun has risen,” thus he murmured and got up. But [498] when he saw the moon still in the sky, he realised that two more watches of the night had yet to pass before dawn. So he lay down on his bed once again.

Thus he passed the two watches of the night, getting up at the end of each watch. At the close of the last watch, immediately before dawn, he walked along the balcony till he reached the main entrance door. He found the entrance door of the seven storey mansion already open. He went down the seven storeys and walked along the main street in the city.

As he went near the city gate, the guardian Devas, who were noble ones (ariya), kept the gate open in advance. They considered: “This wealthy man has come with the intention of paying homage to the Buddha and serving him. This rich man on his worshipping the Buddha for the first time will be established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala), and surpassing all others will become the noblest of disciples in rendering service to the Three Treasures of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha. He will build a magnificent, matchless monastery, the doors of which he will keep open to all the noble Saṅgha from the four directions of the world. It would not be proper to close the door against him.”

As Anāthapiṇḍika went out of the city, the radiance emitting from his body disappeared and darkness reigned, with the result was that fear and trembling arose in him and the hair of his body stood on end. Therefore, he felt like retreating even from that very spot.

Rājagaha was a cosmopolitan city with a population of 180 million: 90 million within the city and 90 million without. The city gates were closed after dusk and the bodies of those who died at unearthly hours during the night were thrown over the walls around the gate. Blinded by the darkness, Anāthapiṇḍika accidentally trod on a freshly discarded corpse and tripped against another corpse with his insteps. This caused the flies on the decomposed bodies to rise with a roar and buzz about him and the foul smell from the dead bodies rushed into his nose. As a result, his devotional faith towards the Buddha began to weaken which resulted in the disappearance of the radiance from his body which was emitted because of the rapturous joy he felt within. Darkness fell. Fear and trembling arose and his hairs stood on end. Therefore he felt like retreating from that place.

20c: The Wealthy Man Anāthapiṇḍika – 668

A celestial Yakkha, intending to make the wealthy man exert himself to continue his journey, approached Anāthapiṇḍika without making himself visible and addressed him with a voice as sweet as the tinkle of a small golden bell.

Sataṃ hatthī sataṃ assā, sataṃ assatarī-rathā, sataṃ kaññā-sahassāni, āmukka-maṇi-kuṇḍalā, ekassa pada-vīti-hārassa, kalam nāgghanti soḷasiṃ.

O wealthy man of great fame, 100,000 royal elephants worthy of kings, 100,000 royal horses worthy of kings, 100,000 royal chariots drawn by mules (assatara), and 100,000 royal maidens bedecked with priceless jewels are not worth a 256th part of the good volition (cetanā) behind each step that takes you on your way to the monastery to pay homage to the Realised One, to listen to a discourse, and to render service to the Saṅgha. Wealthy man, Anāthapiṇḍika, go forward. Proceed on your way. Only your going ahead will be noble and worthy of praise. Your retreat will be ignoble and not worthy of praise.

On hearing this Anāthapiṇḍika considered: “I thought I was all alone, but I now find there are some companions with me. Why should I be afraid?” He became bold and courageous. His powerful devotional faith in Buddha began to strengthen once again. Therefore darkness disappeared, and there was light, and fear and trembling were dispelled. [499]

He was on the road once again, on the fearful journey through the cemetery, with dead bodies in varying states of decomposition scattered all over. The voices of domestic dogs and jackals disturbed his mind with the result that light disappeared and darkness fell as on the previous occasion. Here again, the celestial Yakkha, Sīvaka, came to his aid and he went along the road again.

When for the third time, as on the previous occasions, he encountered the disheartening circumstances of the disappearance of light, Sīvaka, by making him nurture his devotional faith in the Buddha again and again, helped him overcome all danger. Continuing on his journey, he eventually arrived at the forest grove of Sītavana. It was about daybreak and the Buddha was walking up and down the passage in the open space.

As Anāthapiṇḍika was walking, an idea crossed his mind: “In this world, Purāṇa Kassapa and the other sectarian teachers have declared themselves Awakened Buddhas. This being so, how can I know whether the Buddha is truly a Self-Awakened One?” Then again in his mind the thought occurred: “All the people know me as Anāthapiṇḍika for my generosity in feeding the destitute. But the name given to me by my parents is Sudatta, which no one knows except myself. If the Buddha is truly a Self-Awakened One, he will call me by the name given by my parents, Sudatta.”

On seeing Anāthapiṇḍika from a distance, the Buddha came down from the passageway and sat on the seat reserved for him. As Anāthapiṇḍika came nearer to him, having read his mind, he addressed him: “Come, dear Sudatta.” Anāthapiṇḍika was rejoiced when he heard the Buddha calling him by the name given by his parents.

He approached him and paid homage, prostrating himself at the feet of the Buddha and addressed the Fortunate One: “Most exalted Fortunate One, have you enjoyed a sound sleep?” the Buddha said in reply (SN 10.8):

Sabbadā ve sukhaṃ seti, brāhmaṇo parinibbuto, yo na limpati kāmesu, sīti-bhūto nirūpadhi.

Wealthy man Anāthapiṇḍika, the Arahāt, who is not besmeared with desire for sensual pleasures, being free from burning passions, is calm and serene. He is also free from the three grounds for rebirth (upadhi): defilements (kilesa), accumulated deeds (abhisankhāra) and sensual passion (kāma-guṇa). Having expelled all evil, and all defilements having been eradicated, all sorrow has ended and as such that Arahāt, at all times, night and day, truly sleeps and lives in ease of mind and body.

Sabbā āsattiyo chetvā, vineyya hadaye daram, upasanto sukhaṃ seti, santim pappuyya cetasā.

Wealthy man Anāthapiṇḍika the Arahāt, who has cut off the five sensual pleasures by means of the fourfold Arahāt path (Arahatta-magga), and extinguished the flames of the defilements, has frequently entered the tranquil state of Nibbāna by way of the attainment of the Arahāt fruition (Arahatta-phala-samāpatti). Having extinguished the blazing fire of the defilements, he sleeps and lives with ease and tranquillity.

Having thus explained how he lives with ease and comfort in all the four postures of the body, the Buddha taught Anāthapiṇḍika the course of moral practice leading to the paths and fruitions: 1) Generosity (dāna-kathā), 2) morality (sīla-kathā), 3) heaven (sagga-kathā), 4) path (magga-kathā), the disadvantages of sensuality (kamānaṃ ādinavaṃ), and the advantages of renunciation (nekkhamma-ānisaṃsa-kathā) in the correct sequence. When he knew that the mind of Anāthapiṇḍika had become adaptable, soft, and free from hindrances, eager, gladdened, purified and pellucid, he taught the Dhamma which was originally discovered by him (sāmukkamsikā Dhamma-desanā), the four noble truths. Eventually, Anāthapiṇḍika became established in Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). [500]

Then Anāthapiṇḍika addressed the Buddha thus: “So delightful is it! Exalted Buddha! So delightful is it! Exalted Buddha! As though what is placed downwards has been turned up, so goes a worldly simile, as though what is covered has been disclosed, as a man losing his way has been guided in the right direction, as a lamp that has been lighted in the dark with the thought: ‘Those who have eyes may see the various shapes of things,’ so the Buddha has clearly taught me the Dhamma in manifold ways. Exalted Buddha! I recognize and approach the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha for refuge and shelter. May the exalted Buddha, take me as a devotee with the threefold refuge from today onwards, until the end of my life.

Having thus taken refuge in the Three Treasures, the wealthy man Anāthapiṇḍika extended an invitation to partake of a meal, saying: “Exalted Buddha, in order that I may gain merit and have delight, may you accept my offering of a meal together with the Saṅgha tomorrow morning.”

The Buddha remained silent, signifying his acceptance of the invitation to the next morning meal. Whereupon, Anāthapiṇḍika joyously rose from his seat and, after paying respects to the Buddha by circumambulating him clockwise, he left for the residence of his host, the wealthy man of Rājagaha.

The news of the Buddha’s acceptance of Anāthapiṇḍika’s invitation to a meal instantly spread all over the city. The wealthy man of Rājagaha, on hearing the news, offered to render service, saying: “I have heard the news that you have invited the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha to a meal tomorrow in order to gain merit. You happen to be a visitor here; may I offer you assistance with provisions and payment for services?” Anāthapiṇḍika refused the offer saying that he would be able to manage the affair with what was in his own possession.

20c: The Wealthy Man Anāthapiṇḍika – 671

Members of the merchants' association of Rājagaha also came forward to help by way of supplying provision and payment of services in the same way as the wealthy man of Rājagaha. Their offer was also not accepted in like manner.

King Bimbisāra also offered to render help in the same way as the others, and his request was also refused in the same way: “Your majesty, I need no such help. I should be able to hold the feast with what I have.”

On the following day, Anāthapiṇḍika held the food-offering ceremony at the residence of his brother-in-law, the wealthy man of Rājagaha, serving food of great worth with delicacies. He then sat at a suitable spot and respectfully presented an invitation to come to his home town of Sāvattḥī: “Most exalted Buddha, may I humbly request you? Please keep the Rains Retreat (Vassa) in our town of Sāvattḥī, together with all your monastics.” The Buddha gave the reply: “Devotee Anāthapiṇḍika, Fully Self-Awakened Buddhas are pleased to reside in secluded places.” Anāthapiṇḍika replied: “Exalted Buddha who always speaks good words (Gracious One), your devotee understands that full well, your devotee understands that full well.” Then after speaking words of Dhamma to Anāthapiṇḍika, the Buddha returned to the monastery.

At that time, Anāthapiṇḍika was a person who had a great many friends, and his word was respected by many. He disposed of his merchandise and hastily returned to Sāvattḥī. On his way home, he urged the inhabitants at the intermediate stations: “Plant gardens, build shelters for rest and lodging. Build monasteries and keep reserves of provisions for alms giving. A Buddha has blossomed forth in the world. That Buddha will be coming to your place at my request.”

In response to Anāthapiṇḍika's exhortation, all his wealthy associates and childhood friends, at the intermediate stations, built shelters, parks and gardens, kept provisions for alms giving at their own expense without accepting any assistance from him, while the [501] needy ones took the responsibility of building shelters and monasteries and set up reserve provisions for alms giving with the money that they received from him.

Anāthapiṇḍika contributed 100,000 in cash and in kind, such as timber and construction materials, to the value of 100,000 to accomplish the project of constructing a shelter and a garden at each league along the route between Rājagaha and Sāvattḥī, a distance of 45 leagues. He returned to his home town of Sāvattḥī after completion of the work.

The Purchase of the Jetavana

On arrival at Sāvattḥī, Anāthapiṇḍika searched the surrounding localities for a suitable site for a monastery; a site which must meet the following five conditions: 1) not too far from the city; 2) not too near the city; 3) communicable by roads; 4) of easy access for everybody at any required time; and 5) free from noise of the city, village and people clamouring for the five sense objects. He found that Prince Jeta's garden land met the said conditions and so he went to the prince and offered to buy it: "Your Highness, I wish you would sell me your garden at a certain agreed price." Prince Jeta replied: "Wealthy man, I cannot give you my garden even if you were to lay gold coins edge to edge over it."

Note that if Prince Jeta had said: "I cannot sell my garden," it would not be tantamount to fixation of a price. But he happened to say: "I cannot give you my garden even if you were to lay gold coins edge to edge over it." That was tantamount not only to a fixation of a price but also to quoting an exorbitant price for it.

Anāthapiṇḍika took advantage of Prince Jeta's commitment in his speech and said: "Your highness, you have quoted terms for the sale of your garden." Prince Jeta's denied it saying: "I have not said a word about the sale of my garden."

Anāthapiṇḍika contended that the prince had to sell his garden while the prince argued that he had never said a word about the sale of the garden and the two finally agreed to secure the judgment of a court of law. The ministers who were judges passed the judgment: "Your highness, because your highness happened to have quoted an exorbitant price with the words: 'Even if gold coins were laid edge to edge' you have committed yourself to negotiations for the sale of your garden."

Having thus won the case at the court of law, Anāthapiṇḍika ordered cartloads of gold coins taken out and transported and laid them edge to edge over the surface of Prince Jeta's garden. For the spaces which could not be laid over with gold coins such as those occupied by trees and ponds, he had the dimensions of their girth or areas measured and placed the gold coins, edge to edge, over equivalent areas at other places. In this way, the rich man, Anāthapiṇḍika, spent 180 million gold coins, which he had put aside for emergency use, in buying the site for the monastery.

With the first batch of cartloads of gold coins, it was found that there were enough gold coins to cover much of the garden-land when placed edge to edge except for a small area earmarked for the construction of an archway.

Anāthapiṇḍika ordered his men: “Men, go and bring more cartloads of gold to cover this space for the archway constructions.”

On seeing that Anāthapiṇḍika’s face grew brighter and brighter as he went on giving away his enormous amount of wealth, the prince reflected: “The abandoning of immense wealth in gold coins by the wealthy man for a good cause such as this must be a noble act of generosity.” With this thought, he requested Anāthapiṇḍika: “Enough, enough! Please do not lay any more coins on that plot. Please be so good as to leave it for me to donate an archway for the monastery.” Anāthapiṇḍika thought to himself: “This Prince Jeta is a famous person, well known to all. Showing devotional faith in the teaching of the Buddha by such a famous personage will be greatly beneficial.” So he left the required plot to the [502] prince who proceeded to build an archway with tiered roofs for the monastery.

The Construction of Jetavana

Having bought the garden of Prince Jeta at a cost of 180 million gold coins, Anāthapiṇḍika spent another 180 million to create a magnificent monastery on it. First he had unwanted trees felled, leaving the desirable ones for the sake of shade and natural beauty. The perfumed chamber (gandha-kuṭi) for the accommodation of the Buddha was surrounded by dwellings for monastics with stately seven-tiered archways constructed at a selected place. Assembly halls with terraced roofs for the Saṅgha, small buildings to store allowable articles, lavatories, passage ways with roofing, water wells complete with roofs over them, bath rooms for both cold and sweat baths in separate buildings, square water tanks and pavilions were constructed within the sacred precincts of the monastery, leaving nothing which would be needed.

The location of the Jetavana monastery was not only the site of the monastery of this Gotama Buddha alone; it was also the location of the monasteries of the preceding Buddhas, such as Buddha Kassapa, Koṇāgamana, etc., as related below:

1. During the time of Buddha Vipassī, a wealthy man, named Punabbasumitta, bought a piece of land at the very site of this Jetavana monastery, then measuring one league, by paying with golden bricks placed edge to edge on it. Constructing a huge monastery on it, he donated it to the Saṅgha.

2. During the time of Buddha Sikhī, a wealthy man, Sirivaḍḍha, bought a piece of land at the same site by paying, according to the Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentary, with the golden teeth of ploughs placed tip to tip; or with golden staffs placed end to end according to the Vinaya commentary, and donated it, measuring three miles, after constructing monasteries on it, to the Saṅgha.
3. During the time of Buddha Vessabhū, a wealthy man, Sotthika, bought a piece of land at the same site by paying with golden blocks moulded into the shape of elephant legs according to the Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentary; or the golden teeth of ploughs according to the Vinaya commentary, placed end to end and donated it together with all the buildings on it, to the Saṅgha. The plot measured half a league or two miles.
4. During the time of Buddha Kakusandha, a wealthy man, Accuta, bought a piece of land in the same site, then measuring one mile, by paying with gold bricks according to the Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentary; or gold blocks made into the shape of elephant legs according to the Vinaya commentary, placed end to end all over the land and donated it to the Saṅgha together with all the buildings on it.
5. During the time of Buddha Koṇāgamuna, a wealthy man, Ugga, bought a piece of land in the same site by paying with golden tortoises according to the Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentary; or golden bricks according to the Vinaya commentary, placed end to end on the land measuring half a mile and donated it together with all the buildings constructed on it, to the Saṅgha.
6. During the time of Buddha Kassapa, a wealthy man, Sumaṅgala, bought a piece of land in the same site by paying with gold blocks according to the Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentary; or golden tortoises according to the Vinaya commentary, placed edge to edge all over the land, then measuring two units of land measure, and donated it together with the monasteries constructed on it, to the Saṅgha.

7. Now in the time of our Buddha Gotama, the wealthy man Sudatta, also known as Anāthapiṇḍika, bought a piece of land in the same site, measuring eight units by paying with gold coins placed edge to edge on it and after building the Jetavana monastery donated it to the Saṅgha.

Reflecting seriously on the varying extent of land and the price paid for the site of the [503] monastery at the time of the seven Buddhas, one should arouse in oneself the sense of spiritual urgency that “all worldly attainments of success and prosperity are subject to deterioration,” and thus now is the appropriate time for strenuous effort to free oneself from attachment to these worldly attainments through developing weariness and disenchantment towards them.

Buddha’s Journey to Sāvattḥī

When the delightful and pleasant Jetavana monastery had been constructed at a cost of 180 million gold coins, on an enchanted plot costing another 180 million gold coins, Anāthapiṇḍika sent a special messenger to the Buddha with his respectful invitation. The Buddha, upon receipt of the invitation through the messenger, decided to proceed to Sāvattḥī, partly because he foresaw that Sāvattḥī would become one of his residences for the greater part of his life, and partly because it would also serve as a favourable “victory ground” for him to save humans, Devas and Brahmas by the millions from the slough of suffering. With that end in view, he left Veḷuvana monastery in Rājagaha for Sāvattḥī, accompanied by his Saṅgha, stopping one night at the shelters at each station, located at intervals of one league along the route, as arranged by Anāthapiṇḍika in advance.

When the Buddha arrived at Vesālī on the way to Sāvattḥī, he resided at the Kūṭāgāra monastery with terraced roofing in the Great Wood. At that time, he laid down the rule for the appointment of a monk, with the consent of the community (kamma-vācā) to take charge of the repairs (navakamma) necessary for monastic dwellings donated by the public.

Then, after leaving Vesālī and proceeding towards Sāvattḥī, pupils of the Group-of-Six monks (Chabbaggī), having gone along ahead of the Saṅgha with the Buddha at its head, took possession of the good dwelling places, the good sleeping places, saying: “This will be for our preceptors, this will be for our teachers.”

Whenever the Buddha went on a journey accompanied by the Saṅgha, Ven. Sāriputta, though he could selfishly claim the privilege of staying close to the Buddha as the chief disciple at the right-hand, he would never do so and leave other monks to look after themselves, but would follow at the tail end of the procession, personally caring and seeing to the comfort of the aged and sick monks.

Such being the case, on this occasion also, having followed at the very end of the procession, he arrived late and all beds and places being taken up by the Group-of-Six monks. Having nowhere to sleep, he had to spend the night at the foot of a tree. The Buddha, coming to know of this incident, considered: “If, while I am still living, monks behave without respect for and showing deference towards one another, what would they do when I attain Parinibbāna?”

Being filled with great urgency for the Dhamma (Dhamma-saṁvega), he caused an assembly of monks to be held in the morning and asked: “Monks, is it true that monks of the Group-of-Six monks, having gone along ahead of others, took possession of the good dwelling places for themselves, denying suitable resting places for the elder monastics?”

On being told that it was true, the Buddha rebuked the Group-of-Six monks and, after having given a reasoned Dhamma talk, asked the monastics: “Who, monastics, is worthy of priority concerning place, water for washing, and food?”

Some monastics replied: “Monastics of the royal blood have prior claim to a place, washing water and food;” some said: “Monastics of the Brahmin class have the priority concerning a place, washing water and food;” others again said: “It is monastics of the wealthy householder class who are worthy of being offered first a place, washing water and food;” while others maintained: “One well versed in the Discipline, or a Dhamma teacher (Dhamma-kathikā), one possessed of the first absorption (jhāna) ... the second absorption ... the third absorption ... the fourth absorption ... are worthy of the first offer of a place, washing water and food.”

Finally, there were those who opined that: “One who is a Stream-Enterer (Sotāpanna) ... Once-Returner (Sakadāgāmi) ... Non-returner (Anāgāmi) ... an Arahāt with simple insight (sukka-vipassanā) ... an Arahāt without super knowledge (abhiññā) ... an Arahāt with the three knowledges (tevijja) ... an Arahat with the sixfold super knowledges (chaḷ-ābhiññā) is worthy of the best seat, the best water for washing, the best alms.” [504]

Then the Buddha addressed the monks: “Monastics, in dealing with the matter of priority to a place, water for washing or alms food, in my Dispensation, consideration of birth, blood, caste and social status is of no importance, nor of being a bearer of Vinaya, Dhamma or Abhidhamma; nor of being possessed of the first absorption, and so on, nor of being a Stream-enterer, and so on.

In reality, dear monks, those within my Dispensation should live paying due respect, rising up and greeting with both palms together in salutation, giving proper homage according to seniority; the best seat, the best water for washing, the best alms should be accorded in order of seniority. In the matter of receiving the best seat, and so on, only seniority in age, seniority with regard to the duration of monkhood is of consequence. Thus the monastic with such seniority is worthy of such priority.

At the present time, monastics, Sāriputta is the chief disciple on my right. He keeps the Dhamma Wheel taught by me in motion; he is one worthy of my place when I am no more. Sāriputta had to spend the whole of the previous night walking or sitting under a tree for want of a place to rest. Monks, when there are such deeds of disrespect and lack of consideration on the part of monks even during my life time, how will the members of the Saṅgha behave in the time to come after I attain Parinibbāna?”

Then the Buddha, in order to exhort the monks, told them the story of three friends: a partridge, a monkey and an elephant (Tittira-jātaka, Ja 37):

“Monastics, in ancient times, even animals came to an understanding: ‘It is not proper to be disrespectful and disobedient to one another; we will determine first who is the oldest amongst us and then we will show due respect and pay homage to him.’ Then having chosen the oldest of them, they honoured him and obeyed him, thus cultivating the practice of paying respect to the elder (vuḍḍha-pacāyana) which led them to rebirth in the Deva realm.

Ye vuḍḍha mapacāyanti, narā Dhammassa kovidā, diṭṭheva dhamme pāsaṃsā, samparāye ca suggati.

Those who are wise in the practice of paying respect to the illustrious and the aged, choose among the three categories of birth, virtue and age, those who are both virtuous and senior in age they honour and show respect to.

Such people are worthy of praise, even in this life and have prospects of becoming celestial beings in future existences.

Monks, even these three animals, a monkey, an elephant and a partridge could live together for mutual benefit, courteous, deferential and polite to one another. If you, who have gone forth and received ordination through faith (saddhā-pabbajita) in my Dispensation (Sāsana), which dispenses righteous instructions, live without mutual benefit, without courtesy, without regard for one another, can such behaviour be seemly or proper? Indeed, it cannot be. Such conduct, lacking due respect and humility also cannot arouse respect and esteem for this Dispensation (Sāsana) in those who are still outside it ... and so on.”

After teaching the discourses extensively on the importance of mutual respect and reverence, by way of rebuking the Group-of-Six monks, the Buddha proclaimed the following rule of discipline: “I allow monastics, paying due respect, rising up and greeting with both palms together in salutation, giving proper homage according to seniority; the best seat, the best water for washing, the best alms should be accorded in order of seniority. Monastics, in the matter of monastic dwellings and sleeping places belonging to the whole Saṅgha one should not hinder their occupation according to seniority. For whoever should do so there is an offence [505] of wrong doing (dukkata-āpatti).”

Unworthy and Worthy Monastics

Having thus laid down the two rules, one concerning what was allowable (anuññāta), and the other concerning what is not allowable (paṭikkhitta), the Buddha continued to address the monks saying: There are these ten individuals enumerated here, who should not be worshipped:

1. A monastic ordained earlier should not worship another who received ordination later.
2. A monastic should not worship anyone who is not a monastic.
3. A monastic should not worship anyone belonging to a different communion (saṃvāsa), who speaks what is not Dhamma (adhamma-vādī), even if he is more senior.
4. A monastic should not worship a woman.
5. A monastic should not worship a eunuch.

6. A fault-free monastic (pakaṭa) should not worship a monastic under suspension from association with the rest of the Saṅgha (parivāsika).
7. A fault-free monastic (pakaṭa) should not worship a monastic who has been judged to undergo the stages of penance again, starting from the first stage of probation (parivāsa) for having transgressed one of the offences Requiring a Meeting of the Saṅgha (Saṅghādisesa) which are expiable while observing the probation penance; while undergoing a further period of penance (mānatta), for six days to gain approbation of the Saṅgha; while having undergone penance, and is about to be reinstated (abbhāna).
8. A fault-free monastic should not worship a monastic, who, having observed the probation, has been judged to undergo penance.
9. A fault-free monastic should not worship a monastic who is undergoing the penance.
10. A fault-free monastic should not worship a monastic who, having undergone penance, is about to be reinstated (abbhāna).”

Having thus explained the ten kinds of person not worthy of homage, the Buddha continued to give an enumeration of the three types of individuals who deserve to be venerated.

“Monastics, these three types of individual are worthy of veneration:

1. A monastic ordained earlier is worthy of veneration by one ordained later.
2. A senior monastic belonging to a different communion if he speaks what is Dhamma (Dhamma-vādī) is worthy of veneration.
3. In the world of sentient beings with its humans, Devas and Brahmas, the Arahat, Perfectly Self-Awakened, exalted Buddha is worthy of veneration by all beings.”

Rules concerning Buildings and Furnishings

All along the route by which the Buddha travelled to Sāvattḥī in the company of the Saṅgha, local people built pavilions, temporary sheds furnished with mattings and Assembly Halls in anticipation of their visit. Here again, disciples of the Group-of-Six monks went ahead and occupied the dwelling places as on the previous occasion and, as a result, Ven. Sāriputta was obliged to spend the night under a tree as he arrived with the group at the end of the procession.

The Buddha investigated into the truth of the matter and rebuked the Group-of-Six monks and prescribed a set of additional rules for observance by the Saṅgha: [506] Na, bhikkhave, uddissa-katam-pi yathā-vuḍḍham paṭibāhetabbam. Yo paṭibāheyya, āpatti dukkaṭassa, “monastics, even before formal consecration, pavilions and temporary sheds, etc., meant for the whole Saṅgha can be occupied without hindrance by the Saṅgha in order of seniority. Whoever should hinder such occupation in order of seniority, there is an offence of wrong doing (dukkāṭa-āpatti).”

Concerning the Group-of-Six monks (cha-vaggiya), the sub-commentary Diamond Intelligence (Vajira-buddhi) says that the Group-of-Six monks made their appearance only when the Buddha had completed the first 20 years of his Buddhahood. And there is the statement in the Discourse giving the Simile of the Saw (Kakacūpamasutta, MN 21): Ārādhayimsu vata me, bhikkhave, bhikkhū ekam samayam cittam ... “during the first period after Awakening of 20 years, the monastics had behaved so well as to give much delight to the Realised One.” It is a matter for consideration here that the account given above of the Group-of-Six monks can be reconciled with those given in the sub-commentary Diamond Intelligence (Vajira-buddhi) and the Discourse giving the Simile of the Saw only by assuming that the story given here of the Group-of-Six monks’ behaviour was taken from the account of the journey to Sāvattḥī on a later occasion. This is included just to highlight the rulings made by the Buddha on some types of offences.

Now at that time, village people appointed elevated places (uccā-sayana), and exalted places (mahā-sayana) in the alms house of the village and furnished them with a long-tufted carpet, a many-coloured wool coverlet, a white wool coverlet, a wool coverlet with floral designs, a cotton quilt, a woollen carpet decorated with animal forms, a carpet with fur on both sides, a carpet with fur on one side, a coverlet with gold embroidery, a silken coverlet, a large size woollen carpet, an elephant rug, a horse rug, a chariot rug, rugs of antelope hide, a coverlet of bear skin, a fancy red ceiling, a couch with red cushions at either end. Monastics, not being certain whether they are allowable did not sit on them.

When the matter was related to the Buddha, he made the following ruling concerning them: Anujānāmi, bhikkhave, ṭhapetvā tīṇi: āsandim, pallankam, tūlikam, etc., “monastics, with the exception of three things: a couch with very long legs, a divan, a cotton quilt, I allow you to sit on what is appointed by the people as elevated places, exalted places, but not to sleep on it.”

In the village, in the same alms house, people provided a low bedstead quilted with silk cotton on both upper and lower sides; monastics, being meticulous, did not use it. The Buddha made a ruling also in this matter: Anujānāmi, bhikkhave, gihivikataṃ abhinisīdituṃ, natveva abhinipajjituṃ, “I allow you, monastics, to sit on the bedstead quilted on both sides, provided by the people, but not to sleep on it.”

As stated above, the Buddha, accompanied by many monastics, set out on his journey from Rājagaha towards Sāvattihī and in due time arrived at the boundary of the Sāvattihī region. The wealthy man, Anāthapiṇḍika, having attended to preparations for a grand ceremony to make the formal offering and dedication of the monastery to the Buddha with the symbolical pouring of water, made arrangements to conduct the Buddha to the monastery on a grand scale as described below.

Princess Sumanā

King Pasenadi Kosala had a daughter, named Sumanā, who, during the time of Buddha Vipassī, was the daughter of a wealthy man and was known as Saddhā Sumanā. Being quick-witted and intelligent, she took the opportunity of offering thick milk rice, which was prepared with pure unadulterated milk to Buddha Vipassī before anyone else did. Having made her offering to the Saṅgha headed by the Buddha, she made this wish: “Exalted Buddha, wherever I am reborn throughout the long journey in Saṃsāra, may I never have to [507] earn my living in want and with great difficulty; and may I be reborn as a much loved and charming lady for offering this garland of jasmine flowers and be known as Sumanā (Jasmine).” Her wishes were fulfilled as she was never reborn in the planes of misery. She was born only either in the plane of the Devas or humans throughout the past 91 aeons. In all these existences, because showers of jasmine flowers fell almost knee-high at her birth, she had always been named Sumanā (Sumanā-sutta, AN 5.31, and its commentary).

At the time of her birth, there was a shower of jasmine flowers, spreading nearly knee-high all over the palace. She was, therefore named Sumanā by her royal father. There were also 500 girls who were born simultaneously with Princess Sumanā. The Princess and her 500 coevals were brought up in luxury. As insignia of office and trappings of rank, the Princess was provided with 500 coaches; and whenever she moved out from the palace, she was accompanied by her 500 birth mates each in her own coach.

Throughout the whole of Jambudīpa, one of the four great continents, there were only three young women who were provided, as symbols of rank and office, by their fathers with 500 attendants, each with a coach. They were: 1) Princess Cundī, daughter of King Bimbisāra; 2) Visākhā, who later became the supporter of the Pubbārāma monastery, daughter of a wealthy man, Dhanañjaya; and 3) Sumanā, daughter of King Pasenadi Kosala.

Princess Sumanā was seven years old when the Buddha went to Sāvattihī to accept the Jetavana monastery. Anāthapiṇḍika went to King Pasenadi Kosala and made the request: “Your majesty, the coming of the Buddha to our town of Sāvattihī is a blessing for us and, as well as a blessing for your majesty. I would like to request you to send your daughter, Princess Sumanā, together with her 500 attendants, each carrying a pot filled with water and scents and flowers, for the reception of the Buddha. The king agreed saying: “Very well, wealthy man,” and made the necessary arrangements to comply with Anāthapiṇḍika’s request.

As ordered by her father, Princess Sumanā set out together with her attendants, in full insignia befitting a princess, to take part in receiving the Buddha. They offered scents and flowers to the Buddha and then took seats at appropriate places. The Buddha taught Dhamma to Sumanā with the result that she and her 500 attendants attained the fruition of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). At the same time, 500 other young women, 500 elderly women, and 500 laymen devotees also attained Stream-entry. Thus 2,000 persons achieved the stage of Stream-entry while the Buddha was still on his way to the Jetavana monastery that day.

Anāthapiṇḍika’s Own Arrangements

Anāthapiṇḍika had not only arranged for Princess Sumanā’s participation in conducting the Buddha to the monastery, but also for his son and 500 attendants, who were sons of wealthy men of Sāvattihī. In compliance with his father’s wishes, Anāthapiṇḍika’s son and his 500 attendants in their five-hued ceremonial dress, each holding a bright streamer, took their positions in front of the Buddha and led the procession right up to the monastery.

Next to their brothers, came the two daughters of Anāthapiṇḍika, Cūḷā Subhaddā and Mahā Subhaddā, with their 500 female attendants, who were daughters of wealthy men of Sāvattihī, and each carrying a pot full of water.

Then came the wife of Anāthapiṇḍika, Puṇṇā Lakkhaṇā, in full ceremonial dress and bedecked with jewellery, accompanied by the wives of 500 wealthy men, each holding a gold or silver cup full of sweet scents and other offerings.

At the end of the procession to welcome and receive the Buddha came Anāthapiṇḍika himself in a newly made dress of a wealthy man, accompanied by his party of 500 [508] wealthy men, all in newly made dresses of wealthy men.

Led by the long procession, the Buddha proceeded, attended by many monastics, causing the surrounding forest to glow golden, as liquid golden yellow orpiment, with the aura of his presence. Then with the infinite grace and glory of an omniscient Buddha, he entered the precincts of the Jetavana monastery.

Formal Donation of Jetavana

At the conclusion of the reception ceremony, Anāthapiṇḍika approached the Buddha and respectfully invited him and his monastics to a meal offering ceremony at his residence, the following day. Having made all arrangements for a sumptuous meal of hard and soft food at his house the next morning, Anāthapiṇḍika sent a messenger to the monastery, informing him: “Most exalted Buddha, it is time to partake of the meal; the food offering is ready.” The Buddha, accompanied by his Saṅgha, went to his house and took seats at the places reserved for them. Anāthapiṇḍika personally attended to the Buddha and his monastics by offering delicious food to them with zealous devotion and sat at a suitable distance. He then addressed the Buddha: “Most Exalted Buddha, may I know how the Jetavana monastery should be dedicated.”

The Buddha then gave this instruction to Anāthapiṇḍika: “It would be proper for you to dedicate the monastery to all of the monastics who have arrived, are still arriving and may arrive from the four directions.” Guided by the instructions of the Buddha, Anāthapiṇḍika dedicated the Jetavana monastery to the Saṅgha who have already arrived, are still arriving and may arrive from the four directions (āgatānāgata-catuddisa-saṅgha), by pouring ceremonial water as a token thereof.

Five Verses of Appreciation

Having accepted the formal offer of Jetavana monastery, the Buddha delivered a discourse in five verses to express appreciation for the donation of the monastery (Vinaya Cūḷa-vagga, PTS 2.148):

Sītaṃ uṇhaṃ paṭihanti, tato vāḷa-migāni ca, sarīsape ca makase, sisire cāpi vuṭṭhiyo.

The monastery which you have donated provides sufficient conditions for protection from the dangers of extreme cold caused by internal disturbances of elements or external inclemency of weather; the danger of heat caused by wild forest fires; the danger of wild beasts, such as lions, leopards, tigers; the danger of reptiles and creeping creatures, such as snakes and scorpions; the danger of gnats, mosquitoes and flies whose bites harm concentration; the danger of biting cold from week long unseasonal rains during the period of two months from the 1st waning moon of January (Phussa) to the full moon of March (Phagguṇa) (sisira-utu); and the danger of torrential rains during the rainy season.

Tato vātā-tapo ghore, sañjāto paṭihaññati, leṇatthañ-ca sukhatthañ-ca, jhāyituñ-ca vipassitum, vihāra-dānaṃ Saṅghassa, aggaṃ Buddhena vaṇṇitaṃ.

The monastery which you have donated provides sufficient conditions for protection from violent and fearful seasonal winds of great velocity and intense heat: it enables monastics to live in solitary seclusion without mental distraction; it enables them to live without danger, and with happiness; it enables them to cultivate meditation (jhāna) practices; it enables them to practice insight meditation (vipassanā).

Those who donate monasteries should make it a [509] point to bear in mind such benefits rendered to the Saṅgha by the monastery they have donated. Buddhas, past and present, have extolled the donation of a monastery to the Saṅgha, as being noble.

Tasmā hi paṇḍito poso, sampassam attham-attano, vihāre kāraye ramme, vāsayettha bahussute.

Therefore, a wise man of good birth, who considers well and perceives the benefits for himself in the human world and for Nibbāna, should build monasteries for the Saṅgha to live with ease and comfort of body and serenity of mind. Having built them, he should dedicate them to monastics who are wise and virtuous and have the necessary qualities and qualifications to control and look after them as a presiding monk, namely: 1) One who has a full ten years (vassa) of monastic life; 2) one who is well acquainted with two sections of Vinaya, viz., the male monastic rules (bhikkhu-vibhaṅga) and the female rules (bhikkhuni-vibhaṅga); 3) one capable of administering and performing various deeds pertaining to the Saṅgha according to the Discipline (Saṅgha-kamma); 4) one with the knowledge of the aggregates; and 5) one versed in the analytical knowledge of mind and matter (nāma-rūpa). It is necessary to select an elder (thera) with these qualifications to be appointed as presiding monk of these monasteries.

Tesaṃ annañ-ca pānañ-ca, vattha-senāsanāni ca, dadeyya uju-bhūtesu, vippasannena cetasā.

To the inwardly upright, virtuous and knowledgeable residents of the monastery, the supporters should offer alms food, drinks, robes and lodging with a mind full of faith in the Three Treasures and in the beneficial results of good deeds.

With this verse the Buddha instructs the supporters of monasteries to support the resident monk with the four requisites also.

Te tassa Dhammaṃ desenti, sabba-dukkhāpanūdanam, yaṃ so Dhammaṃ idhaññāya, parinibbāti anāsavo.

The learned monastics, who reside in the monasteries, should, in return, preach with compassion and loving-kindness the Dhamma which would lead to emancipation from all the sufferings of the cycle of rebirth for the benefit of the supporters of these requisites. In my Dispensation with eightfold wonders, the supporter of the monastery, endowed with pure faith, hearing such Dhamma discourses from the resident monks and practising them according to their instructions, will become enlightened, and with complete eradication of the pollutants (āsava) and cessation of suffering became Arahats.

The Buddha, after delivering this discourse on the benefits of donating a monastery (vihārānisamsa) in appreciation of Anāthapiṇḍika's dedication returned to Jetavana monastery.

The ceremony held for the successful donation and dedication of the monastery started from the second day of the arrival of the Buddha and lasted nine months.

The ceremony held by Visākhā, the wife of a wealthy man, on the occasion of the dedication of the Pubbārāma monastery lasted only four months. The cost of the nine month's celebration [510] consisting of offerings of various alms amounted to 180 million.

Thus, as a measure of support to the Dispensation (Sāsana), Anāthapiṇḍika spent altogether 540 millions in gold: 180 million for the cost of the site, 180 million for the construction of the monastery and 180 million for the celebrations for the successful dedication of the monastery.

The Second, Third and Fourth Rains Retreats

Concerning the second, the third and the fourth Rains Retreats kept by the Buddha at Rājagaha, the ancient treatise of Wasozin, an account of the series of Rains Retreats kept by the Buddha, deals only with the three stories described below.

1. The story of a friend of Ven. Sāriputta, who was a Brahmin.
2. The story of Cunda, a butcher of pigs.
3. The story of Ven. Mahā Kassapa.

The Wasozin treatise concludes the account of the second, the third and the fourth Rains Retreats (Vassa) with these words: Thus the Buddha, in keeping with the promise given to King Bimbisāra, [516] spent the second, the third and the fourth Rains Retreat (Vassa) at Rājagaha, expounding such discourses and showing innumerable Devas and humans the path to Nibbāna. [517]

21: Sumana, Aggidatta and Jambuka

The Story of the Flower-Seller Sumana

The Buddha taught a verse, beginning with the words (Dhp 68): Tañ-ca kamman katam sādhu, “having done an act, the doer has no bitter regret for it,” on the advantages of a reward for a deed of merit with reference to a flower seller named Sumana of Rājagaha during his stay at Veļuvana monastery in that city (for the story see DhpA V.9).

The flower seller used to present King Bimbisāra with eight measures of Royal Jasmine (Jasminum grandiflorum) every morning, for which he was granted eight pieces of money each day. One day, as Sumana was entering the city with the flowers as usual, the Buddha, attended by many monastics, was also entering the city for alms round, with a radiant light shining forth from his body, and with great dignity, splendour and the glories of a Perfectly Awakened Buddha.

Sometimes, the Buddha used to go round, like an ordinary monastic on an alms round, with the six radiant lights concealed by the robes. For instance he went out all alone incognito to a distance of 30 leagues to meet Aṅgulimāla, the notorious robber. But, at other times, he used to go with radiant light shining, for instance, when he went on alms round in the city of Kapilavatthu. And, on this day, when he was to meet Sumana, the flower seller, the Buddha entered the city of Rājagaha with radiant light shining forth from his body, and with great dignity, splendour and the glories of a Perfectly Awakened Buddha.

When Sumana saw the Buddha – with a body like an ornamented gateway column, replete with the 32 major characteristics and 80 minor characteristics, with the six-coloured radiant light emitting from his body – enter Rājagaha to go on alms round with great dignity, splendour and with the glory of a Perfectly Awakened Buddha, there arose in him intense devotional faith and reverence for him.

He then considered: “What kind of offering should I make to gain merit?” When he could not think of anything with which to pay homage to the Buddha, he thought of offering the flowers in his hands. But, on second thought, he came to realize: “These are the flowers meant for presentation to the king, as a matter of daily routine. If I fail to do my daily duty, I shall be liable to be put in the stocks, bound with ropes and imprisoned or executed or expelled from the country.

What should I do?" A bold thought entered his mind at this juncture: "Let the king kill me, should he so desire, put me in jail, expel me from the country. I might be rewarded by the king for carrying out the daily duty; such a fortune would be sufficient for my livelihood during the present life. But if such an offering is made to the Buddha, it is certain that I will reap the fruits of my meritorious act for aeons to come." He, therefore, decided to sacrifice his life in making his homage to the Buddha.

He was, at the same time, mindful that he should act while his intense devotional faith was at its pitch and so he started offering the flowers in the following manner:

1. First, he threw two handfuls of flowers high above the head of the Buddha; the flowers formed into the shape of a canopied ceiling, hanging in the air right above the head of the Buddha.
2. Then he threw two handfuls of flowers in a like manner; the flowers came down, standing in the form of a flower curtain on the right side of the Buddha.
3. Again, he threw two handfuls of flowers in a like manner; the flowers came down, standing in the form of a flower curtain at the back of the Buddha.
4. Lastly, he threw two handfuls of flowers in a like manner; the flowers came down, standing in the form of a flower curtain on the left side of the Buddha. [518]

Thus, the eight measures of Royal Jasmine flowers stood around the Buddha like a canopied ceiling with curtains of flowers on the top, right, left and back, leaving a space in front just enough for the Buddha to enter. It is remarkable that the flowers fell in place with the flower stalks turning inward and petals outward in an orderly fashion.

The flower curtain around the Buddha, like a silver screen, moved along together with him as if it were an animate body, without sundering apart or falling down. It stopped wherever the Buddha made a rest. Rays of light emitted continuously from five places: the front and the back, the right and left sides and from atop the head of the Buddha, like millions of flashes of lightning. Having emerged from the body of the Buddha, every single shaft of these radiances first turned clockwise three times round him, forming a mass of bright light resembling a search-light beam directed towards the Buddha, the size of a young palm tree, before shooting away ahead of him.

The whole city of Rājagaha with a population of 180 million was agog with excitement and agitation, and came out clamorously. Of the 180 million men and women, there was none who came out without holding vessels filled with alms food for offering.

All the citizens, clamouring and proclaiming aloud and courageously like a lion king, throwing aloft their twisted headdresses, moved along in large groups, leading the procession before the Buddha. The Buddha, in order to bring out the attributes of Sumana, the simple flower seller, walked along the main streets within the city covering an area of approximately three miles. Hence the entire body of Sumana was suffused with five forms of delightful satisfaction (pīti).

Sumana went along with the Buddha only for a distance, like a person who took a plunge into a red orpiment-coloured stream of water, then he entered into the compass of the brilliant radiance emitted by the Buddha and after paying reverential homage to him, he left for home carrying the empty flower basket.

On arrival at his house, his wife asked him: “Where are the flowers?” he replied: “My dear, I have offered the flowers to the Buddha.” His wife then asked: “What about the presentation of flowers to the king?” Whereupon, Sumana replied: “Let the king kill me should he so desire or expel me from the country, but I have offered the flowers to the Buddha at the sacrifice of my life. The eight measures of flowers, which formed only eight handfuls, indeed worked miracles. He then related in detail what had actually happened. The whole 180 million citizens were now following the procession in honour of the Buddha, making loud proclamations. What you are hearing is their cheers congratulating me on my deed of merit.” He told her this in a delightful tone full of deep satisfaction.

Sumana’s wife, being very foolish and ignorant, took not the slightest interest in the miraculous display of the glories of the Buddha and scolded her husband with abusive words and said: “Kings are harsh and ruthless. Once you have incurred their displeasure, your hands and feet may be cut off. I may also be adversely affected by your acts, which may bring ruin on me.”

Nagging continuously, she left, taking away her children to see the king at the palace. The king asked her: “What is your complaint?” She complained thus:

“Your majesty, my husband, Sumana, the flower seller, has offered the Buddha all the flowers that were to be presented to you as usual and returned home empty handed. When I asked him: ‘Where are the flowers?’ he related to me what he had done with them. I scolded him in many ways, saying: ‘Kings are very harsh and ruthless. Once you incur their displeasure, your hands and feet may be cut off. I may also be adversely affected by your act which may bring ruin on me.’ After severing my relationship with him, I have come to your presence. Whatever he has done, good or bad, that is his own affair, his own responsibility. Let him fare according to his deeds all by himself, your majesty, I have forsaken that husband of mine and I make this formal report in advance to your majesty.”

King Bimbisāra had become a noble disciple (ariya-sāvaka), having attained the fruition stage of a Stream-enterer (Sotapatti-phala) ever since his meeting with the Buddha at the grove of young palms, near the city of Rājagaha, and, as such, his confidence in him was unshakable.

The king thought: “This woman is so foolish and stupid, she cannot arouse devotional faith in the glories and miraculous powers of the Buddha,” and pretending to be indignant asked her: [519] “Woman, have you just said that your husband, Sumana, had offered all the flowers that were to be presented to me?” – “Indeed, I have said so, your Majesty,” replied the flower seller’s wife.

The king replied expediently: “Woman, you have done well by severing your relationship with your husband, and now I am to consider what kind of punishment should be meted out to Sumana for offering the Buddha the flowers which were to be presented to me.” Then dismissing the woman, the king went out quickly to pay homage to the Buddha and joining the procession, followed him all the way.

On seeing King Bimbisāra in a reverential mood, the Buddha made it a point to walk along the congested main streets within the city and finally went towards the palace gate. When King Bimbisāra removed the bowl from his hand and started to conduct him into the palace, he noticed the indications that the Buddha had a desire to stop at the courtyard just outside of the palace. He at once had a temporary pavilion erected in the courtyard, and the Buddha and his monastic followers took rest on the prepared seats in the newly erected pavilion.

A question may arise as to: “Why the Buddha did not go into the palace?”
The answer is: It occurred to him that, should he choose to go into the palace, the 180 million citizens would not be able to pay obeisance to him and the virtues of Sumana, the flower seller, would not become manifest. True, only Buddhas could show plainly the attributes of virtuous people, when ordinary people try to do honour where honour is due. Others are apt to have a feeling of jealousy.

21: Sumana, Aggidatta and Jambuka – 691

As the Buddha went inside the pavilion and sat on the seat which was prepared for him, the four screens of flowers moved to the edge of the crowd in the four directions, each standing like living objects. Then the people rallied round him to pay homage; and King Bimbisāra offered hard and soft food of the best quality to the monastics headed by the Buddha. After the meal was over, and when the Buddha had given a discourse of appreciation for it, the four screens of flowers went back to their places surrounding him on four sides. Surrounded by 180 million citizens and amidst deafening sounds of the uproarious crowd, the Buddha returned to the Veḷuvana monastery.

On returning to the palace, after seeing the Buddha off, King Bimbisāra sent for Sumana and asked him: “How were the flowers meant for me offered to the Buddha?” Sumana replied thus: “I offered the flowers to the Buddha, making this resolution: ‘Let the king kill me should he so desire, let him expel me from the country, I will offer these flowers to the Buddha,’ thus have I made the offering of flowers at the risk of my life.” Whereupon, King Bimbisāra said these congratulatory words: “You are a noble person, indeed.” The king then presented Sumana with eight royal elephants, eight royal horses, eight male servants, eight female servants, eight sets of costumes, 8,000 pieces of money, together with eight fully dressed maidens and eight villages, making what is known as the all-eights (sabbaṭṭhaka) reward for a gift consisting of 8x8 things.

This great event made Ven. Ānanda wonder as to what kind of benefit Sumana would derive from his deed of merit which was marked by the sounds that rent the air like thunderous roars of a lion king, and by throwing aloft of thousands of head dresses of citizens from the early part of the morning. Therefore, he went to the Buddha and asked to be enlightened as to what sort of benefit Sumana would enjoy. The Buddha told Ānanda: “Dear son Ānanda, you should not think that Sumana, the flower seller, had made just a small offering! In offering the flowers to me, he had made a liberal alms giving (dāna) of his own life, with full devotional faith in his mind.” (DhpA, PTS 2.46)

ṭhatvā Deva-manussesu, phalaṃ etassa kammuno, [520]
pacchā Paccekasambuddho, Sumano nāma bhavissati.*

For this meritorious deed of his, for a full 100,000 aeons, he will not be reborn in the planes of misery. He will be born again and again in the realms of Devas and humans enjoying the fruits of his deed of merit and will become a Paccekabuddha in the future.

This was the Prophecy uttered by Buddha Gotama in response to Ven. Ānanda's request.

On reaching the Veḷuvana monastery, as the Buddha entered the Scented Chamber, the Jasmine flowers lay behind in heaps at the entrance.

In that evening, the monastics gathered together in the Dhamma Hall and expressed their appreciation of Sumana's deed of merit and the result, thereof saying: "Friends, the benefit derived by Sumana from his deed of merit is really wonderful, worthy of applause by the snapping of fingers. He has offered the living Buddha a handful of Jasmine flowers at the risk of his life, and for this, he has been rewarded by the king, at that very moment, with gifts made up of eight kinds of animate as well as inanimate objects, each numbering eight (sabbaṭṭhaka)."

The Buddha left his chamber and came to the Dhamma Hall where, after sitting on the Dhamma throne of the Buddha, he asked: "Monastics, what is the subject of your conversation?" They explained the subject of their discussion. He then said: "You are right, monastics, by doing an act for which no feeling of remorse should ever occur, but only the feeling of happiness whenever he dwells upon it every time. A deed of such a nature is indeed worth performing." And in this connection, he recited the following verse to serve as a maxim of what he had already said (Dhp 68):

Tañ-ca kammaṃ kataṃ sādhu, yaṃ katvā nānutappati, yassa patīto sumano, vipākaṃ paṭisevati.

Having done an act, the doer has no bitter regret for it; he only enjoys the fruits of that act with joy and gladness. Such an act is faultless and wholesome and is worth doing.

At the end of the discourse 84,000 sentient beings Awakened and gained release from the round of suffering.

The Story of the Ascetic Aggidatta

This discourse of five verses, beginning with the words: Bahuṃ ve saraṇaṃ yanti (Dhp 188-192), was expounded by the Buddha while residing at Jetavana monastery, with reference to a recluse by the name of Aggidatta, formerly a court Brahmin of King Kosala, who was then residing near a pile of sand.

The recluse Aggidatta was living near a pile of sand lying between the three countries of Aṅga, Magadha and Kuru that were adjacent to Rājagaha.

The Brahmin Aggidatta was the court advisor of King Mahā Kosala, father of King Pasedani Kosala. On the expiry of his father, King Pasedani Kosala retained Aggidatta in the same rank as his court advisor, esteeming him as his father's old counsellor. When Aggidatta went to the palace to attend to duties, he was treated with due respect by the king and was given the same seat which he had occupied before.

One day, it occurred to Aggidatta: "King Pasenadi Kosala treats me with due respect, no doubt, but it is not easy to make kings accept one's counsel all the time. It is natural that the [521] king would prefer to deal with advisors of his own age. I have become too old, it is time that I lead the life of a recluse."

So he sought permission from the king and having made public his decision by the beating of drums in the city of Sāvattihī, within seven days he abandoned all his belongings to become a recluse outside of the Buddha's Dispensation (Sāsana).

10,000 male followers became his disciples and they dwelt at a place situated between the Aṅga, Magadha and Kuru countries. Aggidatta, as their leader, gave them instruction for their observance: "Anyone thinking any of these thoughts: thoughts of sensual desire (kāma-vitakka), thoughts of ill-will (vyāpāda-vitakka), thoughts of harming others (vihimsa-vitakka), shall carry one bundle of sand from the river and dump it here." His disciples promised to observe this disciplinary rule and every time they detected an unwholesome thought, such as thoughts of sensual desire, arising in their mind, they chastised themselves by carrying a bundle of sand from the river and dumping it as promised, in the appointed place. In time, the pile of sand assumed a huge dimension.

The pile of sand was later taken over by a Nāga King named Ahichatta. People from Aṅga, Magadha and Kuru used to come with offerings for the recluses every month. The recluse Aggidatta then exhorted them thus: “Disciples! Go to the hills for refuge, go to the jungles for refuge; go to the parks for refuge; go to the trees for refuge. If you take refuge in the hills, the jungles, the parks and the trees, you will be free from all kinds of suffering.” He also made the same exhortation to his 10,000 recluse disciples.

Aggidatta was popularising himself through teaching wrong practices at a time when the Bodhisatta, as Prince Siddhattha, after renouncing the world, had become a Buddha and was residing in the Jetavana monastery of Sāvaththī. Rising early one morning at dawn and mentally surveying the whole world for sentient beings who were ripe for emancipation, the Buddha perceived in his mind’s eye the recluse Aggidatta together with his 10,000 disciples. The Buddha also knew then that all of them had accomplished the sufficing conditions (upanissaya) for the attainment of Awakening. So he gave instructions to Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, saying: “Son Moggallāna, why have you ignored the recluse Aggidatta who is making people walk along the wrong path that will not lead them to the shores of Nibbāna, son Moggallāna, go now to these recluses and exhort them.”

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna replied: “Most glorious, exalted Buddha, the number of these recluses is great. They might not readily accept the instructions from me alone. Should your reverence also come along, they would readily obey your instructions.” Whereupon, the Buddha responded: “We will come also, but you might go ahead first to exhort them.”

While proceeding first as instructed by the Buddha, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna thought to himself: “These recluses are many and strong, any attempt to give instructions to them while gathering in one place might lead them to turn against me.” So he caused a torrential rain to fall, through the power of his super knowledge (abhiñña), with the result that the recluses rising from their places, rushed into their own dwelling places.

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna then stood in front of the entrance to Aggidatta’s dwelling and called the recluse by name. On hearing Ven. Mahā Moggallāna’s voice, Aggidatta wondered as to who had called him by name, since there was no one in the world who could address him thus. In a fit of pique, he gave a sharp reply: “Who is that calling me by my name?” Ven. Mahā Moggallāna answered: “It’s me, Brahmin Aggidatta.” – “What do you want to say?” responded Aggidatta. When Ven. Mahā Moggallāna made the polite reply: “I wish you could show me a place where I could spend a night,” Aggidatta said curtly: “There is no place for you; each room has its own occupant.”

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna then replied: “Aggidatta, it is natural that men come to the abode of men, bullocks to the abodes of bullocks, and recluses to the abode of recluses. Please do not talk to me like that, do allot a lodging for me to spend the night.” The recluse [522] then asked: “Are you a recluse?” – “Yes, I am,” was the reply. Aggidatta then queried: “If you are a recluse, where are the equipment of a recluse; what are your utensils?” – “Brahmin,” replied Mahā Moggallāna in a serious manner, “I possess the equipment of a recluse; but thinking it is cumbersome to carry them separately while wandering around, I take them along inside me.” Aggidatta was much annoyed to see Ven. Mahā Moggallāna going about without the necessary equipment of a recluse.

Knowing the state of his mind, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna said: “Aggidatta, don’t be angry with me, just point out a place for me.” Aggidatta gave the terse reply: “There is no place for you around here.” Indicating the pile of sand with his finger, Mahā Moggallāna enquired with patience: “Who lives at that pile of sand?” – “A dragon king,” was the reply. “Then allot it to me,” insisted Ven. Mahā Moggallāna. The recluse made the cautious reply: “I dare not allot it to you. The dragon king is of a violent, terrible nature.” Mahā Moggallāna replied: “Let it be, never mind about it. You just allot it to me.” – “If so, you better judge for yourself whether the place is suitable for occupation or not,” retorted Aggidatta.

Then Ven. Mahā Moggallāna went towards the pile of sand and when the dragon King Ahichatta caught sight of him, he thought to himself: “This recluse does not seem to see my presence here. I will dispose of him by exhaling fumes.” With this thought, the dragon king started emitting dense clouds of noxious vapour. Ven. Mahā Moggallāna considered: “This dragon king has overestimated himself, thinking no one else can send out fumes.” Therefore, he also started exhaling wave after wave of vapour, which, together with that emitted by the dragon king, rose higher and higher up to the realm of the Brahmas. The voluminous fumes exhaled by both of them caused great suffering to the dragon king while Ven. Mahā Moggallāna remained unscathed.

Suffering from the effects of the fumes, the Nāga king became so furious that he sent out a continuous stream of blazing flames. By developing the fourth absorption (rūpāvacara-kriya-jhāna) with a fire-device as its object, Mahā

Moggallāna also sent out, in competition, more violent flames. The blazing fires produced by both of them went up as far as the Brahma realm; but none of them caused any harm to Ven. Mahā Moggallāna while the Nāga king was subjected to great suffering. His whole body appeared as though it were consumed in a blazing fire. At the sight of the massive conflagration, the recluse teacher, Aggidatta, and his disciples wrongly concluded: “The Nāga king had set the recluse ablaze; he has been destroyed completely, for not listening to our advice. It serves him right.”

Having overcome the Nāga king by subduing its haughtiness, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna sat on the pile of sand, while the Nāga king kept itself coiled around the sand-pile, with its hood spread over him like a terraced chamber crowned with a fine pinnacle.

To make immediate enquiries as to the fate of the recluse, the recluses went to the scene of recent combat and saw Ven. Mahā Moggallāna sitting becomingly on the peak of the sand-pile. They could not help but pay respects to him with their clasped hands, speaking highly of him in many ways, and they asked him: “Recluse, have you not suffered anything at the hands of the Nāga king?” Then Ven. Mahā Moggallāna replied: “Don’t you see the Nāga standing nearby with its hood spread like a white umbrella over me?” The recluses uttered in amazement: “Friends, this is a wonderful feat worthy of cheers by the snapping of the fingers! The recluse has subdued a powerful Nāga such as this. It is marvellous indeed!” They then rallied round Ven. Mahā Moggallāna in a group.

At that moment the Buddha arrived and Ven. Mahā Moggallāna rose from his seat and made obeisance to him. The recluses asked him: “Is this recluse more powerful than yourself?” – “This great recluse is replete with six glories; he is my master, I am merely his disciple,” was the reply.

The Buddha took his seat on the pile of sand. The recluses went round and with clasped hands raised, spoke in high praise of the Buddha: “The recluse who subdued the Nāga king is but a disciple, one wonders how mighty his master might be.” The Buddha then called Aggidatta and asked him: “What kind of instructions do you give to your recluses and lay [523] disciples for their guidance?”

Aggidatta gave his reply: “Exalted Buddha, I gave this instruction to them: ‘Disciples, go to the hills for refuge, go to the jungles for refuge, go to the parks for refuge, go to the trees for refuge. If you take refuge in the hills, the jungles, the parks and under the trees, you will be free from all kinds of suffering.”

On hearing this answer, the Buddha said: “Aggidatta, one who takes refuge in the mountains, forests, gardens and trees cannot escape from suffering; as a matter of fact, only one who takes refuge in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha can escape from the sufferings of the round of rebirths! The Buddha then expounded the true way of escape from suffering in five verses (Dhp 188-192):<sup>195</sup>

Bahuṃ ve saraṇaṃ yanti, pabbatāni vanāni ca, ārāma-rukkha-cetyāni, manussā bhaya-tajjitā.

Aggidatta, people take refuge, through fright, in the mountains, such as Mount Isigili, Mount Vepulla, Mount Vebhāra, etc., or in the forest groves, such as the Great Wood, Gosiṅga, Sālavana, etc., or in the gardens and parks, such as the Veḷuvana, Jīvaka’s Mango Park, etc., and under the trees, such as at the Udena tree-temple, Gotama tree-temple, etc. All these are erroneously regarded as refuges and means of protection from dangers.

Netam kho saraṇaṃ khemaṃ, netam saraṇam-uttamaṃ, netam saraṇam-āgamma, sabba-dukkhā pamuccati.

Aggidatta, these mountains, forests, gardens or trees are not safe, harmless refuges, they do not constitute the best, the highest refuge. By taking refuge in these mountains, forests, gardens or trees one cannot gain release from the continuous cycle of suffering (dukkha).

*Yo ca Buddhañ-ca Dhammañ-ca, Saṅghañ-ca saraṇaṃ gato, cattāri ariya-saccāni, sammappaññāya passati.
Dukkhaṃ dukkha-samuppādaṃ, dukkhassa ca atikkamaṃ, ariyaṃ caṭṭhaṅgikaṃ maggaṃ, dukkhūpasama-gāminaṃ.*

Aggidatta, any person, whether lay or recluse, who takes refuge in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha as a safe haven, as a secure shelter with sincere, pure faith in the Three Treasures; with transcendental consciousness (lokuttara-saraṇa-gamana-cittuppāda); any person, whether lay or recluse, who realizes the path truly and rightly through insight path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa), the four noble truths: the noble truth of suffering (dukkha), the noble truth of the origin of suffering, the noble truth of the cessation of suffering and the noble truth of the path leading to the cessation of suffering, that is, the eightfold noble truth of right view, right thought, etc.

---

*Etam kho saraṇam khemaṃ, etam saraṇam-uttamaṃ, [524]
etam saraṇam-āgamma, sabba-dukkhā pamuccati.*

Aggidatta, only the refuge taken by such a person of noble disposition, with abounding faith in the Three Treasures is a safe and harmless refuge. Only the refuge taken by such a person of noble disposition, with abounding faith in the Three Treasures, constitutes the best, highest refuge. Only the refuge taken by such a person of noble disposition, with abounding faith in the Three Treasures, can bring about release from the continuous cycle of suffering (dukkha).

At that very moment, all the recluses, the leader and his followers instantly turned into full-fledged monks like senior monks (thera) of 60 years' standing readily robed and equipped with the eight requisites, paying homage to the Buddha with great respect.

That day, when all the recluses became summoned monastics (ehi-bhikkhu), happened to be the occasion when the people from Aṅga, Magadha and Kuru congregated at the recluses' place with offerings for their recluse teachers. When they saw the recluses assuming the form of monastics, they began to wonder: "How is it, is our teacher Aggidatta superior to the great ascetic Gotama, or is the great ascetic Gotama superior to our teacher?" Then they wrongly surmised that since the great recluse had come to the presence of their teacher, their teacher, Aggidatta, must be superior to the great recluse.

The Buddha knew what was in the minds of the people, and he told Aggidatta: "Dear son Aggidatta, you might yourself remove the doubts from the minds of your audience." Aggidatta replied: "Most exalted Buddha, it has also been my intention to do so," and so saying, he went up high into the air and descended therefrom seven times. And after that he stood paying respects to the Buddha, declaring: Satthā me, bhante, Bhagavā, sāvakoḥam-asmi, "you, the exalted Buddha, are my teacher; I am but a disciple of yours," thus removing doubt being entertained by his followers.

The Story of the Naked Ascetic Jambuka

This discourse beginning with the words: Māse māse kusaggena (Dhp 70), was given by the Buddha while residing at the Veḷuvana monastery in Rājagaha in connection with the naked ascetic Jambuka (for the story see DhpA V.11).

Jambuka's Demeritorious Deeds of the Past

During the time of Buddha Kassapa, a rich man of a village in the countryside built a monastery for a monk. He made regular offerings of food, robes, living quarters and medicine, which are the four requisites for monastics, to the resident monk. The resident monk made regular visits to the house of the rich man for his daily meal.

One day, an elderly monk who was an Arahāt, going on alms round, arrived at the gate of the rich man. The rich man was very pleased with the deportment of the monk and so he invited him into the house and offered him food with profound respect and said: “Your Reverence, please accept this piece of cloth for use as a robe, after dyeing and stitching. Your hair is also long enough to be cut, I will bring a barber and a bedstead for you to the monastery.”

The resident monk saw the reverential way in which his supporter made his offering to the Arahāt monk. He was instantly assailed by unwholesome thoughts of envy concerning the offerings gained by the Arahāt monk (lābhamacchāriya) and also his superior birth (kula-macchāriya); and he was very worried, thinking to himself: “The rich man has shown more reverential attention to the monk whom he has just met, than to myself, even though I frequent his house regularly for meals.” He returned to the monastery in an angry mood. [525]

The guest monastic, who was an Arahāt, followed the resident monk to his monastery. He dyed and stitched the piece of cloth offered to him by the wealthy monastery supporter and sat down wearing it as a robe. The wealthy man arrived, bringing with him a barber who attended to the Arahāt monk's hair. The rich man prepared the bedstead he had brought with him, ready for use and invited the Arahāt monk to take a rest on it. Then after inviting both monks for a meal on the morrow, he went back home.

21: Sumana, Aggidatta and Jambuka – 700

The resident monk was so overcome by malice towards the guest monk that he went to the place where the Arahant monk was resting, and gave vent to his bitter feeling in very offensive words:

Look here visitor, it would be better for you to eat faeces than the food offered at the house of the rich man, the supporter of my monastery. It would be better for you to have your hair pulled out with the outer shells of a palmyra seed than cutting it with the knife of the barber brought by the rich man, the supporter of my monastery. It would be better for you to go about naked than wearing the robe offered by the rich man, the supporter of my monastery. It would be better for you to sleep on the ground than lying on the bed offered by the rich man, the supporter of my monastery.

The Arahant monk left the monastery early in the morning for a place where he could find peace and happiness, foregoing the invitation by the rich man for a meal, in order that nothing untoward might happen to the resident monk on account of him.

The resident monk attended quite early to all the routine works in the monastery, and when the time came for going on the alms round, he thought: “The lazy visitor is still asleep. I might strike the bell to wake him up. But feeling uneasy that the visitor would actually get up on hearing the sound of the bell, he just touched the bell with his finger nails and made off for the village to receive alms food. After having made magnificent arrangements for a meal offering, the rich monastery supporter was waiting for the arrival of his two invited monks. On seeing the resident monk coming alone, he asked: “Venerable sir, where is the guest monk?” The envious resident monk replied: “Don’t you talk about him, supporter of the monastery! Your monk went into his room to sleep since you left the monastery last evening and did not wake up while I had the monastery compound swept, and the pots filled with water; nor did he hear the sound of the bell when I struck it as the time came for alms round.”

The rich supporter thought to himself: “It is absurd that such an exalted personage with such commendable deportment should have slept for such a long time. This resident monk, through jealousy on seeing me showing great respect and courtesy to the visiting monk, must have spoken some reproachful words to him.” Having thus surmised correctly, being wise and intelligent, he kept his thoughts to himself and made his offering of a meal respectfully to the monk. After the meal was over, he took the empty bowl of the resident monk, had it washed carefully and filled it with delicious food. He then handed the bowl back to the resident monk, with the request: “Venerable sir, please be so kind as to give this food to the guest monk when you meet him.”

While going back to the monastery with food for the Arahāt monk, the envious resident monastic had this wrong thought: “The indolent visitor would stay on in the monastery if he were to enjoy delicious food such as these,” so he threw away the bowlful of food offered by the rich monastery supporter. On arrival at the place occupied by the visiting monk, he looked for him, but the Arahāt monk could not be found.

The evil deed of this envious monk against the Arahāt monk, the destruction of the food offered to the Arahāt, was so demeritorious that its ill-effects outweighed the merits accruing from 20,000 years of living a holy life as a monk. Consequently, after his death he was reborn in the lowest plane of woe (mahā-avīci) to undergo intense suffering for the duration of the incalculably long interval between the disappearance of Buddha Kassapa and the appearance of Buddha Gotama. After such suffering, he was born in a household, [526] where food was abundant, at Rājagaha at the time of Buddha Gotama.

Jambuka in the Present Life

He was named Jambuka by his parents. He did not wish to sleep in a bed ever since he could walk about; and instead of taking ordinary food, he ate his own excrement. His parents and relatives at first thought that he took up these habits through youthful ignorance and tried to help him mend his ways, taking pains to feed him and clean his body. But even when he had grown up, he did not wish to wear cloths; he walked about naked, slept on the ground and ate his own filth.

Jambuka’s parents came to realize in due course that he was not fit to live in a family of good birth like their own, as he had no sense of shame and should be in the company of the Ājīvakas, a heretical sect. So they took him to the monastery of the Ājīvakas and entrusted him to their care.

The Ājīvakas then ordained him as a novice in their sect and the following is an account of how it was carried out: He was placed in a pit that was deep as far as his neck; wooden planks were placed covering the hole and resting upon his shoulders so that he might not struggle his way out. Sitting on the planks, the Ājīvakas pulled out the hair from the head of Jambuka. This was how the Ājīvakas initiated a lad as a novice. Then his parents left after inviting the Ājīvakas for the next day's meal at their home.

The following day, the Ājīvakas said to Jambuka: "Come along, let's go to the village." He replied: "You better go and I will remain in the monastery." After several vain attempts to persuade him to follow, they left him all alone and went into the village. Once he knew that they were gone, he took off the wooden covering of the latrine and went into the pit, picked up the filth with his two hands and helped himself to his heart's content.

The Ājīvakas, being unaware of the truth, sent food to him from the village. But he was not interested in it and rejected it, and in spite of persuasive advice given by the Ājīvakas, his reply was: "I don't want this, I have enough food for myself." When he was asked: "From where did you receive it?" he replied: "From within the precincts of the monastery." The second, the third and the fourth days passed in the same manner, Jambuka refusing the invitation to go out for food but choose to stay alone in the monastery.

The Ājīvakas began to wonder what Jambuka was up to: "This Jambuka refuses every day to go into the village, rejects the food that was sent to him, saying, he gets the food for himself from within the precincts of the monastery. What is he up to? We will have to investigate." They then decided to leave behind one or two of the brethren to keep a watchful eye on Jambuka's activities, while they went to the village. Those charged with the responsibility of investigation, pretended to go along with the group, but remained behind under cover to watch Jambuka. Thinking that all the Ājīvakas had left for the village, Jambuka went down the latrine pit as on the previous days and ate the faeces.

Jambuka was caught red-handed by the spies and the matter was reported to their elders. The elders, on hearing the report murmured: "Jambuka's action is grievous. Should the disciples of ascetic Gotama come to know of this affair, they will surely decry us as a wandering tribe of filth eaters, which will be much to the detriment of our dignity. He is not fit that he remain with us any longer." So saying they unanimously expelled him from their sect.

When he was expelled by the Ājīvakas, Jambuka went to stay near a huge stone slab which was close to a spot used by the citizens of Rājagaha as a public lavatory. There was [527] also a huge sewage pipe adjacent to that large stone slab. People usually came to ease and relieve themselves behind the stone slab screen. Jambuka ate the refuse matter at nighttime, and when people came to answer the call of nature during the day, he stood with an arm rested on the edge of the flat stone and with one of his legs rested on the knee of the other leg, keeping his head erect with the mouth open.

Those who came to answer the call of nature, on seeing him, approached him and asked: “Venerable sir, why are you standing like this with your mouth open?” – “I live on air, there is no food for me other than air,” he replied boastfully. People asked: “Venerable sir, why do you stand on one leg only, with one leg rested on the knee of the other one?” – “I am a person engaged in rigorous austerity practices. When I stand with both my legs touching the ground, the earth cannot withstand my glories and attributes and trembles violently; that is why I stand in this posture. In truth it is because of the earthquakes. I have got to stand on one leg night and day, without sitting down, without sleeping,” replied Jambuka with an air of ostentation.

It is a general fact that people accept readily what others say; only a few take the trouble to consider whether there is element of truth or not. So they said in admiration: “Marvellous indeed it is! There are such personalities in the world who undertake such severe practices. We have never before seen such personalities having such rigorous practices.” A great number of people from the Aṅga and Magadha countries, agitated and excited by hearing the news of Jambuka’s austerities, came together with offerings for him and paid homage to him every month.

Jambuka rejected delicious and wholesome food offered by people, maintaining: “I live on air only, I do not take any other food. If I do take any other thing than air, it means a breach of my practice.” People beseeched him, repeatedly saying: “Venerable sir, may you not deny us this opportunity to gain merit; only if a personality such as yours, well advanced in austerity practices, would accept our offer of alms food, will our prosperity and happiness grow and last long.” Jambuka was not interested in any food but only excrement, but pressed by earnest requests of the people, he was obliged to taste such food as butter and molasses the people fetched, picking them up with the tip of a blade of grass, just to give them satisfaction. Then he dismissed them, saying: “Go now; this much will go far to do a great deal of good for you.”

Thus Jambuka had to pay for his offences against an Arahāt by suffering for 55 years in these four ways: he could not put on any clothes; he ate nothing except faeces; he had to pull out his hair by using palmyra seed shell; and he slept on the ground.

Emancipation of the Naked Ascetic Jambuka

It is the usual practice of Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddhas to survey the whole world at early dawn, every day, to see who are ready for liberation from the cycle of suffering. Thus, early one morning, the omniscient Buddha, on surveying the world, perceived the person of Jambuka in his mind's eye. Upon further investigation, he discovered that Jambuka had already accumulated meritorious deeds which would serve as sufficing conditions for his attainment of the Arahat fruition (Arahatta-phala), complete with the fourfold analytical knowledge (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa). He also came to know that he would have to teach a verse to the naked ascetic Jambuka, and that this teaching will also bring about the realisation of the four noble truths by 80,000 sentient beings who will thus gain emancipation. "Because of this person Jambuka, thousands of people will come to achieve [528] happiness."

Thus, after going round Rājagaha for alms food, he informed Ven. Ānanda: "My dear son, Ānanda, I will be going to see Jambuka." – "Exalted Buddha, is it that you are going there alone," asked Ānanda. "That's right, Ānanda. I will go alone," replied the Buddha and went to the place of Jambuka in the evening of that day.

The Devas considered: "The exalted Buddha is visiting the naked ascetic Jambuka this evening; but that naked ascetic's abode is the great stone slab which is abominably filthy and smelly with an accumulation of excrement, urine and discarded twigs used as tooth cleaners. We should wash up the loathsome mess by a downpour of rain." Thus they caused, by means of their supernatural power, a falling at that very instant of a torrential rain, which washed away all the filth and dirt from the stone slab, making it look spick and span. Then the Devas caused the falling of flowers of the five colours on the stone slab.

On arrival at Jambuka's place in the evening, the Buddha called out the naked ascetic by his name, who felt annoyed being discourteously addressed by name by an unknown person who, he thought, must be a lowly person. He retorted angrily: "Who is that calling me by my name?" the Buddha replied: "I am a noble recluse." Jambuka asked then: "What is that you want here?" When the Buddha said: "I wish you would allot me a place to stay for one night." Jambuka replied bluntly: “There is no place for you in this place.” But the Buddha insisted: “Jambuka, please do not say this; do allot me a place to stay for one night. It is only natural that a recluse seeks the help of a recluse, men expect help of men and beasts expect help of their own kind.” Whereupon the naked ascetic asked: “Are you, indeed, a recluse?” – “Yes, I am a noble recluse,” answered the Buddha. Jambuka then queried: “If you are a recluse, where are the equipment of a recluse, such as gourd, ladle for stirring fire, sacrificial threads?” the Buddha replied: “I possess the equipment of a recluse you ask about; but thinking it is cumbersome to carry them separately while wandering around, I take them along only inside me.” Jambuka was much annoyed and reproached the Buddha: “Being a recluse, how could you go wandering about without the necessary equipment of a recluse?” The Buddha made a gentle reply: “Jambuka, let that be! Don’t be angry with me. Just point out a place for me.” But Jambuka gave the terse reply: “There is no place for you around here.”

There was a small valley close by Jambuka’s place and the Buddha asked: “Who stays there?” – “No one,” replied Jambuka. “If so, I want that place allotted to me,” said the Buddha. Whereupon, Jambuka made a reply: “It is up to you to judge whether it is suitable or not,” implying that he had no objection for the occupation of the place but took no responsibility whatsoever.

The Buddha placed a small mattress at a spot in the valley and sat upon it. At the first watch of the night, the Four Great Kings came, illuminating the four points of the compass and waited upon the Buddha. When Jambuka saw the illumination he wondered what it could be. At the second watch of the night, Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, came to attend upon the Buddha and Jambuka remained puzzled as before. At the last watch of the night, when Mahā Brahma, who had the power of lighting one world with one finger of his, two worlds with two fingers, ten worlds with ten fingers, came to wait upon the Buddha, illuminating the whole forest, Jambuka pondered, as before: “Now, what could that illumination be!”

When the morning came, Jambuka approached the Buddha and after courteous exchange of greetings, sat down at an appropriate place and addressed him: “Great recluse, who were those that came to you, in the first watch of the night, lighting up the four points of the compass?” – “Jambuka, they were the Four Great Kings,” he replied. “Why did they come?” asked Jambuka. “They came to pay homage and wait upon me,” was the reply. Jambuka asked again: “Great recluse, how is that? Are you superior to them?” “Yes, Jambuka, that’s right, I am superior to them,” replied the Buddha.

The naked ascetic Jambuka asked again: “Great recluse, who was the one that arrived in the middle watch of the night?” – “He was Sakka, the Lord of the Devas,” replied the Buddha. [529] “And why did he come?” asked Jambuka. The Buddha replied: “He came to pay homage to me and attend upon me.” Jambuka asked again, “Great recluse, how is that? Are you superior to Sakka also?” – “Yes, Jambuka,” replied the Buddha, “I am superior to Sakka also; Sakka is just like a nurse attending on me or a resident novice who looks after me.”

Jambuka asked the Buddha: “Great recluse, who was he that came in the last watch of the night, flooding the whole forest with his bodily radiance?” – “Jambuka, the one who came in the last watch of the night was none other than Mahā Brahma whose name is often invoked by Brahmins and others saying: ‘I worship the Mahā Brahma,’ when they suddenly sneeze or loose balance and totter.” Jambuka asked again: “Great recluse, how is that? Are you superior to Mahā Brahma too?” – “Yes, Jambuka, I am beyond the king of the Brahmas, superior to Mahā Brahma as well.”

Then the ascetic Jambuka made his usual boastful remark: “Great recluse, you are worthy of admiration indeed, by the snapping of fingers. None of those persons have ever come to pay homage to me at this place where I have been practising austerities for 55 years. True! For the last 55 years I have been sustaining myself only on air; and over all those years, these Devas, Sakka and Brahmas have never approached and paid homage to me.”

Whereupon, the Buddha gave Jambuka a very plain talk: “Jambuka, you, who have been cheating persons of poor intelligence, think of playing the same game with me! Have you not been eating filth for the past 55 years, sleeping on the bare ground, wandering round naked, extracting hair by means of a shell of palmyra seed? And yet you have been deceiving all the people, telling them: ‘I only live on air, standing on one leg without sitting down and sleeping,’ and now you wish to play the same trick on a Fully Awakened Buddha like me! Jambuka, because you professed this vile, base, heretical view you have to live on filth, sleep on bare ground, roam about naked, extract hair with the shell of a palmyra fruit seed for all these years, experiencing intense suffering; and yet you are still holding this wretched, base, heretical view.”

Then Jambuka asked the Buddha: “Great recluse, what kind of unwholesome deeds have I committed?” Whereupon, the Buddha explained to him extensively the various misdeeds he had done in the past. While the Buddha was giving this discourse, Jambuka was assailed by remorse, conscience and concern about the consequences of his past misdeeds; he was shaken so much that he squatted down to conceal the private parts of his body.

The Buddha threw a bathing robe for him to cover himself. Jambuka put on the robe and sat down at a suitable distance paying respects to him. Then the Buddha expounded a graduated discourse touching on points connected with generosity (dāna-kathā), moralality (sīla-kathā), etc., and finally the four noble truths. At the end of the discourse, Jambuka became an Arahāt, complete with the four analytical knowledges (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa). He stood up from his seat and worshipping the Buddha, made a request for the going forth as a novice and higher ordination as a monastic.

Thus, the ill-effects of the unwholesome deeds which he had committed in the past had ceased. To elaborate: For his offence against an Arahāt during Buddha Kassapa’s Dispensation, as stated above, he had suffered intensely, being burnt and incinerated in the lowest hell of Avīci for a long duration of time, long enough for the earth to rise to a height of one league and three miles. And after that, for the amount of retribution still outstanding against him, he had to make his expiation by going through 55 years of wretched, abominable, inhuman life. Having thus paid off the debts of evil deeds, the consequences of his past misdeeds had become exhausted.

But his accumulation of merit, which he had earned by observance of moral precepts as a monastic for 20,000 years, still remained undisturbed by his evil deeds.

Therefore, when Jambuka requested for initiation and ordination, the Buddha stretched [530] out his right hand and called out: Ehi bhikkhu, cara brahmacariyaṃ sammā dukkhassa anta-kiriyāya, “come monastic, accept the monkhood that you request, strive to take up the three noble practices which form the moral training in my Dispensation (Sāsana), in order to bring about the end of the rounds of suffering.” At that moment, Jambuka turned into a full-fledged monk like a senior monk (thera) of 60 years standing, readily robed and equipped with the eight requisites.

On that very day when Jambuka became an Arahant, people from Aṅga and Magadha visited him with offerings to pay homage. When they saw the Buddha, and began to wonder: “How is that? Is our teacher Jambuka superior to the great ascetic Gotama or is the great ascetic Gotama superior to our teacher Jambuka?” Then they wrongly surmised that since the great recluse had come to their teacher, their teacher Jambuka must be superior to the ascetic Gotama.

The Buddha knew what was in the minds of the people, and he told Jambuka: “Dear son Jambuka, you might remove the doubt yourself from the minds of your followers.” Jambuka replied: “Most exalted Buddha, it has also been my intention to do so,” and so saying, he entered into the fourth absorption (jhāna). Then rising up from his seat, he went up into the air to the height of a palm tree from where he addressed the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, you, the exalted Buddha, are my teacher, I am but a disciple of yours.” Then he came down to earth and after paying homage to the Buddha, rose up in the air again. He repeated the same performance seven times, going up higher and higher, to the height of two palm trees, three palm trees, etc., up to the height of seven palm trees. In this manner, he had made it very clear to the assembled crowd that he was just a disciple of the Buddha. On seeing these strange phenomena, people were struck with wonder and said: “Buddhas are worthy of admiration by the snapping of fingers; they are glorious and there is no equal to them.”

The Buddha, being desirous of holding a discussion with the masses on Dhamma subjects addressed them: “Lay devotees, Jambuka has lived here for the last 55 years telling you ostentatiously: ‘I have been exercising self-denial, eating only what is picked by the tip of a blade of grass out of the whole lot of offering you have brought.’ Supposing, he continued on with this practice of self-denial till it reached 100 years, and a certain amount of merit accrued on that score. Such a measure of merit to his credit would not be worth even 1/256th part of the merit he would earn by refusing to take any food now as a noble one (ariya), through having some doubt whether the food and the time it is offered is allowable or not allowable.”

Then the Buddha expounded the following Dhamma verse which was pertinent to what he had been telling the people (Dhp 70):

Māse māse kusaggena, bālo bhuñjeyya bhojanam, na so saṅkhāta-dhammānam, kalam agghati soḷasim.

Even though, month after month the fool who does not know the four noble truths, bent on living in austerity, takes his food sparingly by picking it up on the tip of a blade of grass for 100 years; he is not even worth one part out of 256 of a noble one (ariya) who has comprehended the four noble truths.

The verse was expounded with reference to a particular individual, namely, Jambuka. When considered in its generic sense: There is the volition (cetanā), which arises when an ignorant heretical recluse practises self-sacrifice for as long as 100 years; there is the volition (cetanā), which arises when a noble one (ariya) who comprehends the four noble truths, refuses an offer of food through having some doubt whether the food and the time it is offered is allowable or not allowable.

Of the two types of volitions (cetanā) mentioned above, the volitions accumulated by the heretical recluse for as long as 100 years is not worth 1/256th part of the volition that arose [531] when a noble one (ariya) refused food through doubt over the time the food was offered.

To explain further, the amount of merit accruing from the volition occasioned by mere doubt on the part of a noble one (ariya) as to the kind of food and the time it is offered, entailing the loss of a meal for him, is 256 times greater than the sum of merit gained by a heretical recluse through his faulty practice of self-denial for 100 years.

At the close of the discourse, 84,000 sentient beings gained release from the cycle of suffering through realization of the four noble truths. [532]

22a: The Discourse on the Treasures

The Founding of Vesālī

A long time ago,<sup>196</sup> the Chief Queen of the King of Bārāṇasī conceived a child. The queen brought this news to the king and he appointed a sufficient number of maids of honour to attend on the queen for the duration of her pregnancy. The queen lived in ease and comfort, carefully tending the embryo in her womb, and entered the maternity chamber in due time. It is taken to be a natural fact that ladies of high social status, enjoying the fruits of past meritorious deeds, usually give birth to children at early dawn in the morning.

The queen, being one such lady of the elite class, gave birth at early dawn, to a lump of flesh as red as a hibiscus flower or as red as lac. The queen thought to herself: “The king will surely remark: ‘Other queens give birth to children who resemble golden statues; but this Chief Queen of mine gave birth to a lump of flesh,’ and I shall lose favour and fall down in disgrace before the king.”

Wishing to avoid disgrace by losing favour and dignity, she had the lump of flesh put into a vase covered by another vase and caused it to be thrown into the current of the river Ganges.

Miraculous events took place: The moment the vase containing the lump of flesh left human hands, it was taken charge of by the Devas who placed it securely in a vase, on which were inscribed in vermilion the words: “These are the sons born of the Chief Queen of the King of Bārāṇasī.” Protected by the guardian Devas, the cup floated along smoothly with the current, undisturbed by billows and swelling tides.

At that time, a recluse was residing close by the river Ganges depending on a village of cowherds for alms food. When he went to the river early one morning, he saw a vase floating down the stream and recovered it as an object discarded by someone up stream. He saw the royal insignia stamped on the vase and discovered the gold lettered plate and the lump of flesh on opening the vase. As soon as the recluse saw the lump of flesh, he opined that the lump of flesh must be in embryo stage since it raised no foul odour. He brought it to his hut and kept it in a clean corner.

After a lapse of fifteen days, the lump of flesh was seen to have divided into two separate units. The recluse took great care of the object on seeing these strange developments. In another fortnight's time, each lump was found to have bulged in five places where the head, two arms and two legs would appear. The recluse attended to them with greater care than before. In another fifteen days time, one was transformed into a boy with golden body and the other into a girl with a golden body.

The love developed by the recluse for the infant boy and girl was so intense that it was like that of a parent for his own offspring. The two thumbs of the recluse turned into fountains from which milk gushed out. From then onwards, the recluse received gruel cooked with milk from the village of the cowherds by virtue of the babies' merit. The recluse ate the solid portion of the gruel and fed the babies with the fluid that remained. Whatever went inside their bodies could be seen like objects going through a glass vessel. They were therefore named "Licchavī" after their soft, delicate, thin skin.

Licchavī, derived from nicchavī; ni, "soft, thin;" chavi, "having skin," therefore one having delicate, thin skin. Ni is changed into li to form Licchavī.

Having to attend to the babies, the recluse could go to the village for alms round only very late in the morning and he had to return to his hermitage in a hurry. When the villagers came to know about his worries, they addressed the recluse: "Venerable sir, looking after babies is a great hindrance to the observance of the precepts incumbent upon recluses. May you hand the babies over to our care. We will relieve you of the burden of looking after them, then you could attend to your Dhamma practice without [533] any obstruction." The recluse agreed to their request, saying: "Yes, you may."

On the following day, the villagers made the roads smooth, level and clean, scattered flowers on them and, after planting streamers and banners on the sides of the road, gathered at the hermitage playing various kinds of musical instruments, to receive the children from the recluse. The recluse then gave them words of advice: "Lay devotees, these babies are of great power and glory because of their great accumulation of past merits. Bring them up with much care, attention and heed till they come of age; and arrange for their matrimonial ceremony when they come of age. Go to the King of Bārāṇasī and having paid him tributes of the five kinds of produce of the cow (go-rasa): milk, curds, ghee, butter milk and butter, make a request to him to grant you some land for the founding of a city. Then having circumambulated the city, appoint this young man your king, holding the coronation ceremony in the new city.” With this advice the recluse handed over the babies to the care of the villagers. After giving him a promise that they would follow his advice, the villagers took away the babies and brought them up in accordance with the instructions given by the recluse.

When they grew up, they played together with the children of the cowherds. But whenever there was a dispute while at play, they beat and kicked their playmates. When the parents saw their children crying, they asked them why they were crying. The children would reply: “The two orphans, cared for by the recluse, beat and kicked us.” Even the adopted parents of the two children, along with other villagers, rebuked them, making remarks, such as: “These two children bully our children; they are too troublesome. We should not gratify them; we should avoid the pair of them (vajjetabbā ime), brother and sister.” Ever since that time, the region measuring 30 leagues where the cowherds’ village was situated was known as the Avoidance (Vajjī) country.”

In due time, the cowherds approached the king, as instructed by the recluse, with offerings consisting of the five kinds of produce of the cow (go-rasa) and requested the allotment of a place and founded a city there. As the boy had reached the age of sixteen, he was crowned king of the region. This was followed by a matrimonial ceremony in honour of the two youths. The people of the region agreed then to make a ruling that no woman from another place should be made their queen, and none of their women should be given away in marriage to those outside of their country.

The crowned king and the queen produced their offspring in due time, the queen giving birth to a pair of twins, one male and one female. The queen gave birth to twins in like manner sixteen times in all. When those children came of age, they in turn gave birth to twins sixteen times each.

The population of the city grew rapidly, so much so, that there was no longer sufficient land in the city to accommodate all the princes and princesses with their palaces, pleasure parks and their large retinues. Therefore, the city had to be extended by one mile each on all four sides, entailing the construction of a second wall to enclose the whole city.

After a long time, the growth of the city, in like manner, demanded further extension to meet the requirements of the increasing number of royal families. As before, it was extended again by one mile each on all four sides with the construction of another wall round the entire city. As years rolled by, the city had to be extended again by one mile on all four sides in the same way for the third time. Thus the city grew and flourished with the march of time. It came to be known far and wide as the city of Vesālī, the Big City, throughout the southern sphere of the universe, Jambudīpa.

This is an account of the origin of the nomenclatures, such as Licchavī, the Vajjī country and the city of Vesālī. [534]

The Background to the Discourse

Vesālī city was thriving and prosperous, like its contemporaries Rājagaha and Sāvattthī, in the time of Buddha Gotama. At that time, the city was inhabited by 7,707 reigning monarchs, each with their crown princes, army generals, finance ministers, and various officials, each of them numbering 7,707. For their accommodation, there were 7,000 palaces and mansions with decorated terraced roofing and an equal number of law courts, Assembly Halls, gardens, pleasure parks and lakes. The city was thickly populated and food was abundant.

As years rolled by, the rulers and the ruled of the city failed to observe their bounden duties (aparihāniya-dhamma), and they eventually fell victims to disaster, such as drought, poor harvest, shortage of food, famine, etc.

Factors of non-decline (aparihāniya dhamma), part of a discourse taught to the Vajjī princes by the Buddha in order to maintain their prosperity and welfare. For full particulars reference may be made to the Long Discourse about the Emancipation (Mahā-paribbāna-sutta, DN 16).

The first disaster caused a great number of deaths amongst the poor people. Dead bodies, thrown everywhere out of the city, were soon found in various stages of decomposition and letting off a foul odour. Such a condition gave the opportunity for the Yakkhas to enter the city and play havoc with the people.

The second disaster was a famine, and together with the evil influence of the Yakkhas, it brought about more deaths and suffering. To make matters worse, there occurred a third disaster, an epidemic of an infectious disease known as snake-wind sickness (ahi-vāta-roga), which shook the morale of the people and took an even heavier toll than before.

The citizens, reeling under the continuous shocks of the three disasters: the famine disaster, the havoc caused by the evil spirits and the outbreak of the epidemic, went to the king and made the following address: “Your majesty, the city of Vesālī is facing three kinds of scourges; no such disaster ever occurred during the reigns of the past seven kings. The consensus of opinion now is that such disasters are brought about by the negligence of duty on the part of the sovereign rulers.”

The king then caused all the citizens to assemble at the court of law and addressed them: “Citizens, you may hold an inquest to find out if there were any failures on my part in the discharge of my royal duties towards my people.” On systematic inquiry of all the daily performances of the king, people found that there was nothing wanting on the part of his majesty, in the discharge of his duties towards his people. They then put their heads together to find a way to overcome the disasters that had fallen on them.

The disciples of the six teachers of the heretical sects suggested that the city of Vesālī would be rid of the three scourges as soon as the six heretic teachers set foot in the city. But some of the citizens who had faith in the Three Treasures said: “Friends, it is said that a Buddha has appeared in the world. He is said to have expounded Dhamma for the welfare and prosperity of all beings. He is powerful and glorious. Our city may be free from all disasters once he is in our city.”

All the people were delighted with the proposal. But some people wanted to know the whereabouts of the Buddha and expressed their doubt: “He may not care to come here even if we invite him.”

Whereupon, some intelligent persons expressed the optimistic view: “Buddhas are always helpful and have compassion for sentient beings; so why wouldn’t he come if we invite him? There is however, one thing to note. The [535] Buddha is now residing in Rājagaha; King Bimbisāra, a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) and supporter of the monastery, is attending upon him, providing him with the four requisites. He might stand in the way of the Buddha coming to our city.”

The people unanimously decided that they should approach King Bimbisāra and acquaint him with the circumstances they were faced with and with his approval should request the Buddha to make a visit to Vesālī. Accordingly, they sent two Licchavī princes to Rājagaha with the responsibility of meeting King Bimbisāra of Rājagaha, carrying with them numerous gifts for him and accompanied by armed guards and troops.

The two princes arrived at Rājagaha and having presented valuable gifts to King Bimbisāra, they then told him the situation in their city and the reason why they had been sent to Rājagaha, and then made the request: “May your Majesty present this request, on our behalf, for the Buddha to visit Vesālī.” The King did not comply with their request, but advised them: “You should approach the Buddha yourself and enquire as to the Buddha’s intention.”

The two Licchavī princes then went to the Buddha and addressed him with profound respect: “Exalted Buddha, our city of Vesālī is being visited by three calamities. If, out of compassion, you would kindly make a visit to Vesālī, it will be a blessing to all of us, the citizens of Vesālī.”

Upon kind consideration of their request, the Buddha perceived: “The recitation and teaching of the Discourse about the Treasures (Ratana-sutta, Khp 6; Snp 2:1) in Vesālī would bring 1,000 billion universes under protection against diseases; and at the end of the discourse, 84,000 sentient beings would be emancipated through realization of the four noble truths.” He therefore accepted the reverential invitation of the two Licchavī princes.

A Ceremonial Departure

On hearing the news of the acceptance by the Buddha of the invitation to visit Vesālī, King Bimbisāra caused it to be proclaimed all over the city: “Know ye, all men, the Buddha has accepted the invitation to visit the city of Vesālī.”

He then went to the Buddha and asked: “Most exalted Buddha, have you accepted the invitation of the citizens of Vesālī?” the Buddha replied: “Yes, I have accepted, your Majesty.” –“If that be so, may the Buddha wait till all necessary preparations for a ceremonial send-off are complete.”

Then King Bimbisāra caused the road between Rājagaha and the river Ganges which was five leagues in length, to be levelled and made even, and temporary pavilions were set up at every league along the route. When the Buddha was informed that everything was set, he started the journey in the company of 500 monastics.

The five-league long route was strewn with flowers of five different colours up to knee height, colourful streamers were erected along the route, pots filled with water and plantain trees were placed in order on either side of the road. Two white umbrellas protected the Buddha from the weather; likewise every monastic was protected by a white umbrella each. The King and his retinue of courtiers and army made offerings with flowers and scents along the route and at every stop, giving the Buddha and the company of monastics enough time to take rest. After a comfortable journey of five days, the whole procession reached the bank of the Ganges.

While the royal barge was in the process of being decorated, King Bimbisāra sent a written intimation to the Licchavī rulers, saying: “The Buddha is on the way to Vesālī; necessary arrangements should be made to keep the roads in a good state of preservation, for a grand reception of the Buddha and his monastics by all the Licchavī rulers.”

When the members of the Licchavī clan received the good news, they unanimously made the decision to organise a welcoming ceremony which would be twice as grand as the reverence shown by King Bimbisāra. They levelled the roads between Vesālī and the bank of the river Ganges which was three leagues. They kept four white umbrellas for the Buddha and two white umbrellas each for every monastic accompanying the Buddha. The whole city came out in a grand procession to the bank of the river Ganges to await the arrival of the [536] Buddha.

In the meantime, King Bimbisāra caused two big boats to be kept side by side and firmly tied together to form a huge barge. On the top of it was erected a pavilion, which was decorated profusely with bouquets of flowers and scents, suspended wreaths of flowers fashioned like a fan; inside the pavilion was installed the throne for the Buddha. It was studded with the seven kinds of precious jewels. On arrival at the bank of the river Ganges, the Buddha and his monastics went aboard the royal barge; the Buddha took his seat on the throne and the monastics took their seats at appropriate places.

After conducting the Buddha and his monastics to the barge, King Bimbisāra went into the river Ganges up to his neck, and holding the barge, addressed the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, I will be waiting for your return, on the bank of the river Ganges,” and he gently released the royal barge from his hand as he came out of water.

Celestial beings of the Deva realm, including the Brahmas of the Akaniṭṭha realm, paid honour to the Buddha. Similarly, beings from the lower planes, such as Kambala Nāga King and Assatara Nāga King, also paid homage to the Buddha.

Thus, amidst great festive celebrations, Devas and humans vied with one another in paying honour to the Buddha while he was being conducted across the Ganges, which measured one league from bank to bank, until eventually he entered the territory of the Vesālī rulers.

The Buddha was received on the opposite bank of Ganges by the Licchavīs who were ready waiting for his arrival. They honoured the Buddha twice as much as King Bimbisāra had shown, going down the river deep up to their neck to welcome him with profound respect.

The Lotus Rain

As soon as the royal barge carrying the Buddha reached the opposite bank of the river, wave after wave of dark rain clouds gathered from all sides, accompanied by flashes of lightning and the deafening roar of thunder, presaging a violent thunderstorm. The setting of the Buddha’s right foot on the bank of the river was marked by a falling of a torrential lotus rain (pokkhara-vassa) which wetted those who wished to get wet, leaving alone those not wanting to get wet. Streams of rain water with varying depths, ranging from the depth of the knee to the waist, the chest and to the neck, rushed all over the city of Vesālī, washing away the decaying dead bodies which were left unattended, as they flowed into the river Ganges. The whole city became clean once again, free from rubbish of all kinds and descriptions.

The Licchavīs conducted the Buddha from the river bank to Vesālī, three leagues away, amidst enthusiastic festivities, stopping one night at every pavilion which had been constructed at one league intervals. On the way, offerings were made which were twice as much as those given by King Bimbisāra. Finally the Buddha arrived at Vesālī after three days.

When the Buddha arrived at Vesālī, Sakka accompanied by Devas came down from their celestial planes to pay homage to him. The congregation of powerful Devas at Vesālī caused most of the Yakkhas, who had hitherto played havoc with the citizens, to flee the city.

The Buddha stood at the city gate and gave instructions to Ven. Ānanda: “Dear Ānanda, after learning this the Discourse about the Treasures (Ratana-sutta) from me, you should recite it within the three walls of the city as a protective measure (paritta), going round the city accompanied by the Licchavī princes who should be instructed to carry offerings in their hands.”

Having learned the Discourse about the Treasures from the Buddha at the gate of Vesālī on the very day of arrival, Ven. Ānanda went round within the three walls of the city reciting it rhythmically, with correct intonation, pronunciation, accent and punctuation. He took with him as he went round the Buddha’s alms bowl filled with water which he sprinkled all over the city.

The Discourse

[The following translation has been moved here from the section on the Dhamma Jewel, as it is needed to complete the story.]

The Pāli text of the Treasures Discourse (Ratana-sutta) is included with this English translation. The very elaborate and ornate Myanmar style of the translation is reduced to simple English prose with care being taken to include its essential features.

Reflecting on the many noble qualities of the Buddha such as: The ten kinds of perfection (pāramī) of three grades: ten perfections in the ordinary degree, [1172] the higher degree, and the superlative degree; the five kinds of self-sacrificing charity (mahā-pariccāga); the three types of good conduct (cariyā): conduct aimed at the welfare of the world, conduct aimed at the welfare of kinsmen, and conduct aimed at becoming a Buddha – all of which the Bodhisatta had taken upon himself since the day he wished to become a Buddha and received the assurance of being a Bodhisatta from the mouth of Buddha Dīpaṅkara, who was the fourth Buddha to arise in the aeon in which four Buddhas appeared.

Reflecting on the memorable events of the Bodhisatta’s conception in his last existence, his birth in Lumbinī Park, his great renunciation, his great endeavour involving six years of self-mortification, his noble victory over the five kinds of deaths (māra) and his Perfect Self-Awakening as the Buddha, having attained the all-knowing wisdom seated on his throne of victory at the foot of the Bodhi tree, his delivering of the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka) discourse at the Deer Park, and the nine supermundane states (dhamma).

Establishing a compassionate mind towards all beings in trouble, like the mind of Ven. Ānanda when reciting the Discourse about the Treasures (Ratana-sutta) around the three walls that guarded the city of Vesālī through the three watches of the night.

Let us recite the Discourse about the Treasures, whose benign authority all the Devas living in the million world-elements gladly acknowledge; and the recital of which alone had the immediate effect of stamping out the three scourges of the plague, demons and famine in the city of Vesālī.

This is the prelude to the Discourse about the Treasures (Ratana-sutta). The first part in Pāḷi prose beginning with: Yānīdha, is found in the commentary on the Dhammapada (DhpA XXI.1), variously called the Story of One's Previous Deeds (Attano-pubba-kamma-vatthu) and the Story about the Arising of the Ganges (Gaṅgārohaṇa-vatthu). The second part concerning the Discourse about the Treasures is in two verses composed by ancient teachers. The sutta as uttered by the Buddha began from the verse beginning with: Yānīdha bhūtāni, "May all the Devas belonging to the earth" Note that the last three verses were uttered by Sakka, the Lord of the Devas.

1. *Yānīdha bhūtāni samāgatāni,
bhummāni vā yāni va antalikkhe;
Sabbeva bhūtā sumanā bhavantu, athopi sakkacca suṇantu bhāsitaṃ.*

May all the Devas belonging to the earth and to the celestial realms, who are assembled here, be happy. Moreover, let them listen to this discourse respectfully.

2. *Tasmā hi bhūtā nisāmetha sabbe, mettaṃ karotha mānusiya pajāya;
Divā ca ratto ca haranti ye baliṃ, tasmā hi ne rakkhatha appamattā.*

Devas! All of you who have assembled here to hear the discourse, pay attention to what I am going to say, bestow your loving-kindness on human beings. By day or by night, they bring offerings to you. Therefore, protect them without remiss.

3. *Yaṃ kiñci vittaṃ idha vā huraṃ vā, saggesu vā yaṃ ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ;
Na no samaṃ atthi tathāgatena,
idampi buddhe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ;
Etena saccena suvatthi hotu.*

Whatever treasure there be, either in this human world or in the worlds of Nāgas or Garuḷas, or the celestial worlds, there is no treasure that can equal the Realised One. This is the incomparable quality in the Buddha that excels all worldly treasures. By this truth, may all beings be well and happy, both here and in the hereafter.

4. *Khayaṃ virāgaṃ amataṃ paṇītaṃ, yadajjhagā sakyamunī samāhito;
Na tena dhammena samatthi kiñci,
idampi dhamme ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ;
Etena saccena suvatthi hotu.*

The great Sakyan sage, with the tranquillity, which is the outcome of the noble path, has comprehended Nibbāna, the element of the extinction of the defilements, the end of attachment, the deathless. This is the incomparable quality in Nibbāna that excels all worldly treasures. By this truth, may all beings be well and happy, both here and in the hereafter!

5. *Yaṃ buddhaseṭṭho parivaṇṇayī suciṃ, samādhimānantarikaññamāhu;
Samādhinā tena samo na vijjati,
idampi dhamme ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ;
Etena saccena suvatthi hotu.*

The Perfectly Self-Awakened One, the Supreme Buddha, extolled the concentration that is the outcome of the noble path. This concentration has been declared by the Buddhas as instantly beneficial. There is an incomparable quality in the concentration associated with the noble path since it is by far superior to the concentration pertaining to the fine-material absorption (jhāna) or the non-material absorption (jhāna). By this truth, may all beings be well and happy, both here and in the hereafter!

6. Ye puggalā aṭṭha satam pasatthā, cattāri etāni yugāni honti;

*Te dakkhiṇeyyā sugatassa sāvakā,
etesu dinnāni mahapphalāni;
Idampi saṅghe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,
etena saccena suvatthi hotu.*

There are these eight individuals whom the noble ones (ariya) praise. They are the four pairs of noble ones (ariya) at the four stages of path-knowledge, each with path and fruition knowledges. These noble disciples of the Buddha deserve choicest offerings by those aspiring to Awakening. Such offerings made to them yield abundant fruit. This is the incomparable quality in the Saṅgha consisting of these eight pairs of noble ones (ariya) that excel [1173] all worldly treasures. By this truth, may all beings be well and happy, both here and in the hereafter!

[There was a long explanation of the 108 types of noble ones inserted here. I have removed it to the Further Explanations, as that is more suitable.]

*7. Ye suppayuttā manasā daḷhena, nikkāmino gotamasāsanamhi;
Te pattipattā amataṃ vigayha, laddhā mudhā nibbutiṃ bhuñjamānā;
Idampi saṅghe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,
etena saccena suvatthi hotu.*

Those noble Arahats, who strive with steadfast minds under Buddha Gotama’s teaching, are released from the defilements. They have their mind well settled on [1174] Nibbāna, the deathless element. Having become Arahats, they enjoy the bliss of Nibbāna without having to incur any expense. This is the incomparable quality in the Arahats that excels all worldly treasures. By this truth, may all beings be well and happy, both here and in the hereafter!

*8. Yathindakhīlo pathavissito siyā, catubbhi vātehi asampakampiyo;
Tathūpamaṃ sappurisaṃ vadāmi, yo ariyasaccāni avecca passati;
Idampi saṅghe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,
etena saccena suvatthi hotu.*

Just as a pillar at the city gate, firmly fixed in the ground, is unshaken by the fierce winds from the four quarters, even so do I declare that the noble one (ariya) who perceives the four noble truths through his first path-knowledge is unshakable under all worldly conditions. This is the incomparable quality in the Stream-enterer that excels all worldly treasures. By this truth, may all beings be well and happy, both here and in the hereafter!

*9. Ye ariyasaccāni vibhāvayanti, gambhīrapaññena sudesitāni;
Kiñcāpi te honti bhusaṃ pamattā, na te bhavaṃ aṭṭhamamādiyanti;
Idampi saṅghe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,
etena saccena suvatthi hotu.*

Those Stream-enterers have perceived the noble truths clearly, being well-taught by the Buddha, the possessor of most profound knowledge. However exceedingly forgetful they might be, they do not take birth for an eighth time. This is the incomparable quality in the Stream-enterer that excels all worldly treasures. By this truth, may all beings be well and happy, both here and in the hereafter!

*10. Sahāvassa dassanasampadāya, tayassu dhammā jahitā bhavanti;
Sakkāyadiṭṭhī vicikicchitañca, sīlabbataṃ vāpi yadatthi kiñci.
Idampi saṅghe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,
etena saccena suvatthi hotu.*

At the instant of the arising of Stream-entry knowledge, the three defilements of wrong view concerning this body of five aggregates, which arises in 20 ways; eight kinds of doubts and sixteen kinds of uncertainty; and the wrong belief in misguided practices outside the noble path, should there be any, are discarded once and for all.

*11. Catūhapāyehi ca vippamutto, chaccābhiṭṭhānāni abhabba kātuṃ ;
Idampi saṅghe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,
etena saccena suvatthi hotu.*

Although certain defilements still remain in him, he is absolutely freed from the four lower worlds (apāya). He is also incapable of committing the six gross evil deeds: the five evil deeds and following teachers other than the Buddha. This is the incomparable quality in the Stream-enterer that excels all worldly treasures. By this truth, may all beings be well and happy, both here and in the hereafter!

*12. Kiñcāpi so kamma karoti pāpakaṃ, kāyena vācā uda cetasā vā;
Abhabba so tassa paṭicchadāya, abhabbatā diṭṭhapadassa vuttā;
Idampi saṅghe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,
etena saccena suvatthi hotu.*

In case, through being heedless, the Stream-enterer commits an evil action by deed, word or thought, he is incapable of concealing it. That quality of being incapable of concealing any misdeed, the Stream-enterer, who has seen Nibbāna, becomes endowed with. This has been pointed out by the Buddha. This is the incomparable quality in the Stream-enterer that excels all worldly treasures. By this truth, may all beings be well and happy, both here and in the hereafter!

*13. Vanappagumbe yatha phussitagge, gimhānamāse paṭhamasmiṃ gimhe;
Tathūpamaṃ dhammavaraṃ adesayi,
nibbānagāmiṃ paramaṃ hitāya;
Idampi buddhe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,
etena saccena suvatthi hotu.*

Just like the forest in spring time, the first month of the hot season has its tree tops ablaze with blossoms, is a scene of delight, so also the doctrine, delightful in word and in meaning, leading to Nibbāna, has been delivered by the Buddha for the highest benefit of Nibbāna. This is the incomparable quality in the doctrine that excels all worldly treasures. By this truth, may all beings be well and happy, both here and in the hereafter!

*14. Varo varaññū varado varāharo, anuttaro dhammavaraṃ adesayi;
Idampi buddhe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,
etena saccena suvatthi hotu.*

The excellent one, the knower of the excellent element of Nibbāna, the bestower of the supermundane to the three spheres, the one who has embraced the old path of the eight constituents, the peerless Buddha, has explained the excellent doctrine comprising ten stages. This is the incomparable quality in the Buddha that excels all worldly treasures. By this truth, may all beings be well and happy, both here and in the hereafter!

*15. Khīṇaṃ purāṇaṃ nava natthi sambhavaṃ, virattacittāyatike bhavasmiṃ;
Te khīṇabījā avirūḥhichandā,
nibbanti dhīrā yathāyaṃ padīpo;
Idampi saṅghe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,
etena saccena suvatthi hotu.*

To Arahats, the old deeds (kamma) are extinct beyond the present existence, no new deeds are created. Their mind is not attached to any future existences. They have completely destroyed the seeds of existence. They do not hanker after continued existence. Just as the lamp is extinguished, these wise ones have their aggregates extinguished. This is the incomparable quality in the Arahats that excels all worldly treasures. By this truth, may all beings be well and happy, both here and in the hereafter!

The following is spoken by Sakka, Lord of the Gods:

*16. Yānīdha bhūtāni samāgatāni,
bhummāni vā yāni va antalikkhe;
Tathāgataṃ devamanussapūjitaṃ, buddhaṃ namassāma suvatthi hotu.*

Devas belonging to the earth and to the celestial realms are assembled here. We all pay our homage to the Buddha whose coming to the world is most auspicious. May this good deed bring peace and happiness to all beings.

*17. Yānīdha bhūtāni samāgatāni,
bhummāni vā yāni va antalikkhe;
Tathāgataṃ devamanussapūjitaṃ,
dhammaṃ namassāma suvatthi hotu.*

Devas belonging to the earth and to the celestial realms are assembled here. We all pay our homage to the Dhamma whose proclamation in the world is most auspicious. May [1175] this good deed bring peace and happiness to all beings.

*18. Yānīdha bhūtāni samāgatāni,
bhummāni vā yāni va antalikkhe;
Tathāgataṃ devamanussapūjitaṃ,
saṅghaṃ namassāma suvatthi hotūti.*

Devas belonging to the earth and to the celestial realms are assembled here. We all pay our homage to the Saṅgha whose presence in the world is most auspicious. May this good deed bring peace and happiness to all beings.

That concludes the Discourse about the Treasures, but the author adds the following encouraging verse, which is an earnest wish:

Let the devotees recite the Discourse about the Treasures (Ratana-sutta) beginning with: May all the Devas, up to this verse, which is an earnest wish, and the three scourges will be kept at bay as in ancient Vesālī. This discourse, uttered by the Buddha himself, will prove efficacious to those who recite it with due faith. Accordingly, may those wishing to be free from all troubles recite Treasure Discourse, which is most excellent. [1176]

As soon as Ven. Ānanda started reciting the first verse of the sutta with the words: [537] Yam kiñci vittaṃ ... those Yakkhas, ghosts, ghouls, goblins and demons who had not yet fled the city but had remained taking shelter under the garbage dumps or clinging to the walls, etc., made off in great haste through the four city gates. As the gates were jammed with fleeing evil spirits, some of them were forced to break through the walls of the city. With the fleeing of beings from the city, those who suffered from their evil influence regained their health and the pestilences disappeared. The citizens came out from their homes with bunches of flowers and scents and paid homage to Ven. Ānanda.

The Buddha Recites the Discourse about the Treasures

The king and the citizens decorated the legislative Assembly Hall in the heart of the city with garlands of flowers and scents, setting up a canopied ceiling with studded ornaments. Then they installed the throne for the Buddha in a proper place and conducted him to the hall. The Buddha took his seat on the throne while the monastics, kings and princes, and citizens sat at appropriate places. Then Sakka, accompanied by the Devas of the two celestial realms of Catumahārājika and Tāvātimsa as well as Brahmas and other Devas, also arrived to pay homage to the Buddha.

22a: The Discourse on the Treasures – 726

Ven. Ānanda, having taken preventive measures by reciting the protection (paritta) all over Vesālī, arrived at the city hall with the crowd of citizens and they all took seats at suitable places. At this huge gathering of humans, Devas and Brahmas, the Buddha recited the same discourse (Ratana-sutta), which he had taught Ānanda.

The Discourse about the Treasures (Ratana-sutta) text which the Buddhist public see, read and study nowadays is made up of three sections: 1) The portion beginning with: Pañidhānato paṭṭhāya ... up to: Parittam taṃ bhaṇāmahe ... is the preface in prose and verse composed by scholars of the past; 2) the fifteen verses, beginning from: Yānīdha bhūtāni samāgatāni ... to: Khīnaṃ purānaṃ nava natthi sambhavaṃ ... are the original Pāḷi text expounded by the Buddha; 3) the last three, Yānīdha bhūtāni samāgatāni ... etc. were uttered by Sakka to the congregation at the end of the recital.

At the conclusion of the discourse on the Discourse about the Treasures (Ratana-sutta) on the first day, the Licchavī royal families together with all the citizens of Vesālī were freed from suffering and gained happiness; all kinds of dangers and pestilence were removed and peace was restored. 84,000 sentient beings were emancipated through realizing the four noble truths.

It dawned upon Sakka then that: “The Buddha has brought happiness and prosperity to the people of Vesālī by speaking words of truth about the attributes of the Three Treasures, I should also utter words of truth concerning the virtues of the Three Treasures for the welfare of the citizens of Vesālī.” He therefore rose to recite the three verses: Yānīdha bhūtāni samāgatāni ... etc. which appear at the end of the discourse.

After reciting the three verses, Sakka paid homage to the Buddha by circumambulating him three times and left for the world of the Devas accompanied by his celestial followers. But the Buddha went on expounding the discourse on the second day when 84,000 sentient beings were again emancipated through realizing the four noble truths. In this way, the Buddha continued to expound the same discourse for seven days in succession, emancipating 84,000 sentient beings on each day.

A total of  $84,000 \times 7 \text{ days} = 588,000$ , this is the amount of beings who were emancipated through realization of the four noble truths. [538]

The Fundamental Principles of Protection Recitation

Protection recitations (paritta) are the Buddha's word, otherwise known as discourses (sutta), which serve as a protective measure, dispelling all forms of danger from all quarters: pacifying and making those dangers presently arising, cease and disappear and preventing the impending dangers from arising at all.

The discourse on the Blessings (Maṅgala-sutta, Khp 5, Snp 2.4) the Discourse about the Treasures (Ratana-sutta, Khp 6, Snp 2.1), etc. are discourses taught by the Buddha, and they are powerful enough to protect both the reciter and the listener from impending danger, and also to repel or disperse the danger presently operating. They have the special attributes of bringing well-being and prosperity; hence they have the special name of protective (paritta) discourses.

In order to bring about such beneficial effects, it is necessary that the reciter should have the four accomplishments and the listener should also possess four accomplishments as set out below:

The Four Accomplishments of a Reciter<sup>197</sup>

1. The reciter must be capable of reciting passages, phrases, syllables of the Pāli text with the correct mode of articulation, enunciation, and accent.
2. He must have full and exact understanding of the Pāli text he is reciting.
3. The reciter should chant the protection (paritta) without expectation of gifts or presents.
4. The protection (paritta) should be recited with a pure heart full of loving-kindness and compassion.

The protection (paritta) should be recited only with the fulfilment of these conditions so as to be really effective in warding off and dispelling the impending dangers to the listener. Unless these conditions are fulfilled by the reciter, no beneficial results will accrue and no advantages gained as intended by the reciting of the protection (paritta).

<sup>197</sup> The author gave two versions, one having three accomplishments and another having four. As the second version includes the first version also, we translate only the second version of the four accomplishments.

The above modes of reciting and listening to the protection (paritta) are prescribed on the lines laid down in the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya) commentary. Systematic study and scrutiny of words and phrases should be made, proper attention being paid to the understanding of Pāli terms employed. Unless proper attention is paid to study correct enunciation and meaning of the Pāli text, the chances of securing the desired result are remote. Only recitation by those who have carefully studied the modes of reciting will bear powerful effects. Recitation of protections (paritta) by those with intention to receive gifts or offerings will not produce any real result. Recitation of protections by those with hearts full of loving-kindness and compassion and with an inclination towards freedom from the cycle of suffering will be advantageous.

Therefore, one who administers protection (paritta) must first and foremost study the Pāli text, together with the relevant commentaries, under a qualified teacher, special attention being paid to the mode of enunciation, accent and punctuation. Any omission or deletion of words or phrases from the Pāli text may render the recitation altogether meaningless. The correct mode of recitation, with full understanding of its meaning, are the vital forces of the protection which will bring about the desired result.

Mistakes in the way of administration, lack of correct enunciation and understanding of its true meaning, coupled with a desire to receive something in return, will undermine the strength of the protection and no desirable result will be obtained.

It must, therefore, be emphasised that it is necessary to administer the protection according to the conditions laid down, with a heart full of loving-kindness, and compassion and resolute inclination towards release from Samsāra and curbing one's desire to receive offerings.

Failure and Success of the Reciter

Failure of one who administers protection (paritta) arises from two causes, namely: a failure in the undertaking (payoga-vipatti) and a failure through wrong determination (ajjhāsaya-vipatti).

1. The inability to express words and phrases of the text with accuracy and exactness and with full understanding of their meaning, through a lack of effort and [539] diligence (payoga-vipatti).

2. Administration of protection (paritta) with a desire for gains and fame (ajjhāsayā-vipatti).

The success of one who administers protection arises from two causes, namely: success in the undertaking (payoga-sampatti) and success through right determination (ajjhāsayā-sampatti).

1. Proficiency in administering protection through diligence, through learning the correct modes of enunciation and with full understanding of the meaning (payoga-sampatti)
2. Proficiency in administering protection through loving-kindness, compassion with an inclination towards emancipation and without a selfish motive looking for rewards (ajjhāsayā-sampatti).

This section on failure and success are excerpts from the sub-commentary to the Āṭānāṭiya discourse (Āṭānāṭiya-sutta, DN 32).

The Four Accomplishments of a Listener

1. The listener should be free from the guilt of the five grave transgressions which bring immediate retribution (pañcānantarīya-kamma): killing his father, killing his mother, killing an Arahat, causing bleeding in an attempt on the Buddha's life, causing schism amongst the disciples of a Buddha.
2. The listener should be free from wrong views with a fixed destiny (niyata-micchā-diṭṭhi).<sup>198</sup>
3. The listener should possess unshakable faith in the efficacy and beneficial results of the protection.
4. The listener should listen to the protection recitation with due diligence, full attention and profound respect.

These are the qualifications which should be possessed by a listener to the protection recitations (paritta); in the Questions to Milinda (Milinda-pañhā), in the chapters on the Question about the Ram (Meṇḍaka-pañhā), and the Question on becoming free from the Snare (Pāsamutti-pañhā) the first three accomplishments are mentioned as follows: “Your majesty, hindrances, such as the five grave transgressions, wrong views or heretical beliefs and a lack of confidence in the protection, cannot serve as a means of protection against dangers.” These are the words of Ven. Nāgasena spoken to King Milinda. In view of this, it must be concluded that only those who are free from the three hindrances, stand to enjoy the benefit of the protection.

Failure and Success of the Listener

The failure of one who listens to the protection arises from two causes, namely: a failure in the undertaking (payoga-vipatti) and a failure through wrong determination (ajjhāsaya-vipatti).

1. Failure to listen to the protection recitation with due respect, raising the palms together; with one’s mind fixed on the protection without any distractions, through lack of diligence and effort (payoga-vipatti).
2. Listening to the protection half-heartedly, without confidence in the efficacy and the beneficial result of the protection; listening to the protection just to oblige and please the person who invites one to the protection ceremony (ajjhāsaya-vipatti).

Success of one who listens to the protection arises from two causes, namely: success in the undertaking (payoga-sampatti) and success through right determination (ajjhāsaya-sampatti).

1. Making the necessary effort in listening to the protection recitation by raising the hands with palms together having profound respect and with one’s mind fixed [540] on the protection without any distractions (payoga-sampatti).
2. Listening to the protection wholeheartedly, with full confidence in the efficacy and beneficial result of listening to the protection, not just to oblige and please the person who invites one to listen to the protection but with wholesome desire to gain merit (ajjhāsaya-sampatti).

Listeners of the protection (paritta) should abandon the two factors of failure as mentioned above and strive to be accomplished in the two successes, so as to secure the true benefit of protection from impending dangers.

Just as the protection reciter has to abandon the two factors of failure and become accomplished in the two factors of success, so also the listener has to do likewise.

Protection Discourses That Possess Unique Power

1. The Discourse about the Treasures (Ratana-sutta, Khp 6, Snp 2.1) is possessed of a power which extends over 1,000 billion world-elements. It has brought about the realization of the paths and fruitions and the attainment of Nibbāna by 588,000 humans, Devas and Brahmas. It is therefore a ward-rune or protection (paritta) of great authority or influence.
2. The Discourse on the Blessings (Maṅgala-sutta, Khp 5, Snp 2.4) is also possessed of a power which extends over 1,000 billion world-elements. An innumerable number of humans, Devas and Brahmas have realised the paths and fruitions and attained Nibbāna through listening to this discourse.
3. The Discourse on Friendliness Meditation (Metta-sutta or Karaṇīyametta-sutta, Khp 9, Snp 1.8) is a well known discourse of great power. Its authority extends over 1,000 billion world-elements. It had helped forest dwelling monastics become Arahats, through extinction of the pollutants (āsava). By assiduously and fully cultivating the moral instructions laid down in this discourse, one can assuredly gain the path to emancipation. It is also a powerful protection (paritta).
4. The Discourse about the Constituents of Mind & Body (Khandha-sutta, AN 4:67) is another powerful discourse, the authority of which extends over 1,000 billion world-elements. It has the power to ward off dangers from various poisons at all times. This discourse contains certain portions that describe the virtues and glories of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha and also the good effects of loving-kindness (mettā). Thus it is a powerful protection (paritta) which can bring about unique beneficial results.
5. The Discourse about the Top of a Banner (Dhajagga-sutta, SN 11:3) is also a discourse of great power which extends over 1,000 billion world-elements. The contemplation of the virtues of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha extolled in this discourse is a means to strengthen one's intellectual power, to enjoy celestial bliss for 3,000 aeons, to be reborn as Sakka for 80 times, as a Universal Monarch for 1,000 times, as an ordinary king or emperor for a countless number of times; to be always rich and prosperous in every existence, when the property he possesses cannot be lost, stolen or destroyed. For 100,000 aeons, he would not be reborn in the planes of woe nor would he be disturbed or shaken through fright which causes the hair to stand on end and goose flesh to appear. Such is the immense power of this discourse which will ultimately lead one to Awakening.

6. The Discourses on the Factors of Awakening (Bojjhaṅga-sutta, SN 46:14-16) wield great authority which extends over 1,000 billion world-elements, possessing the power to ward off danger and ailments. A complete cultivation of the seven factors of awakening contained in this discourse leads to Nibbāna in this very life through realization of the paths and fruitions.
7. The Āṭānāṭiya Discourse (Āṭānāṭiya-sutta, DN 32) was originally composed by the Four Great Kings (Catu-mahā-rājika), having gathered together in the celestial city of Āṭānāṭā. They first paid homage to the seven Buddhas, praising their virtues and attributes. They then composed this discourse and made a proclamation: “Those unruly wild celestial beings such as Yakkhas, who are not amenable to the instructions of the Buddha, nor to the code of conduct laid down by ourselves, will be punished according to the celestial laws.” The guardian Devas then went to the Buddha, accompanied by a great number of celestial guards and troops, and presented to him this powerful discourse, which they had [541] composed. The Buddha taught this discourse to the monastics which thus became a powerful authoritative, protective word-rune, or protection (paritta).

The relevant commentary lays down the method of administering the protection as follows: In the case of those possessed by demons, Petas and unruly beings, the Āṭānāṭiya Discourse (Āṭānāṭiya-sutta) should not be administered initially. For seven days continuously, the Discourse on Friendliness Meditation (Metta-sutta), the Discourse through the Top of a Banner (Dhajagga-sutta) and the Discourse about the Treasures (Ratana-sutta) should be recited first. Should the possessed person become normal after these recitations, there is no need for administering the Āṭānāṭiya Discourse (Āṭānāṭiya-sutta).

Only when the desired result is not achieved after reciting continuously for seven days of the first three discourses, should the Āṭānāṭiya Discourse (Āṭānāṭiya-sutta) be recited. The monastic who recites the Āṭānāṭiya Discourse (Āṭānāṭiya-sutta) should not eat cakes made of flour, meat and fish; nor should he reside in a cemetery. This is because if such a monastic eats flour cakes, meat or fish or resides in a cemetery, he is liable to be possessed by evil spirits. The place chosen for recitation of the protection should be kept clean and tidy and besmeared with turmeric powder.

The monastic who would administer the protection should be conducted from the monastery to the house, surrounded by a security guard of men armed with bows and arrows, shields, swords and spears. The monastic should not recite the protection in the open; the gate door, windows and doors of the house should be securely closed and the monastic should sit down closely surrounded by the armed guard. Then with a heart full of loving-kindness he should administer the protection according to the following guide lines: it is essential that the afflicted person should be first established in morality (sīla) by observance of the precepts and then this is followed by the recitation of the protection.

Should such measures fail to drive away the evil ones, the possessed person should be taken to the monastery and kept lying on the relic shrine (stūpa) platform. The shrine platform should be swept clean and offerings of light should be made; then Pāḷi prose and verses, such as: Divā tapati ādicco ... (Dhp 387) etc., which generally bring auspiciousness, should be chanted. An announcement should then be made to the effect that all monastics have gathered together at that place.

Then someone should go to the nearby forest grove where there would be a tree which is conspicuous by special features, such as size, height, etc., and invite the guardian dryad, saying: “All the monastics are desirous of your coming to the gathering.” Such an invitation by the monastics can never be refused.

Then the person possessed should be asked: “What is your name?” Should it be Naradeva, for instance, he should be addressed by that name: “Naradeva, you have been given a share of merits gained from provision of accommodation to the Saṅgha, the share of merits gained from the offerings of scents and flowers, from the offering of meals to the Saṅgha; the monastics have also recited auspicious discourses, such as The Discourse on the Blessings (Maṅgala-sutta), as a gift of Dhamma to you. So out of consideration for these deeds of kindness and out of respect to the Saṅgha, we pray that you release this patient.”

Should such measures fail to secure the release of the demoniacal possession, the situation should be made known to the benevolent Devas: “Good Devas, you are fully aware that this unruly evil spirit does not take notice of our request made with loving-kindness. We have no alternative but to have recourse and invoke the authority of the Buddha.” So saying, the Āṭānāṭiya Discourse (Āṭānāṭiya-sutta) should be recited.

The above method is applicable only to lay people. For the monastic who is possessed by demons, Petas and unruly beings, his room should be swept clean and made tidy, then all the Saṅgha should be invited to assemble there. After sharing the merits gained from offerings of flowers, scents, etc., the Āṭānāṭiya Discourse should be recited as described before.

Thus the administration of the Āṭānāṭiya Discourse is elaborately described in the commentary on the Discourse. When recited systematically as laid down in the commentary, the Āṭānāṭiya Discourse is of immense authority, wielding great power and influence.

Likewise, the other protections are also of great power and influence in their own way. In short, the words of the Buddha, such as the Basket of Discourses (Sutta-piṭaka) consisting of the five Collections (Nikāya), are of great authority, its influence pervading over 1,000 billion world-element, promoting welfare and prosperity both in mundane and supermundane spheres. It wards [542] off all kinds of dangers and paves the way to the attainment of Nibbāna through realization of the paths and fruitions. These words of the Buddha, enshrined in the Collections are the noblest of all the spoken words and it should thus be confidently taken to be of immense authority, wielding great power and influence in accordance with this saying (SN 8.6):

Yaṃ Buddho bhāsate vācaṃ, khemaṃ Nibbāna-pattiyā, dukkhassanta-kiriyaṃ, sā ve vācānam-uttamā.

The Fully-Self Awakened Buddha has expounded out of great compassion the Five Collections with the object of attainment of Nibbāna, which is the cessation of all sufferings. The words spoken by the Buddha, as contained in the Collections, excel all other words, free of any fault and conducive to peace and happiness.

Leaving Vesālī

After a fortnight's stay in the city of Vesālī, the Buddha told the Licchavī princes: "We are leaving," by way of farewell. Whereupon the Licchavīs honoured the Buddha as much as twice that of King Bimbisāra and in three days they conducted him to the bank of the Ganges.

The Nāgas in the region of the Ganges agreed amongst themselves saying: "Men have made homage to the Buddha on a lavish scale and why should we not do likewise? We will do likewise." They proceeded to create golden boats, silver boats, and emerald boats mounted with golden, silver and emerald thrones, and covering the entire surface of the Ganges with a blanket of five different species of lily. They then approached the Buddha and made the solemn request: "Most exalted Buddha, may you grant us a favour by gratifying our wish out of compassion for us?"

The Buddha conceded to their request and went aboard the boats which were created by the Nāgas with jewel ornamentations. Each of the 500 monastics also occupied a jewelled boat. Whereupon, the Nāga kings conducted the Buddha and his 500 monastics to the Nāga realm, and the Buddha spent the whole night expounding discourses for the benefit of the Nāgas. The next morning, a great offering of celestial food was made to the Buddha and his monastics by the Nāga kings. After teaching a discourse in appreciation of the offerings, the Buddha made his departure from the land of the Nāgas.

Devas, who had dominion over that region of the earth (bhumma-devā), also agreed amongst themselves, saying: "Humans and Nāgas have made great homage to the Buddha, why should we not do likewise? We shall follow suit." They proceeded to do honour to the Buddha by setting up excellent umbrellas all over the hills, forest and trees. In this manner similar offerings were made right up to the Brahma realm of Akaniṭṭha.

King Bimbisāra, making great homage twice as much as that of the Licchavīs, conducted the Buddha and his monastics to Veḷuvana monastery, Rājagaha, making the whole journey as before, in five days.

The Life of the Bodhisatta Saṅkha

After the arrival of the Buddha at Veḷuvana monastery, the monastics assembled at the main hall in the afternoon to discuss matters relating to meditation. Their discussion was often interrupted by conversations, such as: “The glories of the Buddha are really wonderful. The stretch of land on this side of the Ganges is five leagues and on the other side of the Ganges it is three leagues, a total of eight leagues; the surface of the land on both sides was without bumps or hollows at any place. It had an even surface all over and was strewn with white sand and flowers. The surface of the river Ganges, with a width of one league, was covered by a blanket of five-hued species of flowers. The whole region was decorated with white umbrellas right up to the Akaniṭṭha Brahma realm.” Their discussion on [543] meditation was often interrupted by such words of praise in honour of the Buddha.

Aware of what was happening, the Buddha left the scented chamber and went to the Assembly Hall. He sat on the reserved seat. He then asked the monastics: “Monastics, what is the subject of your discussion at this moment?”

When it was explained what it was, he said: “Such a wonderful manner of paying respects is not attributable to my glories as a Buddha, nor to the powers of the Nāgas, Devas and Brahmas. It should be attributed to the beneficial results which accrue from a small deed of mine done in the past.”

When the Buddha had given such a hint, the monastics approached him with the request: “Most exalted Buddha, we do not have any knowledge of that small deed of generosity done in the past. Most exalted Buddha, we pray that we may be enlightened so as to know about it fully.”

The Buddha, thereupon, proceeded: Monastics, what happened in the past was this: There was a Brahmin in the city of Takkaṣilā by the name of Saṅkha. He had a son named Susīma, who was sixteen years old. One day, Susīma approached his father with great respect and his father asked him: “My dear son, what is the matter with you?” Then the lad replied: “Father, I would like to go to Bārāṇasī to acquire an education.” His father said: “My dear son, there is a Brahmin teacher in Bārāṇasī. He is my childhood friend, you might go to him and receive your share of education.” He then gave his son a sum of 1,000 pieces of money for his necessary expenditure.

Susīma paid due respect to his parents and taking the money, set out on his journey and arrived at Bārāṇasī in due time. He approached the teacher with profound respect and in a customary way. He told the teacher that he was the son of the Brahmin Saṅkha of Takkasilā. The teacher gave him a warm reception making the remark: “So you are a son of my friend.”

After a moment of rest, Susīma went again to the Brahmin, and placing the sum of money at his feet, requested him for permission to acquire education under his care. The permission was willingly granted. He took pains in learning, so that, in a very short time, he added everything to the fount of his knowledge, just like the precious grease of lions is retained in a gold cup for the sake of security. As he was endowed with the perfections (pāramī), he completed the full course of learning in a few months instead of the twelve years an average pupil would have to spend.

As Susīma was in the middle of studying a Veda text, he discovered that the treatise contained only the beginning and middle of the subject they treated; the final section was not to be found therein. He brought the matter to the notice of the Brahmin, saying: “Great Brahmin, this Veda text deals only with the beginning and middle of the subject, the final portion is not found in it.” Whereupon, the Brahmin also admitted that he too did not find it. Susīma then asked the Brahmin: “Is there anyone who knows all about the subject from beginning to end?” The Brahmin replied: “My dear son Susīma, those Paccekabuddhas who live in the forest of the Deer Park at Isipatana, may possibly know.” – “If so, may I have your kind permission to go and ask those Paccekabuddhas about it,” requested the youth Susīma. The Brahmin granted his permission, saying: “My dear son Susīma, you may go as you like.”

Susīma, who was accomplished in the perfections (pāramī), went to the forest of the Deer Park at Isipatana, approached the Paccekabuddhas with due respect and asked: “Venerable sirs, do you know the subjects in the Vedas from beginning to end?” – “Yes, we do, lay devotee Susīma,” was their reply. Then he requested them: “Kindly teach me the last part of the knowledge which is missing in the Veda.” The Paccekabuddhas told him: “Lay devotee Susīma, you will have to renounce the world and become a recluse. No one other than a monastic could learn that.” Susīma agreed and gave his word: “Very well, venerable sirs, please ordain me as a monastic. You may direct me to do anything that is necessary so long as it helps me learn the last portion of Veda knowledge.”

He was ordained as a monastic as requested and was taught how [544] to wear the robes properly such as keeping the borders of both the upper and lower robes in a tidy circular fashion. They could teach him only the precepts of good conduct (abhisamācārika-sīla), and not any meditation, because unlike omniscient Buddhas, they had not the ability to give instructions on how to practise insight meditation (vipassanā).

The newly ordained monastic Susīma devoted himself earnestly to the observance of the precepts of good conduct as instructed by the Paccekabuddhas. Having performed deeds of merit in the past which formed sufficing conditions (upanissaya) for the attainment of Paccekabuddha knowledge (Pacceka-buddha-ñāṇa), after a brief period of practice, he became a Paccekabuddha. He was soon held in high repute and reached the height of his glory acquiring great fame and gains and a large number of followers and disciples. But because of his past misdeeds, which prohibited longevity, he did not live long and passed away while still young. His remains were cremated by the Paccekabuddhas and the citizens of Bārāṇasī. The relics of his body were placed in a relic shrine (stūpa) built near the gate of the city.

The old Brahmin father, Saṅkha, thought of his son one day: “My son had been gone for a long time now and no news had been received from him.” So he left Takkaṣilā with a longing to see his son and eventually reached the gate of the city of Bārāṇasī. He saw quite a number of people gathered together near the shrine there; and thinking someone from amongst the crowd would perhaps know something about his son, he approached them and enquired: “Friends, there is a young man by the name of Susīma who came to Bārāṇasī to study; perhaps some of you might know something about him.”

“Yes we do, old Brahmin. That young man Susīma, after acquiring the complete knowledge of the Vedas under the care of the Brahmin of Bārāṇasī, received ordination at the place of the Paccekabuddhas, and eventually became a Paccekabuddha through realization of Paccekabuddha knowledge (Pacceka-buddha-ñāṇa). He has passed away now, attaining Nibbāna with no residue remaining (anupādisesa-nibbāna). This is the shrine where his relics are enshrined.”

22a: The Discourse on the Treasures – 739

After hearing this shocking news, the poor old Brahmin wept most hopelessly, beating the earth with his palm many times. After mourning the loss of his dear son to his heart's content, he went into the precincts of the shrine and removed grass, and spread white sand which he had brought from a nearby place with his shoulder towel. He poured water from his jug all over the place to keep the dust from arising; then he collected as many wild flowers as possible and offered them to the shrine. He put his shoulder towel into the shape of a streamer and wrapping it around his umbrella, he placed it high above the shrine, tying them tight to the shrine. Then he departed.

Having thus told the story of the past, the Buddha correlated the events of the past with those of the present by giving the following discourse: “Monastics, you might be wondering who the Brahmin Saṅkha of this story could be. You need not ponder any more about it. The Brahmin Saṅkha was none other than myself.

I, who was a Bodhisatta then, cleaned the precincts of the shrine containing the relics of the Paccekabuddha Susīma, removing the grass roots, stump, etc. As a beneficial result of this act of merit, the people made the road clean and free of tree stumps and levelled it for a stretch of five leagues on this side of the Ganges and three leagues on the far bank.

I, then a Bodhisatta, spread white sand in the precincts of the Paccekabuddha shrine. As a benefit accruing from this act of merit, people spread white sand all along the route measuring eight leagues.

I, then a Bodhisatta, had collected as many wild flowers as I could and placed them in the shrine. This meritorious deed of mine resulted in Devas and humans strewing various kinds of flowers on land and the river, covering a distance of nine leagues. [545]

I, then a Bodhisatta, sprinkled the precincts of the Paccekabuddha shrine with water from my jug to prevent the dust from arising. As a result of this act of merit of mine the lotus rain (pokkhara-vassa) from a cloud bank the size of a lily leaf fell the moment I set foot on the land of Vesālī.

I, then a Bodhisatta, set up a streamer at the shrine of the Paccekabuddha and erected an umbrella on top of it. For that act of merit, streamers were set up all the way to the Akaniṭṭha Brahma realm and white umbrellas were erected all over the regions.

Monastics, making homage to me in such wonderful manner is not attributable to my glories as a Buddha, nor to the powers of Nāga, Devas and Brahmas. It should be attributed to the beneficial results which accrue from a small deed of merit done by me as a Bodhisatta in my existence as Brahmin Saṅkha.” The Buddha summed up the discourse by expounding the following verse (Dhp 290:

Mattā-sukha-pariccāgā, passe ce vipulaṃ sukhaṃ, caje mattā sukhaṃ dhīro, sampassaṃ vipulaṃ sukhaṃ.

When it is known with certainty that a generous abandoning by way of sacrifice of pleasurable sensations, which gives a small amount of happiness, will bring a vast amount of reward such as the happiness of Nibbāna, then surely a wise person should forego such an insignificant reward of a small pleasure in favour of the great reward of Nibbāna.

At the conclusion of the exposition, many sentient beings attained the Stream-entry path and fruit, etc.

Uggasena, the Acrobat

[The following is based on DhpA XXIV.6, the commentary to Dhp 348, it is moved here from the following chapter, so as to make that chapter more focused.]

Uggasena, the Son of a Richman

In the time of the Buddha a theatrical troupe of 500 entertainers used to stage shows to entertain the King of Rājagaha for seven days annually or bi-annually, for which they received an enormous amount of reward in gold and silver. The prizes awarded by the enthusiastic general public in their honour, at intervals of performances, was inestimable. The citizens sat upon rows and rows of four-legged bedsteads of their own, arranging them behind and above one another, each row getting higher and higher than the one in front.

Their shows usually started with the appearance on the stage of a young actress, the daughter of the troupe’s leading acrobat. She displayed her skill in acrobatics in various styles on a string of bamboos at a certain height from the ground; she moved from end to end gently and steadily, as she danced and sang with a pleasant voice.

Amongst the audience was a youth named Uggasena, the son of a rich man. He was enjoying the show together with a friend. He gazed attentively at the impressive performer displaying her acrobatic skill in different postures and styles, softly bending, raising, stretching her delicate hands and feet. He went back home driven mad with intense attachment and love for the youthful actress. On arriving home, he threw himself down on bed, saying: “I will live only if I can have her or else I will die on this bed,” and sentimentally went on hunger strike.

His parents asked him: “Dear son, what ails you?” – “Dear mother and father, I will live only if I win the hand of the actress whom I have seen performing in the precincts of the royal palace; if not, I will die on this bedstead,” was his frank, blunt reply. His parents consoled him by saying: “Dear son, don’t get so sentimental. We will find a fair lady suitable for you from amongst our own clansmen of wealthy status.” But Uggasena was not moved by the pleadings of his parents but reiterated his wish as before without any [546] change and persisted in lying on his bed.

Uggasena’s father made several attempts to persuade his son to change his mind, talking to him privately with soothing words, but to no avail. Finally the parents sent for his friend and asked him to negotiate with the head acrobat, the father of the girl, on their behalf, saying: “Friend, please take his sum of 1,000 and give it to the father of the actress with a request to accept it and to give his daughter in marriage to my son, Uggasena.”

The head acrobat’s reply to the messenger’s request was: “I am not prepared to accept the money in exchange for my daughter. If the rich man’s son Uggasena cannot live unless he wins the hands of my daughter, he will have to come along with us. I will give away my daughter only on this condition that he follows us wherever we go.”

When his parents conveyed the news to him, Uggasena said: “Mother and father, in that case I will go along with them,” and so saying he left for the head acrobat’s place in spite of repeated requests of his parents and relatives not to do so. The head acrobat was as good as his word, he gave away his daughter and they all wandered about towns and villages staging shows and acrobatic performances.

A son was born of the union of Uggasena and the actress. The mother used to coax and cuddle the child by singing a lullaby: “Son of a watchman of the carts ... I wish you would sleep. Son of a wicked man, the custodian of prize money ... I wish you would sleep. Son of an ignoramus ... I wish you would sleep.” She sang this in a mocking, ridiculing manner.

This lullaby reflected on the life being led by Uggasena. Whenever the entertainment troupe rested during the course of wanderings, he was charged with the responsibility for securing food for the oxen and feeding them, and for the security of the camp. He was also responsible for the safe custody of the proceeds from the performances.

Uggasena realized that by singing mocking lullabies, the actress was making insinuations and ridiculing him, so he asked the actress: “Are you singing to despise me?” She replied: “Yes, it was intended for you.” Uggasena retorted: “Then I will abandon you and go back to my parents.” The actress was unmoved by this threat and she replied: “I don’t care at all whether you go away or come back,” and went on repeating the lullaby again and again knowing that it was irritating to Uggasena.

The actress was puffed up with the pride of her beauty and her fine art of dancing which enabled her to earn her living easily.

Uggasena thought over how the actress became so conceited and finally realised: “Her pride is rooted in her prowess as an acrobatic artist.” He made up his mind to learn the skill of acrobatic feats. Approaching his father-in-law, the acrobatic master, he sought and received permission from him to be trained in the art of gymnastics until he became an expert in it. He then went from place to place staging shows in villages and marketing towns and finally he came back again to the city of Rājagaha. There, he had it announced widely throughout the city that “Seven days from now, Uggasena, the son of the rich man, will stage a performance, demonstrating amazing feats of acrobatics and somersaults.”

The citizens vied with one another in setting up bedstead seats with longer legs to get a better view of the performances and they assembled around the stage on the appointed day. Finally, Uggasena appeared and he climbed up a pole of 60 cubits high and made up of many lengths of bamboo affixed to one another firmly. He stood on top of the pole poised to stage a performance. [547]

Uggasena Appears to the Buddha

On the day fixed for the staging of the performance by Uggasena, the Buddha surveyed the world of beings before dawn and perceived by means of his omniscience a vision of Uggasena, who was caught in his supernormal mental screen, like a fish trapped in a net, and he reflected on what would come to pass.

He saw in his mind's eye: When the morning comes, Uggasena will stand on top of the pole of 60 cubits high to stage a performance and the citizens will appear to witness it. At that assemblage of people, I will expound the Dhamma made up of four verses. As a result of hearing this teaching of mine, 84,000 sentient beings will gain emancipation through realization of the four noble truths, and Uggasena will become an Arahat.

As the time for alms round arrived, the Buddha went into the city in the company of his monastics as usual. Just before the Buddha's entry into the city, Uggasena had signalled to the audience by pointing his index finger towards them that he was about to begin the show; that brought thunderous applause from the crowd. Uggasena who was then standing on top of the pole took a leap up in to the air and somersaulted seven times in the air before he came down and stood on the pole.

The Buddha, who had now arrived in the city, caused the audience, by his supernormal power, to pay exclusive attention to him, thus diverting their interest which was directed to Uggasena a moment ago. Watching the mood of the audience from atop the pole, Uggasena noticed their attention which was fixed on him, suddenly turn towards the Buddha. He felt down-hearted that the audience had lost interest in him. He thought to himself: "I can stage this acrobatic show only once a year, yet, as soon as the Buddha has come into the city, the audience is no longer interested in me, instead, they give their attention only to him. All my efforts to demonstrate my skill in acrobatic feats are in vain, and fruitless."

The Buddha knew what was in the mind of Uggasena and asked Ven. Moggallāna: "Dear son Moggallāna, go to the son of the rich man and tell him that he is asked to go on with the acrobatic performance." Ven. Moggallāna went as instructed by the Buddha and standing at the base of the pole gave encouragement to Uggasena by the following verse (DhpA, PTS 4.62):

Īṅha passa naṭa-putta, Uggasena mahabbala, karohi raṅgam parisāya, hāsayassu mahā-janam

O gymnastic artist of great strength, Uggasena, I urge you to resume your display of skill in somersault with ease of mind. Look at the crowd that has gathered. Let the mass of people enjoy your amazing entertainment and praise your skill with uproarious cheers.

On hearing the words of Ven. Moggallāna, Uggasena felt greatly delighted and encouraged; he thought that the Buddha was desirous of seeing his skill. He replied while still standing on top of the pole by the following verse:

Iṅgha passa mahā-pañña, Moggallāna mahiddhika; karomi raṅgam parisāya, hāsayāmi mahā-janam.

Ven. Moggallāna of great wisdom and of the highest degree of supernormal power! Please watch, I will entertain the crowd that has gathered by displaying my skill with ease of mind. I will perform such an amazing feat that the audience will give enthusiastic cheers and praise uproariously.

So saying, he threw himself up into the air and made fourteen complete rounds of somersault [548] before coming down on his feet on top of the bamboo pole.

Exhortation by the Buddha

At that moment, the Buddha exhorted Uggasena by these words: “Dear son Uggasena, a wise man should abandon attachment to the five aggregates which arose before, to the five aggregates which will arise in the future and to those which are presently arising. Not clinging to the five aggregates, he should strive for the release from the suffering of birth, the suffering of ageing, the suffering of death.” The Buddha went on expounding the Dhamma by means of the following verse:

sabbattha vimutta-mānaso, na punaṃ jāti-jaram upehisi.*

Dear son Uggasena, give up and abandon the craving for the fivefold aggregates of mind and matter of the past ... the future ... and the present. Once you have completely forsaken the attachment to these aggregates of the past, the future and the present, you will have transcended the round of suffering in the three realms: the sensual world (kāma-bhava), the world of form (rūpa-bhava) and the formless world (arūpa-bhava) and you will have reached perfection and become an authority in matters pertaining to super knowledge (abhiññā), full comprehension (pariññā), letting go (pahāna), meditation (bhāvanā) and realisation (sacchikiriya); you will live fully emancipated from all forms of the conditioned and pass beyond the stages of birth, ageing, sickness and death.

At the conclusion of the discourse, 84,000 sentient beings became emancipated through realization of the four noble truths. The rich man's son, Uggasena, became an Arahant complete with analytical wisdom (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa) while still standing on top of the bamboo pole. He came down from it and went towards the Buddha, paying homage with full reverence. He then requested permission to receive ordination. The Buddha stretched out his hand and pronounced: Ehi bhikkhu ... to summon him as a full-fledged monastic. The form of an acrobatic artist disappeared instantaneously and Uggasena assumed the form of a great elder (mahā-thera) of 60 years' standing aged 80, and fully equipped with the eight requisites of a monastic.

Fellow monastics asked Uggasena: "Did you not feel afraid when you came down from the top of the bamboo pole 60 cubits high?" Thereupon, Uggasena replied: "Friends, I had not the slightest fright." The monastics went to the Buddha and reported: "Most exalted Buddha, Uggasena has claimed to be an Arahant by telling lies that: 'He did not feel the slightest fright when he was coming down from the top of the pole.'"

The Buddha gave them a brief explanation in support of Uggasena: "Dear monastics, all the monastics, like my son Uggasena, through eradication of the pollutants (āsava), by cutting off the ten fetters (samyōjana) are free from fright." [549]

The bonds or fetters (samyōjana) bind all beings to the wheel of existence. When they are completely broken or eliminated, emancipation results. The ten fetters are: 1) belief in a soul, the view that the body and mind is 'myself' (sakkāya-diṭṭhi); 2) doubt or wavering concerning the Buddha's Enlightenment, His Teaching and His Order (vicikiccha); 3) the belief that there are paths other than the noble (ariya) path of eight constituents that can liberate one from suffering (sīlabbata-parāmāsa); 4) sensual desire, sensuous passion (kāma-rāga); 5) ill-will (paṭigha); 6) craving for existence in the fine-material (Brahma) realms (rūpa-rāga); 7) craving for existence in the formless Brahma realms (arūpa-rāga); 8) pride, awareness of superiority or inferiority (māna); 9) restlessness, agitation, mental unrest (uddhacca); 10) ignorance, lack of real or correct knowledge as to the nature of existence, as to the four noble truths (avijja). It is the main root of suffering and of rebirth.

The Buddha then expounded the following verse which is included in the Chapter about Brahmins (Brāhmaṇa-vagga) of the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada, Dh 397).

Sabba-saṃyojanam chetvā, yo ve na paritassati, saṅgātigam visaṃyuttam, tam-aham brūmi brāhmaṇam

Monastics, a monastic who has become an Arahāt through eradication of the pollutants (āsava) has indeed cut off the ten long fetters by the sword of the Arahāt path (Arahatta-magga); he cannot therefore be moved or startled by fright which has its origin in greed (lobha). I praise and proclaim such an Arahāt who has overcome the seven kinds of clinging (saṅga): sensuous passion, ill-will, conceit, wrong view, moral defilement, physical, verbal and mental misdeeds, and who has nothing more to do with four ties (yoga) sensuality (kāma), continuation (bhava), views (diṭṭhi) and ignorance (avijjā) as a truly noble, pure person, a Brahmin, who has done away with all kinds of evil.

A large multitude of people attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga), and so on, at the conclusion of the discourse.

Uggasena's Past Deeds

One day, monastics were assembled again in the main hall and were discussing the mode of Uggasena's attainment to Awakening: "Friends, one wonders, in the first place, how a person such as Ven. Uggasena, who was predestined to become an Arahāt, got entangled through an actress with the troupe of acrobatic performers, following them wherever they wandered; and in the second place, what was the cause of the powerful sufficing condition for attainment of Awakening."

The Buddha went to the main hall and asked: "Monastics, what is the subject of your discussion?" When they explained what the subject of their discussion was, he explained to them briefly thus: "Monastics, Uggasena himself was the cause of these two events; the one that entailed his engagement with the dancing troupe and the other that resulted in his attainment to Awakening."

He then went on to relate the full account as follows: "Long, long ago, when a relic shrine (stūpa) was built to enshrine the relics of Buddha Kassapa, men and women of Bārāṇasī went in large numbers to the shrine site to contribute the necessary labour, carrying plenty of food in their carts. On the way they met a great elder (mahā-thera) entering the city on his alms round.

At that time, one woman noticed the great elder and told her husband: “My dear lord, the elder is receiving food on his rounds, please go and bring his bowl so that we may offer something to him. We have brought along in the cart plenty of food.” The man went and fetched the bowl from the monastic and after filling it with hard and soft food to its brim, they returned it to the great elder and both the husband and wife declared their wish: “Revered great elder, for this deed of merit, may both of us be blessed with a share of the supermundane knowledge which you have realized.”

The recipient of their gift food was not an ordinary monastic, he happened to be an Arahat devoid of the taint of pollutants (āsava). He foresaw, by means of his knowledge of the future (anāgata-ñāṇa), that their wishes would be fulfilled and so he smiled happily. The woman caught a glimpse of it and she muttered: “My dear lord, the venerable who received our offering might be an actor.” The husband also agreed, saying. “Yes, he might be an actor.” They then departed from that place. This then was the deed the husband and wife had done in the past.

The couple lived to the end of their lifespan in that existence and were reborn in [550] the realm of the Devas. After enjoying the life of Devas, the wife was born as the daughter of the leading acrobatic performer in her present and last existence. The husband was born as the son of a rich man in the last stage of his existence, by the name of Uggasena. Although born as a son of a rich man, he had to accompany the dancing troupe in their wanderings, for the demeritorious deed of agreeing: “Yes, he might be an actor,” to his wife in a past existence. But for the good deed of offering food to an Arahat, in pure piety and devotional faith, he became an Arahat.”

When Uggasena became an Arahat and became a summoned monastic, his wife, the young actress, thought to herself, awakened by the meritorious deed in her past: “Whatever level of intelligence possessed by my husband, my level of intelligence should also be the same as his.” Reasoning in this way she approached the female monastics and received ordination from them. Then devoting herself to the practice of Dhamma, in due course she also became an Arahat, having eradicated all the pollutants (āsava).

22b: 500 Monastics Become Arahats

The War over the River Rohinī

There was a small river by the name of Rohinī between Kapilavatthu and Koliya. The two kingdoms took turns, in harmony, to water their respective arable lands by controlling the flow of the channel with a single dam.

The level of the water in the channel was at its lowest in the month of June (Jeṭṭha) and the crops usually withered. The farmers of the two countries called a meeting to discuss the matter of sharing the water in the channel. At the meeting the Koliyan farmers said: “Friends, if the small amount of water in the river was to be divided and shared by both of us, neither of us would receive a sufficient amount to water our fields. One more flood of water would suffice to bring maturity to our crops. We request you therefore to let us make use of this small amount of water.”

The farmers of Kapilavatthu also had their say in this manner: “Friends, we can’t go from door to door of your houses carrying baskets with our purses filled with gold, silver and precious jewels in search of paddy, in a dejected manner, while you all sit down with your minds at ease having filled your granaries with paddy to their full capacities. Our early crops, too, are about to mature and need watering in the same manner as yours do.”

Heated arguments ensued, one side saying: “We are not going to yield,” the other side retorting in the same words. The exchange of words eventually led to blows, a farmer on one side attacked a farmer from the other side and the latter retaliated in a like manner. The affray that started between the farmers on both sides ultimately grew into hostilities, like a small bush fire which grows fierce and finally burns down a palatial mansion to the extent of decrying the royal clans on both sides.

The Koliyan farmers began the quarrel: “You have threatened us by placing your reliance on the royal clan of Kapilavatthu. The Kapilavatthu royal clan you depend upon behave like common dogs and jackals of the forest making their own sisters their wives.<sup>199</sup> What harm can their elephants, horses and armour do to us?”

The Kapilavatthu farmers retaliated in a no less acrimonious tone: “You threatened us by relying on your little lepers inflicted with horrible leprosy. The Koliyan descendents on whom you lean on for support are themselves in a miserable plight ever since they were banished from the city and lived like animals [551] in the hollow of Kola trees. What harm can their elephants, horses and armours do to us?”

The farmers returned to their respective cities and reported the matter to the ministers of agriculture, who in turn, brought the state of affairs to the notice of their chiefs.

Consequently, the Sakyans of Kapilavatthu prepared to wage war on the Koliyas and came out of the city, shouting the war cry: “The husbands of their own sisters will demonstrate their strength of arms.” The rival royalties on the side of Koliyas also prepared for war and came out, their war cry being: “Those taking shelters in the hollows of Kola trees will display their strength of arms.”

At that time, the Buddha was residing in the Jetavana monastery of Sāvaththī. On the very day on which the two rival communities of Kapilavatthu and Koliya were prepared to go to the battlefield, he surveyed the world early at dawn and perceived that a bloody battle was imminent between the two opposing sides that very evening. He further perceived that he would be able to avert the war by going to the scene of hostilities and expounding three Birth Stories (Jātaka): The Birth Story about the Flame of the Forest Tree (Phandana-jātaka, Ja 475), the Birth Story about the Jackal’s Roar (Daddara-jātaka, Ja 172) and the Birth Story about the Quail (Laṭukika-jātaka, Ja 357). This would bring about peace, after which, he will have to teach the Birth Stories about the Way of Trees (Rukkha-dhamma-jātaka, Ja 74) and the Birth Story about the Quail (Vaṭṭaka-jātaka, Ja 33), aka the Birth Story about being in Agreement (Sammodamāna-jātaka, Ja 33) and lastly, followed by the Discourse about Taking up Weapons (Atta-daṇḍa-sutta, Snp 4.15) to bring home the benefits of unity and harmony. Having heard the discourses, the Sakyans and Koliyans will each give him 250 youths to enter the Saṅgha: “I will ordain them as monastics and it will culminate in the convening of the great assembly (mahā-samaya).”

Having perceived this, the Buddha decided to go to the place of hostilities and save the warring kinsmen from mutual destruction. He went early for the usual round of receiving alms food and stayed the whole day in the scented chamber. Towards evening, he left the chamber for the scene of strife all alone, carrying the double robe and alms bowl himself, without informing anyone. On arrival at the spot, he sat cross-legged in the sky in the middle of the rival groups, and caused a dark blue radiance to be emitted from his hair so that darkness prevailed all over, although the sun had not yet set. This was meant to cause contrition in the heart of the warring factions. While all the people were greatly frightened by the strange phenomenon, the Buddha, sending out a six-coloured radiance from his body manifested himself to them.

When members of the Sakyan clan saw the Buddha, they began to contemplate thus: “The Buddha has come, he is of our own blood. Perhaps he has knowledge of our strife.” They discussed among themselves and decided: “It is not right and proper for us to let our weapons fall upon the bodies of others in the presence of the Buddha; let Koliyans kill us or take us captives, should they desire to do so.” By mutual consent they abandoned all their weapons and sat down respectfully paying homage to the Buddha.

The Koliyans also arrived at the same decision amongst themselves. They too abandoned their weapons and sat down paying obeisance to the Buddha who then descended from the sky and sat on a reserved seat on the delightful sandy plain, with all the grace and glory of a Buddha.

The Buddha’s Teaching

The Buddha knowingly asked: “Why have you all come to this place?” The kings of both countries replied: “Most exalted Buddha, we have not come just to see the river, nor to sport in the river; as a matter of fact we have come to wage war upon one another on this sandy plain.”

The Buddha again asked: “Your royal highnesses, what is the actual cause of your strife?” Then they replied: “The water of this Rohinī stream is the cause of it.”

The Buddha then asked: “Your royal highnesses, what is the value of the water of this [552] Rohinī stream?” They replied: “Exalted Buddha, it is of small value.”

The Buddha asked an additional question: “What is the value of the earth?” – “Its value is limitless,” was the reply.

Whereupon, the Buddha made this direct question: “How would you evaluate the nobility?” They replied: “The value of the nobility is unlimited.”

The Buddha then made this address: “Your royal highnesses, for some water of this Rohinī channel that is of small value, why do you wish to destroy the priceless nobility by fighting one another. Not the slightest amount of pleasure could be found in worthless conflicts and wasteful strifes. Your royal highnesses, there was a glaring instance where the seed of enmity sown by a tree Deva and bear remained potent throughout the auspicious (bhadda) world-element.”

The Birth Story about the Flame of the Forest Tree

The Buddha then went on to expound the Birth Story about the Flame of the Forest Tree (Phandana-jātaka, Ja 475), a brief account of which is as follows: “Your Royal Highnesses, a long time ago, during the reign of King Brahmadata in Bārāṇasī, there was a village of carpenters just outside the city; and there was a Brahmin who was a carpenter by profession, he brought wood from the forest and made them into chariots for a living.

At that time, there was a Flame of the Forest (Phandana) tree in the region of the Himālayas. A bear used to go and sleep under that tree with ease and comfort after his meal. One day a dried branch broke due to a strong wind and fell on the bear’s back, hurting it slightly. The bear ran away through fright but soon returned to seek out the cause of his injury. He did not see his enemy.

So he thought to himself: “There is no wild beast, such as a lion, leopard or tiger, around here to harm me; and there can’t be anyone except the tree Deva who might be jealous of my sleeping under the tree, to cause me harm. I will surely have my revenge on him.” Thus making a mountain out of a molehill the bear hit the tree and scratched it with its paws, saying: “I have not eaten your leaves, nor broken your branches, you don’t show spite towards other animals taking rest under the tree, but you are jealous of me. What fault is there? You just wait for two or three days and I will uproot your tree and cut it into pieces.” Having threatened the tree Deva, the bear stayed in the neighbourhood, looking for a person capable of causing damage to the tree.

A Brahmin carpenter, accompanied by a few hands, went into the forest in a small vehicle in search of wood for the construction of chariots. They left the vehicle in a certain place and went into the forest with hatchets and choppers. They went round looking for the right type of wood and eventually came near the Flame of the Forest tree.

When the bear saw the Brahmin carpenter, it thought: “Today, I shall have my retaliation against my enemy,” and he went and stood at the base of the tree. As the carpenter passed by the tree, the bear seized the opportunity of addressing<sup>200</sup> him thus:

“My dear man, you have come into the forest with a hatchet in your hand. Tell me frankly which tree you have in mind to cut down?”

When the carpenter heard the words of the bear, he uttered in amazement:

“Dear boys, it is strange indeed that a bear speaks the language of the humans, a thing I have hitherto never seen or heard.”

He thought to himself then, such a bear speaking the human language would know the kind of wood suitable for making chariots, and so he asked the bear:

“Dear bear king, you have wandered all over, up the hills and down the valleys, please tell me honestly which kind of wood is most suitable for the construction of chariots?” [553]

When the bear heard this, he felt that his wish was going to be fulfilled and he replied in verse:

“Red sandalwood (Pterocarpus indicu) is not strong enough to use as frame work; Cutch (Acacia catechu) is equally unsuitable; the Sāl tree (Shorea robusta) is the same; and shrubs (Lythrum fruticosum) are out of the question as they are equally weak. There is a certain kind of tree known as the Flame of the Forest; the wood of that tree is the strongest for the construction of chariots.”

The carpenter was delighted to hear it and so he thought to himself:

<sup>200</sup> The conversation between the bear and the carpenter was made in seven verses. The verses in Pāli, which are not so important, are not reproduced; only their translation is provided here.

“I’ve come into the jungle on a truly auspicious day and even a beast, like the bear, pointed out to me the most suitable kind of wood for the construction of chariots. What good fortune!”

He asked the bear:

“My dear bear, how about the branches and leaves of that tree and its stem? Dear good friend, please tell me everything so that I know all about that tree.”

The bear gave his reply in two verses:

“My dear friend, Brahmin, there is a certain tree whose branches and twigs bend downwards and hang down. They are pliant, durable and strong. I am now standing at the base of that tree, it is called the Flame of the Forest. Its wood is the right stuff for making the circumference of wheels, axles, shafts and all other components of a chariot.”

After uttering these two verses, the bear made off with a happy mind to some other place suitable for seeking his prey. Then the carpenter started to make arrangements for cutting down the tree. The guardian spirit of the tree thought:

“Although I had not thrown down anything on his back, the bear has been harbouring a grudge against me and has sewn the seed of enmity for nothing. He has now plotted to cause the destruction of my habitation. With the destruction of my dwelling, I am certain to be destroyed too. I shall have to bring about his destruction with a ruse.”

He then transformed himself into the form of a human labourer and approaching the carpenter asked him: “Man, you have got a beautiful tree; what do you intend to do, once you have cut it into wood?” The carpenter replied: “I will make it into a chariot frame.”

“Who has told you that the wood of this tree is good for making chariots?” queried the tree Deva. “A bear told me so,” was the reply. The tree Deva said: “That’s good. The bear has given you a good advice. Indeed, the chariot you are going to make, according to the advice of the bear, should turn out to be a fine looking one. I too should like to give you a suggestion, that is, strengthen your chariot frame work with a girdle of bear’s skin, removed from round its neck. This will make it stronger than if it were secured with tin plates, and increase your income from the chariots.”

When asked by the carpenter: “My dear man, from where can I get the bear’s skin?” the tree Deva said:

“Man, are you still a young boy not to know that the tree is inanimate; it will remain here and will not run away. Just hurry after the bear who has told you about the tree and ask him by showing great respect: ‘My lord, which part of the tree you have shown me should be cut?’ and persuade him to come back to the tree. Then suspecting nothing, he would point out with his long stretched-out snout: ‘Cut here, cut here.’ At that moment, you can cut him down with a sharp axe and put him to death. Then strip him of his leather, eat his flesh and attend to the business of cutting down the tree.”

Thus the seed of enmity was sown. On hearing the guardian spirit of the tree, the Brahmin carpenter expressed his feeling of delight in these words: “How marvellous, this is an auspicious day for me.” He returned home after killing the bear and cutting down the tree.

The Buddha concluded his discourse by expounding the following verses in order to exhort and instruct the feuding kinsmen:

Icevaṃ phandano issaṃ, [554] isso ca pana phandanam, aññam-aññam vivādena, aññam-aññam-aghātayum.

Your royal highnesses, in this manner, the tree Deva quarrelled with the bear; and the bear in turn disputed with the tree Deva. Their animosity finally led to the destruction of both.

Evam-eva manussānam, vivādo yattha jāyati, mayūra-naccam naccanti, yathā te issa-phandanā.

Your royal highnesses, when people fight against one another, they do so like the bear and the tree Deva in the manner of a dancing peacock. Just as a peacock could not dance without exposing the private parts of his body, so the people fighting one another are not capable of concealing what is to be concealed.

This is a reference to the derogatory remarks concerning the origin of the Sakyans and the Koliyans made by the warring factions.

Tam vo vadāmi bhaddam vo, yāvantettha samāgatā, sammodatha mā vivadatha, mā hotha issa-phandanā.

Your royal highnesses, may you always be blessed with glory and graciousness, you who have gathered together on the banks of Rohinī, I exhort you to act after the manner of the waters of the two rivers, Ganges and Yamuna, harmoniously mixing together with loving-kindness. Avoid fighting one another and caused mutual destruction. Do not follow the example of the bear and the tree Deva.

Sāmaggi-eva sikkhetha, Buddhehetam pasamsitam, sāmaggi-rato dhammaṭṭho, yogakkhemā na dhamsatī”ti.

Your royal highnesses, strive only for unity. Every Buddha has praised the virtues of unity. He who delights in harmonious living, established in the ten modes of good conduct (sucarita)<sup>201</sup> is bound to achieve nothing less than the happiness of Nibbāna, the end of all ties (yoga), which yoke one to rebirth.

The two rival factions of the Sakyans and Koliyans were amicably reunited after hearing the discourse of the Buddha. In winding up the discourse, the Buddha revealed that he was the Chief Guardian deity of the whole forest who had personal knowledge of the conflict between the bear and the tree Deva.

The Birth Story about the Jackal’s Roar

The Buddha then went on by giving exhortation to the assembled crowd: “Your royal highnesses, do not believe what others say without giving careful consideration. All the quadrupeds of the Himālaya forest, which is three leagues in extent, were once about to plunge into the great ocean for trusting, without reason, the word of a hare that ran away screaming: ‘The earth has crumbled! The earth has crumbled!’ You should never allow yourself to become a person who is taken in by what others say without careful [555] consideration.” With these introductory words, the Buddha gave the discourse on the Birth Story about the Jackal’s Roar (Daddara-jātaka, Ja 172).

This Birth Story (Jātaka) treats of the story of a hare who was unduly scared by the fall of a beli fruit on the palm leaf under which it was sleeping. It ran towards the ocean through fright screaming: ‘The earth has crumbled.’ Equally frightened without any reason, all the four-legged animals of the Himālayan forest ran along until they were stopped by the lion king who saved them from the impending danger after careful investigation into the matter.

The Birth Story about the Quail

Then the Buddha went on to explain to them that sometimes it is possible that someone who is weak could get an opportunity to destroy someone who is strong while, on other occasions, someone who is strong gets the chance to wreak havoc with someone who is weak.

Giving the instance where a young skylark had caused the death of a full grown elephant, he gave the following discourse on the Birth Story about the Quail (Laṭukika-jātaka, Ja 357):

Excellencies, once upon a time, a Bodhisatta was born as an elephant during the reign of King Brahmadatta in Bārāṇasī. When it grew up, it had a fine appearance and a huge body. It lived in the forests of the Himālayas, governing a herd of elephants numbering 80,000.

At that time a female skylark happened to have laid her eggs on the floor of the beaten tracks of elephants. The Bodhisatta elephant travelled in the company of 80,000 elephants along the route at a time when the baby skylarks were not yet capable of flying. Eventually, the Bodhisatta and his herd of elephants arrived at the spot where the skylarks were living.

When the skylark saw the king elephant, she was worried about the safety of her chicks. She thought: “If I do not approach the king elephant, it will surely tread upon my chicks and kill them. I should immediately approach it with a request for a rightful protection of my chicks.” So with her wings closed together as if to make obeisance, she stood right in front of the king elephant and made her submission:

*Vandāmi taṃ kuñjara saṭṭhi-hāyanam, āraññakaṃ yūtha-patiṃ yasassiṃ,
pakkhehi taṃ pañjalikaṃ karomi,
mā me vadhī puttake dubbalāya.*

O your majesty, king of elephants, one whose strength wanes only at the age of 60, chief of the herd of elephants that roam in the forest, I salute you, paying homage to you with clasped wings. I pray that my children be spared their lives by not treading upon them.

Whereupon the Bodhisatta gave her comfort with those words: “Skylark, don’t be downhearted, I will protect your chicks so that no harm will come to them,” and he stood over the young ones shielding them with his body. All the elephants by-passed him and the young skylarks were saved.

The Bodhisatta then called the female skylark and gave advice before he left: “Young skylark, a large rogue elephant, with no companions, will come this way after us. He will not listen to our words. When he comes along, you had better approach him also for the safety of your children, praying him to spare their lives.”

When the female skylark saw the rogue elephant coming along, she approached him with her wings clasped in homage and beseeched him thus as advised by the elephant king:

*Vandāmi taṃ kuñjara eka-cāriṃ, āraññakaṃ pabbata-sānugocaraṃ,
pakkhehi taṃ pañjalikaṃ karomi, [556]
mā me vadhī puttake dubbalāya.*

O elephant king, a lone wanderer of the forests, grazing in the valleys of rocky and sandy hills, I salute you, paying homage to you with clasped wings. I pray that my young ones will be spared their lives by not treading upon them.

On hearing the skylark’s humble request, the rogue elephant replied:

Vamissāmi te laṭukike puttakāni, kiṃ me tuvaṃ kāhasi dubbalāsi, sataṃ sahasāni pi tādisīnaṃ, vāmena pādena papothayeyyaṃ.

Hey, skylark why do you put your young ones in my way? That’s enough of your insolence. I shall tread upon them and crush them to death. How can you wreak revenge on me when you are weak and I am powerful enough to pulverise 100,000 of your kind with just my left foot.

So saying the rogue elephant crushed the skylark’s young ones to dust, and washed them away in a stream of urine and departed, shouting with the voice of a crane.

Perched on the branch of a tree, the female skylark threatened: “Hey, you great brute of an elephant! You have the upper hand this time and go away, crowing gleefully in the tone of a crane. You just wait! Within two or three days you will see what I can do. You are not aware that intellectual might is more powerful than physical force. I will make you aware of that fact within a few days.

Na heva sabbattha balena kiccāṃ, balañ-hi bālassa vadhāya hoti, karissāmi te Nāga-rājā anattamā, yo me vadhī puttake dubbalāya.

O elephant king, not everything can be accomplished by means of physical force alone; unwise use of physical strength can be suicidal. You have mercilessly crushed to death my helpless children; I will bring about your destruction within a few days.

After thus making this war-cry, the skylark managed within two or three days to gain the friendship of a crow by waiting upon it. Being delighted by the skylark's pleasant behaviour, the crow asked her: "Is there any thing I can do for you?" The skylark replied: "What I want to ask you as a favour is to cause damage to the eyes of the rogue elephant that used to roam about alone; that is the assistance I need." The crow gave his word: "I will do it."

The skylark then went to a big bluebottle fly and formed a friendship with it in a like manner. When the fly asked her what she wanted, she requested: "When my friend the crow has damaged the eyes of the lone rogue elephant, it is my wish that you help me by laying your eggs in the sockets of the elephant's damaged eyes."

When the bluebottle fly gave her assurance for co-operation, saying: "Yes, I will," the skylark approached a frog and sought its friendship as before. The frog asked her what it could do to help her and she replied: "When the lone rogue elephant has gone blind through the assistance of my two friends, the crow and the fly, and is looking for water to quench his thirst, I wish you to croak from the top of the hill. When the elephant climbs up the hill after hearing your voice, you might get down to the bottom of the cliff to make a sound from there. This is all the assistance I look for from my frog friend." The frog, likewise, gave his promise to assist the skylark.

On the following day, the crow pounded the eyes of the elephant with its beak as requested by the skylark; the bluebottle fly laid its eggs in the damaged eyes. Suffering painfully from damaged eyes now infested with maggots and from intense thirst, the rogue elephant groped blindly after water. [557] The frog then started croaking from the top of the hill, hearing the frog croaking, and thinking: “Where the frog croaks, there must be water,” the elephant climbed up the hill with great hope. The frog went down the cliff and started making a noise from the bottom of the hill. Heading towards the cliff from where the sound seemed to come, the elephant went tumbling down the hill and died through the fall.

The skylark was delighted when it came to know of the death of her enemy, the rogue elephant, and uttered out of joy: “Oh! I have seen the back of my enemy,” so saying, it strutted to and fro on the back of the elephant several times and made off to a place of its liking.

The Buddha exhorted the two royal families, saying: “Your royal highnesses, you should not engage in hostilities with anyone; as explained, even an elephant of great strength can be brought to ruin by the combined efforts of small powerless creatures, such as the crow, the bluebottle fly, the frog and the skylark,” and he continued by teaching the following verse:

Kākañ-ca passa laṭukikaṃ, maṇḍūkaṃ nīla-makkhikaṃ, ete nāgaṃ aghātesuṃ, passa verassa verinaṃ, tasmā hi veram na kayirātha, appiyena pi kenaci.

Members of the Sakyan clan! Look at these small creatures, the crow, the skylark, the frog and the bluebottle fly; these four creatures, because they were united, brought about the complete downfall of a powerful bull elephant. You can see the outcome of hatred accruing to a person who wishes to engage in hostilities. Therefore, you should not carry on a feud with anyone, not even with someone you do not like.

In winding up the discourse, the Buddha revealed that: “The rogue elephant at that time was the Devadatta of today, and the noble leader of the elephant herd at that time was myself.”

The Birth Story about the Way of Trees

Having expounded the three Birth Stories (Jātaka): about the Flame of the Forest Tree, the Jackal’s Roar and the Quail, the Buddha proceeded to expound two more Birth Stories (Jātaka) to bring home the advantages of unity.

The first was the Birth Story about the Way of Trees (Rukkha-dhamma-jātaka, Ja 74): “Your royal highnesses, you all are related to one another by blood; and it would be only right and proper for blood relatives to be closely united and work together in harmony. No enemy can harm you when you stand united. Unity is necessary even for trees that are insentient, leave alone conscious creatures such as human beings.

I will cite a relevant instance: once upon a time, a forest of Sāla trees in the Himālayas was struck by a violent storm. But not a single tree suffered the slightest damage, as they stood in a body, securely fastened to one another by plants and bushes. The storm could not touch the trees but brushed against the topmost part of the tree and broke away. In contrast a lone tree complete with big trunks and branches was blown down, root and branch, by a strong wind for want of solidarity and a united front, in close association and collaboration with other trees, plants and bushes. It is essential, therefore, that you all stand in a body united through co-operation and co-ordination.”

Whereupon the members of the royal family requested the Buddha to expound the appropriate Birth Story (Jātaka) in more detail: “Royal highnesses, it was during the reign of King Brahmadata in Bārāṇasī that a Vessavaṇa Deva passed away and Sakka appointed another Deva in his place. During this transitional period, the new Vessavaṇa Deva issued a fresh order permitting all the Devas to accommodate themselves in the places of their own choice amongst trees, plants and thickets. [558]

The Bodhisatta was then a sylvan deity in charge of a Sāla forest in the region of the Himālayas. He gave advice to his relatives thus: “My dear men, don’t choose the trees growing in the bare plane as your dwelling places; you will be well advised to dwell on the trees surrounding the one which I have chosen as my abode in the forest.”

The wise ones among the deities occupied the trees surrounding the abode of the Bodhisatta as he had advised. The unwise deities agreed amongst themselves: “No useful purpose would be served by residing in trees amidst the forest away from human habitations. Only those living in the vicinity of villages and towns could better their prospects, both for gain and fame.” So deciding, they chose to occupy trees along the main road in the bare plains.

After some time a violent storm accompanied by torrential rain visited the area and all the trees including the trees of great dimensions got their boughs and branches broken away and they fell down by the roots. When the violent storm reached the Sāla forest controlled by the Bodhisatta, they blew wildly all over the forest, but none of the trees fell because they were closely knit together.

Those, who were rendered homeless, went about holding their young ones by the hand, to their friends dwelling in the Sāla forest in the Himālayas and acquainted them with their miserable plight. Their friends in the Sāla forest recounted in turn, the story of their woes to the sylvan Deva who was the Bodhisatta.

Whereupon, the Bodhisatta made it plain to them: “It is quite natural that the people who decided to dwell in such places, against the advice of the wise, have to face such difficulties,” and expounded the following discourse in verse (Ja 74):

Sādhū sambahulā ñātī, api rukkhā araññajā, vāto vahati ekaṭṭham, brahantam-pi vanappatim.

O my relative Devas, when a great number of friends and relatives live close together, dependent upon one another, even the trees growing all over the forest, dwell comfortably, free from oppression by their enemies. But the tree growing in isolation on the open plain, in spite of its huge trunk and many thick branches, cannot withstand the tempest which uproots it with all its branches and leaves.

After giving this discourse, the Bodhisatta passed away at the expiry of his lifespan.

The Buddha concluded the discourse by exhorting them thus: “Royal highnesses, all the relatives should first strive to achieve unity; having achieved it, live happy, harmonious lives, suffusing one another with loving-kindness.” He finally revealed that: “The audience present today were the deities of the Sāla forest and I was the wise sylvan deity who gave them guidance.”

The Birth Story about the Quail

The Buddha then made further exhortation: “Royal highnesses, it is not at all proper to quarrel amongst your own relatives. There was an instance in the past where even animals could conquer their enemies by living together harmoniously and in unity, but they perished due to internal strife.” At the request of the kinsmen, the Buddha then gave an exposition of the Birth Story about the Quail (Vaṭṭaka-jātaka, Ja 33):

“Royal highnesses, a long time ago, the Bodhisatta was born as a quail and lived in a forest with thousands of companions during the reign of King Brahmadata in Bārāṇasī. A bird-hunter used to go to where the quails dwelt and entice them by imitating their cry. Once the quails arrived and formed a gathering at the spot, he spread out his net over them. He then walked around the edge of the net to drive the quails to the centre of the net. The quails were then seized and put in a basket and taken away for sale. The hunter earned his living by catching and selling the quails in this way. [559]

One day, the Bodhisatta addressed all the quails in the group under his care: “My dear quails, the bird-hunter has caused serious damage to our kind several times now. I have devised a plan to avert the danger of being caught by the bird-hunter, and this is what each and every one of us should do. Once we are caught under the net thrown over us by the hunter, everyone should push his head through the holes in the netting and then, all together lifting the net, fly away. You should all perch on a cluster of bushes, in a safe place, where the net will remain entangled with them. We can then make our escape from beneath the net and fly away.”

All the quails in his group accepted his advice saying: “Very well.” On the following day, all the quails lifted up the net at the same moment they were caught in the hunter’s net, and flew away. They threw the net on a bush and flew away in different directions.

The hunter could free his net from the bush only after dusk and went back home empty handed. The next day the quails acted in the same manner also. The hunter took a long time to retrieve his net and went home empty handed again. It continued in this way for some time. The hunter’s wife became cross with her husband and asked him: “You come home late and empty handed day after day. It is as if you have someone else to be maintained besides myself.”

“My woman, I have no one to maintain except you. The thing is, the quails are there flying about, but they are now more closely knit than before. As soon as I spread the net over them, they lift it up and carry it away and drop it onto thorny bushes. But, my dear, they cannot remain united for ever; so don’t trouble yourself with suspicion about me. There will surely come a time when the quails will start quarrelling with one another, then I will catch them all and bring them to you to make you smile,” advised the hunter, who recited the following verse:

Sammodamānā gacchanti, jālam-ādāya pakkhino, yadā te vivadissanti, tadā ehinti me vasanti.

My good lady, with harmonious unity and co-operation the quails carry away the net I have thrown over them, drop it on the thorny bushes and make their escape. There will be a time when they start quarrelling amongst themselves. At that time, they will have to yield to my wishes.

A few days later, a quail accidentally trod on the head of another quail as it came down into the pasture. The one trod on, showing its anger asked in a threatening tone: “Who trod on my head?” The other quail replied meekly: “Please pardon me, my dear friend, I trod on it through carelessness. Please don’t be angry with me.” But the angry quail could not be pacified. The two began to make scurrilous attacks upon each other very often, beginning from that day.

When the two quails were found to be in a quarrelsome mood, arguing as to who could lift the hunter’s net, the Bodhisatta foresaw a trail of consequences: “Where there are heated arguments, there can be no peace and happiness. As of now, the quails will fail to take part in the lifting and carrying away of the net. The lives of numerous quails are at stake, the hunter will undoubtedly take advantage of the situation. It will not be proper for me to stay in this place any longer.”

He therefore departed from that place, taking along with him all the quails which were the associates forming his group. Only the group of quails, headed by the future Devadatta, remained in that forest.

The bird-hunter went to the same spot a few days later and made the sound in imitation [560] of the quail, and threw his net over the quails headed by Devadatta. Then, instead of working unitedly for their freedom, the quails started finding faults among themselves, quarrelling and challenging one another as to their superiority in strength and their ability in lifting the net. The bird-hunter lost no time in capturing and taking them to his house as presents for his wife.

The Buddha, in winding up the discourse said: “Royal highnesses, strife amongst relatives is, on no account, justifiable. It is the causal condition of destruction,” and finally revealed that: “Devadatta was the leading and most ignorant quail and I was the wise leader of the quails of the other group at that time.”

The Discourse about Taking Up Arms

The Buddha after expounding the five Birth Stories (Jātaka) proceeded to teach the Discourse about Taking up Weapons (Atta-daṇḍa-sutta, Snp 4.15) of the Anthology of Discourses (Sutta-nipāta), as the final discourse.

[Mingun Sayādaw did not provide a translation of this important discourse, so I have made one myself, following his expansive style of translation.]

1. Fear arises, both now and in the future, for those who have taken bodily, verbal and mental weapons, just look at these Sakyans and Koliyans who are quarrelling; I will explain how I was stirred with a sense of spiritual urgency.
2. Seeing this generation of men trembling because of craving, views and other defilements like fish in a small pond tremble because of crows, herons and storks. Seeing them fight with each other I was overcome with fright.
3. The world is insubstantial on all sides, from hell unto the Brahma world, all conditioned things are in turmoil; desiring to find a shelter for myself, I saw nowhere that was not overcome by ageing, sickness and death.
4. Even at the end of their lives they are hostile. Seeing that I no longer took delight in life, I saw the darts of lust, hatred, delusion, conceit, views, suffering, and doubt that had settled in the mind.
5. When struck by those darts one runs around in all directions engaging in bad conduct, but when one has drawn out those darts one does not run around engaging in bad conduct any more, one does not get reborn over and over.
6. Here the training rules are recited: Whatever ties to the strands of sensual desire there are in the world, having pierced through all sensual desire, you must train yourself in higher conduct, higher mind and higher wisdom so as to attain Nibbāna.
7. One should be truthful in words, knowledge and path, not forward, free of deceit, one should get rid of slander, being without anger, a sage will cross over the evils of greed and selfishness.
8. One should overcome sleepiness, laziness and sloth, without abiding in heedlessness. One who does good deeds with a mind set on Nibbāna should not have great conceit.

9. One should not be determined on false speech, nor have affection for form, one should completely know conceit, and live without violence driven by passion and so forth.
10. One should not find happiness in what has passed, one should not prefer what is present now, one should not grieve for conditioned things in decline, one should not have an attachment to attractive things.
11. Yearning for conditioned things, I say, is a great flood, wanting is like the rapids that washes all away. It is the basis for forming intentions, the defilement of sensual desires which is hard to overcome.
12. The sage never deviates from truthfulness, right view and the path, the true Brahmin stands on firm ground. Having forsaken all the sense spheres, one is indeed said to be peaceful.
13. The one who understands, the one who has highest knowledge, having understood the Dhamma, abandoning defilements, he is independent of the senses. He moves around rightly in the world, not yearning for anything at all.
14. Whoever has crossed over sensual desire, the clinging that is hard to cross over in the world, does not grieve, nor does he long for anything, having cut off the stream, he is no longer bound.
15. One must dry up whatever defilements there are regarding what has passed, and let there be none that come later, if you do not grasp at the five aggregates in the present, peacefully you will wander around.
16. One who cherishes nothing in the whole realm of mind and matter, and does not grieve for what he does not have, does not lose anything in the world.
17. The one who has nothing that he thinks is his own or as belonging to others, not finding any selfish attachments, has nothing to grieve about thinking: it is mine.
18. Not being jealous, not having greed, imperturbable, everywhere equanimous, being asked about being unshakeable, I say those are the four advantages.
19. The one who is imperturbable, who understands the Dhamma, who abstains from volitional striving, sees safety and security in all places.

20. The sage does not speak of himself as being amongst equals, superiors or inferiors, he is one who is at peace, without selfishness. He does not take anything up nor does he throw anything off.

The members of the royal families of the two countries were finally reconciled and appeased, and with devotional faith and full of gratitude, agreed amongst themselves: “Had not the Buddha come and intervened, we would certainly have destroyed one another and made blood flow in a stream. We have been saved from mutual destruction only because of him. Above all, had he not chosen to renounce the world, he would have been enjoying the life of a Universal Monarch, ruling over the four continents surrounded by 2,000 smaller islands. Accompanied by thousands of his sons of great intellectual and physical strength, he would have roamed over all his dominions followed by a large retinue.

But our royal kith and kin of noble blood, the Buddha, had renounced all the pleasures and luxuries of a Universal Monarch to become a recluse and he has blossomed forth as a Fully Self-Awakened Buddha. It would be only right and proper, now that he had become a Buddha, we should let him have monastics of royal blood attend upon him.” With this unanimous decision, the royal members of the two countries offered 250 princes from each country to the Buddha, for ordination.

The Buddha accepted them and ordained them as summoned monastics and took them to the Great Wood near the city of Kapilavatthu. From the following day onwards, he took alternate turns to receive alms food from Kapilavatthu and Koliya in the company of these 500 monastics. The people of the two countries offered the Saṅgha a large amount of alms food.

These 500 monastics had taken up the ascetic life not out of their own volition, but because they were unable to refuse the request of their parents and relatives. Thus, within a few days, the 500 monastics found their life tedious, uninteresting, and boring. News from their homes also did not help to make them happier in the monastery. “We beseech you not to take delight in the life of a monastic; from the time of your departure, our private business have been deteriorating day by day,” wrote their wives to them.

The Birth Story about Kuṇāla

The Buddha kept constant watch over these 500 monastics by personal contact, three times in a day and three times at night, a total of six times a day, just as a pheasant looks after her eggs, or as the fabulous yak (camarī) regards its tail, a mother cares for her only son, or a one-eyed man regards his one good eye.

He became aware of the unhappy state of their minds and he considered: “These monastics felt discontented and tedious even in the company of such a person as myself, the Buddha, what kind of discourse would be suitable for them?” He perceived that the Birth Story about the King of the Cuckoos, Kuṇāla (Kuṇāla-jātaka, Ja 536) which mentions the frailties and weaknesses in the character of women would be best for them. Therefore, he made the decision: “I shall first take these monastics to the Himālayas, then, by relating the Birth Story about Kuṇāla, I shall bring home to them the imperfections and defects in the character of [561] women. In this way, I shall remove the unhappiness and discontent which has risen in their hearts and give them the knowledge of the Stream-entry path (Sotāpatti-nāṇa).”

The Buddha entered the city of Kapilavatthu in the morning for the usual round of alms food, and in the afternoon he asked the 500 monastics: “Have you ever seen the pleasant forests of the Himālaya regions?” and they replied: “We have never seen them, Lord.” He asked them again: “Would you like to pay a short visit to the forests of the Himālayas?” – “Most exalted Buddha, we do not possess any supernatural power; how would we go there?” Whereupon he asked: “But if someone who has the power offers to take you there, would you like to go along with him?” The monastics answered: “Yes, Lord, we will go.”

The Buddha, exercising his supernormal power, took them through the air to the Himālayas, and in the course of the journey, while still in the sky, they were shown the golden, silver, emerald, vermilion and mountains of glass, etc., the five great rivers and the seven great lakes. The Himālayas were of huge dimension, 500 leagues high with an area of 3,000 leagues. The Buddha revealed to the 500 monastics by his supernatural power only a small portion of the delightful splendours of the Himālayas. He also showed them four-legged animals such as lions, tigers, elephants, as well as enchanting parks and gardens teeming with the various kinds of flora and fauna, abounding in numerous species of birds, aquatic and land birds. They were shown the sheer cliff on the east side of the Himālayas, the whole surface of which was golden and the cliff on the west completely covered with vermilion.

From the moment they witnessed this rare spectacle and the strange scenery in the mighty Himālayas, all these 500 monastics had cut off their attachment to their former wives. Then the Buddha, with all 500 monastics, descended on the western slope of the Himālayas where there was a massive vermilion slab, 60 leagues in extent, on which was a huge Sāla tree that will last to the end of the present world-element, with a height and width of seven leagues. Under the shade of that tree, on a vermilion platform, three leagues in width, the Buddha took his seat surrounded by the 500 monastics. With brilliant six-hued radiance emitting from his body, he sat there looking like the morning sun whose radiance was reflected from the surface of the ocean. He then addressed the monastics: “Monastics, you may ask me if there is anything in this vast region of the Himālayas you have not seen before.”

At that moment, a king of the cuckoos, seated on a stick that was carried by a pair of youthful hen cuckoos with their beaks on either end of the horizontal stick, was seen coming down from a higher altitude. They were accompanied by groups of eight youthful hen cuckoos, each group taking their positions above their heads, below them, on their right and left and on their front and back. Struck with wonder at the sight of the strange spectacle, the 500 monastics made their request to the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, what kind of birds are these and what are they called?”

“Monastics, those birds are the descendants of a succession of generations of cuckoos that owe their origin to a species of bird I was born into a long time ago. Such youthful hen cuckoos treated me in like manner at the very outset, their number being 3,500 in my days. The number has dwindled in time and there is now just enough to preserve the species.”

Then the monastics requested the Buddha to recount how those 3,500 cuckoos had attended upon him in those forests. So he expounded the Birth Story about Kuṇāla in 300 verses so they could draw the lessons therefrom.

The Monastics become Stream-Enterers

By the end of the discourse, all 500 monastics, the descendents of the Sakyan clan, attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). At the moment of entering the path to Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga), all the monastics became endowed with supernormal psychic powers such as flying through space, etc.

An ordinary worldling has to practice the method of concentration on a meditation-device (kaṣiṇa) in order to attain the mundane meditations (jhāna) with supernormal psychic powers [562] (abhiññā).

Certain noble persons (ariya-puggala), after realization of the path and fruit, practise concentration meditation and attain the mundane meditations with psychic powers (abhiññā); other noble persons, having attained mundane meditations with psychic powers even while they were still worldlings, have no need to practise concentration meditation afresh; they can enjoy the privileges of mundane meditations and psychic powers easily at will.

Still there is another type of a noble person (ariya) who were not endowed with mundane meditations and psychic powers while still ordinary worldlings and yet, the moment they realize the supermundane path and fruition, they become endowed with mundane meditation and psychic powers which they can enjoy at will and easily. Such meditation attainments are termed absorption attained through the realization of the path (magga-siddhi-jhāna); and such psychic powers are called super knowledges attained through the realization of the path (magga-siddhi-abhiññā).”

Those 500 monastics, due to former application, and deeds of merit, achieved absorption and super knowledges attained through the realization of the path, without having to specially practise concentration meditation for them. They can enjoy these privileges freely at will.

The Buddha considered that the path and fruition stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti) should be sufficient for the 500 monastics for the time being and departed for the Great Wood by his psychic power. The monastics, who had relied upon him on their outward journey, returned to the Great Wood, by their own powers, accompanying the Buddha.

The Great Assembly

Taking his seat on the prepared throne in the Great Wood, the Buddha had the monastics assembled and addressed them: “Dear monastics, come on, sit down, I shall teach you the meditation practice that leads you to the three higher stages of the path (magga), through eradication of the defilements.” He then instructed them on the meditation method for attainment of the three higher paths.

The monastics thought to themselves: “The Buddha, being well aware that we were not happy leading the lives of monastics in the Dispensation, took us to Lake Kuṇāla and then, having removed our discontent and unhappiness, led us to the first stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). And now that in this Great Wood he has taught us the meditation method of attaining the three higher paths, we should not become lax with the thought: ‘We are noble Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna-ariya),’ but should strive hard like those pioneers who have gone before us to attain the state of perfection through application.”

They paid homage to the Buddha and left; in the secluded place at the root of trees, each of them spread their own small mats, and sat on them. The Buddha perceived: “These monastics, being Stream-enterers (Sotāpanna), know the way of attaining the path and fruit, and as such, they will not have any difficulty in achieving the higher stage of the paths and fruitions. Each and every one of these monastics who have now gone to practice insight meditation (vipassanā) will return in the evening to acquaint me with the virtues of the Arahata fruition he has gained. All the Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element will also gather together in this universe at the same time. Then this will be an occasion of a Great Assembly (Mahā-samaya). It would be better for me to wait for such an assembly in a secluded place.” Having considered in this way, he went to a secluded spot and sat on the reserved place abiding in the fruition attainment (phala-samāpatti).

Of the 500 monastics, the one who left first after receiving instructions on meditation became an Arahata complete with the four analytical wisdoms (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa) before the rest. The [563] monastic, who left second after receiving instructions, became an Arahata with the four analytical wisdoms like the first one. He was next followed by the third monastic in a like manner. Thus all the 500 monastics had their knowledge of the four noble truths blossom into the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala) one after another, like lilies blooming forth into beautiful flowers in order of maturity.

The first monastic who became an Arahata rose from his seat, picking up the small mat on which he had been sitting, with a view to go to the Buddha to acquaint him with his attainment. The second and the third monastic and all the rest of them followed suit and headed towards the refectory. Then they went in a long queue as if they had lined themselves according to seniority in monkhood, to where the Buddha was waiting for them.

The monastic who arrived first sat on the small mat at a suitable distance and prepared to address the Buddha with the virtues of the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala) he had attained. But first, he turned round to see if there was anyone coming behind him with the same idea, and saw the second monastic, the third monastic, and finally all the 500 monastics lined up in a row after him.

When all the monastics had taken their seats at suitable places, each one looked at the other with a searching eye to form an idea of one another's intentions and discovered that each one of them felt shy to address the Buddha about his attainment.

Noble Arahats always have the welfare of all beings at heart and their sincere wish is that humans, Devas and Brahmas acquire the penetrative insight-wisdom which they themselves have attained. They have no desire to reveal their attainment of Awakening for conspicuousness unlike the person who has discovered a pot of gold.

The Discourse about the Great Assembly

The Great Assembly of the 500 monastics, according to the commentary on the Discourse about the Great Assembly (Mahā-samaya-sutta, DN 20) took place in the cool evening on the full moon day of June (Jeṭṭha). No sooner had the 500 Arahats taken their seats than the moon appeared, rising from the top of Mount Yugandhara in the eastern hemisphere, free from the five kinds of obstructions: dew, mist, cloud, eclipse and smoke. The moon, in its fullness, assumed the form of a framed disc of a silver mirror or the frame of a silver wheel turning round and round on its edge, hanging high above the eastern horizon, shining with all its brightness as if to reveal the world that was made delightful and pleasurable by the appearance of the Awakened Buddha. At that auspicious moment, the Buddha was still in residence in the Great Wood near Kapilavatthu in the Sakka country, in the company of the 500 Arahats.

The Devas residing in the environs of the Great Wood, in great excitement, hailed one another: "Friends! Come, let us go. To pay homage to the Buddha is meritorious; to listen to the Dhamma is beneficial; to pay respects to the Saṅgha is to acquire great merit; Come, friends, let us go." Thus clamouring, they congregated in the presence of the Buddha, made obeisance to him as well as to the 500 monastics who had just become Arahats.

Their rousing clamour, spread far and wide, reaching by stages from a halting distance, to half a mile, to a mile, to half a league, and to a league and thus extending from the centre of this universe to the surrounding 10,000 world-element. All the Devas and Brahmas, inhabiting these 10,000 world-element, therefore congregated in this universe, excepting for the Unconscious (Asaññā) Brahmas, the formless (arūpa) Brahmas and those Brahmas who happened to be absorbed in their meditation attainments (jhāna-samāpatti).

At that time, the universe was entirely packed with Devas from the celestial regions, reaching up to the Brahma realms like a needle case packed tightly with needles with no space left [564] between them who had come to attend the Great Assembly. The distance between the plane of the Brahma worlds and the human world may be reckoned by dropping a boulder of the size of seven tiers, crowning the graduated mansion known as Lohapāsāda in Śrī Laṅkā from the Brahma land. It took four months for that boulder to reach the human plane. The space between the two planes was so tightly packed with the Devas and Brahmas that there was no vacuum whatsoever, even for the sweet fragrance of flowers to float upwards or a mustard seed to find its way downwards.

When a Universal Monarch sat in congregation with all the monarchs from the vassal states, privileged and powerful rulers who arrived earlier could find their seats which were in the vicinity of the Universal Monarch and were not too uncomfortable. But those who arrived later could occupy only the back seats which were packed tight and provided little comfort. In a like manner, the space around the Buddha, who was like a Universal Monarch, was comparatively not so tight. All the powerful Brahmas, such as the Mahā Brahmas,<sup>202</sup> could find their seats close by the Buddha. But even there, those privileged, powerful Brahmas had to make themselves comfortable, occupying a tiny space the size of a yak tail's tip, in batches of ten, 20, upto 60, by making their bodies subtler and subtler.

When the Buddha and the 500 Arahats, together with the Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element, had assembled, four Arahat Brahmas rose from absorption at the expiry of the pre-determined duration. When they looked around the Brahma realms, they found the whole region lifeless like a deserted mess room after lunch time. On investigating where the Brahmas had gone, they noticed that the Great Assembly was in progress.

<sup>202</sup> Original had: Mahāsakkha Brahmas, but there seems to be no such category, or anything similar.

The four Arahats Brahma discussed among themselves: “This is a Great Assembly and we are left behind, and there will be no seats for late comers. Let us not go empty handed; let each of us prepare a verse for presentation to the Assembly. These gift verses will serve as an intimation of our arrival and as a gesture of our homage to the Buddha.” Having agreed thus, each Brahma composed a verse before they left the Brahma realm and then one Arahats Brahma descended on the edge of the eastern hemisphere of the universe; another descended on the edge of the southern hemisphere of the universe; another one descended on the edge of the western hemisphere of the universe and the last one on the edge of the northern hemisphere of the universe.

The Arahats Brahma who had descended on the edge of the eastern hemisphere entered into absorption through the meditation device on a dark blue object (nīla-kasiṇa); and to signify his presence, emitted brilliant dark-blue radiance from his body that enveloped all the Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element as though they were covered with an emerald blanket. He then traversed along the Buddha approach passage (Buddha-vīthi), free from any hindrance and reserved for easy access to the Buddha and stood in front of the Buddha, paying homage by presenting the verse he had composed:

Mahā-samayo pavanasmim, Deva-kāyā samāgatā, āgatamha imam Dhamma-samayaṃ, dakkhitāye aparājita-saṅgham.

Most exalted Buddha, today a Great Assembly of Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element has convened in the Great Wood to pay homage to the Arahats who have conquered the five kinds of death (māra) with pure devotional faith. Like all these Devas and Brahmas, we have also arrived with great delight at this congregation to pay our respect to the invincible victors, the Arahats, out of pure devotional faith.

Having presented this verse, he returned for want of space in the vicinity of the Buddha’s throne to the edge of the eastern hemisphere of the universe and remained standing there.

The Brahma who had descended on the edge of the southern hemisphere of the [565] universe entered into absorption based on a meditation device of yellow colour (pīta-kasiṇa); and to signify his presence, emitted brilliant yellow radiance from his body that enveloped all the Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element as though they were covered under a cloak of gold. Then after the manner of the first Brahma, he approached the Buddha and presented his verse:

*Tatra bhikkhavo samādahaṃsu, cittam-attano ujukaṃ akāṃsu,
sārathīva nettāni gahetvā, indriyāni rakkhanti paṇḍitā.*

Most exalted Buddha, at this congregation of the Devas and Brahmas, the 500 Arahats maintain their minds at peace and they are perfectly tranquil through developing the highest state of concentration (appana-samādhī). They maintain their minds perfectly upright, free from mental deviations which may be likened to the three deviations from straightness exemplified by a zigzag track of the urine of an ox, the comb shape crescent of the moon and the curvature of a plough's handle. In the same way, a skilful charioteer of a chariot harnessed to well-tamed Sindh horses holds the reins gently without pulling them roughly to get an easy, comfortable ride, these 500 Arahats, wise with path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa), have guarded with mindfulness the sense doors: the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind, against the inroads of the defilements. Most exalted Buddha, we have come to this Great Wood with the object of paying homage to these 500 Arahats.

Then he went back to his place at the edge of the southern hemisphere of the universe like his predecessor and remained standing there.

Then the Brahma who had descended on the edge of the western hemisphere of the universe entered into absorption based on the meditation device of a red colour (lohita-kasiṇa); and to signify his presence at the Great Assembly emitted shining red colour from his body that enveloped all the Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element as though they have been wrapped up in a red cloak. Then after the manner of his predecessors, he approached the Buddha and presented his verse:

*Chetvā khīlaṃ, chetvā palighaṃ,
inda-khīlaṃ ūhacca manejā,
te caranti suddhā vimalā, cakkhumatā sudantā susu-nāgā.*

Most exalted Buddha, the youthful Arahats, who, being well instructed, have been subdued and trained to restrain their six faculties by the Buddha who is gifted with five kinds of eyes: the eye of a Buddha who sees the heart of humans (Buddha-cakkhu); the eye of truth which means attainment of the path-knowledge (Dhamma-cakkhu); the eye of all round knowledge or omniscience (samanta-cakkhu); the Deva-eye which is all pervading, seeing all that proceeds in the hidden worlds (dibba-cakkhu) ; the physical eye which is exceptionally powerful and sensitive (mamsa-cakkhu).

These youthful Arahats have done away with the thorns of greed (lobha), hatred (dosa) and delusion (moha) by the sword of the fourfold path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa). They have struck off and destroyed the crossbars and bolts on the door of the chamber of existence: greed, hatred and delusion, which hinder any escape from Samsāra. By the same weapon of path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa), they have uprooted the pillars: greed, hatred and delusion, stoutly standing at the gate of the city of personality-belief (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), by means of the fourfold path. Being devoid of craving, free from taints and desires, they freely roam about in all [566] four directions without the hindrance of defilements. We have come to pay homage to these youthful Arahats.

Then he went back to the edge of the western hemisphere of the universe and like his predecessors remained standing there.

Then the Brahma who had descended on the edge of the northern hemisphere of the universe entered into absorption based on the meditation device of white colour (odāta-kasiṇa); and to signify his presence at the Great Assembly emitted radiance of white colour from his body enveloping all the Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element as though they have been wrapped up in robes made of jasmine flowers. Then like the previous Brahmas, he approached the Buddha and recited the verse he had composed:

*Ye keci Buddham saraṇam gatāse, na te gamissanti apāya-bhūmiṃ,
pahāya mānusaṃ dehaṃ,
Deva-kāyam paripūressanti.*

Most exalted Buddha, any person who has taken refuge with confidence in the Buddha will not be reborn in the four realms of misery: the realm of suffering, animals, Petas and Asuras. Having thrown off the human body, they will fill up the Deva realms.

After presenting the verse, he went back to the edge of the northern hemisphere of the universe like his predecessors.

The Buddha observed that the Great Assembly of Devas and Brahmas was taking place in the vast space which extended to the edges of the universe in width and to the plane of Akaniṭṭha Brahma in height. He considered: “This is indeed a huge congregation of Devas and Brahmas; the 500 monastics may not be aware of this fact. I will make it known to them presently.”

He therefore addressed them: “Monastics, all the Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element have congregated here now to pay homage to the omniscient Buddha whose coming is just as excellent as those of the Supreme Buddhas of the past, and to the monastics as well. Monastics, just like this Great Assembly, similar congregations of Devas and Brahmas of the same magnitude, no more and no less, have taken place during the time of Buddhas of the past also.

Monastics, just like this great assembly, similar congregations of Devas and Brahmas of the same magnitude, no more and no less, will also take place during the time of the Supreme Buddhas in the future.”

The Devas and Brahmas at the Assembly were of the opinion that, in consideration of the huge number of celestial beings present, the Buddha might mention only the names of the powerful Devas and Brahmas and those of minor importance might not be brought out. The Buddha, on considering what the Devas and Brahmas might be thinking about, perceived what was going on in their minds, as though he had held their hearts, or just as the case of a thief being caught red-handed with the exhibit, and accordingly decided: “I shall reveal the names and clans of all the Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element who are present at this Great Assembly, irrespective of whether they are of great or small power.”

Buddhas are very great and glorious personalities. There is nothing that is beyond their ken. All six sense objects that make contact with the sense-organs of men and celestial beings to produce eye-consciousness, ear-consciousness, nose-consciousness, tongue-consciousness, body-consciousness and mind-consciousness are within the scope of their perception, with no obstruction whatsoever. The Buddha, therefore, had the power of differentiating between those who were fully mature and developed and ready to be released from Saṃsāra and those who were not yet ready to gain emancipation. He first mentally put aside all those beings who were not ready and gave his concentrated attention to those who would benefit immediately by his teaching. [567]

Again, amongst those who would gain release from Saṃsāra, the Buddha divided them mentally into six groups, according to their inclinations, viz., Devas and Brahmas with a propensity for lust (rāga-citta); Devas and Brahmas with a propensity for hatred (dosa-citta); Devas and Brahmas with a propensity for delusion (moha-citta); Devas and Brahmas with a propensity for thought-conception (vitakka); Devas and Brahmas with a propensity for faith (saddhā), and Devas and Brahmas with a propensity for wisdom (paññā).

Then of these six groups, he decided that Devas and Brahmas with an inclination towards lust and craving should be taught the Discourse on the Correct Way to Wander (Sammā-paribbājanīya-sutta, Snp 2.13); those with a tendency towards aversion should be taught the Discourse on Quarrels and Disputes (Kalaha-vivāda-sutta, Snp 4.11); those with an inclination towards delusion should be taught the Long Discourse on the Array (Mahā-byūha-sutta, Snp 4.13); those with an inclination towards thought-conception should be taught the Short Discourse on the Array (Cūḷa-byūha-sutta, Snp 4.12); those with an inclination towards faith should be taught the Discourse of Being Quick (Tuvaṭṭaka-sutta, Snp 4.14) and those with wisdom should be taught the Discourse entitled Before the Break-Up (Purā-bheda-sutta, Snp 4.10).

He next determined which mode of teaching would be suitable for the assembled Devas and Brahmas out of the four modes, namely:

1. Teaching according to the Buddha's free will (attajjhāsaya-sutta-nikkhepa).
2. Teaching according to the wish of the audience (parajjhāsaya-sutta-nikkhepa).
3. Teaching according to occasion or prevailing circumstance (aṭṭhuppattika-sutta-nikkhepa).
4. Teaching in the form of an answer to a particular question (pucchāvasika-sutta-nikkhepa).

And he perceived that Devas and Brahmas would gain emancipation through realization of the four noble truths, on hearing a discourse taught by way of answering the question asked in harmony with their inclination. He then looked to see if any of the 500 Arahats was capable of raising such a question that would be in accord with the inclinations of the Devas and Brahmas, and perceived that there was none among them. He also found out that the 80 senior disciples and the two chief disciples were not capable of raising such a question.

He perceived that a Paccekabuddha was equally incapable of raising such a question. He then considered whether Sakka or Suyāma Deva could fulfil his need, but they were also found to be incapable of raising such a question.

Finally, realising that only a Fully Awakened Buddha like himself would be able to raise a question in accordance with the inclination of Devas and Brahmas, he looked into the innumerable world-elements with his infinite power of vision to see if there was another Awakened Buddha in any of the universes, and he discovered that there was none of his equal in any of the universes.

There is no wonder that he could find none to equal him. Indeed there was none of his equal, amongst the Devas and humans, even at the time of his last birth. As baby Prince Siddhattha, he uttered the bold words: Aggoham-asmī lokassa, “I am supreme in the whole world.” Needless to say, there was no one to equal him now that he had become a Fully Awakened Buddha.

Perceiving there was not another Buddha like himself, the Buddha considered: “These Devas and Brahmas would not get a penetrative insight into the Dhamma if I were to ask a question and then provide the answer myself. Only if another Buddha raised the question and I gave the answer to it, would it be a wonderful feat and the Devas and Brahmas would get a penetrative insight into the teaching. I have to create an image of my true likeness.”

For this purpose, the Buddha entered into the fourth form world absorption (rūpāvacara-kiriya-jhāna) which formed the foundation for the development of supernatural power (abhiññā). Then arising from the absorption, he made the resolution, through the exercise of the great knowledge joined with a thought process focused on determination (mahā-kiriya-ñāṇa-sampayutta-adhiṭṭhāna-javana), so that a Buddha of complete [568] likeness to himself, in all respects, such as handling the bowl and robe, looking straight forward and glancing sideways, bending and stretching the limbs, should come into being. Thus he created another Buddha, an exact replica of himself, as though it had emerged from the surface of the full moon which was just then rising from the top of Mount Yugandhara in the eastern hemisphere.

At the sight of the mind-made Buddha (nimitta-buddha), the Devas and Brahmas expressed their views saying: “Friends, another moon has appeared besides the existing one.” When the mind-made Buddha was seen emerging from the surface of the moon and coming closer to them, they changed their views and said: “Friends, it is not the moon but the appearance of the sun.” As the image came nearer, they said: “Friends, it is not the sun but the mansion (vimāna) of a Deva.” When it was coming closer and closer, they said: “Friends, that is not a mansion but a Deva,” and again they said: “Friends, that is not a Deva but a Great Brahma,” and finally as it came quite close to them, they concluded: “Friends, that is not a Great Brahma, but, in fact, it is another Buddha coming to us!”

Of the celestial beings, ordinary (puthujjana) Devas and Brahmas thought to themselves: “When the universe was packed to its capacity by Devas and Brahmas congregating to pay homage to a single Buddha, the number of Devas and Brahmas for two Buddhas would be beyond imagination.” But the noble (ariya) Devas and Brahmas concluded that there could not be two Buddhas in one and the same universe at the same time; therefore the other Buddha must be a creation in his own likeness by the living Buddha.”

In the meanwhile, the mind-made Buddha came closer to the Buddha as the Devas and Brahmas were looking on, and sat face to face with him, on a seat kept in reserve on an equal level, without paying homage to the Buddha.

There were 32 characteristics of a great person on the body of the Buddha, and the mind-made Buddha also bore the same characteristics. Six-hued radiance emanated scintillating from the body of the Buddha; and the same kind of six-hued radiance also emanated scintillating from the body of the mind-made Buddha. The radiance of the Buddha was reflected from the body of the mind-made Buddha, just as the radiance of the mind-made Buddha was reflected from the body of the Buddha. The flashes of radiance from the body of the Buddha and those of the mind-made Buddha shot up to the Akaniṭṭha Brahma realm, and retracing their paths, rested on the heads of the Devas and Brahmas before they scattered towards the edge of the universe. The whole universe assumed the form of a scaffolding, made of bent rafters of gold, enclosing a relic shrine (stūpa), looking graceful and glittering.

All the Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element, grouped together in this single universe, enveloped in the chamber formed of the meshing radiance emanating from the two bodies of the Buddha and the mind-made Buddha. The mind-made Buddha, in his sitting posture, put forward a question, after a formal address in verse in praise of the Buddha for his conquest over the defilements (kilesa) on the throne of Awakening under the Bodhi tree.

Before proceeding to deal with the question presented by the mind-made Buddha, in the Discourse on the Correct Way to Wander (Sammā-paribbājanīya-sutta, Snp 2.13), in order to make the minds of the Devas and Brahmas malleable, pliable, firm and imperturbable, the Buddha decided to greet them, as it were, by announcing their names, families and clans, etc., without any distinction as regards to rank or status. Therefore, the Buddha proceeded to give the discourse on the Discourse about the Great Assembly (Mahā-samaya-sutta, DN 20), which began with words: Ācikkhissāmi, bhikkhave, Deva-kāyānaṃ nāmāni ... “monastics, I shall disclose the identity of the audience by announcing their names, the names of their families, clans, etc.”

The Discourse about the Great Assembly has been dealt with in great detail by various eminent scholars giving the Pāli text and translation, including word by word translations (nissaya), based on the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya). Special mention must be made of the treatise entitled: “An Exposition of the Mahā-samaya-sutta with Pāli text and word-meanings,” by Ven. Bhaddanta Nandiya, presiding monk of the [569] Mahāvissutārāma monastery of Pakokku. There is a section, at the end of that treatise, on the six inclinations dealt with by the Buddha in the six discourses such as the Discourse on the Correct Way to Wander following the Discourse about the Great Assembly; their Pāli text and word for word translation are also provided therein.

At the conclusion of the discourse on the Discourse about the Great Assembly, 1,000 billion Devas and Brahmas became Arahats, and those who attained noble Stream-entry (Sotāpanna-ariya) were beyond calculation, according to the commentary to the Discourse about the Great Assembly (Mahā-samaya-sutta).

Ven. Sayādaw U Budh’s Note of Clarification

When we look at the Discourse about the Great Assembly as a whole, we find that the discourse was given with emphasis placed on the nomenclature of the Devas and Brahmas, mentioning their family and clan names; and the question may arise: in the absence of any exposition of the ultimate truth how could Devas and Brahmas realise the four noble truths and achieve emancipation, attain the state of Stream-entry, and so on only by hearing their family and clan names?

Here is the answer: 1) The Buddha was aware that by hearing the Great Assembly discourse, the mind of Devas and Brahmas had become imperturbable, malleable, free of hindrances, exulted and pellucid, and therefore at that moment he expounded the four noble truths which he himself had discovered. Having thus heard the discourse on the four noble truths, Devas and Brahmas became noble persons (ariya); 2) in other words, by hearing the Discourse about the Great Assembly, there arose in the mind continuum of the Devas and Brahmas, continuous mental states one after another, the preceding one serving as the cause for the arising of the following, which developed joyful satisfaction (pīti), tranquillity (passaddhi), happiness (sukha), concentration (samādhi), knowledge according to reality (yathā-bhūta-ñāṇa); getting thoroughly tired of worldly life (nibbida-ñāṇa); fading away of lust or passion (virāga-ñāṇa); knowledge of release (vimuccana-ñāṇa) or knowledge of the path (magga-ñāṇa); knowledge of emancipation (vimutti-ñāṇa) or knowledge of fruition (phala-ñāṇa); insight arising from knowing and seeing emancipation (vimutti-ñāṇa-dassana) or reflection knowledge (paccavekkhaṇa-ñāṇa). It was only because of the development of these series of mental states that Devas and Brahmas became noble persons.

In providing these clarifications, Ven. Sayādaw U Budh quoted the authority of the pertinent commentaries.

The Discourse about the Great Assembly has been held in high esteem by celestial beings. Therefore a wise person who wishes welfare and prosperity in both mundane and supermundane matters should recite this discourse on auspicious occasions such as the construction and occupation of houses, monasteries and villages.

When we think of why the Discourse about the Great Assembly was held in high esteem by Devas and Brahmas, we find that the Buddha was naturally the chief personality at the Great Assembly which comprised a variety of beings from the lowly earth deities to the most powerful Hārīta Brahmas. The Discourse about the Great Assembly was, in fact, the opening address by the Buddha in his capacity as the chairman of the Great Assembly.

The Great Assembly was attended by three categories of celestial beings: Those of the highest rank and power, those of the middle rank and power and those from the lowest strata. To an audience of different social status, it would be a tactful measure for the chairman to evince interest in the members of the lowest rank by announcing first their presence to the congregation, followed by mentioning those of the medium status and finally the most powerful Devas. Any attempt to introduce the Devas of highest rank and power at the outset by announcing their family and clan names might cause displeasure and dissatisfaction among those of the lower rank.

As it happened, the Buddha made it a point to mention the members of the lowest [570] rank of Devas, such as the earth deities, at the beginning of the welcome address, followed by giving recognition of the presence of the Devas of medium status, and closing his address by giving attention to those of the highest rank. He thus gave delight to all classes of the audience, the lowest rank feeling happy that they were welcomed first and the Devas of position and influence satisfied that they were given prominence by being mentioned at the crucial closure of the proceedings. This can be regarded as how the Buddha set a fine example for the guidance of those who are responsible for delivering an address of welcome to a great gathering.

In view of the facts stated above, all the Devas have since been looking forward to hearing the Discourse about the Great Assembly, as they wander about in the four directions of the universe.

The following is an illustration of how the Discourse about the Great Assembly is held in high esteem by the Devas. There was a cave known as Nāgalena in the precincts of Koṭipabbata monastery. A celestial damsel was dwelling on an ironwood tree standing at the gate of the said cave. One day a young monastic dwelling in the cave was reciting the Discourse about the Great Assembly and the Devakaññā listened ardently to the recitation of the discourse. When the monastic's recitation came to a close, the celestial damsel uttered: Sādhu, sādhu, at the top of her voice and a dialogue ensued between the youthful monastic and the Devakaññā:

Monk: Who is that saying sādhu?

Devakaññā: Venerable sir, it is me, a female deity.

Monk: Why have you said sādhu?

Devakaññā: It is because I had the good fortune to hear the Discourse about the Great Assembly (Mahā-samaya-sutta) for the first time when the Buddha propounded it in the Great Wood, and for the second time I heard it today. I understand that you have learnt the discourse well, exactly as taught by the Buddha, not making the slightest variation from the original even for a single letter. I therefore said sādhu on that score.

Monk: Have you heard the recitation by the Buddha yourself?

Devakaññā: Yes, I have, reverend sir.

Monk: It is said that there was a great assembly of Devas and Brahmas at the time of the recitation by the Buddha of this discourse. From which place did you hear the recitation?

Devakaññā: Venerable sir, I was then a resident of the Great Wood near Kapilavatthu, but I was unable to acquire a place in the whole of Jambudīpa because the powerful Devas and Brahmas crowded in. I was compelled to go across to Śrī Laṅkā, and as I was attempting to listen to the discourse standing at the port of Jambukola, powerful Devas came crowding in again. I was again pushed further and further backwards until I got to a small village of Rohana near Mahāgāma where, standing in the ocean to the depth of my neck, I was finally able to hear the recitation.

Monk: Devakaññā, how could you see the Buddha at the Great Wood which was at such a distance from where you happened to be at the time?

Devakaññā: Venerable sir, I really did see the Buddha; it appeared as if the Buddha was looking at me fixedly from the Great Wood all throughout the time he was expounding the discourse; so much so, I felt afraid and abashed and I felt like hiding myself beneath the foamy waves.

Monk: It is said that 1,000 billion Devas and Brahmas became Arahats on the day when the Discourse about the Great Assembly was delivered. Did you become an Arahāt too?

Devakaññā: No, venerable sir, I did not.

Monk: Then I think you attained fruition stage of a Non-returner (Anāgāmī)!

Devakaññā: No, sir, I did not. [571]

Monk: Then I think you had attained the fruition stage of stage of Once-returner (Sakadāgāmi)!

Devakaññā: No, sir, I did not.

Monk: Devakaññā, it is said that hearing the Discourse about the Great Assembly countless number of Devas and Brahmas attained the three lower paths; I am sure you must have at least become a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna).

Devakaññā: As one who had indeed attained the fruition stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpanna) the Devakaññā felt shy and said: “Venerable sir, you should not have asked me such a question,” thus avoiding the issue.

The young monastic then asked the Devakaññā: “Can you manifest yourself to me?” She replied: “Venerable sir, not the whole body but only the tip of my finger, and so saying, she thrust one of her fingers through a key hole, exposing just the tip of it. The whole cave was then brightly illumined as though thousands of moons and suns had thrown beams of light into it.

The Devakaññā did not manifest her whole person so as to save the young monastic from the danger of temptation, which would ruin his life as a recluse.

Then the Devakaññā departed after paying her respects and urging the young monastic not to be remiss in his effort to practise the precepts prescribed for monastics. This is how the Discourse about the Great Assembly (Mahā-samaya-sutta) is held in high esteem by the Devas and Brahmas.

Discourses in Harmony with Inclinations

After delivering the Discourse about the Great Assembly, the Buddha proceeded to give discourses to the same Great Assembly on the following discourses in accordance with the dispositions of the different groups of Devas and Brahmas.

1. The Discourse on the Correct Way to Wander (Sammā-paribbājanīya-sutta, Snp 2.13) was taught to the Devas and Brahmas who had a propensity towards lust (rāga), by way of a dialogue between a mind-made Buddha and the Buddha himself. 100,000 Devas and Brahmas became Arahats at the conclusion of the discourse and countless Devas and Brahmas attained the three lower paths at the same time.

2. The Discourse on Quarrels and Disputes (Kalaha-vivāda-sutta, Snp 4.11) was taught to the Devas and Brahmas with an inclination towards aversion (dosa), such Devas and Brahmas achieved emancipation in a like manner.
3. The Long Discourse on the Array (Mahā-byūha-sutta, Snp 4.13) was taught to those who had inclination towards delusion (moha), such Devas and Brahmas gained emancipation likewise.
4. The Short Discourse on the Array (Cūḷa-byūha-sutta, Snp 4.12) was taught to those who were inclined to thought-conception (vitakka) with the same results.
5. The Discourse of Being Quick (Tuvaṭṭaka-sutta, Snp 4.14) was delivered to the audience with a tendency of faith (saddhā) in the Three Treasures with the same results.
6. The Discourse entitled Before the Break-Up (Purā-bheda-sutta, Snp 4.10) was taught to those who were inclined towards wisdom (paññā) in the same manner and with similar results.

For full particulars in respect of these six discourses, reference may be made to Bhikkhu Bodhi's translation Suttanipāta, An Ancient Collection of the Buddha's Discourses, together with its commentaries. [572]

23a: The 5th Rains Retreat (Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī)

Having accomplished an incumbent duty of a Buddha by teaching the Discourse about the Great Assembly (Mahā-samaya-sutta, DN 20), the Discourse on the Correct Way to Wander (Sammā-paribbājanīya-sutta, Snp 2.13), etc., to the 500 Arahats of Sakyan descent and establishing seven 1,000 billion Devas and Brahmas in the Arahata fruition (Arahatta-phala), and a countless number of them in the three lower paths, as stated above, the Buddha took up residence at Kūṭāgāra monastery, which had terraced roofing and a crowning pinnacle, in the country of Vesālī to observe the fifth Rains Retreat (Vassa).

There were two forests bearing the name of Great Wood: one near Kapilavatthu and the other near Vesālī. Of these two, the one where the Buddha taught the Discourse about the Great Assembly, near Kapilavatthu, extended from the edge of Kapilavatthu to the Himālayas on one side and to the ocean on the other side. The one near the city of Vesālī was a great forest with a marked boundary on all sides.

When the Buddha was observing the fifth Rains Retreat (Vassa) in the Great Wood near Vesālī, King Suddhodana entered Nibbāna after attaining the Arahata fruition under the white umbrella in his golden palace.

An account of King Suddhodāna's attainment of the Arahata fruition under the white umbrella in his golden palace and entering Parinibbāna has been dealt with in detail in the treatise entitled Tathāgata-udāna-dīpanī. In view of this, it is only briefly mentioned here as treated in the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Aṅguttara-nikāya) commentary.

Permission for the Ordination of Women

The Buddha's step-mother Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī had approached the Buddha at the time of his first visit to Kapilavatthu with a request for admission of women to the Saṅgha by formal ordination. Since then she had made the request three times more and the Buddha had rejected her request each time.

The reason for such rejection was because the Buddha had decided not to grant admission of women to the Saṅgha easily, but only after painstaking efforts on the part of women to gain permission for ordination. Only then would they realize that becoming a nun (bhikkhunī) in the Dispensation was a thing difficult of attainment and would safeguard their monastic status with constant vigilance.

He wished them to cherish the hard won admission to the Saṅgha after a great struggle.

Thus, when Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī made her first request, which was repeated three times to the Buddha at the Nigrodha monastery of Kapilavatthu, her request was rejected by him for the reasons stated above. At each attempt, she had to abandon hope and return to the royal palace.

Now when the Buddha had taken up residence at Vesālī to keep the fifth Rains Retreat (Vassa) an opportunity presented itself for her to make another attempt. As stated in the previous chapters, the 500 monastics of royal blood, prior to their attainment of Awakening, had messages sent to them by their former spouses, requesting them to return and live a household life again. These ladies made their earnest appeal again by sending messages, as before, to the 500 monastics who had become Arahats now. But the Arahats monks sent the reply: “We are no longer in a position to lead a worldly life.”

The 500 deserted wives considered it would not be appropriate to seek for a [573] new married life, and decided unanimously to go to Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī to appeal to her to obtain permission from the Buddha for admission to the Saṅgha as female monastics. Accordingly, they went in a group to Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī and made their appeal to her.

Their request reminded her of her failure to obtain permission for women to receive ordination when the Buddha was in residence at Nigrodha monastery on a previous occasion and so she had a hair-dresser shave their heads, including that of her own, and asked the ladies to wear dyed clothes and assume the form of female monastics while they were still in the royal palace. Then they made arrangements to set out all together for the Great Wood of Vesālī where the Buddha was then residing.

The distance between Kapilavatthu and Vesālī was 50 leagues; and when the Sakyan and Koliyan royal families considered arrangements for their journey, they concluded: “It would not be possible for these princesses and royal ladies, who were brought up so regally and gently, to make the journey on foot,” and they arranged to provide them with 500 sedans to solve the problem.

The 500 ladies agreed amongst themselves that such a mode of travelling might be tantamount to an act of disrespect to the Buddha and they therefore made the journey of 50 leagues on foot. Royal families of both countries arranged for regular provision of food at every stop and a sufficient number of escorts for their security on the way to Vesālī.

Having made the difficult journey of 50 leagues, their delicate feet were swollen with callouses which rose and burst, looking as if they were covered with the seeds of the clearing nut (Strychnos potatorum). All 500 fair ladies, headed by Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī, who arrived at Vesālī with swollen feet, bodies besmeared with dirt and dust, with tears streaming down their cheeks and in sore distress, stood in a group at the gate of the Kūṭāgāra monastery in the Great Wood.

They dared not enter the precincts of the monastery at once. Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī reflected to herself that she had taken on the dress of a nun without the permission of the Buddha, and the news of her action may have already spread throughout the land. It would be well if the Buddha would be pleased to admit her into the Saṅgha. But, failing that, she would have to withstand reproaches. That was the reason why she stood wailing at the gate without daring to seek entry.

When Ven. Ānanda noticed Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī in such a plight at the gate, he came to her and inquired: “Dear step-mother, why do you look so miserable? Have the royal relatives of the Sakyan and Koliyan families met with tragedies and are ruined? Why are you in an unsightly appearance such as this, with swollen feet, and looking shabby, with a grief-stricken face, standing helplessly and weeping at the gate?”

Whereupon, Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī replied: “Venerable Ānanda, we have been standing at the gate with tears in our eyes for failure to get the Buddha’s permission for women to receive formal ordination, so that they might lead the life of female monastics in this Dispensation.”

Ānanda soothed her by saying a few words of encouragement: “Step-mother, if that is the case, I will go and approach the Realised One for admission of women into the Saṅgha by formal ordination, so that they might lead the life of female monastics in this Dispensation; please remain at the gate until I come back.”

So saying Ven. Ānanda went to the Buddha and made this request: “Most exalted Buddha, step-mother Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī is standing at the gate with her feet swollen, her body covered with dirt and dust, her heart seared, tears streaming down her cheek, and in a miserable plight for failure to obtain permission for womenfolk to receive formal ordination, so that they might lead the life of female monastics within the Dispensation (Sāsana). May I pray solemnly that they be granted permission to receive formal ordination!”

The Buddha said in response: “That is not a proper thing, dear Ānanda, and I advise you not to be interested in the matter of admitting womenfolk into the order as female monastics.” [574] With an undaunted will, Ven. Ānanda made similar requests for the second time, for the third time, but received the same words of discouragement from the Buddha.

Ven. Ānanda thought of a new approach, after failure to obtain permission for admission of womenfolk to this Dispensation of the Dhamma-Vinaya for three times, and accordingly went to the Buddha and addressed him: “Most exalted Buddha, could womenfolk become noble persons (ariya) ranging from the fruition stage of a Stream-enterer, Once-returner, Non-returner and Arahāt, by leading the life of female monastics within the framework of the Dhamma-Vinaya?”

Whereupon, the Buddha replied: “Ānanda, womenfolk could become noble persons ranging from the fruition stage of a Stream-enterer, Once-returner, Non-returner and Arahāt, by leading the life of female monastics within the framework of the Dhamma-Vinaya.”

“Most exalted Buddha, if womenfolk are capable of attaining the four stages of the attainment by way of their being female monastics within the framework of the Dhamma-Vinaya, may I submit a case that is worthy of the Realised One’s sympathetic consideration in support of my request: Most exalted Buddha, Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī had rendered great service to you besides being your step-mother. She was responsible for feeding and nursing you and for your physical and mental well-being ever since the time of your birth. She used to tidy you up by showering you with scented water twice a day. Indeed, she was exclusively responsible for feeding you with the milk that flowed from her breast.”

Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī gave birth to Prince Nanda a few days after Mahā Māyā Devī had given birth to the Bodhisatta. She entrusted her own child, Nanda, to the care of wet nurses, and she volunteered to act as wet nurse and caretaker to the Bodhisatta; hence this additional weight applied to his request.

“Most exalted Buddha, I humbly pray for the favour of granting permission for womenfolk to receive ordination as female monastics within this framework of the Dhamma-Vinaya.”

Eight Special Rules

The Buddha finally acceded to Ven. Ānanda's entreaties, saying: "Ānanda, if Mahā Pajāpatī accepts the eight special rules (garu-dhamma), let such acceptance mean her admission to the Saṅgha. The eight special rules are:

1. A female monastic, even if she enjoys a seniority of 100 years in the Saṅgha, must worship, welcome with raised clasped hands and pay respect to a male monastic, even though he may have been a monastic only for a day. This rule is to be strictly adhered to for life.
2. A female monastic must not keep her rains-residence at a place that is not close to one occupied by male monastics. This rule is also to be strictly adhered to for life.
3. Every fortnight, a nun must do two things: Ask the Saṅgha for the Observance day (Uposatha) and approach the Saṅgha for instruction and admonition. This rule is also to be strictly adhered to for life.
4. When the rains-residence period is over, a nun must attend the Invitation (Pavāraṇā) ceremony at both of the male and female monastic assemblies, in each of which she must invite criticism on what has been seen, what has been heard or what has been suspected of her. This rule is also to be strictly adhered to for life.
5. A female monastic who has committed an offence Requiring a Meeting of the Saṅgha (Saṅghādisesa) must undergo penance for a half-month (pakkha-mānatta) in both assemblies of the male and female monastics. This rule is also to be strictly adhered to for life.
6. A female monastic must arrange for ordination by both assemblies of male and female monastics for a woman novice only after two year's probationary training under her in the observance of six training practices. This rule is also to be strictly adhered to for life. [575]
7. A female monastic should not revile a male monastic for any reason whatsoever. This rule is also to be strictly adhered to for life.
8. Female monastics are prohibited from exhorting or admonishing monastics with effect from today; but male monastics can exhort female monastics when and where necessary. This rule is also to be strictly adhered to for life.

23a: The 5th Rains Retreat (Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī) – 791

These are the eight special rules. If Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī accepts the eight special rules, let such acceptance mean her admission to the Saṅgha.”

The Buddha thus permitted the establishment of the female Saṅgha after expounding the eight special rules for their guidance.

Ven. Ānanda learned the eight special rules from the Buddha and returned to Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī at the gate and told her what had transpired at his meeting with the Buddha: “Great step-mother, if you accept the eight special rules, such acceptance means your admission to the Saṅgha. He then explained the rules as given to him by the Buddha above, and then he said: “Great step-mother, you can count yourself as one who has been duly admitted to the Saṅgha of female monastics, the moment you adhere strictly to these eight special rules.”

Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī responded: “Ven. Ānanda, just as a young maiden who is in the habit of decorating herself with flowers, with her hair washed and brushed, or a man in like manner, would eagerly receive lilies, jasmine or other flowers, with outstretched hands, for planting on their heads if and when offered; so also I am prepared to adhere to the eight special rules (garudhamma), with great delight and due respect till I breathe my last.

Thereupon, Ven. Ānanda approached the Buddha again with profound respect and stood at a suitable distance and addressed him thus: “Most exalted Realised One, Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī has vowed to adhere strictly to the eight special rules as laid down, with due diligence and respect up to the end of her life.”

Her enthusiastic acceptance of the eight special rules constituted automatic admission to the Saṅgha; she became a nun without formal ordination in a boundary hall (sīma). Such procedure of admission into the Saṅgha is known as the higher ordination through taking up the eight special rules (aṭṭha-garu-dhamma-pañiggahaṇa-upasampadā).

Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī went to the Buddha and sat at a suitable distance with due respect and asked: “Exalted Buddha, what should I do with the 500 princesses of royal blood?” He gave her certain instructions. She left after hearing the Dhamma and paying respects to him.

Then the Buddha told the monastics about his instructions to Mahā Pajāpatī and laid down the following rules: “Monastics, I give permission to monastics to help in ordination of female candidates to become female monastics.”

23a: The 5th Rains Retreat (Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī) – 792

The monastics proceeded to help in the ordination of the 500 royal princesses with Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī as their preceptor (upajjhāya). They were known as ordained on one side (ekato upasampannā) there being insufficient number of female monastics to participate jointly with monastics in the ordination ceremony.

When the ordination ceremony was over, Mahā Pajāpatī Gotamī attained fruition stage of Awakening through hearing the Discourse: ‘In Brief’ (Saṅkhitta-sutta, AN 8.53), and the 500 female monastics [576] attained according to their wishes, ranging from Stream-enterer, Once-returner, Non-returner and Arahāt through hearing the Discourse giving Nandaka’s Advice (Nandakovāda-sutta, MN 146).

The ordination of distinguished female monastics, such as Princess Yasodharā, Princess Janapadakalyāṇī, Queen Khemā, Dhammadinnā, the wife of a rich man, Bhaddakapila, will be described separately when we come to chapter 44, The Life Stories of the Nuns.

23b: The 5th Year (Saccaka)

Victory over the Wandering Ascetic Saccaka

The Buddha conquered the wandering ascetic Saccaka while taking up residence at Kūṭāgāra monastery in the Great Wood near Vesālī. An account of this wandering ascetic, Saccaka, will be reproduced here from the Short Birth Story about the King of Kāliṅga (Cūḷa-kāliṅga-jātaka, Ja 301) and the Short Discourse about Saccaka (Cūḷa-saccaka-sutta, MN 35) and their commentaries.

A long time ago, 7,707 descendents of the Licchavī royal family of Vesālī took turns to rule the country. All those royal descendents were very much inclined to investigate into various ascetic views prevailing at that time. Once, a wandering mendicant, who professed 500 views, arrived in Vesālī. These royal descendents held him in high esteem and treated him well. A female mendicant, who also professed 500 views, arrived in the country of Vesālī at about the same time.

The descendents of the royal family arranged a debate between the two mendicants. The debate ended in a draw as one could not defeat the other since they were equally matched. A peculiar idea struck the Licchavīs: “Should the two be united in marriage, we could expect of them an offspring of great talent.” So they persuaded them to remain in their country without taking the trouble of wandering about. They treated them with respect and arranged for their maintenance. As years rolled by, the couple produced four daughters and one son. The names of the daughters were Saccā, Lolā, Avadhārikā and Paṭicchādā, and that of the son was Saccaka.

According to the commentary on the Short Discourse about Saccaka (Cūḷa-saccaka-sutta, MN 35) the names of the daughters were Saccā, Lolā, Paṭācārā and Ācāravatī.

When they came of age, they were given instructions on views held by their parents: 500 paternal and 500 maternal views, a total of 1,000.

Special parental advice was also given to the four daughters: “My dear daughters, if you find anyone who can refute your views, you might offer yourself as his wife if he is a layman; should he, however, happen to be a monastic, you might lead a homeless life under him.”

After the death of their parents, the wanderer Saccaka, being more intelligent than his four elder sisters, studied more and more unorthodox views in addition to the 1,000 that he had inherited from his late parents. Without wandering forth he resided in Vesālī and gave instructions to the young royal princes. Fearing that his belly, which was full of wisdom, might burst at any moment, he had it wrapped up with iron plates.

His elder sisters held the view that Jambudīpa was conspicuous through the presence of the rose-apple tree (jambu). So they used to carry rose-apple flowers and fresh leaves as they moved from town to town in search of rivals in the matter of doctrinal views. They used to plant a few branches of a rose-apple tree on a heap of sand or earth at the entrance to a town, announcing: “Anyone capable of refuting our views can trample it down,” by way of a challenge, before they entered the town.

As they wandered from place to place, they eventually arrived at Sāvaththī. Here, again, they planted a branch of rose-apple at the gate and made an announcement: “Anyone, whether a lay or a monastic, who can refute our ideology, can trample down this heap of earth and this branch of the rose-apple with his feet.” They left their word with the children whom they found loitering round the gate, and went into the town.

Ven. Sāriputta’s Intellectual Power

On that day, the chief disciple, Ven. Sāriputta, went for his usual round of receiving food fairly late in the morning, as he had been sweeping certain places in the [577] monastery, filling pots with drinking water and nursing the sick within the precincts of the Jetavana monastery. As he reached the gate, he came upon those branches of rose-apple. He, therefore, asked the nearby children about the strange spectacle. They gave a full account of it to Ven. Sāriputta.

Ven. Sāriputta asked them to trample down the rose-apple branches. The boys replied: “Reverend Sir, we dare not do it, we are afraid...” Ven. Sāriputta urged them again by saying a few words of encouragement: “Boys, don’t be afraid; should they ask you as to who ordered you, just let them know that I, Sāriputta, the chief disciple of the Buddha, asked you to do it, and tell them also that if they want to challenge me in debate, they should come to the Jetavana monastery.” The boys summoned their courage and trampled down the rose-apple branches as instructed. Ven. Sāriputta went on his round and having received alms, returned to the monastery. When the four sisters came out of the town, they asked the boys: “Who has asked you to trample down our rose-apple branches?” They told them all about it.

The four women went back into the town, each moving along a different route, announcing: “We heard that the chief disciple of the Buddha, known as Sāriputta, is ready to engage in a debate with us. Those wishing to hear the debate come along.” Many people came out and went along with them to the Jetavana monastery.

Ven. Sāriputta felt that presence of womenfolk in the residential area of monastics was not permissible, and so he went to the central part of the precincts of the monastery to meet them. On arrival, the womenfolk asked: “Did you ask the boys to trample down our rose-apple branch?” – “Yes, I did,” was the reply. Those women then challenged Ven. Sāriputta to a debate on views. Ven. Sāriputta accepted their challenge and asked them as to who should start the questioning. They replied: “The onus of questioning rests with us.” To which Ven. Sāriputta said: “Yes, you, being womenfolk, shall start the questioning.”

The four women took positions, one on each of the four sides, and thrust a barrage of questions, 1,000 in number, which they had learnt from their parents. Ven. Sāriputta gave prompt answers to every one of their questions, just like cutting off the stalk of a lily with a double-edged sword, leaving no problem unsolved. He then invited more questions from the four women, who being subdued, replied: “Most reverend Sir, we know this much only.”

Ven. Sāriputta then said: “Well, wanderers, I have answered all the 1,000 questions that you have asked, and now I will ask you only one question and how will you answer it?” Knowing by now somewhat about Ven. Sāriputta’s standing, they dared not reply courageously: “Please do, Ven. Sāriputta, we will answer your questions,” but, instead, they said meekly: “Reverend sir, please do. We will answer if we can.” Before putting forward his question, Ven. Sāriputta made it plain to them that the question which he was about to ask was not of a higher standard but one meant for prospective novices who have to learn them after becoming novices and he asked this question: Ekam nāma kim?, “What is one?”

The four ascetic women could not make head or tail of the problem. Ven. Sāriputta asked them: “Heretics, answer the question,” and they admitted their inability: “Reverend sir, we have not the vaguest idea of the answer.” Ven.

Sāriputta told them: “Now I have answered your 1,000 questions, while you cannot answer a single question of mine, who then is the victor and who are the vanquished?”

Their reply was: “Reverend sir, you are the conqueror and we are the conquered.” Ven. Sāriputta asked: “What will you do in such circumstances?” They told Ven. Sāriputta of what their parents had asked them to do in the event of their defeat, and expressed their desire to receive ordination under the patronage of Ven. Sāriputta.

Ven. Sāriputta then gave them this instruction: “This is not the right place for you womenfolk to receive ordination and you will be best advised to go to the monasteries of the [578] female monastics with our introduction and ask to be ordained there.” Accordingly, they went to the monasteries of the female monastics with the introduction of Ven. Sāriputta and received ordination. They received ordination under the patronage of the elder Uppalavaṇṇā, according to the Birth Stories (Jātaka) commentary. They became Arahats within a short period of time through mindful, earnest effort in the practice of the path.

The Buddha expounded an account of this episode in the Short Birth Story about the King of Kāliṅga (Cūḷa-kāliṅga-jātaka, Ja 301). For further particulars, please refer to the commentary thereon. This episode happened only when the Buddha was taking up residence at Jetavana monastery of Sāvathī, some time after the establishing of the female Saṅgha with the Buddha’s approval and also in compliance with Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī’s express request when he was residing in Great Wood, Vesālī. This interesting episode has connections with the story of the wanderer Saccaka, hence its exposition here.

The Story of the Wanderer Saccaka

As narrated above, the four women ascetics had a younger brother called Saccaka, who was acting as an instructor of the royal princes of Vesālī. It was during the period when the Buddha was staying at the Kūṭāgāra monastery in Great Wood, near Vesālī, that wanderer Saccaka, pupil of the sectarian Nigaṇṭha, was proclaiming himself as one skilled in debating, one who was very learned; and people also took him to be a holy person.

He boasted to the Vesālī citizens: “I have never come across any person claiming to have monastic followers, a sectarian, a sectarian leader, ascetic or Brahmin (samaṇa-brāhmaṇa) or one worthy of homage, a Perfectly Self-Awakened Buddha, who could resist without perspiring from their arm-pits when I refute and rebuke them on the ground of views. Even senseless logs or wooden blocks could not remain unshaken when I talk about things in terms of views, let alone living creatures!”

Wanderer Saccaka was, in fact, going about the city and boasting about himself as one who was out to find faults with the ascetic Gotama. One morning, as he was strolling about and taking walking exercise, he noticed Ven. Assaji on his alms round at a distance.

He thought to himself: “I am a person who has been contemplating how to debate with ascetic Gotama’s teaching though I cannot do it yet, since I have no means of knowing his views. I must therefore try to get to know his views before I challenge him in a proper manner. Ven. Assaji is well versed in ascetic Gotama’s views and I should make him declare their doctrine firmly before I can find fault with Gotama and rebuke him.”

He approached Ven. Assaji with that end in view, and entered into conversation with him after exchanging friendly greetings: “Assaji, how does ascetic Gotama exhort his disciples? In how many ways does he give them instructions in minute detail?”

Whereupon, Ven. Assaji explained it to him in this way: “Descendent of Aggivessana, wanderer Saccaka, the Buddha exhorts his disciples in this manner. He gives detailed instructions in various ways, such as: ‘Monastics, corporeality (rūpa) is impermanent, sensation is impermanent, perception is impermanent, volitions are impermanent, sixfold consciousness is impermanent. Corporeality is not self, sensation is not self, perception is not self, volitions are not self, sixfold consciousness is not self (atta). All conditioned things are not permanent; all things (dhamma) are without self.’ O descendent of Aggivessana, wanderer Saccaka, the Buddha had exhorted his disciples in this way. He had given many detailed instructions in various ways.” The above is Ven. Assaji’s reply to the heretic Saccaka’s query.

Points of special interest which are worthy to note: From the foregoing statement, it will be seen that, in his reply to Saccaka’s query, Ven. Assaji mentioned the [579] facts of impermanence and unsubstantiality or non-self, but nothing was said about the fact of suffering. The reason for the omission of the fact of suffering has been explained in the commentary as follows: Had Ven. Assaji mentioned corporeality is suffering, sensation is suffering, perception is suffering, volitions are suffering, sixfold consciousness is suffering, Saccaka might have got a chance for disputation. This is because, figuratively speaking, path and fruition are regarded as suffering (saṅkhāra-dukkha). Hence, the omission of the fact of suffering.

Otherwise, Saccaka would have asked: “Assaji what is the object of your receiving ordination?” Then Ven. Assaji’s reply would be: “For the sake of the paths and fruitions.” In such a case, he would be exposed to censure: “Assaji, your Dispensation (Sāsana), after all, does not lead to emancipation, in reality, your so-called Dispensation simply is a place of oppression and destruction; your so-called Dispensation is a kind of hell plane of misery! Therefore, your minds are void of desire for joy. Indeed, you all have been wandering round striving anxiously after suffering.” It was for this reason that Ven. Assaji had purposely avoided the employment of the figurative term (pariyāya), and adopted the abstract term (nippariyāya) that could not have another meaning, hence the exclusive presentation of impermanence (anicca) and unsubstantiality (anatta).

Whereupon, Saccaka said: “Assaji what improper things do I hear? We have heard what ascetic Gotama has been teaching. Perhaps we could meet with honourable Gotama sometime when there might be some discussion. Perhaps we could then rid him of this evil view.”

At that time the 500 Licchavī princes were assembled at the Assembly Hall to transact some business. Saccaka thought to himself: “I was unable to decry the views of ascetic Gotama in the past because of not knowing anything about it. Now, I have learnt about it from his great disciple Assaji, and I know them fully well, I had better go to his place and reproach him for his views.”

He went first to the Assembly Hall where his 500 Licchavī princes were holding a meeting. He bid them to come out from the chamber, shouting: “Come forth, honourable Licchavīs! Come forth, honourable Licchavīs! Today, there will be a discussion between ascetic Gotama and myself about his view. It is going to be a grand show! Assaji, one of the five monastics and a well-known disciple of ascetic Gotama, has stood firmly on the view of impermanence and unsubstantiality. If ascetic Gotama also stands firm on the same view of impermanence and unsubstantiality:

Just as a powerful man taking hold of a long fleeced ram by its fleece, might pull, push and pull it about, even so will I pull and push and pull ascetic Gotama about with my arguments and refutations of his view.

Just as a powerful workman of a liquor shop, taking a big mat from the liquor shop, might throw it into a deep lake and seizing it by the corner, might pull it, push it, and shake it, even so, will I pull, push and shake ascetic Gotama about with my arguments and refutations of his view.

Just as a powerful drunkard, taking hold of a liquor strainer by its edge, might shake it up, shake it down, and toss it about, even so, will I shake up, shake down and toss about ascetic Gotama with arguments and refutations of his view.

Just as an elephant, which gets infirm only when it is sixty years old, might get down into a deep pond and play the game of washing hemp, even so, will I play with ascetic Gotama the game of washing hemp with my arguments and my refutations of his view.

When hemp stalks are in the process of being transformed into fibres, they are made into bundles and dipped in the water for softening. After three days, when they are soft and pliant, workmen come with provisions, such as drinks and edibles, for enjoyment when the work is over. They take hold of bunches of hemp [580] and strike them hard against the planks laid on their right, left and front in turn, while they enjoy food and drink.

The royal elephant, imitating the action of hemp workers, goes deep into the pond and drawing water with its trunk, blows it on its head, on its back, on either side of its body, and in between its thighs. Hence the term, (sāṇadhovika) playing the game of washing hemp.

“Licchavī princes come forth, come forth. Today there will be a debate between me and ascetic Gotama on his view. It’s going to be a grand show!” Thus Saccaka invited his disciples.

Among the Licchavī princes there were those who expressed their conviction that: “The ascetic Gotama is not capable of refuting the views of Saccaka, it is Saccaka who will be able to refute the view of the ascetic Gotama;” and those who said: “What kind of a man is Saccaka that he will be able to refute the Buddha? It is the Buddha who will be able to refute Saccaka.”

Then Saccaka made his way towards the Kūṭāgāra monastery in the company of the 500 Licchavī princes. It was noon then and many monastics were walking to and fro to repulse sloth and torpor after having rich food.

In other words, these monastics were meditators in the day time (divā padhānika), who usually took a walk to and fro to expose themselves to the sun at noon and then bathed. They found this practice most helpful in developing concentration in their meditation.

Saccaka approached these monastics and asked: “Friends where does the honourable Gotama take residence at the present moment? We would like to see him.”

Early at dawn on that day, the Buddha, after abiding in the attainment of great compassion (mahā-karuṇā-samāpatti), looked into the 10,000 world-element and perceived through his omniscience, that Saccaka would be coming along with many Licchavī princes to rebuke him concerning his view. Therefore, he took his bath early in the morning and went out for receiving alms, accompanied by the monks. On return, he did not go into the scented chamber but went straight into the Great Wood and sat under a shady tree for the convenience of the visiting crowd, led by the heretic Saccaka.

Those monks whom Saccaka had contacted were meditating monks who had just returned from the Buddha. They, therefore readily replied indicating with their clasped palms pointing towards the Buddha, saying: “Saccaka, the Buddha is sitting under a tree in the Great Wood to spend the day.”

Thereupon, Saccaka went into Great Wood in the company of a huge mass of people. He approached the Buddha, and after a cordial exchange of greetings with him, he sat down at a suitable spot.

It should be noted that in addition to the 500 Licchavī princes who were his disciples, a huge crowd was following him, consisting of numerous citizens of Vesālī who were interested to witness the debate between the two distinguished personalities.

Those who came along with Saccaka may be divided into five categories: 1) Some people paid homage to the Buddha and sat in suitable places; 2) some exchanged greetings with him, saying words that would remain always fresh in their hearts throughout their lives, and sat in suitable places; 3) some bowed with palms together towards him and sat in suitable places; 4) some announced their names and lineage and sat in suitable places; 5) some simply sat down in silence.

Having sat down at a suitable distance, Saccaka addressed the Buddha: “May I, with your approval, submit a question concerning a certain subject?” the Buddha replied: “Ask, Aggivessana, whatever you like.”

This is the sort of invitation to questions, peculiar to Fully Self-Awakened Buddhas, and beyond the range of Paccekabuddhas and disciples (sāvaka).

Saccaka started questioning: “Honourable Gotama, how do you exhort your disciples? What part of your many teachings is most emphasised for your disciples?”

To which the Buddha replied: “Descendent of Aggivessana, wanderer Saccaka, I exhort my disciples in this [581] manner, this part of the many teachings is most emphasised for my disciples: ‘Monastics, corporeality is impermanent, sensation is impermanent, perception is impermanent, volitions are impermanent, sixfold consciousness is impermanent. Monastics corporeality is not self, sensation is not self, perception is not self, volitions are not self, sixfold consciousness is not self (atta). All conditioned things are impermanent; all conditioned and unconditioned things (dhamma) are not self (atta).’ O descendent of Aggivessana, Wanderer Saccaka, this is how I exhort my disciples; this part of the many teachings is what I give most emphasis to for my disciples.”

Saccaka said: “A simile occurs to me.”

The Buddha then told him: “Descendent of Aggivessana, reveal it boldly and vividly.”

Saccaka said: “Just as seeds and trees cannot grow without depending and resting on the earth that affords support; or just as a manual worker cannot accomplish his task without depending and resting upon the earth that affords support, O honourable Gotama, even so, this individual person produces merit or demerit based on corporeality that is self (atta); this individual person produces merit and demerit based on feelings that are self; this individual person produces merit or demerit based on perception that is self; this individual person produces merit or demerit based on volitions that are self; this individual person produces merit or demerit based on the sixfold consciousness that is self.” Thus Saccaka presented his view on self (atta) by way of similes.

He had likened the fivefold aggregate to the earth; sentient beings are dependent on the fivefold aggregates like the earth. They produce merit or demerit based on the fivefold aggregates.

Saccaka further said: “The honourable Gotama has thus discarded the very evident and manifest self and declared it to be non-self (anatta).” Thus Saccaka presented his soul theory firmly supported by similes.

The supporting similes presented by Saccaka are notable, quite valid and firm. With the exception of the Fully Self-Awakened Buddhas, there is no one capable of refuting his criticism and condemning his soul theory. In fact, there are two types of people: 1) Those who are tractable by Fully Self-Awakened Buddhas only and 2) those who are tractable by disciples (sāvaka). Those in the second category can be corrected by the Buddhas and the disciples, but those in the first category can be guided by the Buddhas alone. Wanderer Saccaka belonged to the first category and could be instructed only by the Buddha.

The Buddha had, therefore, decided to personally rectify and refute his view: “The descendent of Aggivessana, Saccaka, do you say that corporeality is self (atta), that feelings are self, that perception is self, that volitions are self, that the sixfold consciousness is self?”

Saccaka came to realize then that: “The ascetic Gotama has put me in difficulty, making me declare, confirm and admit my self theory (atta-vāda) in the presence of an audience. Should anything untoward happen, I alone will be condemned for my self theory,” and thinking of citing the people of Vesālī as co-adherents of self, he replied: “Honourable Gotama, indeed, I do say: ‘Corporeality is self, feelings are self, perception is self, volitions are self, the sixfold consciousness is self, and the general mass of citizens of Vesālī also say this.’”

The Buddha, being 100,000 times superior to Saccaka in matters of views, would not let him make other people share the same fate with him. Instead, he would make his conquest over Saccaka alone, and said to him: “Saccaka what has the great mass of people to do with this? I urge you, Saccaka, to explain your view.”

What the Buddha meant to say was this: “Not all of these people are out to refute my view. You are the only one who has come to refute my view. They are here because you [582] have invited them to witness the debate. The onus of expressing the view rests with you, and don’t let them share the same fate with you.”

Saccaka was thus pressed to repeat his own view: “Honourable Gotama .... Indeed, I do say: ‘Corporeality is self, feelings are self, perception is self, volitions are self, the sixfold consciousness is self.’”

After causing Saccaka to explain his own view, the Buddha proceeded to ask: “Saccaka, since you have admitted that the fivefold aggregates are self, I will ask you in turn about this. Answer me as you wish. Saccaka, what do you think of the question I am about to ask? Would an anointed king like Pasenadi Kosala, or the crowned King Ajātasattu, ruler of Magadha, son of Queen Vedehi, have the power in their respective realm to order the execution of one deserving to be put to death, to order the confiscation of one whose property deserves to be confiscated and to banish one deserving of banishment?”

In answer to the above question, Saccaka replied: “Honourable Gotama, a king like Pasenadi Kosala, or the crowned King Ajātasattu, ruler of Magadha, son of Queen Vedehi, have the power in their respective realm to order the execution of one deserving to be put to death, to order the confiscation of one whose property to be confiscated and to banish one deserving of banishment. O honourable Gotama, even those federations like the Vajjis or Mallas have power in their respective realm to order the execution of one deserving to be put to death, to order the confiscation of one whose property deserves to be confiscated and to banish one deserving of banishment. What more need we say of an anointed king such as King Pasenadi of Kosala or King Ajātasattu of the kingdom of Magadha, the son of Queen Vedehi? He would have the power, Gotama, he deserves to have the power.”

The Buddha had purposely brought Saccaka to state this in order to completely crush his self theory (atta-vāda). Saccaka being unwise had even gone to the extent of “sharpening the weapon meant for his own execution,” by mentioning the governments of the Vajjis and Mallas in support of his statement.

“Saccaka, how do you like the question I am about to ask? You have said: ‘Corporeality is self.’ If so, can you cause that self to obey your words, saying: ‘Let my corporeality be thus; let my corporeality not be thus?’ When the Buddha asked in such a point blank manner, Saccaka remained completely silent.

Saccaka had discovered his grave mistake. He thought to himself: “The ascetic Gotama had brought about the destruction of my view. I was foolish enough to have created a chance for ascetic Gotama to defeat me at my own game. I have been ruined beyond redemption. In case I say: 'I can prevail my power upon my corporeality,' the Licchavī princes would stand up and rebuke me for my ugly body compared with their own beautiful, admirable bodies which resemble those of celestial beings of Tāvātimsa. In case I choose to say: 'I do not have power over my body,' ascetic Gotama would stand up and rebuke me: 'Saccaka you already have said that you have control over your body, and now you have retracted your own statement.' ” He had placed him on the horns of a dilemma. He therefore kept complete silence.

For the second time the Buddha asked Saccaka to answer the same question: “How do you like the question I am about to ask? You have said: ‘Corporeality is self.’ If so, can you cause it to obey your words, saying: ‘Let my corporeality be thus; let my corporeality not be thus?’ ”

Saccaka remained completely silent, and did not answer the Buddha’s question for the second time.

If no answer was given to a reasonable question put by a Fully Self-Awakened Buddha for three times in succession, it constitutes a grave act [583] against the Buddha, and the offender’s head is liable to be split into seven parts, according to a principle law of nature (dhamma-niyāma).

Fully Self-Awakened Buddhas had fulfilled the perfections (pāramī) for four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons, out of great compassion for all beings, and, as such, the Buddha did not repeat the question for the third time, but changed the subject of discussion: “Saccaka, speak up now. This is not the time for you to keep silent. The head of one who does not answer a Buddha’s reasonable question for three times in succession is liable to have his head split into seven parts spontaneously.”

Then Sakka could not help coming to the scene under the guise of a Yakkha holding a burning, blazing, flaming thunderbolt and stood right on top of Saccaka’s head, as though threatening to punish him should he fail to answer the Buddha’s reasonable question for three times, but this strange spectacle was visible only to the Buddha and Saccaka, no one else could see it.

According to the sub-commentary Sakka had come holding a thunderbolt in his hand and stood above Saccaka. Sakka has great compassion for him, like the Buddha, and wanted to persuade him to give up his wrong views by threatening him in the guise of a terrible Yakkha wielding a thunderbolt. He made his appearance, not because he actually wanted to do harm to Saccaka but because no untoward mishap to anyone should ever occur in the presence of a Buddha.

23b: The 5th Year (Saccaka) – 805

According to the commentary the reason why Sakka came under the guise of a Yakkha was that, he had a desire to cause Saccaka to turn over a new leaf and accept right view. Sakka was in the company of Brahma Sahampati when the latter approached the Buddha with a formal request to preach the Dhamma. Both of them requested the Buddha to preach the Dhamma, and they, on their part, undertook to see to it that reluctant people are persuaded to act according to his instructions: “Let yours be the authority of the Dhamma, and ours will be the law of temporal authority,” hence the appearance of Sakka under the guise of a Yakkha in fulfilment of his undertaking.

When Saccaka saw Sakka under the guise of a Yakkha, his body perspired profusely through fright, beads of sweat came streaming down, and waves of air swirled round in his stomach. He looked around to see if there was any one also witnessing the strange phenomenon and saw none. He thought it would be unwise to shout out “a great Yakkha” when no one saw it, and would be like creating a chance for the people to turn against him saying: “We also have eyes but you are the only one seeing a Yakkha. You see it only because you dispute with ascetic Gotama.” He was so shaken that his hair stood on end and goose flesh developed all over his body. He found no one but the Buddha to take refuge in, and seeking shelter, protection and refuge only in the Buddha, he thus spoke to the Buddha: “Be pleased to ask me, honourable Gotama; I will answer.”

The Buddha asked him: “Saccaka, how do you like the question I am about to ask? You have said: ‘Corporeality is self.’ If so, do you have power over that corporeality and can you say: ‘Let my corporeality be thus; let my corporeality be not thus?’ ”

Saccaka replied: “Honourable Gotama, I do not have the power.” Then the Buddha warned him: “Saccaka, think it over again, ponder it over again before you give an answer. What you have said before does not agree with what you have just said; and what you have just said does not agree with what you said before. They do not corroborate one another,” and he proceeded to ask him again: “Saccaka, how do you like the question I am about to ask? You have said: ‘Feelings are self.’ If so, do you have power over those feelings and can you say: ‘Let my feelings be thus; let my feelings be not thus?’ ” Saccaka replied: “Honourable Gotama, I do not have the power.”

Then the Buddha warned him: “Saccaka, think it over again, ponder over it again before you give an answer. What you have said before does not agree with what you have just [584] said; and what you have just said does not agree with what you said before. They do not corroborate one another,” and he proceeded to ask: “Saccaka, how do you like the question I am about to ask? You have said: ‘Perception is self.’ If so, do you have power over that perception and can you say: ‘Let my perception be thus; let my perception be not thus?’ ” Saccaka replied: “Honourable Gotama, I do not have the power.”

Then the Buddha warned him: “Saccaka, think it over again, ponder over it again before you give an answer. What you said before does not agree with what you have just said; and what you have just said does not agree with what you said before. They do not corroborate one another,” and he proceeded to ask: “Saccaka, how do you like the question I am about to ask? You have said: ‘Volitions are self.’ If so, do you have power over those volitions and can you say: ‘Let my volitions be thus; let my volitions be not thus?’ Saccaka replied: “Honourable Gotama, I do not have the power.”

Then the Buddha warned him: “Saccaka, think it over again, ponder over it again before you give an answer. What you said before does not agree with what you have just said; and what you have just said does not agree with what you said before. They do not corroborate one another,” and he proceeded to ask: “Saccaka how do you like the question I am about to ask? You have said: ‘The sixfold consciousness is self.’ If so, do you have power over that sixfold consciousness and can you say: ‘Let my sixfold consciousness be thus; let my sixfold consciousness be not thus?’ Saccaka replied: “Honourable Gotama, I do not have the power.”

Then the Buddha warned him: “Saccaka, think it over again, ponder over it again before you give an answer. What you said before does not agree with what you have just said; and what you have just said does not agree with what you said before. They do not corroborate one another.”

The Buddha continued to exhort Saccaka by expounding a discourse which involves questioning and answering three times (te-parivatta-dhamma-desanā).

“Saccaka what do you think of this? Is corporeality permanent or impermanent?” Saccaka answered: “Impermanent, Gotama.” – “That which is impermanent, is it suffering (dukkha) or pleasant (sukha)?” – “It is suffering, Gotama.” – “Would it be proper to consider that this corporeality, which is impermanent, suffering and subject to change as: ‘This corporeality is mine through clinging, this corporeality is I through conceit, or this is self through wrong view?’ – ‘Saccaka answered: ‘Gotama, it is indeed not proper.’

‘Wanderer Saccaka, what do you think of this? Is sensation permanent or impermanent? Is perception permanent or impermanent? Are volitions permanent or impermanent? Saccaka, how do you think of the question that I am about to ask. Are the six kinds of consciousness permanent or impermanent?’ Saccaka answered: ‘Ven. Gotama they are impermanent.’ – ‘That which is impermanent, is it suffering or pleasant?’ – ‘It is suffering, Gotama.’ Would it be proper to consider the six kinds of consciousness, which are impermanent, suffering and subject to change as: ‘This consciousness is mine through clinging, this consciousness is I through conceit, this consciousness is self through wrong view.’ Saccaka answered: ‘Gotama, it is indeed not proper.’

Just as an expert snake charmer caused the snake concerned to suck its venom out of the bitten part of the body of the victim, even so the Buddha had caused Saccaka to admit, by his own mouth, the fact that the five aggregates (khanda) are impermanent, suffering and insubstantial, [585] and not permanent, pleasant and substantial as he had previously maintained by the word of his mouth and in the presence of the same audience, which comprised the Licchavī princes.

The venom, that is, the false view of the soul (atta), which had appeared out of the mouth of Saccaka, he made to be sucked out by the same mouth of Saccaka and an admission to be uttered that it is not self (anatta), in the presence of the audience.

In this manner the Buddha had Saccaka definitely admit that the five aggregates are impermanent, suffering and insubstantial in the presence of throngs of people, and being desirous of subduing him to accept the truth with his head hanging down, the Buddha went on to ask: ‘Heretic Saccaka, how would you like the question that I am about to ask? When a person clings to suffering (dukkha), adheres to suffering, cleaves to suffering and considers the suffering of the fivefold aggregates as: ‘This suffering is mine through clinging; this suffering is I through conceit and this suffering is self through wrong view,’ could he himself accurately understand suffering? Could he abide in the complete cessation of suffering?’

Saccaka answered: “Honourable Gotama, how could it be possible! It is an impossibility!” Whereupon, the Buddha went on to ask: “Wanderer Saccaka, how do you think of the question I am about to ask? If that is so, clinging to that suffering of the five aggregates, attached to that suffering of the five aggregates, cleaving to that suffering of the five aggregates, do you not hold wrong view, and consider that: ‘This suffering of the five aggregates is mine through clinging, this suffering five aggregates is I through conceit, this suffering five aggregates is self through wrong view.’ In view of all this, are you on the wrong track in respect of view?” Saccaka answered: “Honourable Gotama, how could it not be so! I do consider it so.”

Then the Buddha gave further exhortation to Saccaka: “Saccaka, it is as if a man, desiring heart-wood, seeking heart-wood, and wandering about, might enter the forest with a sharp hatchet. He might see a plantain tree with a straight stem and devoid of a budding stalk. He might cut off the bottom part and then cut off its crown. Then he might peel the bark of the stem. Having peeled the bark of the stem, that man would not even get sap wood, let alone heart-wood. In the same way, Saccaka, as I question and cross-question you for reasons in regard to your view, you prove to be empty, futile and a great failure.

Saccaka, you have been boasting to the citizens of Vesālī, through empty pride thus: “I have never come across such ascetics and Brahmins as Fully Self-Awakened Buddhas, one who could resist me without perspiring from their armpits when I refute and rebuke them on the ground of views; and even senseless logs or wooden blocks could not remain unshaken when I talk about things in terms of views, let alone living beings.”

The Buddha, exposing his golden coloured body to the assembly, then said: “Saccaka, there is no trace of perspiration on my body.”

As a matter of course, a compounded body perspires at one time or the other; hence the Buddha said: “There is no trace of perspiration on my body at the moment.”

As regards the exposition of the golden coloured body it does not mean that the whole body was exposed to view. It is customary among the Buddhas to have the button-knob properly fixed to the button-ring of the robe when they take their seat before an audience. The Buddha, on this occasion, held the robe above the upper part of the throat and dropped just four inches of it to permit the emergence of the golden radiance, whirling round like a stream of liquid gold or flashes of lightning, right round [586] his head, resembling a golden tabor and shooting skywards.

The Buddha did such a thing to dispel doubt, if there was any, on the part of the people. If the Buddha did not disclose the true aspect by exposing his body, certain people might say: “We can see beads of perspiration streaming down Saccaka’s body; ascetic Gotama had said he had no sweat but we cannot know if it is true because his body is completely cloaked in a double robe.”

When the Buddha had said thus, Saccaka sat speechless with a sad look, drooping shoulders and downcast head and at his wit’s end.

Then the Licchavī Prince Dummukha seeing Saccaka speechless with a sad look, drooping shoulders and downcast head and at his wit’s end, addressed the Buddha: “Most exalted Buddha, a simile has occurred to me.” The Buddha urged him: “Dummukha, reveal it.”

Prince Dummukha addressed the Buddha thus: “Most exalted Buddha, there was a pond near a village or a market. A crab was living in that pond. Many boys and girls, coming out from that village or town, might approach the pond and might go down into the pond. Taking the crab out of the water, they might put it on dry ground. And, venerable sir, as often as that crab would thrust out a claw, these boys and girls would cut it, break it and smash it with sticks and potsherds. Just as that crab, with its claws cut, broken and smashed, would be unable to get back into the pond again as before, even so, venerable sir, Saccaka will be unable now to come round to the Buddha to make refutations and assertions as you have cut, broken and smashed all the distorted, conceited and twisted views of Saccaka.”

Whereupon, Saccaka asked Dummukha: “Dummukha, stop it, Dummukha, stop it; you are a person with rough speech; we are not speaking to you, nor are we discussing with you. I have been discussing with Ven. Gotama.” He thus objected to Dummukha’s participation in the conversation.

When other Licchavī princes heard the simile quoted by Prince Dummukha, they remembered the contemptuous treatment they received at the hands of Saccaka while undergoing training under his care. They thought the tables had been turned and it was the most opportune time for them to take revenge on their common enemy by quoting different similes, in the manner of delivering blows to a fallen enemy. So they waited their turn thinking of the similes they would quote.

Saccaka had a presage of what the princes were planning and what was in store for him. He knew: “These princes were impatiently waiting their turn. If each of them gets the chance to come out with his simile, I will never be able to raise my head again in such crowds.” He therefore planned to avoid such a mishap by approaching the Buddha with a request to solve a problem before they could intervene as planned. It was with this intention that he deterred Prince Dummukha from intervention and approached the Buddha with a request.

“Venerable Gotama, please leave aside my words, as well as those of many of the ascetics and Brahmins. Such words may be taken as idle talk. To what extent does a disciple of yours practise according to the teaching, following the instructions and abiding by the teaching of Gotama, having overcome uncertainty, having dispelled all doubts, having gained the courage of conviction. Is he no longer dependent on others in matters of faith?”

The Buddha gave the following answer in compliance with his request:

“Wanderer Saccaka, in this Dispensation, a disciple of mine, who sees any or all corporeality with right understanding as they really are, whether past, future, or present, in oneself or outside oneself, gross or subtle, mean or exalted, far or near, in these eleven different manners, through insight meditation (vipassanā-ñāṇa) and path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa), thus: ‘This corporeality is not I, this corporeality is not mine, this corporeality is not my self (atta) ... all sensation ... all perception ... all volitions ... sees any [587] or all of the sixfold consciousnesses with right understanding as they really are, whether past, future, or present, in oneself or outside oneself, gross or subtle, mean or exalted, far or near, in these eleven different manners, through insight meditation and path-knowledge. Thus, this consciousness is not mine; this consciousness is not I; this consciousness is not my self.’ Wanderer Saccaka, it is to such an extent that a disciple of mine practises according to the teaching, following the instructions and abiding by the teaching, having overcome uncertainty, having dispelled all doubts, having gained the courage of conviction and he is not dependent on others in matters of faith.”

According to the canon, the three lower fruition stages are termed the training grounds (sikkha-bhūmi) for those still in training (sikkha); the canonical term for those who have reached the Arahāt fruition stage is (Arahatta-puggala) or the abode of the noble persons (ariya-puggala).

Herein, the term “sees” signifies a continuing process, not having completed the act of seeing. Although Saccaka was not acquainted with the terms employed in the Dispensation, it occurred to him that “sees” is somewhat short of “realization,” and so he addressed the Buddha again.

“Venerable Gotama, to what extent, and in what manner does a monastic become an Arahāt, having eliminated the pollutants (āśava), having accomplished the path (magga), having done what is to be done, having laid down the burden of the aggregates, defilements and conditioned existence, having attained his goal of the Arahāt fruition (Arahatta-phala), having destroyed all the fetters of existence, and having become emancipated through full comprehension?”

The Buddha replied: “Wanderer Saccaka, in this Dispensation, a disciple of mine, who sees any or all corporeality with right understanding as they really are, whether past, future, or present, in oneself or outside oneself, gross or subtle, mean or exalted, far or near, in these eleven different manners, through insight meditation and path-knowledge thus: ‘This corporeality is not I, this corporeality is not mine, this corporeality is not my self ... all sensation ... all perception ... all volitions ... sees any or all of the sixfold consciousnesses thus: ‘This consciousness is not mine, this consciousness is not my self,’ he becomes emancipated, having no clinging.

Wanderer Saccaka, it is to that extent that a disciple of mine become an Arahāt, having eliminated the pollutants (āśava), having accomplished the path (magga), having done what is to be done, having laid down the burden of the aggregates, defilements and conditioned existence, having attained his goal of the Arahāt fruition (Arahatta-phala), having destroyed all the fetters of existence, and having become emancipated through full comprehension.

Wanderer Saccaka, such a monastic, with the mind thus emancipated becomes endowed with three eminent qualities: eminence in insight, eminence in practice and eminence in emancipation.

Eminence in insight means insight into Nibbāna; eminence in practice means perfect practice, the noble path of eight constituents; eminence in emancipation means the attainment of the Arahāt fruition.

Wanderer Saccaka, a monastic with his mind thus emancipated, reveres, esteems, honours, and venerates the Buddha saying:<sup>203</sup>

Buddho bodhāya desesi, danto yo damathāya ca, samathāya santo dhammaṃ, tinno va taraṇāya ca, nibbuto nibbānatthāya, taṃ lokasaraṇaṃ name. [588]

Our teacher, the Buddha, having gained Awakening with regard to the four noble truths, expounds the Dhamma to enlighten sentient beings. Our teacher, the Buddha, having subdued or tamed himself, expounds the Dhamma to tame sentient beings. Our teacher, the Buddha, having extinguished the flame of the defilements himself, expounds the Dhamma to sentient beings to help them extinguish the flame of their defilements. Our teacher, the Buddha, having crossed over the four great floods (ogha) of sensual desire, rebirth, wrong views and ignorance, expounds the Dhamma for crossing over. Our teacher, the Buddha, having achieved the total extinction of the defilements (kilesa), expounds the Dhamma to sentient beings, for the achievement of the total extinction of their defilements.

An Alms-Meal Offered by Saccaka

When the Buddha had thus explained the exalted state of the Arahāt fruition, Saccaka addressed him: “Venerable Gotama, we have, indeed, offended you and were impudent to think that we could dispute your views and refute them. We have tried to disparage you with harsh and discourteous words.

Venerable Gotama, for example, a person might find safety after attacking an elephant in must. But there could be no safety for a man attacking the honourable Gotama.

Venerable Gotama, a man who attacks a blazing mass of fire might find safety but there could be no safety for a man attacking the honourable Gotama.

Venerable Gotama, a man who attacks a dreadful and poisonous snake might find safety, but there could be no safety for a man attacking the honourable Gotama.

<sup>203</sup> [This verse seems to be based on a prose section of the Short Discourse about Saccaka (Cūḷa-saccaka-sutta, MN 35), and may have been composed by Sayādaw himself.]

Venerable Gotama, we have, indeed, offended you and were impudent to think that we could dispute your views and refute them. We have tried to disparage you with harsh and discourteous words.”

Saccaka said, “... there could be no safety for a man attacking the honourable Gotama.” This meant that anyone, who chanced to pass strictures on venerable Gotama in a debate on views, cannot escape from being destroyed and has to depart with his views completely demolished. It should be noted that the Buddha did not cause harm to the life of anyone, like a big elephant, a great bonfire or a venomous snake.

Saccaka had made such a statement, with three similes, not intending to praise the Buddha, but to blow his own trumpet. For example, a king, who had caused the death of an enemy might speak highly of the defeated by remarks, such as: “That man is such a brave and courageous one,” just to glorify his feat of arms.

Saccaka had, in like manner, praised the Buddha, who was difficult to be approached by an ordinary being, by the similes of a big elephant, a great bonfire and a venomous snake, just to show that he was the only wise man with enough courage to have challenged the Buddha to a debate on views.

When Saccaka had thus indirectly praised himself he turned to the Buddha and presented an invitation: “Venerable Gotama, may the honourable Gotama be pleased to accept my offering of an alms meal, together with the community of monastics at my place tomorrow.” The Buddha accepted his invitation by keeping silent.

Saccaka then turned to the Licchavī princes and said: “Let the Licchavī princes listen to me. Venerable Gotama has accepted my invitation to the food offering at my place tomorrow. You might bring whatever you think is suitable for them.” When the night passed, they all brought 500 pots of cooked food to him. Then Saccaka, [589] having made ready sumptuous food, hard and soft at his place, sent a messenger to inform the Buddha: “Honourable Gotama, it is time for the meal; the alms food is ready.”

Then in the morning, the Buddha, having arranged his robes and taking his alms bowl and double robe, went to Saccaka’s place and took the seat prepared for him, together with the community of monastics. Saccaka served, with his own hands, sumptuous food, both hard and soft, to the monastics headed by the Buddha, till they were completely satisfied and could not take any more.

When Saccaka knew that the Buddha had finished taking the meal, he sat down in a suitable place and addressed him: “Gotama, may the main beneficial result accruing from this alms meal (dāna) and the subsidiary consequences of this great offering be for the well-being of the supporters, i.e., the Licchavīs.”

The main beneficial results mean future existence in the form of the five aggregates in the Deva realms, or happy circumstances in the human world; the subsidiary consequences mean wealth, properties, regalia, etc., necessary for sumptuous living conditions.

Saccaka had made such a wish under the impression that only Licchavī princes were entitled to enjoy the fruits of the act of merit, which was performed with the food donated by them. But it was Saccaka himself who should enjoy the reward because he had actually made the offering to the Buddha and the Saṅgha with what he had received from the Licchavī princes.

The Buddha therefore removed his wrong impression by saying: “Wanderer Saccaka, the merit goes to the Licchavī princes for gifts offered to a recipient like you, who is not free from lust, hatred and delusion. Saccaka, the merit goes to you for gifts offered to a recipient like me, who is free from lust, hatred and delusion.” Thus the Buddha impressed upon his mind the idea of consequences of deeds of merit so as to let it become a part of his nature.

Expounding of Mahā Saccaka-sutta

The above is the Short Discourse about Saccaka (Cūla-saccaka-sutta, MN 35). This is not the only discourse that the Buddha had expounded to Saccaka. The Long Discourse about Saccaka (Mahā-saccaka-sutta, MN 36) was also expounded to him at a later date. The Long Discourse about Saccaka deals with two modes of meditation: contemplation of the body and contemplation of the mind, and two types of persons: a bewildered person (sammūḷha-puggala) and one who is without bewilderment (asammūḷha-puggala). For full particulars, please refer to the text.

The Buddha expounded the Short Discourse about Saccaka and the Long Discourse about Saccaka. The former is as long as a section for recitation (bhāṇavāra), while the Long Discourse about Saccaka is as long as one and a half sections for recitation. In spite of these long discourses and exhortation by the Buddha, Saccaka did not attain any stage of the paths and fruitions nor did he receive ordination. He did not take refuge in the Three Treasures either. A question might be asked as to why then the Buddha taught to him such exhaustive discourses (sutta)?

Ven. Kāḷa Buddhārakkhita

The Buddha taught the discourses to sow the seed of the noble truths in him so as to reap the harvest of the paths and fruitions, in due course. This is an explanation in detail: The Buddha perceived that Saccaka lacked sufficing conditions for the attainment of the paths and fruitions during his present life time. But he was destined to become an Arahat 200 years after the Buddha's Parinibbāna when the Dispensation would be in full bloom in Śrī Laṅkā. He would be born to the family of a minister of a king. When he came of age he would become a monastic and after learning the Three Baskets (Tipiṭaka) and practising insight meditation (vipassanā) he would attain the Arahat fruition (Arahatta-phala), endowed with the analytic knowledges (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa). He would be popularly known as Ven. Kāḷa Buddhārakkhita. Perceiving his future destiny [590] through his knowledge of the future (anāgata-ñāṇa), the Buddha had instilled into his heart a spark of truth so that it might develop into a natural tendency in due time.

When the Dispensation was in full bloom in Śrī Laṅkā, he would pass away from the celestial plane and he was reborn in the family of a minister at a village that was responsible for the provision of food for a great monastery known as Dakkhiṇagiri. He would receive ordination when he came of age and study the Three Baskets (Tipiṭaka). He eventually rose to the status of a senior monastic in charge of a section of the Saṅgha. He would go to pay homage, in the company of his numerous disciples, to his preceptor, who was responsible for his ordination.

The preceptor would decide to censure his own disciple, Buddhārakkhita, for neglecting the practices necessary for liberation, though he had studied the Three Baskets. The teacher then decided therefore, not to sit face to face with the disciple.

Going to his master's monastery on the following day, Kāḷa Buddhārakkhita would ask his teacher: "Revered sir, now that I have come to see you after completion of the full course of learning the scriptures, I find that you do not seem to have the desire to see me. May I know if there is anything wrong I have done?"

His teacher would answer: “Buddharakkhita, do you think that you have accomplished all the tasks incumbent on a monastic just because you have studied the Five Collections (nikāya) and the Three Baskets?” Whereupon, he would seek for instructions by asking: “Revered sir, if so, what should I do?” His preceptor would then give the following instructions: “You must give up all the obligations to your followers (gaṇa-paṭibodha) which obstruct your progress, and cut off all the remaining defilements by repairing to the Cetiya mountain monastery and devote yourself entirely to meditation.

Ven. Kāḷa Buddharakkhita would do as he was advised by his old master and in due course he attained the exalted state of an Arahāt with the analytic knowledges (paṭisambhidā). He would continue to reside at the Cetiya mountain monastery amidst many disciples, and became well-known as the master of the king and the commoners, as well.

At one time, King Tissa was doing religious practice in a cave known as Rāja Lena on the hill of the Cetiya. He left words with a monastic who was attending upon Ven. Kāḷa Buddharakkhita: “Revered sir, kindly let me know when Ven. Kāḷa Buddharakkhita attends to questions or preaches Dhamma.” On a day fixed for teaching, Ven. Kāḷa Buddharakkhita went to the precincts of the Khandhaka relic shrine (stūpa) and sat on the Dhamma throne prepared at the base of an ebony tree.

Ven. Kāḷa Buddharakkhita recited the introductory verses and started to preach the Discourse at Kālaka’s Monastery (Kālakārāma-sutta, AN 4.24). The monastic attendant to the elder went to King Tissa and informed him of the teaching of the Dhamma by the great elder (mahā-thera).

King Tissa reached the site of the Dhamma teaching while the elder was still reciting the introductory verses. He stood listening to the discourse on the fringe of the big audience, in the guise of a commoner, throughout the three watches of the night. He said: Sādhu, sādhu, at the conclusion of the discourse. The great elder recognized him to be the king and asked: “How long have you been here?” “Revered Sir, from the outset of the discourse,” was his reply. Then the great elder said: “Your majesty, you have done a difficult thing indeed.” To this, the king made this solemn reply: “Revered sir, this is not a difficult thing at all for me to stand and listen to the discourse for a night. In fact, I had been taking note of every word and following the discourse without my mind being led astray at any moment, from start to finish. This statement of mine is true, if I have told a lie, may I be stripped off my sovereignty over this island of Śrī Lankā, without having any more authority even over a tiny spot of land the size of the tip of a whip.” He thus made a solemn vow very boldly. [591]

Infinite Attributes of the Buddha

The Discourse at Kālaka’s Monastery (Kālakārāma-sutta, AN 4.24) illustrates the attributes of the Buddha, and therefore king Tissa asked the great elder: “Revered sir, should we take it that you have described all the attributes of the Buddha in full or are there any more besides these?” The great elder replied: “Your majesty, attributes of the Buddha are infinitely incalculable, many times more than what I have just described.”

The king then requested: “Revered sir, kindly explain this to us with an example.” The great elder gave an example in response to the king’s request. “Your majesty, suppose there is a state paddy field measuring 1,750 acres.<sup>204</sup> The amount of seeds present in an ear or spike of corn is infinitesimal compared with the number of seeds borne by the rest of the corn spikes in the whole field; even so the attributes of the Buddha that remain undescribed by me are innumerable times greater than what I have just described.”

The king said: “Revered sir, please give us another example.” The great elder said: “Just as the amount of water that would pass through the eye of a needle, which is dipped in alignment with the current of the river Ganges, is negligible when compared with the remaining volume of water that flows down the mighty river, even so the attributes of the Buddha that I have described is negligible compared to those that still remain undescribed.”

The king said: “Revered sir, please give us one more example.” The great elder said: “A tiny sky-lark can be seen flying merrily about the sky. Just compare the area of space that is covered by its spread-out wings with the remaining open space, and, tell me which portion of the space is greater?” The king readily responded: “Revered sir, now that you have said it, it goes without saying that the amount of space occupied by the spreading wing of the bird is negligible when compared to the remaining, infinite portion of the sky.” The great elder told the king: “Your majesty, even so, the attributes of the Buddha that remain unrevealed by me are far greater than what I have just described.”

The king then addressed the great elder: “Revered sir, you have taught well by comparing the infinity of the attributes of the Buddha with the infinity of space. May I express my profound respect and deep sense of gratitude to you. We are incapable of making a fitting homage to you. May I therefore offer you kingship and sovereign power over the island of Śrī Laṅkā with an area of 300 leagues! This is a humble offering of a poor man.”

The king had evaluated his kingship with regard to the invaluable discourse on the attributes of the Buddha; hence he likened the offering of his kingship as a poor man’s gift.

Ven. Kāḷa Buddhārakkhita made this remark in response to the king’s offer: “Your royal highness, you have, indeed, shown your profound respect and deep sense of gratitude to me, and I now return the kingship, which you have offered to me with all its glories, to you with my blessings: my sincere wish is that you rule the people of Śrī Laṅkā and govern them with righteousness.”

This Arahāt Kāḷa Buddhārakkhita had set an example to the members of the Saṅgha. The kingship and regalia or emblems of royalty, offered out of deep devotional faith and reverence to monastics are not to be accepted since they are appurtenances and luxurious belongings of worldly people. They should be returned to the supporters.

During the fifth Rains Retreat (Vassa), the Buddha had made the first and second visit to Śrī Laṅkā to give exhortations to the dragon King Cūḷodara and his nephew Mahodara. But as the Buddha made a third visit to the island during the eighth Rains Retreat, we have deferred inclusion of the first two visits in order to give a combined account of the three visits when we describe the events of the eighth Rains Retreat. [592]

24: The 6th Year (Miracles)

The Buddha's Journeys

The Buddha took up residence at the Great Wood in Vesālī country during the fifth Rains Retreat (Vassa) emancipating those sentient beings who were deserving. He left there after the conclusion of the Rains Retreat, and travelled towards the countries of Sāvathī and Rājagaha on a similar mission.

There are two kinds of journey undertaken by the Buddha, according to circumstances: the kind of journey made quickly (turita-cārika) and an itinerary with stops at villages and towns, covering distances from one to two leagues regularly per day (aturita-cārika).

1. The journey undertaken quickly when the Buddha sees someone deserving of emancipation (turita-cārika). There are many instances, such as the Buddha setting out all of a sudden to receive Ven. Mahā Kassapa covering three miles; then he covered a journey of 30 leagues in no time to save Yakkha Āḷavaka; he did the same thing at the time of saving Aṅgulimāla, a notorious robber; he covered 45 leagues swiftly to preach to King Pakkusāti after he had become a monastic; he covered 120 leagues in no time to save King Mahā Kappina; he covered 700 leagues in no time to save Dhaniya, the wealthy owner of bullocks and his wife. Such journeys made suddenly on such missions are termed journeys made quickly (turita-cārika).
2. When the Buddha left a certain place at the end of a period of the Rains Retreat (Vassa), and set out on a journey, he usually touched in at every intermediate town and village to receive alms or to preach, covering a distance of one or two leagues per day. Such journeys honouring all people along the route by receiving alms or teaching to them are known as journeys not made quickly (aturita-cārika).

The Buddha used to make three types of journey with varying circumferential dimensions: 1) A journey covering the most widespread territory (mahā-maṇḍala); 2) a journey with a medium coverage of territory (majjhima-maṇḍala); 3) a journey with the smallest coverage of territory (anto-maṇḍala).

24: The 6th Rains Retreat (Miracles) – 820

Of these three types the great zone (mahā-maṇḍala) has an area of 900 leagues; the medium zone (majjima-maṇḍala) has an area of 600 leagues; 3) the inner zone (anto-maṇḍala) has an area of 300 leagues. This will now be clarified:

The Buddha held the Invitation (Pavāraṇā) ceremony at the end of the Rains Retreat (Vassa) on the full moon day of October (Assayuja). Should there be no special reason to wait, such as to save a worthy sentient being from the round of existence, he started his journey on the first waning moon of October, in the company of a large number of monastics, covering one or two leagues per day.

He continued wandering thus for nine months till the full moon day of July (Āsāḷha) of the next year. At each stop on the way to the destination, enthusiastic supporters from all directions, within an area of 100 leagues came in groups to pay homage with offerings. Those who came late scarcely got the chance of extending an invitation to the Buddha to their places. These two other regions formed part and parcel of this great zone. The Buddha stayed a day or two at villages and towns within the vast great zone, to bless the people of the locality by receiving alms from them and by teaching the Dhamma to them, he thus developed their merit to escape from the round of rebirths. Thus the Buddha usually spent nine months on the way before he ended his itinerary.

The journey lasting nine months covered a distance of 300 leagues from the beginning to the [593] end. With this area of 300 leagues as the centre, people from places 300 leagues on the left side of the route as well as those on the right also had the opportunity of doing meritorious deeds such as offering alms and listening to the Dhamma. Thus, these areas may be considered as also having been visited by the Buddha. Hence the statement above that a great zone journey measuring 900 leagues is explained.

In case the monastics had not reached maturity in their practice of concentration and insight meditation, the Invitation Ceremony of the Saṅgha which fell on the full moon of October (Assayuja), was put off till full moon of November (Kattikā). Then only on the first waning moon of November, the Buddha would start the journey attended by the monastics.

If for some other reason he wished to go on a medium zone journey (majjima-maṇḍala), he would tarry till the full moon of November, a full four months at wherever he had kept the Rains Retreat (Vassa), and then set out on the journey. In the above manner, the Buddha would spend an eight-month journey honouring the populace with his visits and teaching the Dhamma. The journey of eight months would cover 200 leagues from the beginning to the end. Each area on either side of the road measured 200 leagues. People from these areas also had the opportunity of doing meritorious deeds such as offering alms and listening to the Dhamma. Thus these areas may be considered as also been visited by the Buddha. Hence the statement above that a medium zone journey (majjima-maṇḍala) has an area of six hundred leagues is explained.

Although Buddha had spent four months observing the Rains Retreat (Vassa) at a certain place, up to and inclusive of the full moon of November (Kattikā), if deserving beings were still lacking in maturity of faculties, he continued his stay at the same place for another month. When necessary, such time of grace was prolonged, month after month, even for four months right up to the full moon of February (Phussa), as occasion demanded, and then only did he leave that place in the company of a great number of monastics, to set out on the inner zone journey (anto-maṇḍala).

As in the previous case the Buddha spent these months, blessing people by his visits and teaching. The length of time necessary for traversing the country was reduced from seven to four months, for reasons described above. Because of the shortage of time that a seven, six, five or four month journey had, it only took in a distance of 100 leagues. As in the above manner, the areas on either side of this 100 leagues journey were also visited. Hence it is said: “The inner zone journey (anto-maṇḍala) ranges altogether 300 leagues.”

It should be borne in mind that the Buddha had set out on these itineraries, not for receiving the four requisites: robes, food, shelter, medicines, but out of compassionate consideration and with the sole purpose of affording an opportunity to the poor, the ignorant, the aged, the sick, who would have no means of paying homage to him at any other time. Of them, some would be pleased just to see him, some would like to offer flowers and sweet scents, or a morsel of hard earned food, and there would be those who had given up wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi) to take up right view (sammā-diṭṭhi). Such encounters with him would bring about lasting peace, prosperity and happiness for these people.

This was how the Buddha, after having kept the fifth Rains Retreat (Vassa) in the Great Wood at Vesālī, travelled to Sāvattthī and Rājagaha with the villages on their outskirts for the uplift of all living beings and administering the elixir of the Dhamma with his teaching.

Ven. Piṅḍola Bharadvāja and the Sandalwood Bowl

The Buddha kept the sixth Rains Retreat (Vassa) at Mount Makula monastery, which was situated by the side of the ocean and was shaded and walled by a forest of star flower trees, saving all deserving humans, Devas and Brahmas from the sufferings of sentient existence.

The Buddha, having kept the sixth Rains Retreat (Vassa) at the Mount Makula monastery, left for Rājagaha and took up residence at the Veḷuvana monastery there.

At that time, a rich man of Rājagaha, being desirous of disporting himself in the river [594] Ganges, caused a huge net to be constructed surrounding all four sides of the place where he was to disport, to protect himself against all possible danger from both above and below the spot and against the risk of his jewellery being washed away.

At that time, a red sandalwood tree was drifting down the Ganges from the upper reaches of the river. The current of the river had caused it to fall by washing away the sand at its base. The tree lost its size, shape and form as it dashed against the cliffs and rocks while floating along the swift current during the course of a long journey. It had been battered, broken into pieces, tattered and finally a heartwood piece of red sandalwood, with constant abrasion, had taken the form of a block of wood with a smooth surface. As it floated down, it was caught in the rich man's net with all the duckweeds wrapped around it. The servants and attendants brought it to their master, the rich man.

At that time, the rich man of Rājagaha was a man without any religious belief; he did not hold right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) or wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi) either. He brought the bowl of sandalwood to his house and had the upper layer chipped off with an adze. They found the reddish heartwood emitting the sweet fragrance of sandalwood.

It set him thinking: “I have so many kinds of sandalwood in my home, what should I do with this one?” and it eventually dawned on him: “In the world today, there are many people, who profess themselves to be Arahats. I have no idea as to who is a real Arahata. I will have a lathe installed in my house and get the block of sandalwood made into an alms bowl; the wood dust from the lathe I will use, but the bowl I will donate out of generosity. I will put it into a containing frame and keep it hanging from a pole made by tying a series of bamboos, end to end, to a height of 60 cubits, and announce: “Anyone who can prove himself to be an Arahāt by flying into the air through absorption (jhāna) power and securing the bowl can have it. And the Arahāt who can actually come by air and claim the bowl as announced I, together with my family, will accept him and worship him as our teacher.”

He, accordingly, had the sandalwood made into an alms bowl, and kept it hanging in a framework from a series of bamboos tied together to a height of 60 cubits, and announced: “Any real Arahāt in the world can take this bowl by flying through the sky.”

The Six Sectarian Teachers

At that time, there were residing in Rājagaha the six sectarian teachers who professed themselves to be Arahāts and sages of their own sects. They were:

1. Purāṇa Kassapa. His proper name is Purāṇa, and he belonged to a clan known as Kassapa, and he came to be known as Purāṇa Kassapa. This is a brief account of this sectarian teacher: There was a rich man who had 99 slaves, and Purāṇa was born as the 100th slave, hence he was named Purāṇa or centenary slave.<sup>205</sup> He was considered an auspicious slave for being the hundredth one, and he was not criticized for his misdeeds or blamed for his negligence of duty. With all that, he absconded with a conceited idea: “Why should I stay in this house?” But he ran straight into a gang of robbers who stripped him bare. He had not enough decency to clad himself in leaves or grass. He went into a village with his body altogether naked. People misplaced their faith in him, speaking highly of him: “This recluse is an Arahāt; he is so self-denying and continent; there is no one like him.” They went to him with offerings of hard and soft food. He thought to himself: “My being naked is the cause of gaining such gifts.” From that time on, he remained unclothed even when he had clothing offered him. He became fixed in his belief that nakedness was a condition of a recluse. He had 500 men who became his disciples by adopting such a way of life. In this way he became a leader of a sect, an illustrious teacher, a god to his followers.

He and the following five sect leaders, in their self-acclaimed positions, made speculations and pronounced them as creeds of their own. For details, the reader may refer to the Discourse on the Fruits of the Ascetic Life (Sāmañña-phala-sutta, DN 2).

2. Makkhali Gosāla. His proper name was Makkhali, Gosāla was added to his name as he was born at the village of Gosāla, or as he was born in a cow-shed (go-sala) where bullocks were kept during the rainy season. A short account of his life: He was also a slave, like Purāṇa. One day as he was going across a muddy spot with an oil-pot on his shoulder, his master warned him to be careful not to slip and fall, saying: “My lad, don’t slip.” But he was so careless that he did slip and fall and so he tried to run away out of fear of his master. When his master caught him by a portion of his nether garment, he abandoned his clothings and escaped through the fingers of his master. The rest of the story is identical with that of Purāṇa Kassapa.
3. Ajita Kesakambala. He was also the teacher of a sect. His proper name was Ajita. He used to wear a garment (kambala) made of human hair (kesa), and he came to be known as Ajita Kesakambala.
4. Pakudha Kaccāyana. He was also the teacher of a sect. His proper name was Pakudha. He belonged to Kaccāyana clan, so he came to be known as Pakudha Kaccāyana. He eschewed cold water. He used either warm water or vinegar to tidy up after defecating, or to wash away dirt or dust. He considered himself to have breached the precepts whenever he had crossed a stream or a river. Such lapses had to be atoned for by piling sand in small heaps and taking the precepts before he could continue his journey.
5. Sañjaya Belaṭṭhaputta: he was also the teacher of a sect. Vens. Sāriputta and Mahā Mogallāna lived with him when they started leading the life of wandering ascetics. His proper name was Sañjaya. He was the son of a man called Belaṭṭha, and so he came to be known as Sañjaya Belaṭṭhaputta.

6. Nigaṇṭha Nāthaputta: he was also the teacher of a sect. He professed: “We have no defilements binding us; we are free from fettering defilements.” Hence the term fetter-free (Nigaṇṭha). In fact they were far from being free from defilements. His father was called Nātha and he came to be known as Nigaṇṭha Nāthaputta.

The sandalwood bowl was kept hanging from the top of a pole made up of a number of bamboos, to a height of 60 cubits. A general announcement was made to the effect that: “Anyone who has become an Arahat in this world may receive the bowl by flying through space with absorption (jhāna) power.” Whereupon, the teacher, Purāṇa Kassapa came to the rich man of Rājagaha and said: “Rich man, I am an Arahat and I am also one with power, so give the bowl to me.” He made such a bold claim without any rhyme or reason. The rich man of Rājagaha tactfully made a meaningful reply: “Venerable sir, I have already offered the bowl to any real Arahat who possesses power. If you be a real Arahat and if you have such power, bring down and take away the bowl with your powers.”

Since Purāṇa Kassapa was not an Arahat replete with meditational power, he had to return with his hopes dashed to the ground.

The other teachers also came to claim the bowl in like manner as Purāṇa Kassapa: on the [596] second day there came Makkhali Gosāla; on the third, Ajita Kesakambala; on the fourth day, Pakudha Kaccāyana, on the fifth, Saṅjaya Belaṭṭhaputta; they all met the same fate as Purāṇa Kassapa, since they could not fulfil the condition set out by the rich man.

On the sixth day, Nigaṇṭha Nāthaputta summoned his disciples and confided to them: “Go to the rich man of Rājagaha and tell him: ‘The bowl is only fit for our great sage; do not make our great teacher come all the way through the sky for a negligible wooden bowl such as that; exempt our great sage from such a task and offer it to him.’”

His disciples went to the rich man of Rājagaha and told him as instructed by their teacher. Whereupon, the rich man gave them a firm reply: “Only those who can come through the sky may have the bowl.”

Nigaṇṭha Nāthaputta had a desire to go there personally and so he confided these instructions to his disciples: “I will make a sham attempt by lifting one of my legs and hands, as though I am about to shoot up into the sky, and you all come saying: ‘O great sage, what are you going to do? Please do not demonstrate the secrets of the virtues of the Arahāt fruition for the sake of a wooden bowl, and then you will push and make me fall to the ground.” He thus confided to them his plans.

After conspiring with his disciples, Nāthaputta went to the rich man and said: “Rich man, this bowl is not fit for anybody else, why should you want me to fly in the air for such a paltry wooden bowl. Please offer it to me.” – “Venerable sir, just fly up into the sky and take it,” was the rich man’s terse reply.

Whereupon, Nāthaputta said: “If that is the case I will shoot up into the sky,” and turning to his disciples he asked them to move aside and he lifted one of his hands and feet. Then his disciples hastened to their teacher as previously arranged and said to him: ‘Great teacher, what do you mean by this! It is not worth demonstrating the virtues of the Arahāt fruition for the sake of a worthless wooden bowl.’ They pulled him by his hands and feet and caused him to fall to the ground. Nāthaputta, while still lying on the ground, told the rich man: “Rich man, you have seen that my disciples will not allow me to fly into the sky. I urge you to offer me that bowl.” But the rich man was not to be moved. He calmly repeated: “Please take it by flying in the sky.” Thus the six teachers made six attempts for six days in succession, but to no purpose.

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna and Ven. Piṇḍola

On the seventh day, the two venerables, Mahā Moggallāna and Piṇḍola came out of the Veḷuvana monastery to enter the city of Rājagaha for their usual round of receiving alms food. When they were putting on their robes, while stood on a huge rock near the city, they overheard the calumniating remarks of some drunken persons: “Friends, those six sectarian teachers used to go round announcing themselves as Arahats in the past. It is now the seventh day since the rich man of Rājagaha made the announcement: “If there is an Arahāt, let him fly through the sky and take the bowl,” after hanging the sandalwood bowl from a series of bamboo poles tied together to a height of 60 cubits. Not even one person declaring of himself: “I am an Arahāt,” has been able to fly into the sky. Today we know very well there are no Arahats in the world.”

On hearing that remark, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna asked Ven. Piṇḍola: “Friend, do you hear the derogatory remark of those drunken persons? His sweeping calumniating remark also affects the prestige of the Buddha’s Dispensation. You possess power; you are mighty; go and bring the sandalwood bowl by flying through the sky.” Whereupon, Ven. Piṇḍola Bharadvāja replied: “Friend, the Buddha has elevated you to the foremost position (etad-aggā) with respect to your supernormal power, and, as such, I wish you to do it yourself. I will accomplish the task only if you do not undertake it.”

This [597] shows that Ven. Piṇḍola had given priority to Ven. Mahā Moggallāna out of respect for his seniority.

Whereupon, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna willingly permitted Ven. Piṇḍola to accomplish the task himself; having obtained permission from Ven. Mahā Moggallāna, Ven. Piṇḍola entered into the fourth absorption (jhāna), it being the basis for supernormal psychic power, and rising therefrom, he caused the huge slab of rock on which they stood to put on their robes, to rise into space by means of his supernormal will. The rock, with neatly and elegantly trimmed sides, was made to fly like a piece of silk cotton-wool and circle seven times round above the city of Rājagaha which had an area of three miles. The huge slab of rock was like an enormous lid covering the city of Rājagaha.

The citizens were frightened at the sight of the huge rock hanging over their heads, and thinking: “This huge slab of rock has covered and presses down on us,” ran helter-skelter and took shelter under nearby places, covering their heads with trays. When the huge rock had made its seventh round above the city, Ven. Piṇḍola made himself visible through the rock. Whereupon the citizens appealed to him: “Venerable sir, please hold the rock fast, lest it destroys all of us.” Even as the people looked on, Ven. Piṇḍola caused the huge rock to return to its original position by kicking and tossing it with his toes.

Ven. Piṇḍola stood in the sky right above the residence of the rich man. The latter, on seeing him, crawled on his breast on the ground and invited Ven. Piṇḍola to descend. Once he was in his house, he had the bowl brought down and filled it with the four sweets (catu-madhu) to its brim. He then offered it to Ven. Piṇḍola with due respect.

As Ven. Piṇḍola was on the way to the monastery with the bowl, people who had missed the opportunity of seeing his supernormal power, through their being away in the fields, came rallying round Ven. Piṇḍola and requested: “Venerable sir, please let us see your supernormal performance like the others saw.” They followed him right up to the monastery hoping to witness the miracle demonstrated by Ven. Piṇḍola.

On hearing the uproar, the Buddha asked Ven. Ānanda: “Dear son Ānanda, why are they clamouring?” Ven. Ānanda replied: “Most exalted Buddha, Ven. Piṇḍola had flown up into the sky and brought down the sandalwood bowl offered by the rich man of Rājagaha. Hearing the news many people have followed at his heels. Those clamorous voices are the voices of the people.”

Whereupon, the Buddha caused the Saṅgha to be assembled and asked Ven. Piṇḍola: “Dear son Piṇḍola, is it true that you obtained the sandalwood bowl of the rich man of Rājagaha by means of a miracle (pāṭihāriya)?” When Ven. Piṇḍola replied it was true, the Buddha censured him, giving many reasons and taught some discourses by way of exhortation, and then he prescribed a ruling: Na, bhikkhave, gihīnaṃ uttari-manussa-dhammaṃ iddhi-pāṭihāriyaṃ dassetabbaṃ. Yo dasseyya, āpatti dukkaṭassa, “monastics, no monastic shall display a miracle to householders; the one who does so is guilty of a wrong-doing.”

He then continued by saying that the sandalwood bowl should be broken into pieces and distributed amongst the monastics to be powdered for use as eye medicine, and then he prescribed another ruling that no monastic should make use of wooden bowls, anyone doing so would be guilty of a wrong-doing.

Upon hearing that the Buddha had prohibited the monastics from demonstrating miracles, the heretics were confident that all the disciples of the Buddha would not breach such a ruling even on pain of death. They considered how they could take advantage of such a situation. [598]

They went about the streets and alleys of the town bragging to the people: “In the past, to uphold our prestige, we had not made any attempt to display our supernatural power for the sake of a wooden alms bowl. Only the disciples of the ascetic Gotama have shamelessly done such things. It is said that the ascetic Gotama, being a wise man, had caused all trace of the bowl to be lost by having it broken into pieces, and he has also prescribed a ruling prohibiting the monastics from performing miracles. We can now take advantage of the situation and challenge Gotama to perform a miracle.”

The Buddha's Miracles

The Twin Miracle

On hearing the above news, King Bimbisāra approached the Buddha and discussed the question with him in this dialogue:

King: Most exalted Buddha, did you prescribe a rule prohibiting the monastics from a performance of miracles?

Buddha: Yes, I did, gracious king!

King: Sectarians have been going round boasting that they would challenge the Buddha to feats of miracles. What will you do now?

Buddha: If they are going to stage a performance of miracles, I too shall stage a performance of miracles.

King: Have you not prescribed a ruling prohibiting the performance of miracles?

Buddha: Gracious King, I have not prescribed the rule for myself, I have prescribed the ruling for my disciples!

King: Could a ruling be prescribed exclusively for the disciples, and not for the Buddha?

Buddha: Gracious King, in such a case, I will put a question to you: Are there mango trees and fruits in your garden?

King: Yes, there are, Revered Sir.

Buddha: What action would you take against a person who chanced to pluck the fruits and eat them?

King: I will have to punish him in that case.

Buddha: But do you have the right to enjoy the fruits yourself?

King: Yes, I have, exalted Lord, no action need be taken against me when I enjoy my own property.

Buddha: Gracious King, just as your authority prevails in this country with an area of 300 leagues, so my authority extends to one trillion world-elements (āṇā-khetta). There cannot be any ruling for me; only my disciples are subject to restrictions. I shall perform miracles.

King: Exalted Buddha, when will you perform the miracles?

Buddha: Gracious King, four months from today, on the full moon day of July (Āsāḷha), the miracles will be performed by me.

King: Exalted Buddha, at which place?

Buddha: Gracious King, near the Kaṇḍamba mango tree in the country of Sāvattḥī.

The term Kaṇḍamba means the white mango tree; but what the Buddha meant by the Kaṇḍamba mango tree (Kaṇḍamba-rukkha) was the mango tree planted by a gardener by the name of Kaṇḍamba.

The Buddha chose that place firstly, because this is the place where all the previous Buddhas used to perform miracles; secondly, to enable a greater number of people to witness the great event. The Buddha had decided on this place which was a distance of 45 leagues, and the time, after a lapse of four months. [599]

When the heretics heard of the bold declaration by the Buddha that he would perform miracles on the full moon day of July (Āsāḷha), near the Kaṇḍamba mango tree, in the country of Sāvattḥī they foresaw that they would be doomed forever. They, however, devised ways to mislead the people by false pretensions. They therefore agreed amongst themselves to follow the steps of the Buddha on the way to Sāvattḥī, and to tell people, should they ask for explanation, that they had decided to stage a parallel performance of miracles in competition with the ascetic Gotama, but that the ascetic Gotama was now running away from them in fear and thus they were following his footsteps not to lose sight of him, and thereby give him the chance to escape. “With this scheme of ours, we will even receive much gain and fame,” thought the heretics hopefully.

The Buddha Leaves Rājagaha for Sāvattḥī

The matter of a performance of miracles cropped up some time about the full moon day of March (Phagguṇa), in the year 523 BCE. It was about the first waning of March that the Buddha went on alms round in Rājagaha and left that city for Sāvattḥī in the company of his disciples.

The heretics also started their journey simultaneously and travelled almost together, trailing behind the Buddha all along the way, receiving food and partaking from the same place, starting off and halting at the same time, sleeping at the same place and resuming the journey after breakfast at the same time the next morning. When asked by the people: “What makes you go along with the Buddha?” They gave the answer as stated above. Crowds of people went along intending to witness the performance of miracles.

The Buddha travelled along the route, and on arrival at Sāvathī, took residence at the Jetavana monastery. The heretics, having travelled along with him, built a pavilion out of heartwood from the fund of 100,000 coins raised by their disciples at their request. They decorated the pavilion in a grand and novel way with blue lotus blooms and boastfully announced that this would be the centre for their performance of miracles.

King Pasenadi Kosala went to the Buddha and asked: “Most exalted Buddha, the heretics have already got a pavilion built. May I have your permission to build a pavilion for you.” He replied: “Gracious King, you need not build it. I have a supporter at hand who is prepared to build it.” – “Is there any person capable of building a pavilion for you other than myself?” – “Gracious King, Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, will build it,” was the reply. The king asked: “Most exalted Buddha, at which place would you be pleased to perform miracles?” – “Gracious King near the Kaṇḍamba mango tree,” was the reply.

The heretics were greatly shaken when they heard the news that the Buddha will perform miracles near a mango tree, and so they discussed with their lay supporters to buy and fell all the mango trees, even day-old sprouts, growing within a radius of one league around the city of Sāvathī. The Buddha entered the city of Sāvathī, accompanied by his disciples, to receive food on the morning of full moon day of July (Āsāḷha).

The Kaṇḍamba Mango Tree

Incidentally, the royal gardener, named Kaṇḍa, was scaring away crows which were attracted by the scent of a big ripe mango fruit within the folds of an old nest of red ants on the mango tree. He eventually picked it with the idea of offering it to the king. On his way, he beheld the Buddha and then a fresh idea dawned on him: “If the king were to enjoy this mango fruit, my reward would be something like eight or sixteen pieces of money, which would not keep me going for the whole of my life; if it was offered to the Buddha, I would get, in return, immeasurable benefit throughout the cycle of rebirths.”

With this devotional faith, he offered it to the Buddha while on his way to the king. Whereupon, the Buddha turned round and looked at Ven. Ānanda, who being [600] perceptive understood what the Buddha wanted him to do. He handed the stone alms bowl that had been offered to the Buddha by the four Great Brahmas. The Buddha then lowered the bowl to accept the gift offered by the gardener Kaṇḍa. Then the Buddha showed signs of wishing to sit down at the spot.

Ven. Ānanda spread a robe over the spot for the Buddha and went ahead to prepare some mango squash and offered it to him. After partaking of the mango squash, the Buddha called upon the royal gardener and said: “Lay devotee Kaṇḍa, scrape the earth and have that mango seed planted here.” When Kaṇḍa had sowed the seed, the Buddha washed his hand right on top of the mango seed.

As soon as Buddha had washed his hands over the seed, a sprout of the size of the stock of a plough came up; the sprout continued to grow gradually to a height of 50 cubits even as they looked on. The main stem put out four main branches sideways, into four directions, and the fifth shooting upwards each one measuring 50 cubits. The main branches, in turn, put out small branches and an abundance of fruits, till gradually the whole tree was full of bunches of ripe fruit.

All the monastics who arrived later could also partake of the fruits, there being enough and to spare. On hearing the marvellous appearance of the strange mango tree, King Pasenadi Kosala issued a royal order to the effect that no one should cut the tree and caused a number of security personnel to be posted around the tree.

The mango tree was named after the gardener, Kaṇḍa, who planted the tree, hence it was called Kaṇḍamba tree. The Buddha was referring to this mango tree when he had told King Bimbisāra and King Pasenadi Kosala that he would perform miracles near the Kaṇḍamba mango tree, in answer to their query. This was a fact unknown to the heretics, and they had therefore arranged with their followers for the destruction of all mango trees, inclusive of sprouts, in and around the city of Sāvattḥī, at their own expense so that the Buddha could not perform a miracle without breaking his word.

Drunken men of the locality also had their share of fruits to enjoy with great satisfaction. They turned to the heretics and they decried their low and selfish motives saying: “Ha, you ruined heretics, you have destroyed all the mango trees, and uprooted even day-old sprouts in and around the city of Sāvattḥī, for fear that the ascetic Gotama would perform miracles near them; but the miracles will take place near the mango tree planted by the gardener Kaṇḍa,” and they attacked the heretics by throwing the seeds of the mangoes they had eaten at them.

Sakka ordered the wind god: “Blow down the pavilion of the heretics, uprooting even the posts and dump it in the garbage.” The wind god did as he was told. Sakka asked the sun god to cause intense heat for the sectarians by taking his mansion down a little. The sun god did as he was bid. The wind god was asked again by Sakka to create a whirlwind exclusively at the place of the heretics. The wind god did as he was bid, with the result that the heretics were soaked with perspiration and covered with dust, and they resembled big red ant-hills. Sakka then asked the rain god to pour torrential rain together with hail stones. The rain god did as he was bid, with the result that the heretics looked like oxen with red and white spots all over their bodies.

The heretics, with their pavilion wrecked beyond repair, could not withstand the intense heat and the force of the whirlwind accompanied by hail, they became crestfallen under the hopeless conditions, and there was no alternative but to run away helter-skelter wherever their legs could carry.

Purāṇa Kassapa Drowned Himself

Thus the six heretic teachers ran away in different directions. Meanwhile, a male servitor and devotee of Purāṇa Kassapa, who was a farmer, thought: “Now it must be time for my noble teachers, to perform miracles. I will go and see the miracles.” He released the [601] oxen from the plough, and carrying the pot in which he had brought his gruel early in the morning, a rope and the goad, he arrived at the spot where his sage was expected to show his miracle. When he saw Purāṇa Kassapa running hastily he asked him: “Most reverend sir, I have come to witness your performance of miracles, where are you bound for?” Purāṇa Kassapa replied: “What good would my miracle do? Just hand me the pot and the rope.” Taking the rope and the pot he ran straight to the bank of a nearby running stream, filled the pot with sand, and tying the pot tightly round his neck with the rope sprang into the running current to end his life. This was marked by some bubbles floating on the surface of the stream while he was reborn in the plane of misery known as Avīci.

It is natural that those who are ignorant and unenlightened are destined to suffer for a long time, through many transient existences; while those who are noble, virtuous, intelligent and enlightened enjoy the maximum of peace, joy and benefits. Such is the nature of the world.

Sakka Has a Pavilion Built

Towards the evening on that day, Sakka realized that it was his duty to arrange for the creation of a jewelled pavilion for the Buddha and so he commanded Vissakamma to create a great pavilion extending over twelve leagues, profusely covered with blue lotus blooms and adorned with the seven kinds of jewels. The Saṅgha and the laity would assemble around the Buddha in this pavilion.

Towards the evening on that day, the Buddha left his scented chamber to take up temporary residence at the pavilion, which was created by Vissakamma, getting ready for the demonstration of the miracle, and on arrival he sat on the jewelled throne of the size of one league and under a white celestial umbrella of the size of three leagues.

It will be recalled that a period of four months had elapsed since the last full moon day of March (Phagguṇa), when the Buddha had given intimation to King Bimbisāra of his desire to demonstrate a miracle near the Kaṇḍamba mango tree. This news had spread far and wide ever since, and now all the male and female monastics and male and female lay devotees had gathered around the Buddha on all four sides: at the front, back, left and right, and for a stretch of 12 leagues long on each side; 24 leagues from end to end and 72 leagues in circumference. All the celestial beings from the 10,000 world-element had also assembled at this place at the same time.

The Addresses of the Buddha's Disciples

At the assembly, Gharaṇī, a female lay devotee and a Non-returner (Anāgāmī) with great power, stood in front of the Buddha and paying obeisance with palms together, made her address: “Most exalted Buddha, when there is a daughter of yours such as myself, we see no need for you to exert yourself. May I be kindly permitted to demonstrate a miracle?” Whereupon, he asked: “Dear daughter Gharaṇī, how would you demonstrate your miracle?”

She replied: “Most exalted Buddha, I shall cause the earth portion of the universe to become water thereby turning the entire world-element into a uniform mass of water. I shall transform myself into a water hen and dive into it and reappear at the eastern edge, then likewise at the western, northern and southern edge of the universe, and then at the centre of the universe.

Whereupon, a certain person might ask who I am, and the people would answer: ‘She is Gharaṇī, daughter of the Buddha, a female Non-returner.’ This would lead the people to say: ‘If this display of power is only the prelude, the power of a [602] daughter of the Buddha, a young woman, the power of the Buddha must indeed be infinite.’ In consequence, all the heretics would naturally lose courage and flee without even daring to glance back at you.”

The Buddha told her: “Dear daughter Gharaṇī, I knew you have the power to demonstrate such a miracle, but the bouquet of flowers attached to the winning post was not meant for you.” Gharaṇī considered that the Buddha had not given her permission for good reasons; it might be that there was someone far superior than her in respect of power in the performance of miracles. So she remained at a suitable distance.

The Buddha contemplated: “If, in this manner, I should ask my sons and daughters, in the midst of this spectacle, covering 24 square leagues, they will rise up bravely and with the mien of a lion king, make such wildly confident declarations. In this way, the attribute of my sons and daughters will be already revealed.” He therefore asked other disciples, both males and females, about their individual achievements. The disciples courageously disclosed the way in which they would display their miracles in his presence.

Amongst those male and female disciples, who made such bold statements, Cūḷa Anāthapiṇḍika was one who had this to say: “Most exalted Buddha, when there is a Non-returner (Anāgāmi) disciple of yours such as myself, there is no need to exert yourself. Let me be kindly permitted to demonstrate a miracle.”

Whereupon the Buddha asked him: “Dear son Anāthapiṇḍika, in what form would you demonstrate a miracle?”

The lay disciple, Cūḷa Anāthapiṇḍika replied: “I will transform my body into that of Brahma’s body, which measures 12 leagues, and then by slapping one of the upper arms with the open palm of the other hand, produce thunderous sounds of a great rainstorm in the midst of the throngs of people present here.

Whereupon, people would ask: ‘What sort of sound is that?’ and the others would answer: ‘This is the sound of the clapping of the arms by the young rich man, Anāthapiṇḍika, who is a Non-returner disciple of the Buddha.’ This will lead the heretics to say: ‘This is only the prelude, the power of a young lay-disciple. The power of the Buddha cannot even be guessed.’ In consequence, they would naturally lose courage and flee without even daring to glance back at you.”

He told him: “Dear Anāthapiṇḍika, I know that you have the power to display the miracle; but you had better wait.”

A young novice (sāmaṇerī) of seven years old, known as Cīrā, who had acquired analytic knowledge (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa), after paying obeisance, requested the Buddha: “Most exalted Buddha, may I be permitted to display my miracle?” He asked her: “Dear young daughter Cīrā, in what form would you display your miracle?”

“Most exalted Buddha, I will bring three mountains: Sineru, Cakkavāḷa and the Himālayas to this spot, where the miracles are being demonstrated, and place them in a row. I will transform myself into a Brahmany duck and coming out from these mountains fly about freely without any hindrance.

Whereupon people would ask: ‘Who is this little girl?’ The others will answer: ‘This is Cīrā, a young novice of the Buddha.’ This would lead the heretics to say: ‘This is only the introductory performance, the power of only a seven-year old novice. The power of the Buddha cannot even be conjectured.’ In consequence, they will naturally lose courage and flee without even daring to glance back at you.”

Such remarks as the latter are applicable to subsequent cases of a similar nature and no attempt will be made to reproduce them hereafter.

The Buddha gave the same reply, and she was not [603] permitted to display her miracle.

Next, a young seven-year old Arahāt novice, Cunda, who had acquired analytic knowledge (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa), after paying obeisance, made a request: “Most exalted Buddha, may I be kindly permitted to display my miracle?” he asked: “Dear son Cunda, in what form would you display your miracle?”

“Most exalted Buddha, I will shake the golden rose-apple tree which is regarded as the victory pennant of the universe by its stem and bring the fruits that fall to feed the audience here; and again, I will bring flowers from the coral tree in Tāvātimsa and give them to the audience here.”

24: The 6th Rains Retreat (Miracles) – 837

The Buddha gave the same reply as before and did not permit the young novice to display his miracle.

Next, the elder nun Uppalavaṇṇā requested the Buddha to display her miracle and the Buddha asked her: “In what form would you demonstrate it?”

“Most exalted Buddha, I will create an audience extending to the length of 12 leagues, occupying a space of 36 leagues in circumference. I will transform myself into a Universal Monarch and surrounded by a Universal Monarch’s attendants come to pay homage to you.”

He replied: “I know that you have the power,” but did not grant permission for demonstration as in the previous cases.

Next, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna requested permission to demonstrate a miracle. The venerable’s request took the form a dialogue between the Buddha and himself.

Moggallāna: Kindly permit me to perform a miracle.

Buddha: Dear son Moggallāna, how would you perform a miracle?

Moggallāna: I will reduce Mount Meru to the size of a mustard seed, shelve it in between the fissures of my teeth and chew it in the presence of the spectators.

Buddha: What else would you do?

Moggallāna: The earth will be rolled up like a small thin mat and I will keep it in between my fingers.

Buddha: Anything else?

Moggallāna: Like a potter’s wheel for grinding earth, I will turn up the great earth and feed the populace here with the fertile top soil that lies under the surface.

Buddha: And again?

Moggallāna: This earth will be put on the palm of my left hand, and human beings will be placed on another island continent.

Buddha: Any more?

Moggallāna: Most exalted Buddha, I will use Mount Meru like the shaft of an umbrella and placing the earth on top of it like the folds of an umbrella I will walk in space to and fro, holding both in one hand, like a monastic with an umbrella in his hand. The Buddha told Ven. Mahā Moggallāna: “Dear son Moggallāna, I know you have the power to demonstrate these miracles,” but he did not permit him to perform them.

Ven. Mahā Moggallāna came to understand: “Permission was not given because the Realised One has in mind an even greater and nobler miracle than this to perform.” So he remained at a proper distance.

The Buddha further pointed out to Ven. Mahā Moggallāna: “Dear son, this [604] victory bouquet is not earmarked for you. I have the power to accomplish any task that lies beyond the achievement of any other person. It is no wonder that there is no match for me when I have become a Fully Self-Awakened Buddha. I had no equal even when I was born as an irrational creature and the accomplishment of my perfections (pāramī) was still immature.” At the request of Ven. Moggallāna, the Buddha propounded the Birth Story about the Bull Blackie (Kaṇha-jātaka, Ja 29), which tells a story of how he was once a bull who earned his owner a fortune by pulling carts no one else could pull, and taking the reward to his poor owner.

Creation of a Jewelled Walk

After recounting the Birth Story about the Bull Blackie, the Buddha created a jewelled walk, which extended from one end to the other of the 10,000 world-element, standing from east to west in a row. The 10,000 Great Merus in the 10,000 world-element served as posts in the creation of the walk. The eastern perimeter of the walk rested on the edge of the eastern-most world-element; the western perimeter of the walk rested on the western end of the western-most world system. The width of the walk was twelve leagues. The bordering surfaces on either side of the walk were golden in colour; the middle portion of the entire walk was filled with earth of rubies, and the rafters, beams, purloins were finished with various kinds of shining gems, the roofing was of gold, and balusters lining the walk were of gold; ruby and pearl grains were spread like sand on the entire surface of the structure.

On each of the four sides of the walk, extending to 12 leagues, was the audience of human beings. The number of humans, Devas and Brahmas was uncountable. It was in the midst of such an audience that the Buddha demonstrated the twin miracles. The following is an excerpt, in abridged form, from the commentary (DhpA 14.2).

24: The 6th Rains Retreat (Miracles) – 839

1. When there were flames of fire appearing from the upper part of the body, there were streams of water flowing from the lower part of the body; and when there were flames of fire appearing from the lower part of the body, there were streams of water flowing from the upper part of the body.
2. When there were flames of fire appearing from the front part of the body, there were streams of water flowing from the back part of the body; and when there were flames of fire appearing from the back part, there were streams of water flowing from the front part of the body.
3. When there were flames of fire appearing from the right eye, there were streams of water flowing from the left eye; and when there were flames of fire appearing from the left eye, there were streams of water flowing from the right eye.
4. When there were flames of fire appearing from the right ear, there were streams of water flowing from the left ear; and when there were flames of fire appearing from the left ear, there were streams of water flowing from the right ear.
5. When there were flames of fire appearing from the right nostril, there were streams of water flowing from the left nostril; and when there were flames of fire appearing from the left nostril, there were streams of water flowing from the right nostril.
6. When there were flames of fire appearing from the edge of the right shoulder, there were streams of water flowing from the edge of the left shoulder; and when there were flames of fire appearing from the edge of the left shoulder, there were streams of water flowing from the edge of the right shoulder.
7. When there were flames of fire appearing from the right hand, there were streams of water flowing from the left hand; and when there were flames of fire appearing from the left hand, there were streams of water flowing from the right hand.
8. When there were flames of fire appearing from the right side of the body, there were streams of water flowing from the left side of the body; and when there were flames of fire appearing from the left side of the body, there were streams of water flowing from the right side of the body.

9. When there were flames of fire appearing from the right leg, there were streams of water flowing from the left leg; and when there were flames of fire appearing from [605] the left leg, there were streams of water flowing from the right leg.
10. When there were flames of fire appearing from each of the ten fingers and the ten toes, there were streams of water flowing from the spaces between each of the ten fingers and the ten toes; and when there were flames of fire appearing from the spaces between each of the ten fingers and the ten toes, there were streams of water flowing from each of the ten fingers and the ten toes.
11. When there were flames of fire appearing from some individual hairs of the body, there were streams of water flowing from the other hairs.
12. When there were flames of fire appearing from some individual pores of the body, there were streams of water flowing from the other pores.

From these different parts of the body there was an emanation of six different colours of light: dark blue, gold, red, white, crimson and resplendent, in pairs, in streams or in groups.

The Buddha developed the absorption based on the fire device (tejo-kasiṇa-jhāna) for the appearance of flames of fire from the upper part of the body and developed the absorption based on the water device (āpo-kasiṇa-jhāna) for the flow of the streams of water from the lower part of the body. The same principle was applied when reversing the performance of the twin miracle.

It should be borne in mind that the flames of fire did not get mixed with the streams of water and vice versa. They remained in their own orbit. Since there can be no two simultaneous thought moments in one instant of time, the creation of flames of fire and the creation of streams of water took two separate moments, taking turns in alternation, although they would appear to be taking place simultaneously in the minds of the ordinary persons. The mental creation happened at very great speed although separately. This may be attributed to the moment between each state of mind of the Buddha being extremely short, the speed of mind and having reached the climax of mastery in the attainment of absorptions.

The flames of fire and streams of water emitted from the Buddha's body went up to the summit of the universe and descended to the edge of the 10,000 world-element.

The Miracle of Unveiling the Universe

Following the demonstration of the twin miracle, the Buddha performed the miracle of unveiling the universe (loka-vivarāṇa-pāṭihāriya). This is how it was performed. He entered the form world fourth meditation (rūpāvacara-kiriya-catuttha-jhāna) based on the white object meditation device (odata-kasiṇa); arising therefrom, he made the resolution: “Let there be illumination throughout the 10,000 world-element.” Instantaneously, the whole universe, right from the human world up to the Akaniṭṭha Brahma realm became illuminated.

All human beings could have full view of the universes from the Four Great Kings (Catu-mahā-rājika) to the Akaniṭṭha Brahma realm even as they stayed in their own residences. They could see all the celestial beings therein going about their daily life in their many special and various planes with all the lakes, gardens, thrones, couches, tiered-roof mansions, carriages, regalia, in a happy joyous mood, disporting themselves fully and enjoying a luxurious life in the jewelled brilliant flying mansions of their own creation, with both themselves and everything else radiantly bright.

In the sixteen form world (rūpāvacara) planes, some radiant Brahmas, still and serene as statues made of assorted jewels, were seen enjoying the tranquillity of their attainments (samāpatti), while others were seen engaged in discussing the profound and delicate essence of the Dhamma. They were clearly seen with human eyes by virtue of the glories of the Fortunate One.

In the same way, down and deep in the earth, there are eight great infernal planes, and each plane has four sides or minor regions of punishment, sixteen in all, known as Ussada Niraya. In between every three universes is a minor region of punishment known as Lokantara Niraya. These are regions of utter darkness. In each plane of misery, there are [606] beings in great agony, serving terms of punishment according to their deserts, depending upon the intensity of their guilt. All the people on this earth could see these planes of misery and miserable beings clearly, by virtue of the glories of the Fortunate One.

All the Devas and Brahmas in the 10,000 world-element, who had arrived by means of their great powers, could be seen paying homage to the Buddha with hands raised and heads bowed in adoration and with minds filled with overwhelming wonder and devotion. They uttered verses in praise of the splendours and glories of the Buddha and spoke words of exuberant joy and happiness.

All these strange phenomena, such as the twin miracle, the six radiations from the body of the Buddha and witnessing the 10,000 world-element could be seen by all the people on this earth, caused much delight and reverential faith.

The Miraculous Display of Six Colours

The Buddha, who had demonstrated the twin miracles, had caused, by virtue of the twin miracle (yamaka-pāṭihariya-ñāṇa), the following radiations from his body:

1. Dark blue (nīla) radiation emanated from where the hair and the beard grew and from the iris of the eye, with the result that the whole sky appeared to have been sprinkled and scattered with powder of antimony or covered by the butterfly pea and blue lotus flowers; it resembled a moving fan made of bluish-green rubies; the whole sky was flooded with sapphire blue light.
2. Yellow (pīṭa) radiation emanated from the skin and the sockets of the eyes and all the golden parts of the Buddha. The entire environs were brightened by a golden colour as though the whole area was poured over with liquid gold or covered by a garment of gold, or as if saffron was sprinkled and golden silk cotton flowers strewn over it.
3. Red (lohita) radiation emanated from the flesh and blood and certain parts of the eyes and other red parts of the body. The entire environs was brightened by the red light as though dyed with vermilion or coated over with red lac, or covered with red velvet, or as if cloaked with noon flowers (Pentapeters phonecea), and Indian coral was strewn over it. The whole area was strangely and beautifully brightened by this radiation.
4. White (odata) radiation emanated from the bones, teeth and the eye-tooth of the Buddha, and from the whites of the eyes. The whole area looked as though covered with milk flowing constantly from silver pots, or with a silver ceiling hung with silver leaves and plates laid out layer upon layer, or a silver fan in motion, or as if wild jasmine, white lores, toothbrush tree, jasmine and Arabian jasmine were strewn all over the place.

5. Crimson (mañjetṭha) radiation emanated from the palms of the hands and soles of the feet, thereby beautifully brightening up the environs as though covered by a net of coral and flowers of the porcupine flower (Barleria prioniti) species.
6. Resplendent (pabhassara) radiation emanated from a single hair on the Buddha's forehead, nails of the fingers and toes, and all parts that shone, thereby brightening up the region as though filled with many constellations of the evening star and with flashes of lightning and currents of electricity. It was indeed a wondrously beautiful scene.<sup>206</sup>

The emanation of the six-hued radiance was indeed a strange phenomenon which resembled the continuous flow of streams of liquid gold, silver and ruby from a fountainhead shooting up to the roof of the universe and then descending to the edge of the universe. All the thousands of universes merged into a great, elegant, wonderful and beautiful golden mansion as it were with beams, rafters of assorted precious jewels.

On that day, the Buddha taught discourses in harmony with the inclinations of the people, at intervals, while demonstrating the twin miracles on the walk, which was laid from east to west, across the thousands of world-elements. He suspended the performance of miracles to allow a short interval of rest for the audience who, in return, said: Sādhu as [607] a gesture of gratitude. It was during these intervals that he looked into the dispositions of each and every member of the audience, who formed a sea of beings. To this end, he observed the mental process of each one of them by the exercise of contemplation of the mind (cittānupassanā), noting the sixteen different mental attitudes of each individual. One can only imagine the speed of the mind of Fully Self-Awakened Buddhas.

As stated above, the Buddha performed miracles and taught the Dhamma in harmony with the disposition and inclinations of the people, only after he had looked into and considered their mind process, with the result that numerous beings were emancipated from sentient existence through realization of the four noble truths. Indeed, it was the occasion of a great triumph of the Dhamma (Dhammābhisamaya).

The Creation of the Buddha's Double

The Buddha looked into the minds of individual persons, amongst a great company of beings, to find out if there were any who were capable of raising questions according to his own desire so that he might furnish the right answer, in return but he could not find anyone. So, he created his own double that gradually grew into two, then into three into four, and into hundreds, by multiplication.

There was an exchange of a series of questions and answers between himself and the mind-made Buddhas, alternately taking turns to raise questions and to answer. The mind-made Buddhas took up different postures while engaging in the dialogue: some were standing, some lying down, some walking and some sitting.

The glow and splendour of the six hues, together with the flames of fire and streams of water of the twin miracles of the Buddha, and brilliancy of the mind-made Buddhas, combined to light up the whole stretch of the sky, producing a clear array to an extent that lay beyond the capability of the disciples (sāvaka).

A great number of Devas and Brahmas spoke eulogies in praise of the glory, greatness and grace of the Buddha. The whole sky rang with the songs of the celestial beings. They poured showers of celestial flowers, the music from the thousands of musical instruments of the celestial beings combined with those of the human beings rent the air. It was indeed, as if a single grand festival of all beings was being celebrated.

Such an uncommon feat of the twin miracle was demonstrated by the Buddha by virtue of the wisdom peculiar to the Fully Self-Awakened Buddhas and not shared with Paccekabuddhas and disciples (asādhāraṇa-ñāṇa). Having had the opportunity to witness the miracles as well as listen to the teaching delivered at intervals, 200 million human beings, celestial Brahmas and other beings were emancipated at this great gathering performance of miracles.

25a: The 7th Rains Retreat (Abhidhamma)

[The first two sections are brought forward from the previous chapter to here as they are part of this story about the 7th Rains Retreat.]

The Buddha's Ascension to Tāvatiṃsa

The Buddha looked into the past, while still in the act of demonstrating the miracles, to see where his predecessors usually observed the Rains Retreat (Vassa) after demonstrating the miracles, and he perceived that they ascended to Tāvatiṃsa to observe the Rains Retreat (Vassa) and to preach the Abhidhamma to the celestial beings who were their respective mothers in their previous existence. Whereupon, he decided to ascend to Tāvatiṃsa, and as soon as he raised his right leg, the peak of Mount Yugandhara, with a height of 42,000 [608] leagues spontaneously moved to place its peak under the soles of his right foot. When the left foot was lifted, the summit of Great Meru, with a height of 84,000 leagues, came underneath his left foot automatically.

No one had seen the summits of Yugandhara and Great Meru bending to place themselves beneath the feet of the Buddha; nor did he take unseemly strides to reach Tāvatiṃsa. This is purely a matter of supernormal power, exclusively the domain of Fully Self-Awakened Buddhas and beyond all other beings to conceive.

The Buddha reached Tāvatiṃsa with only two steps. Tāvatiṃsa is on top of Mount Meru, and to reach its summit is to reach Tāvatiṃsa itself.

As soon as Sakka saw the Buddha, he mistakenly thought: “The Buddha might take up residence on the emerald slab to observe the Rains Retreat (Vassa) and the Devas and Brahmas would benefit from it. In such a case, no one would even have the chance of touching the emerald slab for the duration of the Rains Retreat. The emerald slab is of enormous size, being 60 leagues in length by 50 leagues in breadth by 15 leagues in height. When the Buddha resides on it for the whole Rains Retreat, it would resemble the scene of a sparrow resting on a big flat tray, leaving a great amount of space vacant.

Having read the thought of Sakka, the Buddha dropped his double robe on the slab and it was completely covered by it. Sakka was still of the idea that a great amount of space would still be wasted after the Buddha had sat on it, because even though the robe covered the whole slab of emerald, the Buddha's person would occupy only a small space.

The Buddha knew what was going on in the mind of Sakka and like a great elder sitting on a small stool and observing ascetic practice, he sat cross-legged on the emerald slab and occupied the whole slab with no space left.

Sakka realised his mistake and blamed himself for not knowing his own limitations: “What kind of person is the Buddha? We can never fully comprehend, nor can we discern to the full, the magnitude of his glorious attributes. About one such as the Buddha, replete with attributes beyond our mind’s power to conceive, I have conceived erroneous thoughts and ideas!” In open acknowledgment of his wrong, he paid respects with deep devotion and profound respect to the Buddha.

In the human world, the people were struck with wonder when the Buddha suddenly disappeared. While they were witnessing the marvellous miracle, as though hundreds of thousands of suns and moons had set and disappeared and so they discussed the cause of the disappearance of the Buddha among themselves.

Gato nu Citta-kūṭaṃ vā, Kelāsaṃ vā Yugandharaṃ, na no dakkhemu Sambuddhaṃ, loka-jeṭṭhaṃ narāsaḥaṃ.

The noblest leader of the three worlds, the most exalted and renowned Buddha, the omniscient one, has disappeared even now while we were witnessing the great miracle! We wonder if he has retreated far from this clamorous crowd to a place of seclusion like Mount Cittakūṭa, or to the silver mountain of Kelāsa or to Yugandhara?

They wept and uttered the above verse as they were discussing among themselves.

There were other people who opined that: “The Buddhas delight to dwell in seclusion. The Buddha must have reflected: ‘In spite of liking seclusion, I have gone and exhibited the strange and wonderful miracle to this great multitude,’ and feeling embarrassed he has retreated to a certain place of seclusion where no one could see him.” They wept and uttered the following verse: [609]

Paviveka-rato Dhīro, nimaṃ lokaṃ punehiti, na no dakkhemu Sambuddhaṃ, loka-jeṭṭhaṃ narāsaḥaṃ.

Now that the omniscient Buddha has retreated to a place of solitude where disturbances of the five senses are calmed, he will never again return to this frenetic human world, full of worldly temptations for the five human senses. The noblest leader of the three worlds, the most exalted and renowned Buddha, the omniscient one, has disappeared, even while we were worshipping.

People asked Ven. Mahā Moggallāna as to the present residence of the Buddha. Although he knew that the Buddha was in Tāvātimsa, he directed them to Ven. Anuruddha for an answer so that credit might be given to him. When they asked the great elder, they were told that the Buddha had taken up residence on the throne of Sakka, under the coral tree (Erythria indica) in Tāvātimsa, and was teaching the Abhidhamma to the celestial Devas headed by the mother of the Buddha in his previous existence. When asked about the return to earth of the Buddha, they were told that after teaching the Abhidhamma throughout the Rains Retreat he would return on the day of the Great Invitation (Mahā-pavāraṇa), which was the day of the traditional assembly of the Saṅgha at the end of the retreat, which falls on the full moon day of October (Assayuja).

These people decided: “We will not leave without paying homage to the Buddha,” and so they erected temporary pavilions with leaves and shrubs in that locality. The sky itself served as the roof and Mother Earth absorbed all the refuse used by them, and the whole area was left in a sanitary condition.

The Buddha had given prior instructions to Ven. Moggallāna to preach to these people, and the lay devotee, Cūḷa Anāthapiṇḍika, was charged with the responsibility of providing them with food. He provided them with broth, rice, sweet meats, betel, tea-leaves, sweet scents, flowers, clothing and all articles for human use, with nothing wanting. As arranged in anticipation, Ven. Mahā Moggallāna taught to them throughout the period of the Rains Retreat.

Devas and Brahmas from the 10,000 world-element gathered around the Buddha to hear the teaching of the Abhidhamma from the throne of Sakka, under the coral tree in the celestial world of Tāvātimsa. There was no one among the Devas and Brahmas who surpassed Buddha in appearance; indeed he surpassed all others in comeliness.

When the most gracious and exalted Buddha sat on the throne of Sakka, Santusita Deva, who was previously the Bodhisatta’s mother, descended from the Tusita plane and sat respectfully in front and on the side close to him.

Aṅkura Deva and Indaka Deva

Indaka Deva, who arrived after Santusita Deva, was seated on the right side close to the seat of Buddha, and Aṅkura sat on the left side in close proximity to him. Aṅkura Deva was obliged to make room for more powerful Devas and Brahmas every time they arrived until he was at a place twelve leagues away from the Buddha. But Indaka could retain his position. Here is why.

The genesis of Aṅkura's biography may be traced back to a dark period that followed the extinction of Buddha Kassapa's Dispensation. He was the youngest of the eleven children of Prince Upasāgara and Princess Devagabbhā. Prince Upasāgara was the son of King Mahā Sāgara of the Uttaramadhu country, and Princess Devagabbhā was the daughter of Mahā Kamsa, ruler of Asitañjana, a province of Uttarāpatha country. His eldest brother was Vāsudeva and eldest sister was Añjana Devī. [610]

When he came of age, his elder brothers made him the ruler of a town with a grant to receive the revenues of that town. This being his share of the spoils of victory after his elder brothers made a conquest of the whole of Jambudīpa with their political power. But he, in turn, surrendered the town to the eldest sister, Princess Añjana. He simply asked for exemption from taxation on merchandise involved in his private trading within the borders of their provinces. He led the life of a free trader. He was happy and content with his lot.

Once, he was put into a great difficulty through a shortage of provisions during his journey across a desert. There was a guardian deity of a banyan tree, who had the power to produce every necessary thing one could desire with only just a gesture of his right hand. He was a grateful deity and he fulfilled the needs of the prince and his people by producing their needs by pointing with his right hand, in repayment of his debt of gratitude towards the prince in a previous existence. The prince, out of curiosity, asked him about his mysterious power and he replied: "I was a poor tailor living near the house of a rich man, Asahya, in the town of Roruva. Once the rich man gave a great alms giving to the needy and I gladly assisted the poor who came my way by pointing my hand towards the direction of the pavilion of the rich man. I am thus enjoying the fruit of my voluntary labour! Thus, all things necessary for human use such as food and clothing flow copiously, as desired, from my right hand."

In emulation of the guardian deity of the banyan tree, Prince Aṅkura, on arrival back in the country of Dvāravatī, as a great alms giving, donated alms to everyone in the whole of Jambudīpa, which was 10,000 leagues in extent. Such an act of generosity bore an adverse affect on the machinery of taxation. It, indeed, paralysed the system of tax levying or any description and his elder brothers had to advise him to be generous, but with a sense of proportion. He shifted to the city of Dakkhiṇapāṭha in the Damiṭṭha country to resume his deeds of generosity along a stretch of land measuring twelve leagues, by the side of the ocean. All along that stretch, he had rows of alms food resting on tripods and almost touching one another. He lived to be 10,000 years old, giving generously all the while and passed away. He was reborn in the celestial plane of Tāvātimsa bearing the same name, Aṅkura.

Although Aṅkura had given much for such a long time, he did not get much in return, this is because his recipients were destitute of virtue during a period the worlds that were void of the Dispensation, just like a farmer who had sown his seeds on barren ground.

This is a brief sketch of the life of Aṅkura. For full particulars, please refer to the Stories about Petas (Peta-vatthu, Pv 2.9) and its commentary.

It was during the time of our Buddha Gotama and while Aṅkura Deva was enjoying the life of a celestial Deva in Tāvātimsa, that a young man by the name of Indaka offered, out of faith and devotion, a ladleful of rice to Ven. Anuruddha who was on alms round.

After his demise, he was reborn as a powerful Deva in Tāvātimsa, endowed with the ten privileges of celestial beings in reward for his meritorious deed done during the Dispensation of Buddha Gotama, like a farmer who had sown his seeds in a fertile field. He was known by the same name, Indaka.

The ten privileges of celestial beings are: 1) celestial objects of sight, 2) hearing, 3) odour, 4) taste, 5) touch; 6) longevity, 7) abundance of attendants, 8) good appearance, 9) wealth or prosperity and 10) supremacy.

Aṅkura Deva had to make room for the more powerful Devas and Brahmas attending the great Abhidhamma festival, so he was pushed back right up to 12 leagues from the Buddha, whereas Indaka Deva could retain his seat without having to make room for any other celestial beings.

When the Buddha saw the difference in the status of Aṅkura Deva and that of Indaka Deva, he thought it would be a good thing to bring out, for the sake of the edification of beings, the differences in the benefits accrued from deeds of merit done during the flourishing Dispensation of Fully Self-Awakened Buddhas and that from deeds of merit done during a period void of the Dispensation. The Buddha, therefore asked (Pv 322): [611]

Aṅkura, lay devotee, why do you have to move back and make room for powerful Devas and Brahmas on their arrival at this great Abhidhamma festival, even though you have to your credit the merit for offering food produced from a line of pots laid across a stretch of land twelve leagues in extent, for 10,000 years? Now you are twelve leagues far away from me. Come now and sit in my presence!

The Buddha's utterance of this interrogative verse reached the earth and was heard by those in the world of men. Aṅkura Deva's reply to the Buddha's question constitutes one and a half verses and the supplementary verse by the great elder Saṅgītikārika constitutes half a verse, amounting to two verses, and these were systematically recorded in the proceedings of the Buddhist Council in Pāḷi as follows (Pv 323-324):

*Codito bhāvitattena, Aṅkuro idam-abravi:
Kiṃ mayhaṃ tena dānena, dakkhiṇeyyena suññatāṃ, ayaṃ so Indako yakkho, dajjā dānaṃ parittakāṃ, atirocati amhehi, cando tāra-gaṇe yathā.*

Having been questioned by the Buddha who had practised two types of meditation conducive to mental and physical composure, Aṅkura Deva, who had done meritorious deeds during a long dark period which was void of the Dispensation respectfully made a reply, as follows: "Most exalted Buddha, there is a kind of meritorious deed done assiduously during a period void of the Dispensation when there was not a single virtuous person deserving of an offering of alms. How could my meritorious deed even though done for a long time during the period void of the Dispensation help me stand in good stead!

Although Indaka Deva, who is in your presence, had offered just a ladleful of rice to Ven. Anuruddha, with faith and devotion, he has received a reward that surpasses mine like a silvery moon that out-shines a multitude of stars; and for the same reason, he has the good fortune to enjoy the ten privileges of the Devas which are superior to those like us who have done meritorious deeds during a period void of the Dispensation!"

Whereupon, the Buddha asked Indaka Deva: “Indaka, you have been sitting on my right side without making a move? Why don’t you have to make room for powerful Devas as and when they arrive, now and again?” This was Indaka’s reply: “Most exalted Buddha, my case may be likened to that of a farmer who had sown a small amount of seeds in a fertile plot, and by the same analogy, I had the good fortune to have a recipient worthy of offering,” and he went ahead to utter four verses in praise of the qualities and qualifications of the recipients of gifts (Pv 325-328):

*Ujjaṅgale yathā khette, bījaṃ bahum-pi ropitaṃ, [612] na vipulaṃ phalaṃ hoti, napi toseti kassakaṃ.
Tatheva dānaṃ bahukaṃ, dussīlesu paṭiṭṭhitaṃ, na vipulaṃ phalaṃ hoti, napi toseti dāyakaṃ.*

Although a great amount of seeds are sown in a plot on a hillock which is rocky, salty, caustic, barren and broken, the yield would be negligible and disappointing to the farmer.

By the same analogy, notwithstanding the vastness of an offering made to a recipient, who is destitute of virtue during a period which is void of the Dispensation, the benefit accrued therefrom would be negligible and disappointing to the supporter.

*Yathā pi bhaddake khette, bījaṃ appam-pi ropitaṃ, sammā dhāraṃ paveccante, phalaṃ tosesi kassakaṃ.
Tatheva sīlavantesu, guṇavantesu tādisu, appakam-pi kataṃ kāraṃ, puññaṃ hoti mahapphalaṃ.*

Most exalted Buddha, just as the yield of products pleases a farmer who works hard in sowing seeds in a fertile field of first class soil which receives a regular shower of rain every fifteen days; or of medium class soil that receives regular showers every ten days, or of a third class soil that receives regular shower of rain every five days.

So also, rewards accrued from a meritorious deed of offering gifts to noble persons (ariya-puggala), who are virtuous and self-composed, will turn out to be great and prosperous, as in the case of the yield of seeds grown in a fertile field.

Thus Indaka had drawn a distinction between deeds of merit done in favour of two different kinds of recipients at two different periods by way of four verses. Whereupon, the Buddha said: “Aṅkura, it is only right and proper that one makes a choice of both the gift and the recipient. A fitting reward could only materialise through the choice of the type of gifts and the type of recipient, just like good seeds that are sown in fertile soil. Of course, you could not make offerings in the manner just described since you happened to be born in a wrong period when there was no Dispensation, opposed to the right period when there is a Dispensation. Wherefore, your meritorious deeds were not as fruitful as those of Indaka.” The following four verses were uttered by the Buddha for the sake of clarification (Pv 329-330):

Viceyya dānaṃ dāttabbaṃ, yattha dinnaṃ mahapphalāṃ, viceyya dānaṃ datvāna, saggam gacchanti dāyakā.

O Añkura Deva, offerings made to persons of virtue with faith and [613] generosity bring about an abundance of rewards. A good choice of recipients should be made before offerings are made. Offerings of gifts to selected persons with faith and generosity invariably lead the supporter to the world of the Devas.

*Viceyya dānaṃ sugatappasaṭṭhaṃ, ye dakkhiṇeyyā idha jīva-loke,
etesu dinnāni mahapphalāni,
bījāni vuttāni yathā sukhette.*

The choice of both gift and recipient has been highly praised by a succession of Buddhas. There are virtuous persons with longevity in this world. Gifts dedicated to such persons of virtue with faith and generosity will invariably bring about wealth and happiness to the supporters while in the worlds of men and Devas before his attainment to the final goal of Nibbāna, as in the case of sowing the choicest seeds of five kinds.<sup>207</sup>

The Buddha went on to preach four more verses that lead to Nibbāna through the avenues of path and fruition stages (Dhp 356-359):

Tiṇa-dosāni khettāni, rāga-dosā ayaṃ pajā, tasmā hi vīta-rāgesu, dinnaṃ hoti mahapphalāni.

There have been instances where potential seeds have been thrown on the fields full of grass and weeds. The same are gifts that have been offered to

---

<sup>207</sup> Bīja or germ, five in number: root, aggregation, germ, fruit and seed; each of these is able to grow when separated from the tree.

Devas and humans who are destitute of virtue and full of passion (rāga). Therefore, an offering of gifts should be made to the noble persons (ariya-puggala) who are void of passion (rāga), with a view to enjoy worldly life in the planes of Devas and humans before the attainment of the final goal of Nibbāna.

Tiṇa-dosāni khettāni, dosa-dosā ayam pajā, tasmā hi vīta-dosesu, dinnam hoti mahapphalam.

Just as there are arable lands full of grass and weeds, so there are Devas and humans who are destitute of virtue and full of anger. Wherefore, one should see to it that gifts are offered to those who are free from malice, so that one may enjoy the worldly life of Devas and humans before attainment of the final goal of Nibbāna.

Tiṇa-dosāni khettāni, moha-dosā ayam pajā, tasmā hi vīta-mohesu, dinnam hoti mahapphalam.

Just as the arable lands are naturally full of grass and shrubs, so Devas and humans are full of delusion. So gifts should be offered only to the noble persons (ariya-puggala), who are devoid of delusion, so that one may enjoy the worldly life in the planes of Devas and humans before attainment of the final goal of Nibbāna.

Tiṇa-dosāni khettāni, icchā-dosā ayam pajā, tasmā hi vigaticchesu, dinnam hoti mahapphalam.

Just as arable lands are naturally full of grass and shrubs, so Devas and humans are naturally imbued with the five kinds of desire for the pleasures of the [614] five senses. Wherefore, gifts should be offered to the noble persons (ariya-puggala) who are void of desire (iccha). Such an act of merit invariably brings about a pleasant life in the planes of Devas and humans even up to the attainment of the final goal of Nibbāna.

At the conclusion of the discourse, Aṅkura Deva and Indaka Deva attained the fruition state of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti), and the discourse was of great benefit to all other Devas and Brahmas, as well. [615]

Teaching the Abhidhamma

Having established Aṅkura and Indaka Deva in the fruition stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti), the Buddha continued to stay on to observe the 7th Rains Retreat (Vassa), sitting crossed-legged on Sakka's throne in Tāvātimsa and taught the Abhidhamma, day and night, to all those Devas from the 10,000 world-element who rallied around him, with Santusita Deva, who had previously been his mother, at their head. He started with the law of good action and its result (kusala-dhamma); bad action and its result (akusala-dhamma); neutral or amoral or indeterminate action (abyākata-dhamma); teaching round the clock, like the river of the sky flowing continuously, for the duration of the Rains Retreat.

[An examination of these items open the first book of the Abhidhamma, the Enumeration of Phenomena (Dhamma-saṅgaṇī)].

Buddhas deliver discourses before noon in praise of food offered, such discourses could be as long as the Collection of the Long Discourses (Dīgha-nikāya) and the Collection of the Middle Length Discourses (Majjhima-nikāya) put together. The discourses taught to the Devas and Brahmas who arrived in the afternoon have the combined lengths of the Collection of the Thematic Discourses (Saṃyutta-nikāya) and the Collection of the Numerical Discourses (Āṅguttara-nikāya).

This is because the thought-process of the Buddha is very fast, with very few intervening underlying consciousnesses (bhavaṅga). And as the Buddha's lips are proportionate and firmly set, the lip movements are precise. The tongue is long, slender and delicate. All these features contribute to production of a voice that is melodious, and that speaks very quickly and clearly.

It is stated that when an ordinary average person had spoken a word, Ven. Ānanda had spoken eight words; when Ven. Ānanda had spoken one word, the Buddha had spoken sixteen words. It has thus been calculated that the Buddha's rate of speech is 128 times faster than that of an average person.

Thus, with such an unimaginable quick speech, it is no wonder that the Buddha taught the long discourses, in appreciation of the offering of food, before noon and more lengthy discourses to Devas who arrived in the afternoon. The Abhidhamma that the Buddha taught during that Rains Retreat (Vassa) of three months is thus endless and incomparable.

In case a question such as this arises: “How did the Buddha maintain his body when he was engaged in teaching the Abhidhamma during the whole period of the Rains Retreat (Vassa) lasting three months?” The brief reply is he did it by regular provision of nourishment.

The following is the extensive answer: all Buddhas are mindful of such matters; they usually follow the progress of time in the world of man while in the act of teaching the Abhidhamma. When the time came for going on alms round, he created a Buddha after his own image, acting after his own manner in handling the bowl and holding the robe and with a voice like his own. He caused the mind-made Buddha to preach the Abhidhamma to the extent prescribed.

The Buddha then left for Anotatta deep in the Himālayas with his bowl and robe. On his arrival at Lake Anotatta, Devas presented him with a twig frayed at one end. After brushing his teeth with the twig, he took a bath in the lake. After his bath, he stood on the slab of orpiment and donned the well-dyed double robe. He then took the brown stone-bowl that was offered by the Four Great Kings (Catumahā-rājika), under the Rājāyatana tree, that is, at the seventh place of the seven places at which Buddha Gotama spent seven days each after attaining Buddhahood. Each Deva had offered one bowl and the four were pressed into one by the Buddha with his hands. He then proceeded to the north continent of Uttarakuru for receiving alms food, and on return, he partook of the food on the peaceful bank of the enchanting and delightful Lake Anotatta. After his meal, he proceeded [616] to the forest of sandalwood trees to spend the day.

Ven. Sāriputta, the general of the Dhamma, went to the sandalwood forest to attend on the Buddha and stood at a place that was free from the six faults. Whereupon, the Buddha told Ven. Sāriputta: “Dear son Sāriputta, I have taught this much of the Dhamma.” He would only give the gist and the guidelines, but Ven. Sāriputta, being endowed with the four analytic knowledges (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa), could fully grasp the Dhamma outlined by the Buddha, like a man who is shown the vast ocean by someone with an outstretched hand. He had the ability to understand it in a hundred and in a thousand ways.

The Buddha returned to Tāvātimsa in the afternoon to resume his teaching there. With the exception of the powerful Devas, no one knew that a mind-made Buddha was teaching the Abhidhamma in the place of the real Buddha and that the real Buddha had gone to the human world and had returned from it. The mind-made Buddha was an exact replica in all respects: in emission of radiance, in voice and in the manner of speaking.

Ven. Sāriputta Teaches the Abhidhamma

Ven. Sāriputta, having learnt the Abhidhamma briefly from the Buddha daily, taught it in a form neither too brief nor too elaborate to his 500 monastic disciples, who had been common bats in a previous existence.

This is a short account of their previous life: They were little common bats dwelling in a cave, hanging down from its roof, in the time of Buddha Kassapa. They heard the recitation of the Abhidhamma by two monastics well-versed in the Abhidhamma. They had not even the slightest idea of what was meant by the waxing and waning of the moon, but, their attention was drawn to the recitation of the Abhidhamma by the monastics' pleasant and harmonious tone.

The bats had no idea of what was meant by the Abhidhamma, the aggregates, sensation, elements, truths, not even the waxing and waning of the moon, but since the tone of the recitation by the monastics served as a good object (kamma-nimitta) of their dying consciousness for the following life, they were reborn in the plane of Devas.

They enjoyed the life of Devas from the time of Buddha Kassapa up to the time of Buddha Gotama, not being born even once in the lower planes. At the time of the present Buddha, they were reborn in the world of humans. They witnessed the twin miracle, which aroused their faith and devotion and made them receive ordination under the personal supervision of Ven. Sāriputta. Everyday, Ven. Sāriputta taught them the Abhidhamma in an extended form as he had learnt it from the Buddha in an abridged version.

The teaching of the Abhidhamma by the Buddha in the world of Devas came to a close simultaneously with the completion of the full study of the Abhidhamma taken up by the 500 monastics under Ven. Sāriputta in the world of humans.

Everyday the Buddha informed Ven. Sāriputta of the nature and extent of the Abhidhamma taught by both himself and the mind-made Buddha in Tāvātimsa and instructed him to teach his 500 disciples as necessary, before he returned to resume teaching from the point where the mind-made Buddha had concluded.

The teaching of the Abhidhamma came to a close at the end of the Rains Retreat (Vassa), on the full moon day of October (Assayuja), with the result that 800 billion Devas and Brahmas were emancipated through realization of the four noble truths. Santusita Deva, the Buddha's mother in the human world, also attained the fruition state of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti).

On the ninth waxing moon of October (Assayuja), people lingering within the area of 36 leagues, went and asked Ven. Mahā Moggallāna: “Venerable sir, it would be right and proper that we enquire as to the time of the Buddha’s return to earth; we will not go back to our own homes until we have paid homage to the Buddha.” Ven. Mahā [617] Moggallāna said: “Very well,” and dived right into the earth and went right up to the base of Mount Meru. He willed that people should see him ascend to Tāvātimsa rising from within Mount Meru. Then like a fine golden string threaded through a ruby he was clearly visible to the people, ascending from within the centre of the mountain to Tāvātimsa.

People who saw Ven. Mahā Moggallāna during the course of his ascent to the summit through the inside of the mountain measured his progress in terms of leagues saying: “Now he has ascended one league, now he has ascended two leagues,” etc. On arrival at Tāvātimsa it was as if the Buddha’s feet rested on the head of Ven. Moggallāna who then approached the Buddha with profound respect and addressed him saying: “Most exalted lord, people will not return to their home without paying homage to you and they are anxious to know the time of your descent to the world of humans.” The Buddha asked: “Dear son Moggallāna, where, at present, is your elder brother Sāriputta?” Whereupon Ven. Moggallāna replied: “Most exalted lord, he has been keeping the Rains Retreat (Vassa) at Saṅkassa.”

The Buddha made the following reply: “Dear son Moggallāna, I will descend at the gate of Saṅkassa on the seventh day from now, which falls on the full moon day of October (Assayuja), the time for the celebration of the Great Invitation festival (Mahā-pavāraṇa). The distance between the two towns is 30 leagues, but tell the people they need not bring any food for the journey, just as they would observe the precepts and go without taking any food or provisions to the monasteries at the head of the towns and villages but to listen to my teaching on this day. Ven. Mahā Moggallāna replied “Very well, most exalted lord.” On arrival back on earth, he relayed the Buddha’s message to the people.

Buddha’s Descent from Tāvātimsa

The Buddha made known his departure to Sakka: “Lay devotee Sakka, the Lord of the Devas, by way of formal leave taking I am informing you that I shall be returning to the world of humans.

At the close of the Rains Retreat (Vassa), on the full moon day of October (Assayuja), Sakka created a set of three stairways, one of gold, another of ruby and another of silver, side by side, with the bases at the gate of Saṅkassa and with their upper end resting on the summit of Mount Meru. The golden stairway on the right hand side was reserved for the Devas; the silver stairway on the left-hand side was reserved for the Great Brahmas; the ruby stairway in the middle was exclusively for the Buddha.

The Buddha, on the eve of departure, stood on the summit of Mount Meru and performed the twin miracle of water and fire, and looked up at the sky. The whole region, right up to the realm of the Akaniṭṭha Brahmas, appeared as an open space, unobstructed and clearly visible and when he looked downwards, he could see Avīci hell at the bottom of the eight planes of misery; when he looked forward and sideways, in all directions, thousands of world-elements could be seen without any obstruction whatsoever. The strange scene was witnessed by all the humans, Devas and Brahmas. Thus all the Devas and Brahmas could see the human beings and human beings could see them.

The Buddha caused the emanation of the six-hued radiance from his body as he descended from Tāvātimsa to the world of humans, and there was no one in that crowd of spectators of 36 leagues in circumference, who did not aspire to Buddhahood when they noticed the grandeur, greatness, grace and glory of the Buddha.

The Devas came down along the golden stairway on the right hand side. The Brahmas came along down the silver stairway on the left-hand side. The Buddha alone descended by the ruby stairway in the middle. Pañcasikkha Deva on the right side of Buddha, paid homage by playing his beluva-wood harp; Suyāma Deva also came along on the right side, fanning the Buddha with a fan made of yak-tail hair; Santusita Deva came along on the same side fanning the Buddha with a fan studded with rubies, Sakka on the right hand side also blew the Vijayuttara conch shell. Devas from the rest of the world-element also came along paying homage in adoration in various ways. Brahmas came along by the silver stairway, holding the Brahmas' white umbrella over the head of the Buddha as a gesture of profound respect. [618]

Thus the Buddha descended to earth in the manner described above, and on arrival, stood at the gate of the town of Saṅkassa. Those people, who were gathered at Sāvattḥī city, left after the morning meal, looking forward to seeing the Buddha on the Invitation (Pavāraṇa) day, at the end of the Rains Retreat (Vassa). They eventually reached the gates of Saṅkassa town as quickly and effortlessly as if they were going to the monastery at the head of their village.

Ven. Sāriputta was the first person to pay homage to the Buddha as soon as he had set his right foot on the earth on arrival from Tāvatiṃsa. All those who were also present followed suit subsequently. The spot where the Buddha had set his right foot on the earth was later regarded as a sacred place and named the Unmoveable Shrine (Acala Cetiya).

The spot, where the Buddha set his right foot on reaching the earth, on his return from Tāvatiṃsa at the end of the Rains Retreat (Vassa), after teaching the Abhidhamma in keeping with the practice of Buddhas, is also regarded as one of the sacred places termed the unabandoned places (avijahitaṭṭhāna).

Every Buddha after teaching the Abhidhamma in Tāvatiṃsa during the whole of the Rains Retreat (Vassa), on return to earth by the three stairways, had always first set his right foot on the very spot where the triple stairways were placed at the gate of Saṅkassa.

The Four Unabandoned Places

Here, as it is appropriate and needs to be specially noted, a brief mention will be made of the four unabandoned places. The permanent sacred sites utilized by all Buddhas for the same purposes with unchanging uniformity are known as the unabandoned places (avijahitaṭṭhāna). They are four in number, namely:

1. The site of the Mahā Bodhi tree, the victory throne (aparājita) where all Buddhas have conquered the five kinds of death (māra).

The very spot where there arose the unconquered throne for our Buddha Gotama had been the site of the unconquered thrones of all Buddhas. There is no change of location.

2. The Deer Park at Isipatana, where our Buddha Gotama taught the Dhamma Wheel (Dhamma-cakka), the first discourse.

This is the location where all the Buddhas had also taught the Dhamma Wheel. It is not taught at any other place.

3. The spot on which the Buddhas usually first set their right foot on their return from Tāvatiṃsa after teaching the Abhidhamma there.

The gate of Saṅkassa town is that sacred place in our Buddha Gotama's time.

4. The location of the Buddhas' bedstead where the four legs of the Buddhas' bedstead usually rested without change.

The scented chamber of Buddha Gotama in the monastery of Jetavana was the site where his bedstead lay.

[A short passage which repeats information given earlier about the size of the Jetavana has been removed, see chapter 20c, under the Construction of the Jetavana for details.]

Although the size of the location of the monasteries differs through the passage of time, the location of the Buddha's scented chamber remained the same without any change.

As stated before, Ven. Sāriputta approached the Buddha after he first set his right foot at the head of the stairway, paid homage to him and addressed him: "All the Devas and laity here are filled with adoration for you, so much that they all long to become Buddhas." Whereupon the Buddha replied: "Dear son Sāriputta, it is true that all the humans, Devas and Brahmas love and revere the Buddhas for their being great, gracious and glorious," and then he uttered the following verse, in preparation to a discourse which he would be teaching (Dhp 181):

Ye jhāna-pasutā Dhīrā, nekkhammūpasame ratā, devā pi tesam pihayanti, Sambuddhānaṃ satīmataṃ.

Dear son Sāriputta, all the Fully Self-Awakened Buddhas have gained mastery over absorption (jhāna) practices in five ways and they delight in these absorptions. They also abide usually in fruition attainment (phala-samāpatti) that has, as its object, the absolute truth of Nibbāna, which is free from all suffering (dukkha). Even the Devas and Brahmas of the celestial regions have made the remark with great adoration and esteem for the Buddhas, who are always abiding in full mindfulness: "How great would it be, if we who have had this rare opportunity were to become Buddhas?"

According to the Dhamma Verses (Dhammapada) commentary, 300 million humans, Devas and Brahmas were emancipated at the conclusion of the discourse; and the 500 disciples of Ven. Sāriputta became Arahats as a result.

The Attributes of Ven. Sāriputta

While still standing at the head of the stairway, the Buddha contemplated thus: “People, who gathered here at this assembly, know that Ven. Moggallāna is the greatest in the matter of absorption; Ven. Anuruddha in supernatural vision; Ven. Puṇṇa Mantāṇiputta is a celebrated teacher in Dhamma; but no one knows the attributes of Ven. Sāriputta.”

Therefore, he thought it would be proper to bring the knowledge and wisdom of Ven. Sāriputta to the limelight in some way or the other. He asked Ven. Sāriputta questions relating to the problems of ordinary average people (putthujjana), those of noble persons in the three lower paths and fruition stages (sekkha), and those of Arahats (asekkha), in the presence of all those present at the time. Ven. Sāriputta gave prompt answers to each and every question, stage by stage, concerning ordinary average persons, in the three lower path and fruition stages and the Arahats, the perfected ones, with the result that all those present came to realise Ven. Sāriputta’s state of exaltation in wisdom.

The Buddha then proceeded to say: “Sāriputta has not exceeded the average level of intelligence only now, but he had also excelled others in the matter of knowledge and wisdom, in past existences also.” He then related the Birth Story about More than a Thousand Fools (Paro-sahassa-jātaka, Ja 99) and its commentary, given here in an abridged form.

The Birth Story about More Than a Thousand Fools

Once upon a time, there lived in a forest, at the foot of a hill, more than 1,000 [620] recluses who lived on herbs, fruits and roots. Once their teacher fell sick, and the most senior disciple went out in search of medicine, leaving instructions with his juniors to attend on their teacher with due care and diligence.

The great teacher passed away before the return of the senior disciple. Upon a request being made by the disciples regarding the attainment of absorption (jhāna-samāpatti) on the verge of his demise, the old sage told them: Natthi kiñci, implying the third formless absorption (akiñcaññāyatana). Anyone wishing to abide in the third formless meditation (arūpa-jhāna) must first and foremost contemplate on the concept of non-existence of the first formless absorption repeatedly. This in fact was what the great master had in his mind when he said: Natthi kiñci.

But the disciples had missed the point and misunderstood the great master to mean that he had attained nothing (Natthi kiñci literally means: “there is none”), and they looked down upon him as one who had not attained any stage of meditation attainment (jhāna-samāpatti) and they did nothing about the burial rites concerning his remains.

The great sage was accomplished in the third formless absorption (akiñcaññāyatana-jhāna) by which the formless Brahma realm is attainable but when asked by his disciples he simply said: Natthi kiñci, and passed away to be reborn in the Ābhassara Brahma realm which is attainable by the second form absorption (rūpāvacara-jhāna). This is because the four formless Brahma realms are not befitting (abhabba) for Bodhisattas.

On his return with suitable medicine, the senior disciple was told that the great teacher had passed away. He asked his juniors if they had asked him anything. They replied: “Aye, we asked, but Natthi kiñci was his reply, and he must, therefore, have gone without attaining any absorption (jhāna) level whatsoever.”

The senior disciple explained to them thus: “You have no idea of what the great master meant. Our great teacher is endowed with the third formless absorption.” He thus gave them a correct interpretation again and again to convince them.

But his correct answer simply fell on deaf ears. When the great teacher, the Bodhisatta, then living as an Ābhassara Brahma, came to know about the unhappy situation, he contemplated that he should reveal the truth by removing the doubt entertained by those ignoramuses, who were groping in the dark. Therefore, the great sage descended from the Ābhassara Brahma world to the world of humans. Positioning himself high above the roof of the hermitage with great power, and wishing to praise the senior disciple’s wisdom, he uttered the verse (Ja 99):

*Paro-sahassam-pi samāgatānaṃ, kandeyyumaṃ te vassa-sataṃ apaññā,
eko va seyyo puriso sapañño, yo bhāsitassa vijānāti atthaṃ.*

Those without any knowledge may cry for 100 years but they will have no idea whatsoever of what their master meant to say. The only person, among an assemblage of over 1,000 persons, capable of understanding what was meant, is worthy of praise.

The great teacher returned to the world of Brahmās after teaching the discourse. All the recluses attained absorption (jhāna-samāpatti) as a result of his visit, and they were reborn in Brahma worlds after death.

In winding up the discourse, the Buddha revealed that Ven. Sāriputta was then the senior disciple and he was the Great Brahma in the Ābhassara Brahma realm.

The Discourse Where Sāriputta Asked Questions

After the Buddha had taught the preceding discourse, Ven. Sāriputta put forward a questionnaire concerning the suitable and desirable abodes, lawful resorts for alms, meditation practices, etc. for the benefit of his disciples who were undergoing training under his personal supervision. These were presented to the Buddha in eight verses and [621] the Buddha gave a series of answers in thirteen verses (Sāriputta-sutta, Snp 4.16).<sup>208</sup>

1. I, Sāriputta, have hitherto never seen or heard of a great sage of a sect, who has come into his mother's womb from the celestial abode of Tāvātimsa, who speaks so pleasantly and is endowed with the power of performing miracles, with all the greatness, graciousness and glory of a Fully Self-Awakened Buddha.

2. All the humans, Devas and Brahmās have seen him truly as one who has dispelled the darkness of delusion, as one who is peerless and unique, enjoying the calm state of absorption (jhāna), and the serene and tranquil state of Nibbāna. All the humans, Devas and Brahmās have looked upon him as the possessor of the five eyes.

The five eyes are: 1) The human eye (maṃsa); 2) the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu); 3) insight-wisdom (pañña-vipassanā); 4) the all-seeing eye (samanta-cakkhu); and 5) the Buddha eye (Buddha-cakkhu).

3. Most exalted Buddha, who is free from the two defilements of clinging and wrong view, one who is not to be moved or shaken by worldly vicissitudes, one who has never tried to attract the attention of people by trickery, who has come to the gate of the city of Saṅkassa as the leader of a sect I, Sāriputta, have come to this place with the object of presenting to you problems for your solution in the interest of my disciples.

4-5. How many fearful and offensive sense objects are there, that are harmful to a noble monastic, who retires through fear and loathing of the dangers of birth, etc., to the quiet root of a tree, a cemetery, a secluded place or a short-legged bedstead in a cave?

6. How many kinds of danger are there to suppress, which a noble monastic may encounter as he speeds his way to the strange yet unattained land of Nibbāna, in his lonely forest hermitage on the outskirts of a town or village?

7. What are the words which a noble monastic may speak? What are the lawful resorts for a noble monastic? What are the meditation practices a noble monastic should develop with intensity?

8. How should a noble monastic observe the precepts with steadfastness, mature judgment and clear mindfulness to discard the dust of the defilements, just as a goldsmith purifies gold?

Thus Ven. Sāriputta presented eight verses, of which the first three verses are in praise of the attributes of the Buddha, and the remaining five are regarding the practice which his 500 monastics should observe.

1. Dear son Sāriputta, there are two things that a person of good birth who is pursuing path-knowledge, and who retires to a place of seclusion through fear of transient existence, ought to know: The way to live in peace and tranquillity and the practice to be cultivated. I will preach to you these two things as I know them from practical knowledge and not simply by inference.

2-3. Dear son Sāriputta, a person of intellect and mindfulness should not get frightened or be shaken when he comes into contact with five kinds of dangers, such as: Gadflies, mosquitoes, flies; snakes, scorpions, centipedes, mice; burglars and robbers; quadrupeds, such as lions, leopards and tigers; people outside of the teaching without faith in the Three Treasures who cause inconvenience by their annoying antagonistic views and questions. One should not get alarmed or frightened by those five kinds of terrible objects, just described. [622] Further, a noble monastic in striving for the attainment of Nibbāna by following a good true path should suppress the following five internal enemies in addition to those just described:

4. Disease, hunger, cold, heat, and, when the noble monastic experienced inconvenience through contact with any of these dangers, he must resist or put up with them, as such sensations and ailments are conducive to the arising of the ten modes of wrong conduct by deed, word and thought. He should protect himself by means of earnest effort (sammappadhāna).

In answer to the question the Buddha mentioned these 5 kinds of internal enemies. Having dealt with these questions, the Buddha proceeded to deal with the rest of the questions in 9 verses as enumerated below.

5. A noble monastic must always refrain from stealing and lying; he must wish for the well-being of both those who still have taints of craving (tasa) and those who have already eradicated craving (thāvara). He must dispel all ten modes of wrong deeds, in short, the group of unwholesome deeds, as they are the associates of Māra.

The four modes of moral conduct as prescribed in this verse are:
Avoidance of stealing and lying, wishing for the well-being of all fellow men and abandoning of immoral conduct.

6. A noble monastic must not yield to anger (kodha) and unrestrained conceit (atimāna). The root causes of these two unwholesome factors are six in number: ignorance (avijjā), wrong attitude (manasikāra), self-conceit (asmimāna), lack of sense of conscience (ahiri), lack of concern over the evil consequences of misdeeds (anottappa), and distraction (uddhacca). These root causes must be up-rooted or extirpated. In addition, a sense of affection and hatred must be overcome by a state of balance of the mind or equanimity.

By this, four practices are described: Anger and conceit must be discarded; the six root causes of these must be removed; and objects of affection and hatred must be avoided by means of equanimity.

A noble monastic is required to cultivate comprehension and develop the ten contemplations. With the force of joyful satisfaction (pīti) developed thereby, the aforesaid enemies, both internal and external must be abandoned.

This is the Buddha's exhortation for the expulsion or destruction of internal and external enemies by means of the contemplation of the ten (anussati) recollections which are the ten contemplations or reflections on the Buddha, the Dhamma, the Sangha, morality (sīla), charity (cāga), the gods (Devatā), death (maraṇa), the body (kāyagatā), the breath (ānaṇā) and calm (upasamana).<sup>209</sup> Joy (pīti) arising from meditation should be utilized as a means of developing forbearance. This is a means of overcoming those forces of the enemy.

7. One should overcome disinterestedness in a hermitage of seclusion and through development of meditation by such means of expediency so as to ensure a full measure of success. Such means of expediency should also be adopted in defeating the four causes of lamentation enumerated below.

Four Causes of Lamentation

1. What kind of food shall I have to eat today: is it rice, or barley cake, or fish, or meat?
2. At what place will I have to eat: at the palace of the king, or the house of a Brahmin or of a rich man?
3. I had to sleep miserably last night: on a plank of wood, a coarse mattress, a piece of leather or a heap of grass.
4. In what kind of luxurious place shall I have to sleep tonight: on an ornamented bed, or a four-legged bedstead?

These four kinds of reflections or speculations are known as the four causes of [623] lamentation.

8. A monastic, cultivating the practice of morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā), being free from the impediments (paḷibodha), such as an attachment to clan, sect, shelter and requisites, should abandon the worries connected with food and lodging. These four types of worries should be given up.

A noble monastic is apt to lament under pressure of such anxieties or worries. He is therefore required to cut off all four impediments such as attachment to clan or supporter, members of his sect, dwelling place and requisites.

When a monastic acquires food and robe lawfully at proper times, he should have the sense of judgment or moderation in accepting and using them with a view to promoting the sense of contentment.

As regards the matter of judgment or moderation, a monastic should take into consideration the quantity of objects for offering, the extent of the supporter's intention, and the extent of one's requirement. In case the quantity of objects outweighs the intention of the supporter, the recipient should be content with a limited amount of alms. When the amount of alms available is comparatively smaller than what the supporter has in mind to offer, the recipient should still receive only limited amount of alms. Where the amount of alms is large enough to satisfy the wishes of the supporter to offer large amount of alms, the recipient should still receive just enough to meet his own requirements. Hence the term denoting receiving just the amount required: the utilization or consumption of the four requisites by way of retrospection is known as receiving by knowing the right measure (paṭiggaha-mattaññutā).

9. A noble monastic, having guarded himself against unwholesome states by observing the two sets of observance in respect of receiving and utilizing the four requisites, should enter the towns and villages with an agreeable deportment, and avoid the use of harsh words, even in dealing with those who have calumniated him.

It means that a noble monastic should receive and utilize alms in accordance with the two modes of moderation, should move about with proper deportment in towns and villages, and, should refrain from the use of harsh words even when one deals with those who had calumniated him.

10. A noble monastic should keep his eyes cast downwards, should not wander about. He should endeavour to attain the absorptions (jhāna) that have not been attained, to acquire the five kinds of mastery over the absorptions that have been attained; should sleep mindfully, only four hours a day and only in the middle watch of the night, and spend the rest of the day, sitting or walking while observing the precepts incumbent on a monastic. Through such activities, equanimity is developed by means of the fourth absorption. When the mind is well-composed, sensuous thoughts (kāma-vitakka), sensuous perceptions (kāma-saññā) and a restless movement of hands and feet through worry and scruples (kukkucca) are restrained.

11. Any instruction given by one's preceptor, such as: "This is not right and proper," should be noted, regarded with sincere delight and gratitude. Ill-will or an unfriendly attitude towards one's associates should not be entertained. It should be eradicated as a thorn is eradicated. Only faultless speech should be made, never talk beyond the scope of the discipline of morality, concentration and wisdom or beyond the limits of time.

One will be liable to be criticized and reproached for a breach of precepts and moral conduct, for wrong view and for a wrong mode of livelihood. It is, therefore, necessary to refrain from such immoral conduct, even in thought, not to say in physical or verbal acts.

12. Dear Sāriputta, besides this, in this world, there are five kinds of stains: passion for visible forms (rūpa-rāga), passion for sounds (sadda-rāga) passion for smells (gandha-rāga), passion for tastes (rasa-rāga) and passion for touches (phoṭṭhabba-rāga). All such passions should be removed by the practice of morality, concentration and wisdom with mindfulness. Constant practice will enable the monastic to overcome these five stains.

The five kinds of stains should be done away with by observance of the three trainings [624]. Only those who observe these precepts can overcome these five kinds of stains, no one else can do so.

13. Once these five kinds of stains are done away with, the monastic will no longer take delight in the five objects of sensual pleasures. That monastic, having mindfulness and emancipated from the grip of the hindrances, contemplates at the appropriate time all that is conditioned as impermanent, unsatisfactory and unsubstantial with resolute steadfastness. His mind will become composed, and he will penetrate through the dark mass of defilements.

The Buddha thus answered the questions of Ven. Sāriputta with a view to pave the way stage by stages that invariably leads to the Arahāt fruition stage. The 500 disciples of Ven. Sāriputta became Arahāts at the conclusion of the discourse, and 300 million Devas and humans were emancipated through realization of the four noble truths.

25b: The 7th Year (Slander)

The Female Wanderer Ciñcā Māṇavikā

The Buddha, after emancipating the 500 disciples of Ven. Sāriputta and the 300 million Devas and humans through the realization of the four noble truths, proceeded to Sāvattthī to take up residence at the Jetavana monastery and to resume teaching the Dhamma to the sentient beings who went there.

It was at that time, a lowly, wily, female wandering ascetic by the name of Ciñcā Māṇavikā made a malicious, slanderous charge against the Buddha. The following is an account of that calumniate attack.

During the first 20 years of his Dispensation, termed the first period after Awakening (paṭhama-bodhi) the number of disciples of the Buddha increased by leaps and bounds, like a rising tide. And the number of humans, Devas and Brahmas who attained the four stages of fruition (ariya-bhūmi) also increased with time; and the attributes of the Buddha, such as being worthy, spread right up to the roof of the world; the volume of offerings made to the Buddha and the Saṅgha grew so much the greater, while the power of the heretics waned and the offerings made to them dwindled to a vanishing point, just like the diminishing glow of fireflies as the sun rises up in the morning.

Sectarians stood at road junctions and made attempts to induce or court the people to make offerings to them, saying: “Devotees, the ascetic Gotama is not the only one who has become a Buddha; we have become Buddhas as well! Is merit gained by making offerings to the ascetic Gotama only? You can gain merit by making offerings to us as well!”

Their appeals were of no avail, and they therefore assembled for a secret meeting to devise ways and means to calumniate the ascetic Gotama, so that people might not make offerings to him through a lack of respect and esteem.

At that time, there lived in Sāvattthī, a wandering female ascetic by the name of Ciñcā Māṇavikā. She was so named because she was born of a moisture-laden tamarind (ciñcā) tree, and she was born in a Brahmin family, and was young (māṇavikā); hence she was popularly known as the Brahmin damsel who took conception in a tamarind tree, Ciñcā Māṇavikā. She was said to be as pretty and gracious as a Devakaññā and her body emitted rays that spiralled around her body.

As the discussion was in progress, a cruel, stupid sectarian put forward a plot to slander the Buddha and bring about his destruction by employing Ciñcā Māṇavikā as an instrument to achieve their selfish ends. This plot was approved and accepted as an effective device for cutting off the flow of gifts to the ascetic Gotama.

When the wandering ascetic, Ciñcā Māṇavikā, went to their parks and stood before them in a worshipping posture, she was totally ignored by the heretics. She was anxious to know what was held against her. She, therefore, addressed them: “Good Sirs, I worshipped you three times, what wrong have I done to you? What is my offence? What is the cause of your silence?” [625]

This was their censorious reply: “Sister Ciñcā, don’t you know that the ascetic Gotama has been going round and doing harm to us by depriving us of gifts?”

Whereupon, Ciñcā said: “What can I do for you in this matter?” They gave her this express reply: “Ciñcā, if you have our welfare at heart, you might calumniate the ascetic Gotama by using your personal charm as an instrument to destroy his fame, honour and gifts.” She was thus charged with the task of performing a dirty job.

Ciñcā pledged boldly: “Very well, good sirs, you may rest assured that I will accomplish the task entrusted to me. Have no more worries over this matter,” and she left the heretics’ park. She then started to put her wily ways into action. She dressed herself in a costume that was as red as the colour of a flying insect and made her way towards Jetavana monastery with a bouquet in her hand, at about the time when people were leaving the monastery after hearing the discourses. People casually asked her: “Where are you headed for?” she replied: “What would you gain from knowing my destination?” arousing people’s suspicion on her.

She actually went her way into the parks of the heretics in the proximity of Jetavana monastery and spent her nights there. At the time people were arriving from the city of Sāvattihī to pay homage to the Buddha early in the morning, she prepared herself to look as if she had spent the night at the Jetavana monastery and was making her way back to Sāvattihī. When asked as to where she had passed the night, she gave a similar answer: “What would you gain from knowing where I slept last night?” to create suspicion in their minds.

She kept up the same routine everyday. After a lapse of one and a half months she began her campaign of imputation by replying: “I passed the night with the ascetic Gotama in his scented chamber.” That caused the ordinary people to wonder whether she might be speaking the truth. Some three or four months later, she pretended pregnancy by tying her abdomen with rags and covering herself with a red dress. And she started telling people that she got pregnant by the ascetic Gotama, an accusation wrongly believed by unthinking people.

After a lapse of eight or nine months, Ciñcā Māṇavikā tied a block of wood, which was cut into the shape of half a bowl, round her body and wore a red costume to assume the form of a pregnant woman. She struck her hands and feet with the jaw bones of a cow to appear like a worn-out and fatigued expectant mother. She then made her way one evening to where the Buddha was sitting on the Dhamma throne and teaching the four assemblies.

She stood right in front of the Buddha and made the following malicious accusation: “Ascetic, you have been calmly teaching the people with compressed lips! As for me, I have become an expectant mother through association with you. You have a heart to remain without thinking about the arrangements for confinement or for the collection of butter-oil. If you don’t care to do such things yourself, you should have charged King Kosala or Anāthapiṇḍika or Visākhā, the supporters of your monastery with the task to do the needful for me. You have been irresponsible and callous towards your own blood, but you know how to amuse yourself by sensual pleasures.”

Ciñcā thus levelled a malicious accusation against the Buddha in the presence of a huge congregation like a stupid woman trying to destroy the moon with a lump of faeces in her hand!

Whereupon, the Buddha suspended his teaching and, like a lion king, refuted her charge with a raised voice: “Sister Ciñcā, only you and I know whether what you have just said is true or false.”

Ciñcā was not to be daunted, she made another attack with these words: [626] “True enough, ascetic, this is a matter between you and I only, this advanced stage of pregnancy.”

Whereupon, the emerald throne of Sakka began to grow warm causing him to deliberate as to its cause; he perceived that: “Ciñcā had made a malicious allegation against the Buddha.” Thinking: “I will go and sort out the matter myself in the presence of the people,” he therefore descended to where the Buddha was teaching, accompanied by four Devas. These four Devas transformed themselves into four rats and bit off the strings on the wooden disc, and as the wind blew Ciñcā’s clothes upwards, the wooden disc dropped right on top of her ten toes, breaking them off.

All those present condemned her and spat on her; holding stones, spears and sticks, they dragged her out of the precincts of the monastery. Once she was out of sight of the Buddha, the earth split into two to claim her body. She was soon wrapped up in the flaming tongues of the fires that covered her in the bottom of the great hell, Mahā Avīci.

When the people saw the heretics in their true colours, they made even less offerings to them, while the alms received by Buddha grew again without limitation.

On the following day, all the monastics assembled in the central hall and were discussing the topic of the day: “Friends, Ciñcā had been ruined for her false allegations against the most exalted Buddha, who is worthy of all homage that the world could make.” The Buddha went to the hall and asked: “Monastics, what is the subject of your discussion?” On being informed by the monastics that they were discussing the fate of Ciñcā, the Buddha recounted her past story making reference to the Birth Story about Prince Mahā Paduma (Mahā-paduma-jātaka, Ja 472) saying: “This is not the first time that she had made false allegations against me and suffered in consequence thereof,” and he proceeded to tell the story.

The Birth Story about Prince Mahā Paduma

Once upon a time, King Brahmadata was ruling the country of Bārāṇasī when the Bodhisatta took conception in the womb of the queen. When he was born, he was named Prince Mahā Paduma, as his face resembled a newly blossomed Sacred Lotus (paduma) species.

When he came of age, he was sent to Takkaṣilā to learn the arts and crafts; and on completion of his studies, he returned to his country and found that his mother had passed away and that his father had made another woman his Chief Queen. He was formally declared as the Crown Prince, and the sole heir to the throne.

Sometime later, the king had to go to the border areas to suppress some insurrections. He told the queen: “Chief Queen, I am going to the border areas to suppress insurrections and you shall remain in this royal palace with ease and comfort.” Whereupon, the queen said: “I do not like to stay behind, I would like to accompany you to the front line.” The king explained to her the dangers of battlefields: “Chief Queen, you had better stay in the royal palace until my return without any feeling of melancholy through lonesomeness; I will leave instructions with the Crown Prince to attend on you with due diligence.”

The king then went to the disturbed areas, and returned after driving away the rebels, and rehabilitating the affected areas, but he did not immediately enter the city on arrival instead, he stayed in a temporary accommodation outside the city for a time, until the auspicious time for re-entering the city would come about.

When the Bodhisatta, Crown Prince Mahā Paduma, heard of the news of his father’s return, he made arrangements to welcome his father by decorating the city and setting the palace in order. Having done all this, he entered the apartment of the Chief Queen all alone. On seeing the amazing beauty of the prince, the Chief Queen felt an intense attraction towards him. The prince paid his respects to the queen and asked: “Royal mother, how can I be of help to you?” The queen replied: “Don’t you call me mother,” and so saying she got up and held the prince by the hands and ordered him to get up on to [627] the bed, saying: “The two of us will enjoy sexual pleasures to the full before the king returns.”

As one who treasured his morality, the prince gave a firm reply: “Royal Queen mother! You have become my mother ever since the demise of my own mother. You are a married woman, I have never in all my life looked at a woman with a legal husband with concupiscence, and how would a self-restrained person like me commit such a hideous crime in collusion with you?”

After making three or four vain attempts to make the prince yield to her temptations, the queen resorted to threatening him, asking: “Will you not obey my order?” – “No, I will not,” replied the prince boldly and bluntly. Whereupon, she made it plain to him: “I will lodge a false allegation against you with the king, so that he will break your head into pieces.” – “You may slander me as you like but I won’t yield to your temptations.” He left her chamber after putting her to shame.

The queen, being conscious of her own guilt, made up her mind to save her skin by lodging a false allegation against the prince with the king without delay, as her life was at stake, lest the prince might reveal her secret before she could see the king. She scratched her body all over with her own fingernails and lay on her bed without taking any food, feigning illness. She instructed her attendants how they should answer the king when he asked them about her in due course.

The king entered the city after circumambulating it and sat on the throne. When he could not see his queen, he enquired about her and her attendant reported that she was not well. He went to her chamber and asked: “My dear queen, what ails you?” She pretended not to hear his words two or three times and, at last, she made this reply: “King, what has made you to press for an answer that I am loath to give? Please keep silent and save me from shame. My case is quite different from those of other married women!” On hearing such an insinuation, the king asked her in a severe tone: “Do tell me at once who has done wrong to you and I will break the head of the criminal.”

In response to the king, she asked this question: “King, under whose charge was this city kept when you left?” – “It was left under the charge of my son, the Crown Prince,” replied the king. The queen then started to tell her fabricated story to calumniate the Crown Prince: “Your majesty, the very person you left in charge of the city, Prince Paduma, entered my room all alone and tried to make me yield to his temptations, and when I beseeched him meekly not to offend his mother, he retorted rudely: ‘Is there any other king than myself, I will keep you in house and enjoy sexual pleasures with you to the full.’ When I refused to yield to him, he pulled me by my hair, beat me all over my body and then, throwing me down on the floor, he outraged me and left my chamber.”

The King Orders the Execution of Mahā Paduma

The king lost his sense of reasoning through anger, like a venomous cobra, and ordered the execution of the prince. The executioners entered the residence of the prince, beat him most severely, bound his hands at the back and brought him out of his house with a ring of red-primrose round his neck, like a prisoner given the death sentence.

The prince knew that the queen was responsible for the whole affair, and he followed the executioners complaining: “Executors, I have done nothing against the king, I am innocent.” The whole city was shocked and tense with fear, and the citizens exchanged views among themselves: “The king has misunderstood Prince Mahā Paduma, and ordered his execution on the strength of his wife’s false allegation.” They rallied round at the feet of the prince, crying and sobbing aloud: “Crown Prince, the kind of sentence passed upon you is not just and reasonable,” and they wept and cried at the top of their voices around him.

When the executioners had brought the prince before him, the king, in a fit of temper, at once ordered the execution of the prince, by throwing him into a steep chasm which was the usual place where robbers were thrown with their heads down. In passing the order, the king remarked that the prince, though his own son, was guilty of impersonating him and offending the queen. Whereupon, the Crown Prince protested: “Royal father, I am not [628] guilty of such allegations, Please do not cause my destruction on the strength of your wife’s allegation.” But his appeal fell on the deaf ears of the king.

The citizens were not alone in weeping over the fate of the prince but 16,000 courtiers, also wept, muttering: “Darling son, Mahā Paduma, it is a great pity that such a punishment has been meted on you for no fault of your own.”

All the princes, princesses, ministers, Brahmins, rich men, all rank and file made joint appeal to the king: “Your majesty, Mahā Paduma has a peerless character, he is a righteous heir to the throne, both by right and by tradition, do not cause the destruction of the heir to the throne on the strength of your wife’s allegation, without investigating into the matter in the name of justice, this is our prayer.” Their appeal was made in seven verses as follows:

1. Noble King, a ruler should not order the destruction of life and limbs of an accused person without personal knowledge; without investigation into the allegation against the accused.

In the time of Mahā Sammata, the one raised to the status of a supreme ruler by the people, there was no order or penalty exacting more than 100 pieces of money; no penalty demanding the destruction of life and limbs beyond corporeal punishment or banishment. Punishments of more severe forms were adopted by cruel rulers in later times. Therefore, the ministers had made the above appeal with reference to the said precedence.

2. A noble king, who happened to cause the destruction of life and limbs of an accused without proper investigation being made into the allegation, is likened to a person born blind who swallowed a fly-contaminated, unwholesome food with attendant troubles; such an act is tantamount to partaking of food enmeshed with thorns.

3. A king who happened to punish an innocent person, who does not deserve any punishment, and has allowed a guilty person to escape unpunished, through power-intoxication, is considered to have taken an uneven path full of dangers, like a person born blind. He does not discriminate between the even path of the ten meritorious paths and the uneven path of demerit and is destined to be punished in the plane of misery.

4. A king who examines cases according to correct procedure, and adjudges or adjudicates the guilt or otherwise of cases, trivial or great, in the name of [629] justice, is a ruler invested with the qualifications expected of a king fit to rule over a domain or territory.

5. Noble King, it is not possible for anyone to remain forever in a position of responsibility when he always exercises extreme measures, either soft or rough. A ruler needs a carefully balanced judgement to discriminate between what requires gentle handling and what demands stern treatment.

6. Noble King, one who governs his people with kindly disposition is constantly open to contempt and disrespect from his subjects. On the other hand, a ruler who governs his subjects harshly and oppressively is liable to provoke hostility and hatred in the people he governs. A king should be able to discriminate between the two extremes and resort to the middle course in the interest of peace and tranquillity.

7. Noble King, one who is inflamed by passion may speak in many different ways; one who is inflamed by malice may also speak in many different ways. Therefore, there is no justification in causing the death of the Crown Prince without proper consideration and mainly on the strength of false accusations made by a woman acting under the influence of burning passion and malice.

The minister's submissions and solicitations failed to move the king. Prince Paduma himself tried several times for the revocation of the royal order in different ways, but to no avail. The king stood firm on his judgement and ordered: "All of you go to the chasm and throw down this ignorant blunderer forthwith."

All the citizens took sides with the man of standing, the Crown Prince, and my Chief Queen is all alone, and in the circumstances, I will take the side of the queen. Go ye all to the chasm and get the traitor, Prince Paduma, thrown into the robbers' pit forthwith.

Upon hearing this summary order, the female members of the crowd could not help crying. All the people raised their arms in protest and shouted out as they followed the prince with their hair spread over their bodies in distress. The foolish king was under the impression that the people would stand in the way of throwing the prince into the pit; so he went along with the weeping crowd under escort right up to the pit. He caused the prince to be borne with his head down and the feet up and flung cruelly into the [630] pit in his very presence.

The Bodhisatta's Loving-Kindness

Under the influence of the Bodhisatta's loving-kindness (mettā), the guardian deity of the mountain made himself visible and consoled the prince: "Prince Paduma, don't worry," and he held him in his arms close to his chest, so that the prince might be comforted by the pervading warmth of the deity. He then descended the cliff and placed the prince on the expanded hood of a Nāga King who was dwelling at the foot of the mountain.

The Nāga King took the prince to the Nāga kingdom and shared with him the ease and comfort in the country of the Nāgas. Having stayed in the company of Nāgas for a whole year, the Bodhisatta intimated his desire to leave: "I am going to the world of humans." The Nāga King asked: "To which place do you intend going?" – "To the Himālayas," was the reply. The Nāga King took the prince to the Himālayas and after providing him with the requisites of recluses and ascetics, he returned to his country. The Bodhisatta spent his days as a recluse developing absorption and the super knowledges (jhāna-abhiññā) and living on herbs, fruits and roots.

After some time, a hunter of the city of Bārāṇasī came upon the abode of the recluse and recognized that he was the Crown Prince. He asked the recluse: "Noble Prince, are you not Prince Mahā Paduma?" – "Yes, I am, my dear man," was the reply. The hunter paid homage to the Bodhisatta and stayed with him for a few days before he returned to the city of Bārāṇasī. On arrival, he went to the king and reported: "Your majesty, your son, Prince Mahā Paduma is living in the forest in the Himālayas as a recluse. I have seen him and stayed with him for a few days.” Whereupon, the king asked: “Have you seen him personally?” – “Yes, your majesty, I have,” was the hunter’s response.

The king proceeded to the place in the company of a great number of army personnel and halted at the edge of the forest in a temporary shed hoping to see his son. When he met face to face with the recluse sitting in front of his hut, like a golden image, he paid his respects and sat in a suitable spot. The ministers exchanged greetings with the recluse. The Bodhisatta presented the king with fruits and exchanged greetings in an amicable manner.

The king began to ask, by means of a verse:

Aneka-tāle narake, gambhīre ca suduttare, pātito giri-duggasmiṃ, kena tvaṃ tattha nāmari?

Dear son, how did you manage to survive after you had been thrown upside down into a precipice with a depth of several lengths of palm trees that was difficult to escape?

Then a dialogue between the father and the son ensued:

Nāgo jāta-phaṇo tattha, thālavā giri-sānujo, paccagahi maṃ bhogehi, tenāhaṃ tattha nāmarim.

Royal father, a powerful Nāga that sprang into being on the sides of the mountain valleys received me on its expanded hood from the hands of a guardian deity of that locality. That was how I escaped from the danger of being smashed to death after I had been thrown into the precipice of unfathomable depth.

The royal father was greatly delighted by the Bodhisatta’s reply and said solemnly: “I am a vile person to have offended a righteous son like you at the instigation of my wife. I humbly plead for favour and your pardon for my blundering offence against you,” with his head bent at the feet of the Bodhisatta.

Whereupon, the Bodhisatta convinced his father: [631] “Your majesty, please do get up, I forbear all your offences, and my sincere wish is that you avoid becoming such a person again, behaving blindly without consideration and investigation.” The king said in reply: “Dear son, your acceptance of kingship with all its glories over the territories alone will signify your forbearance towards me.”

Ehi taṃ paṭinessāmi, rāja-putta sakam̃ gharam̃, rajjam̃ kārehi bhaddante, kiṃ araṅṅe karissasi?

My royal son, Prince Mahā Paduma, I am taking you back as the rightful heir to the throne of the kingdom of Bārāṇasī. May you reign with glory and greatness. Can you accept the kingship and sovereignty over the domains? How will you promote the welfare and prosperity of the citizens in such a wilderness cut off from civilization?

The following is the prince's reply in verse:

Yathā gilitvā baḷisaṃ, uddhareyya salohitaṃ, uddharitvā sukhī assa, evaṃ passāmi attanaṃ.

O king father, just like a man who had accidentally swallowed a hook brought it out immediately together with the blood before it went far enough to reach the vital heart, so that he might keep his mind and body in a state of peace and tranquillity, so I see myself as a person who had accidentally swallowed a hook but had removed it in time to live in peace and tranquillity.

*Kiṃ nu tvaṃ baḷisaṃ brūsi? Kiṃ tvaṃ brūsi salohitaṃ?
Kiṃ nu tvaṃ ubbhataṃ brūsi? Taṃ me akkhāhi pucchito.*

Dear son, what do you mean by hook? What do you mean by blood? What do you mean by removing? I beseech you to enlighten me by answering these questions for me!

Kāmāhaṃ baḷisaṃ brūmi, hatthi-assaṃ salohitaṃ, cattāhaṃ ubbhataṃ brūmi, evaṃ jānāhi khattiya.

O royal father, I have seen, by way of wisdom, the five sensual pleasures as a hook; worldly wealth or possessions, such as elephants and horses as blood; renunciation of the five sensual pleasures as removing, try to understand these things discriminately by contemplative knowledge.

After he had given the above answer, he continued to give his father instructions for guidance in administering justice: “Noble King, as already mentioned above, I have nothing to do whatsoever with the kingship of Bārāṇasī, and what I wish to commend to you is to rule by strict adherence to the ten codes of conduct for a ruling monarch, without [632] the influence of four wrong courses of actions.

The ten codes of conduct of a king: alms giving, morality, charity, straightness, gentleness, self-restraint, non-anger, forbearance, austerity and non-opposition. The wrong courses of action are those dominated by desire, ill-will, delusion and fear.

The King Punished the Queen

The king, after several vain attempts to persuade his son to return to his country, made his way back to his capital, crying and weeping all along the route. In the course of his journey, he questioned his ministers: “Who is responsible for the severance of my son from me?” They all unanimously replied: “You have sustained the loss of such a worthy and honourable son through your Chief Queen.” On his arrival at the city, he immediately caused the queen to be flung over the precipice upside down before he entered the royal palace. He ruled over the country and the people wisely and justly ever after.

The Buddha, after teaching the above discourse, proceeded to say: “Monks, in this manner Ciñcā had decried me by abusive language in a previous existence also.”

Ciñcā-māṇavikā mātā, Devadatto ca me pitā, Ānando paṇḍito nāgo, Sāriputto ca devatā, rāja-putto ahaṃ āsiṃ, evaṃ dhāretha Jātakam.

Monks, Ciñcā was then the queen, the stepmother; my brother-in-law Devadatta was then the king; Ānanda was then the wise Nāga; Sāriputta was then the guardian deity of the mountain, and I was then Prince Mahā Paduma, remember the Birth Story (Jātaka) thus.

The Birth Story was brought to a close with this verse. The Buddha proceeded to reveal the fact that there is no immoral act that a liar dare not commit: “Monks, one who has abandoned the course of telling the truth and pursued the course of telling lies, has also forsaken the advantages of the attainment of Nibbāna and rebirth in the worlds of Devas and humans, and as such, there is no immoral act that they loath to perform!”

Ekam dhammam atītassa, musā-vādissa jantuno, vitiṇṇa-para-lokassa, natthi pāpaṃ akāriyaṃ.

Monks, one who has breached the course of not telling lies has also forsaken the advantages of Nibbāna and rebirths in the realms of Devas and humans, and as such, there is no immoral act that these people, destined for planes of woes, will not dare to perform.

At the conclusion of the discourse, a large multitude of beings attained Stream-entry (Sotāpatti) and other noble states.

The following is an exposition of the original cause that actuated wicked Ciñcā to make the accusation: Prior to an infinite period of four immeasurable periods and 100,000 aeons before the definite prophecy of Awakening had been made, the Bodhisatta was a person of distracted mind, with wrong attitudes through constant association with bad people of the most hopeless type. On one occasion, he chanced to slander an Arahāt named Nanda, a disciple of Buddha Sabbābhibhū, by accusing him of having unlawful association with a woman. This was a very grave offence of slandering a noble person (ariya). [633]

As a result of such a false accusation against a noble person (ariyūpavāda), he had to suffer in the plane of misery for many a year, and once released from it and reborn in the world of humans, he was subjected to false accusations, existence after existence, and in the last existence as a Buddha, he was accused by the wicked Ciñcā Māṇavikā in the presence of the four assemblies.

Apadāna 39.10 gives a full account on this matter as expounded by the Buddha himself.

The Female Wanderer Sundarī

As stated above, heretics outside the teaching, because of a paucity of offerings being made to them, had the wicked woman Ciñcā slander the Buddha. They made another attempt to slander the Buddha by a similar ruse when they engaged a good looking sectarian woman named Sundarī at a time when the Buddha was residing in Sāvattihī (Sundarī-sutta, Ud 4.8).

While the Buddha was residing at Jetavana monastery, all humans, Devas and Brahmas paid homage to him and the Saṅgha; they revered, honoured and made offerings to them. The four requisites of robes, food, accommodation and medicine were always in ample supply for them. For the Buddha and the Saṅgha, their accumulation of meritorious deeds in the past was immense and also their practice of the true path in the present existence was productive of merit. The beneficial results from these two wholesome sources, combined together to produce an incessant flow of requisites and offerings for them, just like the huge volume of water pouring forth from the confluence of two big rivers.

In sharp contrast, the heretics suffered from a deficiency of the four requisites and other offerings. This is attributed to their lack of meritorious deeds in the past and the wrong practice they followed in the present.

At that time, there lived in Sāvattthī a young heretic maiden who was in her most impressive youth excelling others in comely appearance; hence she was named Sundarī which means Lovely, though her behaviour by deed, word and thought were not lovely, but deplorable.

The heretics gathered together to devise ways and means to slander the Buddha and the Saṅgha out of covetousness. They all took part in the discussions with that end in view: “Dear sirs, we have been ruined beyond redemption since the coming of the ascetic Gotama and we have suffered much from a paucity of gifts, because people have almost forgotten about our existence. What has prompted the people to make such wonderful offerings to the ascetic Gotama with such profound respect and enthusiasm?”

One of the heretics present at the meeting offered his opinion: “Dear sirs, the ascetic Gotama is a direct descendant of the noble Mahā Sammata, through an uninterrupted royal lineage in the pure Sakya clan. That must be the reason why people have honoured him and made offerings so profusely.” Another heretic had this to say: “It is because of a variety of miraculous events that took place at the time of his birth.”

Likewise many heretic leaders presented their individual views: “It is because, when his father, King Suddhodana made him pay homage by raising his two hands in a worshipping gesture towards the recluse Asita, just after his birth, the baby’s feet miraculously flew aloft and rested on the matted hair of the ascetic. And when his parents placed him under the cool shade of a rose-apple tree during the ploughing ceremony, while the shades of many other trees moved with the sun, the shade of the rose-apple tree under which the prince reposed stood unchanged even after noon-tide.”

“It is because he is extraordinarily handsome,” said another, while yet another speculated: “It might be because he had forsaken the throne of the Universal Monarch with all its glories and renounced the world through seeing the four great signs, that the people have been paying homage and making offerings in greater volumes.”

They went about speculating, but without finding the real cause of the immense respect being paid to the Buddha by the people because they were totally ignorant of the Buddha's [634] incomparable attributes of the perfections (pāramī), charity (cāga) and good conduct (cariyā).

After an exchange of fruitless discussions, one of the fiercest heretics came forward with a plot to destroy the fame and gains of Gotama with the aid of a woman, saying: "Dear sirs, there is no one in this world who is immune from the desire for sexual pleasures derived from a woman and the ascetic Gotama, being young and good looking like a Deva, will certainly get entangled with a maiden of his own age and appearance, if and when available. Even when he cannot be completely tempted, people will begin to have doubt about his moral uprightness. Come let us send the wandering woman Sundarī on a mission to bring ruin to the ascetic Gotama's reputation throughout the land."

Upon hearing this suggestion, all the heretics spoke in support of him: "Your plan is excellent, indeed. This will bring about the downfall of the ascetic Gotama. He will have no alternative but to run away with his head hanging down." They all decided to turn the resolution into action and went in a group to Sundarī.

On seeing the heretics, Sundarī asked: "Why have you all come here in a group?" They went to a corner and sat there without giving her any reply. She approached them in a submissive manner and asked them again and again: "Have I done any thing wrong and, if so, what is my offence?"

At last, they gave this reply: "We have not given you any reply since you have neglected us when we have been oppressed by someone." Sundarī asked them: "Who has oppressed you?" Whereupon, they revealed their case: "Don't you see the ascetic Gotama wandering around and depriving us of offerings, to our great disadvantage?" – "Good Sirs, in this matter, how can I be of assistance?" They replied: "Sister, can you really work for the good of your own relatives?" They tried to tie her to a commitment.

They had employed the word "relatives" to win her over, though there was no blood relationship. The heretics are indeed very terrible in their deception.

Whereupon, Sundarī said: “Good Sirs, what should I do for you, there is nothing that I cannot do. I am prepared to sacrifice my own life to do anything that would be of advantage to relatives like you.”

She had thus pledged herself to fulfil their wishes and she could not shrink back, like a deer that had got itself entangled in a bush.

The heretics told her: “Sister, you have pledged to do anything that would be of advantage to us. As you are in your most impressive youth, at the first stage of life, do anything to the best of your ability that will ruin the ascetic Gotama by means of your own irresistible personality.” Thus encouraging her vanity, they sent her away on a mission with a hint that she should pay constant visits to the Jetavana monastery.

Foolish Sundarī, like a person who wishes to dance with a ring of flowers on the teeth of a saw; like one who attempts to catch a bull elephant in musk by its trunk; like one who extends a warm welcome to the king of death by bowing the head besmeared herself with sweet scents and bedecked herself with flowers, and went her way towards the Jetavana monastery, at the time when people were coming out of the precincts of the monastery after hearing the discourses. When asked, she said: “I am going to the ascetic Gotama with whom I usually stay together in his own chamber.” But she dared not enter the monastery and instead, made her way to the nearby hermitage of the heretics. She returned by the same route to the city when people were going to the monastery in the morning. When asked, she told them that she had just come out of the chamber of the Buddha with whom she had stayed the night, giving him sexual gratification.

After a few days the heretics, being satisfied with the part played by Sundarī, bribed some villains and instigated them to kill Sundarī and to conceal her body under heaps of decayed flowers in a ditch adjacent to the Buddha’s chamber. The drunkards carried out their instructions. The heretics then spread the news that Sundarī was missing, and went to King Kosala and reported that their female disciple, Sundarī, was missing and could not be found. The king asked them if there was any place held in suspicion. They informed him that they suspected she was located in the Jetavana monastery. The king then ordered for a search [635] to be made in the Jetavana monastery.

The heretics went with their disciples to the Jetavana monastery and pretended to look for the wandering woman Sundarī. They found the dead body of Sundarī beneath the heaps of decayed flowers in a ditch and brought the corpse into the king's presence on a decorated bedstead. They made the king believe that the disciples of the Buddha had slain the young Sundarī and left her corpse beneath the heap of decayed flowers to conceal the evil deed of their master, ascetic Gotama. The thoughtless king passed a summary order without any formal investigation, to the effect that the corpse be carried and shown around the city, street by street, to make all the citizens aware of the case.

Encouraged by the ill-considered judgement of the king, the heretics carried the corpse of Sundarī on a decorated bier and went all over the city, from street to street, from one junction to another, announcing: “All men and women please know this. See for yourselves what the descendants of the Sakyan race have done. They are shameless; they are of evil nature, they have no morals; they are wont to tell lies; and they indulge in sexual intercourse, and, yet they make false claims pretending to be good monastics, saying without shame: ‘We observe precepts, we are virtuous, we are of good conduct, of morality, developing noble practices, speaking only what is true.’ But for these recluses there are no more precepts; noble precepts are a thing of the past, how can there be any element of virtue in them? How can there be noble practice? They are bereft of precepts, bereft of noble practices. Why has someone slain a person of the fair sex after ravishing her?”

They also made the citizens of Sāvattthī make similar slanderous charges. When the citizens saw the monastics, they made accusations against them as instigated by the heretics: “These monastic-princes of the Sakyan race are shameless, without virtue, stupid and liars. They indulge in sexual practices, pretend to be virtuous, righteous, straightforward, noble, truthful and moderate persons. In actual fact, they are without virtue, without precepts, the precepts for monastics are no more than things of the past. How can there be any noble precepts or elements of virtue in them? They have no noble qualities whatsoever. Why should a man slay a woman after he has enjoyed sex with her?” The citizens thus condemned the monastics when they were seen in the city, using vulgar language and humiliated them in an aggressive manner.

On their return from Sāvattthī, after the regular rounds for alms food, the monastics went to the Buddha and addressed him: “Most exalted lord, when the people of Sāvattthī saw the monastics they accused them, saying in vulgar language: “These monastics of Sakyan race are shameless, without virtue and liars. They indulge in sexual practices, and they pretend to be virtuous, righteous, straightforward, noble, truthful and moderate persons. But they are, in fact, without virtue, without precepts, without noble practices or habits, the precepts for monastics are no more than things of the past. How can there be any precepts or noble qualities whatsoever? Why has someone killed a woman after he has ravished her?”

Thus the monastics told the Buddha how they had been calumniated, reviled, abused, oppressed in very harsh language not fit for the ears of noble people. The Buddha explained to them that these people will reap as they sow, by offending the monastics and said: “Monastics, such voices of slander will last only for seven days and they are bound to disappear after seven days. You should refute these people who have calumniated, reviled, abused and oppressed you in very harsh language not fit for the ears of noble people by uttering the following verse:

Abhūta-vādī Nirayaṃ upeti, [636] yo vāpi katvā na karomi cāha, ubho pi te pecca samā bhavanti, nihīna-kammā manujā paratthā.

A person who is in the habit of speaking falsehood by saying, I have seen it, I have heard it, I have met with it, I know about it, though he has not personally seen it, heard it, though he has no knowledge of it; and a person who denies commission of his own offence are equally guilty. Both of these vile people who have done low, base deeds are liable to be reborn in the plane of misery after death.

The monastics learnt the verse from the Buddha and uttered it in the presence of those citizens by way of refutation. On hearing the verse of refutation uttered by the monastics, it dawned on the citizens: “The monastics, belonging to the Sakyan race, have not committed the murder as charged by the heretics through proclamation all over the city. There is one thing that deserves consideration: These noble persons did not care to take any steps whatsoever to retaliate upon us for abusing, reviling and slandering them by using vulgar language not fit for their ears. Instead, they are seen to have put up with false allegations and have thus shown forbearance (khanti) by gently, meekly carrying on with their wholesome deeds (soracca). And, above all, they simply taught to us and explained to us, who have blindly and inconsiderately slandered them, reviled them, the evil consequences of lying and denying commission of one's own offence, to prove that they are innocent, by way of an avowal of truth (sacca-kiriya).
